Blow-up portraits of the Society's founders and distinguished contributors will enhance the entire exhibit's setting while honoring these individuals' assistance over our nearly twelve decades of existence.

Two curators join museum staff

Dan Tomberlin brings skills and experience in both exhibit and graphic design to his new position as Curator of Exhibits. He will be designing and supervising the fabrication and installation of both permanent and temporary (including traveling) exhibits for the museum.

Over the next two years, Tomberlin will be responsible for the major Haynes Gallery installation that is funded by grants and private donations. This permanent exhibit, whose construction will begin soon, will tell the story of F. Jay Haynes' and his family's life and work.

The rich collection to be displayed includes the photographs, cameras and working equipment F. Jay Haynes used in the late 19th century and items from his years in Yellowstone National Park—even including a tourist stagecoach.

In the 20th century, his son Jack Ellis Haynes continued to photograph the Park and to run the family business there. He and his wife Isabel were also art collectors, and the works they gathered will be included in the display.

"It's the scope of this exhibit," Tomberlin explains, "that made this position especially tempting."

Since arriving here in September, Tomberlin has been working on designing this exhibit while remodeling the Museum workshop and planning other, smaller displays.

One of these will introduce the visitor to Territory Junction, setting the context by visually explaining the evolution of Montana's territorial-era communities.

Tomberlin holds a bachelors degree in graphic design from the University of South Carolina and has done graduate work in art history at University of Denver. He worked as an exhibits specialist at the Colorado Heritage Center in Denver, and was Curator of Exhibits for the Columbus (Georgia) Museum. He has also worked as an advertising graphics designer and a freelance designer.

Mary Hoffschwelle joined our staff in August, coming from Colonial Williamsburg in Williamsburg, Virginia, to serve as Curator of the Original Governor's Mansion in Helena.

Born in Billings but raised in Pittsburgh, she was pleased to find a job that combined returning west with a way to use her training as a historic site curator.

Since her arrival, she has begun a thorough research into the building's history, and has just now completed looking at the years it was the private home of W. A. Chessman. Hoffschwelle has found, for example, that the house was completed in 1888 by architect E. J. Hodgson—putting to rest the legend begun by Chessman's elderly son in the 1950s, when he credited Cass Gilbert and set the year of construction at 1885.

Another long-term project for Hoffschwelle is documenting all the home's furnishings, both permanent and loaned.

Meanwhile, she is working with the Mansion Board to plan a Christmas house tour based at the Mansion, which will be decorated in Victorian style for the holiday.

Ironically, she says, her work at Colonial Williamsburg was with the Governor's Palace, as Assistant Conservator in preparation for totally refurbishing the building.

"It's an exciting challenge," she says, "to move into this very recent period of history after studying one of America's oldest sites."

She holds a masters degree in American history from the College of William and Mary, with an apprenticeship in administration and interpretation of historic sites completed at Williamsburg in 1980.

At Montana's Original Governor's Mansion,

Hoffschwelle oversees a part-time guide who works daily, plus a group of 21 Society docents specially trained for the Mansion. They are on call for tours and special occasions.

Groups traveling to Helena who want to arrange for a tour of the Mansion should contact Hoffschwelle at the Society.

History Conference a study in diversity

The Eighth Annual History Conference, held in Helena October 1-3, could not have begun with more enthusiasm and good fun than it did when Perrie Reinoelhl of the Old Time Fiddlers, cowboy singer Ken Trowbridge, Mexican singer Pete Rodriguez, and cowboy poet Wally McRae entertained over 200 guests at the Montana Historical Society. It was a convivial launching for the three-day gathering that had more variety than any previous history conference.

Conference attendees chose from informative sessions on Friday, October 2 that ranged from discussions of the Winters Doctrine and Indian water rights in Montana to an overview of the history of medicine in the state. The disastrous 1910 forest fires and the development of smoke-jumper firefighters in the northwest were discussion topics in another Friday session. Panelists in two other sessions treated the history of women's organizations in Montana and recent discoveries by archeologists who are probing Montana's prehistoric past.

This year's Friday evening banquet featured a truly exceptional address on a seldom discussed and almost never researched topic: children on the frontier. Social historian Elliott West, a professor of history at University of Arkansas and author of a recent article in Montana, described what a child's life was like on the western mining frontier and how adults perceived children. In many ways, West concluded, our views of children have not changed over the last one hundred years, but the experiences of those kids in rough-and-tumble mining camps were unique to that time and place and part of a truer portrait of western social history.

Michael Malone's entertaining and informative sketch of Butte at the turn of the century, drawn from his award winning The Battle for Butte (Univ. of Wash. Press, 1981), was one of the high points in an exciting session on the state's most famous mining city. Montana State University professors Richard Roeder and Jerry Calvert rounded out the panel with discussions of Butte's culture and socialistic politics.

Saturday morning a large audience heard three knowledgeable speakers discuss the political careers of Montana's great senators at mid-century: James E. Murray, Mike Mansfield, and Lee Metcalf. Donald Spritzer, librarian at Missoula County Library and expert on Senator Murray, commented on the senator's life-long adherence to liberal political principles. Jeff Safford of Montana State University presented a very challenging interpretation of Senator Mansfield's successes as a Montana politician and national statesman. Former aide to both senators Murray and Metcalf, Vic Reinemer of Washington, D.C., described Lee Metcalf's no-nonsense approach to tough political questions and how the senator dealt with unpopular issues.

Jim MacDonald, historic architect from Missoula, and Rick Trela, art conservator at Montana Historical Society, capped the conference with a two-hour tour of the state capitol, featuring general discussions of the capitol interiors and technical information on architectural details and the conservation of murals and paintings in the building.

Special members increase

Since its creation in the summer of 1980, the Society's Special Members program has grown continuously. "We're very honored by the interest and support these members have shown," Society Director Robert Archibald comments.

The additional money these members give annually, beyond the base membership fee of $15, goes for projects beyond the scope of our routine operations, such as outreach programs under the direction of Jennifer Jeffries Thompson, Curator of Education.

Montana Governor Ted Schwinden, himself a special member, recently challenged the group to back the preservation of Montana's culture by joining his administration in its support of the Historical Society's work.

He was addressing about one hundred special members who attended a banquet in their honor at the Montana Club, following the Montana History Conference in October.

Trustees, Paladin Awards

Al Partoll's comments on October 2 upon receiving one of the Board of Trustees annual awards for Contribution to Montana History can stand as an expression applicable to all of the award winners. "We recognize that Montana's great treasure is its people," Partoll stated, "both native-born and adopted. Hence, the name Treasure State, originally bestowed because of natural resources, has an added significance."

Norman Winestine, the other recipient of the Board of Trustees award for 1981, worked closely with Al Partoll of Missoula in the early years of the Society's development of expanded services in the then new Veterans and Pioneers building across from the capitol. One of their favorite projects—both served on the Board of Trustees for many years—was Montana the Magazine of Western History. Their dedication to the preservation of Montana history alike, Winestine and Partoll continue to be models of what is so unique about Montana history—the people over the years who have poured into their curiosity about our past in equal measure their love of the state.

Just beginning her career in Montana history, Prof. Paula Petrik of Montana State University received the annual Vivian A. Paladin Award for the best article in the magazine in 1981. Her article, "Capitalists With Rooms: Prostitution in Helena, Montana, 1865-1900" (Spring issue), gave readers a dramatically new look at an old subject. Petrik, raised in Sidney, Montana, teaches western and women's history at MSU and is busily researching the history of women in Montana. Her latest project, no less challenging than her last, is a study of the women's territorial prison.

The many faces of the

by Jennifer Jeffries Thompson, Curator of Education

An historical agency such as the Montana Historical Society must be dedicated to the collection, preservation and interpretation of Montana's heritage. While each department of the Society contributes to the achievement of all three, it is our Department of Education's goal to create an atmosphere and provide opportunities for the last of the three activities: interpretation. It is an immense challenge because our audience can range from a dedicated scholar, to the merely interested adult public; from the senior citizen, to the pre-schooler; from a captivated audience to one that needs to be corralled. Although Montana's physical size precludes certain kinds of activity, that size is the very reason why the Society has addressed the need to reach out. Circumstances could indeed be discouraging if it were not for the wealth of the Society's historical resources, which we have the privilege of sharing with a grateful public. Consequently, the Department of Education has many faces, practically one for each audience and activity. Hopefully through its cumulative efforts the department will succeed in provoking an understanding of Montana's heritage and an appreciation of the state's historical and cultural wealth.

Traveling exhibits

Because of the size of the state of Montana, it is difficult for many people to travel to Helena to see and take advantage of the Historical Society's changing exhibits and programs. Our traveling exhibition service is an attempt to reach out to communities across the state and to provide them with a sampling of the Society's collections.

"Montana Collage: Our History Through Photographs, 1880-1910" is a collection of 40 photographs reproduced from the Society's photo archives, matted and prepared for exhibition. The collection reflects five Montana history themes: Native Americans, Transportation, Settlers, Cities and Towns, and People. "Collage" is just completing its first tour of the state and is presently scheduled to appear in other communities through September 1983. One patron commented, "The Montana Historical Society through 'Montana Collage' has made a very important contribution to the state of Montana by bringing to its citizens valuable and thoughtful historical insights into the nature of Montana society."

"F. Jay Haynes: Fifty Views" is the newest traveling exhibit and has just been released for viewing around the state. Haynes was employed by the Northern Pacific Railroad beginning in 1876 to photograph the railroad's construction route in the Dakota and Montana Territories. In 1881 Haynes traveled to Yellowstone Park and quickly recognized the photographic and business opportunities offered by the area. This exhibit reflects his interest in the beauty of the frontier wilderness, the Park, and the Pacific Coast.

Two copies of the exhibit have been produced and already both have been scheduled through 1982. The exhibit will travel as far as Portland, Maine, and will also be seen throughout the state of Montana.

Any public institution that can assure security and maintenance of these exhibits is urged to contact the Department of Education for reservation instructions. Each is available free of charge, although costs of transportation must be assumed by the hosting institution.

Museum assess

The Montana Committee for the Humanities has recently awarded the Montana Historical Society funds in support of a project designed to assess museum and historical agency problems, and to provide assistance to those organizations throughout the state in the form of seminars and workshops, and through written materials. Wanda Walker, formerly the Society's museum registrar, has been appointed the Project Coordinator. Wanda is a graduate of the University of Idaho and received her Master's Degree in Museum Science from Texas Tech University; she has been active in museum-related occupations for the past eight years.

The first phase of the project began November 23 and will continue until February 23, 1982. During this time Ms. Walker will be drafting a directory of all Montana museums, art galleries, and historical agencies and contacting individuals connected with such institutions by phone, by mail—or, when weather permits, through personal visits. Jennifer Thompson is the Project Director and will also be visiting museums to assist them with particular problems.

The second phase, whose funding is pending, will focus primarily on providing seminars, workshops, and a newsletter to all the agencies identified. It is hoped that through this effort museums, art galleries, and historical agencies

Kids, tours & docents

A visit to the Montana Historical Society may have several educational goals for the classroom teacher: 1) to supply facts; 2) to supplement a school lesson; 3) to provide an esthetic experience; 4) to provide exposure to objects, art, and cultural experiences; 5) to alleviate boredom; 6) to provide a pleasant experience. The Society meets and greets thousands of school-children per year, and each class presents a new challenge.

To assist the Department of Education with a myriad of requests, the Docents provide an invaluable service. Docents are men and women who have expressed an interest in the history and culture of Montana and in assisting the Society in its efforts to share that history with the visiting public. Docents are active in providing tours of the formal museum gallery, the Mackay and Poindexter Galleries, Territory Junction, and the Original Governor's Mansion.

They provide a special service to elementary school students with a "Touch and Feel" presentation focusing on Native Americans, Cowboys, the Mining Era, or Frontier Life. In these sessions children are allowed to touch and explore artifacts representing lives and cultures of times past. Handling an object, we have found, results in students' gaining clearer, more accurate, more easily recalled images of the object.

It is increasingly important to create an awareness among school administrators and teachers of the importance of incorporating a museum visit with school curriculum and that the museum can serve them best as an extension of the classroom. Preliminary visits to nearby classrooms, by the Curator of Education or Docents, to introduce museum visits, have been successful; as time and finances permit, schools throughout the state will be eligible for this service. In addition to school relations, Docents are also actively involved with planning, provisioning, and hosting receptions held in conjunction with gallery openings.

Docents, like Toni Person pictured in this article, are active men and women in the community who have a stake and interest in education. Toni is a young mother who brings to the organization a special talent. She is a puppeteer and storyteller, and she effectively uses her expertise in interpreting Montana's history and culture. "I enjoy my work with the Historical Society and feel it is an important contribution to its efforts to make history vital, interesting, and fun for children," comments Ms. Person.

M. J. MURDOCK CHARITABLE TRUST

JENNIFER JEFFRIES THOMPSON
CURATOR OF EDUCATION

Footlockers and slides

Through the generosity of the M. J. Murdock Charitable Trust of Vancouver, Washington, the Society's Department of Education has been able to reach out to schools in the state. We have long been aware of our obligation to share and provide access to the Society's resources, but it has been only recently that these resources have been interpreted, duplicated or reproduced for use in the classroom.

There are two phases of the Murdock Project. One is the creation and distribution of six footlockers containing artifacts, facsimiles, photographs, tapes and guides which focus on six different themes in Montana history: Plains Indians, Frontier Military, the Fur Trade, Mining, Ranching and Cowboys, and Homesteading. These units are designed for use in the elementary classroom.

The second phase of the project is the design of six slide units also focusing on six different Montana history themes: Native Americans Lose their Land, Frontier Towns, Power Politics, Transportation, the Energy Industry, and the Depression in Montana. These units contain 30 slides each, and an accompanying text for use primarily in junior and senior high school classes. The slides are intended to be used as an aid in teaching the appropriate topics and would serve most ideally in introducing the students to the topic.

Both the footlockers and slide units may be reserved by any teacher simply by calling or writing to the Society's Department of Education. There is no charge for the service, although each school will be asked to cover the cost of mailing the unit to the next scheduled school.

Society documents Great Falls smelter in pictures

Marcella Sherfy photographs the billet casting building at Great Falls smelter, where raw materials for seamless copper tubing were produced. The "big stack" is in the left background.

The Boston and Montana Consolidated Copper and Silver Mining Company began construction of a smelter at Great Falls, in 1891. While the company's major mines were in the Butte area, they had selected the Great Falls site for the smelter for its abundant water, available supplies of hydroelectric power, railroad transportation, and easy access to coal from mines near Stockett and Sand Coulee. Boston and Montana added an electrolytic refining capability the year after the construction of the smelter. Of major significance in succeeding years, this addition to the operations became a "hall mark" of the Great Falls plant.

The Boston and Montana, along with most other major mining concerns in the Butte area, including the Anaconda Company, was sold to Amalgamated Copper Company, a combination designed to control the copper market, which was put together by Standard Oil trustees in 1899. The Amalgamated trust came to control much of Montana's copper production, its smelters, coal mines, timber operations, and other collateral operations.

The Amalgamated also came to control much of Montana's economy and political life and, as such, became a target for Theodore Roosevelt's highly publicized "trust busters." By 1910, these federal pressures caused the dissolution of the Amalgamated and in its place, the Anaconda Copper Mining Company was formed. This corporation bought out most of the Montana holdings of the Amalgamated, including the Boston and Montana mines and the smelter at Great Falls. From that date the smelter/refinery beside the Missouri River has been Anaconda property.

Throughout the period of Amalgamated control and the years of Anaconda operation, the plant at Great Falls continued to expand. They built the imposing stack, which still dominates the Great Falls skyline, in 1908, added a zinc treatment facility in 1916 and a copper wire mill in 1917. At about the same time of World War I they ended most of the smelting operation and placed more emphasis on the expansion of the plant's refining capabilities.

In subsequent years, the Anaconda Company added many new buildings and operations to the plant. The Anaconda refinery through all these years was one of the largest employers in the Great Falls area and played a prominent role in the city's economic life. This situation changed with the decision to close the refinery for good in 1980.

Recently, the Anaconda Company's parent corporation, Atlantic Richfield, announced that the entire plant would be dismantled under a salvage contract let to an independent firm. This news prompted Society staff from the Historic Preservation Office to seek permission to document this historically significant plant photographically before it was radically altered or completely razed. The officials of the Anaconda Company in charge of the plant shutdown readily gave permission for this project and offered full cooperation.

On November 6, Marcella Sherfy, Lon Johnson, and Brian Cockhill of the Society, and Fred Quivik, of Butte, a member of the Preservation Office's Review Board, made the trip to Great Falls.

Bill Peterson, a member of the plant shutdown staff, served as guide for the Society group and enthusiastically took the party through the many plant buildings and operations. Although it proved to be a long and exhausting day, it was also a most informative and worthwhile effort. To see a massive industrial complex of that nature, one that has been so important to Montana, and to be able to document it through photographs was a rare opportunity.

The several hundred pictures taken that day will serve as a resource for future research and will complement the several thousand glass plate photographic negatives of the smelter/refinery already donated to the Society by the Anaconda Company.

The Anaconda Company has been a major factor in Montana's history and the operations of the plants in Anaconda and Great Falls have touched the lives of thousands of the state's citizens. It is fortunate that the Society has been able to preserve a glimpse of those operations for the future.

With the hiring of photo technician John Smart in August, the Society at last gained the services of a full-time, in-house photographer. He will be preparing prints ordered by patrons, making reference and archival prints of originals in our Photo Archives, and photographing Society events for documentation and also for the Montana Post.

He will also produce prints offered for sale, such as those in our current gift catalog, and prints utilized in exhibits.

Until now, photo duplication had to be done by outside studios. While patron orders were filled, extensive duplication of old prints among our holdings was a luxury. And pictures of Society events were taken by any staffer willing to tackle them.

Because deterioration of both old photo prints and glass plate negatives cannot be stopped, Smart will be rephotographing them and producing, along with a new copy negative, both reference and archival prints. Reference prints are those cataloged and on file in the library, for public use. Archival prints are specially processed for maximum permanency.

Two major collections receiving attention right now are the L. A. Huffman photos (on loan for copying) and the Anaconda Company glass plates and prints.

Smart, who received a bachelor's degree from Eastern Montana College in 1981, studied photography at the Art Institute of Chicago. He has taught photography at Labre High School, Ashland, and at Eastern Montana College.

He pursued an independent study project, photographing in Tibet out of what he describes as "personal concern for the vanishing culture of the Tibetan people." The resulting works have been shown in several major exhibitions, with some prints published in camera journals and collected by the Art Institute of Chicago museum.

Grants allow for special Society projects

Five different grants have come to the Society recently, allowing us to initiate special projects that will improve our operations and assistance to the public.

Security Banks of Montana has given $5,000 in memorial to Warren P. Hall, a director of Security Bank, Billings, and president of our Board of Trustees from June until suffering a fatal heart attack in August. The money will be used to create the first ever cataloging of L. A. Huffman photos. The Miles City photographer's heirs, James D. and Richard Koster, have made the photos themselves available for the Society to produce and maintain a complete set of copies.

American Association of Museums has made a one-time grant of $600 to be used for professional assessment of our museum operations and recommendation of new or changed procedures.

Institute of Museum Services has awarded the Society $33,460 to catalog and document our costume, ethnographic, and art collections. Because of staff limitations over the years, many of these items are not, or poorly, cataloged. The grant will allow contracting with a specialist to document Indian artifacts, and another for textile and costume holdings both in our museum and at the Original Governor's Mansion. A cataloguer will also be hired to prepare the resulting record.

National Historic Publications and Records Commission included Montana in the 38 states given funds to assess historical records needs statewide, with a grant of $24,000. The assessment project will extend through calendar year 1982.

The Dousman Fund has added $6875 to its earlier grant of $3125, towards the permanent Haynes Gallery exhibit of F. Jay and Jack Ellis Haynes photos, equipment, and personal art and artifact collections.

Museum storage at left, and a portion of the Haynes Collection, will benefit from grants.

Archivist returns from Netherlands

Archivist Sue Jackson returned in October from a year of study at the Netherlands National Archives, The Hague, on a Rotary International scholarship. She has learned paper restoration techniques that will be useful to both our Archives and Library.

She received informal, on-the-job training working in the Netherlands Archives that is directed by A.E.M. Ribberink. She worked and learned with the staff of six restoraters under Chief of Restoration Gerrit de Bruin, over a period of nine months.

That staff was working exclusively on 15th and 16th century documents—quite a difference from the 19th and 20th century materials that make up our own holdings. Chief de Bruin allowed our Library and Archives each to select damaged materials to send to the Hague, so that Ms. Jackson's training directly aided us.

Working in the Netherlands National Archives' brand-new, eight-story, building (dedicated in November 1980), Ms. Jackson learned skills in bookbinding, paper strengthening, various ways to mend paper tears and holes, cleaning, and acidity neutralization.

"I have many special memories," she adds, "along with knowledge that I'm looking forward to putting into use for the Society."

Ms. Jackson's training, along with that of map cataloguer Kathie Otto and library assistant Ron Brey, enhances our ability to care for rare, aging, and damaged books and historical documents.

In summing up her year, Ms. Jackson states that she found the Dutch people to be "so gracious, and just super-hospitable," as for example the Hans le Feber family who welcomed her into their home for five months of her stay.

MOHA officers plan for 1982

The Montana Oral History Association (MOHA), which has just begun an outreach grant project funded by the Montana Committee for the Humanities, has a small but growing membership—now numbering forty-two oral historians in the state. Representing all of the major cities, and communities as diverse in background as Sheridan and Glasgow, members of MOHA look to the association for information, guidance, and support in all aspects of oral history work in Montana.

The MOHA officers met in Missoula at University of Montana in early November to lay out plans for MOHA activities and projects in the coming year. The first of two newsletters will be compiled, edited, printed, and readied for distribution by late November. While this initial newsletter will include updates on various projects now underway around the state and other news, one of the principal items will be a call to communities and oral historians to bid as hosts of MOHA's spring oral history workshops. Eight workshops are planned for successive Saturdays in April and May 1982 in selected communities across Montana. The MOHA hopes that the workshops can be held in towns in every area of the state. The MOHA newsletter will carry all the specifics on the proposed workshops, but their general purpose will be to introduce local historians to the techniques of oral history and to provide instruction in specialized areas.

The publication of A Montana Guide to Oral History is also in MOHA plans for 1982. The guide, which will be a handy reference for the practice of oral history in the state, should be ready for sale and distribution by spring 1982.

Annual membership dues are $5.00, which MOHA uses to offset postage and office expenses. Anyone interested in MOHA membership, activities, or general information on oral history in Montana should contact: Rex Myers, Social Science Division, Western Montana College, Dillon, 59725.

¶ Relatives can be demanding at holiday time, as this curious letter written from father to son in late November 1886 documents. Alfred Laws of Spangle, Washington Territory, writing to his son Frank, who reportedly was living in Helena, Montana Territory, pleaded for a visit from Frank in the most unusual manner.

> My dear son, I am going to write once more to try and find if you are dead or not. The last letter I received from you was one year ago last September. You said you would be down the 10th of November if you was alive. I expect you are alive, for I saw a man at the Falls who said he was on the inquest at Missoula. He said you was near murdered last Christmas night, and robbed of $800. That is about the same you should have sent me. I lost everything I had by fire thirteen months ago; I run in debt for lumber and built me a small house, but when spring come, no one would trust me for seed, so I got no good of the farm this year. I had to prove up last July; I mortgaged the place for $500. I have nothing to live on this winter—if my life should be spared that long.
> I am on my last legs, my race is about done. If you should get this, and don't come down to see me once more before I lay beside your poor brother that got killed. God never will forgive you. I will send this to the postmaster and will write him a few lines to see if he can't find out if you are dead or alive. I would come down—I think the train will stop and let you off, if not you can jump off.
> I built on the south end of the place, six miles from Marshall. You will see a new house under four pines. You never sent me that money from the east; I never got a dime of it. No more until after death will you see me, and then you will see me every night.
> From your old crippled father . . .

¶ Have you decided on your 1982 calendars yet? The Montana Historical Society has several calendars in our gift catalog—"The Collection"—which you have received by now. One calendar that has come to our attention is "Yesterday and Today." The title does not completely disclose the contents. Each month is illustrated with political cartoons from the Butte Miner and the Butte Evening News (1904-1905). Many of them deal with Montana political battles and national and international issues. To order, write for: Political Cartoon Calendar, 599 W. Main St., Helena, Montana, 59601. They go for $7.50.

¶ The title itself is intriguing enough: A Radiant Map of the World. It is a product of a creative mind, that of Rick Newby, and it is the winner of The Montana Arts Council's First Book Award for 1981. Of the book, A. B. Guthrie, Jr., said: "An engaging creativity is at work here."

This would be fully enough to merit our attention here at the Society, but it is a double pleasure for us to note this volume of poetry and fiction because Rick Newby is a staff member in the Society's archives department.

Rick's book also reflects much of his interest in Montana history, contemporary art, Montana's environment and much more. The book is full of Montana images, scenes, language and landscapes. It is a piece of Montana literature that should not be missed. At $4.95 a copy, A Radiant Map of the World can be ordered directly from Arrow Graphics, P.O. Box 8507, Missoula, Montana 59807, or purchased at bookstores across the state.

¶ Helena is celebrating its centennial this year—in 1881 Helenans passed their city charter, thereby incorporating their municipal government. Many stories of Last Chance Gulch have been told in honor of the century-long survival of the city, but most have spotlighted the glamorous or sensational in Helena's history. We all know that day-to-day history is made up of the more mundane in life. So it was in the summer of 1889, just months before Montana's statehood, and all of the respectability and the power that it would bring to Helena, when the City Council passed the following resolution:

> Committee on ordinances reported recommending that no larger number of cattle be driven through the streets than can be handled by one man. Adopted.

¶ Another book that Montanans might enjoy, especially those who have homesteading in their family history, is written by T. Eugene Barrows. Homestead Days tells the story of a homesteading family in central Montana during the halcyon homesteading period, 1910 to 1920. The book can be purchased from Brownstone Books, P.O. Box 14007, Chicago, Ill. 60614. The purchase price is $17.95, plus $1.00 for postage.

¶ The Institute of the American West, a division of the Sun Valley Center for the Arts and Humanities, has published through Westwater Press (P.O. Box 6394, Salt Lake City) a book that should be of great interest to Montanans and others interested in the history and future of the Northern Rockies. The book, That Awesome Space: Human Interaction with the Intermountain Landscape, covers a full range of topics concerning the history and contemporary problems of the Rocky Mountain West. In a series of essays by specialists in western history and art, literature and the environment, the editors have put together an informative and thought-provoking book.

Mike McCourt, curator, resigns

It is said often when staff members leave any institution: "It won't be the same around here without so-and-so." In this case it is true. Everyone who has worked with Mike McCourt in this place over the years will feel the loss of his talents and personality. But more than that, there are many people in the art and history circles in Montana who will miss Mike McCourt's generosity with his time and advice as the administrator of the Society's museum program.

McCourt, who has been on the Society staff since 1975 and held the position of Museum Curator since 1978, has resigned in favor of entering private business in Helena. With his wife Mary, Mike has opened the "Frame Factory" at 36 S. Park St. in Helena's historic district, where customers will get the benefit of his museum-quality framing of their favorite pictures.

At the Society, Mike was responsible for the exceptional mini-gallery of C. M. Russell memorabilia in the Mackay Gallery, the preview exhibit in the Haynes Gallery, a string of very successful gallery shows over the years in the Poindexter Gallery, and the coordination and hanging of the annual Rendezvous of Western Art. But it is not just his talent that will be missed at the Society. Mike McCourt is one of those rare colleagues who always made the most difficult situations seem easy and never failed to support other professionals in their work. We wish him the best in his new endeavor.

Director seeks speaking dates

Robert Archibald, Society Director, is looking for invitations.

He wants to address local history and civic groups around the state, carrying the message of what the Society is doing, what is going on in Montana history, and how the individual communities fit in.

"There's an exciting story to tell," he says, "and I'm looking for the concerned people who want to hear it, such as the Central Montana Historical Society in Lewistown, whom I visited in October."

Archibald's speaking trips will be made at no expense to the sponsoring groups. Arrangements can be made by calling or writing the Director's Office at the Society.

Five best Montana books?

MONTANA A History of Two Centuries
NOT IN PRECIOUS METALS ALONE
GOLD CAMP

It was several months ago when we first heard of Harry Fritz's ambitious and intriguing survey of American historians in which he asked the audacious question: "What are the best five history books you have read?" Harry, who earns his living as a professor of history at University of Montana where he was department chairman for the last three years, was preparing an article and address on this subject of the "best books." In talking with him about it an idea occurred to us: Why not query the readers of Montana and ask them what they think are the five best books on Montana?

Every subscriber received Dr. Fritz's questionnaire sometime in late May or early June, and the responses have come to Harry's office in Missoula in impressive numbers. "Montana's readers are a very knowledgeable lot," Fritz told us, "and they are taking this whole thing very seriously. To this point (late July) nearly 800 subscribers have sent in their nominees for the best five books, and the range of works mentioned is truly astounding."

Candidates for the best five, as we might expect, include most of the better known books on Montana, but Fritz also lets on that there are some surprises. Of course we have tried to pry out of him the results of his poll, but he has kept his secrets well, tantalizing us with hints of what he thought the consensus might be. The results will be the text of his address to the Special Members' Banquet on Saturday evening, October 3, at the conclusion of the Eighth Annual Montana History Conference in Helena. He will also treat the topic in a full-scale article in Montana next year.

What we could get out of him, however, were some intriguing statistics. Only the most esoteric books, Fritz let on, have not been nominated. Nearly 300 separate titles have appeared on the returns, representing an impressive range of books. They extend from the Journals of Lewis and Clark to a book, not yet at press, that had enough pre-publication publicity to draw some votes! Some of the respondents listed their nominations but then complained that there are too many good books on Montana to be limited to only five picks, so they added a few for good measure. The whole project has kept Fritz scurrying through the university library checking on title after title. "These people," Harry commented, "really know what they are talking about—they read about Montana."

Dr. Fritz's address will be part of an evening social that has been arranged to give the Society's Special Members an opportunity to meet with the Board of Trustees, Directors and staff on an informal basis. The Society is very appreciative of those who have generously contributed extra to its programs, making all manner of special shows, exhibits, and projects possible. Although one evening a year is a brief time to express this appreciation, it is an excellent chance for Special Members to learn of the Society's plans and to become part of those plans.

The Special Members' Banquet, which will be held this year at the historic Montana Club in Helena, will be an annual gathering. "We hope," Society Director Robert Archibald expressed, "that this event will generate even more enthusiasm about what we are doing and what needs to be done for the preservation of Montana's heritage. We are proud of what we have achieved and are eager to tell of what ambitious projects lie ahead."

Anyone interested in becoming a Special Member should contact the Director's Office at Montana Historical Society. The spaces at the banquet will be limited to 150, so reservations should be made early. Reservation information will be included in Montana History Conference materials that will be sent out in early September.

Haynes Collection opens for research

The impressive Haynes Collection, one of the most complete photographic records of the development of the West and of its scenic wonders, was officially opened to public use July 1 by the Montana Historical Society.

The collection contains over 23,000 photographs by F. J. Haynes, official photographer for the Northern Pacific railroad and Yellowstone National Park, and by his son, Jack E. Haynes. It was donated to the Society in 1978 by Mrs. Isabel Haynes, widow of the younger photographer. The negatives, especially the more than 9,000 glass plate images created by F. J. Haynes, had to be cleaned, processed and cataloged by the Society's Photo Archives before the pictures became available for use by researchers and the general public.

As part of the opening of the collection, a special traveling exhibit of selected photographs, "F. J. Haynes: Fifty Views," went on display in the Society's Haynes Gallery. Over 200 people attended the opening reception on July 1 that honored Mrs. Haynes. The exhibit represents all phases of this master photographer's long and diverse career from his beginnings in Moorhead, Minnesota, to his final work capturing the beauty of Yellowstone National Park.

Two copies of "F. J. Haynes: Fifty Years" will tour Montana and surrounding states. The photographs may be scheduled for display in Washington, D.C., by a gallery of the Smithsonian Institute. A few engagement slots are still available for this popular exhibit, with some extension of the regular 30-day loan period possible for out of state exhibitors. Further information on scheduling is available from Jennifer Jeffries Thompson, Curator of Education, Montana Historical Society.

The exhibit's prints, as well as those archivally-processed prints, were produced by photo technician Mary Fleenor under a two-year grant from the National Historic Publications and Records Commission. Amy Stark prepared the collection's cataloging under a one-year grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities.

To make the collection accessible to the public, the Society has published the catalog in microfiche that lists titles and brief descriptions of the photographs. The 12 sheets of microfiche cover only the F. J. Haynes portion of the collection. This catalog, available in the Society's library or from the Photo Archives, should be used by those ordering prints from the collection. Copies of the catalog, which cost $4.00, may be ordered from Lory Morrow, Photo Archives Department, Montana Historical Society, 225 N. Roberts, Helena, 59620. This is a 48 x reduction microfiche. Anyone interested in obtaining prints of the photographs by Jack E. Haynes should contact Photo Archives directly.

Donations made for display

The Ila B. Dousman Trust and Montana Heritage Foundation have made the first donation to the Society for a permanent display of historical photographs and artifacts in the Haynes collection. The $3,125 donation will be used as "seed money" for a proposed exhibit of photographs, early cameras and photographic equipment and other items collected by F. J. and Jack E. Haynes.

Included in the exhibition will be a reconstruction of the "Haynes Palace Studio Car" with which F. J. Haynes toured the Northern Pacific Railroad lines from 1885 to 1904. A major area of the exhibition will depict the transition and development of the Northwest resulting from the coming of the railroad. Jack E. Haynes' work will be represented primarily by photographs illustrating the development of Yellowstone National Park. The complete Haynes Collection documents eighty years of the Park's history.

Surprises found in railroad books

Historical libraries can get excited about things most people sensibly throw away as useless. They are especially grateful when a donor presents items that are scarce just because almost everyone in the past has thrown them away.

Milt Mitchke, of Helena, recently surprised the Library with a bundle of promotional pamphlets from towns and railroads trying to entice settlers or tourists to Montana in the first decades of this century. The newly-built Canyon Hotel in Yellowstone, Glacier National Park, Deer Lodge County, Livingston and Park County, Lewistown, Sheridan County, and Butte are all presented in the brightest light of positive thinking.

Most of the "facts" these pamphlets offer are less than trustworthy. Who would recognize Butte as a place of "mild, invigorating winters," or trust that in Sheridan County "A sufficient amount of rain falls here every year to carry through and produce a good crop"? Who would not now be suspicious of a Livingston booklet of unspecified authorship that claims "Every statement in this pamphlet is most conservative," and a few pages later categorically states that poultry in Livingston "are not troubled with any diseases"?

8th Annual Montana History Conference

Montana history enthusiasts take note: it is time again to plan on attending this year's Montana History Conference. Sponsored by the Montana Historical Society and funded by a grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities, the Eighth Montana History Conference is set for October 1, 2, 3 in Helena at the Colonial Inn.

This year's program will continue the Society's commitment to offer a program of broad interest to historians, librarians, archivists, archeologists, preservationists, and others interested in the state's history. Sessions on topics from folklore to the art and architecture of Montana's Capitol are planned.

Elliott West

Vic Reinemer

Kicking off the conference will be a Thursday evening presentation, at the Society, of Montana's folklife, featuring a distinguished panel of authorities on the state's folklore and examples of that folklore, from storytelling to poetry and songs.

Friday and Saturday sessions, including all meals, will be held at the Colonial Inn. On Friday morning a panel, headed by Dr. Elizabeth Furdell of the College of Great Falls, will discuss the history of Montana's women's organizations. Following that panel, at 10:00, three experts on the history of Butte, Drs. Michael P. Malone, Richard B. Roeder and Jerry Calvert, all of Montana State University, will probe the mining city's past from three distinct viewpoints. Butte lawyer Neil J. Lynch will moderate what is expected to be a lively session on Butte.

In concurrent sessions scheduled for early Friday afternoon, Dr. Duane Hampton of the University of Montana will chair a session on Montana's forest fires, while Prof. Robbie Ferron of MSU will head up a panel discussing the implications of the important Winters Doctrine on Indian water rights. Late afternoon concurrent sessions will deal with two very different subjects. Dr. Leslie Davis of MSU will chair a session on archeological findings in Montana, while Dr. Pierce Mullen of MSU will lead a discussion of Montana's medical history.

Saturday's schedule will include a single session in the morning on Montana's great senators at mid-century, Mike Mansfield, Jim Murray and Lee Metcalf. Dr. Jeffery Safford of MSU, Dr. Donald Spritzer of Missoula Public Library, and Vic Reinemer of the American Public Power Association will present brief papers on the three senators. Saturday afternoon historical architect Jim McDonald and art conservator Rick Trela will conduct a tour viewing the Capitol's art and architecture.

As in past conferences there will be three featured speakers at this year's conference. At Friday's luncheon, Missoula physician and historian of medicine in Montana, Dr. Leonard Brewer, will talk on the history of the practice of medicine in the state. The featured banquet speaker at 7:30 p.m. Friday will be Dr. Elliott West, author of several articles on the social history of the West and a recent book, The Saloon on the Rocky Mountain Mining Frontier. Prof. West's address topic will be "Children on the Frontier." Vic Reinemer, former aide to both Senators Murray and Metcalf, will speak on the personal relations between Mansfield, Metcalf and Murray at Saturday's luncheon.

In addition to all of this activity, there will be two special meetings held in conjunction with the conference. On Friday morning at The Bakery restaurant on South Park in Helena's historic downtown, everyone interested in the status of historic preservation in Montana and particularly those interested in establishing an informational network will meet for a working breakfast. On Saturday morning at the Colonial Inn, the Montana Oral History Association will hold its first annual meeting, which is open to all who are interested in oral history in Montana.

The Board of Trustees' Award for Contribution to Montana History, the Vivian A. Paladin Writing Award for the best article in Montana the Magazine of Western History, and the 1981 Historic Preservation Awards will be presented at the Friday evening banquet.

If you are a Montana history enthusiast, you should not miss the 1981 Montana History Conference. Look for a packet of information and registration materials in your mailbox about the first week of September. Those who are not subscribers to the magazine and Post can get further information on the conference by writing: Montana History Conference, 225 N. Roberts, Helena 59620.

Montana Oral History Association states plans

The first mention of forming a Montana Oral History Association came up a couple of years ago when the Montana Committee for the Humanities funded a series of oral history workshops held around the state. Since then interest in oral history in Montana has continued to grow. Now, with ambitious plans and an open invitation to anyone interested in oral history to join, the Montana Oral History Association is a reality.

The first annual meeting of the MOHA is planned for this October, in conjunction with the Eighth Montana History Conference in Helena. At a breakfast meeting beginning at 7:30 a.m. on Saturday, October 3, the officers of the Association will explain the general purposes of the organization, describe the services it hopes to render oral historians in Montana, and generally encourage everyone interested to join up now.

According to Rex Myers, the president of the Montana Oral History Association, the organization's overall purpose is to promote oral history in the state by supporting those who are already active in oral history and by encouraging those who want to begin using oral history techniques. Of particular importance, Myers explains, is the service the MOHA can give to individuals who do not have access to or do not live near one of the units of the university system. Local libraries, county historical societies and community groups are some of the organizations that the MOHA expects to aid most.

The MOHA has set annual dues at a modest $5 to help defray printing and postage costs they expect to incur. Plans are already under discussion for a basic manual of oral history, to be distributed throughout the state, and another series of oral history workshops.

Anyone interested in the MOHA should plan to attend the Montana History Conference in October or write to: Montana Oral History Association, 225 N. Roberts, Helena, 59620.

women's work as contributors to Montana's homesteading families and communities. They also challenge conceptions of traditional divisions of labor within the family. While many tasks were assumed to be "women's work" or "men's work," the photographs, plus information gleaned from oral histories, confirm the flexibility of work roles.

Photos contain unexpected information and raise pertinent questions. The picture of Elise Lawrence beaming at her newly acquired washing machine, for example, perhaps shows her expectations of the device. Those researching women's history who want to know the impact of various household appliances on women's workloads might ask: Did Mrs. Lawrence expect to spend less time washing clothes with her new (time-saving) machine? If so, she was to be disappointed. Other research shows that the number of hours spent in laundry work did not significantly lessen but stayed much the same because of increasing standards for cleanliness.

Historians are also interested in how children learn the roles they will fill as adults. The photograph of five-year-old Betty Blue is intriguing because it captures a moment in the learning of women's work roles on the farm. A very young Betty is learning to milk, an aspect of the work that will be her responsibility as an adult.

These photographs, and others still being collected, will be part of a slide show about Montana women that is being produced by the Montana Women's History Project at the University of Montana. The slide show, expected to be completed this fall, will be available to the public, historical societies, and schools. To schedule showings, contact: Diane Sands, director; Montana Women's History Project, Women's Resource Center, University of Montana, Missoula 59812.

"Montanans at Work" project is underway

Historians and students of Montana history know too well how much of our past has gone undocumented, how much is still vague, and how little we know about even key areas of the state's history. The Montana Historical Society, with monies from coal tax revenues, has begun a two-year project that will help fill in some of those gaps in our historical knowledge.

"Montanans At Work" is an oral history project that is designed to gather information about how Montanans did their jobs, during the period 1910 to 1945, in three important occupational areas: forest products, mining and agriculture. It is an ambitious undertaking—the goal is to collect and preserve over 300 interviews—and it is planned to cover as much of the state as possible in selecting the narrators and interviewing them. The project is based in the Oral History Office of the Montana Historical Society under the direction of oral historian Laurie Mercier.

"What we gain from using oral history," Mercier explains, "is the individual's perspective that is left out of the statistics and business records historians often use." Although she has been on the job less than a month, historian Mercier has already found out how eager Montanans are to talk about their experiences. Because the purpose of the project is to collect information on workers and their communities, the range of narrators will be broad. Boardinghouse managers in Butte, implement dealers in High-Line towns, or logging camp cooks near Libby, for example, are all potential narrators. Their memories will aid historians in understanding what those communities were like and how people interacted three or four decades ago.

Laurie Mercier comes very well prepared for this challenging project. She has two degrees in history, including an M.A. from Memphis State University, and experience on two oral history projects. In Jackson, Tennessee, Ms. Mercier directed an oral history study of the business community of that area. She interviewed a cross-section of the Jackson community, asking narrators how their lives and businesses changed over a period of two or three decades. "What you learn almost immediately," Mercier comments, "is that our past is not nearly so simple as we have thought. Once you hear and learn the individual stories, you realize how complex our history is and how many viewpoints comprise the full story."

Laurie Mercier

More than simply recording many viewpoints, oral history gives historians the chance to document that singular experience, the kind that is so often missed by using traditional sources. Mercier has an example of that from her own interviews. While investigating the history of riverboat disasters on the Mississippi, she interviewed the last living survivor of one of those disasters. The information she recorded was unique to that man's perspective and the fact that he died shortly after the interview made it all the more important that she had interviewed him.

"Montanans At Work" will preserve those individual stories and those unique views of what working in Montana was like. Although 1910 might not seem that distant from us, many jobs that were common no longer exist and others are done so differently that those old ways are just a dim memory. The interviews directed by Laurie Mercier will come to the Montana Historical Society archives where historians and researchers will use them for decades to come. The writing of Montana's history will be the better because of this project.

Readers who know of individuals who should be interviewed, or anyone interested in the progress of the project, should contact: Laurie Mercier, Oral Historian, Oral History Office, Montana Historical Society, 225 N. Roberts, Helena 59620.

Huffman photos on loan for copying

Eight cartons of Montana history are sitting in a corner of the Society's photo archives department, but they won't be there for long.

Photo Archivist Lory Morrow says that the archives staff will start work soon on the cartons' contents, a priceless collection of over 1,000 glass plate and film negatives produced from 1878 to 1905 by the great frontier photographer, L. A. Huffman. The negatives, many of them one-of-a-kind images of a vanished past, have been loaned to the Society by Huffman's heirs, James D. Koster and Richard Koster.

Each negative will be cleaned, cataloged and copied before being placed in acid-free envelopes for archival storage. The entire process will take approximately one year, after which prints from the copies will be available to the public for research and use in scholarly publications. Commercial prints will not be available.

The negatives were stored until recently at Coffrin's Old West Gallery in Miles City, where Huffman's last studio was located. They represent much of the Miles City photographer's work and include portraits of Chief Joseph, Spotted Eagle and Rain-in-the-Face, along with Calamity Jane, Con Kohrs and cowboys from the XIT outfit. There are also pictures of railroad snowplows, the Custer Battlefield, sheep shearers at work, the 1881 flood in Miles City, the Lamedeer agency and many other scenes of early Montana life.

McGarvey named to MHS trustees board

Dale L. McGarvey, a Kalispell attorney and native Montanan, is the newest member of the Montana Historical Society's Board of Trustees.

McGarvey, who was appointed to the Board in April, has been interested in Montana history for most of his life. His family homesteaded shortly after World War I in the Winnett area east of Lewistown, and his wife's family were early Philipsburg settlers.

During the early 1960s, McGarvey began collecting maps of the Flathead area as an offshoot of his specialization in land value law. Included in his collection is a copy of a rare 1931 contour map of the lower Flathead Valley, considered to be the oldest accurate map of that area. McGarvey says that the detailed map, with less than 10-foot intervals between contours, was drawn when Montana Power Company planned to raise the level of Flathead Lake.

McGarvey was born in Great Falls and graduated from Flathead County High School in Kalispell. He holds law degrees from Harvard and Montana State University (Missoula) and served as a state representative in the 1957 and 1959 sessions of the Montana Legislature. A practicing attorney since 1952, he is a member of the Montana and American Bar Associations. McGarvey, his wife, Elsie, and their three children live in Kalispell.

Warren P. Hall
1921-1981

Warren P. Hall, recently elected President of the Montana Historical Society Board of Trustees, died on September 7. A member of the Board since 1979, he had been elected its president in June.

Hall, a Billings realtor and mortgage broker, had recently expressed his interest in the diversity of Society programs, and his support for "continuing the Society's progress of recent years."

With his wife Betty, Hall had been a resident of Billings since 1955, where he was active in many civic and professional affairs.

"We will all miss Warren's enthusiastic energy and interest in our work," Director Robert Archibald commented.

MEAT MARKET

Choteau, Montana, in 1898, as seen in "Montana Collage."

"Montana Collage," the Society's traveling exhibit of photographs depicting Montana in the 1880-1910 period, has proven so popular that the Society is now arranging the 1982 and 1983 schedules for the exhibit, according to Jennifer Jeffries Thompson, Curator of Education.

Thompson says that the exhibit of forty historical photographs, which has been touring Montana since early last year, is already booked for much of 1982, but there are still a number of dates available in 1983. "Montana Collage" may be loaned to libraries, museums, schools, banks and community organizations for up to 30 days, free of charge. There is a shipping charge from one destination to another.

The sepia-toned photographs are mounted on board and ready for hanging. They cover five subject areas: Native Americans, transportation, homesteading, cities and towns, and a general category on people. The show, which is accompanied by free, interpretative catalogs, was made possible through a grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities.

Anyone desiring more information or wishing to reserve exhibit dates should contact: Jennifer Jeffries Thompson, Curator of Education, Montana Historical Society, 225 N. Roberts, Helena, 59620.

Pottery show honors Bray Foundation

Museum curator Mike McCourt announces "Celebrating 30 Years of the Archie Bray Foundation," a sale show honoring the first three decades of the Helena pottery center.

A public reception, with some of the potters in attendance, will open the show on Saturday, October 17, at 7:30 p.m. The exhibit will continue through November 30.

Kurt Weiser, Resident Director of the Foundation, is working with McCourt in arranging the cooperative venture. Weiser says that "everything is possible" from ceramic sculpture to functional pieces, representing the varied interests of former Bray potters—many of whom are now known nationally and internationally.

Potters who have worked at the Bray Foundation over the years have been invited to send one current work apiece. Proceeds will go to the Foundation for building or improvements at its facility west of Helena, the former Western Clay Manufacturing Company.

The pottery study and work center was founded by Archie Bray, last owner of the factory, who died in 1953. A patron of the arts as well as a clay-products manufacturer, Bray combined both interests in converting his factory into a home for clay as creative medium.

Malone wins UW award

Michael P. Malone, Dean of the Graduate School and Professor of History at Montana State University and also member of the Montana Historical Society Board of Trustees, has won the University of Washington Press's major book prize. Malone's volume, The Battle for Butte: Mining Politics on the Northern Frontier, 1864-1906 (to be published in October) is the fourth recipient of the Emil and Kathleen Sick Lecture-Book Series Award in Western History and Biography. The award, which was established in 1966 to honor exceptional studies, includes publication by University of Washington Press, a cash prize and funding for a public lecture at University of Washington.

In The Battle for Butte Malone examines the famous "War of the Copper Kings" from new viewpoints, placing the tempestuous struggles for control of Butte's mining wealth in national and international contexts. W.A. Clark, Marcus Daly, F. Augustine Heinze and a large cast of economic and political figures from Butte's history play key roles in the drama Malone unfolds in this book. It is part history of Butte, part biography of the copper titans of Montana, and part political biography of Butte and Montana. This is the first book to delve into the intricate economic and corporate maneuverings that made the battle for Butte so important.

1920-1981

When Governor Ted Schwinden nominated K. Ross Toole for the National Governors' Association Award for Outstanding Contribution to State Government, he wrote that Toole was a contentious but responsible critic of how Montanans had dealt with great political questions in the past. Governor Schwinden's comment was accurate and Toole received the award on August 11, but when K. Ross Toole died two days later citizens all over the state and admirers across the nation remembered much more about Montana's most dynamic historian.

He was author of books about the state that Montanans read: Montana: An Uncommon Land (1959), Twentieth Century Montana: A State of Extremes (1972), and The Rape of the Great Plains (1976). He was the continual defender of the study of state and local history and he was a perennial commentator on the status of Montana politics. Forthright in his views and often flamboyant in his style, K. Ross Toole spoke and wrote about Montana from his heart. As a fourth-generation Montanan he felt the right and the need to speak about his state's past and present. In his fifteen years of teaching at University of Montana he drew record numbers of students to his Montana history classes, and those students all went away from his courses with as much of Ross Toole's love for the state as knowledge about it. He was more than just another historian.

For friends of the Montana Historical Society, K. Ross Toole remains an especially important man. It was Ross Toole who pled for legitimate support of the state's historical society. It was Ross Toole who made Montanans aware of the heritage in buildings, art, and manuscripts that were going uncollected and unpreserved. It was Ross Toole who shamed Montanans into keeping the Mackay Collection of C.M. Russell art in the state. And it was Ross Toole who nurtured Montana the Magazine of Western History through its earliest years.

K. Ross Toole, A.B. and M.A. from University of Montana and Ph.D. from U.C.L.A., was Director of the Montana Historical Society from 1951 to 1958. He served as Director of first the Museum of the City of New York (1958-1960) and then the Museum of the City of Santa Fe, New Mexico (1960-1963). In 1965 he accepted the position of Hammond Professor of Western History at University of Montana, one he held until his death. The list of awards he received during his career is a long one, but it is very short in comparison to the number of Montanans' lives he touched as writer, teacher and friend. It is too little to say that he will be missed.

August 16. This is the first major show of Fechin's work since a joint Russian-American exhibit five years ago, and it commemorates the centenary of the artist's birth.

Financing for transportation costs of borrowing the artwork, and other show expenses, comes both from a Montana Arts Council grant and the contributions of many individual Society members.

"Montanans are eager to bring the work of major artists to their state," says Curator Mike McCourt, "and we at the Society feel that this exhibition provides that opportunity. Nicolai Fechin is an artist of international repute, and deservedly so. His skill as a draughtsman and his superb handling of color mark him as a master of the first rank."

Eya Fechin Branham, the artist's daughter, will participate in a symposium on the show's opening night. Seattle art historian Mary Balcomb, Fechin's biographer will also participate. Santa Fe photographer Gordon Adams will show slides of additional Fechin works not included in the exhibit.

The Russian-born artist, who emigrated to the United States in 1923, lived and worked in Taos, New Mexico, from 1927 to 1933. He later settled in Santa Monica, California, painting and teaching there until his death in 1955.

According to Carolyn Laceky, one of a group of Helena artists who have given their time to help with the show's preparation, "Fechin was chosen because he is such a favorite among artists in the West, and at the same time, his painterly technique and bold colors attract the admiration of even the most committed non-western artists."

Works for the show have been borrowed from ten private collections in seven different states. The institutions lending works include the Phoenix Art Museum, San Diego Museum of Art, Fenn Galleries (Santa Fe), Colorado Springs Fine Arts Center, New Mexico Museum of Fine Arts, and the Anshutz Collection (Denver).

The Society will be offering a limited edition poster, and a color catalog of the show, for sale.

The two-month show in our gallery will focus upon Fechin's vividly rendered portraits, but will also include a number of landscapes, nudes, still lifes, and anatomy studies. According to Eya Fechin Branham, the centenary exhibit is "one which I know my father would have approved and enjoyed." We at the Society look forward to the enjoyment of sharing Fechin's work with our members and other visitors this summer.

Library Gets Copies of Unique Maps

Jim Vanderbeck, former Society trustee, and the Virginia City Council have loaned the Society Library two important maps from the one-time territorial capital's early days.

The first map, not only rare but perhaps unique, is an original, hand-colored town plat of Virginia City done in 1868 at the request of the City Council. It appears to incorporate the city fathers' intentions for the town as much as the reality, for it includes a major cemetery, pleasure parks, and, what now seems most wistful, a handsomely-landscaped Capitol Square that never came to fruition. By the time the map was created, Helena had already tried to wrest the territorial capital from the declining placer-mining town, and would succeed in doing so in 1874.

The second map, a plat of the Masonic Cemetery, was used to record both purchases of plots and the names on already occupied sites. Of uncertain date, it was done late enough to have the fame of Thomas Dimsdale, editor of the territory's first newspaper and author of its first book, already obscured. His plot is marked "Dinsdale," while the names on several other gravesites had already been lost.

Haynes Book Progresses

F. Jay Haynes: Photographer, the book that will sample our vast collection of Haynes' work, is in our printer's hands as this issue of the Montana Post goes to press. To be published by the Montana Historical Society Press, the book has been produced by member of our staff in the Library, Archives, and Publications departments.

It will give people a chance to savor 160 of Haynes' photographs—examples of interest to history buffs as well as photography lovers—whether or not they can see the works here at the Society. His entire career is represented, from the early days in the late 1870s in Minnesota through his retirement around the turn of the century.

Because Haynes was official photographer for both the Northern Pacific Railroad and Yellowstone National Park, these two aspects of his work are extensively represented. Haynes recorded the Northern Pacific's building across the Upper Midwest and Northwest, as well as the cities, homestead farms, mining camps, and industries that grew up along the line.

In Yellowstone National Park, he photographed the geological wonders beginning in the 1880s, when few "improvements" for tourists had been installed. He also captured the park's development over the last fifth of the 19th century.

Almost all the book's photographs will be reproduced the same size as Haynes' glass plate negatives. These include 8"x10" pictures as well as the 5"x8" double-image "views" for the popular 19th century stereo-opticon.

Sixteen additional illustrations are included in the biographical introduction. These include personal and family portraits, advertisements, and scenes of the photographer and his studio staff at work. The text covering Haynes' life was prepared from the Haynes family and business manuscript collection held by Montana State University, Bozeman.

Beginning in September this year, public institutions throughout Montana and other states can borrow the show, free except for shipping costs. Jennifer Jeffries Thompson, Curator of Education at the Society, will be scheduling the show's travels. She can be contacted for details of borrowing the exhibit.

Brochures for free distribution to visitors, and catalogs to be offered for sale, will accompany the show here and on its tour.

The fifty images had to be selected from the 9,000 images that are in the 23,500-piece Haynes Collection donated to the Society in 1978. The show will feature contact prints made directly from the glass-plate negatives, the exact size of the images F. Jay Haynes created.

He sold prints nationwide in the latter 19th century to Americans interested in the growth of the West and in its scenic natural wonders. As official photographer of Yellowstone National Park, he documented the park's sights from its earliest days. Interested in the effects of weather and light changes, Haynes often shot the same feature (such as the Great Falls of the Yellowstone) under several different conditions. His career behind the camera represents an artistic interpretation of the West as well as a documentation of some of its history.

As official photographer for the Northern Pacific Railroad, Haynes also recorded the construction of the line across Dakota and Montana Territories and to the west coast. From the mid-1870s to the turn of the century, he regularly traveled the NP's main and branch lines, making "views" of the new and established towns along the way, and taking portraits of their inhabitants. He continuously pursued his private interest in landscape photography during his travels.

We look forward to sharing this rich collection with visitors both in our Haynes Gallery and wherever other insitutions display it.

Helen Clark of Butte is a graduate of University of Montana, Missoula, a former high school English teacher, and a writer for the last three decades. She and her late husband, a cowboy, were close friends of Ace Powell for thirty years, and she says of the artist that "He was a loyal, steadfast friend—like a brother—and we loved him."

Asa Lynn Powell of Kalispell, Montana, was a many-faceted man: artist, cowboy, packer, humanitarian, teacher, mentor, friend. He left this world January 25, 1978, and he is still mourned across the West, where his trademark, the ace of diamonds adopted from the deck of playing cards, is known to thousands of art lovers.

He was named after his father, a cowboy-packer for the Park Service in Glacier National Park, but the cowboys changed his name to Ace. It fitted him. He was a rugged looking individual with a gentle nature, a soft-speaking voice, expressive talented hands. His features may not have been handsome, but he was beautiful. He radiated sincerity, interest and dedication. He inspired others to success. He was the most generous of human beings.

Now, three years after his death, his works are commanding still-increasing prices. Some have called Ace Powell "the dean of western artists" because he was a proponent of the western motif long before western art became the multimillion dollar business it is today. He predicted its popularity and he stayed with western themes even when prices paid for such work hardly brought him a living. He was, however, to live long enough to reap quite a financial harvest. Death came too soon at age 65, the result of internal injuries from a fall on the ice.

Born in Tularosa, New Mexico, on April 3, 1912, Ace was an infant when his parents moved to Montana. His father's father had lived among the Assiniboine and Gros Ventre Indians, and the culture and way of life of all Indians fascinated Ace. Some of his greatest paintings and sc

On the first anniversary of Ace's death, the Thomas Gilcrease Institute of American History and Art in Tulsa had a giant exhibition of his work, specially arranged by David DeFrancesca of San Francisco. Mike Mansfield, the former U.S. Senator from Montana and a friend of Ace's, wrote in the show's catalog:

"The paintings Ace Powell has left us capture a great transition in American history. Through his efforts we can see once again the life of frontier America, of Indians in their native garb, of settlers pushing Westward, and of mountains rising high in the Western sky. His works cover an era between Charles M. Russell and the jet age, always with a spark of realism reflecting his love of America and the West. His works also remind us that great events such as the Western movement were shaped by ordinary men, but [those] who were also men of courage and determinaton."

With real affection, Ace liked to recall his early years of cowboying in Glacier National Park for Bar X 6, the largest saddle horse company in the Park. He loved the sociability of guiding paying guests through the wilderness. It helped develop his ability as a master story teller. He liked the winters spent in Babb, where the company headquartered, and he liked his cowpoke associates.

But it was in these years he developed a fondness for the bar, and drinking became a tough bronc he had to ride all his life. He was determined to defeat this craving, and he possibly took the cure more times than any other human being. He had fine help from men like Dr. Van Kirke Nelson, and from his wife, Thelma Conner Powell. (He was married five times: his first wife died; he was divorced from his next two wives, and he and Thelma were married twice; Thelma was with him when the end of his life approached.)

It was Ace's "humanness" that drew people to him. No one was ever self-conscious around him. His sins were the sins of all. He conquered them and he gave others the feeling they could do the same.

His life was best summed up by movie actor George Montgomery who wrote the following in his introduction for the Ace Powell Book by J. M. Moynahan: "History of people, life, places and times are recorded by God's gifted few. They are a rare breed, dedicated, giving beyond human endurance to set forth, from mind, to canvas, to words, so that others can experience the richness and depth of their perception.

"Great artists like Russell, Remington, Koerner and Seltzer have left us many such vivid masterpieces. Few others have come along who could walk in their shadows to carry forth the great western heritage of the past and present. [Powell is] one such man whose life and works reach back to the days of Russell and Seltzer . . . painting from love and heart the world he knew and knows so well. I am most honored to know this man whose work will live on through the centuries."

Library Map Cataloging Begins

The Society's Library has received a $43,025 grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities to complete the cataloging of its historical maps. Because the funds come from the Research Resources Program, one of the most highly competitive programs of the Endowment, the two-year grant testifies to the significance of the Society's collection.

The maps, numbering some 5,000 titles and 20,000 sheets, include several rarities, such as the original of Walter DeLacy's second official map of Montana, done for the Territorial Legislature in 1866. But more important in getting the grant, according to Librarian Bob Clark, is the collection's depth. Early U.S. Geological Survey and Forest Service issues, the most complete set of Sanborn Fire Insurance maps of Montana towns that exists outside the Library of Congress, and hundreds of scarce published and unique manuscript maps make the Society's collection the single largest assemblage of older cartographic records of Montana's history. Clark estimates that no more than 25% of the collection is duplicated by the universities, the two other state institutions with sizable Montana historical collections.

Because the collection has not been cataloged, researchers have had to rely almost completely on the staff's personal knowledge of the holdings. It might take hours of searching to locate a particular map, and in the process many maps, some of them fragile, had to be handled more than was good for long-term preservation. Nor could the library quickly determine whether it already owned a copy of a given Montana map advertised for sale by an antiquarian dealer. More than once a desirable rarity had already been sold by the time the library could complete a check and make its order.

Most of the grant monies will be used for the salary of a full-time cataloger to work exclusively on the maps. Although Dave Walter, the reference librarian and Montana historian on the library staff, had begun to catalog the collection some 18 months ago, so little time could be diverted from answering hundreds of reference requests and aiding visitors to the library that only some 400 maps had been completed. Catalog librarian David Girshick was already fully occupied with an equally intimidating backlog of books, pamphlets, microfilm, and periodicals.

With the grant, the library expects to be able to complete the project by the summer of 1983, including the weeding and disposing of many thousands of duplicate and irrelevant maps. The project will produce both a standard card catalog for use in the library, and a special microfiche catalog. Duplicate sets of the microfiche will be sent to selected other libraries in Montana and the surrounding region, with copies also to the National Cartographic Information Center in Denver and to the Library of Congress.

Clark considers it fortunate that the right person to undertake the cataloging was already a Society employee, Kathie Otto, who came to the Society Archives last October as a temporary replacement for archivist Sue Jackson (off for one year of conservation training in the Netherlands), moved from the Archives to the library in May.

Ms. Otto earned her bachelor's degree in history from the University of Wisconsin at La Crosse, and a master's degree in librarianship with an emphasis on manuscript material from Wisconsin-Madison in 1978. Prior to coming to the Society, she worked two years as a reference assistant amidst the vast holdings of the Wisconsin Historical Society, and most recently was Manuscript Curator at the South Dakota Historical Society in Pierre. Both jobs gave her considerable experience with large map collections in various states of cataloging and disorganization. Several of her articles have appeared in South Dakota History.

Walter will continue to assist on the project, and Library Assistant Ron Brey, who recently completed an intensive basic course in preservation techniques, will be actively involved in the cleaning, repairing, and encapsulating of the most fragile and most heavily-used items.

By the end of the grant period, the riches of one of the library's most important collections will for the first time be readily accessible to the citizens of Montana, and to researchers all around the country.

Summer Programs, Classes Planned for Children

Special summer programs for children are being arranged by Curator of Education Jennifer Jeffries Thompson. They include four courses, and a continuation of last year's popular outdoor programs.

The Lewis and Clark County Library is co-sponsoring the weekly programs on our front lawn. Children who attend those will be treated to history brought to life by games, puppets, and even actors presenting a 19th century melodrama. Ranch life, Montana Indian culture, folk and traditional music, and life in pre-electricity days are among the nine program topics.

Three separate art classes, divided by age groups for four-year-olds through thirteen-year-olds, will be offered. Sara Scott, staff archeologist in the State Preservation Office, will teach "Archeology and Montana Indians."

Each of these classes runs for five weeks. A lower registration/materials fee is being offered to children whose families belong to the Montana Historical Society.

Judge/Schwinden Papers Deposited In Archives

During the last weeks of December 1980, the Montana Historical Society received the administrative records of former Governor Thomas L. Judge and Lieutenant Governor Ted Schwinden. Spanning the years 1968 to 1980, the records consist of 265 cubic feet of official correspondence, memoranda, speeches, reports, press releases, proclamations, newspaper clippings, photographs, film, and tape recordings as well as the peripheral records of some of the administration's important aides. The acquisition of this material is of significance for two reasons. First, the information contained in the collection constitutes valuable primary source material to be used for scholarly research documenting the Judge administration's contributions to the social, political, and economic history of Montana and the Northwest. Second, the collection is notable in that it is the first deposit made in response to House Bill 512 passed by the Montana Legislature in 1977. This legislation designated the Montana Historical Society as the repository for the records of constitutionally elected officials of the executive branch of government.

The quantity and quality of the records of Judge and Schwinden will require meticulous processing by the staff of the State Archives. At present, with the exception of the photographs and film, which have been placed in the photo achives and the tape recordings which are being summarized, the records are temporarily shelved in the order in which they were created and reflect a chronological arrangement according to type and office of origin. As soon as possible the collection will receive final processing and a detailed inventory of the contents will be provided for the research that will ultimately follow.

Lewis & Clark Pageant At Three Forks

The Three Forks and the Gallatin County Historical Societies will jointly present a pageant late in July, marking the 175th anniversary of the Lewis and Clark Expedition's return passage through the headwaters area of the Missouri River.

The outdoor event, featuring well-amplified music and dialogue, will be held Saturday evening, July 25, at 6:30, and Sunday afternoon, July 26, at 3:00. It will take place in Headquarters State Park, along Interstate 90 about three miles east of Three Forks.

An advance party of the Expedition, led by Clark, first arrived at the headwaters on the westward bound journey, July 25, 1805, and was joined by Lewis and the others two days later. This event was marked last year by the Three Forks and the Gallatin County Historical Societies.

On the Expedition's return trip, in mid-July 1806, Clark and a party of twenty men plus Sacajawea and her son passed again through the headwaters area. (Lewis and nine men had headed north toward the Great Falls.)

This year's pageant, to be held on the banks of the Missouri at the exact location of the expedition's landing, will include horses, canoes afloat, and a cast representing Expedition members and Indians.

CHAUTAUQUA

It has been years since Montanans had the opportunity of taking in a Chautauqua show under the big tent where everyone enjoyed entertainment that educated. The last times they were here, in the 1920s and 1930s, the Chautauqua featured nationally-known orators who were veterans of the circuit. Now, under the sponsorship of the Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, and South Dakota Humanities Committees and the National Endowment for the Humanities, the new Chautauqua touring show will play at twelve communities in the four high plains states, beginning in early June and concluding in late August.

"Chautauqua: Bringing the Humanities to the Mountain/Plains," the title of the 1981 touring show, includes six chautauquans who recreate in theatrical productions actual or composite personalities from the high plains past. Montanans will be particularly interested in Linda Pease's impersonation of Pretty Shield, a Crow woman who lived in southeastern Montana in the 1870s, and in Sheila Sundquist Peel's recreation of Chicago Joe, famous Helena prostitute in the 1880s.

Other characters in the Chautauqua include William Fleming's portrayal of South Dakota Justice Granville G. Bennett; Dave Miller's recreation of a fictional, but typical buffalo hunter, Levi Davis; Virginia Scharff's interpretation of Wyoming suffrage leader Julia Bright; and Clay Jenkinson's view of how frontier North Dakota journalist A.T. Packard might have questioned the other nineteenth-century westerners presented in the chautauqua.

The entire production tours to each town and each of the chautauquans will be available during their stay to offer community organizations special workshops in such topics as local history and theatricals, Indian dancing and music, country music, folk music, writing local history, and much more.

The Chautauqua is an outgrowth of the revival of the touring shows that began in North Dakota in 1977. Funded by the North Dakota Council on the Humanities and other grants, the North Dakota Chautauqua was a great hit, particularly because each community could vary its own participation. That same flexibility will be part of the 1981 tour in the four states. It will be a great opportunity for the whole family to learn about our nineteenth-century past and join the fun under the Chautauqua's big tent.

Haynes Photos Open to Researchers

This July, the significant photographic resources of our Haynes Photograph Collection will be opened to researchers, Photo Archivist Lory Morrow announces. Hundreds of these images have not been publicly available since they were originally published by the Haynes Studio. The Collection came to us in 1978, given by Mrs. Isabel Haynes of Bozeman.

It has taken a year of intensive work for the photographic archives staff of the Society to complete cataloging and processing the Haynes Photograph Collection. Nine thousand negatives dated from 1876 to 1915 have been fully cataloged and indexed by subjects and by geographic and personal names. These represent the work of F. Jay Haynes (1853-1921). Another 14,000 negatives made between 1916 and 1962 represent the work of his son Jack E. Haynes (1884-1962). The latter have been organized into self-indexing subject files.

All of this has been possible because of a two-year grant from the National Historic Publications and Records Commission that brought photo technician Mary Fleenor here in 1979 for the physical preservation and print preparation. A one-year grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities, for cataloging, indexing, and guide preparation, brought Amy Stark here in 1980.

Preservation has been an important adjunct to the cataloging of the Haynes Collection. Each glass plate or film negative has been examined, cleaned, and placed in an acid-free envelope. "Reference" prints have been made for each negative, to be available to researchers. Archivally-processed copy negatives and prints have been produced for each significant image. These are stored separately since they represent the "insurance policy" on damage or deterioration of the originals.

Beginning in July, researchers can obtain, for a nominal charge, a microfiche index. This index will cover the works of F. Jay Haynes in the collection, and can be used to search or browse for information, to match photographs with prints in other locations, and to order copies of Haynes photographs from the Society.

The publishing of the microfiche subject index and opening of the collection will be concurrent with the mounting of the photographic exhibit, "F. Jay Haynes: Fifty Views". It seems an appropriate way to celebrate the long-waited unveiling of an extraordinary collection of photographs of Montana, the Northern Pacific Railroad, Yellowstone National Park, and the northwestern United States.

One of the little known facts in the biography of the late General Omar N. Bradley is his tour of duty in Butte in 1917 and 1918. As a captain and commanding officer of the 14th Artillery, Bradley formed a team and competed in the Butte City Independent Baseball League.

Bradley was quite a star himself, playing third base some days and pitching on others. In one game, played against the Montana Power Company team at the old Hebgen Baseball Park on East Second Street, Bradley hurled a two-hitter and stole a base to pace his team to a 2-1 win. He was good enough to make the all-star team in 1918, a team that defeated the Billings all-stars in a three-game series. Years later, when asked about Butte, Bradley remembered his days in the Copper City and said, "Butte is a good town."

The Custer Battlefield Historical and Museum Association is planning a two-day celebration June 27-28 in commemoration of the 1876 battle, according to Custer Battlefield National Monument Superintendent James Court.

In conjunction with the Association's annual meeting on June 28, there will be a bus trip to Plenty Coups State Memorial in Pryor, to the Pictograph Caves State Monument, and to Pompey's Pillar National Historic Landmark on June 27. The bus trip will also feature a lunch of Native American food and an elk roast for dinner. Anyone interested in the Custer activities should contact: Superintendent, James V. Court, Custer Battlefield National Monument, P.O. Box 39, Crow Agency, Montana 59022.

Living in the arid West has always presented problems for farmers and ranchers, problems that often resulted in arguments over water rights and how many inches of water could be taken from irrigation ditches. Up near Choteau, in the early years of this century, a local judge was having an awful time trying to get two disputants to agree on how much water was running in their ditch. Exasperated, the judge asked: "Mr. Warfield, can't you give us some idea of how much water is in the ditch?" Warfield thought for a moment and then replied: "Well, you honor, since you put it that way, there isn't, on the square, enough water in that ditch to keep me in highballs."

We ran across this interesting item from the Helena Independent of August 2, 1906, that may indicate how venturesome or fearful Helena's city fathers were in those days. "The petition of A.H. Warner," the paper reported, "for a license to conduct a roller skating rink in the city, was denied, the committee reporting adversely. Alderman Dryburgh stated that it had been the experience in other cities having roller skating rinks that they were the cause of domestic quarrels, the breaking up of families, and the source of more scandals than anything else." And we always thought the local saloon was the real culprit!

Banking Records Reveal Troubles of 1920s, 1930s

Archivist Ellie Arguimbau and Gordon Brown are in the process of sorting and preparing for researchers' use many of the records of the old State Banking Department.

During the drought and depression years of the 1920s and 1930s a large number of banks, especially in the small towns of Eastern Montana, went bankrupt. The State Banking Department then appointed a liquidating agent whose job it was to try to collect the assets of the bank, mostly farm mortgages and stockholders' liabilities, and then to pay off as much as possible to the depositors. (Pay-off ranged from a low of 2¢ or 3¢ on the dollar to 100%.)

The records provide a close look at the economic dislocation of Montana during those bad years, and represent a valuable resource of the economy and history of the small towns of Montana. These records should be available for research use by early summer.

The 1980 Western Rendezvous of Art topped its own attendance and sales records, while treating guests to some of the nation's finest western art, a full weekend of activities, and the sights and hospitality of Montana's capital city. Sponsored jointly by the Montana Historical Society and the Helena Arts Council, this year's Rendezvous included works of the twenty-four members of the Northwest Rendezvous Group and eight invited artists. As in other years, the Montana Historical Society served as host for the event, while the Northwest Rendezvous Group and the Helena Arts Council made selections of art and arrangements.

The activities began on Thursday evening, August 21, with an informal gathering at Montana's Governor's Original Mansion, hosted by the Montana Historical Society. On Friday evening, all were invited to take a scenic boat trip through historic Gates of the Mountains on the Missouri River, northeast of Helena. At 8:00 p.m. that night, the Rendezvous exhibit officially opened in the Poindexter Gallery at the Society with over 350 persons in attendance.

Mistress of Ceremonies Ginger Renner of Paradise Valley, Arizona, presided at the Saturday morning brunch at Frontier Town on the crest of the Divide just west of Helena. There the exciting "Quick Draw" auction drew the interest and raves of those in attendance as participating artists created works on the spot. The Northwest Rendezvous Group put a new twist in the "Quick Draw" by doing a collage that was then auctioned.

At the Saturday evening banquet, held at the Colonial Inn, exhibition awards were announced by art judge Ginger Renner and presented by this year's honored guest, Leanin' Tree Publishing Company founder Ed Trumble of Boulder, Colorado. Merit awards went to Jim Daly's acrylic, "It's That Time Again," Paul Calle's pencil work, "Teton Friends," the "Eagles Conquest" sculpture by Clark Bronson, Verne Tossey's oil, "The Open Range," a gouache by Jessica Zemsky titled "The Woman Waiting for Her Harvest," and Clyde Aspevig's oil, "Passage to Hole-in-the-Wall."

The Irvin "Shorty" Shope Award, which was presented by Irva Shope, was given to John Scott for his oil entitled "Cloud Shadows," depicting a group of trappers descending from the high country. This year the Society introduced a new award, the selection of one work by the museum curator for the permanent Montana Historical Society collection. Curator Mike McCourt chose Jessica Zemsky's gouache, "The Woman Waiting for Her Harvest." The winner of the Mill Pond Press Award was Paul Calle's "Teton Friends."

For everyone who could not attend the Rendezvous, but would like the full-color exhibition catalog designed by MONTANA Editor Emeritus Vivian Paladin, they are still available at $5.00 each from the Society's book shop.

1980 History Conference

Living up to the standard set in the last six years, this year's Montana History Conference promises to be another first-rate gathering. Each October the Montana Historical Society sponsors a three-day conference that brings together historians, western history buffs, and anyone who enjoys hearing of the latest discoveries in Montana history. The conference is funded under a grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities.

The 1980 Conference will be held October 23-25 in Billings at the new Sheraton Hotel. All general sessions and meals will be at the Sheraton, with Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon activities to be held elsewhere in Billings.

Norman Maclean

Highlighting the conference will be three celebrated Montana authors who will deliver banquet addresses on Friday and Saturday at the Sheraton. Norman Maclean, Professor Emeritus at University of Chicago and author of A River Runs Through It, will be speaking Friday evening on Montana's impact on a writer's imagination. At the Friday luncheon, Spike Van Cleve, author of 40 Years' Gatherin's, will talk about the experiences he wrote about in his memoirs. Ivan Doig, author of the highly acclaimed This House of Sky, will address the Saturday luncheon audience on "How a Book Happens," in which he will describe the methods he used in writing that unique book.

The conference will begin on Thursday evening October 23 at the Western Heritage Center in Billings. Registration will open at 5:00 p.m. and special exhibits and activities will begin at 7:00 p.m., including two showings of the classic Custer film, "They Died With Their Boots On." Custer expert, Brian Dippie of University of Victoria, will provide a commentary for the film.

On Friday morning the conference sessions will begin at 9:00 a.m. at the Sheraton Hotel, with registration open at 8:00 a.m. A single session in the morning will treat the Custer Battle's historical and cultural significance. Several Custer experts, including John Gray, author of the prize-winning Centennial Campaign, will present their views and then open the session to questions and discussion from the audience.

In the afternoon there will be four sessions, two beginning at 1:30 and two others commencing at 3:30. The earlier concurrent sessions will include one on the history of women in Montana and a second on Montana railroad labor disputes at the turn of the century. In the latter sessions, one panel will treat the interesting topic of the history of dude ranching in Montana, while another session will discuss the latest findings of archeologists working on Montana's prehistory.

The annual meeting of the Montana Historical Society is scheduled for 5:00 p.m. on Friday afternoon, just prior to a no-host social hour and the evening banquet, which will begin at 7:00 p.m.

On Saturday morning a distinguished panel of Montana authors will discuss the trends and patterns of Montana literature in the twentieth century. Chairing the session will be Richard Hugo of University of Montana. With him will be Ivan Doig, A.B. Guthrie, Jr., Spike Van Cleve, and James Welch. Because they are all active writers and have contributed significantly to the making of Montana literature, this session promises to be one of the most important in recent years.

The final activities on Saturday afternoon will include a choice of two tours. Stuart Conner of Billings will direct an excursion to Pictograph Cave State Monument near Billings, while the Western Heritage Center will host a walking tour of historic Billings.

Conference programs, reservation cards, and other information will be mailed out in mid-September. Anyone desiring specific information on the conference may contact: Montana History Conference, 225 N. Roberts, Helena 59601.

Sue Jackson Will Spend Year Abroad

Society archivist Sue Jackson will be spending the next year at the Netherlands National Archives in The Hague, Netherlands. The recipient of a Rotary International Scholarship for technical studies abroad, Ms. Jackson will be the first American to be trained in paper conservation techniques at the prestigious Dutch institution.

She is taking a leave of absence from the Society and hopes to bring back invaluable information on the conservation of all types of paper, from nineteenth-century newspapers to fine linen papers.

The Rotary International program pays for transportation, living expenses, tuition, and fees. "I feel very fortunate," Ms. Jackson said, "and right now I am just anxious to get there and begin my studies."

Society Now Has a Department of Education

There has been a new look at the Historical Society this summer. On Wednesday afternoons visitors may have noticed crowds of eager youngsters learning how nineteenth-century mountain men tanned hides or how the pioneers made music and spun thread.

These activities are part of the programs of a new division at the Historical Society—the Education Department. Thanks to funds from Montana Committee for the Humanities and the Murdock Trust of Vancouver, Washington, the Society can now coordinate educational programs under this new department.

Heading up the department as Curator of Education is Jennifer Thompson, formerly Curator of the Society's branch museum at the Libby Dam Visitor's Center in Libby, Montana, from 1976 to 1980.

Mrs. Thompson is a graduate of Kalamazoo College in Michigan, where she majored in history and studio art. Her studies also included an internship at Sturbridge Village in Massachusetts and a year in southern France. After teaching elementary school in Peoria, Illinois, and serving as Assistant Curator for Collections at Peoria's Lakeview Center for Arts and Sciences, she returned to school, studying history and museology at University of Idaho. She spent 1975 as Assistant Director of the Watkins Community Museum in Lawrence, Kansas, before taking the curator's job at Libby.

At Libby Mrs. Thompson organized the highly successful Kootenai Seminars for three years, aided Libby's Heritage Museum in cataloging their collections, and developed numerous educational programs with local schools, in addition to her regular duties.

She is well equipped to take on her new job. Among her duties are the supervision of the Society's Docent volunteers, a direct involvement in oral history projects, the creation and supervision of public outreach programs, and various supporting services to other Society departments.

Jennifer Thompson

"The biggest project facing me right now," Mrs. Thompson explained, "is the creation of the educational kits funded by the Murdock Trust grant. It is a challenging assignment, but very exciting."

Mrs. Thompson expects to have some of the traveling kits ready for distribution to schools early next year, but in addition to that work she expects to initiate many other public programs, including lectures and films at the Society, and statewide touring programs that will feature exhibits, lectures, and special presentations.

"The summer programs," Mrs. Thompson commented, "have gone so well that I expect we will offer them again next summer. The participants were enthusiastic, the children loved it, and we have had great cooperation from the Docents and interested people in Helena."

One of the mainstays of the education program, she explained, is the Docent volunteer group. There is always room for more volunteers and anyone moving to or now living in Helena who is interested should contact Jennifer Thompson at the Society.

Montana's G Or

At one time, hoboes camped in the rooms where Montana state business had been transacted; later, state office desks replaced the flower-bedecked tables of official receptions. Today, the Montana Governor's Original Mansion offers visitors a glimpse of gracious 19th century living.

On August 1, the mansion came under the care of the Montana Historical Society. The volunteer Governor's Original Mansion Restoration Board will continue to serve, working with the Society's museum staff. The only major change is that the individual admission charge has been dropped.

The fifteen-room house on the corner of Sixth and Ewing in Helena has been open to the public since 1970, but restoration work that began in 1969 still continues, eventually to include the grounds and carriage house.

For a period of 46 years—from 1913 to 1959—what had once been a private home was the official residence for Montana's governors. Nine governors and their families resided there.

Helena entrepreneur W.A. Chessman built the house in the 1880s as his residence, using the same substantial brick as in his apartment building across Sixth. ("Chessman Flats" still serves its original purpose.) By 1913, when the state purchased the mansion, it was owned by banker G.H. Conrad.

The Governor's Residence

Governor-elect Sam V. Stewart, a Democrat, and his wife Stella selected the house from several on the market at the time, choosing it for its "accessibility to the Capitol, roominess, attractiveness and general solidarity," as Emily Stewart Stephens later recalled. "A location less fashionable at the time—and at any later time—would be hard to find," she wrote; it was blocks away from the upper west side mansion district.

When the Stewarts moved in, Emily was six years old and sisters Marjorie and Leah were four and two. The girls would attend public school at nearby Central and adapt easily to the grandeurs of their new home. They were pleased to have a modern desk-model telephone (instead of the wall-hung style), and they enjoyed sharing such wonders with their friends.

Marjorie Stewart Keeton later recalled being unable to convince her second grade classmates at Central School about the large marble lavatory in one of the bathrooms. She took them home from school with her and spirited them up the backstairs upon discovering that her mother was hosting a tea. "The little girls . . . were every bit as impressed as I had hoped and we stood for a long time gazing at the lavatory. Later, when my mother asked what my friends and I had been doing, she expressed some surprise that a bathroom fixture could be such an attraction."

The house was grandly decorated throughout, including leather wall-covering in the dining room and dark-colored, heavily embossed wallpapers in other rooms. The second floor sitting room featured a mural of two cherubs on the plaster above the marble fireplace—a mural still in place today.

During the Stewarts' eight years in the mansion, the small third floor ballroom served mainly as playroom and sewing room. The family used the second floor for living quarters, preferring the privacy such an arrangement offered.

In the summertime, the governor's family used the generous front porch just as their neighbors did, decorating it with wicker furniture and receiving drop-in visitors there in the evenings.

Such was the beginning of Montana's first governor's mansion. Because it was built as a family home, the mansion did not serve well for large-scale official functions. Many of these over the years would be held at the capitol or in the Placer Hotel. Teas and receptions at the mansion did see from 200 to 400 guests, however.

After Governor Stewart's two terms, Joseph M. Dixon was elected, and as Montana's first Republican governor to live in the mansion, moved in with his family in 1921. A contemporary newspaper article announced that Caroline Dixon had revived the pleasant and old-fashioned custom of "at homes" to receive legislative wives. She hosted teas and luncheons at the Montana Club and the Placer Hotel, apparently not entertaining much at the mansion.

John and Grace Erickson came to the mansion in 1925, when he was elected to the first of three consecutive terms. Erickson enjoyed walking the mile out Sixth to his office in the capitol. The Ericksons' entertaining in the mansion included receptions and open houses. Notably, only a small dinner party preceded the governor's third inaugural ball in 1932. Because Erickson soon after was appointed to complete Thomas Walsh's Senate term (when FDR named Walsh to his cabinet), the three-time governor lived in the mansion only slightly longer than others.

The next two governors to live in the mansion did so for brief periods. Frank Cooney, Erickson's lieutenant governor, was there from 1933 to December 1935. His wife Enna continued the "at home" custom, receiving legislative wives and her Helena friends separately. When Cooney died in office, President of the Senate Elmer Holt became the third man to serve as governor under Erickson's third term. Lora Holt's entertaining emphasized informal luncheons.

During the Cooneys' residence, Governor Stewart's belief in the structure's stability was verified. When the 1935 earthquakes toppled towers and permanently damaged many Helena structures, they put the mansion's seven fireplaces out of commission but did little other harm.

In 1937, Roy Ayers became the first native-born Montanan to be elected as governor. One of the notable visitors during his single term was boxer Jack Dempsey, who was honored by a men-only banquet at the mansion. Governor Ayers and his wife Eleanor, judging by newpaper accounts, preferred quiet entertaining, especially groups of "old friends" from out of town.

During the two terms of Samuel C. Ford, the first Republican governor since Dixon, beginning in 1941, the mansion saw a different and more family-oriented use. Three of Sam and Mary Ford's daughters were married in the governor's mansion during the years of World War II, the only times weddings were held in the mansion. Mrs. Ford was the granddaughter of territorial governor Preston Leslie, who had served from 1887 to 1889, and the Fords' own wedding in 1910 had been held in the home Governor Leslie used as his official residence.

When John W. Bonner became governor in 1949, he was the second and last native-born Montanan to occupy the mansion. He was also the last Democrat to live in the house. Josephine Bonner found a new way to include diverse groups in official functions when she invited women's organizations to assist in hosting legislative teas. She included both Democratic and Republican women's clubs, along with the VFW Auxiliary and others.

Scandinavian delicacies turned up on tea tables during the eight years Swedish-born J. Hugo Aronson served as governor. Rose Aronson offered guests treats that included fattigmand, drommars, mardegspinners, and sandbakkels. Most memorable among table decorations was a centerpiece done near Valentine's Day 1953, featuring live lovebirds in a red satin cage.

The In-Between Years

The Aronsons became the first residents of the new official governor's residence in 1959, and discussions (and disagreements) immediately began about what the state should do with the old mansion. Proposals included demolish it, sell it, turn it into offices, apartments or a "tea shop," or make it what would have been the first period-home museum in the state.

Michael Kennedy, then acting director of the Montana Historical Society, approached state officials in 1959, trying to get them at least to prevent destruction or sale. By 1961, he had moderated his proposal of the period-home museum enough to suggest renting the finished basement as office space and the third floor as an art facility, a compromise undoubtedly bred of frustration.

In the 1961 legislature, state senators Charles Bovey and William R. Mackay proposed Senate Bill 113 "to provide for the restoration, preservation, and maintenance" of the mansion, under the Society's direction. A young state representative, Thomas L. Judge, told reporters of his support for the bill, calling the building "magnificent" with "considerable period charm." Governor Donald Nutter signed the bill into law.

But there was a catch. Within two years, the Society had to collect the $10,000 estimated for restoration—or the mansion would revert to the State Board of Examiners. The Montana Federation of Women's Clubs came to the Society's aid and collected $4,000 but at the end of two years not enough money was in hand for the project.

During this time the mansion stood empty. Hoboes were known to break in and start fires for warmth, birds inhabited the ballroom, paint and wallpaper peeled, the porch sagged. Restoration costs were rising faster than contributions.

The mansion enter the third phase of its history as a state building in 1964, becoming office space at last. Over the next five years it housed a series of agencies beginning with the Territorial Centennial Commission.

This view of the Mansion's north side shows its architectural style and one reason why it was nominated to the National Register of Historic Places in 1971. The south side of the front porch, (right) which was later glassed in, as it was in 1905.

A Period Museum

In 1969, a year after the last agency had moved out, another movement for restoration began. By now the estimate of restoration costs stood at $75,000. The legislature that year appropriated $35,000 for exterior repairs and came up with a plan for leasing the mansion to the city of Helena as a museum. Two years later, the state granted $5,000 of the $39,000 requested for interior work. At last, a grant from the federal Model Cities program got the project off the ground.

Since then, room-by-room restoration has progressed as funds became available, both through contributions and the nominal admission charge. Appropriate antique furniture has been gathered, both on loan and by donation. This work has continued under the energetic efforts of the volunteer Governor's Original Mansion Restoration Board, whose members are appointed by the Helena City Commission.

This Board, which will continue to serve, includes: Homer Loucks, chairman; Jerry Metcalf, vice-chairman; Mary Pitch, secretary; Carol Ferguson, treasurer;

Larry E. Anderson, Bill Coddington, Carla Cronholm, Herb Jacobson, Lloyd A. Markell, Janeen McCarvel, Hugh McWhorter, Harriet Meloy, Carol Harrison, recording secretary.

Resident manager-guide Dorothy Barr will also continue in that position.

An Educational Facility

According to Society museum curator Mike McCourt and education curator Jennifer Thompson, we can look forward to an expanded educational use of the facility. In the planning stage is a walking tour available to school groups, featuring architecture and based around the governor's mansion.

The Mansion Restoration Board has planned a Victorian Christmas program, complete with costumes, decorations, and period recipes. It may become the centerpiece of a winter lecture series on Victorian life in Montana.

Interest in the Governor's Original Mansion is high. Society staff members look forward to combining their efforts with those of the Mansion Restoration Board to utilize the old home and to continue restoring it to 19th century grandeur.

Marcella Sherfy, New Head of Historic Preservation

Field work, site and building inventories, cultural and historical resource surveys, compliance reviews for federal and state laws, grant awards, and much more are concurrent activities in one of the Society's busiest offices—the Historic Preservation Office.

Just three months on the job, but already a veteran of historic preservation work, Marcella Sherfy oversees the action in that busy office in her dual roles as Deputy State Historic Preservation Officer and staff historian. What she has discovered so far is that the challenge of preserving Montana's historical and cultural resources if formidable, but the challenge is more than matched by Montanans' commitments to honor and protect their heritage.

"The job, of course, is enormous," Ms. Sherfy commented, "because we are responsible for identifying as much of the historical and cultural resources in the state as possible while being sure that state and federal laws protecting those resources are followed. Our long-term goal is to aid citizens in evaluating Montana's historic and prehistoric properties and deciding how best we can protect them."

Marcella Sherfy

Ms. Sherfy is a graduate of McPherson College in McPherson, Kansas, and holds an M.A. degree in American history from University of Oregon. She has worked for several years in the National Park Service, first as a seasonal and then as a full-time historian at Gettysburg in Pennsylvania and later as a staff historian in Washington, D.C. From 1977 until coming to Helena, she worked for the Heritage Conservation and Recreation Service of the Department of Interior as an historian and reviewer for the National Register of Historic Places.

The Historical Preservation Office includes Ms. Sherfy, archeologist Tom Foor, architect Jon Hayt, architectural historian Pat Bick, archeologist Sara Scott, and secretary Denise Thiel. Because the staff is not large enough to inventory the entire state, they spend much of their time helping communities, private land and building owners, federal and state agencies, corporations, and other vitally interested parties determine what resources exist and what should be done to preserve Montana's past.

"Current and projected developments in the state," Ms. Sherfy remarked, "make the identification of these resources even more crucial, and we must find constructive ways to do this."

One of the best means to facilitate historical preservation work is to inform the public. Preservation, a quarterly newsletter that will be sent to Society members along with the Post, will be the preservation office's vehicle for passing along the latest developments in state and federal laws, buildings and other properties that are listed on the National Register, features, and other news.

AASLH Workshop Teaches Museum Skills

Twenty museum professionals, apprentices, and interns attended a regional workshop, "Interpreting the Humanities through Museum Exhibits," at the Montana Historical Society from August 17 to 21. Sponsored by the American Association for State and Local History and supported by the National Endowment for the Humanities, the workshop provided instruction in designing and preparing exhibits using three-dimensional artifacts.

Topics such as "Interpretative Exhibits: What are They?," "Interpreting History through Three-Dimensional Artifacts" and "Labels: Verbal Communication of the Interpretative Message" were presented by Dr. Fred Schroeder, University of Minnesota (Duluth), Byron Price, Panhandle-Plains Historical Museum (Canyon, Texas), Glenn Mason, Lane County Historical Society (Eugene, Oregon), and Robert Stark, Oregon Historical Society (Portland). Students and faculty visited the Society's various departments and the Governor's Original Mansion as well as touring historic Helena on the double-decker London bus.

After three days of slide lectures and presentations by the workshop faculty, the participants (representing museums and historical societies in Washington, Idaho, Oregon and Montana) were given a selection of World War I artifacts and instructed to design an exhibit in two hours, presenting these items in a thematic context. This "hands-on" exercise allowed the participants to apply the techniques and methods they had learned in the preceding sessions. In the next ten months, they will use their new skills to construct exhibits in their own institutions and submit plans and photographs of their exhibits to the faculty for review and comments. They are encouraged to consult with the faculty in planing these exhibits.

The American Association for State and Local History is the only national organization that offers such comprehensive outreach programs to institutions whose annual budgets are below $100,000; this is especially important to states such as Montana who have more historical societies than professional training resources.

News of an event in Butte not covered by the press, comes to us from Rick Newby, publisher of Scratchgravel Hills in Helena. Rick was present on August 1 when members of the Butte Historical Society placed a bouquet of red carnations and gladiolas on the grave of Frank Little in Butte's Mountain View Cemetery. Sixty-three years ago, on August 1, 1917, Frank Little, the feisty labor organizer, was dangled from a railroad trestle west of Butte by unknown assailants. "Slain by capitalist interests," his gravestone reads, "for organizing and inspiring his fellowmen."

The subject of the Little hanging still provokes discussion and arguments about who his killers were. Little was an itinerant organizer for the radical Industrial Workers of the World (I.W.W.), a controversial group organized in Chicago in 1905. The I.W.W. still holds annual conventions and, according to Bill Walker of the Butte Archives, at this year's convention the organization will consider holding full-scale memorial services for Little in Butte each year on August 1. His funeral in 1917 drew thousands; the projected memorial service in 1981 should draw many I.W.W. members from across the nation. The flowers sent this year came from active I.W.W. chapters in Syracuse, New York, and Chicago.

Historic walking tours, long a traditional way to see the historic districts of our nation's oldest cities, are now being used more and more in western cities. To have a good walking tour you need an accurate and easily understood map, pictures of what you will see, and explanations of each building's historical significance. In Montana, Butte and Bozeman have excellent walking tours, complete with handsome tour pamphlets that describe the historic districts in those two cities.

Sponsored by the Butte Junior League, the Butte pamphlet outlines two tours that cover a five square-block area. The pamphlets can be acquired in several places in Butte, including the Arts Chateau on West Broadway and the Clark Mansion on West Granite. Several Bozeman banks aided the South Willson Improvement Association in Bozeman to produce the South Willson Historic District Walking Tour. The tour covers eight blocks of South Willson street in the heart of Bozeman.

Evidently some of the out-of-state financiers in the late nineteenth century found working in Montana something of an ordeal. Archivist Brian Cockhill turned up a series of letters between one E.T. Wilson of Spokane, who was serving as receiver in Helena for the Maginnis mine in Maiden, Montana, in 1899, and several Montanans he employed to watch the abandoned mine property. After finding out that area ranchers had helped themselves to tools from the mine, Wilson determined, as he wrote to his man in Maiden, a Mr. M. Strain, that "Montana has more thieves to the square inch than any state in the Union. In many communities, and Maiden is no exception, I believe they would steal a graveyard if it was possible to get away with it."

After more difficulties with the Maginnis operation, Wilson, who had been in Helena for several months, became completely exasperated with Strain and his cohorts in Maiden, calling Strain a "cowardly cur" who "has proven to be a genuine coyote." It was good he skipped the country, Wilson wrote, and "if he ever came back there it would serve him right to give him a coat of tar and feathers and ride him on a rail out of the camp." Whatever it was that Strain had done, it had certainly convinced Wilson that Montana was no place for the shy or faint-hearted type.

Telling us about what he calls a "Remarkable Coincidence," retired Justice A.F. Bray of Martinez, California, (his father, A.F. Bray, was a member of Montana's second legislative assembly and operated a wholesale grocery in Butte) remembers how he and other neighborhood kids in turn-of-the-century Butte attracted the ire of W.A. Clark's Chinese cook, Charlie. "We kids liked to ride our sleds down the Clark sidewalk where the snow would pack hard and be ideal for sledding," Justice Bray said. "Charlie would spread ashes on the snow," he continued, "and we would come down the walk on our sleds and strike the ashes; the sled would stop, but we would keep on going and Charlie would laugh at us as we tumbled off our sleds."

Much later, in 1915, Justice Bray was an attorney in Martinez when his father-in-law, Contra Costa County Sheriff R.R. Veale, remarked about a new cook he had hired. That new cook was none other than Charlie Clark, the Chinese cook who had taunted the kids in Butte. "I found out," Bray said, "that Charlie was not such a bad fellow after all and got to be very fond of him."

History in Their Hands

THANKS to a generous grant from the M.J. Murdock Charitable Trust of Vancouver, Washington, Montana elementary and junior high school students will have access to historical artifacts, artifact reproductions and specially designed curriculum materials that document Montana history right in their own schools. The $20,500 grant will fund the research, production and distribution of "suitcase" exhibits for use in grades one through six and history curriculum packets for seventh through ninth grades. The Murdock Trust, which funds a wide range of educational programs in the Northwest, lent its support to this project because of the concern it shares with the Montana Historical Society that students be given a solid introduction to regional history by actually touching and experiencing a part of that history.

The suitcase exhibits will feature actual artifacts from Society collections, ones that are durable and plentiful, and reproductions of artifacts that are more fragile or are rare. Each case will center on one of six topics in Montana history: the fur trade, the frontier army, cattle ranching, Native American culture, homesteading, and mining. There will be three copies of each topic created, making a total of 18 exhibits available for classroom use throughout the state.

For the higher grades, history curriculum packets will discuss six other topics: political history from 1889 to 1920, Native Americans' loss of their lands, the development of transportation, Montana's energy industry, the Great Depression in Montana, and life in frontier towns. Each packet will treat the topics in the broad context of Montana's historical development and focus on specific and unique aspects that contributed to the state's history.

This type of educational program is something of a new venture for the Society, but one that has been desired for some time. "Most of Montana's students," Director Robert Archibald commented, "do not have the opportunity to visit the Society's museum, archives, and library in Helena. This grant will give us the ability to take part of the Society to those students. It is also one of the most effective ways of introducing young people to the excitement of local and state history."

Jennifer Thompson, new Curator of Education, will oversee the project, although the archives, museum, library and publications departments will all contribute. It will take a year, beginning this summer, to complete the traveling school exhibits and curriculum packets, although some materials may be ready for use as early as January or February 1981.

"Used in combination with other materials already available to the schools," Director Archibald remarked, "we hope the suitcase exhibits and curriculum packets will give Montana students and teachers that rare feeling of having the real stuff of history in their hands. We think that will be a genuine contribution to history education in the state. Of course we are very pleased that the Murdock Trust agreed to support us in this project."

Day-Long Workshop Prepares Librarians, Others for Crises

Nearly 30 library and museum people came from as far away as Kalispell and Livingston to get their hands wet at the Society late in April—and to learn how to conserve books and other paper materials. They were attending the Disaster Action Team Development Workshop.

Jack Thompson of Thompson Conservation Laboratory in Portland, Oregon, conducted the session that concluded a series of eight workshops in Montana, Oregon, Washington, and Idaho. Society archivist Ellie Arguimbau coordinated the event, which was funded by the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Thompson hopes to form a network of experts among those who attended all the workshops, who can share knowledge and skills when disasters such as fires or floods cause damage. And those present admitted they were starting at the beginning, that their institutions currently had no plan for handling such crises.

As Thompson pointed out, much good literature has been published on coping with major catastrophes, but little on the small events that are most frequent—from coffee spills to burst steam pipes. His training emphasized prompt, in-house treatment by library or museum staff, whether for one item or many.

Along with lectures and a slide presentation, the all-day session included practical experience. Participants literally waded in when they learned how to salvage water-soaked books.

Thompson hopes that someday the Pacific Northwest will have a regional disaster team, who can begin library salvaging operations as soon as large-scale problems occur. In the meantime, smaller accidents have become much more manageable for those who attended the workshop.

WESTERN RENDEZVOUS OF ART

AUGUST 22 23 24

The 1980 Western Rendezvous of Art will be held August 22-24 in the galleries of the Montana Historical Society. Sponsored annually by the Helena Arts Council as a benefit for the Society, the Rendezvous attracts some of the best western artists in the country. The Northwest Rendezvous Group, which was organized two years ago to insure the quality and continuity of the Rendezvous, accounts for the majority of the artists showing each year, along with additional invited artists. This year 25 Rendezvous Group artists will be joined by ten invited artists.

Richard B. Duffy, co-chairman of the event, expects more and higher quality art then ever before. In addition to the art sale, there will be a "quick draw" event, during which artists will create a piece of art in 30 minutes. The "quick draw" has traditionally been one of the most popular events, and the auction of "quick draw" pieces always draws great interest.

The master of ceremonies for events on Saturday, August 23, will be Ginger Renner of Paradise Valley, Arizona. Mrs. Renner is a well known art dealer and expert on western art. She will preside at the Saturday morning brunch at Frontier Town on MacDonald Pass, 15 miles west of Helena, the "quick draw" and the Saturday evening awards banquet at the Colonial Inn in Helena. Ed Trumble, president of Leanin' Tree Publishing of Boulder, Colorado, will be this year's honored guest.

At the awards banquet, a number of prizes will be given, including the Millpond Press Print Award. Millpond will produce a signed and numbered limited edition print of the winning work, with royalties going to the artist. And for the third year, the Shorty Shope Award will be given to the artist whose work best expresses an historical theme. Other awards, for best oil, best bronze, best watercolor and best of show, will also be awarded Saturday evening.

The show is open for general viewing by prospective buyers throughout the three days in two galleries on the Society building's main floor. The sale will begin after the banquet, with all items offered at prestated prices.

The Rendezvous theme suggests mountain men, and again this year a group of costumed mountain men have invited the artists to take in a five-day camping trip that will culminate Friday evening with a tour boat trip and catered dinner at Meriwether Campground at the Gates of the Mountains north of Helena. The mountain men will also be present Saturday morning at Frontier Town in costume, displaying fur trade era implements and accoutrements.

The number of persons who can be accommodated at the Rendezvous is limited, according to co-chairman Duffy. He encourages everyone who plans to attend to send reservations in promptly. Our readers can use the handy coupon at left. The Helena Arts Council and the Montana Historical Society expect this Rendezvous to be an even greater success than last year's. It is an event western art lovers will not want to miss.

Museum, Archives Receive Assistance

The National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) and the Montana Committee for the Humanities (MCH) have awarded the Society two separate grants that will help the archives and museum departments accomplish projects that current staff and funding would not permit.

The NEH grant of $17,302 will give the museum department the resources to plan a full-scale renovation of the Society's formal museum. The museum, which is well over 25 years old, has had only slight changes since it was first opened. For several years the museum staff has wanted to plan new exhibits that utilize new museum design techniques and reflect recent interpretations of our state's history. Now that will be possible.

The planning grant, which will run from May 1980 to April 1981, will provide money to hire consultants, research new exhibits, and produce a full plan for the new museum.

The archives also received help recently with the award of a $12,941 MCH grant. The grant also has a one-year life and provides funds to hire an archives cataloger, Amy Stark.

Ms. Stark, who holds an MLS degree from University of California and has had experience in photographic and paper conservation techniques, joined the archives staff in April to catalog the thousands of photographs in the Haynes Collection.

Her work will include a full cataloging of the photographs, indexing the collection, and the preparation of a collection guide. Ms. Stark's work is essential if the Haynes Collection is to be readied for public use.

SANBORN MAPS Unli

How insurance company maps offer information on the evolution of Montana's cities and towns

By Robert M. Clark

A truly significant, but relatively little-known resource in Montana history is the collection of fire insurance maps published by the Sanborn Company and held by the Society's Library. Consisting of 3,135 separate sheets in 485 sets, these specialized maps provide a surprising range of historical information on 199 Montana towns and cities.

D.A. Sanborn, a civil engineer from Somerville, Massachusetts, did not have historical research in mind when he agreed to produce his first maps right after the Civil War. The firm that had hired him in 1866 was the Aetna Insurance Company, and Sanborn's job was to map some Tennessee towns in sufficient detail to enable company officials in New York to calculate the risks of fire before issuing a policy in a distant place.

For nearly a century, the maps produced by the company which Sanborn started were used primarily for their original purpose. "Many persons must have noticed," R.P. Getty wrote for the readers of Cassier's Magazine in November 1910, "when making application for fire insurance, that it is the practice of the underwriter to examine certain maps before he will fix the rate of premium, or accept a risk on the property offered. His lithographic surveys marked off in diagrams of red and yellow and other colors are always in evidence . . ."

It has only been in the last twenty years, as insurance companies have ceased to use them, that many of these large volumes and loose sheets have found their way into research collections such as the Society's Library. There they are proving a boon to the historian, the historical architect, the demographer, the preservationist, and the citizen curious about the background of his private residence.

The first maps for Montana towns were issued in 1884, when sheets appeared for Anaconda, Billings, Bozeman, Butte, Deer Lodge, Dillon, Fort Benton, Livingston, Miles City, Missoula, Sun River, Townsend, and White Sulphur Springs, an indication of where the action was considered to be in that year. Over the next half-century, at least 191 other towns were mapped. Size does not seem to have been a consideration. A map exists for Carter in 1920, with little over 100 population. Carter did, however, have a grain elevator, and a railroad, just as Troy, in Lincoln County, although its population in 1912 was listed on the Sanborn map as only 483, boasted a railroad, railroad yards, and a sawmill. If a Montana town existed between 1885 and 1930, was along a railroad, and included at least one major commercial or industrial structure other than retail stores, it was probably mapped by an itinerant Sanborn surveyor.

Quite simply, these 21″ × 25″ sheets provide the most detailed graphic record of Montana towns and cities at particular moments in their histories that exists. The scale is so large, usually one inch to 50 or 100 feet, that even a modest-sized town such as Billings in 1923, with a population a little over 15,000, required 86 sheets to cover. Although one would need photographs to show the external appearance of buildings, and a city directory to establish the specific business or residents occupying a particular address, the Sanborn sheets provide all else that would be necessary to reconstruct precisely all but the outlying buildings of the seat of Yellowstone County for that year, or for the years 1884 (when it took only two sheets), 1886, 1889, 1891, 1896, 1903, and 1912.

"The amount of detail," as Mr. Getty said, "will doubtless be astonishing to the reader. . . . An underwriter is asked to insure a certain building . . . He turns to the key map and obtains there the street and block number. Then turning to the street indicated and the proper block, he can tell immediately the exact size and shape of the building in question. He is shown by the coloring of the diagram the kind of material used in its construction. . . . The height of the building is given . . . He can tell whether it contains a cellar, or sub-cellar, the thickness of the walls of each floor, the style of roof and whether the latter is constructed of metal, slate or composition . . . The windows at the rear walls are indicated, and if the building is detached from others, those on each of the side walls.

"When there are iron doors and iron shutters these are indicated, and also the skylights on the roof and whether protected by wire glass or by screens. . . . The underwriter can also tell by these maps the position of the interior arrangements of a building, like stairways, dumbwaiter shafts, elevators, etc." There are even included such obscure things as bake ovens, furnaces, coal chutes, forges, kitchens. He noted the maps even tell the direction of the prevailing winds.

Sanborn did not originate the fire insurance map, which had been developed in England and began to appear in the United

kely Aid to Researchers

States in the 1850s. Adopting the style that had become standard, Sanborn was one of the first to produce maps independently, to be sold to any and all insurance companies.

In 1867, he established the D.A. Sanborn National Insurance Diagram Bureau, which was incorporated in 1876 with a shorter name. The company had many rivals through its first quarter century, but was unmatched in aggressive pursuit of settlement across the country. It soon established branch offices in Chicago, St. Louis, and San Francisco from which surveyors went out in all directions. The Sanborn company had a virtual monopoly on Montana.

Although they did not record all information of interest to today's researcher, the surveyors sometimes included "real occupancy" notations for use by underwriters. Thus we can see where in Dillon, in 1897, were the red light district and the Chinese ghetto.

Dillon had already been mapped in 1884, 1888, and 1890, with the saloons duly noted. But by 1897 the business district had expanded sufficiently to justify the mapping of the section along Montana Street north of Virginia, where there appears a cluster of buildings, mostly frame but one veneered in brick and a good-sized one totally of brick, all fronting on the railroad tracks, and all labelled, delicately or mischievously, "Female Boardg." Behind them appear a scattering of small structures, all wooden, marked bluntly "Chinese."

These labellings, of course, were not the whimsy of individual surveyors providing an entertainment guide or making ethnic slurs. The same combination of a red light district contiguous to Chinatown shanties appears for several other Montana towns, and in each case the surveyors are specifically identifying higher-than-average fire hazards whose proximity to more valuable buildings was a factor in policy-issuing or rate-setting.

The candor forced by the map's special purpose, and permitted because they were prepared for a special and exclusive audience, does mean the maps offer a handy, if partial and laconic, history of a town's development from survey to survey. One finds the "Female Boarding" district of Dillon still intact in 1905 and 1912, but by 1927, when a new set of maps was issued, the space is occupied by lumber and building materials yards.

The special purpose of the maps also has its disadvantages. The researcher may find more information than he wants about fire hydrants, fire alarm boxes, town water pressure, and the number of buckets available at the local fire department, while information more valuable in tracing the history of a building is missing. The date of construction is usually noted only on "fireproof" business or public buildings. Residences in general receive less attention than business buildings both in original mapping and on revisions.

Fortunately for Montana, coverage of residential property is somewhat more complete than for eastern towns because insurance rates here were based on the number of dwelling units, and Sanborn surveyors felt it necessary to map sections with duplexes or apartment houses. But blocks consisting totally of single-family dwellings not impinging on the business district might not be mapped at all. Neither were street-car lines, nor open spaces which might have been empty lots, but might also have been parks (unless they were potentially combustible, such as wood or coal yards).

Other complications for researchers, and for libraries anxious to collect a "complete" set of Sanborns, arise because of the company's updating methods. New and small towns were resurveyed more or less on schedule, and completely new maps were issued. But when a town grew large enough that its map collection had to be issued in bound-volume form, updates were done by paste-on diagrams. While handy for insurance companies, these "stickers" would cover previous building diagrams that modern researchers might want to see.

Still later, in the 1920s, Sanborn changed from bound volumes to loose-leaf books. At this stage, totally revised maps were issued for sections of both large and small towns. Anaconda, for example, is portrayed on complete maps sets for 1884, 1888, 1890, 1891, and 1896. But in 1903 it grew to the stature of a bound atlas and maps up through 1961 include a combination of sticker-revisions and complete replacements.

The bulk of the Society's collection has come as duplicate discards from the Library of Congress, who received two copies of each sheet as it was published, for copyright depository. This gift has made us the largest holders of Montana Sanborns other than the Library of Congress.

The Northwestern National Insurance Group, headquartered in Helena, recently improved the Society's holdings with the generous donations of updated sets for seven Montana towns, 141 sheets in all, that not only improved the collection's comprehensiveness, but also provide helpful clues as to how often updating stickers had been issued.

We are still hoping to locate maps for five towns still not represented in our collection: Belfry (1912), Coffee Creek (1929), Scobey (1914), Fairfield (1927), and Reed Point (1923). Loyal members of the Society, especially those who own or work for insurance companies, might check attics and storage rooms.

More important than completing our collection, though, is encouraging researchers to draw upon its great supply of information on the evolution of Montana buildings, neighborhoods, and towns.

H.G. Merriam

When his alma mater conferred an honorary L.L.D. on him in 1962, he was lauded as a "pioneer in the discovery of the cultural potentialities of his region," but to the three generations of students he taught, the writers he helped and encouraged, and the many friends he made in Missoula and throughout the state he was much more.

Harold Guy Merriam died in Missoula on March 26 at the age of 96. He had been a part of the Missoula and University of Montana communities for 61 years. For most of those years, 1919-1954, he worked his magic on students in the classroom, inspiring them to try creative writing and then to strive for excellence.

H.G. Merriam, 1939

Born in Westminster, Massachusetts, in 1883, Merriam grew up in Denver, received a B.A. from University of Wyoming, where he was Phi Beta Kappa, and was among the first group of Americans to receive a Rhodes Scholarship to Oxford in 1904. He also held an Austin Fellowship to Harvard in 1910 and later earned a Ph.D. at Columbia University. Before coming to University of Montana, he taught at Whitman, Beloit and Reed Colleges.

More than for his academic laurels, Merriam will be remembered as the creator of Frontier (later Frontier and Midland) in 1920, a very successful regional literature magazine that was known nationally and internationally, and as one of the founders of the Montana Institute of the Arts in 1948.

Merriam himself continued to write throughout his long teaching career. His last work, a poem in free verse celebrating the historic friendship of Charles M. Russell and Frank B. Linderman, The Long Friendship, was published in 1980. He was also the author of Edward Moxon, Publisher of Poets (1939), Montana Adventure: The Recollections of Frank B. Linderman (1968), The University of Montana, A History (1970), and Frontier Woman, The Story of Mary Ronan (1973).

His writings will endure and the creative forces in the arts in Montana he helped to stimulate continue to flourish, but the most enduring thing about H.G. Merriam will probably be the inspiration and friendship he gave so many Montanans over the years.

Firehouse To Be Preserved, Transformed

The Heritage Conservation and Recreation Service of the Department of Interior has awarded $30,000 in historic preservation discretionary funds for the restoration of "Fire House #2" in Billings. The award, Montana's first, is part of a recent program designed to preserve historic resources in minority and ethnic neighborhoods throughout the nation for use by those minority groups.

The Billings fire house, which had been vacant for many years, stands in the center of a Chicano neighborhood. The coincidental need for a community center in the neighborhood and the need for a home for the Rainbow Children's Theatre made it possible to save an historic structure and put it to good use.

The Chicano community center will occupy the second floor of the old fire house, while the children's theater will have the open space on the first floor to stage their productions and teach Billings children theatre arts.

"This is a good example," commented Edrie Vinson of the Society's historic preservation office, "of how historic buildings can serve contemporary purposes and a city's needs. The neighborhood gains, the City of Billings gains, and a fine building is preserved."

Fire House #2 at 201 S. 30th, Billings, as it looks today, and architect Carl Christensen, Jr.'s sketch of the planned restoration. Note that the original carriage doors will be reconstructed.

Lochrie Paintings, Artifacts Given

Montana artist Elizabeth Lochrie recently made a generous gift to the Society of over 70 of her Indian portraits and a collection of Indian artifacts she has gathered over the years.

Mrs. Lochrie, formerly a Butte resident, has been living in California since 1975. She was joined in making the donation by her daughters Betty McGlynn of San Mateo, and Helen Lochrie of Ojai.

"We're delighted with the family's generosity," curator Mike McCourt states, "and look forward to displays that will be done as soon as the collection is processed."

Born in Deer Lodge in 1890, Mrs. Lochrie began painting as a child, but it wasn't until 1931 that she turned to the Indian portraits for which she is known—as a result of visiting Glacier National Park. Exhibits of her work throughout the United States included representations of the Crow, Nez Perce, Flatheads, Blackfeet, and Assiniboines.

She has worked in all media, including frescoes and murals in public buildings in Galen and Dillon, Montana, and in Idaho.

New Membership Plan

The Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society has approved a new Society membership program. The new plan provides for an active membership, including elected officers, annual programs, special events, and many other activities.

The new plan will go into effect this summer with the first annual meeting scheduled for the spring of 1981. At that meeting officers will be elected by Society members that are in attendance.

The Board took this action because so many members have expressed the desire to play a more active role in the Society's efforts to preserve local history, to promote the study of Montana history, and to generate more public support for Society programs in general.

Subscribers to MONTANA will still be considered Montana Historical Society members, and they will continue to receive Society publications, announcements and news, but they will not be voting members. Voting memberships, which include subscriptions to MONTANA and the MONTANA POST, have been set at $35 per year for Supporting Members, $250 per year for Sustaining Members, and $600 per year for Patron Members.

Voting members will all receive a 15% discount on all items purchased from the Society, with the exception of original art and limited edition art pieces. They will also receive invitations to special events and will be offered special publications, limited to members only. Each spring voting members will convene for an annual meeting where officers will be elected for the coming year.

It is the hope of the Board of Trustees that many current members will participate in this more active membership program. Membership dues will be used to support Society programs, particularly public programs. # Jack Russell Donates Portrait of Nancy

Jack Russell, son of Charles and Nancy Russell, presented a portrait of his mother to the people of Montana, a portrait that will be hung in the Society's Russell Gallery late this summer.

Director Robert Archibald and Board of Trustees president Eric Myhre accepted the painting at a ceremony during this year's C.M. Russell Auction in Great Falls.

"It's a lovely portrait," Archibald commented recently, "and an excellent addition to our Russell collections. We're pleased that Jack Russell has chosen to share it with the public."

New York artist W.C. Krieghoff did the portrait in 1911, and it has not been publicly displayed since that year. Krieghoff, a friend of the Russells, visited the couple both in Great Falls and at Lake MacDonald.

The prominent portrait painter must have shared Charles Russell's friendships with the firemen of a station near the Great Falls home and studio. On the back of Nancy's portrait (which is painted in oil on board) is an unfinished painting of a fire-chief.

¶ Montanans have a sense of history second to none in the West. You can hear it in reminiscences or when we show visitors our favorite historic sites. That sense of history led Montana pioneers to found the Montana Historical Society one year after gaining territorial status. Ten years after that, in 1875, the following article appeared in the Fort Benton River Press, showing how conscious of history Montanans were even at that early date.

Complaining of the shortening of the town name to Benton City and then to just Benton, Lt. J.H. Bradley wrote "A Plea for Fort Benton," railing at the editor of a new paper called the Benton Record. After he had nostalgically recounted the actual naming of Fort Benton in 1850 by Alexander Culbertson, Bradley pleaded in defense of history, for reverence of historic deeds.

> Oh, Mr. Editor and proprietor of the Record, would that you had looked into Lippincott's Gazetteer of Geography before you did this thing. Let me tell your readers what you would have found there. You would have found that, within the limits of the United States, there are already fifty-two geographical localities in possession of the name of Benton, while there is but a single one called Fort Benton, and that is our town. And now you have despoiled us of all the advantages of our singleness of possession, and humbled us ruthlessly into such a nest of Bentons that it is bewildering to try to identify ourselves. Thus have we been three times named, and there is no guarantee that we have reached the end of it yet. Permit my indulgence in a little speculation as to where the thing seems tending. Fort Benton, Benton City, Benton, Bentown, Bungtown, Bunghole. That sounds ridiculous, but truly, it is scarcely in advance of what has already happened. But let us halt here, and retrace our steps. Let us go back to the first and best name of them all, and forever hold fast to it. Benton is truly a good name, but it violates our early traditions, and there are, in all conscience, enough Bentons in the country already. Fort Benton is a better name, it is in keeping with our traditions, it perpetuates our fur-trading and military history, and it is a name that really makes us a peculiar people, since the world over we have no participants in its possession.

The Benton Record ceased publication in 1884 and the defenders of Fort Benton's history kept to the barricades and won. Fort Benton was a good name then and it still is; preserving its history is still important, too.

¶ Another interesting footnote in the history of Montana journalism is the short existance of an unusual political sheet that was published in Miles City in the fall of 1890. If any readers have information about this newspaper (or hopefully copies of the paper) the Society library would like to know. The Montana Bomb was the official organ of Montana Prohibitionists in 1890 during the September-November campaign season. Although we have not seen any copies, by reference from other contemporary papers, the Bomb seems to have been a very aggressive publication, willing to take on any opponent with barbed pen. One puzzle, though, is what the significance of its name might be. A quick search of Americanisms current in the 1890s gives no clue. Any ideas?

¶ Historians of Native American culture, oral historians, and anyone who enjoys story-telling will be interested in a publication of Rising Wolf, Inc. of Missoula. Stories From The Old Ones, by Walter A. Denny of Rocky Boy, Montana, is a book filled with timeless tales from the oral tradition of the Chippewa-Cree told to Mr. Denny 50 years ago when he was a child.

Edited by Harold Gray and Patricia Scott and funded in part by the Montana Committee for the Humanities, Stories From The Old Ones also contains 15 illustrations by William Daychild, a Cree artist who also lives at Rocky Boy. Purchase price of the softbound volume is $4.95 plus 50¢ for postage. To order, write: Rising Wolf, Inc., 240 N. Higgins, Missoula 59801.

¶ Have you ever wondered how damaged paintings are repaired or fragile ones preserved? Rick Trela, art conservator at the Society, has written two articles on the subject that unveil the mysteries of his craft. His articles, "Art Conservation: The Twentieth Century Science" parts I & II, appear in Art West (Vol. III #s 2 & 3). Among the many things Trela's articles explain is how sophisticated the work of art conservation has become.

MONTANA COLLAGE

This spring the Montana Historical Society is going to present an exhibition that has been discussed for years but never accomplished—a traveling exhibit of historic photographs from the Society's archives. Funded by a grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities, the "Montana Collage" exhibit of fifty photographs will tour the state for two years or more, after an opening stand in the Society's Poindexter Gallery, April 4 to May 21.

The project has been several months in the making and just now the exhibit team, consisting of photo archivist Lory Morrow, photo technician Mary Fleenor, historian Bob Swartout, museum curator Mike McCourt, editor Vivian Paladin, and coordinator Wade Wilkison, are putting together final plans for the traveling show and accompanying catalog.

"Our collections are so varied," Lory Morrow commented, "that when we first began planning the exhibit our initial problem was what criteria to use for selection. We settled on five subject areas: Native Americans, transportation, homesteading, cities and towns, and a general category on people. For each area we have selected approximately ten photos, and they were very difficult choices."

Rather than choose images from the full span of Montana's history, the planners limited the exhibit to the 1880-1910 period. "It was an era of great change in Montana," Bob Swartout explained, "and as such it gives us an excellent opportunity to document those changes in a graphic and stunning manner."

The photos come from a variety of sources. Some are pictures taken by photographers using glass plate negatives, others are prints mounted on cardboard, while others are printed on old and brittle paper, and still others are from 80-year-old photo albums.

Getting the best quality photographs was as important as choosing those with the most important historical content, because each of the fifty images in the show will be enlarged to at least 16 × 20 inches and mounted on hard board. Photo technician Mary Fleenor carefully scrutinized each photograph to cull out the blurred or faded ones and those that might distort when enlarged. As she explained, "the source of the photo is not as important as the quality of the negative that can be produced. A high quality negative will assure a clear and clean enlargement." Each print will be sepia-toned to bring out the richness of these great photographs.

Reflecting the exhibit's title and its purpose, the pictures comprise a mosiac of historical Montana. Portraits, group photos, action shots, interior scenes and panoramas are included in the selections. And they picture much of the state, from Butte to Fort Belknap and Crow Agency to Kalispell.

"We hope," Mike McCourt commented, "that libraries, museums, schools, banks, and any community organization that can find the wall space to hang this exhibit will sign up to host the show." There is no charge for the exhibit, save the shipping charge from one destination to another.

Each photograph will be mounted on sturdy board made up for easy hanging. Coordinator Wade Wilkison emphasized that community groups need not have any gallery experience or even a formal gallery to hang the exhibit. "We want the widest use possible," he said. Each exhibitor may have the show for three or four weeks.

Mary Fleenor and Lory Morrow inspect photos

The exhibit also includes a companion 16-page pamphlet written by Bob Swartout of Carroll College and designed by Vivian A. Paladin, editor emeritus of Montana. More than a catalog of the show, the pamphlet will lead visitors through the photographic exhibition and provide more information on the history the photographs document.

"Montana Collage" will be ready to travel in early June. Anyone desiring more information or wishing to reserve an exhibit time should contact: Wade Wilkison, Curator of Education, Montana Historical Society, 225 N. Roberts, Helena 59601.

Membership Poll—What We Learned

We've been pleased with the good return of our membership polls, published in the last issue of Montana Post, and thank the many of you who took time to fill out the form—and to add questions, comments, and even photographs.

We've already begun putting your information to work, and one result will be an opportunity for more active membership involvement through a new program to begin later this year. Meanwhile, we've begun contacting individuals who expressed interest in donating historical materials for the museum, archives, and library.

If there's a statistically typical member of the Society, we now know that he or she has been with us for 13½ years but also belongs to at least one other historical society. This member is between 41 and 60 years of age and either lives in Montana or did at one time. (Of the half of you not currently living here, 45% never have—and we salute your special interest.)

Three-fourths of you have visited our building—including many out-of-staters who make an annual vacation visit. You're busy with personal historical research as well, over one-third having used our library and archives, and the same number interested in obtaining printed guides to our document and photo collections.

As we announce the opening of the "Montana Collage" traveling photograph exhibit, we're happy to note that over 80% of you want to see this sort of show, and traveling art and artifacts shows as well. Almost as many of you support the creation of school education kits and slide programs—and some of you noted that you'd like to see such items travel beyond Montana's borders.

The staff and Board of Trustees are currently working out final details of an expanded membership program that will enable Supporting and Sustaining Members to have a direct say about Society plans, as well as increased benefits from their memberships.

This new program, which will have a voting privilege and it own elected officers, will be fully outlined in the next issue of the Post.

Supporting Members contribute $35 annually for their Society dues, with Sustaining Members giving $250 per year and Patron Members $600. This extra assistance is greatly needed—and is mightily appreciated.

Rescued Bank Records Now Processed

At last, this spring, the Archives will make available to researchers the Helena banking collection, obtained by the Society 25 years ago. The records, about 365 linear feet, cover Montana banking and other businesses from the 1860s to the earliest years of the 20th century.

For part of their history, the records were apparently lost and forgotten. For another part, they were safe and protected but still not readily accessible to researchers. Now, with a larger archives staff to process it, the necessary work has been done, and this vast and significant collection will soon be open.

The collection's story began during the depression of the 1890s, when two Helena banks failed and went into receivership. The same receiver, Eugene T. Wilson, was appointed for the First National Bank (which had previously merged with the Second National and the Helena National), and for the Merchants National. After completing his duties, Wilson went home to eastern Washington—and left the defunct banks' records in storage.

They were in a stone-and-brick warehouse in the oldest part of Helena when they next surfaced, in the mid-1950s. When Noral Johnson bought the building, we acquired its historic contents, and the records were moved to our building.

Lack of staff, though, meant that the milestone collection could receive little attention for years, but was at least stored in the climate-controlled quarters here. In the late 1960s, archivist John Coleman was able to accomplish the required preliminary sorting.

Finally, last November, State Archivist Brian Cockhill assigned a team of three Archives staffers to tackle the bank collection. From November 13 through January 17, they worked in the sub-basement—sorting, stacking, filing, arranging.

The team included archivists Ellie Arguimbau and Sue Jackson, and assistant archivist Frank Marron. They enjoyed the project and were glad it was at last underway, but did feel a bit isolated working underground day after day. As the holidays approached, the bare-cement walls seemed even drearier, and so the team brought in their own Christmas tree.

The three are currently working on the collection's final sorting, but this can be done in their offices—still in the basement, but definitely more cheerful than the sub-basement.

Researchers will be able to trace, according to Sue Jackson, "the economic ups and downs of small businesses in Helena and other early commercial centers such as Virginia City, White Sulphur Springs, Fort Benton, Butte."

"People throughout Montana," Frank Marron added, "were using these Helena banks, including sheepmen and cattlemen and mine-owners who had enterprises at more than one location."

In addition to the main collection, about 75 small collections have been created. These are the records of small businesses whose records apparently became bank property when they themselves failed.

The archivists' first step in processing this collection was to vacuum the exteriors of the many ledger books that were bound in leather, suede, canvas, or cardboard. Then came days of carefully unfolding brittle papers, all unbound papers having been neatly folded into thirds and tied into bundles.

Many sheets had rust spots from staples and pins, or patches of mold. With small paintbrushes, the archivists painstakingly dusted away such marks.

Because the collection included all the records each bank had on hand on its closing day—when ledger entries abruptly ceased—the archives team needed to weed out superfluous items. Although it may sound like heresy for archivists to talk about throwing historic papers away, Ellie Arguimbau pointed out that every piece of paper was inspected, and only duplications were pulled out.

What they found in this collection were the bank's own copies of transaction slips, most listing only name, date, and dollar amount—with the same information completely listed in the ledger books.

Overlapping with the weeding, and continuing afterwards, was the sorting of materials into a logical sequence. Archivists' usual goal is to maintain the order used by the person or business who created the papers. In the case of the Helena banking collection, because of its original disorderly storage, the archival team had to start from scratch.

What the archivists will have ready for researchers is a truly accessible collection. And, they emphasize, here at the Society "researcher" does not mean "scholar" only, but anyone pursuing his or her own interests, such as family history or the development of a home town.

What these researchers will find, the end product of archival processing, is a series of files organized within cardboard boxes—both files and boxes made from acid-free paper stocks to protect the old papers from further deterioration.

Here at the Society, indexes to all archival collections are housed in the Library. Subject, proper-name, and geographic-name indexes point the researcher to specific collections; inventories of each collection tell her or him what materials are in that group.

The archives staff look forward to seeing researchers interested in business history utilizing the Helena banking collection. The team who processed it say they wouldn't mind if an accountant had a look at it—they'd like to know how much accounting methods may have changed over the years.

J.C. K
Montana's F

by Frances Judge

He worked in a world where the professional's equipment includes heavy and light chasing hammers; round, flat, and square files; doming block and doming punches; pliers—slide, round-nosed, flat, and ordinary; scorpers; draw-plates; straight and curved cutting shears; a frame saw and fine piercing saws; snarling irons, drill stock, sandbag, pitch block, bench vise, blow pipe, and spirit lamp; slips of boxwood, and jeweler's rouge.

These esoteric items were the working tools of the goldsmith one hundred years ago (just as they are today). And Joseph C. Keppler was, in all likelihood, what he claimed to be: the first jeweler in Montana Territory.

Keppler made rings, watches, and other jewelry from precious metals that came out of the local mountains and streams. Many of his rings and pins were set with garnets—some unusually beautiful—that came from Montana gravel beds, the stones that were sometimes mistakenly known as "rubies."

Surely there are persons in Montana and elsewhere who own jewelry made by J.C. Keppler who know nothing about the man and would not recognize his name if they heard it. But there are also a number who own Keppler pieces, know who made them, and consider them doubly precious.

Keppler as a youth

Joseph Charles (or Carl) Keppler was born in Prussia in March 1844, the third of eight children. He attended German schools until he was fourteen; at that time his parents, Joseph and Mary, with their children, left their native Germany. Conditions in Prussia had become intolerable in the 1850s after a slight trend toward liberalsim. Religious persecution, renewed press censorship, and other feudal restrictions led to heavy emigration between 1850 and 1860. The Kepplers, who were Jewish, joined the many who moved to the United States.

According to J.C. Keppler's granddaughter, Lilac Holman, the family "went as far as the train could go, which landed them in Galena, Illinois." For two dollars an acre, the senior Joseph acquired a government lot that lay between Galena and East Dubuque. Here he would spend the rest of his life.

In Galena, the young Joseph apprenticed to J.W. Safely, jeweler and watchmaker. (Montanans years later would refer to Keppler as a friend of Ulysses S. Grant. Keppler's master, Safely, was a sometime business partner of the yet-unsuccessful Grant in those pre-Civil War days).

Without finishing his apprenticeship, Joseph left for Denver, Colorado Territory, in 1861. There he completed his training after three more years of apprentice work.

Joseph and his brother Michael, who had joined him in Denver, moved northwest to Boise City, Idaho Territory. Michael remained there while Joseph turned the ox team northeast toward Montana and the gold fields. He arrived in Bannack in 1864, better prepared for the future than most in the swelling camp. As soon as possible he opened a jewelry and watch shop—the first in the territory, as he would proudly advertise in future years.

Keppler knew that gold dust would flow freely among the people, as long as the earth and streams held gold that could be recovered. Most people enjoy jewelry, so those who mined and those who served the miners—storekeepers, innkeepers, saloonkeepers, operators of livery stables, blacksmiths, barbers, harlots, housewives, and ranchers—would buy ornaments, if they were available, for themselves and those they loved, admired, or owed.

Keppler did not have a complete set of jeweler's tools when he started out in the middle 1860s. Getting to a mining camp in the Rockies in those days with bare necessities was not an easy feat in itself. Too, Keppler was only twenty years old and new at his craft when he came to the Territory, and it takes time to build up a well-equipped shop. But he made use of ingenuity, making his own tools, such as the pair of long-nosed pliers that he fashioned from an iron tire. (A couple years before his death, Keppler gave this handmade tool to Peter Moran, an Anaconda jeweler.)

Much of Keppler's work with gold and garnets was heavy, but with a beauty to the heaviness. There was skill in his thick-knuckled hands, creativity in his mind, and even humor—he was known to make a trick ring of gold, a snake that uncoiled. He used various colors of gold, which lent further interest. Some shades were made by the alloy used; for instance, gold alloyed with silver has a greenish cast. Some colors can be darkened by heat alone, without the use of chemicals: 15 carat gold (15 parts pure gold, 9 parts alloy) will turn a shade of purple if heat is arrested at just the right moment.

In much of his work—earrings, breast pins, and finger rings—Keppler used an intricate grape and leaf design made of shining "rough" gold. This design, now associated with the Black Hills region of South Dakota, may have been, as some Montanans believe, originally used in the West by Joseph Keppler.

Two years later Keppler relocated to Virginia City, Montana—the new boom town—in Alder Gulch and about sixty-five miles from Bannack. Here, using gold and other native metals, he carried out special orders for his customers, a practice that enhanced his reputation. A favorite order placed by the young miners was to have Keppler fashion a ring from their very first gold find—a ring to be sent back home to the "girl left behind."

But Virginia City soon died down; the placers of Alder Gulch were playing out. In 1868, therefore, Keppler returned to Bannack, retaining a financial interest in a Virginia City jewelry store for a while. He would make Bannack his residence for the next ten years.

Above Bannack, on either side of Grasshopper Creek, are hills and gullies and mountain flanks. Rising on and up are the mountains themselves with evergreens running the ridges. Here and there naked cliffs protrude—sunburned, windswept, frost-eaten.

The town of Bannack developed helter-skelter along the undulating north bank of the creek. Dozens of prospectors and miners from Colorado, Idaho, Oregon, and California made their way to this new bonanza area, disappointed by their failures elsewhere. They were a mixture of college-educated men with serious plans for making a future, and many who were ill-educated in any formal way, but no doubt sharp as their mining picks. Had graduate degrees been offered for sweltering, freezing, bullwhacking, digging, building, and cursing, most would have earned doctorates.

By the time the winter of 1862-63 set in, Bannack had burgeoned (in less than six months) from a few individuals to four hundred men, women, and children. The gravels and sands of the stream were sluiced. In time, the hills, gullies, and mountain flanks became dotted with prospect holes; some today still appear raw, though they have not been touched in years.

Clarinda Kirkpatrick Keppler

Although J.C. Keppler had followed the gold rush, he did not share the "get rich and get out" attitude of so many prospectors. He was among the responsible citizens who came west seeking permanence, and who realized that the quality of a community was of first importance.

After becoming established in Bannack, Keppler accepted an invitation to join the Masonic Lodge. Being a citizen with a respectable trade and a future cut out for him, Keppler was welcomed by this fraternity.

In 1869, at the age of 25, he entered into the first of his four marriages. Clarinda Kirkpatrick, not yet sixteen, had emigrated from Wisconsin with her family six years earlier. She bore Joseph four sons during the first seven years of their marriage.

Bannack's boom was fading by the late 1870s, residents drifting on to more prosperous places. From a high of 5,000, population was down to 700 by 1879. For Keppler, whose business needed an affluent town, the Bannack years had come to an end. In 1878, he opened a store in one of the newest boom towns: Glendale.

A number of Bannackites moved there during that camp's heyday. Glendale was a silver camp about fifty miles north of Bannack, in the foothills of the Pioneer range. The smelter that opened there in 1875 made Glendale the principal business town of the several along Trapper Creek.

Clarinda Keppler and the four boys were still living in Bannack in the spring of 1879 when tragedy stuck the family. Two years before, a diphtheria epidemic had swept the settlement and had passed the Kepplers by. Now, trying to comfort his mother and asking her not to worry, the eldest son died on April 14; four days later, the two youngest boys died. Seven-year-old Eugene, who had seemed the sickest, alone survived.

Keppler, who may have been at his new Glendale shop throughout the epidemic, blamed his young wife for the boys' deaths, probably without justification. Bannack, like similar boom towns, still had the most primitive water and sanitary facilities. It no longer had a resident doctor, and the "Mrs. Estes" who helped Clarinda may actually have harmed the boys.

At any rate, the Kepplers were divorced and Joseph took custody of Gene. The boy did not forget his mother, and eventually passed along to his own family a remembrance of her. Gene's daughters have preserved a small card with the following sentiment:

Reward of Merit
Presented to Eugene Keppler
by his Mother
Teacher

On the back, in Clarinda's handwriting, is:

and love me well

Joseph Keppler lived in Glendale for the next five years. His jewelry store there was quickly a success, and he also served as the town's postmaster. But once again, mineral resources began to play out and the town began to fade. As he had done before, Keppler looked around for a more permanent community. This time he found one that would last, and that would be his home for the rest of his life.

The town was Anaconda, built as an industrial town and not dependent on flakes of gold or veins of silver. In late 1883, Marcus Daly completed "the largest [copper] smelting plant in the world" at this site twenty-five miles northwest of the Butte mines where his fortunes had begun. He envisioned a great city growing around it, a city that could be the capital when Montana's statehood came.

In 1884, when Joseph Keppler moved there, no town yet existed. In fact, Keppler was one of the city's incorporators, and he served as an alderman on the first city council. He was a charter member of the Masonic Lodge, and would serve twenty-five years as its treasurer. He also was Anaconda's postmaster for four years, 1890 through 1893.

Keppler arrived in Anaconda as a successful and well-established businessman. He had to hire a Glendale ore hauler to help him make the move, with one wagon for household goods, another for "several thousands of dollars worth" of gold and gold dust, gems and jewelry, the whole caravan attended by two armed guards.

Keppler in his middle years

His new store, in the very center of town, was soon beautifully stocked, its displays impressive. Here he continued to create jewelry, including many Masonic rings. The shop sold fine giftware, and also fitted eyeglasses.

Before moving to Anaconda, Keppler had sent his son to a boarding school in Wisconsin, Campion College of the Sacred Heart at Prairie du Chien. Gene entered this school in 1883, at the age of eleven, and graduated in 1888. In the 1890s his father sent Gene to Germany for two years apprenticeship in goldsmithing and watchmaking.

Sometime after his divorce from Clarinda, Joseph Keppler married a second time, to a "Miss Lamay." Who she was, how long the marriage lasted and why it ended, are unknown by Keppler's grandchildren. His own obituaries did not mention her at all, although including Clarinda.

It was with his third marriage that Keppler found a long-time and close companion. She was Samantha Haining, sincerely known as "Grandma" to Gene's family. Joseph and Samantha were married in July 1890, according to court records. Samantha's first marriage had been annuled; she had used an alias to marry a first cousin also named Haining in 1884. her obituary states that she married Keppler shortly before he moved to Anaconda, in 1884—a chivalrous fiction?

The union between Samantha and Joseph Keppler lasted 26 years, until Samantha's death from "cancer of the heart" in 1916.

Gene joined his father in business, and in the early years of the twentieth century Joseph was President and Manager, and Eugene was Vice President of the Keppler Jewelry Store. According to Anaconda jeweler Peter Moran, who knew both men and enjoyed each, Gene liked the jewelry business but could not get along with his father.

Although they worked together for over a decade, Gene was working as a power-house engineer for the Anaconda smelter in 1918, when Joseph Keppler retired. The store was sold to Louis Kirschman of Butte, and Gene stayed with the Anaconda Company for the rest of his working days.

When Gene chose not to continue in his father's footsteps, J.C. Keppler's dreams were shattered. The wound was so deep that he all but disowned his son. The elder Keppler was devoted, though, to Gene and Elizabeth Horn Keppler's four daughters—Violet, Lilac, Iris, and Lilly—and that greatly eased the situation between father and son.

Also in 1918, J.C. Keppler married for the fourth time. His new wife was Bibbienne Bishop, widow of a dentist and mother of a grown daughter. The bridegroom was 74 years old.

Keppler's health was failing in 1920, and he and Bibbienne traveled to Oregon in search of a more beneficial climate. But Joseph succumbed to "a general decline of old age" on December 27, 1920. In its obituary, the Anaconda Standard went on to say that "Probably no man among early Anaconda settlers enjoyed a wider acquaintance, due to his business and fraternal activities, and his reputation for veracity, and square dealing."

Like many others, Keppler had followed the boom from town to town and had moved on when the bust came. He lived without fanfare, but his quiet dedication to community was the spirit that helped build Montana's permanent towns.

Editor's Note: Frances Judge became interested in Joseph C. Keppler, Montana's first jeweler, through a ring she inherited from her grandmother—a ring made by Keppler in the 1870s. Mrs. Judge's great-grandparents, Wilson and Mary Jane Wadams, emigrated to Bannack in 1862, just as the camp's boom began. Mrs. Wadams was known as "the first white woman in Bannack"; Mrs. Judge says that this "now amuses me, since I've recently learned that she was part Menominee Indian."

The Wadams' daughter Lucy was a young woman living in Bannack, when, around 1875 to 1878, Keppler made the ring that she treasured all her life. "It was designed in two shades of gold," Mrs. Judge writes, "the mounting bold, at right angles to the band, and set high with three Montana garnets. I wear it now.

"I like to think that Keppler might have been intrigued by my grandmother—a character in her own right; anything but stupid, anything but educated (formally, that is), uninhibited, raucous, and full of mischievous fun. By the turn of the century she had been married three times, and so had J.C. Keppler. Do you suppose she was referring to him when she told me that a friend confessed that he had wanted to marry her but never had the chance to ask, because they were never single at the same time? When she wasn't, he was, and when she was, he wasn't."

E.E. "Boo" MacGilvra

Each generation produces a few great story-tellers and only a handful of them live long enough to entertain and instruct several generations. E.E. "Boo" MacGilvra was one of those precious few and anyone who know him or even met him knew they were around a great story-teller—in this case a man who could recount true tales from Ringling Brothers circus life to gold mining and homesteading in the Little Rockies to the inner workings of Montana's legislature. Boo MacGilvra, who died March 3, lived a fascinating and rich life and he had the gift of sharing it with others.

He was born on a ranch near Baraboo, Wisconsin (the source of his nickname) in 1893, not far from the headquarters of Ringling Brothers circus. As a youngster Boo traveled with the circus and it was then, in 1903, that he first saw Montana. Thirteen years later he came to stay, first in Zortman where he homesteaded, then to the Flathead Valley where he grew cherries, and finally to Butte where lived the rest of his life and held a position in the public relations department of Montana Power Company, a job that took him to Helena as lobbyist for 20 consecutive sessions of the legislature.

Boo was a member of the Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society since 1960, and served as its president for several terms. He was very active in the Lewis & Clark Heritage Trail Foundation, the Montana Centennial Train in 1964, Butte's World Museum of Mining, and dozens of other activities in service of Montana history.

There will be many Montanans who will mourn his passing and everyone involved with Montana history will remember his contributions, but those who knew him best will remember how he met life squarely, lived it fully, and always saw humor in the human condition.

400 Crowd Open House at Bitter Root

Over 400 visitors crowded into the Bitter Root Heritage Center in Hamilton in mid-February for an open house occasioned by new and rearranged displays. Heritage Center trustees and volunteers were delighted, even though, according to librarian Erma Owings, "It was so crowded you couldn't see the exhibits!"

The carefully planned (and still growing) museum arose phoenix-like just last spring after its collections had been in storage for 15 years. In 1964, when the building that housed the Bitter Root Valley Historical Society Museum was sold and torn down, new quarters couldn't be found. Finally, in the spring of 1979, county commissioners gave the Society a new home in the former Ravalli County Courthouse.

Displays in the historic building include room exhibits that bring to life everything from a dentist's office to a formal dining room. An excellent Indian artifacts collection and pioneer settlers collection are now housed in the former county treasurer's vault. The fight against Rocky Mountain Spotted Fever is memorialized as well.

Now in the planning stage is a communications room that will include telephone and telegraphy equipment—along with the entire original Hamilton post office.

Visitors are welcome at the museum Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays from noon to 4 p.m.

Surveys Planned

Ten Montana cities will inventory their historic properties this year, aided by historic preservation grant funds, according to Dr. Robert Archibald, Acting State Historic Preservation Officer.

The historical and architectural surveys will be done in Fort Benton, Missoula, Troy, Dillon, West Yellowstone, Helena, Red Lodge, Billings, Kalispell, and Bozeman's downtown commercial district.

Professional historians and architects, under contract, will examine each building in each city and will record those eligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places. The resulting inventory will be produced both in written and in map versions—permanent references for future developers and preservationists.

The cities involved will supply matching funds for the surveys. In Bozeman, the School of Architecture at Montana State University will perform the survey as a class effort.

Dr. Archibald stated that public meetings will be held in each city following its survey, in order to familiarize property owners with the National Register and its benefits that encourage private preservation.

When Disaster Strikes . . .

"What if," asks archivist Ellie Arguimbau, "a water main breaks and floods your museum or library, or firemen hose down a small fire and get rows of shelves soaked? Is your museum or library staff ready to handle such disasters?"

If not, come to the free workshop being held April 22 at the Montana Historical Society. It's open to volunteer and professional, museum and library staff members and will last from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Jack Thompson of Thompson Conservation Laboratory, Portland, will conduct the workshop, which is sponsored by Northwest Archivists, Inc., and funded by the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The morning session includes slides and instruction on disaster salvage techniques and discussion on forming a disaster action team.

The afternoon will feature four hours of actual experience in salvaging water-damaged materials. In fact, old shoes and old clothes are recommended for the session.

Attendees will be on their own for the one-hour lunch break.

Advance registration is requested and should be in by April 8. To register, or to request additional information, contact Ellie Arguimbau, Montana Historical Society, 225 N. Roberts, Helena 59601.

¶ The famous flight of the Nez Perce through Montana over a century ago continues to draw interest. One of the better known episodes in Montana, though not as well known outside the state, is the way Joseph and the Nez Perce skirted the breastworks thrown up at the bottom of Lolo canyon—the barricades that earned the name "Fort Fizzle." While working on an unrelated collection of papers, archivist Frank Marron came across this letter, dated July 25, 1877—just three days before the Nez Perce passed Fort Fizzle and headed up the Bitterroot.

> Hostile Indians within 25 or 30 miles of us and say they will fight their way through if not allowed to go peaceably. We have only about 125 guns against supposed 300 Indians comprising Joseph's, Looking Glass' and White Bird's band. We look for help from DL County [Deer Lodge] tomorrow. Indians say they will give us until 3 P.M. tomorrow to decide. We will fight rather than allow them to pass. Are short of guns and ammunition but will give them the best game we can. My own impression is that they won't attempt to force a passage against the Breastworks & rifle pits constructed across Lo Lo Canyon but that Joe will give us the slip on one of 3 trails west of us and go to the Jocko & thence east—or he can if he chooses force his way right through town [Missoula] & thence up the Big Blackfoot thus avoiding the forces on the way to our assistance. You will hear news before this reaches you as a courier left for DL at 9 this AM as soon as we had the news.

Ferdinand Kennett, the author of this letter, was then cashier at Missoula National Bank. Born in St. Louis in 1840, he came to Montana from Wisconsin in 1867, worked in Helena as a bookkeeper, and went to Missoula in 1873. In 1889 he organized Western Montana Bank in Missoula and served as its president. Kennett died in Missoula on May 4, 1915.

¶ The Arts Chateau in Butte, the turn-of-the-century mansion at 321 Broadway that was built by William A. Clark's son, Charles, is undergoing significant interior restoration work, according to Chateau director John Barsness. Funded by a grant from the historic preservation office in the Montana Historical Society, the restoration will provide additional gallery space and preserve the mansion's historic qualities. Barsness estimates that the work will be completed by July.

While the restoration proceeds, the Chateau will continue normal operations in the small art galleries and five period rooms that are open to the public without admission charge. The Arts Chateau is a non-profit institution dedicated to promoting the arts and preservation of culture and is funded by memberships and donations.

¶ Not many Montanans recognize the name Hazel Hunkins Hallinan, but they should. Belle Winestine, a Montanan who grew up with the idea that women and politics should mix and was Representative Jeannette Rankin's assistant in Washington in 1917, reminds us that Mrs. Hallinan is the last of the national heroines of the woman suffrage movement. Mrs. Hallinan will be ninety in June and has lived in England for many years, but her youth was spent in Billings, Montana, where her father and mother, Lewis and Ann Whitingham Hunkins, raised their only child.

Mrs. Hallinan graduated from Vassar College in 1913, hoping to pursue a career in the field of chemistry. After teaching at the University of Missouri for three years, she returned to Montana to care for her ill mother. She tried to find employment as an industrial chemist, but the answer was always the same—"Women need not apply." That prompted her to join the feminist cause and her activity eventually landed her in jail in Washington, D.C. in 1917 for picketing.

Montana Senator Thomas J. Walsh defended her in Congress, and during those debates, according to Belle Winestine, suffrage women were called "short-haired, iron-jawed angels." Many activist women had begun cutting their hair short and the pundits could not resist commenting on it. Hazel Hunkins Hallinan of Billings was one of those activists—another Montanan we should know more about.

Russell Auction Planned For March 20-22

Western art fans will gather in Great Falls for the 12th Annual C.M. Russell Auction of Original Western Art on March 20-22, at the Heritage Inn. The Auction, created and sponsored by the Great Falls Advertising Federation, benefits the C.M. Russell Museum there.

Contemporary Western art is featured in the two main evening auctions and in the "Quick Draw" event. Artist Steve Seltzer will conduct a seminar entitled "Seltzer: Then & Now," and cartoonist Stan Lynde will host the seminar "History of American West and the Comic Strip."

Saturday afternoon features a showing of the documentary "The West of Charles Russell," followed by a panel discussion with Dan Jones, photo archivist who worked on the film, and the 1980 Honorary Chairman; Milburn Stone, actor and this year's Honored Guest; and Fred Renner, Russell authority.

Tickets and further information are available from the Great Falls Advertising Federation, Box 619, Great Falls 59403.

Saindon Heads Foundation

Glasgow's Bob Saindon took over the presidency of the national Lewis & Clark Trail Heritage Foundation in August. The educator, who is also director of the Valley County Historical Society, was a founder and the charter president of the Valley County Lewis & Clark Trail Society.

The Foundation is an association of local, county, and state groups in eleven states along the Corps of Discovery's route. Their goals include preserving and protecting Trail sites and publicizing the Expedition's varied contributions.

SIXTH ANNUAL MONTANA HISTORY CONFERENCE
McCOURT
"THE IMPACT OF HISTORY"

The Sixth Annual Montana History Conference did again this year what it has done so well before—served up the best fare on historical Montana to three hundred people. Many in attendance were back for their fourth or fifth conference and the concensus was that this year's meeting was another success.

The conference was held at the Montana Historical Society and Helena's Colonial Inn, October 11-13. From Thursday evening, when Lt. Governor Ted Schwinden presented certificates of registration of historic properties in Montana, the conference kept everyone involved with panel discussions, illustrated lectures, and formal addresses throughout Friday and Saturday.

Partially funded by the Montana Committee for the Humanities, this year's conference had as its theme —"The Impact of History," how the past has shaped the present in Montana. The opening illustrated lecture by Helena artist Robert F. Morgan, "Western Art: Images of the Past," explained the importance of research in the creation of historically accurate western art. Using examples of painting and sculpture from the Society's collections, Morgan pointed out fine details to a large and attentive audience gathered in the Mackay Russell Gallery.

At the Colonial Inn on Friday morning, two concurrent sessions explored the history of forest lands policy in Montana and the actual conditions faced by troopers on Montana's military frontier. Robert Wambach, Director of the Montana Department of Fish, Wildlife and Parks, chaired the session on forest policy. Included on the panel were Gary Brown of the Forestry Resources Division of the Montana Department of Natural Resources, Richard Strong of the U.S. Forest Service and Doris Milner of the Montana Wilderness Society. The panel concluded, among other things, that there needs to be much more research in the history of resource management in Montana.

Dr. Robert Utley, formerly with the Park Service and now President of the President's Advisory Council on Historic Preservation, joined Dr. Raymond Mentzer of Montana State University and Kermit Edmonds of Missoula's Hellgate High School to discuss the often misrepresented life of the frontier trooper. Mentzer's on-site research at Fort Logan/Camp Baker near White Sulphur Springs and Edmond's meticulous investigation of the personnel at Fort Missoula during the frontier period arrived at the same conclusion: the frontier trooper's life in Montana was filled with ordinary and unexciting details with few actual combat experiences. Robert Utley, who addressed the Friday luncheon on "The Trooper," commented on the many misconceptions about frontier military life perpetuated by films, novels and television.

Fr. Peter J. Powell, Research Associate at the Newberry Library in Chicago, presented a captivating illustrated lecture that graphically recounted the history of the capture, incarceration and escape of the northern Cheyenne people in the late 1870s. Using Northern Cheyenne paintings that were sketched in captured or discarded ledger account books, Fr. Powell carefully explained the Indians' perspective on their historic ordeal, including the long march from Oklahoma back to Montana in 1878. Introducing Fr. Powell with a traditional prayer and later commenting on the lecture was respected Northern Cheyenne elder John Wooden Legs of Lame Deer, Montana.

Speaking at the Friday evening banquet was Dr. Richard Roeder, professor of history at Montana State University. Dr. Roeder's address, acclaimed by many as the best in recent years, was entitled "J.K. Howard: The Journalist's Montana." Joseph Kinsey Howard, Dr. Roeder told his audience, was more than one of Montana's greatest authors, more than an accomplished journalist; Howard was an advocate of Montana, especially those character traits that have historically made a statewide community.

Two special awards were given at the banquet. The Board of Trustees Award for Outstanding Contribution to Montana History was presented to Dr. Merrill Burlingame, professor emeritus at Montana State University, by Board president Eric Myhre. The magazine's annual award for the best article published in the preceding year, the Vivian Paladin Award, was given to William E. Foley and Charles David Rice of Central Missouri State University by magazine editor Bill Lang.

At an early session on Saturday morning, the Montana Oral History Association held an organizational meeting that drew an enthusiastic audience, demonstrating clearly that oral history is growing in popularity in Montana.

Two concurrent sessions Saturday morning dealt with very diverse topics, ethnic history in Montana and historic preservation. The former session featured a panel discussion by historians in the field of ethnic historical research. Dr. Arthur Dolman of Northern Montana College spoke on Scandinavians; Jeanne Eder of University of North Dakota discussed researching the Chippewa-Cree landless Indians of Montana; Anna Zellick of Lewistown described her research on the Croation population in the state; and Lory Morrow and Bill Lang of the Montana Historical Society explained respectively the difficulties of researching the history of the Jewish and black communities in Helena.

Jerry Rogers, Chief of the Office of Archeology and Historic Preservation in Washington, D.C., Robert Utley, and Edrie Vinson, Historian in the Office of Historic Preservation in Helena, presented an informative workshop for the many people and groups interested in historic preservation in the state. Rogers later spoke at the Saturday luncheon on "Historic Preservation in America." There is no question about it, as Rogers told his audience, historic preservation in the United States is growing in popularity with businessmen and financial institutions as well as preservationists and local historical associations.

As a fitting finale for the Sixth Annual Montana History Conference, Jean Baucus, author of Helena, Her Historic Homes, and Kingston Heath, architectural historian from Montana State University, led a guided tour through Helena's famous mansion district on the city's west side. Included in the Saturday afternoon tour were looks at the interiors of several of the historic homes.

Burlingame Honored

One of the special moments at the Montana History Conference in October was the awarding of the Board of Trustees' Award for Outstanding Contribution to Montana History. The 1979 award went to the dean of Montana historians, Dr. Merrill Burlingame.

Long a professor of history at Montana State University and now Professor Emeritus, Dr. Burlingame is recognized by nearly everyone who has read or researched much in Montana history. A generation of students attended his classes, and, as one of his colleagues said to us in casual conversation, "that man knows more than any of us about the details of Montana history."

Over the years his writings have contributed greatly to the education of Montanans about their state. Most famous, and due to be re-issued soon, is his classic account of Montana's territorial history, The Montana Frontier (1942). In that volume he set a high standard for care in presenting the factual base of Montana history.

It is fitting, too, that the Board of Trustees honored Dr. Burlingame, because he served on the Board from 1954 to 1976. As a respected historian and teacher, as an active scholar, and as a public-spirited citizen who has supported historical activities of all kinds throughout Montana, Dr. Burlingame was honored by the Montana Historical Society.

MOHA Formed at Conference

The Montana Oral History Association, which grew out of the oral history workshops last spring put on by the Montana Committee for the Humanities, held its first meeting in Helena during the recent Montana History Conference. The meeting drew well over 100 interested persons, many now or previously involved in oral history projects across the state. The Association's steering committee, composed of Dr. Jeff Safford of Montana State University, Dr. Robert Archibald and Dr. Bill Lang of Montana Historical Society, Dr. Art Dolman of Northern Montana College, Claire Rhein and Dr. Dale Johnson of University of Montana and Dr. Rex Myers of Western Montana College, explained the goals, plans and resources of the new organization.

The general aim of the Montana Oral History Association is to encourage, aid and stimulate oral history projects throughout the state. Membership in the association is open to anyone interested in oral history, and as of yet there are no dues connected with membership. Secondary, but important, goals of the organization are to inventory oral history holdings and current activities in Montana, to prepare an oral history guide or handbook, to help find funding sources for new projects, and to press for the establishment of a statewide oral history program.

These are ambitious goals, but it was clear at the first meeting in Helena that oral history activities are on the increase and there is great popular support in large and small communities across the state. Future association news and projects will be reported in these columns. Anyone desiring further information or to become a member please contact: Rex Myers, Western Montana College, Dillon, MT 59725.

Anaconda Donates Records to Society

When two truckloads of Anaconda Copper Company records arrived here in August, they represented what archivist Brian Cockhill calls a "great acquisition, an excellent collection in business history."

Now being processed for the Archives, the collection includes company records from the 1880s to the 1910s—internal records that have never before been available to researchers. The collection comprises about 60 letterpress books and 25 letterboxes, and almost 400 volumes of financial records.

For the time period covered, the Anaconda Company was active only in Montana, but not only in mining. The collection includes materials from subsidiary operations, including brickmaking and real estate development, pursued in support of the mining operations.

Predecessor and subsidiary companies are also represented, such as the Boston & Montana Consolidated Copper & Silver Mining Company, the Parrot Silver & Copper Company, and the Butte and Boston Consolidated.

The gift results from several years' contact between former Historical Society director Sam Gilluly, along with Cockhill, and Anaconda Company officials Alex Hansen and C.J. Hansen.

Our staff is especially pleased with the company's decision to place the material in a Montana repository. Cockhill describes it as "a very broad representation of business endeavor in Montana, that will increase in significance with the passage of time."

Glasgow Host to Lewis & Clark Celebration

The 11th Annual Meeting of the Lewis and Clark Trail Heritage Foundation attracted 125 attendees to Glasgow in mid-August. Special emphasis during the four-day conference was on the Assiniboine Indians, a tribe greatly feared by Lewis and Clark. Their modern-day descendents were gracious hosts for a powwow and a dinner of traditional Plains food.

Kenny Ryan, Assiniboine historian and Administrative Officer at Rocky Boy Reservation, addressed the dinner gathering with white and Indian accounts of "The History of the Assiniboine People." Mike Aderhold, biologist in Glasgow for the Department of Fish, Wildlife and Parks, offered a slide talk on "Lewis and Clark and the Plants and Animals of Northeast Montana."

Mining in the Kootenai

Mining—past, present, and future—and its effects on a region's culture, economics, and topography were explored during the third annual Kootenai Seminar at the Libby Dam Visitor Center early in August.

Speakers and panels traced the many aspects of mining in the Kootenai region, on both sides of the U.S.-Canada border, since it began in the early 1860s. Seminar participants ranged from modern-day mining personnel to historians of the mining industry. They discussed Montana's mining history, from precious metals to coal, and the impact contemporary mining has on the state.

In his keynote address, Michael P. Malone, Graduate Dean of Montana State University, pointed out that the first Montana coal boom occurred in the 1880s, pioneered by the steam-driven railroads. Donald Spritzer, author of the recent Waters of Wealth: A Story of the Kootenai River and Libby Dam, described the international Kootenai region mining rush from the 1860s to 1900.

Mining technology was presented in an illustrated lecture by David Morley, Assistant Superintendent at Ft. Steele Historic Park. David Norcross, a retired miner from British Columbia, recalled early 20th century mining with a showing of hand-drawn slides.

Heritage Museum volunteers offered another kind of history with a Friday night banquet of "mining camp grub," including stew, sourdough bread, and huckleberry crisp. Following the banquet, the Old Time Fiddlers of Kalispell supplied dance music.

Duane Smith, professor of history at Fort Lewis College in Durango, Colorado, entitled his banquet address "The Curtain Fell to Slow Music." In it, he described the society and cultural life of the western mining camp.

Seven consecutive sessions on Saturday were devoted to the contemporary mining issue in the Kootenai Region. Earl Lovick of W.R. Grace, Inc., described that company's vermiculite mine in Libby, preceding a panel discussion chaired by State Historian Edrie Vinson, "The Environmental Impact Statement: Protection for Whom?"

Ms. Vinson also led panel discussions of "Environmental and Social Impacts of Mining," and "Economic Impacts of Mining."

The situation in Canada's Kutenai region was explored by Miller H. Mason of The Mining Association of British Columbia. Dr. John Balla of the Asarco Northwestern Exploration Division present an illustrated description of the proposed Troy-Asarco Project.

The closing remarks by William A. Douglas, Lincoln County Attorney, vividly described the "unholy bug" that causes the average, small-time miner to "go around digging holes and to remain living on a poverty level while aspiring to wealth."

Jennifer Jeffries Thompson, curator of Libby Dam Visitor Center, has announced that transcripts of the seminar will be available from her in January. Contact the Center at Star Route 2, Libby, MT 59923.

YouthinArt: The Best in Montana

Cloth wall hanging, untitled, by grades 1 through 8, Hawthorne School, Missoula.

Excitement was the watchword in our Poindexter Gallery through November 28, during the "YouthinArt" show that featured 150 juried selections by Montana schoolchildren.

Part of that excitement comes from the exuberance and sensitivity of the artists themselves. Part comes because of the generosity of the Montana affiliates of the First Bank System, whose financial support will allow the exhibit to travel around the state.

And, curator Mike McCourt says, "it was especially exciting that so many of the artists and their parents from around the state came to the opening on October 13."

The show is one event in Montana's celebration of the International Year of the Child. Four hundred works from over 30 Montana towns were entered. All have been photographed for a set of colored slides that will be available on loan.

The show will travel to First Bank affiliates through the middle of 1980. "The fifteen banks," said Earl Johnson, president of First National Bank in Helena, "felt this was a worthwhile project because of our belief in youth and in their future."

Visitors to the show have expressed surprise over the high level of creativity and technique of many of the works. In all, the show makes a bright and optimistic scene in the Poindexter.

Russell Painting X-Rays Taken

C.M. Russell's "When the Land Belonged to God" recently underwent diagnostic x-rays at St. Peter's Hospital, Helena. At left, conservator Rick Trela and curator Mike McCourt examine one of the x-rays as hospital technicians look on. Out of sight is the armed security guard who also accompanied the painting.

Trela explains that the x-rays are needed because the painting is in fragile shape—even exhibiting some paint loss. From photographs of Russell at work on the piece, plus visible surface evidence, Trela knows that many layers of paint were built up on the canvas as Russell changed the design while painting. X-rays, picking up metals in pigments, are one of several tests needed to reveal the painting's sub-surface qualities and problems.

An autumn day was chosen because the painting could not be subjected to temperature or humidity extremes even in the short interval it was out of the climate-controlled Mackay Gallery.

New Organization Formed By Montana Historians

There is a new historical group on the Montana scene. The Organization of Montana Historians, composed of academic historians, representatives of local historical societies, state historical societies, and other interested historians, was formed at the Montana History Conference in October.

Harry W. Fritz, chairman of the department of History at University of Montana and coordinator of the new organization, said that the Organization of Montana Historians hopes to bring together historians from across the state to discuss common problems, promote the study of history in Montana, find employment for history graduates, and other questions of interest to the group.

The Montana group may affiliate with the National Coordinating Committee for the Promotion of History, a cooperative association created by the major national historical associations. "Regardless of our role in a national effort," Fritz remarked, "it is clear that we need to protect and promote the study of history in Montana. The historians of the state need to communicate more with one another and support each other's work."

Bill Lang, David Rice, Vivian Paladin

The second annual Vivian Paladin Writing Award has gone to William E. Foley and Charles David Rice for their article "The Return of the Mandan Chief" in the Summer 1979 issue of Montana.

Editor William Lang presented the award to Rice during the Montana History Conference banquet in October. Foley and Rice are both professors of history at Central Missouri State University in Warrensburg, and have received a similar award from the Missouri Historical Review.

Montana's editorial board and editors selected the winning article from all those published in the magazine during the past year. Selection criteria include readability, original research, and the importance of the article's contribution to historical knowledge.

The Paladin Writing Award, established by our Board of Trustees last year, honors Montana editor Vivian Paladin, who retired in 1978 after twenty years with the magazine.

Foley and Rice focused on the troubled journey of Mandan chief Shahaka as he returned from Washington, D.C., after visiting there with Lewis and Clark in 1806. By describing the dangers, deaths, and scandal that resulted, the authors illuminated early 19th century conflicts between pragmatic frontier administrators and idealistic federal policy-setters.

New Staff

Over the last few months several new staff members have joined us at the Society; some of them in positions that bring them in direct contact with Society members and patrons. We thought Post readers would like to know something more about our new people and how they came to work here.

Jane Smilie, our enthusiastic new advertising/circulation manager for the magazine, graduated from Southern Illinois University in 1978 with a degree in anthropology. Summer visitiors may remember her helpfulness at the Information Desk, her first job with the Society. Jane's interest in history brought her to us, and she says she "looks forward to helping obtain additional financial support the magazine needs—as well as helping solve subscribers' problems."

Ken Grieb, named Assistant Curator on July 1, joined the Society in 1977 as Business Manager for the Libby Dam Project. He is a Helena native and former employee of the Montana National Guard. A ten-year tour of active duty took him around the country before he returned to Helena and joined our staff two years ago. The needed position of assistant curator was reinstated by the legislature just this year.

Patty Dean, our new Registrar, is an honors graduate of Carroll College in Helena and is currently completing her master's thesis in history museum studies for Cooperstown Graduate Program, State University of New York. Her regular duties include cataloging objects, preparing condition reports on collections, and caring for items both in storage and on display. A current special project is designing the Victorian Christmas room display for our lobby during the holidays.

Patti Borneman, assistant to merchandise manager Dot Walther, handles mail order purchases. She's come to us from California via Oregon and is looking forward to her first winter in a snowy climate. Patti studied at Indian Valley College in California, with special emphasis on journalism and music.

John Hayt, Historic Architect in the Historic Preservation Office, is a Californian who came to the northwest for a "lot saner lifestyle, and no traffic jams." A 1979 architecture graduate of the University of Idaho, Moscow, he worked with the Historic Preservation Office in that state before joining us. He is excited about the chores ahead, citing the many unidentified historic properties in Montana that need to be protected. "The quality," he explains, "and intensity of architecture from Montana's early years are especially high, because of the money available in the state."

Dot Walther succeeded to the position of Merchandise Manager at the end of 1978. She joined the Society in 1977 as audit technician for the business office. Dot has been responsible for two large-scale special projects this year, the limited-edition bronze Russell belt buckle, and the limited-edition reproductions of Russell's painting, "In the Wake of the Hunters."

Frank Marron, an archival technician with the Society since 1977, has been promoted to the position of archives assistant. He is currently working with archivist Ellie Arguimbau, processing the Helena banks collection—business records for three banks that failed in the 1890s depression.

Diana Wilkison moves from one section of the Archives to another, leaving photo archives to become Library Assistant working with manuscript collections. Diana, who studied library science at Simmons College, Boston, Massachusetts, will assist in receiving and processing new collections, microfilming delicate documents, and maintaining the indexes researchers use. She will also aid library patrons who utilize archival materials.

Becca Kohl, replacing Diana Wilkison as archival technician in photo archives, is a history and English graduate of the University of Montana. Half her time is spent working with the photographs of the Haynes collection—a collection she's already familiar with, having helped to catalog the Haynes artifacts. "The number of photographs in the Haynes collection is amazing," she says, "and their quality and range of subjects makes this really interesting work."

Linda Gamble, Business Manager, comes to us from the Governor's Office of Budget and Program Planning, where she worked with the budgets for the Departments of Justice, Health and Environmental Sciences, and Crime Control Division. A native of Wisconsin, Linda completed a Master's in Public Administration at Montana State University in 1978. Working at the Society combines vocation and avocation, she says, adding that "The skiing in Montana is great."

Ayako Kastl, accounting technician in the Business and Accounting Office, was born and raised in Tokyo, where she graduated from business college before working at Yamato U.S. Air Force Base. She moved to Billings in 1970, and this year obtained her U.S. citizenship.

Sally Morrow, a Montanan originally from Great Falls has been a sales counter supervisor for the Society since August. "The busier the better" seems to be Sally's motto, and she looks forward to next summer's crowds of visitors.

Debbie Harriott at the Information Desk is the first face visitors see. A Montana native from Great Falls, Debbie has been at the Desk since October and says she "really enjoys meeting all the interesting people who come in."

Robert Bayuk, a sales counter supervisor since May, is a Theatre Arts graduate of Carroll College, where he will direct "A Delicate Balance" this winter. Robert, from Shelby, Montana, also finds time to work with the Grand Street Theatre in Helena.

The Montana Arts Advocacy, the active citizens group that lobbied the legislature so effectively earlier this year, will commence a fund-raising / member-raising drive soon. Local groups around the state are planning meetings this fall to generate more interest in keeping the Arts Advocacy strong and active between legislative sessions. The Advocacy made a genuine difference in the amount of monies spent on the preservation and promotion of culture in Montana. It is an organization that deserves support from everyone interested in the quality of life in Montana. A contribution of $10 makes you a member and keeps you informed of Advocacy activities via The Advocate. The Montana Arts Advocacy, P.O. Box 7515, Missoula, Montana 59807.

We stumbled over this tidbit while trying to confirm an unrelated item in the Helena Independent in 1906. Evidently Helena police had been receiving daily complaints about the reckless antics of motorists on county roads coming into Helena. The auto was still a novelty and horses had had little time to adjust to the cars' speed and the drivers' behavior. "The ranchers complain," the Independent reported, "that the motorists, as a rule, take the road and refuse to yield an inch to any man with a team." This angered one rancher so much that he blurted out the following to a reporter.

"I'm going to take a shot at one of these fellows some day and even if I fill his carcass full of lead there isn't a jury in the county that would convict me. It's not safe for a woman to drive on the roads around Helena any more since these machines have come in. Some of the motorists haven't the first instincts of a gentleman. This spring my wife was coming into town when one of these machines tore by. The horse she was driving began shying when the fellow was 200 yards away, but he didn't slow up a bit and went by flying. The horse bolted and ran into a barb wire fence, but the fellow never stopped. There are one or two that are pretty decent, but most of them should be taken out and hanged!"

The Oral History Center in the Archives of the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Library at University of Montana received a gift of $750 from the Friends of the Library organization, a most helpful group of people who contribute time and money in support of the University library. Their gift was matched by a private donor.

"This contribution," oral historian Claire Rhein remarked, "will enable us to continue cataloging our oral history collection and help us purchase necessary equipment and storage cases." The Mike Mansfield Collection, archivist Dale Johnson and Claire Rhein explained, contains some fascinating oral history, including disc and tape recordings of major speeches, interviews on national news shows, press conferences, and many other recordings. The Oral History Center also has materials from the Chet Huntley and Senator James E. Murray collections. Other holdings include interviews with lumbermen, homesteaders, forest service employees and a separate Native American collection.

Warren McGee of Livingston, Montana, a local historian who has spent years researching the faint tracks of the Bozeman Trail, has alerted everyone to the prospect that the famous historical highway signs, which were done many years ago by Bob Fletcher and Shorty Shope, may be phased out by the Montana Highway Department. McGee has organized a petition drive to prevent this and to encourage the highway department to put up additional highway markers at historic locations around the state. Anyone who wishes to aid him in this endeavor should contact: Warren McGee, 427 S. 8th, Livingston, Montana 59047.

Neihart? Monarch? Riceville? Note the town plat of Monarch tacked up on the side of the building. And who was the "Dr. Craig" whose nameplate is on the steps?

Since September we have been sending historic photographs and historical articles to newspapers throughout Montana as an educational service, and as a way of sharing some of our resources on an informal basis. Some of you may have seen these articles and photos. It is fun to find special pictures and historical tidbits to share, but one recent photo we used created a minor controversy among historians in the Society. The picture seemed simple enough, but the identification on the back did not correspond with some details in the photo.

Opinion was divided. Was it a picture of Neihart, Montana, or of a sister mining camp, Monarch? One day after it appeared in the Helena newspaper under the heading "Help!", we heard from a resourceful citizen who poked around in his own library and informed us that it was a photo of Riceville, Montana, a close neighbor of both Neihart and Monarch. Does anyone have any other candidates? We sure would like to know.

THE BEST YET

Bigger and better than ever, varied and relaxed are all ways to describe this year's Western Rendezvous of Art, held in the Society's Poindexter Gallery August 24-26. Crowds and sales broke records, and the quality of art entries created extra work for western art expert Ginger Renner, who juried the show.

A banquet at Frontier Town, where five lodges of mountain men camped in true rendezvous style, a Gates of the Mountains boat trip, and plenty of time to view the works of 34 artists were hallmarks of the 1979 Rendezvous.

John Quigley, Frontier Town's builder and owner, was this year's honored artist, in recognition of his fine wood carvings.

Nearly all the works on display were sold during the weekend, for receipts of $108,000. The show remains open to the public through September 30.

The Mill Pond Press chose Paul Calle's pencil drawing, "The Winter Hunter," for its award, which includes production of a limited commemorative print of the work.

The Irvin S. "Shorty" Shope Award for treatment of a historical subject went to Jack Hines' oil, "First Day in Camp."

Merit awards were given for Calles' "The Winter Hunter," Arlene Hooker Fay's pastel "Mother and Child," Hank Lawshe's oil "Wolf," Joe Halko's duron original

New Board President Is Eric Myhre

Eric Myhre, a Montana businessman in Great Falls and Helena and a Board member since 1975, is the new president of the Montana Historical Society Board of Trustees. Myhre was elected to the post at the Board's summer meeting on July 20.

As a Board member and businessman, Myhre has been active in historic preservation and historic art fields. Participating in the general historic preservation effort in downtown Helena, he is currently remodeling the old Eddy's Bakery building.

Myhre has set several new goals for the Board and the Society. "It is clear," Myhre commented, "that we need to pursue private grant monies to accomplish all that needs doing in the preservation of our state's history. With that in mind, the Board will take the next year to develop as full a plan for the future as possible.

"We are looking forward to working with our new director, Dr. Robert Archibald," Myhre said. "With the Board, Archibald and the staff working together as a unit," Myhre continued, "we will be much better able to determine our objectives and also communicate them to the Legislature."

Mr. Myhre, a native Montanan and a graduate of the University of Montana's School of Journalism, lives in Helena with his wife, the former Nina Harrison, and their one child.

Sixth Annual Montana History

For the sixth year the Montana Historical Society, in cooperation with the Council to Preserve Montana History, will sponsor the annual Montana History Conference, October 11-13, at the Colonial Inn in Helena. Funded by a grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities, the 1979 conference will offer attendees a wide variety of sessions, workshops and special presentations.

As in the previous five conferences, the setting will be informal, the participants will range from nationally-recognized experts to local historians and history buffs, and the result will be three days of enjoyment and learning about Montana's past. This year the conference theme is "The Impact of the Past."

"What we hope to do," conference coordinator Bob Clark explains, "is to provide a convivial atmosphere to discuss some serious subjects. We always avoid academic stuffiness and I think that is why these conferences have been so successful; they give everyone interested in Montana history an opportunity to participate and learn."

The whole affair will begin at the Society on Thursday evening, October 11. In the Russell Gallery, Governor Thomas L. Judge will present certificates to owners of Montana properties listed on the National Register of Historic Places. After the presentations and a social hour, Robert F. Morgan, former museum curator at the Society and an expert on western art, will present an illustrated lecture, "Western Art: Images of the Past." Using examples of works by Charles M. Russell, Edgar Paxson, and others, Morgan will explain the differing styles of individual western artists and how they developed them. Coincidentally, the Society will feature a collection of works by the late Ace Powell in the Poindexter Gallery.

Conference sessions will begin Friday morning at the Colonial Inn. Meeting concurrently, one morning session will probe what life was like on frontier military posts in Montana, while the other session will discuss the evolution of forest lands policies in Montana. Featured participants in the military session include Dr. Robert M. Utley, Executive Director of the President's Advisory Council on Historic Preservation, and Dr. Raymond A. Mentzer, Jr., of Montana State University who has researched the history of Camp Baker/Fort Logan.

K. Ross Toole, Hammond Professor of Western History at the University of Montana, John Willard of Burlington Northern, and Doris Wilner of the Montana Wilderness Society will be on the panel discussing how our forest lands policy developed and what impacts that policy has had on Montana history.

On Friday afternoon Fr. Peter J. Powell, Research Associate at the Newberry Library in Chicago, will present an illustrated lecture on the famous 1878 flight of the Northern Cheyenne people from their incarceration in Oklahoma to their homeland in Montana. John Wooden Legs of Lame Deer will add comments about Cheyenne life of a century ago.

Also on Friday afternoon, The Council to Preserve Montana History will conduct an open meeting to help formalize the Council and draw to it a broader membership. Originally formed nearly a decade ago, the Council is presently an informal group composed of librarians, historians, archivists and museologists from around the state. It is hoped that the Council can expand its mission to become an advocacy group for the concerns of history and historic preservation in Montana.

Dr. Richard B. Roeder, Professor of History at Montana State University, will be the featured speaker at the Friday evening banquet. Dr. Roeder's topic is "Joseph Kinsey Howard: The Journalist's Montana." Other speakers at the conference will be Robert Utley on "The Impact of the Frontier Military" and Jerry Rogers, Chief of the Office of Archeology and Historic Preservation in Washington, D.C., on federal and state historic preservation programs.

Tentatively scheduled for Saturday morning before the sessions begin is a meeting of all persons interested in joining a new organization which is just now forming—the Montana Oral History Association. This group is the result of a series of oral history workshops presented around the state this spring.

Montana's ethnic heritage and the difficulties inherent in researching ethnic history will be the topic of one of the concurrent Saturday morning sessions. The ethnic panel will include: Dr. Art Dolman of Northern Montana College discussing Scandinavian-American settlements on Montana's High Line; Dr. Bill Lang describing the black community of Helena; Ms. Lory Morrow on Helena's Jewish community in 1900; Ms. Jeannie Eder on the Chippewa-Cree; and Ms. Anna Zellick on Montana's Croatian population.

At the same time as the ethnic session, the State Historic Preservation Office will put on a workshop specifically directed at the process of nominating a structure or district for inclusion on the National Register of Historic Places. The panel will include Jerry Rogers, Robert Utley, and Edrie Vinson of the Society's historic preservation office.

For conference attendees who have always wanted an inside look at some of the magnificent mansions on Helena's West Side, the Saturday afternoon session, "History in Houses," will be a genuine treat. Jean Baucus, author of Helena, Her Historic Homes, and Kingston Heath, architectural historian with the Society's historic preservation office, will serve as guides on a walking tour of the historic homes district, including interior tours of selected homes.

The Sixth Annual Montana History Conference has much to offer and the Society hopes that everyone who has an interest will be able to attend. On or about September 1, 1979, advance programs will be mailed to previous conference attendees and members of the Society. Hotel reservation cards will be included in that mailing. Anyone wishing additional information should contract: Bob Clark, Montana History Conference, Montana Historical Society, 225 North Roberts Street, Helena, Montana 59601.

Robert Archibald Appointed Historical Society Director

Dr. Robert Archibald will become the new Director of the Montana Historical Society on September 1, 1979. After a search of several months to find a replacement for outgoing director Ken Korte, the Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society chose Dr. Archibald from a large field of highly qualified applicants.

Dr. Archibald, who has been Director of the Western Heritage Center in Billings since 1977, completed his undergraduate education at Northern Michigan University and received a Ph.D. in American history at the University of New Mexico in 1975. At New Mexico he specialized in western studies, particularly the history of the southwestern borderland region.

In 1975 Archibald became Curator of History at the Museum of Albuquerque where he worked in exhibit design, collections development, photographic collections and museum research. He also served as Secretary to the New Mexico Museums Association in 1976-1977 and served as an historical consultant on a number of projects.

At the Western Heritage Center, Archibald expanded exhibits, educational programs and outreach services. One of the most successful innovations has been the "suitcase exhibits" (covered elsewhere in this issue of the Post) that are sent to schools all over the state, exposing elementary students to history they can "hold in their hands."

"Dr. Archibald has demonstrated his competence in several important museum and administrative areas," Board president Eric Myhre commented, "and all of us at the Society are very excited about his abilities and what it will mean for the institution's immediate future."

For his part, Archibald sees his new position as a tremendous but welcome challenge. "There is so much potential, and there are so many resources that remain untapped," he remarked. "The professional staff is first rate and the Board is committed to having the finest Society in the region. There is a cooperative spirit present that will allow us to do some exciting things in the months to come."

Educational projects and outreach programs are top priorities for Archibald. "The Society," he continued, "is primarily an educational institution that was established to serve the entire state, from the museum and galleries to publications, archives and library departments."

We all welcome Dr. Archibald. We hope members of the Society who visit Helena will take the opportunity to meet the new director.

Archives Labor Holdings Strengthened

Two recent Archives acquisitions add greatly to our coverage of Montana labor unions, according to archivist Brian Cockhill and assistant archivist Ellie Arguimbau. The collections are papers of the Anaconda Central Labor Council, and those of the Helena Typographical Union.

"Our Montana labor holdings are weak," Cockhill says, "and the Anaconda papers are a very good addition to them." They were donated by the Tri-County Historical Society, chaired by Alice Finnegan.

The Council was formed by the merger of the Deer Lodge County Trades and Labor Council and the Anaconda Building Trades Congress, becoming an umbrella group to coordinate and support activities of small locals.

The 1.2-foot collection includes general correspondence 1899-1919, financial records 1901-43, and minutes 1897-1919.

As a specialist in labor materials, Arguimbau was pleased when a second donation completed the Helena Typographical Union records this spring, The local's minutes had been given to us in 1973 by then secretary-treasurer Don Schmidt.

A recent conversation with the current secretary-treasurer, Ben Melugin, resulted in donation of correspondence, contracts, and other papers. The entire collection now spans 1885 through 1972, and measures four cubic feet.

As local #95 of the International Typographical Union, the Helena chapel (printers' locals were so named in the days when meetings opened with a prayer) dates from 1867. It served all of Montana Territory until Miles City (in 1882) and Butte (1883) chapels formed. Helena received its permanent charter in 1884, the year before this collection begins.

Mysterious Women of

by Barbara Rackley

When Progressive Men of the State of Montana came out about 1902, the book preserved biographies of nearly 1100 pioneer Montanans. For us today, it's a useful who's who of the famous and not-so-famous people here in the 19th century.

The book was published by A.W. Bowen & Company of Chicago. Biographees paid for their entries (and paid extra for photographs), and supplied information to Bowen. Staff writers turned these facts into flowery, praiseful prose that suited the style of the times.

Because willingness to pay was a criterion for inclusion, Progressive Men includes many whose names don't appear in formal history books. And despite its masculine title, it includes a few women.

Most of these women are educators and/or nuns, not surprisingly since those are among the few occupations then open to women. Only one of Progressive Men's women is well-known: Ella Knowles Haskell, Montana's first woman attorney.

We became curious about four of the other women in the book, four who seemed to be independent and self-sufficient businesswomen ahead of their time. They turn out to be, for now, mysterious women: the Society's library and archives offer no portraits, letters or diaries, or business records. What stories we could track down suffer from conflicting versions or gaping holes.

We've put together what we could of their stories, incomplete biographies that raise as many questions as they answer. That's our point in this offering: to illustrate the needs both for more materials on and from Montana women, and for research based on those materials.

Sarah Brown: Was she a miner?

Sarah J. (Sadie) Brown raises this intriguing question herself. Although her husband Frank was then still alive, she took a listing in Progressive Men under her own name. But she seems to have given her information to the editors in the plural; her entry, written by Bowen's staff, consistently says "they mined" here and then there and then still another place.

Whether or not she mined alongside Frank in the early days, she lived them in a manner contrary to the mining frontier's pattern.

Sarah, from Boston, was seventeen when she married Frank; they came to Montana in a train of 126 wagons the following year—she being the only woman. Along the east branch of the Yellowstone, their first daughter was born.

The small family arrived in Helena July 3, 1866, according to Sarah's account. They stayed only a month and then began to move around the territory, mining and looking for the big strike. For seventeen years, they continued to move around Montana.

We know that miners did move frequently, guided by rumor or by their own ideas of where the treasure must be. According to Frank's obituary in 1906, he had—before marrying Sarah—already made a "large fortune" in California, been in Alder Gulch and at Last Chance Gulch. The contrary thing is that most fortune-seekers didn't have wives and children during their traveling years. Sarah and Frank had six children during theirs.

We don't know whether Sarah mined at Diamond City, Lincoln Gulch, Cedar Creek, Pioneer, Philipsburg—but Progressive Men, on Sarah's information, says "they" did. From another source, we learn that Sarah co-signed the deed for at least some of their property when they at last struck silver in Warm Springs canyon near Anaconda.

There they opened the Blue-Eyed Nellie Mine, along with a limestone quarry long known as "Brown's Quarry." The mine was rich enough in silver and lead, according to the U.S. Geological Survey, that it produced "several hundred thousand dollars" worth of ore "with a comparatively small amount of development." It's said to be named for one of the Browns' two daughters who died in childhood (their names were Zaidee Mabel and Minnie L.).

If Frank had made a fortune in California, he must have lost it—to have spent all those years looking for another. Anne C. Perro, whose mother was a friend of Sarah, writes in the Anaconda Community history (In the Shadow of Mt. Haggin, 1975) that Frank was a heavy drinker. By the time the Blue-Eyed Nellie closed in 1890, its profits were gone.

Ms. Perro also relates that Frank eventually forged Sarah's signature to sell some of their property to the Anaconda Company. Sarah's attempts to block the sale were stopped by Anaconda's threats to charge Frank with forgery.

In 1900, although Frank was still alive, Sarah, was negotiating the sale of apparently another piece of property—the Browns' ranch near the Blue-Eyed Nellie. Ms. Perro says she was dealing directly with Marcus Daly at the time of the copper baron's death.

Our shadowy portrait of Sarah Brown—until more evidence is found—seems to be of a practical woman married to a flamboyant man. While raising four sons to adulthood (three, interestingly, went into mine-related work), did she handle the family business affairs? We're looking forward to finding out.

Fannie Campbell: A cultured rancher

Fannie Campbell's birthdate is one of the many things we don't know about her, and it seems she meant it to be that way. She didn't tell Progressive Men, and even her obituary gives an approximate age.

So, she was about 18 years old when she came to Montana in 1865. Ten years earlier, her father's business in Chicago had folded and the family had moved to Missouri. In 1863, the parents and at least two children came to Montana; Fannie, the youngest Campbell, and Anna stayed to finish school.

On the girls' 1865 trip up the Missouri, one steamboat sank and the second was attacked by Indians while grounded on a sandbar. Major James B. Campbell met his daughters 200 miles below Fort Benton and took them to his ranch near a settlement he had helped create, the first Gallatin City.

James Campbell had homesteaded that ranch. By 1873, Fannie had filed on her own adjoining homestead; when her father died that year, she took over management of both ranches. (She later sold them and bought the ranch of Joe Wilson, another Gallatin City founder—apparently before 1897.)

Fannie and her neighbors believed she was the first woman in Montana to file on a homestead in her own name. In 1869, though, Miss Gwenllian Evans filed on land on Warm Springs Creek; some digging is yet needed to see whether Fannie had filed before that year.

Fannie Campbell was sturdy and independent enough to run a cattle ranch on her own, but she had other and very different interests, probably rooted in her more affluent childhood. In 1870, she had been certified to teach in Gallatin County. Two years later, according to Lyle K. Williams in Historically Speaking (published by the author at Three Forks for the bicentennial), she opened the area's first free public school (but not first school).

Fannie took music seriously too, having her piano brought up the Missouri in 1866 and keeping it for the rest of her life. She mentioned it in Progressive Men, and even her obituary noted how neighbors over the years had enjoyed her piano playing.

Meanwhile, she entered still another area of investment. In 1874 she bought the ferry built across the Jefferson and Madison rivers about nine years earlier by her brother-in-law James Gallaher and her father's associate, Samuel Weir. Fannie put the equipment into better repair and lowered the rates. (Weir had come west with the Campbell family and Fannie apparently considered him almost a relative; she provided a home for him in his later years.)

Around age 62, Fannie Campbell married Edward J. Thornburg—a Gallatin area horse rancher, according to local directories. At the time, her taxable property was assessed at about seven times the value of his.

Her late name change added spice to the search for Fannie Campbell, with her obituary decorously filed under "Mrs. E.J. Thornburg" and local residents continuing to call her "Aunt Fannie Campbell." She died in 1919, aged "about 72 years."

rogressive Men

We look forward to learning more about this remarkably capable woman in about three years, when the Three Forks Area Historical Society completes an ambitious—and welcome—project. Members of that group, chaired by Mrs. Ruth Myers, recently began compiling biographies of area residents from the earliest up to the present day.

Mary Miller: Maid who invested

When Mary Smith was born in Darke County, Ohio, in 1850, her French immigrant parents probably looked forward to providing well for their daughter. But within three years her brickmason/farmer father was dead, and her mother died six years after that.

At the age of twelve, Mary began working as a domestic, and remained with one family for twenty years. Sometime during those years, she married Ford Hunt and they had a daughter named Gracie—but Hunt died after only eighteen months of marriage.

In 1884, when Mary came to Montana with her second husband, a barber named Henry Miller, she apparently left Gracie in Ohio. We don't know the daughter's birthdate, but Mary told Progressive Men about 1900 that Gracie was living in Akron, married and the mother of two.

After three years in Montana, Henry Miller left the territory and rambled around the West, first selling liquor in California and then returning to barbering and settling in Denver.

By 1889, Mary Miller was living in Butte and identified herself in the city directory as a widow. Whether Henry had recently died or whether Mary simply preferred to be called a widow is uncertain. At any rate, Mary (or Mollie, as she was nicknamed) returned to domestic service, first with a hotel and then with a family for nine years, according to Progressive Men. City directories show, however, that by 1895 she was offering furnished rooms for rent.

Mary Miller managed her growing income wisely, and in 1898 built what she proudly called the Miller Block, on Main Street. More modest than its name suggests, it was still a substantial lodging house, a brick two-story structure with a basement restaurant. For seven years she lived there, renting rooms to miners and raising her second daughter, Ella Miller.

And she apparently continued to invest in Butte. When she died in 1907, her estate included $25,000 in real estate in Butte townsite and the Central and Railroad additions, plus a surprising $5,000 property in the state of Oaxaca, Mexico.

At the time of Mary's death, Ella, a schoolteacher in Butte, was visiting that Mexican property. The obituary (wrongly?) lists Ella as Mary's only daughter. Her first daughter was not a beneficiary of Mary's will, which was written the day before she died. Whether Gracie was already dead is but one of many questions remaining about Mary Miller.

Mary Jackman: Proprietor and principal

The most successful businesswoman of these four was Mary E. Jackman, creator and principal of the Jackman Commercial & Helena Business College. Born in Indiana in 1854, she was raised in Auburn and taught school while working her way through the State Normal School in Danville. She was 29 when she graduated. After teaching for one year at a black university in Alabama, she returned to Indiana, took business courses and then taught in an Indianapolis business college.

She came to Helena in 1890 to visit her brother Charles, a former teacher who had turned to real estate sales. Working at first as an insurance office secretary, Mary Jackman began to teach business students on the side.

By 1892, she had left her secretarial job and was teaching business students full time; within three years she employed five teachers. As enrollment grew, the school moved to larger and still larger quarters in several successive office buildings around the center of Helena. Its name evolved, too, from the initial "School of Shorthand and Typewriting" to "Jackman Business School," and then "Jackman Commercial College."

In 1893, Montana (Wesleyan) University in Helena named Jackman principal of its newly-organized business department. Students traveled by streetcar from their Prickly Pear Valley campus to her downtown classrooms. After five years, the University created its own on-campus Commercial Department.

Curriculum and extracurricular activities at Jackman Commercial College both expanded during these years. The school's catalogs show that foreign languages were added to basic business courses (along with such electives as "ornamental penmanship"). The school supported a baseball team, gave plays, and held an annual alumni reunion.

In the summer of 1901, Jackman bought out her competition, the 18-year-old Engelhorn Business College and became proprietor and principal of the Jackman Commercial & Helena Business College. The combined school took the third floor of the Horsky Block at the center of town. (As Helena Business College, it would continue in existence, at various locations, until 1960.)

Mary Jackman, at the age of 54, sold the school in 1906 to her new principal (and former professor of penmanship), Stephen A.D. Hahn. The following year she moved back to Indiana—and disappeared from Montana history. Her business and personal papers, if preserved, may have gone east with her.

The papers of the Helena Business College, if they go back far enough, could provide insight into Jackman as businesswoman, but we don't know yet. We don't know whether they were destroyed when the school closed two decades ago, or whether they're still held by a private individual.

These, then, are the partial stories of four pioneer Montana businesswomen, sketches that we hope will be filled out someday. In an era that hardly encouraged careers for women, they were outstanding. As the editors of Progressive Men put it, in somewhat condescending amazement:

"It is not given to every woman to become prominent in business in the same lines and in direct competition with the masculine element of society, but it is noticeable that in many cases when they do so compete their success is as pronounced as it is meritorious and deserved."

"Suitcase History" Travels the State

Schoolchildren all over Montana have been experiencing a special kind of history, thanks to the efforts of some talented people who are not afraid to innovate in the cause of historical education. The experience is "suitcase history," a curriculum device that truly brings history "alive" for elementary grade students. These traveling exhibits, which originate at the Western Heritage Center in Billings, bring historically accurate artifact reproductions into the schoolroom where students can actually feel, heft, and rub pieces of Montana's past.

The project was the idea of Dr. Robert Archibald, Director of Western Heritage Center, who began with little more than a concept and then sold it to funding agencies for the necessary financial support. In 1977 volunteers helped put the first exhibit together, and by the following year the Center had received grants from two federal sources, the Institute for Museum Services and the National Endowment for the Humanities. In 1979 the Montana Committee for the Humanities and School District # 2 in Billings provided additional support for the program.

Linda Van Heuvelen, Educational Curator at the Western Heritage Center, has developed five suitcase exhibits since the project began. The exhibits range from a frontier doctor's case to the accoutrements of the fabled mountain men. In each exhibit there are artifact reproductions, of common tools, clothing, and devices that reflect the life of the subject. Teachers are provided with scripts and teaching guides that help them to present the historical background of each item.

The exhibits are in constant use, and they are usually booked for the entire school year by September or October. It is estimated that over 10,000 students have used the exhibits in the last two years.

Van Heuvelen is currently working on a frontier soldier exhibit funded by Deluxe Check Printing Foundation of Minneapolis. Although it is not quite complete, the traveling case already contains clothing, basic kitchen utensils, a canteen, and military hardware. When students pick up the heavy canvas and fleece-lined long underwear the soldiers were issued, they may have a better understanding for the daily irritants the army men faced. Of course, that is the main idea behind the whole project—to allow students the opportunity to identify with the past in a direct manner. It's exciting and it works.

Morgan Earp Was Never in Butte

"The Historical Society of Montana has repeatedly checked their voluminous files, checking and rechecking the 1877 files of the Butte Miner, but all in vain. No mention of . . . the brother of the then unknown Wyatt Earp. The librarians' time has been often wasted with such requests, when they would perhaps prefer to spend their efforts in legitimate historical research."

So wrote one exasperated researcher on our behalf, says librarian Bob Clark in explaining this prickly quotation from the book Wyatt Earp: The Untold Story, by Ed Bartholomew. Bob tells the story this way:

Colorful legends and apocryphal tales abound in Western history, of course, and most of them are better-known and have a longer life than do efforts to set the record straight.

One of the hardiest legends concerned with famous gunfighters and Montana has Morgan Earp being the City Marshal of Butte in the late 1870s, mowing down a Kansas killer, Billy Brooks, along with some local badmen, as a warm-up for the greater glory of the O.K. Corral.

Unfortunately, there's no evidence that Morgan Earp was ever in Butte, while Brooks was hanged several years before Earp supposedly shot him. The story seems to have come from Morgan's more famous brother when, as an old man, he was interviewed by Stuart Lake. Lake's highly-romanticized biography, Wyatt Earp, Frontier Marshal, appeared in 1931 and supplied bushels of inaccuracies for later and equally credulous or careless writers.

In 1963, after lengthy research, Ed Bartholomew published Wyatt Earp: The Untold Story, in which he tried to untangle Wyatt's tall tales from the documented record. Thomas Teakle, the Spokane high school history teacher whose special collection of range life books came to the Society after his death in 1969, bought a copy of this fairly obscure work. Not many others did, and the library continues to receive inquiries, usually from a distant place by mail, about Morgan Earp's adventures in Butte.

But now we can simply respond with photocopies of Bartholomew's explanation, from the book that came to us through Thomas Teakle's serious collecting.

Haynes Work Begins

Mary C. Fleenor speaks with both excitement and concern in describing her coming two years work as photo technician conserving the Haynes Photographic Collection. She has been hired under a grant from the National Historic Publications and Records Commission.

Fleenor, with an American history degree from Eastern Washington University and experience in reproducing antique photos, brings a good combination of technical expertise and historical interest to the project.

Photo archivist Lory Morrow is project director administering the grant. Archival technician Diana Wilkison will, along with other regular duties, file Haynes prints, clean and resleeve negatives, and lend a hand in some darkroom work.

First in the collection to receive treatment are the 9,000 glass plate negatives made by F. Jay Haynes. They'll be carefully cleaned, and then archival prints and negatives created in a two-step process. These new prints and negatives will be specially toned for permanency.

Some of Haynes' glass plates are as large as 20×24 inches. Fleenor mentions that "the very high technical ability of F. Jay Haynes is apparent in the current quality of these plates." She explains that, because his work preceded important chemical and technical innovations, even the minerals in water at various sites would have affected the traveling photographer's negatives.

The darkroom in which she'll work has been sealed from dust, and the water will be filtered—luxuries F. Jay Haynes didn't have in developing negatives in his train car or tent studios. Even the type of paper for our archival prints has been carefully selected, a paper not coated with plastic which can break down in storage. All processes will be done completely by hand, Fleenor adds, with quality as the main criterion.

Special Members Help the Society

The Summer issue of MONTANA sported a new back page—the listing of special friends of the Society who have become Supporting and Sustaining members. These two new levels of membership, announced by the Board of Trustees in May, are designed for those who want to make additional contributions, beyond annual Regular membership dues, to our work.

Supporting membership, for a contribution of $35 per year, includes a subscription to both MONTANA and the Montana Post, and also entitles the member to a 10 percent discount on items sold by the Society (with the exception of original or limited edition art objects).

Sustaining membership is obtained with an annual contribution of $250. These members receive five copies of MONTANA each quarter, invitations to special art shows, a 15 percent discount on purchases here (excluding original art or limited editions), and a plaque commemorating their support.

We look forward to adding many names to the listing in MONTANA, as more of our members join in the new program.

Preservation Workshops Fill Summer

Four districts in Livingston have been nominated to the National Register of Historic Places as a result of the recently-completed survey done under grants from the Montana State Historic Preservation Office, the Department of Community Affairs, and the city of Livingston.

While State Historian Edrie Vinson and her office await the federal decision on acceptance of these districts to the Register, they are proceeding with a full summer schedule of workshops around Montana.

Local groups and the Society are cosponsoring a series of workshops open to the public, in which both concepts and how-to's of historic preservation are explained.

Custer County Arts Center cosponsors the July 27-28 session at Miles City; Fort Missoula Museum Association will cosponsor the August 10-11 meeting in Missoula; and the Red Lodge Chamber of Commerce cosponsors the September 5 workshop at Red Lodge.

Earlier sessions, held in June, had Paris Gibson as cosponsor in Great Falls; and Landmarks, Inc., Historic District Committee, in Billings.

City officials around Montana are being invited to a workshop in Billings, August 22-24, which will cover the role of historic preservation in Housing and Urban Development programs. Sponsored by the Montana Historic Preservation Office, the session will be given by the President's Advisory Council for Historic Preservation. Interested officials can contact Ms. Vinson at the Society, for more information.

The Historic Preservation Office also reports three recent Montana listings on the National Register of Historic Places: the Ravalli County Courthouse in Hamilton, and the William A. Coleman residence and William K. Kohrs Free Memorial Library, both in Deer Lodge.

The Montana Oral History Association—the organization that emerged from the series of oral history workshops held across the state this spring—will hold a general organizational meeting at the Montana History Conference, October 13, in Helena. Anyone interested in getting involved at the beginning should attend, those who can't make the Conference should watch this space for more information on the Association's progress.

Remember that "rare" book our librarian, Bob Clark, found in the stacks of the Historical Society Library—the one entitled "Recollections of Old Milestown" by Samuel Gordon? Well, it seems that it isn't as rare as the bookdealer in Texas thought it was. He had put a $950 price tag on the book. Pat Gudmundson, who writes a column for the Miles City Star, picked up on our story and found out quickly from her readers how many copies of Gordon's book there are in Miles City alone; a half dozen people have the book in town and the Miles City library has three copies on its shelves.

Bob Clark also got calls on the book, after we publicized it in the Post. Someone in White Sulphur Springs has a copy, and so does another reader over near Deer Lodge. So, I expect we have just about shot the market for that bookdealer's "rare" $950 volume. Of course, the book is still a rare book, but the Texan's price is probably a bit too high.

The Butte Historical Society needs some help. In the midst of hosting an historic preservation team from Washington, D.C. this summer, the Butte people are also trying desperately to finish an oral history project. What they need, of course, is financial support. Society members estimate that $1,000 to $1,500 will finish the project. Anyone who might be able to help should contact: Al Hooper, Butte Historical Society, Box 3913, Butte, Montana 59701.

The State Historic Preservation Office, here in the Society, is accepting nominations for Montana's first historic preservation award. The award will be presented at the Montana History Conference, October 11-13, in Helena. Nominations will be considered for projects involving the restoration, rehabilitation or stabilization of historic properties. Nominations forms are available from the Montana Historical Society or from local historical societies.

We came across this item from the Billings Gazette, June 30, 1927. Horace M. Albright, Superintendent of Yellowstone Park, received letters daily requesting information on the Park and all of the sights to be seen. This letter, from a young girl, was reprinted in the Gazette:

"Dear Sir—Please sent me a copy of the Yellowstone Park Motorist Guide. My family, which includes my Doctor Daddy, my Mother Dear, my wild brother and myself plan to visit your wonderful park this summer. So of course we have to learn where the biggest bears are, so that my brother can wrestle with them, and especially where the hottest soapy springs are, so we can get my brother clean for once, especially after he finishes the bears. With much appreciation of your kindness, I am your little friend, Virginia Mills."

Fred Whiteside (1857-1935), drummed out of the legislature on false claims when he alone spoke against William Clark's attempt to bribe his way into the U.S. Senate, is at last honored in the Montana Capitol. The bas relief bronze plaque (above) also cites Whiteside's 1897 exposure of the capitol construction profiteering scandal. Appropriately, only private donations went into the project, which was overseen by a citizens' committee with assistance from Montana Arts Council. Another new sign (below) graces our own building, carved and placed by our museum staff.

NHPRC funds Haynes project

The National Historic Publications and Records Commission (NHPRC) has just awarded a $38,438 grant to the Society's archives department for the conservation and care of the enormous Haynes Photographic Collection. Donated to the Society by Isabel Haynes of Bozeman, this collection of photographs, glass plate negatives and nitrate negatives is one of the most important additions to the Society's holdings ever received. The grant, which will fund technical conservation and preservation work on the Haynes photos, is the largest grant received by the Society to date. It also comes at a most opportune time, for it is only in the last two years that the archives department has been able to add enough professional staff to process such a collection.

"Without this grant," State Archivist Brian Cockhill commented, "there is no way we could have adequately handled a collection as important and large as this one." Cockhill, who wrote the original grant proposal, observed that special project funds have been almost impossible to get through general legislative appropriations. "Frankly," Cockhill continued, "we just had to get some outside support."

Lory Morrow, photographic archivist, will be the project director administering the NHPRC grant. The task facing her is substantial. The heart of the collection is the approximately 9,000 glass plate negatives taken by F. Jay Haynes (1853-1921) throughout the American West from 1872 until his retirement in 1916. Also included in the 23,000-photograph collection is the life work of Jack Ellis Haynes (1884-1962) son of F. Jay Haynes.

Those familiar with the photographic history of the West will recognize that F. Jay Haynes ranks with other great photographers of the American West: Layton A. Huffman, William H. Jackson, Stanley J. Morrow, and David F. Barry. What makes F. Jay Haynes' photos even more important, however, is the range of subjects he photographed and the span of years he documented with his camera.

Born in Saline, Michigan, in 1853, Haynes took up the new art of photography in his early 20s, locating a studio in Moorhead, Minnesota, in the mid-1870s. By 1877, however, he had decided to move further west, first to Fort Abraham Lincoln, then to Deadwood, South Dakota, and up the Missouri River to Fort Benton. At the age of 30, Haynes became the Northern Pacific Railroad's official photographer. He traveled the road in a special "Palace Studio" car, photographing railroad construction crews, agricultural and town scenes, military posts, Indian families, and dozens of other subjects.

In 1884 Haynes also received appointment as the official photographer for Yellowstone National Park, a connection he maintained until his retirement and then handed down to his son. The Haynes family enterprises maintained a photo shop in the Park until 1943 when they moved the business to Bozeman, Montana. The result is a 70-year documentation of changes in the Park and the full spectrum of its visitors.

F. Jay Haynes did not spend all of his creative energies on Montana and Dakota subjects. In 1890-1891 he traveled to Alaska to photograph that territory's expansive scenery and frontier life. Other photographic journeys took him through Wisconsin and Michigan, down the Columbia River Gorge to Portland, up the Pacific Coast to Seattle, and throughout the interior of Oregon, Washington and Idaho.

HAYNES COLLECTION

State Archivist Brian Cockhill and photo archivist Lory Morrow inspect one of the glass plate negatives in the Haynes Collection.

"It isn't just the historic documentation these photographs provide that makes them so important," Ms. Morrow commented. "F. Jay Haynes' work was artistic—each photo is an artistic expression—and as such it constitutes a significant chapter in the history of western photographers."

The NHPRC grant has a two-year life. In those two years, archivist Morrow, along with a photographic technician, and archival technician Ron Brey will clean the glass plate negatives, separate the chemically-unstable nitrate negatives, and make copy negatives of the entire collection. With the copy negatives made, Morrow explained, file prints will be made for use by researchers and the public.

"It is essential that we make these copy negatives," Morrow continued, "for the glass plates are fragile and they should not be used to make prints again and again. The nitrate negatives, of course, can deteriorate very rapidly."

In order to accomplish this enormous task, Mike McCourt and the museum staff have already been called upon to create some special equipment. Because the only known manufacturer of archival print washers no longer makes them, McCourt and his staff built a washer which will allow archivists to wash individually up to 15 prints at a time. For the best results, file prints must be printed on the highest quality paper and under the best possible conditions. The museum staff has also constructed specially-designed print dryers.

The glass plates will be stored in acid-free buffered envelopes, designed to reduce any chemical deterioration on the face of the glass plates; they are buffered to counteract any acid particulates which may be in the atmosphere. The jacketed plates can then be housed in the original wooden cases used by the Haynes family. The great care Isabel Haynes has devoted to this collection over the years accounts for their superb condition today.

"We plan to begin work in July," Lory Morrow commented, "first with the earliest glass plate negatives and then chronologically through the whole collection." The archives staff hopes to have some portions of the collection ready for use by researchers and the public in the late fall of this year.

The Society feels fortunate to have received the NHPRC grant, for the competition for grant monies is stiff. This is the first NHPRC grant to be awarded to a Montana institution. But the Society is even more fortunate in obtaining the collection in the first place. In addition to increasing the holdings of our photographic archives by more than one third, the donation of the Haynes Photographic Collection establishes the Montana Historical Society as a new center for the study of frontier photography. We hope that Isabel Haynes' example will inspire others to donate significant collections.

Holter collection now ready for use

Anton Holter came to Montana Territory at the beginning and proceeded from sawmill operator to hardware store owner to diversified frontier entrepreneur.

His papers, given to the Society Archives by grandson Norman J. (Jeff) Holter, add significantly to our research materials on Montana's territorial period, according to archivist Sue Jackson. The 82.5 linear-foot collection, which took seven months to process, is now available to researchers.

The Holter papers cover three generations of family business people, from 1861 through 1968, and cover investments in utilities, timber, cattle, mining, real estate, and medical research—as well as the keystone Holter Hardware Company.

The Holter Hardware section alone, Ms. Jackson says, is "one of our best collections on a mercantile company because the records are so complete, up to the 1950s when the company went out of business."

In 1863, Anton M. Holter and his brother arrived in Virginia City, where they operated the territory's first sawmill. Soon they were selling lumber to the new camp on Last Chance Gulch, and in 1867 Anton opened his hardware store there.

By 1886 he had built the three-story Holter Block near the center of town. The company's inch-thick illustrated catalog offered engines and boilers, wire rope and cordage, mining and railway supplies along with general hardware. Holter Hardware used this building until going out of business in 1958.

From 1920 to 1924, A.M. Holter Hardware of Helena maintained a branch in Spokane, but the Holter name didn't appear on all stores where Holter invested, such as in Boulder and Norris, Montana, and in Idaho.

Archival technician Frank Marron, volunteer Joan Bishop, and archivist Sue Jackson display some of the varied materials in the Holter Collection which includes Holter Hardware's 1898 catalog.

Reversing the pattern of outside capitalists who invested in Montana, Holter maintained many investments elsewhere, among them timber interests in Oregon, mining investments through various companies in Idaho, Washington, and Mexico as well as Montana, and real estate purchases largely in California.

As his four sons reached maturity, they joined Anton's business ventures, which came to include a securities company and a real estate company established to watch over Holter family interests.

Other family ventures covered in the collection include Montana Flour Mill Company, N Bar Ranch, and interest in the Blackfoot Cattle Company.

Anton Holter often shared investments with his friend and contemporary Samuel T. Hauser, whose papers are also housed in the Society archives. The two business giants, incidentally, had known each other in Missouri before emigating to Montana in the 1860s.

Ms. Jackson anticipates that the interlocking nature of the Holter and Hauser collections will magnify the significance of each for researchers.

Chronologically, the collection ends with a contemporary subject: the heart pacemaker research of collection donor and former nuclear scientist Jeff Holter at the Helena lab of his Holter Research Foundation.

NORTHWEST NWR RENDEZVOUS GROUP

The 1979 Western Rendezvous of Art will be held on August 24 through 26, according to the Helena Arts Council and the Montana Historical Society, who will be aided this year by the newly-formed Northwest Rendezvous Group of professional artists.

The Group, comprising 23 founding members from nine states and two Canadian provinces, will present its first exhibition in the Poindexter Gallery here during the Rendezvous.

Among the founders of the Northwest Group are Frank McCarthy, Bob Morgan, Tucker Smith, Gary Carter, Joe Bohler, Jack Hines, Jessica Zemsky, Paul Calle, Gary Schildt and Newman Myrah.

Ten guest artists will be invited to participate in the show, along with Group members. The exhibit will remain on display through September 30, according to curator Mike McCourt.

Among Western Rendezvous of Art activities planned are a Rendezvous of Mountain Men in fur trade era style, a "quick-draw" session, luncheon and banquet events, and public sale of works on display.

One new award this year will be the commemorative print award, given by a nationally-known printmaker—with royalties to the artist.

A share of the profits from general art sales and activities will be given to the Historical Society.

Schedule and special events information is available from the Helena Arts Council, Box 1231, Helena, MT 59601.

Pride in High Line History shows

In Hill County

Plains Indian culture, Montana's homesteading years, coal mining, the frontier military, and the High Line's close ties with Canada—all these come together in exhibits of the H. Earl Clack Museum in Havre.

Curator Toni Hagener, also Montana Historical Society Board president, is currently preparing for the summer visitor season that extends from Memorial Day to Labor Day, when the museum is open from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

The Clack Museum is a monument to Havre and Hill County community pride and cooperation. The family of the late H. Earl Clack, regional oil distributor, donated money for the modern building. The county commissioners granted space on the fairgrounds for it and have tendered financial support. County residents contributed through donated labor—and continue to do so.

Nearby is the Wapka Chu'gn buffalo kill, a National Historic Site, through which Clack Museum staff guide visitors. Digs by the Milk River Archaeological Society have revealed its use from about 2,000 years ago to about 300 years ago (never with the horse).

Native Americans who used this site combined the pishkun (buffalo jump) and the surround techniques, and processed the meat on the spot. The plants used in pemmican still grow there, as when the buffalo users camped to make meat. Visitors can step inside actual excavations, one each at the kill, processing, and camping spots.

Havre's own

Al Lucke of Havre has been collecting photographs about as long as he can remember and now estimates that he has several thousand. People around the area now bring him photos for identification and preservation, as well as continuing to borrow them for various local history projects.

Except for college in Missoula and in Wisconsin, Al has lived in Havre ever since he was born there in 1905. He's watched the town grow over the years, and his only concern was that it not grow too big too fast.

Readers of MONTANA have often seen his name beside photographs generously lent from his collection—most recently on a history of Fort Assinniboine. Al probably has the best pictorial history of the fort's thirty-two years, possibly based on personal interest. His grandparents arrived there in 1887.

We think that his photo collecting and sharing make Al Lucke rank as one of Hill County's historical resources.

Exhibits in the Clack Museum proper tell the Havre area's story from prehistoric times up through the days of nearby Fort Assinniboine, early 20th century coal mining and homesteading. A recurring theme is the common heritage of U.S. and Canadian wheatland frontiers.

Many fine dioramas by sculptor Bob Scriver and others complement the interpretive displays. Reconstructions also vividly display local history, including a homestead-era blacksmith shop located inside the museum—complete from steam-driven equipment to wall signs.

Outside stands a homestead house, moved to the site from along the High Line and authentically furnished. It features the small post office unit that so often served isolated rural homes, as well as the luxury of an added-on bedroom.

Beside it is the Favor School House, this summer's restoration project for Mrs. Hagener and her staff. Along with, that is, a twice-weekly lecture series that begins July 4, guiding visitors through the museum and buffalo kill site, and tailoring tours to special interests of clubs and school groups.

It all adds up to a labor of love and an excellent portrayal of Hill County history.

HEAR ME MY CHIEFS

in Havre and Glasgow Museums

In Valley County

When members of the Valley County Historical Society opened the doors to their museum in Glasgow, Montana, in June of 1972, a sign at the entrance declared: "We are just starting to put this outfit together.... See it now in colt size, then watch it grow."

The Valley County Pioneer Museum grew in size and sophistication over the years, and last year they added a new dimension—one that is certain to entertain and educate visitors.

The Stan Kalinski Wildlife and Historic Bar Exhibit is dedicated to the late Stan Kalinski, a Glasgow bar owner and community supporter, who collected mounted animals, animal horns, an antique backbar from Buffalo Bill's Bar in Cody, Wyoming, and many other antiques. In a new 30-foot by 70-foot room, built especially to house the million-dollar Kalinski Collection, visitors can view hundreds of mounted animals, including the head of an albino deer.

Beginning in the 1930s when Kalinski acquired his first mounted animal, the walls of his bar became more and more crowded with animal heads, skins and horns. "I put it [the collection] in my will," Stan said at the museum dedication last year, "but then I thought why not donate it to them [Pioneer Museum] while I'm still living, then I can go over and see how they look."

Visitors to the Valley County Pioneer Museum can see more and learn about other things than Stan Kalinski's unique collection. The museum features exceptionally well-designed exhibits, dioramas and artifact displays. Beginning with the history of the area's first inhabitants and early explorers and settlers, including Lewis and Clark, museum exhibits document the major developments in Valley County's history.

The site of Old Fort Peck, one of the important fur posts established on the Upper Missouri River in the 1860s, is depicted in a museum diorama. Other exhibits bring to life a bygone era of homestead life, general stores and blacksmith's shops, steam railroad travel, and the life on early-day cattle and sheep ranches.

Dominating one area of the museum is Assiniboine Chief Wetsit's impressive tipi, constructed from 23 elk hides and decorated in a stunning and graphic manner. The history and culture of the Assiniboine people, so much a part of Valley County's past, is an important portion of the story told in the museum's displays.

And the museum sets you to thinking about both the variety and similarity of experiences Valley County's history includes. There are hunters there: the Assiniboine on a buffalo hunt in one display and the numerous hunters included in Stan Kalinski's fabulous collection. In contrast to the hunters, there are artisans: creative products of Assiniboine art are displayed in the same room housing the intricate woodcarvings of Frank Lafournaise.

The Valley County Pioneer Museum does what good museums should do; it brings back the aura of the past, while it stimulates visitors to think about those unique people and events in our past. In Glasgow, Montana, along the Milk River, this museum—open from Memorial Day to Labor Day—is well worth the visit as you travel along Montana's High Line.

Lewis and Clark enthusiasts from all over the nation and other countries will converge on Glasgow, Montana, this August where the Valley County Lewis and Clark Trail Society will host the Eleventh Annual Meeting of the Lewis and Clark Trail Heritage Foundation. This year's meeting, to be held August 12-15, 1979, will commemorate the 175th anniversary of the Expedition.

There is a full slate of activities planned for the Glasgow meeting, including: field trips to a nearby buffalo jump, to Fort Union, and to Fort Buford; lectures on Lewis and Clark as naturalists, on the cartography of the Expedition; and presentations of traditional Assiniboine tribal ceremonies.

The Lewis and Clark Trail Heritage Foundation, Inc., founded in 1969, is a federation of eleven Trail State organizations all of whom are dedicated to publicizing, protecting, and interpreting the events, personalities and legacies of the greatest adventure in American history—the experience of the "Corps of Discovery." In addition to state Lewis and Clark organizations, there are county and local groups along the Trail route who belong to the Foundation, including the hosts of the Glasgow meeting.

If you are interested in attending this year's annual meeting in Glasgow, please contact: Katherine Rusher, Registration Secretary, Box 965, Glasgow, Montana 59230.

Society honors Arts Advocacy's "Mr. Culture"

Their emblem is a whimsical walrus, inspired by Lewis Carroll's walrus who told the carpenter "the time has come to speak of many things." But the Montana Arts Advocacy has left behind shoes, ships, and sealing wax for the State Library, the Historical Society, Montana Arts Council, and more. The Advocacy has indeed spoken of many things, addressing the legislature in defense of state arts programs large and small.

"We have just begun," says Robert E. Fehlberg, an Advocacy Steering Committee member and also president of the parent body, Montana Institute of the Arts Foundation.

The Advocates intend to see their organization grow over the next two years. Planning toward the next legislative session has already begun—so that, as Fehlberg explains, the group can "determine, as a citizens' group, what is wanted in the arts throughout Montana and . . . encourage a better cultural climate."

Conceived last spring as an activist committee for the 31-year-old MIA, the Arts Advocacy went into high gear in November. An early stroke of genius was to hire J.D. Holmes as its registered lobbyist for the 1979 legislative session.

Holmes had recently retired after 30 years as Associated Press capitol reporter, during which he had covered 16 regular and five special sessions of the Montana legislature. He combined an enthusiasm for arts programs with his legislative savvy and did an outstanding job.

Mr. Culture
Thanks From
All of Us

J.D. Holmes, Director Ken Korte, and Arts Advocacy co-chairperson Joeann Daley.

Francis Bardanouve, before whose appropriations committee Holmes often found himself, had nicknamed the Advocacy lobbyist "Mr. Culture" before the session was over. It's an appellation that well fits the intelligence and grace with which Holmes represented the Advocacy.

On April 24, Society staff members joined Advocates in honoring Holmes at an informal coffee-break party. Magazine editor Bill Lang presented him a lifetime membership in thanks for his efforts on the Society's behalf.

Director Ken Korte announced a contribution of $500 to the Advocacy, voted by Society Trustees at their April meeting.

Whimsical though their walrus mascot may be, the Advocacy combines idealism about the arts with a broad streak of pragmatism. Fehlberg speaks of the arts' "value both economically and spiritually" yet also states that "the Arts Advocacy cannot support 'carte blanche' for all the programs of established arts agencies."

Besides monitoring the activities of legislative interim committees over the next two years, the Advocacy intends to look closely at arts programs' goals and effectiveness. Their evaluations of both sides—arts funding and implementation—will shape presentations to the 1981 legislature.

Right now, the Advocacy counts 450 members—and it needs more. Minimum dues of $5.00 brings members a quarterly newsletter (monthly during legislative sessions) detailing existing and proposed programs around the state. Membership information can be obtained from the Historical Society or directly from Montana Arts Advocacy, P.O. Box 7515, Missoula, MT 59807.

Our new reference librarian

Dave Walter, our new reference librarian, comes to his job as well-equipped as anyone can. Experienced in local, state, and regional history as an author and editor, Dave produced the most comprehensive Montana local history bibliography ever compiled—published in Montana Historian (May 1978).

Happily for our patrons, he enjoys both the "detective" aspects of his new job, and the diversity of information requests received.

A graduate of Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut, he did postgraduate work in history at the University of Montana. He replaces Rex Myers, who now teaches history at Western Montana College.

Walter answers telephoned and written reference questions from Society members and other researchers, including schoolchildren who take their work as seriously as do doctoral candidates. He keeps the library's clipping and vertical files updated, as well as hunting for hard-to-find historical information.

Many requests, he notes, come in letters from people tracking down ancestors who were Montana pioneers. For these and other long-distance requests, the Library often sends photocopies of our holdings.

As summertime researchers plan visits to what Walter describes as "the most historically comprehensive Montana collection—a marvelous collection," he suggests that they let him know their concerns in advance, so that appropriate materials can be gathered and held.

Meanwhile, Walter also finds time for his own varied research interests, such as the current project: a history of transportation in Glacier Park.

"He's Montana's own—the show has to come here," is how curator Mike McCourt describes the late Ace Powell and the retrospective show of his work scheduled to open in the Poindexter Gallery the first week of November.

The show, which includes over 100 works, opened January 26—the first anniversary of Powell's death—at the Gilcrease Museum in Tulsa, Oklahoma.

David De Francesca put the show together, including oils, watercolors, sketches, and sculptures. It presents the versatility of the Montana artist as well as displaying many works owned by friends and family.

The show's catalog is available by mail from the Society now, and will be on sale throughout the show. It includes 20 full-color pages of Powell's paintings, black and white photos of his sculptures, and his drawings reproduced on textured paper. The price is $8.00 plus 50¢ postage. Address orders to the attention of Merchandise Department.

New membership plan announced

The Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society has approved a new membership program. Over the years friends of the Society have asked if they could contribute to the support of Society programs. Until now there has been no formal structure for such contributions and only one type of membership offered by the Society. The new membership plan features three levels of membership: Regular, Supporting and Sustaining.

Regular Membership, beginning with the summer issue (July) of the magazine, will be $12 per year. Members annually will receive four issues of MONTANA The Magazine of Western History and four issues of the Montana Post, the Society's official newsletter. In addition, Regular members will receive membership cards and announcements of special sales offerings from the Society.

Supporting Membership calls for a $35 annual contribution to the Society. Supporting members will receive a yearly subscription to MONTANA and the Montana Post and a 10% discount on all items sold by the Society, with the exception of original or limited edition art objects. Each Supporting member will also receive a special membership card and a listing of his/her name in each issue of the magazine.

Sustaining membership in the Montana Historical Society has been set at $250 annually. For such a generous contribution to the ongoing work of the Society, Sustaining members will receive 5 complimentary copies of MONTANA each quarter and an attractive plaque commemorative of their support, suitable for hanging in office or home. Sustaining members will also be granted a 15% discount on purchases at the Society, invitations to special art shows, lectures and other special Society functions, as well as a prominent listing in each of the magazines.

Current members who are interested in becoming Supporting or Sustaining Members should contact: Director, Montana Historical Society, 225 N. Roberts, Helena, Montana 59601.

Hall named to Board

The newest member of the Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society is Warren P. Hall of Billings. Appointed by Governor Thomas L. Judge to fill the seat held by the late Anthony "Tony" Dalich of Great Falls, Warren Hall has long been interested in Montana history and its preservation.

Mr. Hall, a realtor and mortgage banker, has been active in civic and professional affairs in Billings for over twenty years. He is a member of the Montana Stockgrowers Association, Scottish Rite Masons and Al Bedoo Shrine, and the Mortgage Bankers Association of America. He has also served on numerous national boards of realtors and real estate appraisers.

A resident of Billings since 1955, Warren Hall is married and has two sons.

Society receives Catlins

They were "part of Catlin's varied and unflagging efforts to 'rescue from oblivion' the appearance and customs of the Plains Indians" before changes resulted from white encroachment, librarian Robert Clark says in describing the prints in our recently-acquired Portfolio of North American Indians by George Catlin.

Marguerite Labrot Spence, of Holly Beach Farm, Maryland, has donated the Portfolio in memory of William H. Labrot, to whom this copy was a sixteenth birthday present in 1916—thus making it publicly available in an area where Catlin worked and traveled.

The 25 hand-tinted lithographs in the Portfolio were published in New York in 1845, selected from the several hundred paintings Catlin produced after spending six years traveling the Upper Missouri.

The lithographic prints, along with Catlin's notes, are currently displayed in the exhibit case just outside the library.

Clark states that Catlin created a traveling exhibition of artifacts gathered on his travels. Called "Catlin's Indian Gallery," it toured the eastern U.S. in 1837-38 and went to Europe in 1839.

When public interest waned, Catlin repeatedly attempted to interest Congress in purchasing and preserving the collection, for both its art and its historical record. In Europe, financial catastrophes multiplied, and Catlin almost had to liquidate the collection to satisfy creditors. In the nick of time, American industrialist Joseph Harrison purchased the Gallery. But he stored it in a warehouse where many of the ethnological specimens were ruined, and many paintings were damaged.

Almost the last words Catlin spoke before he died, Clark points out, were, "What will happen to my Gallery?" In 1879, seven years after Catlin's death, Harrison's heirs gave the collection to the Smithsonian.

The Portfolio lithographs, besides their historical and ethnological value, "deserve attention as well-preserved examples of careful 19th-century print work," as well, Clark says. They are, he adds, "a new high spot" in our collections.

Material herein comprises news of the Montana Historical Society and its membership, and articles based on Society holdings. Check your bookshelves to see if by chance you have a slim, 42-page modest looking work called Recollections of Old Milestown by Samuel Gordon, with photographs by L.A. Huffman. If you have it, Librarian Bob Clark tells us, you have a rare and valuable book, one that a Texas bookseller lists as the "rarest of Montana histories." Whether that is true is open to debate, but evidently the book-dealer knows of only two copies extant—one at Yale University and the other at the Newberry Library in Chicago. "I guess we are better off than we thought," comments Clark, "since the Society has two copies—one bound in brown cloth and the other in paper." Nevertheless, it is a rare book, and the going price is $950.

There have been some changes in Montana's Antiquities Act. The new legislation requires state agencies to consider significant archeological, historical, architectural, and cultural properties as well as paleontological remains in their plans and actions. The Historic Preservation Office in the Montana Historical Society will serve as a clearinghouse for information on state and federal regulations affecting historic preservation. Preserving Montana's past forces many difficult decisions, and it is encouraging to see that the legislature has decided to strengthen Montana's antiquities law.

There are plans to form a Montana Oral History Association. Participants at the five regional oral history workshops, hosted throughout Montana in April and May by the Montana Committee for the Humanities, agreed that an oral history association should be formed soon. The planned organization will be loosely structured and will serve as both a coordinating group and a souce of aid and advice for anyone interested in oral history. Those interested in the organization should contact: Rex C. Myers, Department of History, Western Montana College, Dillon, Montana 59725.

A new high school-level textbook in Montana history is due to be published early this summer. Pruett Publishing Company of Boulder, Colorado, expects that the book, Montana: Our Land and People, will fill a genuine need. Authored by William L. Lang and Rex C. Myers, the book covers Montana's past from geologic times to the 1970s, and includes maps by Robert Taylor and an extensive local history bibliography by Dave Walter.

First June Art Fair set

"Society members are especially invited to our June Art Fair," merchandise manager Dot Walther says. "We're hoping to make it an annual, Society-sponsored event."

The first June Art Fair is set for June 23 and 24 at the Lewis and Clark County Fairgrounds, Helena. Painters, sculptors, potters, and jewelers from the region will offer their works for sale. The public will be admitted free of charge.

"It's a fun opportunity for us, as a state agency, to become more involved in the arts," Ms. Walther adds. "We expect works that will appeal to a wide variety of tastes—in an informal, come-as-you-are setting."

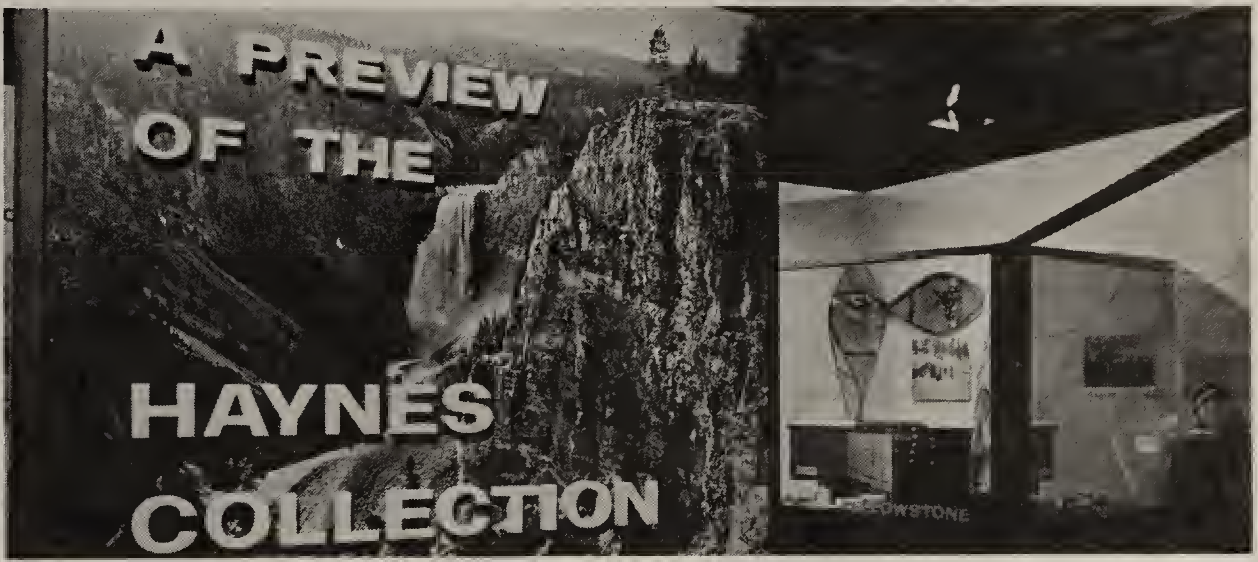
TRACING THE IRON ROAD



A PREVIEW OF THE HAYNES COLLECTION
YELLOWSTONE

Our Open House featured a preview exhibit of the vast Haynes Collection as the focal point for members of the 46th Legislative Assembly who attended our biennial Legislative Open House on February 2. Board of Trustees members, legislators and their families, guests of the Society, and staff members braved the fiftieth-odd day of Helena's sub-zero weather for the evening festivity.

Mrs. Isabel Haynes, donor of the collection that includes photographs taken by her late husband Jack Ellis Haynes and his father, F. Jay Haynes, along with their equipment and historic artifacts and western art collected by the family, also attended the Open House to observe the preview exhibit. Curator Mike McCourt says the exhibit will remain on display through the summer months.

As slides of historic photographs played on the wall above their heads, guests gathered around a refreshment table prepared by our docents, who served from the U.S.S. Helena silver service.

Another new exhibit in place was the Montana Oral History Seed Project listening post, where today's legislators could listen to reminiscences of some of their predecessors. (The Project is described elsewhere in this issue of the Post.)

Throughout the building, our guests could tour areas not usually open to visitors, such as the Archives and Museum Storage. Historic Preservation staffers greeted guests in their newly-occupied office behind Territory Junction—redecorated by their own hands with a touch of last-minute bustle.

The Library displayed its recently-acquired Portfolio of North American Indians, a first American edition of George Catlin's 1845 collection of colored lithographs. The treasure is a gift of Marguerite Labrot Spence of Holly Beach Farm, Maryland. The twenty-five lithos are from the sketches and oils Catlin did along the Upper Missouri from 1830 through 1836. Priced under $40 when published, the portfolio is now valued at about $30,000.

Between Friends/Entre amis attracted guests to the Poindexter Gallery. This traveling photo exhibit, a portion of the Canadian people's bicentennial gift to the American people, colorfully presents scenes of the life and the land on both sides of our mutual border.

In all, it was an evening for sharing our newest and our best, the culmination of extra work by staffers and docents.

C.M. RUSSELL AUCTION

Annual event scheduled for March 15-17

Unveiling and dedication of Bob Scriver's heroic-size bronze statue of Charles M. Russell will be a highlight of this year's eleventh annual C.M. Russell Auction in Great Falls, March 15-17. For the Browning sculptor, the ceremony (2 p.m., March 17, at the Russell Museum) will realize a 23-year dream.

Dorothy and Bill Harmsen of Denver, nationally-recognized collectors of western art, will serve as 1979 Honorary Co-chairmen for the three-day art festival.

This year's Honored Guest is John Mantley, the Hollywood producer of "How the West Was Won," "Gunsmoke," and many other westerns.

With a gay nineties theme, this year's auction features two nights of auctions conducted by Jack Raty, offering works by contemporary western artists. "Quick Draw" auctions are also scheduled for each evening.

Further events at the Heritage Inn range from seminars to a wine-tasting party, all arranged through the year-round efforts of thirty-one committees headed up by Great Falls broadcaster Norma Ashby.

Additional information is available from the Great Falls Advertising Federation, P.O. Box 619, Great Falls, MT 59403.

MAGAZINE OF WESTERN HISTORY

Sharion Stark joins the publications staff as MONTANA Magazine circulation manager, bringing an enthusiasm for Montana history that led her to move here from Utah.

Sharion's special duty is handling our new circulation system, one both more complex and more efficient. Her friendly voice on the phone will greet subscribers who have gifts to give or their own renewals to make. "I'm hoping our members will call me," Sharion says, "any time they have questions about their MONTANA subscriptions."

Prior to joining us, Sharion was a volunteer transcriber for the Montana Oral History Project (a labor of love she continues), and an employee of the Fish and Game Department's Parks Division.

Her special interest in the mining era has led to frequent visits to Bannack, where, she says, "I can just feel the presence of the people who built the town." She looks forward to writing projects on early town development at Bannack and elsewhere.

Along with daughters Shelley and Shari, she explores historic sites around the state, and keeps busy during winter weather with ceramics, painting, and drawing.

Giegerich photos donated to Society

Logging and flume operations in the Anaconda area during the early 1880s are depicted in seven photographs recently acquired by the Society Archives.

They are the gift of Miss Elizabeth Giegerich, who now resides in Kaslo, British Columbia. Her father, H. Giegerrich, and his associates produced the 11"×14" photographs. Miss Giegerich, born in Anaconda in 1890, has provided descriptive notes for each photo.

Extensive logging was required in the 1880s to provide timbers for the Butte mines and fuel for Anaconda smelting operations, requiring construction of the miles-long flume to transport cut timber. These photos document the monumental engineering achievement this flume was.

The collection includes photos of vast clear-cut areas, illustrating how extensive logging was in the flume's vicinity. An example of the quantity of wood being cut appears in a photo of 50,000 cords of wood stacked at the edge of a huge cut-over area.

Two photos show the dump area at the flume's lower end, about four miles from Anaconda. The completed dump, a huge pile of timber, measured fifteen feet high and over a half-mile long.

Also preserved in pictures are the store building and cabins which probably served as headquarters for the logging operation. Men, women, children, dogs, horses, and mules all posed in front of the high-roofed store building that boasted a boardwalk. Stumps in the year attest to clear-cutting in that immediate area.

Archivist Sue Jackson states that "we are indeed grateful to Miss Giegerich and her nephew, H.M. Giegerich, who assisted his aunt, for making this valuable donation."

She adds that these photos and other such gifts answer a two-fold need: preservation of valuable historical materials, and making them available for use by researchers of Montana history.

Anthony "Tony" Dalich

Montana athletes and history buffs alike shared the sense of loss when Tony Dalich of Great Falls died late in December. Mr. Dalich had served on our Board of Trustees since 1976, while initiating local history projects in his native city and writing about Montana and national sports history.

From high school days, he was a lifelong participant in various sports, including 51 years of refereeing basketball, football, boxing, track and wrestling competitions. He was partner in a sports supply company, the state's first baseball commissioner, and inter-mountain region scout for the Brooklyn Dodgers and St. Louis Browns.

Readers of MONTANA recall the 1965 article in which Tony Dalich detailed the colorful saga of Shelby's 1923 Dempsey-Gibbons prizefight. He contributed articles to other national publications, including Sports Illustrated.

Natives and Pilgrims alike welcomed the Great Falls bus tours he initiated in 1976. Mr. Dalich himself, a great storyteller, was the tour conductor, offering lesser-known details about homes and public buildings along the routes.

Born in Great Falls in 1908, he was graduated from Montana College of Mineral Science and Technology. In 1934 he married Mildred Conrad of Kalispell, who survives along with a daughter and a son.

Oral History Seed Project

The Montana Oral History Seed Project neared completion in January with over thirty hours of taped interviews transcribed on 600 typed pages, according to coordinators Jeff Safford, history professor at MSU, and editor Bill Lang.

Nine former legislators and one lobbyist recorded their reminiscences in project interviews, discussing the politics of reapportionment, executive reorganization, the making and effects of the new state constitution, among other issues of the last three decades.

Subject to the editorial directions of the participants, the interviews will be available for scholarly use at the Society, after indexing and binding are completed, within the year.

Interviewees include Dorothy Bradley, Jack Brenner, Bill Christiansen, Bill Groff, Clyde Hawks, Bill Mackay, Neil Lynch, E.E. "Boo" MacGilvra, Antoinette Fraser Rosell, and Ted Schwinden.

The legislative oral history project, Dr. Safford adds, "aims eventually to see to the recording of prominent legislators and/or administrators following each biennial session. But we have to find funding if that is to be a reality."

The Montana Committee for the Humanities funded the seed project. Hopefully, the legislative project will be only the beginning of recording Montana's oral history. Safford and Lang list equally important fields that include homesteading, hard rock mining, ranching and farming, the lumber industry, and veterans' experiences.

Museum cataloger attends workshop

Early in December, museum cataloger Glenda Bradshaw spent a week at the National Park Service's Mather Training Center in Harper's Ferry, West Virginia. She was among eight non-park service personnel invited to attend a curatorial in-service training course.

Instructors, who included Tom Vaughn of the Grant-Kohrs ranch, covered the registration and cataloging of artifacts, along with special handling techniques. A highlight was the group's tour of Park Service lab facilities, which are specialized to handle items from paper to furniture.

Especially valuable, Glenda reports, was meeting people in the field and learning from their unique solutions to problems.

COPPER DOME

An Informal & Incomplete History at Our 90th Year

Third Try Works

Montana's first state constitution, ratified by voters on October 1, 1889, as a final step toward statehood, was actually its third one.

Although the Territory's population didn't come close to statehood population requirements in 1866, Acting Governor Meagher called a constitutional convention anyway. He apparently shared the hopes of Montana Democrats, that the U.S. Congress would overlook population numbers for us as it recently had for Nevada.

Neither the six-day convention's records nor the constitution itself survives, but the document was said to be modeled on those of New York and California. According to legend, the constitution was lost by delegate Thomas Tutt of Edgerton (now Lewis and Clark) County on his way to a St. Louis printer. That makes a good story, but Michael P. Malone and Richard B. Roeder, in Montana: A History of Two Centuries, say that the missing document probably burned in a fire that destroyed records of convention secretary H.N. Maguire years later.

Population was not the problem in 1884 when Montana sought statehood and failed again. That time, national politics and the partisan balance in each of several western territories seeking statehood held up Montana.

This constitution survived and received state voters' approval by a fifteen to four margin. A nonpartisan, elected assemblage that copper king William A. Clark chaired had written the constitution in less than a month of deliberations.

For five years compromises were sought over admittance of several new states, until President Cleveland signed the bill enabling Montana, along with Washington and the Dakotas, to enter the union.

The third constitutional convention opened on the Fourth of July, 1889, again chaired by Clark. Seventy-five delegates, elected along partisan lines this time, used the 1884 Constitution as basis for the new document. The most divisive issue was state senate representation, with the rural ranching counties demanding one senator for each and every county, and the populous mining counties wanting senators, like representatives, apportioned according to population.

Rather than further delaying statehood over this issue, the big counties at last gave in. Because permanent location of the capital promised to be an emotional issue, delegates delayed that problem by making it a ballot question for a future election.

It took them longer in 1889 to write a constitution—more than six weeks—but the document lasted 83 years, until 1972.

Money, Stone and Politics

You could say that it took eleven years to build Montana's capitol, although only six of them were actual construction. You could also say that the dignified Greek Ionic structure had a colorful (putting it mildly) or even a troubled (to be more accurate) birth. You could say that some things haven't changed in the eighty-odd years since it all began: graft, dramatic cost rises, the clash of budget restrictions versus state pride, officials fired and replaced, a completion date moving ever forward.

When the project got under way in 1895 (the year after Helena was chosen as capital), the plan covered a structure of brick or stone, using Montana materials, costing no more than $300,000 and completed by January 1, 1900. Over 100 architects' plans were submitted to the Capitol Building Commission that the Fourth Assembly had established. Cass Gilbert came in second to C.E. Bell and J.H. Kent, possibly because he wouldn't pony up $20,000 to buy the privilege of being selected.

for the First Territorial Assembly was $4.00. Mileage was reimbursed at $4.00 for each 20 miles to and from Bannack. Funds came from the federal treasury.

Within two years, that first Capitol Commission was out and its replacement appointed. The foundation wouldn't be begun for another year, but a grand jury agreed with Fifth Assembly Rep. Fred Whiteside's charges that the first Commission had conspired to substitute inferior materials and alter the plans—pocketing the dollars saved. Only one member, Sen. William K. Floweree, was completely exonerated.

After John C. Paulsen, the former state architect who had first informed Whiteside of the graft, died suddenly during the grand jury investigation, rumors circulated that his death was faked and he'd been seen alive and well in Denver and other Western cities. A delegation was duly sent to view his disinterred remains.

Early in 1898, a bond issue for funding—backed by a Federal land grant at statehood, earmarked for capitol monies—attracted no buyers. It was too risky to invest in this now-clouded venture. Tommy Cruse came to the state's rescue, buying the entire issue at par.

was the first native-born governor (1937-41), born in 1882 on a central Montana ranch.

In September that year, the foundation was at last begun, and a celebration the following Fourth of July marked the cornerstone laying.

Sandstone from Columbus, Montana, was the chosen building material, but the large order had called for opening a new quarry and capitol construction continued past its 1900 deadline. The Seventh Assembly convened and adjourned in 1901 while builders worked on.

That Assembly significantly contributed to the capitol's meaning for Montanans when it appropriated funds for the interior. Against the fashion of the day, legislators specified that all paintings should be "historical and commemorative rather than symbolical or allegorical," portraying "pioneers of Montana" rather than mythological figures. Certainly their "practical" intention of recording our history has enriched the building.

The Cincinnati firm of F. Pedretti's Sons contracted to do interior decoration. Charles Pedretti painted the murals in the dome and the Senate chamber, and supervised the House mural painting, devoting four months to the job. (That Senate chamber is now the Supreme Court; the House chamber then is the current Senate.) In the dome, the apparent relief carving of the dividing ribs resulted from his brush artistry on flat strips of wood.

At last, in 1902, the capitol was completed, two years late and 50% over budget. Fourth of July dedication ceremonies featured a flowery oration by (at last) U.S. Sen. William A. Clark.

But, in only seven years, the building was outgrown and the Eleventh Assembly provided a half-million dollars for two wings and installation of steam heat. This time, however, the potential problems of a Building Commission would be avoided; the State Board of Examiners, headed by the governor, would direct.

Then came the great stone controversy. Although the main building used native stone, the Examiners recommended use of Bedford limestone from Indiana for the new wings. It would be cheaper and need less maintenance than Columbus sandstone. Governor Edwin Norris called the Eleventh Assembly into special session between Christmas and New Year's, 1909. There was other business for the four-day session, but newspaper reports indicate that most of the time was spent discussing stone.

The Columbus quarry and a Great Falls quarry lobbied for Montana stone, pointing to the original goal of using native materials. But the Fourth Assembly had not required the use of Montana materials if the price were too high. Because their stone did cost more, the Montana quarrymen suggested that "some of the fancy features" of the wings be eliminated.

Acting Governor Meagher, according to legend, carried the official Territorial records in one pocket when the capital moved from Bannack to Virginia City.

If native, higher-cost, stone were to be used, enabling legislation was needed for the additional funds. Voting deadlocked along party lines, with the Democrat house supporting native stone and the Republican Senate against it. Democrat Rep. John MacGinnis proposed that Montana granite be chosen—instead of Columbus sandstone—for its durability.

On that deadlocked second day, House wits suggested that since every other kind of stone had been inspected and discussed, Rep. Neil O'Donnell "tell about the effectiveness of the Blarney stone." It was thought wiser not to approach O'Donnell, though, who was in a bad temper over another legislative squabble.

The "acting one" for territorial governor didn't apply only to Thomas Meagher. There were five other acting governors during the territorial period.

After the House passed a $100,000 bond issue for native stone, Gov. Norris, in a special message to the Senate, announced that he was not opposed to Montana granite. Senate Republican leader Edward Donlan, and the "Donlan Ring" who had fought added cost, about-faced and went to work drumming up support for the extra funds.

On the day before New Year's, showing more generosity than originally requested, the Assembly agreed to a $150,000 bond issue, thus making a total of $650,000 available for the wings—almost 50% more than the actual cost of the main building. Around 7 p.m. on New Year's Eve, Gov. Norris signed the enabling bill. The special session had already adjourned and headed home.

Kentucky, Ohio, and New York each supplied two Territorial governors to Montana, and Massachusetts one. The remaining governor, Samuel Hauser, was almost a native, having come out in the 1860's from Missouri (but he was also born in Kentucky).

The wings, of granite from Kain Brothers quarry, Clancy, went up during 1910 and 1911. Inside were Vermont marble, furnishings and decorations by "the Hennessey Co. of Butte," paintings commissioned from Russell, Paxson, and DeCamp. Late in 1912, the wings were occupied, with the Thirteenth Assembly being the first to meet in the completed building.

The current Senate chamber was the House's when the Capitol's main section opened in 1902, and the current Supreme Court was the Senate.

If the main building is Columbus sandstone, and the wings Clancy granite, how do they match so perfectly? That's a benefit of the New Deal: in 1933, a Civil Works Administration project faced the main section with Montana granite.

All Because of 174 Votes

At noon on Saturday, November 23, 1889, great cheers saluted the call to order for Montana's first state legislature—for both of them, that is, at two different Helena locations.

After 24 years of waiting for statehood, that first state session made up for lost time in uniqueness, as two opposing rump sessions met for the full 90 days, and sent two opposing pairs of U.S. Senators to Washington.

This bizarre debut into statehood hinged on only half a percent of the votes cast the previous October, yet it resulted in Montana's being without state laws for more than its first year, not to mention having a national black eye.

It all started when Precinct 34 in Silver Bow county was created especially for Butte and Gallatin Railroad workers who were digging the Homestake Tunnel. The important October 1 election included ratifying the new state constitution and selecting the very first state officials.

Across the state, the constitution was a sure thing, adopted by a thirteen-to-one margin. When they came to elective offices, Montanans divided those very evenly between Democrats and Republicans. So evenly, in fact, that each party had to be greatly concerned over which would control the legislature.

Whoever controlled the joint session elected Montana's U.S. Senators, a plum neither party would relinquish willingly.

Several things were suspect to the Silver Bow county canvassing board when they looked at Precinct 34's results. One was that, according to the poll book, the 174 voters thoughtfully came forth in alphabetical order!

When they tallied the official results, Silver Bow's canvassers—against threats on their lives, according to board chairman William Jack—rejected Precinct 34's ballots.

That didn't affect acceptance of the constitution or the election of Silver Bow state senator D.J. Hennessey. All but three of those contested ballots were for Democrats, and the tallies for state representative candidates were amazingly close. The Democrats badly wanted those 171 additional votes, and the Republicans badly wanted those votes excluded from the count.

Whether Precinct 34's votes were counted or not would determine not only which party controlled Silver Bow's house delegation, but also who controlled the entire House, and the joint sessions and, therefore, the election of U.S. Senators.

The legal maneuvers began, and partisanship was accentuated. When the smoke began to clear over a month after the election, each side had what it wanted—on paper, at least—and Silver Bow county had not one, but two, "duly elected" sets of state representatives. Neither side was satisfied.

Each party appealed for a higher ruling, using one of two channels: the courts or the territorial canvassing board. On November 5, in the last days of territorial status, that territorial board gave its decision supporting the Silver Bow canvassers who had thrown out the suspicious Precinct 34 votes. The ruling meant the Republicans carried the county House delegation, and the legislature. But it may have been self-serving, for the territorial canvassing board was headed by Republican governor B.F. White.

The other channel for a decision, through the courts, led to Judge Stephen DeWolfe, a Democrat just defeated as candidate for Chief Justice of the Montana Supreme Court. He ruled on November 7 that the county canvassers could only tally votes, not refuse them. He ordered Precinct 34's votes included in the county total. Accordingly, the county clerk now certified the Democrat representatives.

But, the very next day, Republican President Benjamin Harrison declared Montana a state. His son Russell, Helena newspaper publisher and former assay office superintendent, was still en route with the election returns certified by the (Republican) state canvassing board—the final requirement for statehood.

Now the governor was Joseph K. Toole, a Democrat. He promptly called the state legislature to meet in Helena on November 23. The day before the session, he proclaimed that only county certificates of election would admit claimants to the borrowed House chamber in the two-year-old Lewis and Clark county courthouse. Toole's proclamation meant that the Democrats from Precinct 34 would be seated, barring the Republican delegation.

As State Auditor, Republican E.A. Kinney was empowered to call the legislature into session. He now summoned the entire house to meet at the Iron Block, completed two years before on South Main's Street's 400 block (today Helena's sole remainging iron-front building).

At noon on that Saturday, each claiming to be the legitimate representatives of the people of Montana, the House Republicans went into session down on the Gulch, and the House Democrats up on the hill.

The latter met in more comfort, in the hall where their last territorial predecessors had met. The Republicans were welcomed by dirty windows and an empty room hastily furnished with a stove and a borrowed kitchen table. A bouquet of flowers personally delivered by Mrs. Lewis H. Hershfield did something to brighten the surroundings, but nothing for the chill. Within a couple weeks the Republicans moved eight blocks south to the original Granite Block, and presumably more comfortable quarters.

As for the state Senate—it was evenly split along party lines, with eight members from each side. The lieutenant governor, who would vote to break ties, was Republican John E. Rickards. (With a Democrat for a governor, Montanans certainly were even-handed in that election.)

So the Republican senators gathered at the courthouse and the Democrats stayed away, to prevent the Senate's formally organizing and the inevitable tie-breaking vote cast by the Republican lieutenant governor. The Democrats stayed away, even when served with warrants by a temporary sergeant-at-arms. When they finally showed up on the twenty-fourth day, their refusal to vote failed to prevent organization. Senate President Rickards ruled that members present but not voting still counted toward a quorum, and the senate was officially organized.

After that, the Democrats stayed away to prevent any further votes, even when the Senate levied fines and issued arrest warrants. On February 20, the session legally expired.

Meeting separately the whole ninety days, the Republican and Democrat Houses had passed various laws, but there was no Senate to vote upon them. Each body had also, along party lines and in joint session with its own state Senators, chosen two U.S. Senators to go to Washington. Wilbur F. Sanders and Thomas C. Power were the Republicans' choices. The Democrats selected William A. Clark and Martin Maginnis.

All four went nonchalantly to Washington, where a Republican U.S. Senate kept its own and sent Clark and Maginnis home. Having desired statehood in order to take charge of its own government, Montana had started off by letting Washington make one more major decision for it.

The Assembly had to meet again the very next year, for crucial items like appropriations (there had been none) and other necessary state business.

But on February 20, 1890, it must have been with relief that legislators left that first session in Helena. Republicans celebrated their closing day by setting off firecrackers in their Granite Block chambers. At 2:30 the next morning, fire broke out in the building. It did little damage, but provided a fitting end to an explosive "regular" session.

The wind blew, the trains were late and there weren't enough of them, so that the parade was late and not all the out-of-town visitors could get to Helena. It was only appropriate, though, that the dedication of Thomas Meagher's capitol statue had a touch of chaos. His life wasn't exactly a smooth one, after all.

Highlight of the Fourth of July celebration in 1905, the festive rite was to begin with an "entirely military" parade from the Lewis & Clark County courthouse along Sixth Avenue to the capitol.

Tricolored bunting went up along the route, and the flags flew. They really flew, because the day was windy—and the decorations "floated bravely on the mountain winds" rather than holding their graceful drapes.

While the crowd gathered at the capitol and waited—the women wrestling modishly wide-brimmed hats that had become airfoils—parade marshal Gen. C.D. Curtis waited at the courthouse. Where was the National Guard Company B from Butte? Their train was late!

In the crowd were 2,500 out-of-town visitors, the Independent reported, and there would have been more "had not the train facilities been inadequate."

Resigned to inadequate train facilities, Gen. Curtis headed up the parade a half hour late, without Company B. Along with the 24th Regiment from Fort Harrison, the old vets of the GAR and the young vets of the Spanish-American War kept time to the strains of the State Capital Band.

Despite the flapping bunting, all went well with the ceremony, and bugles and guns saluted the suitably fiery statue of Meagher when its veiling of Old Glory fell away.

And Company B? They arrived just in time to help with the gun salutes.

Montana's newest listing on the National Register of Historical Places is the Adams Stone Barn near Sun River, entered in the Register on January 29.

Historic Preservation

MONTANA'S HERITAGE IN USE

Historic preservation has been a part of Montana since the First Territorial Assembly enacted laws to preserve history then in the making, and established the Montana Historical Society. When the National Historic Preservation program began in the late 1960's, Montana enthusiastically joined in.

Today the State Historic Preservation Office, located in the museum building, includes a staff of four headed by Edrie Vinson, State Historian. Patti Bell, State Archeologist, is the Society's former museum cataloger. A former School of Architecture instructor at Montana State University, Kingston Heath is Architectural Historian. The newest staff member is Roger Muzia, Historical Architect, who came from the University of Texas School of Architecture.

This office works hand in hand with private citizens, local governments, and state and federal agencies in projects to preserve our history today.

Historic sites, a visual link to the past, serve as educational vehicles to interpret Montana's history. The first site preserved here was the Custer Battlefield National Monument, dedicated in 1886. The second, the Big Hole Battlefield National Monument, was designated by Executive Order in 1910. Over 353,000 people visit these two sites annually.

The Historic Sites Act, passed by Congress in 1935, underscored the goal of acquiring historic places of national significance for "the inspiration and benefit of the people of the United States." Under the authority of this act, the National Park Service later acquired the Grant-Kohrs Ranch at Deer Lodge. Over 23,000 visitors experienced 19th century ranch life and procedures in this first year of this National Historic Site's operation as a year-round working ranch open to the public.

Often, Ms. Vinson explains, treasures are overlooked by the people who own them—but that's not so in Montana. "The people of our state," she says, "through the Historic Preservation Office, are taking steps to preserve their historic sites and honor them by listing on the National Register of Historic Places."

The Register covers sites of national, state and local significance which meet the stated criteria that:

> The quality of significance in American history, architecture, archeology, and culture is present in districts, sites, buildings, structures, and objects that possess integrity of location, design, setting, materials, workmanship, feeling, and association, and:

A. that are associated with events that have made a significant contribution to the broad patterns or our history; or

B. that are associated with the lives of persons significant in our past; or

C. that embody the distinctive characteristics of a type, period, or method of construction, or that represent a significant and distinguishable entity whose components may lack individual distinction; or

D. that have yielded, or may be likely to yield, information important in prehistory or history.

Bannack's Masonic Hall before restoration work was completed. It is part of the Bannack National Historic Landmark.

Anyone may nominate a site, using forms obtained from the State Historic Preservation Office, 225 North Roberts, Helena, MT 59601. The nominator must also supply two 8″×10″ black and white photos and a U.S.G.S. quadrangle map which has the site location marked.

Once approved by the Governor's Advisory Council on Historic Sites and Antiquities, the nominations are submitted to the Keeper of the Register in Washington, D.C., for consideration.

At this time, Montana has 91 sites on the National Register of Historic Places. The first site initiated by the state (in 1970) was Beaverhead Rock near Dillon. The Shoshonis named the rock for its shape, and the landmark convinced Sacajawea in 1805 that she was guiding Lewis and Clark in the right direction to find her people.

Our most recent listing is the Adams Stone Barn near Sun River, entered on the register January 29, 1979. It is Montana's first state-initiated agricultural site. Mr. Harold Polson, the current owner, will present it to the Sun River Historical Society, which plans to develop an agricultural museum in the structure.

J. O. Adams, who built the barn in 1885, was an inventor of items for farm and home use. Several of his creations are still in the area, and will be interpreted by volunteer Mike Stuckslager as part of the exhibits. Demonstrations of blacksmithing and other lost arts are in the Adams Barn Museum plans.

Right now, the Sun River Historical Society is seeking local support in donated labor and materials, to qualify as a matching share for federal grant funding towards stabilizing and adapting the barn for its new future.

Federal grant funds are administered by the State Historic Preservation Office, out of appropriations by Congress. This year Montana received $545,000 in such funds.

When a site achieves listing on the National Register of Historic Places, it qualifies to receive a grant. To apply, the owner of the site may write to the State Historic Preservation Office describing the type of work proposed on the site. He or she must include a cost breakdown, and listing of the amount and source of owner's funds, along with the amount of grant money sought.

The State Historic Preservation Office evaluates grant applications in light of the year's National Goals and Objectives. Each applicant, to be successful, must meet at least one objective. This year's are:

> To give funding priorities to projects or activities that:
> 1. are matched at greater than 50% by outside funds
> 2. catalyze significant non-federal investment in preserving resources that would not otherwise by preserved
> 3. are located in neighborhoods and/or urban areas
> 4. incorporate techniques of conserving energy

5. that benefit minorities, low-income persons, and handicapped people
6. conserve archeological resources
7. preserve national historic landmarks
8. preserve endangered properties
9. create or utilize nonprofit revolving funds
10. benefit cultural resources, the preservation of which will also contribute to the conservation or enhancement of natural or recreational resources.

Owners of commercial properties may also apply to the State Historic Preservation Office for certification of preservation work on their structures. The Tax Reform Act of 1976 and amendments of 1977 provide tax savings to those who expended funds to preserve historic structures.

The time is now for historic preservation throughout Montana, and citizen participation is the basis for saving and using the past. The State Historic Preservation Office in Helena, now fully staffed, is both channel and advisor for citizen action. All four staff members strongly urge Montanans—both individuals and organizations—to act now, and also to contact the Office for help on any aspect of preservation projects.

¶ from the Editor's File

¶ Oral history in Montana will be getting quite a boost this spring. Plans are now being made for a series of five oral history workshops throughout the state, beginning in mid-April.

The Montana Committee for the Humanities is undertaking the project, one that has been long-desired by many local historical societies. The meetings will be aimed at helping local groups in their oral history projects. Experienced oral historians will conduct the workshops. There will be more information and publicity forthcoming, but anyone interested in the details can also contact: Howard Schwartz, P.O. Box 8036 Hellgate Station, Missoula, Mt. 59807.

¶ Membership dues in the Montana Historical Society will be increased this spring. It has been over four years since the last increase, and printing costs have continued to rise. Because we are committed to producing the finest state historical journal in the nation, we must increase annual dues from the present $10 to $12 and two-year dues from $18 to $22. The per copy price of MONTANA, now at $3, will be $3.50.

The new dues will take effect with the summer (July) issue. Members whose subscriptions expire with the summer issue will receive renewal notices reflecting the new prices in mid-May.

You can renew early and beat the new membership rates. If you renew before your subscription expires, you will not miss an issue of MONTANA and your current yearly expiration date will remain the same.

¶ The Carbon County Historical Society in Red Lodge is just about ready to publish a history of Red Lodge, tentatively titled Red Lodge, Through the Years. Co-editors Shirley Zupan and Harry Owens expect the book to be ready by June 1. Any publishing venture is expensive and risky, so the Carbon County people are encouraging advance sales by offering the book at a pre-publication price of $20. You can order the book from: Carbon County Historical Society, Box 476, Red Lodge, Mt. 59068.

¶ Beginning February 24, the Montana Historical Society's research library in western history will be open each Saturday from 9:00 am to 5:00 pm. University faculty, students, genealogists, researchers, and the general public will benefit greatly from these expanded hours.

According to Librarian Bob Clark, all normal services will be avilable on Saturdays, including use of archival materials, copying services and general reference assistance. "We do not know how many individuals will take advantage of our new Saturday hours," Clark commented, "but we intend to give it a fair trial period before we evaluate the new hours. However, we do have to demonstrate significant use on Saturdays to justify the new policy."

For several years researchers have asked for Saturday hours in the library, but security problems in the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial building and a lack of professional staff prevented opening the library on weekends. "Security is still a problem," Director Ken Korte explained, "and to solve that problem we have decided to close the entire building on Sundays from Labor Day to Memorial Day. During the summer, of course, the museum will be open seven days a week with the library open every day but Sunday."

About Our Mailing Labels . . .

As we get our new circulation system into full swing for MONTANA and for the Montana Post, members will be able to check the expiration date right on the mailing labels, circulation manager Sharion Stark reports.

This will be the case for all future issues of both publications. In the upper right hand corner of the label, a member will find the three-letter abbreviation and the final two digits of the year—for the last issue they will receive. For example, OCT79 signifies the Autumn 1979 issue, mailed to members in mid-October.

As a reminder: MONTANA is mailed from Helena about the 15th of January (Winter issue), April (Spring), July (Summer), and October (Autumn). The Post goes out about the middle of February, May, August, and November.

Sharion adds that the new system sequences our file records by zip codes, so that any correspondence to her about subscriptions should include the member's address. "It would be great," she adds, "if a label could be included, but the mailing address with zip code is what I really need."

Changes of address should include both old and new addresses, so that we can be sure of uninterrupted service.

Our service to members isn't changing, Sharion explains, since the only difference is how we're keeping records here at the Society.

Gift subscriptions—for Christmas and occasions throughout the year—are still available, and will still be announced by an appropriate gift card. Whether the gift is new or a renewal remains an important thing for the donor to tell us, in order to prevent duplications.

BUTTE: HISTORY LIVES!

Montana history is alive and well in Butte! That fact was underscored at the Fifth Annual Montana History Conference which met in the Mining City, October 26-28. The meeting, which was held at the War Bonnet Inn, was a great success. A record number of attendees—well over 375—enjoyed three days of meetings, workshops, films and historic tours. More important is the fact that this was the first time the conference had been held outside Helena. "If anything," conference coordinator Bill Lang remarked, "the location change seems to have encouraged attendance."

The conference was sponsored by the Montana Heritage Foundation, the Council to Preserve Montana History, and the Montana Historical Society under a grant provided by the Montana Committee for the Humanities. The Butte Historical Society and the Tri-County Historical Society from Anaconda were local sponsors, and the long hours their members contributed to the effort made the conference a guaranteed success.

One of the attractions in Butte is the city's older uptown district where historic buildings stand as monuments to the power and importance of Butte in boom years. It was appropriate that the conference activities began in the Knights of Columbus Hall, a solid example of Butte's graceful nineteenth century architecture. At the Knights of Columbus on Thursday evening, October 26, the Butte Historical Society presented a fast-paced, educational slide show, depicting the history of Butte and current interest in preserving Butte's heritage. The Tri-County Historical Society followed with a very informative slide presentation on the history of the famous Washoe smelter in Anaconda.

Regular conference meetings began Friday morning at the War Bonnet Inn. Meeting concurrently, one session dealt with the confusing nature of Indian treaties, while another session discussed the construction and uses of the Bozeman Trail and the Mullan Road.

Deputy Associate Solicitor in the Department of Interior Hans Walker joined Frank Lamebull of Fort Belknap, Bob Corcoran of Montana's Department of Revenue, and Professor Thomas Wessel of Montana State University on the Indian treaties panel. Wessel explained the historic significance of Indian treaties, which the U.S. government stopped negotiating in 1871, and the impact of the many "agreements" which have been the text of understandings between Indian tribes and white governmental agencies since 1871. As Walker and Lamebull explained, Indian treaties and agreements affect almost every aspect of law from civil rights to water rights. The audience also learned what might occur if Congress passes proposed legislation abrogating all previous Indian treaties and agreements.

In the pre-railroad transportation session, chaired by Robert L. Peterson of the University of Montana, Warren McGee took the audience over nearly every mile of the famous Bozeman Trail. Using dozens of slides, McGee made a plea for preserving the remaining portions of the road. Those in attendance also learned how harrowing travel was on the Bozeman Trail in 1867-1868.

Ralph Zimmer, professor of engineering at Montana State University, discussed the

MICHAEL MALONE

Mullan Road's importance in the settlement of Montana in the early 1860s. John Mullan's engineering marvel, which was the first engineered road in the Pacific Northwest, has just been named a National Historic Engineering Landmark. Rex Myers, Reference Librarian at the Historical Society, concluded the transportation session by commenting on how important these early roads were in establishing travel and settlement patterns in Montana. Modern highways, Myers noted, follow the same routes pioneered in the 1860s.

At the Friday luncheon Hans Walker of the Department of Interior spoke on contemporary problems associated with historic Indian treaties. The entire question of how Indian treaties will be handled is now under the most serious discussion in Congress. Walker told luncheon guests that radical changes may be in the offing.

Dorothy Johnson, Missoula's celebrated author, entertained a large audience Friday afternoon with her lively commentary on the writing of her novel The Hanging Tree and the making of the Warner Brothers film adaptation. Among other things she disclosed, Miss Johnson told everyone how the film producers actually constructed a mechanical "hanging tree" which they could rotate to take advantage of the best light for filming. "They decided it should be a Ponderosa Pine," Miss Johnson remembered, "even though the tree was a Cottonwood in my book."

Museum Curator Michael McCourt and other museum experts, including Frank Grant and Sue Haselton from Fort Missoula and Jennifer Jeffries from Libby, conducted workshops on Friday and Saturday afternoons. Among other things, workshop attendees learned the fine points of grant-writing and what agencies or institutions are most likely to fund small museum projects. The high point was the on-the-spot construction of an interpretive museum display depicting a cowboys' line camp. Complete with canvas tent, branding irons, saddles, ropes, and other cowboy paraphernalia, workshop instructors explained how each artifact could be arranged to tell the story of the cowboy's working life on the range.

In a second series of workshops held Friday and Saturday afternoons, Assistant Archivist Jeff Cunniff and several experienced teachers from high schools throughout the state conducted workshops on the teaching of Montana history. Those who attended learned of the new materials available, including the slide shows created by David Walter of Columbia Falls for the Office of Public Instruction. Teachers also heard about new classroom techniques such as special research projects, unique field trips, and other activities which generate interest in Montana history.

Friday evening's banquet address was delivered by H. Duane Hampton, Professor of History at University of Montana. Dr. Hampton discussed the early opposition to the establishment and enlargement of national parks in the early twentieth century. Too often, Hampton told the audience, historians have labeled national park opponents as miscreants who wanted to develop the nation's natural resources for their own enrichment. As Hampton explained, national park opponents represented several legitimate concerns and were not necessarily involved in any sort of resource development.

Those infamous vigilantes in Virginia City in the 1860s and out in the Missouri Breaks in the 1880s were the subjects of a single session on Saturday morning. Dr. Merrill Burlingame, Professor Emeritus at Montana State University, Larry Pointer, author of the best-selling In Search of Butch Cassidy, and frontier violence expert Professor Richard M. Brown of University of Oregon discussed the true nature of vigilante justice and the mystery surrounding vigilante activities.

The two vigilante actions were very different—the Virginia City vigilantes punished highwaymen and murderers while the central Montana vigilantes in the 1880s executed horse and cattle rustlers—but there were similarities. In both instances, according to Burlingame and Pointer, an extended period of extreme lawlessness preceded the formation of vigilante groups. Both vigilante organizations kept their membership secret. Much less, however, is known about the 1880s episode.

Professor Michael P. Malone, Chairman of the Department of History and Philosophy at Montana State University, delivered an exciting luncheon address on Saturday. The subject of his address was Senator William Andrews Clark, the famous copper baron and antagonist of Marcus Daly. The title of Malone's speech, "Midas of the West," indicates his perspective on Clark. The most remarkable aspect of Clark's life, Malone explained, was his success in business and his drive to be accepted in the monied society of the day. This explains his ambition to be a Senator and his opulent life style, especially the size and expense of his Fifth Avenue mansion in New York City. Beyond everything, Malone concluded, W.A. Clark was a man of determination and exceptional talent.

Tours of Butte's historic uptown district on Saturday afternoon concluded the scheduled events at the Fifth Annual Montana History Conference. Conference planners look forward to next year's meeting in Helena. As now scheduled, the 1980 meeting will again move out of the Capital City. Whoever hosts that meeting will have a hard act to follow after the great reception everyone received in Butte.

Distinguished Service Awards

The Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society took an unprecedented step this year when they instituted the Montana Historical Society Distinguished Service Award. For years individuals associated with the Society have felt that there should be some way to honor those people who, over the years, have devoted their energies, minds and hearts to the work of historic preservation and the promotion of historical activities throughout the state and the region.

The first Distinguished Service Awards were presented to the late Charles A. Bovey and to E. E. "Boo" MacGilvra. Presentations of the awards were made at the banquet at the annual Montana History Conference in Butte by Board President Toni Hagener. Sue Ford Bovey, widow of Charles Bovey, accepted the award for her husband. Vivian Paladin, long-time friend of "Boo" MacGilvra, accepted the award in his behalf. Mr. MacGilvra was ill and could not attend the banquet.

Charles A. Bovey was as involved in the promotion of Montana history over the last forty years as anyone in the state. He and his wife began collecting historical artifacts years ago, and, beginning with their Old Town exhibits on the fairgrounds in Great Falls, they invested all their energies in historic restorations. The results of their work, Virginia City and Nevada City restorations, have entertained and educated countless visitors. Charles Bovey was a member of the Society Board of Trustees for over 14 years and served as its President.

E.E. "Boo" MacGilvra is known to all as a man dedicated to the preservation of Montana history. He has been active in Lewis and Clark Trail Heritage activities, Montana's Centennial Train display in 1964, and on the Board of Trustees of the Society for over 18 years. It is hard to think of a person who has contributed more to the work of the Montana Historical Society. For "Boo" MacGilvra, we should emphasize the word service in the award he deserves so much.

2nd Kootenai Seminar Meets in Libby

Touring archeological digs that the hotly-contested Libby Re-Regulating Dam will obliterate in five years capped two days' discussion of the Kootenai area's ten-thousand-year human history for participants in the second annual Kootenai Seminar.

Held on July 21-22 at the Libby Dam Visitor's Center Museum, the seminar attracted 300 participants—twice as many as its predecessor, according to coordinator Jennifer Jeffries Thompson, curator of the Montana Historical Society's Libby branch.

The Society and the Army Corps of Engineers sponsored the meeting, with financial assistance from the Montana Committee for the Humanities, an affiliate of the National Endowment for the Humanities.

With the theme "Search for the Kootenai Past," this year's edition of the international history and archeology seminar explored the saga of the area's Native American inhabitants. Topics ranged from prehistory to present cultural preservation projects among Kootenais on both sides of the U.S.-Canadian border.

Evidence shows that the original inhabitants came into the area hunting mastodons about 9,000 to 11,000 years ago, according to Dr. Carling Malouf of University of Montana's Department of Anthropology. One sign of their lengthy stay is the lack of origin myths in Kootenai traditions; other evidence comes from archeological work.

Spreading out, Dr. Malouf explained, the Kootenai eventually divided into three groups: the plains Kootenai hunted buffalo, the upper Kootenai lived off small game, and the lower Kootenai, south of present Libby, depended upon fishing. All branches, according to Mary Ann Michel, Special Assistant at the Ft. Steele (British Columbia) Historic Park, could not have survived without making use of plants as they did. In her special heritage project, Ms. Michel is collecting tribal elders' knowledge of the range of medicinal and supply items that extended plants' usefulness beyond foodstuffs.

MARY ANN MICHEL

The eastward movement of the Kootenais, which began with their obtaining horses in the 1730s, stopped and then contracted as the Blackfeet, themselves being pushed westward, caused the Kootenai to return to their earlier territory. Settling on both sides of today's U.S.-Canadian border, the Kootenai (Kootenay in Canada) developed into a mountain people.

Wayne Choquette, Coordinator of the University of Idaho's Libby Archeological Project, presented and explained the term "mountain people" as defining an "overlap culture" where elements of plains and plateau lifestyles combined. This blending within Kootenai culture negates an earlier theory that plains and plateau cultures were totally separated by mountain barriers.

Dr. Tom E. Roll of Montana State University's Department of Anthropology noted that archeological investigation did not begin in this long-inhabited area until 1950. In thirty years of work, Roll commented, the estimated number of sites increased from eleven to over 400.

Several seminar speakers outlined the continuing problems of archeological work. Pat Lefthand of the Kootenai Tribe, Flathead Reservation, described the raiding of artifacts as souvenirs for whites, and the resultant use of secrecy by Kootenais in order to protect their heritage.

The Kootenai themselves spend $80,000 to $100,000 a year of tribal money on preserving their own heritage and transmitting it to youth, according to Laurence Kenmille of the Kootenai Tribe at Flathead Reservation. In the area of linguistics work, Elizabeth Gravelle of the Cranbrook Kootenay Indian Area Council outlined the detailed checking process she and others now use to record oral history and tradition. Nothing is recorded, Gravelle explained, until the story, spellings and pronunciations are checked with four different tellers.

Discussions on archeological investigation revealed the extent of discovery in the Kootenai region, as well as ironic problems faced. Mr. Choquette described bulldozers used in construction—as at Libby Dam—as both beneficial and destructive, uncovering new sites but simultaneously destroying some of their contents.

The amateur archeologist, caring but untrained, represents a different kind of threat to finds. Ray Kenny of the Provincial Archeologist's Office in Victoria outlined the British Columbia program that harnesses amateurs' energy under guidelines that protect their finds. The Volunteer Archeological Program initiated in 1975 provides for volunteer wardens throughout the province, who maintain a communication and training network between professionals and amateurs.

David Munsell, archeologist for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, based in Seattle, described the work of his agency as they seek to preserve artifacts in areas soon to be inundated or otherwise disturbed by Corps projects.

HARRY FRITZ

Bringing together the seminar's themes of protection and interpretation, Dr. Harry Fritz, head of University of Montana's Department of History, addressed the seminar banquet. He spoke of the past divergence of historians and archeologists, which sent the latter's discoveries into the interpretative sphere of anthropologists. Now, the field of historical archeology is emerging, he stated, as historians turn to knowledge about non-cultural events such as weather, pollution, and fires, and as they seek to understand the effects of these on cultural history.

Dr. Fritz's address, and the seminar itself, described the need for and also applauded the growing interest in a sharing of discoveries. The Society looks forward to the continued—and enthusiastic—sharing that future Kootenai Seminars are bound to bring.

A 1913 Homestead C

by Billee Hanes

The Christmas Eve of 1913, when I was twelve years old, became the one I would remember most. As usual, our family would be attending the annual square dance at the thousand-acre Rosco Wilkinson cattle ranch six miles from ours in the valley of Five Mile, Montana. Each Christmas Eve, Rosco's twenty-four ranch hands moved everything out of their spacious bunk house to make room for this dance. The building housed 200 dancers easily.

It was customary for my mother to play the piano at these dances, accompanied by Clyde Burgess, a young and energetic fiddler. This year my mother had allowed me to ask my best friend, eleven-year-old Elizabeth, to come early, go to the dance with us, and spend the weekend.

Elizabeth, riding her horse, Baldy, arrived around three that afternoon. Wedged behind the pommel of her saddle was a dress box holding her party dress. My mother happened to be pressing mine; she took Elizabeth's out and pressed it, too. We both stood impatiently watching as she put the dresses on hangers with instructions to carry them carefully.

Both of us had been to the Christmas Eve dances before but this year was expected to be different. Bill Bates, one of Rosco's ranch hands, had told us the Collier family from Two Bear Mountain would be coming to the dance.

We were well acquainted with the unusual story of Jake Collier and his family. We never tired of hearing Betty Yates (Mrs. Wilkinson's aunt) tell of lean, lanky, uneducated Jake who came down alone from the mountain to help during round-up time, when the beef cattle were taken to the stockyards and shipped to Chicago, and the calves were branded.

Jake had told Aunt Betty he had a wife and ten children. The children, including two sets of twins, ranged in age from two to twelve. The thing that amazed us was that Jake's wife and children had never been away from their mountain home! After much persuasion by the Wilkinsons, Jake reluctantly promised to bring his family to the Christmas party.

Elizabeth and I could hardly believe we were at last to see this family of Jake's. To think the children had never seen anyone but their parents and an old trapper who also lived on the mountain was almost beyond our comprehension.

Elizabeth and I went to the Wilkinson ranch earlier than my mother, for we had volunteered to babysit with the children to allow Abbey Wilkinson, Rosco's wife, and Aunt Betty free time to do the many last-minute odd jobs. We rode horseback holding our dresses carefully on hangers, planning on dressing after arriving.

Though we were early, many saddle horses were already tied at the hitching posts, and some families had already arrived in wagons. There were no cars on Five Mile. My mother, Clyde the fiddler, and his widowed mother came around seven. By that time Elizabeth and I were free from babysitting in the big house, so we followed them to the brightly lighted bunk house.

Inside was a beautifully decorated room. A large tree with hundreds of lights, balls, tinsel, and strung popcorn captured our eyes as we entered. The huge stone fireplace sent out a welcoming warmth from its blazing logs. A long table lighted by candles stood ready to receive the refreshments.

There must have been a couple dozen people standing around visiting. They called and waved to my mother and Clyde, whom everyone knew because they played at all the dances within a radius of fifty miles.

Elizabeth and I slipped into an adjoining room where the cowboys' bunk beds stood in long rows. Already several small children were there sleeping. Parents had no way of leaving their young ones at home so they were brought along and bedded down in this room. I whispered to Elizabeth as I leaned over to cover little Betsy Pinnick, "Are you going to square dance?"

"Sure, aren't you?" whispered back Elizabeth, and she added, "I saw Charlie Sober last night and he asked me to be his partner."

"I hope Clair Barngrover asks me," I said wistfully.

These two young men, some fifteen years our senior, and three others were the area's eligible bachelors, each working to prove up on a homesteading claim. Being adolescents, we took turns having crushes on them, unbeknownst to them. We, of course, were only little girls for them to protect as big brothers would.

That past summer, we had spent our afternoon hours in the saddle, riding over miles of hills and flat lands, exploring. (There being no school within thirty miles, we were tutored by Elizabeth's mother from 8 to 12 each morning.)

One day Elizabeth's Uncle Sid, also a Five Mile rancher, asked us to take a plowshare to be sharpened by Grover Lanter, one of our "has-been" loves. Upon reaching his 9×12 shack, we knocked several times, There was no answer so we went inside, with no feeling of trespassing. It was an unwritten law that no one should lock his door, since it might be necessary for some traveler to seek shelter.

Grover's shack was such a sight! An unmade bunk, stacks of dirty dishes, an overflowing garbage can and a very dirty floor. We looked at each other.

"Do you think it needs a clean-up job?" I asked.

"You said it. Let's get going!" answered Elizabeth.

When the chore was finished, we were quite proud of our results. Leaving the plowshare, we started toward home in silence until Elizabeth said, "Why not clean Charlie's, Clair's, Glen's and Frank's places, too?"

"Do you mean today?" I answered tiredly.

"No, we must be sure to find when any one of them will not be home. That is what will make it fun, if they don't know who did it."

So we carried out the plan all summer and through fall. Winter days in Montana

ristmas Remembered

were unpredictable and too dangerous for traveling.

Tonight, Christmas Eve, we stood admiring the tree, watching the happy square dancers and waiting expectantly for Charlie and Clair, our current "loves."

Our attention was drawn to the door, as everyone stopped dancing. In walked Jake Collier, his wife and ten children. Jake, made awkward by the abrupt silence, stood twisting his fur cap, looking as though he would like to turn and run. His wife, in sympathy with his embarrassment, forgot her own shyness, moved forward and took hold of his hand and said, "Jake, knock us down to 'em!"

Seeing their father and mother holding hands, the children lined up beside them clasping hands tightly. I was experiencing pain with them. They seemed so alien, so defenseless, and completely awed with their surroundings and the crowd of strangers. Jake, visibly trembling, began, in his wife's words, to knock 'em down.

"This here is Wisteria, my woman." Beginning with the child closest, he named each of them. The introductions entailed considerable time, for each child had four names!

Kerry, one of Rosco Wilkinson's ranch hands, picked up two-year-old Sachie Melinda Doritha Florabelle and said, "This little lady needs her feet warmed." Abbey pulled off the child's heavy fur boots and rubbed her cold feet briskly. We learned that the Colliers had trailed four miles down the mountainside, where Kerry met them with a wagon for the remaining seven miles to the ranch.

Sensing the friendliness, the other children, after recovering from their wonder at the "never seen before" beauty, gradually lost their shyness. Elizabeth and I invited them over to the tree. We sat on the floor with them where they might see everything.

Jake and Wisteria sat by the fireplace, warming themselves and listening in raptured silence to the rollicking music and utterly absorbed in watching the dancers.

Shortly after they arrived, "refreshments" were served. No one would go hungry. The table was heavy with every conceivable kind of food. The Wilkinsons were wealthy, and were generous with their wealth. I venture to say the Colliers had never had so much food. We refilled their plates and they ate as though they were empty from their toes up.

After eating, dancing began again. Elizabeth got her dance with Charlie. I was doomed to be disappointed, for Clair was unable to be there. His neighbor had been gored by a bull and Clair had taken him to Edgar, where our one doctor lived. But I did get to dance with Kerry and Frank, two of my past amours.

Suddenly, Grover (whose cabin was the first one we had cleaned), clapped his hands and said, "Listen!" There was a sound of sleigh bells and a hearty voice called, "Ho, ho, will you let a fellow come in and get warm?"

We all clapped as Santa Claus came in with a filled pack over his shoulder. There were one hundred and twenty-seven of us at the party and each one received a generous bag of candy, nuts, and fruit. Most of these were already under the tree—the pack Santa carried in was for the benefit of the children.

As we sat opening our bags, again Grover clapped his hands and said, "I see there are two more gifts under the tree." He walked close to the tree and bent over two beautiful saddles. Looking at the card on one, he called out, "Is there anyone here by the name of Ethel Hanes?"

Elizabeth gave me a push and, startled, I stood up.

"Here," I answered.

"The tag on the other saddle says Elizabeth Meyers."

I pulled her up beside me and we ran to the tree. Out of the crowd Charlie, Glen and Frank followed us. Grover, looking at us, smiled and began talking. "In appreciation of two elves that have been doing housekeeping for five untidy bachelors, we want to present these saddles!"

"How did you know?" gasped Elizabeth.

"We've always known," laughed Grover. "The plowshare you delivered for your Uncle Sid gave us the clue. But why should we spoil your fun by telling you we knew! Besides, you might have stopped then!"

We knelt beside the saddles. The people clapped and clapped.

I ran my hand lovingly over the saddle, breathing in the aroma of its new leather. Happiness left me speechless. The stirrups were studded, the seat deeply cushioned, and the pommel had a gold cap. The four gift-giving bachelors, minus my absent Clair, knelt in a circle around us enjoying our happiness. Others gathered around. Even the Colliers shared our joy.

That Christmas Eve, sixty-five years ago, stands out in my memory as being one of my happiest times and I'm sure the Colliers would agree with me that it was a party never to forget.

Epilogue

Two years later, in the year 1915, a log schoolhouse was built by the men of Five Mile and Blue Water (an extension of Five Mile). There were twenty-two children who attended. All of the Collier children came, except Daniel David Joshua Mark (the new baby). And Wreatha Mariett Claudia Francine, who was the same age as myself, became a very close friend to both Elizabeth and me.

Billee (nee Ethel) Hanes came to Montana at age 10 when her mother, Alice Hanes, and her older half-brother Mark Ball and half-sister Maude Ball filed on homesteading claims they developed into the Five Mile ranch. When she was 17, Ethel moved to Iowa for her schooling. Since she had come directly from her sister's home in Billings, classmates nicknamed her Billee—which stuck, since she preferred it to Ethel.

"Retired" after 37 years as a primary school teacher, Ms. Hanes lives in Waterloo, Iowa, where she holds volunteer jobs in a charity clothing shop and in a shop that sells crafts items made by over-60's. She also finds time for writing classes and publishing articles in children's and other magazines.

Capitol Paintings Get Needed Treatment

The mural-size Russell oil in the Capitol's House chamber is about 26 feet by 12 feet. The man seated on scaffolding before its upper right corner seems to be performing a mysterious ritual. He taps the painting lightly, listening to the wall, and then adds colored dots to a small-scale sketch of the work. He dips a cotton ball into a chemical bottle and dabs carefully at a tiny spot. He makes more notes.

This ritual begins the very welcome art conservation project now in progress, during which the Capitol's paintings will be cleaned and their "health" problems diagnosed. Art conservator Richard J. Trela, hired with funds appropriated by the 45th Legislature, will be working under the aegis of the Montana Historical Society until mid-1979.

The largest, and most valuable, work is the Charles Russell oil, "Lewis and Clark Meeting the Flathead Indians at Ross' Hole," acclaimed by some as his masterpiece. Commissioned in 1911 and installed in the House of Representatives the following year, it is usually called a mural because of its vast size. But, Trela explains, a true mural is designed for viewing both from a distance and from various perspectives.

Russell did this work in the manner of an easel painting, including great detail that, along with being historically accurate, is best appreciated close up. He also composed it with a central focal point, unlike classic mural style.

The painting was cleaned once, twenty-four years ago; the subsequent years have seen a surface dulling that now hides subtle light hues Russell utilized in the background and dims the brighter shades of the figures.

Trela's first order of business is photo-documentation of the painting's current status, including ultraviolet color photos. He will eventually take three series of photos of the whole work and of details to accompany his written record of what he found, what he did, the materials used, and the final result.

Conservation work, he points out, must be completely documented and also reversible—protecting but not altering the paint layer. When the natural aging of materials Trela uses, or the development of better materials or methods occurs, a future conservator can rely upon this written and pictorial record to plan the follow-up work.

One preliminary check used for the Russell, which is on canvas affixed directly to the wall, is sounding. Tapping the surface gently, Trela listens for and finds small air pockets where the hidden wall surface has crumbled. As he marks their locations on a sketch of the work, he explains that these now-invisible flaws can result in visible future damage. One solution to the problem is injecting adhesive through the painting's surface, using a hypodermic needle to pierce between threads in the canvas.

Trela's testing of cleaning solvents begins in a background area, away from the major figures—in this case, the mountains and sky above Lewis and Clark's heads. A variety of solvents and strengths will be chosen for the actual cleaning, determined by physical and chemical factors of each surface area.

When the cleaning begins, Trela will still be dabbing tiny areas with a cotton ball affixed to an orange stick—across all 312 square feet of canvas.

Smoke, lighting, and heat are the main factors affecting this Russell. Smoke particles, because of their minute size, infiltrate the surface and collect on the canvas texture and on brushstrokes.

Lighting, Trela explains, must be concentrated rather than merely bright, both for viewing the painting and for saving it from the heat produced. He expects to recommend a change in the lighting around the Russell.

In the past, central heating combined with this work's position on what was originally an exterior wall, probably led to some condensation on the painting's surface. Luckily, Trela says, the exterior wall has been moved out six inches and dead air space now insulates the painting from outside temperatures.

Each work presents a unique problem to the conservator, resulting from the organic and inorganic materials used to create it and their interaction with display (or storage) conditions over the years.

All the other capitol paintings will receive Trela's attention during the project, individually requiring more and less work. In the Rotunda, the arch-shaped canvas portraying "The Last Golden Spike of the Northern Pacific Railroad," by Amedee Joullin, will need to come down from its high niche for treatment.

Joullin's canvas has stretched over the years, enough that a six-inch bulge across the bottom now collects dust, and the arching top of the painting sags against its stretcher bar, which may be causing paint loss. New canvas will be applied behind the original and possibly the stretchers will be replaced. Cleaning the Joullin work will also mean taking off wall paint that splashed onto the painting—in one case being wiped off with a rag, leaving a whitish smear on a main figure.

The four portraits of frontier types around the dome, by Charles A. Pedretti, require only cleaning. These include Jim Bridger representing trappers, and Henry Edgar in the miner's portrait, along with anonymous Indian and cowboy figures.

The Edgar S. Paxson paintings in the House Lobby will require little more than cleaning, although some earthquake damage may need repair. These canvases are affixed to the plaster of the walls, so that past quakes have actually caused tears as the walls cracked and moved slightly.

The Law Library's Ralph E. DeCamp paintings, ten framed oils of landscapes around the state, require mostly cleaning. But the concavely curved murals in the ceilings of the Supreme Court and the Senate were improperly installed and are in bad condition, their paint flaking. The ideal treatment, Trela feels, would include removing them and applying the canvases to properly curved sheets of aluminum. That, however, would require more time and personnel than the current project allows. These works, also by Pedretti, include scenes of the formation of the State of Montana (in the Supreme Court) and of early historical events (in the Senate).

Capitol visitors next summer, then, will see paintings that look more like the artist intended, and that also are (invisibly) prepared to stay that way for a while. We welcome this first stage in what should become an ongoing project.

Meet Our New Librarian, Assistant Editor

Robert M. Clark, who has joined the Society as Librarian, applauds the growing interest historians feel for nonfactual works as sources for information on the past. He looks forward to improving our holdings in Montana-related fiction and poetry, as well as adding to the already very strong collection of Montaniana.

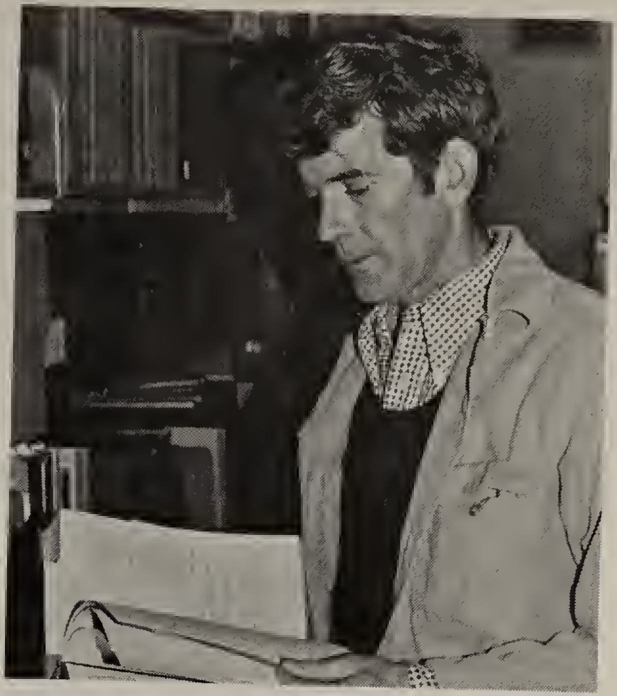
Bob's formal training and varied experience, as well as his hobby of collecting 19th century American fiction, reflect the broad perspective he brings to the Library position. At Stanford, he combined a minor in American history with a major in English. The Air Force, following its own logic, trained him first as a Personnel Officer, and then as a Minuteman II missile Launch Officer.

He later received an M.A. in American Literature from the University of Nevada in Reno, teaching freshman composition at the same time, and his master's in Librarianship from the University of Denver.

He completed the editing job begun by his father on the three-volume Journals of Alfred Doren 1894-1902, which was published by the University of Nevada Press in 1973.

Although Bob has lived primarily in Nevada, this is not his first Montana residence. He attended high school in Missoula for two years when his father, novelist Walter Van Tilburg Clark, was teaching at the University of Montana.

Most recently, Bob was director of the White Pine County Public Library, which serves 10,000 people in a 10,000-square-mile county from its headquarters in Ely, Nevada. Montana's famous county-busting fever never infected Nevada.



Besides noting the warm welcome received by the Clark family—which includes wife Betsy and four children aged one to sixteen years—Bob says they've noticed that Montanans demonstrate "a sense of history beginning within their own families."

It is not often that anyone gets a second opportunity to work at a favorite job. Most of us feel more than lucky to get that great job once in our lives.

Barbara Rackley, new Assistant Editor of MONTANA, is returning to a familiar place. In 1969, as she puts it, "I just fell into one of the greatest jobs ever when I went to work as an editorial assistant to Viv Paladin. Then, as now, there is never a dull moment in MONTANA's editorial office."

Her husband's job change in 1971 took her to Pennsylvania and away from the magazine.

Since leaving MHS in 1971, Barbara has worked as an editor for Brodart, Inc. in Williamsport, Pennsylvania, editing and producing book catalogs. She gained some valuable experience at the job, but her heart and hopes were still in Montana. If at all possible, she wanted to get back to that great job she had reluctantly left.

Barbara and Cliff Rackley both graduated from Ohio University in Athens, Ohio, in the spring of 1969; Barbara's degree is in creative writing. They came west that fall when Cliff took a job on the staff of the Independent Record in Helena. In the fall of 1978, they're glad to be back in the Real World—Montana.

"Cliff always had a great interest in the West," Barbara commented, "and when I got here I fell in love with Montana, too." While she was Viv Paladin's editorial assistant, Barbara read western history and lore, avidly pursuing all aspects of the subjects published in the magazine. In the winter issue of 1971 Barbara wrote an article on one of the more famous events in Montana history, "The Hard Winter of 1886-1887."

Barbara expects to do more writing in the future, some on historical topics, but also a good deal of fiction. "Writing fiction that nobody publishes," she admits, "is one of my hobbies. When I grow up, I hope to be discovered." She and Cliff also like cross-country skiing, refinishing furniture, reading, and hiking with their two dogs, appropriately named Bridger and Scannon.

"We are very fortunate to have her back on the staff," editor Bill Lang commented. "She knows editing, loves history, and has a genuine feel for the needs of the magazine."

Arts Advocacy Organizes

Montanans looking for the way to let public agencies know their support for arts programs—those funded by state and federal governments—will welcome the formation of the Montana Arts Advocacy on November 4.

The statewide group will seek to end what one member calls the "sins of omission, or benign neglect" that occur when publically-funded agencies overlook arts programs, both large and small, in making hard budgeting decisions.

The Advocacy's communications will also be directed to citizens, informing them of the status of the arts programs and public policy decisions-in-process that will affect those programs. In the works are a brochure explaining Montana Arts Advocacy to interested citizens, and a communications network for advocates across the state.

Selecting Sr. Joeann Daley and Ed Groenhout as co-chairman, the steering committee capped several months preparation (and meetings in cities and towns across Montana) with a statement clearly outlining the spectrum of concerns. It reads:

"The Montana Arts Advocacy is a group of citizens committed to the provision, protection, and perpetuation of the arts, preservation of our cultural legacy, and advancement of our living heritage by: exchanging information about matters which affect public policy; ensuring public participation in and access to services and resources; fostering life-long educational opportunities—for advancing the quality of life for all Montanans."

It is a tall order, and an exciting one. Arts Advocacy opens a channel through which all Montanans can express their interest in the continuance and growth of funded programs. We wish them well.

Readers interested in receiving more details, or offering their much-needed time (or even money!) should contact Sr. Joeann Daley, 709 E. Third, Anaconda, MT 59711, telephone (406) 563-3842.

The Western Heritage Center, Billings, plans to open an operating blacksmith shop—featuring demonstrations and classes—for public display of this significant frontier craft. If you have tools, a forge, or other materials to offer, please write the Center at 2822 Montana Ave., Billings, MT 59101.

¶ from the Editor's File

¶ We begin this column as a space for editorial comment about what is happening in Montana history, historic preservation, cultural resource development and other items we think might be of interest to Montana Historical Society members. It is intended to be a potpourri of history news. Sometimes we will give readers a glimpse of a future event—one that is just in the planning stages. Other times we might offer our opinion on how one or another event faired. We hope this column will enlighten as often as it entertains.

¶ Many people in Montana will be pleased to hear that the historic preservation office at MHS will finally have a full staff to process nominations to the National Register of Historic Places, help secure historic preservation grants, and advise interested people about historic preservation in the state.

It has taken some time to receive approval for the new staff positions, but without them the entire program stood in jeopardy of losing most or all of the federal funds committed to historic preservation in Montana. The full staff will include a state historian, archeologist, historic architect and architectual historian.

¶ Not all the news is good. The winds of inflation are buffeting the magazine along with everyone else in our economy. We have held back for four years, but the inevitable is at our doorstep. Increased printing costs, particularly the price of paper which shot up over 45 per cent since January 1978, and other increases can no longer be ignored.

Although few Montanans know it, MONTANA the Magazine of Western History operates solely on revenues through subscriptions, advertising and sales of merchandise. No state appropriated funds are used—not one penny of Montana tax dollars has ever been expended on the magazine. Of course, that puts quite a burden on us.

If all of this sounds like a justification for increasing MHS membership dues, it is. Although the exact amount has not been established, we intend the increase to be moderate. It will go into effect with the summer issue of 1979.

In an effort to economize without jeopardizing the quality of MONTANA, we are converting our present subscription service to a new and more efficient system. Beginning with the next renewal notices, subscribers will receive a new type of form with new reply envelopes. In any conversion of this sort there are sure to be a few mistakes, but the cost savings are great and efficiency will be improved. We ask for patience during this conversion.

¶ One of the things everyone mentioned at the Montana History Conference in Butte is the great interest there is in historic preservation. More and more people are beginning to realize that their neighborhoods, business buildings, old churches and other structures are worth protecting. In Anaconda a dedicated group of historic preservationists have successfully blocked the demolition of a two-block downtown area which contains many buildings of historic importance. The case is still being argued in court, but it does show what a small group of interested people can accomplish.

¶ The Board of Trustees of MHS is now contemplating establishing three or fours levels of MHS membership. Many MHS members and long-time supporters of Society activities have asked for some vehicle allowing them to contribute directly to the Society. Although the details have not been set, each class of membership will ask for a stated dollar contribution to MHS in return for special considerations and benefits.

Vivian Paladin Writing Award

Throughout her tenure in the editor's chair at MONTANA, Vivian Paladin always stressed the importance of readability in every article she accepted for publication. Above all else she made certain that articles were written in a style which encouraged readers to keep turning to the next page. It is more than fitting, then, that the Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society named the newly-commissioned annual writing award for articles appearing in MONTANA after Vivian A. Paladin.

The first annual Paladin Writing Award was given at the Montana History Conference in Butte, on October 27. Gary L. Roberts, author of "The Shame of Little Wolf" (Summer 1978), won the award—a cash gift of $150 and a handsome engraved silver bowl.

The award-winning article was chosen on the merits of readability, original research, and the importance of its contribution to historical knowledge. The award jury consisted of MONTANA's editorial board and editors.

Gary Roberts' article discussed the tragic life of Little Wolf, fearless leader of the Northern Cheyenne people during the tribe's most trying years. Roberts described Little Wolf's exceptional character with great sensitivity. But he also addressed a most difficult subject in the article—the nature of tribal leadership and the effects of reservation life on that leadership.

Roberts, who has been on the faculty of Abraham Baldwin Agricultural College in Tifton, Georgia, for several years, is currently finishing his Ph.D. work at the University of Oklahoma. "I feel so honored," Gary commented when he received the award, "and all the more because Viv Paladin gave me encouragement when I first began publishing. It will be a long time before I forget this moment."

Gary Roberts is no stranger to western history enthusiasts and readers of MONTANA. He has been active in pursuing the history of violence on the frontier. In 1970 we published his article on the gunfight at the OK corral, "The Wells Spicer Decision: 1881." Four years later we again featured an article he authored, "Condition of the Tribes, 1865: The Report of General McCook." We hope it will not be too long before we can include another Roberts article in MONTANA.

RENDEZVOUS ART SHOW SCHEDULED; DISTINGUISHED ARTISTS TO APPEAR

When the dedicated members of the Helena Art Council announced early in May that they would sponsor a 1978 Western Rendezvous of Arts August 25 and 26, and that many of the events as well as the proceeds would redound to the benefit of the Historical Society's goals, there was widespread applause, and, as we go to press, increasing excitement.

With leadership provided by Dick Duffy and Bob Morgan, both former Society staff members, some of the finest artists now working in the western art field will be represented. They include: Joe Abbrescia, Joe Beeler, Bill Bender, Mitch Billis, Joe Bohler, Clark Bronson, Harley Brown, Gary Carter, Hall Diteman, Arlene Hooker Fay, Chester Fields, Joe Halko, Hank Lawshe, Newman Myrah, Bill Reese, Gary Schildt, Conrad Schwiering, Steve Seltzer, Elmer Sprunger, Ron Stewart, Marlo Urdahl, John Weaver, and Fritz White.

With exceptional art quality assured, the coordinators began making plans for other outstanding events, including a retrospective showing, in the recently dedicated Haynes Gallery, of paintings by the late Irving S. "Shorty" Shope, designated as the year's honored artist. This beloved artist will be further commemorated with a special award to the participating artist whose work "best depicts a factual historical event."

The Society's large Poindexter Gallery will contain the works of all participating artists, and all pieces will be for sale. A specially constructed gallery adjacent to the Haynes and Poindexter galleries will contain a showing of works by esteemed deceased artists, and again all pieces will be available for sale.

VIVIAN PALADIN

Vivian A. Paladin, whose retirement as Editor of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY is dealt with elsewhere in this issue, will be Honorary Chairman for the event, and will present the Shope award as well as prizes for such categories as "Best of Show," "Best Oil," "Best Watercolor," "Best Mixed Media," "Best Drawing" and "Best Sculpture." The presentations will be made at an awards banquet, scheduled for Saturday evening, August 26, at the Colonial Inn Ballroom.

Registration will begin Friday at 9:00 A.M. in the Historical Society lobby, and will continue through 5:00 P.M. All galleries will be open for viewing from 8:00 to 10:00 P.M. that evening. Registration will continue Saturday, beginning at 9:00, and at 11:00 a.m., a brunch will be held at the Colonial Inn, during which participating artists will engage in a "quick-draw" event, with their spur-of-the-moment work placed in informal auction.

All Society galleries will remain open through both days, until 4:00 p.m. Saturday, and prospective buyers will be invited to place "intent to-purchase" slips in a box by each work of art, no more than one bid permitted by any buyer for any one piece. A public announcement will be made Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. signalling the opening of the sale, with the top bid with buyer present being awarded the sale.

In sum, the 1978 event brings back to life a distinguished series of Rendezvous art shows instituted in 1972 by the Society and continued for the next three years until rising costs and staff limitations forced their suspension. With the leadership of the Helena Arts Council and the gallery facilities of the Society, this one promises to be a worthy resurrection. All proceeds from the sales will be earmarked for the Montana Heritage Foundation, dedicated to promoting the Society's goals of preserving Montana history through its galleries and museums.

On the back of this issue, a coupon has been provided for Society members throughout the country to attend or participate to the extent of acquiring a copy of the catalogue being prepared for the event.

BUTTE TO BE SETTING FOR FIFTH MONTANA HISTORY CONFERENCE

Historic Finlen Hotel in uptown Butte will be the site of the Fifth Annual Montana History Conference, October 26-28, 1978, according to conference co-ordinator Bill Lang. Thanks to a grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities, the Montana Heritage Foundation in association with the Montana Historical Society, the Council to Preserve Montana History, and the Butte Historical Society are able to continue the annual history conference.

This year's program includes general sessions, discussion panels, workshops, a film presentation, slide shows, an oral history demonstration, three major addresses, and tours of historic Butte. The Conference title, "Shaping Montana: 19th Century Precedents and 20th Century Problems," suggests a special view of Montana's frontier period. The Conference sessions will explore this general theme.

The meetings will get underway Thursday evening, October 26, at the grand old Finlen Hotel on Broadway in Butte. This will be an historic occasion in itself, as it will be the last time the Finlen will function as a hotel. Formal meetings will take place all day both Friday, October 27, and Saturday, October 28.

W. TURRENTINE JACKSON

Three major addresses will be delivered at two luncheons, Friday and Saturday, and at a Friday evening banquet. University of California Professor W. Turrentine Jackson will speak on "Wells Fargo in Montana," and Tom Fredericks of the Department of the Interior will address the topic of Indian treaties. Montana State University Professor Michael Malone will discuss the career of Sen. W. A. Clark on Saturday.

Other Conference sessions will include an intriguing reconsideration of Montana Vigilantes by Dr. Merrill Burlingame, Professor Emeritus at Montana State University, and a discussion by Larry Pointer of Billings about famous outlaws who holed up in Eastern Montana in the last days of the nineteenth century.

Planners expect this year's meeting to be one of the most popular in the conference series.

Programs and registrations materials, according to Bill Lang, will be in the mails in early September. Anyone desiring further information on the Conference may contact Dr. Lang at the Montana Historical Society.

MONTANA'S "LADY

After two decades with MONTANA, including chief editorial responsibilities since 1966, Vivian A. Paladin is retiring this month. She is by no means saying a final goodbye, however, for her name will continue to appear on the magazine's masthead as Editor Emeritus, a fitting and much deserved title. What is perhaps more important to us, she will continue to live in Helena, between travels with her husband, Jack, and will thus be on hand to assist in the always complicated process of transition.

"Of course you cannot really replace someone like Vivian," commented Director Ken Korte, "although we have the greatest confidence in her successor, Bill Lang. I have been pleased to observe the close and highly professional way in which these two people have worked together the past year, and I know the future of the magazine is in good hands, a goal which Vivian shares with all of us."

Particularly since she became Editor in 1966, MONTANA has increasingly reflected Vivian's exceptional editorial talents and her genius in layout and design. Because of her energy and devotion to excellence, MONTANA now ranks as one of the best and most respected state historical journals in the nation.

Vivian learned the printer's trade early in life, and admits that even now it is the publishing process itself which keeps her excited about each issue of the magazine. Indeed, she has said many times that printers, on whose prideful craft the success of any publication depends, have played important roles throughout her career. "Without exceptions," Vivian told us, "the printers with whom I have worked have been cooperative, immensely helpful and really as proud of the publication as anyone. Perhaps because I once worked at their trade and know their lingo, they have accepted this particular 'lady editor' with unusual camaraderie. Whatever it is, the dividends have been enormous."

One of six daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Hans Hilden of Glasgow, Montana, Vivian found herself working as an apprentice Linotype operator while she was still in high school, first at the now-gone Glasgow Times, and later at the Glasgow Courier, published by the late Joe Hocking, an important early mentor, as was Editor Sam Gilluly, who many years later became Director of the Historical Society.

That first exposure led to four years at the printing craft, during which she earned an International Typographical Union card, before she enrolled at the University of Montana's School of Journalism. Here, between classes, she operated a Linotype in the printing plant which then printed, and still does, The Montana Kaimin.

By 1941, Vivian had located in Cut Bank, where she worked for the well known Montana publisher, the late Dan Whetstone, at the Pioneer Press. She attributes much of her editorial training to this cultured man, who regularly encouraged her to leave the Linotype keyboard and go out and interview people.

"One interview I especially remember," Vivian told us, "was one with a giant of a man named J. Hugo Aronson, who, with a heavy Swedish accent, told me about his work in the oilfields, work which earned him the title the Galloping Swede. This was long before he entered politics, of course, and years later, when he was Governor, he was kind enough to tell me he remembered a scared newspaper reporter who wrote him up for Dan Whetstone's paper. He was, he told me, as scared as I was."

In 1946, Vivian married a returning veteran and career U.S. Immigration Service officer, Jack Paladin, and their first home was in Havre, where she assumed finally a full-time editorial job—as Society Editor of the Havre Daily News. "Here again I lucked out when it came to mentors and associates," she told us. "There was Jack Travis, the genial publisher, and the delightful editor, Herb Watts, who recently completed 35 years as editorial guide to this publication. I learned a great deal there in Havre—how to work but have fun at it, to have pride in professionalism but avoid the pomposity that can sometimes sneak in when you're not looking."

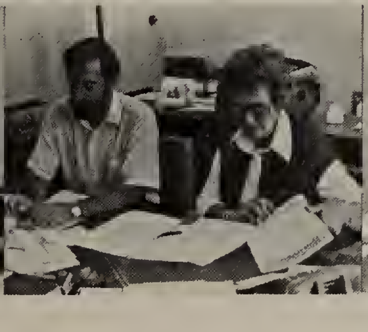
In 1950, the Paladins were transferred to New York City—a radical change which Vivian says probably caused a more severe cultural shock to the city than to them, although they settled across the Hudson in New Jersey, where they became house-owners for the first time and eventually made lifelong friends among the neighbors.

Vivian continued her journalism career on the Bergen Evening Record in Hackensack, where she operated a Linotype and read proof part of the day. "That was a noisy room with twenty-three machines running full tilt," she recalls. "I kept trying to get on the editorial side of things, but almost got fired my first day as a proof reader when I missed a horrendous error in a front page story about a plane crash in Elizabeth, New Jersey. There had been an earlier crash in the same area, and a bold face subhead was supposed to read SEVENTY-SIX KILLED PREVIOUSLY. Instead it read SEVENTY-SIX KILLED PERMANENTLY. Someone in the editorial department saw it before the press had run very long, but no amount of Montana humor could mitigate the wrath heaped upon a hapless Linotype operator who longed for an editorial job."

In 1953, the Paladins were happy when Jack was transferred back to Montana, to Billings. After time out for the birth and caring for their only child, Liz, Vivian came back to her career in Helena in 1957. "Ross Toole asked me to edit a manuscript on Calamity Jane," Vivian recalls. "and after thinking it over I decided to give it a try. It was quite a challenge and great fun, and I guess my work impressed somebody, because it was not long before I was reading proof for MONTANA, and finally joined the staff in 1958."

That was the beginning of Vivian Paladin's long and creative association with MONTANA. As staff member and Editor, she has continually applied the most demanding standards to her own work and the work of contributors. The result is an accumulation of awards, a quarterly magazine read by thousands, and the respect and admiration of colleagues all over the West.



Beginning with the Autumn issue in October, William L. Lang will sit at the editorial desk. Lang came to the Historical Society a little over a year ago as Assistant Editor and Vivian's understudy. He came to the Society from Helena's Carroll College, where he had taught American history for six years. A graduate of Willamette University in Salem, Oregon, Lang completed an M.A. degree at Washington State University and received his Ph.D. from the University of Delaware.

Lang's involvement in Montana history has ranged from teaching to his current project, writing a new high school level text on the state's history with Dr. Rex C. Myers of the Society's library staff. Dr. Lang has also completed a study of Helena's Afro-American population in the early twentieth century, and has been very active in statewide oral history projects.

"It has been quite a challenge to step into the complicated and exciting world of historical journalism," Lang remarked, "but I have one of the best teachers of the craft in Vivian. She is a marvelous person to work with, and I am surely going to miss working with her."

Vivian plans to aid the transition process by serving as a consultant, particularly in layout and design problems. "She is such a master of the process," Lang commented, "that her advice and participation will be invaluable. But I am also sure Vivian will be much sought after in her retirement—everybody knows how good she is."

The retiring Editor expressed equal confidence in her successor, pointing out that Bill Lang brings not only great academic strengths to the magazine but a dedication to its rather hazardous but effective format: a solid journal, yet one that is highly readable and palatable to a very broad audience.

SOCIETY ARCHIVISTS PROCESS SIGNIFICANT LOCAL HISTORY PAPERS

The Society's archivists have been busy catching up on the large backlog of unprocessed papers in the Society's holdings. Among recently processed collections are several, according to Assistant Archivist Jeffrey Cunniff, which will be of interest to local historians, including the New Mine Sapphire Syndicate Records, the Clifton Boyd Worthen Papers, and the Neil Fullerton Collection.

Anyone interested in sapphire mining in the Little Belt Mountains or in the history of the Utica, Montana area should peruse the New Mine Sapphire Syndicate Records. The collection contains documentation of the company's operations from 1898 to 1958, when an estimated four million dollars of world famous "Yogo" sapphires were mined. Included are stockholders' reports, the letterpress books of mine manager Charles T. Gadsen, and other company records.

The papers of amateur historian and teacher, Cliften Boyd Worthen, contain extensive notes and materials on the history of the Judith Basin region. Worthen, a high school instructor at Lewistown and later Missoula, studied Indian tribes, the livestock industry and mining in the Maiden/Kendall area. The Worthen Papers, 1929-1955, also include several reminiscences of early Judith Basin pioneers.

Another collection amassed by an amateur historian is the Neil Fullerton Collection, 1932-1968. A former Thompson Falls resident and U.S. Forest Service employee, Fullerton researched Sanders County history, including the fur trade and Salish House activities, the Coeur d'Alene mining district, the Nez Perce flight in 1877, Indian missions, and other topics relating to local history. The Fullerton files also contain correspondence with regional historians, research notes, maps, photographs, clippings, and interviews with local pioneer families.

Researchers interested in Native American studies will want to mine 16 cubic feet of records of the State Coordinator of Indian Affairs which recently have been processed by the archival staff. The records cover two decades, 1951 to 1971, and document the agency's endeavors to foster the economic development of the reservations in Montana through low interest loans.

FREDERIC REMINGTON, WELL DOCUMENTED A

While Montana claims him as their own and retains a deeper feeling for his work, Charles M. Russell was not the only artist who recorded a changing frontier. Better and earlier known was a rotund, affable artist Frederic Remington, whose life and works are not only on the record but have received wide acceptance and readership. One summer experience in his early life, however, remains obscure, and it is described here by Peggy and Harold Samuels who have dug deeply into the subject of Frederic Remington. The purpose in using these columns to tell this story, then, is two-fold: it is an interesting episode, and it is possible some gaps in it may be filled by a knowledgable readership.

— The Editors

KANSAS STATE HIST. SOC.

THE YOUNG ADVENTURER

by PEGGY and HAROLD SAMUELS

In the summer of 1881, Frederic Remington was on vacation from his hometown, Canton, New York. The stocky blond 19-year-old was busy maintaining his reputation as a massive trencherman, sportsman and outdoorsman, going on camping trips up the St. Lawrence or in the Adirondacks, and following the standardbred ponies at the track. He spent part of his time teasing senior members of his mother's family, the shop-owning Sackriders, and he was doing some sketching. Still he was bored, and had been for some time.

The year before, the young man had drifted from job to job in Albany, beginning as an executive clerk in the chambers of Governor Ezra Cornell. For a while, he worked as a reporter on his uncle's newspaper, the Albany Morning Express, then as a clerk in his uncle's state agency, the Department of Public Instruction, and finally as a clerk in the office of the Adjutant General. All the jobs had been arranged, and with each one, his boredom grew.

In July, Uncle Mart Remington, the executor of his father's will, announced that a new job had been found for him in the Insurance Department of the State of New York. It was a clerk's job again, but it was tailored to meet the shortcomings of the previous year, and Remington was expected to be satisfied and commence a serious career. The young man's price for accepting the continued boredom he anticipated in Albany in October was the opportunity to end his vacation with an adventuresome expression of his love for the wilderness, a trip to Montana. His eastern university group would have been familiar with western junkets, for some Harvard and Yale graduates had purchased and were operating western cattle and sheep ranches. Eastern politicians and artists often toured the Rockies, and eastern newspaper reporters wrote regularly about western events, expecially the progress of railroad construction, Indian wars, military life on the plains, and outlaws.

What is most unusual for the well-documented life of Frederic Remington, however, is that so few hard facts are known about his youthful Montana vacation. A Canton newspaper carried a "personal" item about his departure and Remington himself provided a studied recollection about the experience some twenty-four years after the fact. And there is a published illustration of Arizona, redrawn from a Remington sketch of Montana, plus two asides in later Remington writings, a rusty Colt said to have been removed by Remington from the Custer battlefield, and a third-hand statement by Remington's sister-in-law, Emma Caten, that he had seen his first cavalrymen in Montana in 1881.

To overcome the missing facts, previous researchers have added some spurious motivations. One reason cited was Remington's ill health, including a doctor's advice that he seek a cure in the west. But there was no illness. Others have suggested that Remington had gone with the declared intention of "becoming a millionaire." But no such quotation can be found in the record. Even more melodramatically, it has been said that the youth was a bitter, rejected suitor at the end of his first love affair. But that episode was over a year earlier.

Although it was Remington's pattern to travel with a camping friend or a relative, he went alone to Montana. That late in the summer, his friends were already returning to school or work.On subsequent trips Remington wrote letters, but if he wrote to his mother or to the Remington family from Montana, the letters were not kept. He did not write to the Sackriders, who retained all his letters, nor did he refer to the trip in letters written immediately after his return.

"Fred Remington, son of the late Col S P Remington," the St. Lawrence Plaindealer reported on August 10, 1881, "expects to start on Wednesday of this week for Montana. We understand he intends to make trial of life on a ranche."

Remington was still referred to as the son of the illustrious Colonel rather than as an individual, and "trial of life on a ranche" was a grandiose description for a vacation trip to be taken by a youth who was not settling down as expected.

Even Remington's travel route is not definitely known. Most likely he travelled by rail from upper New York State to Chicago, a journey he had made with his parents as a four-year-old when his father was an editor in Burlington, Illinois. From Chicago he may have taken a steamboat up the Missouri River to the head of navigation, Fort Benton. From Fort Benton he could have gone on to Fort Shaw and Helena by stage. The last steamboat to make the trip in 1881, however, was the Benton, on July 22, too early for Remington.

The second and most likely route would have been via the Northern Pacific from St. Paul after a connection from Chicago. The terminus was in western Dakota, where Remington would have taken the stage to Fort Keogh and Miles City along the Yellowstone River.

Remington's parents had been in Ogden, Utah in 1872 on a pleasure trip. His more sentimental route would have been north from the main rail line at Ogden via a branch of the Union Pacific called the Utah Northern. In August, 1881, rail construction into Butte, Montana, had been delayed while the right of way was secured, so the terminus would have been about 20 miles short of Butte. This route, later called the Oregon Short Line,would have landed the New Yorker farther west than is likely.

After Remington arrived in Montana, his itinerary was still conjectural. In a town, he would have put up at the hotel. The Miles City newspaper regularly printed the names of arrivals who registered at the hotel. No mention of Remington has been found, however, in Miles City or in Bozeman.

The only direct statement about the trip occurred September 18, 1905, when Collier's magazine published a "Remington number." The artist, by now famous, was asked to write about himself. The episode he picked as the one that triggered his career was the Montana vacation:

"I had brought more than ordinary schoolboy enthusiasm to Catlin, Irving, Gregg, Lewis and Clark, and others on their shelf," the artist wrote, "and youth found me sweating along their tracks. I was in the grand silent country following my own inclinations, but there was a heavy feel in the atmosphere. I did not immediately see what it portended, but it gradually obtruded itself. The times had changed."

Remington was an avid reader all his life, so his references to books would be real. George Catlin's Manners, Customs and Conditions of North American Indians had been a classic since 1841, including Indian illustrations from Catlin's own paintings. Washington Irving's Astoria was about the fur trade, and oddly enough, when it was reissued it was illustrated by the mature Remington. Irving also wrote about the Lewis and Clark expedition. Josiah Gregg described the Santa Fe trail in The Commerce of the Prairies in 1844. "Others on their shelf" would have been James Fenimore Cooper, Capt. Mayne Reid, Parkman, and the dime novels.

"Evening overtook me one night in Montana," Remington continued, "and by good luck made the camp-fire of an old wagon freighter who shared his bacon and coffee with me. I was nineteen years of age and he was a very old man. Over the pipes he developed that he was born in western New York and had gone West at an early age. His West was Iowa. Thence during his long life he had followed the receding frontiers, always further and further West. 'And now', said he, 'there is no more West. In a few years the railroad will come along the Yellowstone and a poor man can not make a living at all.'

"There he was, my friend of the open, sleeping in a blanket on the ground (it snowed that night), eating his own villanies out of his frying-pan, wearing a cotton shirt open at the throat, and hunting his horses through the bleak hills before daylight; and all for enough money to mend harness and buy wagon grease. He had made his point of view and he made a new one for me.

"The old man had closed my very entrancing book almost at the first chapter. I knew the railroad was coming—I saw men already swarming into the land. I knew the derby hat, the smoking chimneys, the corn-binder, and the thirty-day note were upon us in a resistless surge. I knew the wild riders and the vacant land were about to vanish forever, and the more I considered the subject the bigger the Forever loomed.

"Without knowing exactly how to do it, I began to try to record some facts around me, and the more I looked the more the panorama unfolded . . . I saw the living, breathing end of three American centuries of smoke and dust and sweat. . . ."

This was a very calculated composition concerning feelings a callow youth of nineteen might have had, if he had known the future. The description was written by a most successful artist at the height of his power, so different from a New York teenager at an old man's fire that he might have been another person.

In his article Remington did not list what was around him, even such a startling thing as the slaughter of the buffalo that could by itself have accounted for the "heavy feel in the atmosphere." Remington could have seen 1,000,000 buffalo in northern Wyoming and east-central Montana that year and his 1897 drawing, Taking the Robe, illustrated the hunters' procedure. The next year, the buffalo (and the hunters) were gone.

If Remington had really made his "trial of life on a ranche" as the Plaindealer had understood, he would also have been in on the beginnings of the ranching industry in Montana Territory. Trail herds were driven up from the south in early summer. One of the cowboys at the 1881 fall roundup might well have been Kid Russell, a green St. Louis boy in the Judith Basin on his first job, as a night herder. The Kid was Charles Marion Russell who also became famous as a Western artist.

Remington would have seen plenty of Indians. General Nelson Miles, who became the artist's friend in 1886, had captured Chief Joseph of the Nez Perce in 1877, but by now had left Fort Keogh. The Blackfeet, the Crows, and the Sioux were assigned to reservations. "Bad men" were commonplace. Emma Caten in her manuscript for the National Cyclopedia of American Biography wrote that the first real soldiers Remington saw were in Montana, escorting General Sherman between army posts. The officer Remington saw was probably not Sherman but Philip Sheridan, leading President Arthur's party through Montana to Yellowstone National Park in 1881.

The battlefield where George Armstrong Custer had been killed only five years earlier was less than 100 miles from Miles City. By 1881, there were crosses for the soldiers' graves and a log pyramid for the horse bones but most of the real loot was gone. Years later, Remington gave Adirondacks guide, Hans Rasbeck, an old Colt .45, remarking, "Here, have this. I picked it up off the battlefield of the Little Big Horn, where Custer died."

The two other references to the trip occurred in magazine pieces written by Remington. In 1890, his fine report on Nelson Miles, "Chasing a Major-General," contained the comment that "some ten years since in this very State of Montana" a careless overusage of a horse put him on foot, "a thing I have treasured in mind, and will not have repeated." The Western pony bought casually had foundered where his large-boned Eastern mount might not have. Similarly, in his article "Vagabonding with the Tenth Horse" in 1897, Remington noted that "after I left school I did considerable of this bobity-bob [riding] over the great strange stretches of the high plains, and I have never found anything else so fascinating. . . ."

As Remington said in Collier's he began on this Montana trip "to try to record some facts around me" through sketches. He also determined to offer the sketches for publication, despite his still amateurish drawing.

One of these sketches came to W. A. Rogers, the senior staff artist for Harper's Weekly, who remembered: "When I first met Frederic Remington he was already known the world over for his pictures of Western life. He recalled to me a little sketch on wrapping paper, all scrambled up in a small envelope, which he had mailed to the Harpers some years before from out in Wyoming. He felt he was taking a long chance. I remembered with how much pleasure I had made a drawing on wood from that little crumpled sketch. . . . "

The Harper art director, Charles Parsons, considered that he "had never received anything as informal and was intrigued by the Wyoming postmark." He sent Remington in Wyoming a larger envelope with a check and tear sheet. That brought Remington to New York "with a portfolio. . . ."

The circumstances Rogers and Parsons described were basically correct but it was not exactly the sequence of the events. Remington was back in Albany by October 18, 1881, writing to his uncle, Horace Sackrider, on the stationery of the State of New York, Insurance Department:

". . . I have an appointment to go to New York soon to see George William Curtis of Harpers Weekly in order to see if that co will publish some work of mine. It would be a good scheme if I could get something in there. . ."

The "little sketch on wrapping paper" was not published in Harper's Weekly until February 25, 1882. It was printed as a full page titled Cow-boys of Arizona: Roused by a Scout and was credited as "Drawn by W A Rogers from a sketch by Frederic Remington." Rather than a tear sheet of the page printed in February, Parsons would have sent Remington a proof of the Rogers wood engraving. And, if Parsons mailed this response to Wyoming, it would have arrived after Remington was back in Albany and would have had to be forwarded. If all these contingencies really did take place, Remington would then have gone with his portfolio to see editor Curtis under the sponsorship of Parsons but it is more likely that the appointment was made through a relative of Curtis who had been one of the many friends of Remington's late father. Whatever the means, the Curtis appointment did not help. It was three years before another sketch appeared.

Cow-boys of Arizona is, of course, an unusual title for a sketch made in Montana or Wyoming. The reason for the title was that Harper's Weekly as a national newspaper kept a quantity of drawings on hand to supplement stories. In this instance the story was about the Southwest so the sketch was titled to suit the locale. Remington was fortunate to have had his sketch assigned to Rogers who had himself been in the West as a Harper's correspondent. It has been said that Remington was incensed that his sketch had been redrawn before publication but in truth his technique was quite unprofessional in 1881 and any young illustrator would have welcomed the opportunity to be published. Remington's second illustration in 1885 was also redrawn and so were some of his sketches as late as the fall of 1886.

The question remains, did Remington really go to Montana for a vacation in the late summer of 1881? It is odd he wrote no letter that has been preserved, either from the West or about what he saw. The number of surviving Remington letters is huge; the authors have themselves recorded 1,200 from him or to him. It is strange that Remington did not use his Montana experiences directly in his later articles. There is no artifact he collected during the trip, other than the unlikely Colt, in contrast to his later avidity for Western material.

The answer would have to be that he did go, given these circumstances: He mailed a letter from Wyoming. The autobiographical piece in Collier's placed him in Montana. The two asides in Western articles are clear. He left Canton about August 10 and he was back in Albany before October 18.

This trip was an incident in a directionless period in Frederic Remington's life. It exposed him to the West at a time when he could have seen a million buffalo, a landscape of Montana yellow grass and sagebrush and the plains, Indians still wild and armed with Winchesters, trappers in an abundant wilderness, an unfenced cattle range, and Indian-fighting cavalrymen to remind him of his father the late Colonel. At the time it was certainly not to him "the living, breathing end of three American centuries," nor was it yet "the foundation of his art," but he did see the old West whose artistic historian he became.

MOTORING IN YELLOWSTONE, 1921

ALL CARS STOP HERE
NORTH ENTRANCE

In 1977, a total of 520,869 automobiles passed through the four entrances to Yellowstone National Park, the nation's oldest national park and still one of its most popular. The cars were bolstered by 200,489 recreational vehicles and some 3,000 buses of both commercial and non-commercial variety. The result was a visitation by literally millions of people.

Fifty-six years earlier, in 1921, nearly 82,000 persons visited Yellowstone, and while many of them still arrived by Burlington, Northern Pacific and Union Pacific Railroad, almost 55,000 of them came by automobile, a record. Some 15,800 cars carried these eager tourists, their high-wheeled cars ranging, alphabetically, from an obscure machine called an Acme (there was only one) to Willys-Knight (there were 159 of these).

These prideful figures, and much more, are contained in the official 1921 information release of Yellowstone Superintendent Horace Albright, a distinguished career officer who, through the years, has maintained his deep interest in Yellowstone. Recently, he wrote the Society's publications division from his home in California that he and his wife "of some 63 years" are in generally good health, but since travel has become hazardous for them, 1977 was the first time in many years that they were unable to come to Yellowstone.

Albright, who was in charge of Yellowstone from 1919 to 1929 and later became the second director of the National Park Service, wrote a totally informative report in 1921, carefully listing travel by states (broken down as to whether by car or rail) and indeed by country, for there were over 100 visitors from such far-away places as Australia and South Africa, and even one from Russia. Albright's carefully kept figures make for fascinating reading and a chance for nostalgia.

"Though the total gain in tourists for the season is not large," Albright said in his beginning remarks, "the increase of 2,158 automobiles carrying 7,684 passengers is the outstanding feature of American tourist travel during the summer, which has been marked by financial difficulties and other adverse travel conditions."

Obviously, this increase in tourists driving their own cars brought new concerns to the superintendent and his staff. "It has made it necessary," Albright wrote, "to plan extensive developments of hotel and camp accommodations and other facilities. Motoring seems to be the most popular means of touring the country and high railroad rates may be partly responsible for this. Motorists as a rule carried their own camping equipment, but many took advantage of the large hotels and permanent camps, both of which rendered excellent service at very reasonable rates."

Pointing out that the motorists represented "all classes of people" and that the greatest numbers came from California, Oregon, Washington, the Dakotas and Illinois, Albright pointed with pride to the forward-looking policies he was administering: "The National Park Service, fully anticipating the tremendous growth in automobile touring was prepared to direct in the interest of safety the stream of motor cars as they toured the park highways, and accidents were rare events. The roads were kept in splendid condition by many small road crews established and sanitation conditions improved as the motorists thronged the park."

For oldsters or old car buffs, Albright's list of automobile names would in itself be enough to catch the eye. It is perhaps a harbinger of things to come to point out that in 1921, familiar names of cars as we know them today led the list of registrants: there were 1,871 Buicks, 403 Cadillacs, 469 Chevrolets, 1,459 Dodges, 4,592 Fords, and 335 Oldsmobiles.

But then there were hundreds of others, recalled but dimly by any American save those whose hobby is vintage automobiles. Here's the alphabetical list, except those already mentioned, with the number of registrants in 1921: Abbot-Detroit (1), Allen (19), American (1), Apperson (26), Auburn (46), Briscoe (13), Carter-Car (2), Case (36), Chalmers (120), Chandler (257), Cleveland (50), Cole (98), Columbia (13), Crow-Elkhart (8), Daniels (2), Davis (7), Day Elder (6), Dort (51), Elcar (6), Elgin (33), Empire (1), Essex (152), Franklin (237), Garford (1), G.M.C. (1), Grant (28), Haynes (86), Holmes (3), Home Made (71), Hudson (404), Hupmobile (235), International (10), Jackson (5), Jeffrey (19), Jordan (45), King (10), Kissel-Kar (26), Lafayette (1).

Lexington (40), Liberty (30), Lincoln (7), Locomobile (8), Lozier (8), McFarlane (1), McLaughlin (6), Mack Truck (1), Marion-Handley (1), Marmon (85), Master (1), Maxwell (202), Mercer (8), Metz (3), Mitchell (84), Molene Knight (5), Monroe (2), Moon (3), Nash (366), National (21), Oakland (216), Olympic (1), Overland (447), Packard (116), Paige (154), Pan American (6), Pathfinder (2), Patterson (5), Peerless (38), Pierce Arrow (50), Pilot (2), Premier (26), Regal (2), Reo (285), Republic (2), Roamer (6), Saxon (30), Scripps-Booth (27), Standard (3), Stanley Steamer (1), Stearns Knight (19), Stevens (58), Stevens-Knight (2), Studebaker (673), Stutz (25), Velie (82), Westscott (7), White (26), and Winton (27).

One more prideful statistic in the 1921 report: on August 8, a total of 1,659 persons registered at park gateways, the largest number for a single day in the history of Yellowstone, which that year was 49 years old. And as though reenforcing Albright's belief that his beloved park was becoming more and more a playground for the average man and his family, his list of cars noted that only one Rolls Royce had rolled through the gates of Yellowstone.

MONTANA'S FAMED RESTORER PASSES

Charles A. Bovey, a modest man whose accomplishments in the field of historical restoration touched the lives of all of us in Montana and thousands of others throughout the country, died suddenly in June at his home in Nevada City. This mining camp, a few miles up storied Alder Gulch in which fabulous gold strikes were made in 1863, was the particular love of Bovey, who since 1946 had been intent upon the restoration of Virginia City and Nevada City, the twin camps of the gulch where so much early Montana history was made.

Aside from their contributions in collecting and restoration, Charlie Bovey and his wife, Sue, have served the Historical Society in countless ways, including membership on and presidency of our Board of Trustees.

Charles Argalis Bovey was born in Minneapolis and was educated at the Blake School in that city and at Philips Academy in Massachusetts. He came to Great Falls in 1928 and was first associated with the Royal Milling Company. In 1933, he married Rachel Sue Ford, granddaughter of pioneer rancher and banker, Robert S. Ford.

Bovey was elected to the Montana House of Representatives in 1942, and in 1946 took a seat in the Senate which he held for the next two decades. Meanwhile, the deep interest of both Boveys led them to begin collecting small historical items and eventually entire buildings, which resulted in the opening of Old Town at the fairgrounds in Great Falls. Their philosophy, that the fun of collecting really begins when it is shared, led to the beginnings of restoration at Virginia City.

In 1960, because of expansion at the fairgrounds in Great Falls, the Boveys began moving the Old Town exhibits to form the nucleus for restoring Nevada City, just up Alder Gulch from Virginia City. Again the key was authenticity, by moving entire buildings and restoring whenever possible original structures.

Many honors came to Charlie Bovey in his lifetime, including an honorary master of arts degree conferred on both him and his wife by Montana State University. If any Montanan ever left a perpetual monument, however, it is this soft-spoken, unpretentious man who didn't merely mouth such platitudes as "someone had better restore and preserve this before it's too late." He did do something about it, and left a legacy that, thanks to his partner, Sue, their son, Ford, and a coterie of dedicated people who have worked with them, will continue and grow.

Oral History Seed Project Underway This Summer

For several years historians and Montanans interested in preserving the state's most fragile historical resource, personal reminiscences, have tried unsuccessfully to begin a major oral history project. A recent development holds out hope that a full-scale oral history project in Montana may yet become a reality. The Montana Committee for the Humanities, a federally funded agency which has consistently aided the cause of history, has approved a pilot project to begin this summer.

Dr. Jeffrey J. Safford of Montana State University's history department, a recognized authority on oral history, is the director of the Montana Oral History Seed Project. The purpose of the program is twofold. The first intent is to conduct interviews with individuals who have served in the Montana Legislature or have an intimate knowledge of legislative politics and procedures. The second purpose is to demonstrate the feasibility of a statewide oral history project, such as the ones operating in North and South Dakota, Texas, and other western states.

"We hope to establish the importance of oral history and the urgency of beginning a major statewide program," Dr. Safford explained. "Oral history is complicated and expensive, but there is really no other way to acquire the personal history of Montana."

"Our intent this summer is to select ten or so of the most important legislative personnel of the last two decades and interview them on a wide range of topics," Safford explained. "What we want to know is the inner history of the Legislature, how legislative procedures and exercise of political power have changed over the years. The people we interview are the ones who truly know."

Once the interviews have been completed and transcripts have been prepared, the tapes and original typescripts will be deposited in the Montana Historical Society Archives. Some interviewees may place restrictions on the use of typescripts by researchers, which it is their prerogative to do, but it is expected that most of the interviews will be available for immediate use.

The Montana Oral History Seed Project grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities will be administered by The Council to Preserve Montana History, a non-profit organization composed of historians, teachers, librarians, local historical societies, archivists and historic preservationists from throughout the state. The Council has been one of the chief sponsors of the annual Montana History Conference.

If all goes as planned, Project Director Safford expects the inteviews to be completed and transcribed by early autumn. Whether a full-scale oral history program develops in the future will depend to a large extent on the public and legislative response to the seed project.

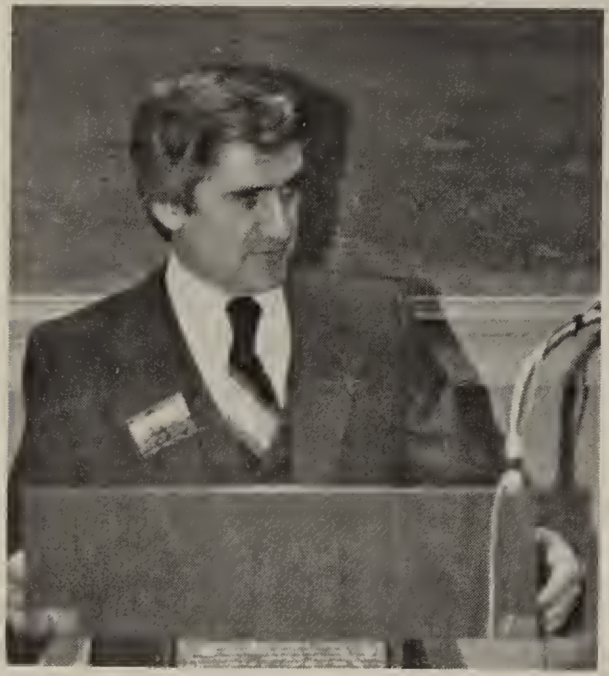
WASHINGTON OFFICIALS INSPIRE MONTANANS TO HISTORIC PRESERVATION

Meeting in Helena's Montana Club was appropriate, for the topic of discussion in a two day workshop, May 1 and 2, was historic preservation in Montana. The fifty or more who attended received valuable information on the processes, requirements, and goals of historic preservation from the nation's most knowledgable preservationists, representatives of the Office of Archeology and Historic Preservation (OAHP) in Washington, D.C.



JERRY ROGERS

Historic preservation in American communities is one of the most exciting popular movements to emerge in recent years. Only two decades ago historic structures or districts in urban and rural areas stood little chance when progress demanded demolition. Even urban renewal programs which pledged to protect historic buildings allowed many treasures to be lost. But now there is clear evidence that citizens throughout the nation do not want novelty at the expense of their heritage; they are willing to organize, study and work to preserve the physical remains of yesteryear in their own communities.

"The inspiration and work of historic preservation," Jerry Rogers, Chief of OAHP, commented when he was in Helena, "is not to be found in the offices of preservation programs at the federal or state level; it is literally at the grassroots—in local preservation committees, historical societies and other community groups." Mr. Rogers and other OAHP personnel came to Helena as resource persons, and the message they delivered was optimistic and supportive of current preservation efforts in Montana.

"All of the elements are here in Montana," Rogers remarked, "for one of the most successful preservation programs in the nation." The truth of Rogers' statement was evident as the workshop participants enumerated viable historic sites and districts, ranging from uptown Butte to archaelogical dig sites in the remotest corners of the state. These historic areas, however, will be protected only after official designation under one of several statutes enacted to protect historic places.

Kate Cole, from the National Register of Historic Places, explained all of the steps necessary to nominate a building or site to the National Register. Each state has a State Historic Preservation Officer and a State Review Board which pass nominations on to Washington for approval. Once a site is on the Register, Ms. Cole explained, preservation funds and technical advice are available from several sources.

"Our main purpose," Ms. Cole stated, "is to protect historic places, not to lock them up and discourage use, and not to restore places which are no longer historic in nature." More and more the emphasis is on maintaining historic buildings and districts for use. If an historic structure is usable as a business or domicile, that is the best means to protect it.

Places which qualify for historic preservation recognition are often surprising, it was pointed out. Historic buildings, sites where important events took place, the birthplace of important persons, and archaeological remains of long passed cultures, are all familiar; but what about bridges, railroad trestles and even industrial machinery? T. Allan Comp of the Historic American Engineering Record assured everyone that they also qualify, and he urged that these sites be identified and protected. In Montana that might mean an old ferry, century-old mining machinery, or perhaps a streetcar from fifty years ago.

In two days of meetings and discussions, OAHP representatives advised Montana preservationists on how they can best protect the state's historic treasures, and those who have already begun projects described their experiences. Darrell McDaniel from the Butte District Office of BLM explained how a few individuals helped to save the mining ghost town of Garnet. The late Charles Bovey, Dick Pace and John Ellingson gave everyone insights into the successful restorations at Virginia and Nevada City. Dick Ellis and Roy Herseth from the Montana Fish and Game Department described the state's preservation effort at Bannack.

All in all, it was an exciting two days, the visiting experts agreeing that Montana's storied friendship is easily translatable into meaningful action when it comes to regard for the past.

HAYNES ART GALLERY OPENS

"The art collection we will be privileged to see today represents only a portion of the entire Haynes collection which has been given to the Society through the generosity of Isabel Haynes." With these words on Sunday, April 23, Montana Historical Society Board President Toni Hagener of Havre began the formal opening ceremonies of the new Haynes Art Gallery on the main floor of the Society's building in Helena.

It was an opening which had long been anticipated, and it was a proud day for Isabel Haynes, widow of the late Yellowstone Park photographer, Jack Ellis Haynes. This gracious donation to the Society is the result of over a century's interest in art, stretching from pioneer photographer Frank J. Haynes to his son, Jack Ellis Haynes, and finally, Isabel Haynes. The art collection, numbering over 400 pieces, will fill the gallery on a rotating basis and is now open to the public for viewing at no charge.

"To say that the Society is honored and appreciative of this gift," Mrs. Hagener commented, "is an understatement, and the words thank you seem decidedly inadequate." It was obvious to all in attendance that Mrs. Haynes was pleased and gratified to see the art she has preserved and nurtured for so many years now on public display. Before she cut the ribbon inaugurating the gallery, Mrs. Haynes welcomed visitors and invited them to "enjoy these works of art as much as I have over the years."

Over 500 hundred persons attended the opening and were treated to works by O. C. Seltzer, E. S. Paxson, Thomas Moran, Conrad Schwiering, Robert F. Morgan, Elizabeth Lochrie, and many other western artists. No visitor was disappointed in what they saw, and many

Arrangements for luncheon and dinner events are planned, but all art showings and sales will be held at the galleries of the Montana Historical Society. Proceeds will go to the Montana Heritage Foundation which will earmark funds to promote the Society's commitment to preserving Montana history in its galleries and museums. commented on the tremendous range of subjects, media, and artistic styles represented in the collection.

After the ribbon-cutting ceremony, Mrs. Haynes greeted each visitor personally in the gallery foyer, a wonderful opportunity for everyone to meet the individual who has cared for these paintings so well over the years. Mrs. John Baucus and Mrs. George Beall, along with other members of the Society's docent group, coordinated the reception for Mrs. Haynes, including the use of the magnificent silver service from the U.S.S. MONTANA and the U.S.S. HELENA.

Much of the success of the gallery opening was due to the hard work of the volunteer group, according to Museum Curator Mike McCourt. "It would be just impossible," he added, "for us to host receptions of this nature without the pleasant and efficient work of our docents."

It should be pointed out, parenthetically, that McCourt, Jim Werner and others of the Society staff put in a great many hours themselves just before the opening, made necessary by the late arrival of carpeting for the gallery. Working almost around the clock, they were able to finish last-minute details—literally, at the last minute.

Mrs. Haynes and close associates from Bozeman were the guests of the Society's Board at a dinner Saturday evening, held at the newly restored Bluestone House close by Helena's famous fire tower, with Society Director Ken Korte as host.

When the opening day activities were over, the many persons who participated throughout the week-end could only agree with Mrs. Hagener's opening remarks: "The words thank you seem decidedly inadequate."

TWO DEDICATED VOLUNTEERS HONORED BY SOCIETY

Over the years many individuals have donated their time and energy to the Montana Historical Society. In fact it is difficult to imagine many Society operations continuing without volunteer help, and the Society has always been appreciative. Two current volunteers, however, have contributed an extraordinary amount of time and talent, behind the scenes, and in recognition of their commitment and labors, the Society recently bestowed life memberships on Wilbur McKinney and Joan Bishop, both of Helena.

Wilbur McKinney, a retired employee of the National Weather Service, has been a volunteer in the library and archives since 1975. He contributes nearly twenty hours a week helping photograph archivist Lory Morrow sort and preserve photographs. But Mac has also worked for the library staff, and recently completed an index to Burlingame and Toole's History of Montana.

WILBUR McKINNEY

"I just enjoy this kind of work," Mac says, "and it gives me something very purposeful to do. I particularly like working with eastern Montana photos, pictures of life as it was on the homesteads." Mac's wife, Patricia McKinney, is a historian in her own right. In 1972 she completed Presbyterianism in Montana: Its First Hundred Years. Mac and his wife fill what little spare time they can find hiking in Glacier or travelling through the country.

Joan Bishop, wife of a Helena physician, also works in the archives as a volunteer. A graduate of the University of California at Berkeley and a former teacher, Mrs. Bishop just naturally followed her interests in history when she and her husband located in Helena. After taking several classes at Carroll College, Joan began working as a volunteer in 1975.

Because she has an avid interest in researching and writing local history, Joan offered her time to the archives where she has helped in processing manuscript collections. "I guess I enjoy archival work," Mrs. Bishop commented, "because it is history in the first person—the raw material for historical writing." Since volunteering, Joan has processed two collections, the Society of Montana Pioneers and the John H. Shober Family papers.

In addition to her volunteer work, Mrs. Bishop also pursues her own research. The product of those labors will be read by subscribers to MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY in the upcoming issue in an article entitled, "A Season of Trial: Helena's Entrepreneurs Nurture a City." And now she is at work on another research project—this time tracking down the elusive activities of early day livestock detectives.

JOAN BISHOP

The Historical Society, it goes without saying, is fortunate to have dedicated volunteers such as Wilbur McKinney and Joan Bishop, but there are other volunteers at the Society who may work fewer hours but with no less enthusiasm and dedication. The docents and others who volunteer their energies make it possible for the Montana Historical Society, with limited funding and staff, to better fulfill its goals.

AMERICAN LEGION DONATES ARCHIVAL MATERIALS

There is always a story of one sort or another behind the acquisition of archival materials, and the recent donation of American Legion records to the Society Archives proves to be no exception to the rule. The story begins with one of the Historical Society's perennial problems—space. The museum vault, which holds some of the Society's most valuable collections of art and artifacts, was filled to overflowing. Something had to be removed. Since the American Legion had stored various materials in the vault for many years which were not part of the Society's collections, it was decided that the American Legion would have to find another storage area.

Tony Cumming, American Legion Department Adjutant for Montana, now had the arduous task of sorting through the mass of Legion materials and decide what to retain and what to discard. It was this forced inventory which led Cumming and Assistant Archivist Jeff Cunniff to discover a genuine treasure in old records, photographs, correspondence files, and other archival materials. "They had been in the vault for so long," Cunniff remarked, "that no one really knew what was there."

After a careful sorting and ordering had been accomplished, Cumming and Cunniff finally identified over forty cubic feet of significant material—records which should be preserved and processed for use by historians. Acting on behalf of the American Legion in Montana, Tony Cumming donated these records to the Society Archives.

"The records we found in the vault genuinely surprised us," archivist Cunniff commented. "For anyone wishing to research the activities of the Legion and other Montana veterans organizations, these materials—and there is quite a bit here—are essential."

The American Legion collection contains materials relating to veterans, from Civil War times to the 1950s. Most of the Legion records document meetings, conventions, and encampments in Montana. But there are also some 300 photographs of Legion activities, including conventions, encampments, and drill team competitions, as well as pamphlets and other items relating to these events. The Legion's ancillary organizations are also represented in the collection, including Boy's State, Girl's State, American Legion baseball, and the Democracy Essay contest manuscripts.

Perhaps the most interesting records donated by the Legion are their cemetery plot registers. These registers locate and identify the graves of Legion members in cemeteries all over Montana. Cemetery records for Wolf Creek, Silver, Craig, Marysville, Lincoln, and many other communities are represented.

In addition to Legion material, there are records of meetings and activities of the Grand Army of the Republic, including photographs and administrative records. Over one cubic foot of records document the Montana chapter of the Spanish-American War Veterans organization. And Chester Shore, long time Legion official and former editor of the Montana Legionnaire, donated to the Society three well preserved military uniforms dating from the Indian Wars period and Spanish-American War period.

In all, the American Legion collection is a significant addition to the Society's collections. Once the archivists have processed the materials, it is hoped that historians and researchers will take advantage of them.

Two significant historical objects donated to the Society's collections by veterans organizations include a Revolutionary War era American flag and, from the C. K. Warren Post of the American Legion of Fort Benton, a colorful Grand Army of the Republic encampment banner.

MIKE McCOURT NAMED CURATOR

In unanimous action at its meeting Saturday, April 22, the Society's Board of Trustees named Mike McCourt Curator of the Museums division. A talented and versatile young man who is a native of Cut Bank, Montana, McCourt has seen service with the Society since student days at Helena's Carroll College, learning the basics of exhibit design from former curator Bob Morgan. In 1974, he joined us as a permanent staffer, and for the past year has been Acting Curator.

Son of Mr. and Mrs. Jim McCourt of Cut Bank, Mike graduated from Carroll in 1969 and spent the next four years teaching in Eureka and Browning, all the while retaining his hope that he could return to the museum field. Aside from his obvious talents as an exhibits specialist, he is a fine photographer and fills many of the Society's needs in that field.

Continuing on the museum staff will be Jim Werner, a highly creative exhibits artisan who has worked with McCourt in enhancing many of our displays, including the gallery-within-a-gallery concept in the C. M. Russell room, and the recently completed Haynes Gallery, dedicated April 23.

CARVERS ON STONE MAY HAVE LEFT

by MERRILL G. BURLINGAME
Prof. of History Emeritus
Montana State University, Bozeman

A curiosity concerning the nature of origins appears to be as much a part of society as it is of the individual. "Who came first?" is always a question of interest. This becomes important when the pioneer is known, the reason for his coming is clear, and the results of his expedition are apparent. Lewis and Clark and David Thompson are important because of the remarkable record which they made, and the continuing action which this inspired.

Over a period of years a number of imprints of early dates and names have surfaced which appear to give "flash" glimpses of early visitors to what is now Montana. We are slowly discovering new maps and narratives which reveal a knowledge of our area earlier than our present records support. Perhaps some of these early explorers or passersby left an occasional record such as those described here. This brief compilation is presented to members of the Montana Historical Society in the hope that someone may have information which will help solve the riddle of these inscriptions. Other such artifacts must still be scattered in fields, caves, yards and barns. If those who know of them will pass the information on to the Society staff, it may be possible to push the curtain back a little further concerning who visited us in an early day, why, and from whence they came.

Any artifact such as those discussed here immediately, of course, becomes suspect. One's first thought often is that this must be the work of a waggish mountainman, a sheepherder, or perhaps a military scout with time on his hands. Indeed, although considerable scrutiny has been given each inscription, every one remains a mystery. A few of those legible enough to be photographed (with some intensification of the lettering) are included here, but in most cases, details about location have purposely been withheld to protect the inscription. The reader's best guesses, and particularly information concerning other such inscriptions, will be welcomed.

IN NORTH CENTRAL MONTANA: THE EARLIEST

The earliest date in the group at hand is 1713, which is early indeed, and if an explanation could be found, it would push Montana's recorded history back considerably. This date is firmly and deeply chiseled on a very hard rock weighing some sixty pounds, heavy enough so that it was certainly not carried around in a shepherd's purse for idle doodling from time to time. This rock, together with others of similar size and composition, was found near the barns on the Allen Kolstad Farms, some twenty-five miles southwest of Chester. Discovered in August, 1958, they had probably been pushed aside a number of years before when the buildings were constructed. The bold lettering reads, "JHN NOV. 1713." The Kolstads placed this first in the Toole County Museum in Shelby, and it is now in the Museum in Chester. Clyde Reichelt's article in the Great Falls Tribune, September 21, 1958, gave the first publicity to its existence.

IN NORTHWEST MONTANA: THREE SPECIMENS

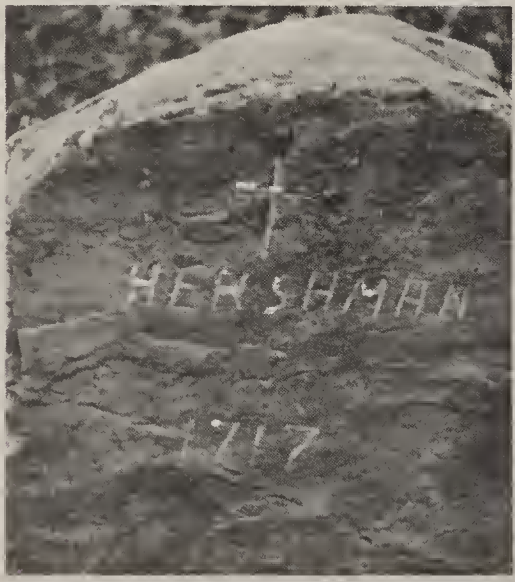
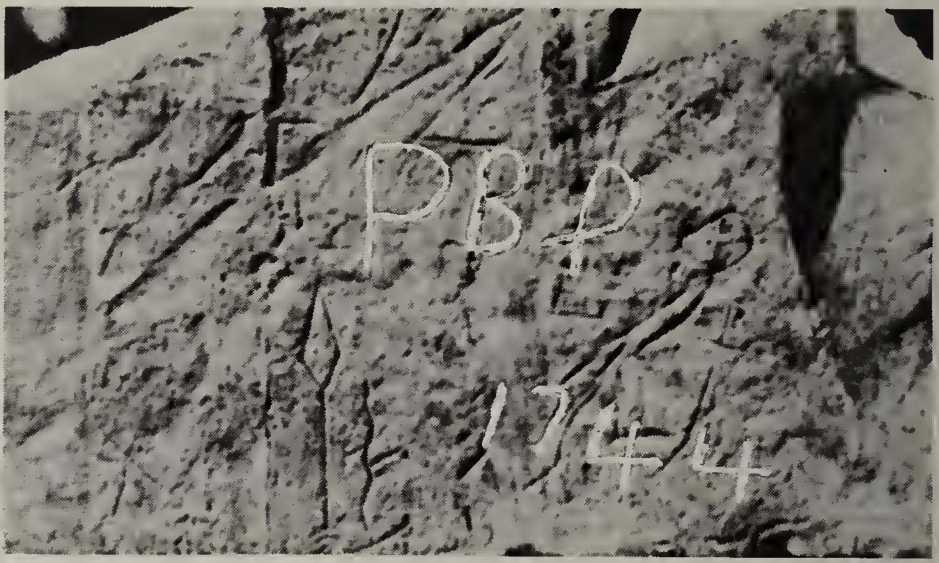
A date just four years later—1717—appears in quite a different setting. In 1968, a few miles northwest of Polson in an open forest, personnel from the Forest Service discovered a small gravestone, composed of hard native rock with a good cleavage on the back and front sides. Some ten inches across and twelve inches high above the ground, the marker has a skillfully rounded top. Inscribed in well spaced but somewhat crudely formed letters is the name "HERSHMAN." Above the name is a deeply chiseled cross, and below the name is a more lightly cut six-pointed star. If the star is intended to be a Jewish symbol, the presence of the cross raises a question. At the bottom, also lightly cut but well-fashioned, is the side view of a sitting rabbit. In the upper right hand corner of the stone what appears as "R I H" is lightly chiseled. This may have originally been the more customary gravestone marking, "R I P." The grave, still mounded with stone and soil, is of a size to indicate a child's grave, which the rabbit also suggests. The Great Falls Tribune again gave publicity to this site in an article by Helen Johnson, published November 15, 1970.



Another early date in northwest Montana was found on a hard native rock of smaller size, about fifteen inches long by ten inches wide and three inches thick. On it is inscribed "PBP 1744." The irregular face of the rock has a number of gracefully lined drawings, including a firmly outlined spear-like impression with a spear point on one end and a diamond shaped point on the other. Iven C. Herron and his son, Gordon, relate that this rock was dug out of the virgin pasture on their ranch near Kalispell, when a shallow excavation was being made for a granary.



Still another mysterious date in the area is that of 1801. This appears somewhat roughly but clearly chiseled in a large granitic rock some six feet long, four feet wide and five feet high, weighing several tons. On a slightly indented section near the top in four lines is chiseled:

J SMITH DIED
JULY 17 1801

All of this was then circled, framing an area some nineteen inches long and sixteen inches wide. This boulder was moved a short distance by John Bras of Coram in 1948 to make way for a logging road. But not until 1959 was the lichen-covered inscription discovered, when the Bras children were playing around the rock. The secret of the rock continued to be well kept. Walt Whirry of West Glacier heard rumors of it about 1975, but did not locate it until 1977. Because a new highway was projected which would endanger the boulder, he initiated an investigation. The Hungry Horse News gave it publicity in its October 27, 1977 issue, and the Highway Department agreed to protect the stone under the Antiquities Act pending further study.

DIM EVIDENCE OF OUR FIRST VISITORS

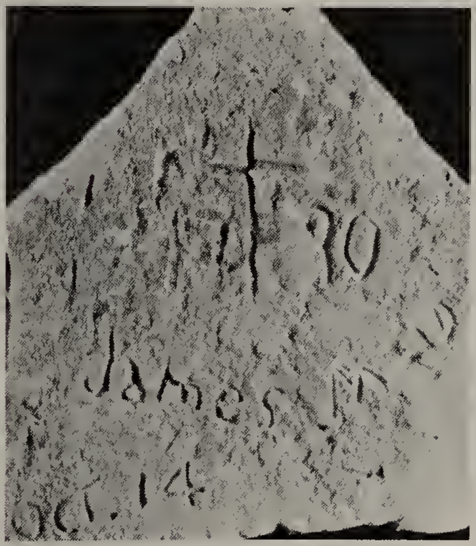
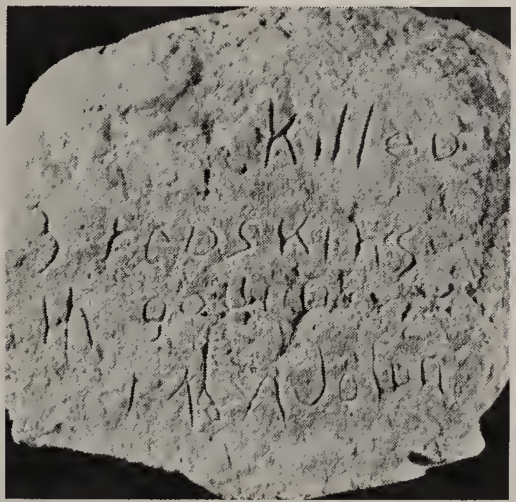
Inquiry has been made to the Hudson's Bay Company central offices and library in Winnipeg concerning all the specimens found in this region. It is their judgment that none are related to Canadian expansion since at that time their fur companies were more interested in the area north of the Saskatchewan watershed. David Thompson and others did, however, investigate northwest Montana around the turn of the century.

IN EASTERN MONTANA: EVIDENCE OF DISASTER

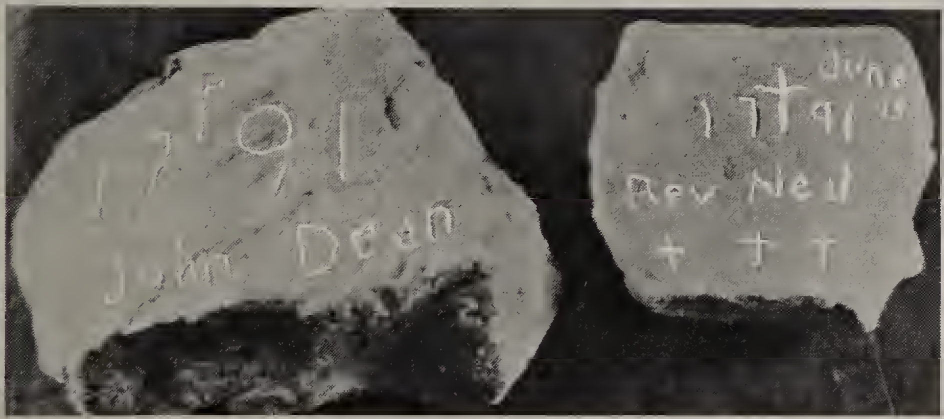
Eastern Montana yielded a spectacular discovery in 1956 when members of the Leslie Baird family were clearing a stone outcrop in a cultivated field on their ranch near Wibaux. An astonishing number of soft sandstone rocks showing skillful handwork appeared strewn over the outcropping, or lying just under the surface.

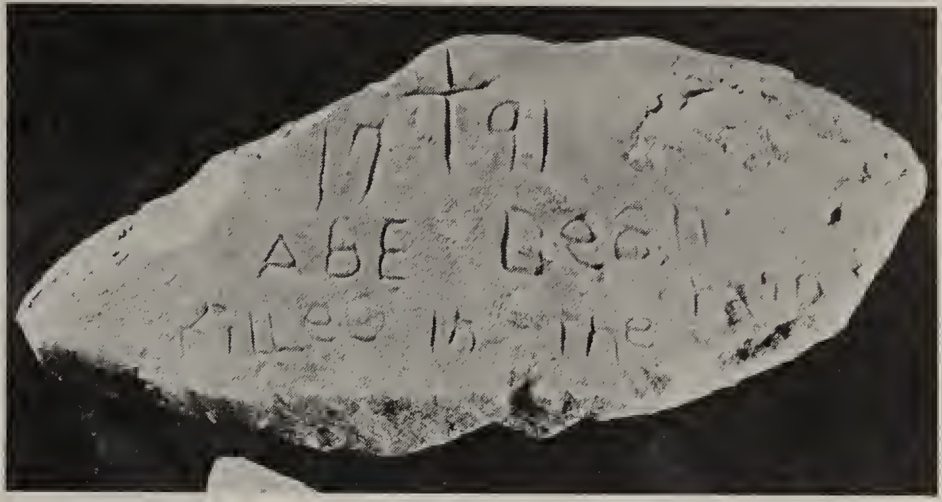


Several of the stones, of a size which can be held in the palm of a hand, have inscriptions carrying the dates 1790 or 1791. These seem to point toward a disaster in 1791 involving two or more families, and at least two women. In addition to names and dates, one or more crosses appear on each stone. Usually the cross is placed at midpoint in the date - "17 + 91." The eleven rocks bearing inscriptions read as follows: 17 + 90 JAMES MEAD Oct. 14. 17 + 91 June 19 REV. NEIL. (Three crosses are below the name). 17 + 91 JOHN DEAN. 17 + 91 ABE DEAN Killed in the raid. 17 + 91 BEN DEAN Killed in the raid. 17 + 91 MAY DEAN Killed in the raid. 17 + 91 JOHN PIKE Killed in the raid. 17 + 91 GEORGE PIKE Killed in the raid. 17 + 91 MARY WATSON Killed in the raid. Another rock of similar size contains the cryptic remark, "Killed 3 redskins . . . John." This rock also contains some stylistic chiseling. Still another reads, "planted bean on May 10."



Casual scrutiny of the rocks fails to reveal significant clues as to origin. Lettering style does not seem distinctive, and instances of differences among the letters appear to be what might be expected. Examination revealed a few traces of iron filing in the deeper cuts, indicating that a metal knife had been used. The "Rev. Neil" rock raises the question again of the use of the cross. American Protestants at this time did not customarily use the cross in personal symbolism, and Roman Catholics would more likely have used "Fr." than "Rev." However, if these people had been Church of England adherents, coming through Canada, the inscription can be explained.





In addition to the rocks which are lettered, a large number of smaller size, a hundred or more, contain delicate petroglyph carvings. One group contains carvings of animals, particularly turtles. These have been compared by Smithsonian technicians with the work of northern plains Indians and have been found to bear close resemblance. Another group of even smaller size, two inches or less across, are of a medallion type, bearing line patterns of various kinds. The stylistic ornamentation appears to be the work of white men. Many of these have carefully drilled holes through which a thong can be drawn to make a well-balanced pendant. These rocks are now on display in the Glendive Museum. A short, well-illustrated description is to be found in Irene James Jones, "Trails Along Beaver Creek, A Chronicle of Wibaux County," published in 1976.

IN THE UPPER YELLOWSTONE: A BONANZA

The Yellowstone country has produced seven dates in the mid-1800's. The earliest, 1825, appears on a large rock weighing several hundred pounds, imbedded in a creek bank overhang. The rock is marked at the top with a firmly and deeply cut X, and in large uncertainly spaced letters the first name of LAWRENCE is clear. Underneath, the last name seems to have two or three letters weathered out, leaving clearly ERSON. On the third line the 1825 date appears. About a quarter of a mile away is a dugout in the same formation which has the appearance of having been used many years ago. This inscription is on the farm of Lester Engdahl near Jordan, who with his not-so-near neighbor, William Dutton, has been interested in the inscription for a number of years.

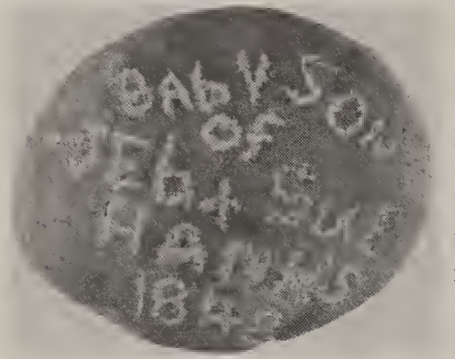
TEXT CONTINUES →

Three inscriptions bear the date 1841. The most imposing of these is carved on a rock about two feet high, fifteen inches across, and twelve inches thick. It was found in May, 1952, by Dudley White and Finch Brown of Columbus and Fred Krieg of Billings, on Hensley Creek, four miles east of Columbus. This bears the inscription "R. R. CHEN, DIED JUNE 1, 1841." The men took the rock to the little pioneer cemetery east of Park City, but concern for its safety led to its later removal to the Rimrocks Museum in Billings. A short note and photograph in MONTANA the magazine of Western History, Vol. II, No. 3, July, 1952, failed to elicit any information.

Another inscription with the 1841 date has been considered to be in the realm of a hoax—perhaps a throw-away piece by someone whiling away an evening around a campfire as late as 1900. The record of this rock comes from the Big Timber Pioneer of July 5, 1913. The article comments that John Peterson brought from the Crazy Mountains a piece of sandstone some twelve inches across, with the inscription, "RAB - US SCOUT - 1841." This probably does not designate a death, but rather, if it is genuine, that Scout RAB slept here.

Some support for scouts in the region comes from the presence of ten or twelve graves some twenty miles south of Brockway, each with markers of native rock slabs. A few contain inscriptions suggesting military abbreviations, but no dates. Some distance from these is one which contains the inscription "EW T 1841." Legend in the area of long standing is that these stones mark the graves of U. S. soldiers who were killed in an encounter with Indians. Miss Mary Wischman of Circle, Mrs. Dan Haughian of Terry, and Leo J. Revell of Stevensville, formerly with the Forest Service in the area, have researched this site, but are still mystified.

Another type of record is an inscription in a cave on Young's Creek, up about six miles above its junction with Tongue River. This reads "JULIUS BOHRERT 1842, BORN 1806." This was reported by Glen D. Sweem of Sheridan, Wyoming, in 1960.



A poignant record with the date of 1848 was found in the summer of 1972 on the banks of Brackett Creek just as it empties into the Shields River, by Cecil Watts, Sr., of Clyde Park. This is an elipse-shaped, stream-rounded smooth hard rock some ten inches long and seven inches wide. Inscribed rather roughly—as with a none-too-sharp-tool—is the legend, "BABY SON JEB AND SUE HANKS 1848." Members of the Hanks family in the Gallatin list early settlers in Montana, but do not find a Jeb or Sue in the family record. The last record to surface in this group, and the latest date, has been well known in Joliet, where a short distance from town is a large shale shaft standing some five feet high, two feet across and eight inches thick. This has inscribed on a broad flat surface in large letters, the legend, "R I P - JOHN DAILY - BORN 1802 - DEATH 1857."

VISIONS, EVEN, OF SPANISH GOLD

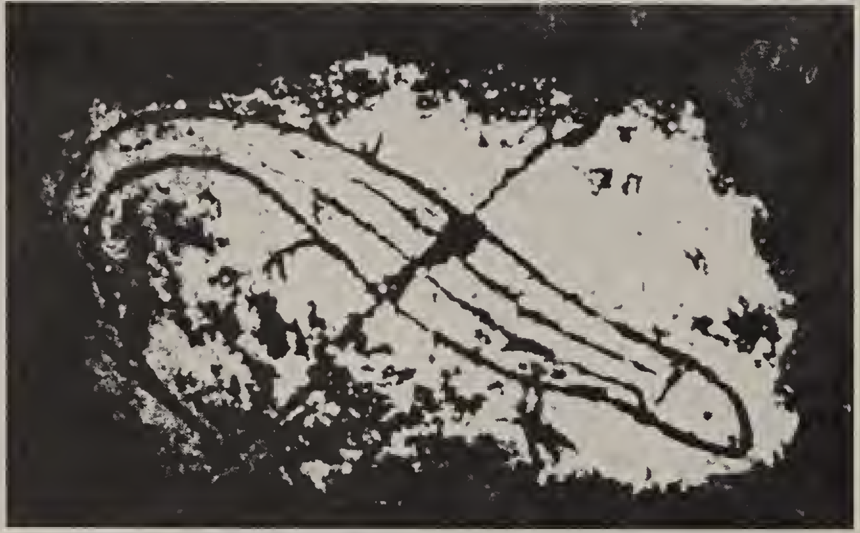
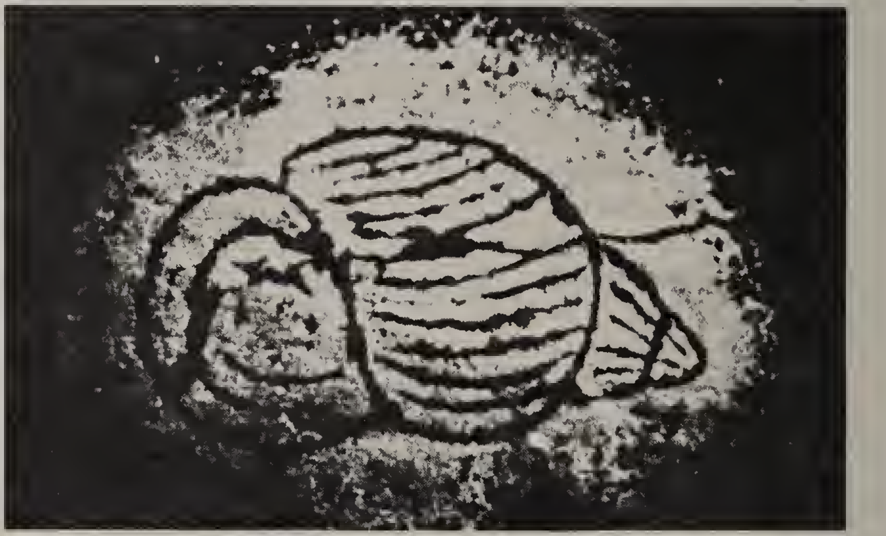
Spanish diggings yarns never fail to start the adrenalin flowing in the veins of nostalgic Montanans. Dan Cushman in the Autumn, 1959, issue of MONTANA, recalled that in 1887, near Racetrack Lake in the Flint Creek Range south of Deer Lodge, prospectors came upon a 200-foot mine shaft which they judged to be at least fifty years old. The timbering resembled that seen in Mexico, and a hand-fashioned drinking cup of silver was found in the mine. And there are some remains and many legends of Spanish arastras in the lower Madison Valley in the shadow of the Spanish Peaks. In the nearby Bear Trap Canyon is the dim but clearly traceable roadway which winds along the mountainside amid many prospector's diggings. Adjacent is a segment of a well-constructed canal, untraceable at either end. Here also is an old but well-defined road leading high on the mountain. Standing squarely in the middle of the road in 1960 was the decaying stump of a pine tree containing at least 100 annual growth rings.

Never before has there been such an interest in not only trying to solve the mysteries of who was first among us but in preserving the evidences that we do have. The monuments and rocks we have described here, as well as the dim trails which suggest early Spanish intrusions, remain so mysterious that even our wishes to preserve them are frustrated because we do not know enough about them. Thus the priority of (1) discovery; (2) getting as many facts as possible and (3) preservation. It is a tall order for any state or region, and Montana is not alone in its search for an answer to the tantalizing question: "Who really were our first visitors?"

CASUAL C.M.R. ETCHINGS TRANSLATED INTO FINE LITHOGRAPHS



AXOLOTL - lithograph - 16" x 20½"



SNAIL SHELL - lithograph - 16" x 20½"

Cornelius F. Kelley, noted Montana industrialist, was one of C. M. Russell's many friends, and the artist and his wife were frequent guests at the Kelley estate on Swan Lake in northwestern Montana. When Kelley had a new patio poured, and while the concrete was still wet, Russell etched the images of two sea creatures, a snail and an axolotl (salamander). Thus some unusual examples of Russell's artistic skills were forever engraved. Some four decades later, intrigued with the idea of translating the etchings into lithographic art, another gifted Montana artist, Branson Stevenson of Great Falls, made careful rubbings, and using grained lithographic stones, hand-proofed them onto jet-black handmade Japanese rice paper. Each lithograph, hand-numbered and signed by Mr. Stevenson, thus represents a provocative work of art. The Montana Historical Society can offer a limited number (only 100 sets were produced before the stones were destroyed) of these unusual lithographs, singly or as a set.

GETTING AT GRASSROOTS HISTORY IN LIBBY

Local historical societies and museums serve their communities best when they involve local residents in rediscovering their own past. At the Libby Branch of the Montana Historical Society (the Army Corps of Engineers' Visitor Center at Libby Dam in the northwest corner of Montana), there has been quite a bit of activity this winter involving the Libby staff and the community as a whole. And what they have been doing could be a model for other small historical societies and museums.

Jennifer Jeffries, Libby Branch Museum Curator, initiated a program in January which coaxed older residents in Libby to talk about the often forgotten daily aspects of living as children in the area fifty or more years ago. Interviewing the elderly is certainly not new, but Ms. Jeffries and her intern on the project, Sherry L. McKean, had more in mind than just gathering historical anecdotes.

"Reminiscences of Childhood in Lincoln County," the result of interviewing elderly persons in the Libby area, is Sherry McKean's brainchild. Ms. McKean, a Libby High School graduate and now a communication arts and history student at Pacific Lutheran University in Tacoma, Washington, had an idea that elementary school children might see history in a different light if real people—neighbors, family friends, or relatives—were the source of and were part of history. In addition to Jennifer Jeffries' sound guidance, Ms. McKean also had support and encouragement from Dr. Art Martinson of the PLU history department. Sherry McKean's final product is a picture slide and coordinated tape recorded show for use in the Libby schools.

Ms. McKean interviewed six individuals in their homes about their childhoods in Libby. Asking anyone, regardless of age, to reminisce about their youngest years can have mixed results. But Sherry McKean approached her interviews in a novel manner, and her innovation was successful. Using historic children's toys from the Porter Collection, a miscellany of Libby-area memorabilia and artifacts gathered by Mr. and Mrs. Roy Porter, Ms. McKean succeeded in reviving some memories among her interviewees.

Grace Kenelty, whose reminiscences are now on tape, responded to seeing the toys with tales of her playtime as a girl. So much of what children used to do, she remarked in an interview, had a direct relationship with nature. In the early days of this century, kids entertained themselves by digging secret hideaways, painting themselves with berry juice, or even catching fish to sell in town.

When today's school kids listen to these tapes and view the slide show constructed by Sherry McKean, they can identify immediately with familiar places and people in the stories. "History has an immediacy and reality not found in books," Ms. Jeffries commented, "and it helps young people to recognize how much real history can be learned by just talking with senior citizens."

The slide and tape program is offered to Lincoln County schools free of charge by the Libby Branch of the Montana Historical Society. If other schools in Montana would like to use this material, or if they would like to see how the program operates, contact: Ms. Jennifer Jeffries, Curator, Libby Dam Visitor Center, Libby, Montana 59923.

FIFTH ANNUAL HISTORY CONFERENCE SLATED FOR BUTTE THIS FALL

Breaking with convention, the Fifth Annual Montana History Conference will be held October 26-28, 1978, in Butte, rather than in Helena where the meeting has been held since its inception in 1974. The Council to Preserve Montana History, one of the sponsors of the annual conference, has often considered moving the meeting away from Helena on an every-other-year basis, and 1978 provided the best opportunity to try a new location. The Butte conference will be headquartered at the War Bonnet Inn, with additional locations in the Mining City serving as meeting places and historical tour attractions.

As in past years, the conclave promises to be exciting for everyone interested in Montana's past, from professional historians to members of local historical societies and western history buffs. It is an opportunity to meet and learn, and one of its chief assets has been the good fellowship and sharing of knowledge which takes place between professionals and non-professionals.

Headlining the three-day meeting are three dinner speeches, each delivered by experts on topics which promise to be interesting and even controversial. On Friday, October 27, Tom Fredericks of the Department of the Interior's Office of the Solicitor for Indian Affairs will speak to a luncheon audience on the history of Indian treaties and their impact on contemporary problems. That evening the banquet address will be delivered by Dr. W. Turrentine Jackson, past president of the Western History Association and Professor of History at University of California, Davis. Dr. Jackson's subject will be historical sketches of Wells Fargo & Company operations in Montana. At Saturday's luncheon, Professor Michael P. Malone of Montana State University will speak on Butte and the controversial "copper kings."

The conference will begin on Thursday evening, October 26, with a reception sponsored by the Silver Bow Historical Society. On Friday morning two concurrent sessions are slated, one dealing with Indian treaties and the other devoted to pre-railroad transportation in Montana. After lunch two workshops are planned, one designed to aid the development of local museums in Montana and the other to the teaching of Montana history.

A special feature on Friday afternoon, at the same time as the workshops, will be a showing of the film, "The Hanging Tree," which was based on a novel by Missoula's Dorothy M. Johnson. Ms. Johnson will be present to comment on the historical nature of the story and how Hollywood handled the subject.

The topic of frontier violence will be taken up again on Saturday, October 28. In a single morning session, chaired by Professor Richard Maxwell Brown of the University of Oregon, Dr. Merrill Burlingame and Larry Pointer will discuss two distinct aspects of violence on the Montana frontier. Dr. Burlingame will present a reconsideration of the vigilante movement, while Mr. Pointer, author of a recent book on Butch Cassidy, will discuss the nature of latter day outlaws in eastern Montana and the Dakotas.

On Saturday afternoon the museum and education workshops hold their second meetings. The two museum workshops are being coordinated by Museum Curator Mike McCourt, while the two education workshops are being organized by Assistant Archivist Jeff Cunniff. It is the hope of the Historical Society that all persons interested in either workshop topic will be able to attend one or both of the sessions planned for Friday and Saturday at the War Bonnet Inn.

Two other special features of the October conference deserve mention. At last year's conference, Director Ken Korte and Board of Trustees President Toni Hagener initiated the first general Montana Historical Society meeting. The second meeting will be held, as it was last year, on Friday afternoon at the conclusion of the regular sessions. This year a new session, which it is hoped will be a regular feature of the annual conference, will provide the opportunity to amateur historians and students to present the results of their research. Three papers will be selected for presentation on Saturday afternoon.

Conference coordinator, Bill Lang, plans to have programs and other material available by mid-summer. At that time reservations for rooms and meals, a preliminary program, and other pertinent information will be sent to Montana Historical Society members.

CALL FOR CONFERENCE PAPERS

The Fifth Annual Montana History Conference, scheduled for October 26-28, 1978, in Butte, will include a session designed specifically to promote research and writing in Montana history by college students and amateur historians. Three papers will be selected for presentation. These papers must deal directly with Montana's past, be well documented, and not exceed fifteen double-spaced typewritten pages. To have your paper considered, authors should send THREE copies to: William L. Lang, Montana Historical Society, Helena, Mt. 59601. The deadline for submission is AUGUST 1, 1978. Further information may be obtained by writing or calling Dr. Lang at the Historical Society.

SEVERAL DEPARTMENTS OF HISTORICAL SOCIETY GREET NEW STAFFERS

Since the last issue of the POST we have welcomed three new staff people, and they bring much needed help to merchandising, archives, and historic preservation departments at the Society.

Michelle Mondot is new at the sales counter where she helps Marie Spurlin organize the sales area, fill customer orders, and assist walk-in shoppers. It is the people contact, Michelle tells us, which makes the job interesting. Michelle is a native of San Francisco and recently moved to the Helena area after spending a year at Lake Tahoe, California. When not working, she loves to backpack and play the flute.

Ron Brey joins Frank Marron as an archival technician in the archives department. Ron is a Billings native and a recent graduate of the University of Montana with a B.A. in history. Working in the archives, Ron says, is a genuine opportunity for him to put his university training to work, especially considering that employment for history graduates in Montana is limited. Ron is married to Claire Cantrell, and in his leisure time pursues cross-country skiing, backpacking, and fishing.

Regina Johnson, a native of Lakehurst, New Jersey, has joined the Historic Preservation Program staff where she helps Al Thompson and Edrie Vinson answer the voluminous inquiries which seem to flood that office. Regina has two children, ages 12 and 4, and she says that Montana offers a great living environment, especially for someone who enjoys hunting and fishing. Her other interests include arts and crafts, and she admits to dabbling in painting.

HAYNES ART COLLECTION COMES TO SOCIETY

Haynes
Gallery

Isabel Haynes (left) is the donor of the large and eclectic Haynes Art Collection. The new Haynes Gallery is located on the main floor of the Society's building where the museum staff (below, L to R) Jim Warner, Patti Bell, and Mike McCourt, are finishing the gallery area for an April opening.

STATE DOCUMENTS COLLECTION
DEC 17 1979
MONTANA STATE LIBRARY
930 E Lyndale Ave.
Helena, Montana 59601

These days our museum staff is busy cataloging and preparing for exhibition a remarkable collection of paintings donated to the Montana Historical Society by a remarkable Montanan. Isabel Haynes, widow of Jack Ellis Haynes (1884-1962) who was for many years the official Yellowstone National Park photographer and operated studios at Mammoth and in Bozeman, recently donated over 400 paintings to the Society. Mike McCourt, Patti Bell, and Jim Warner of the museum staff are preparing a formal gallery for the Haynes Collection in a portion of the main floor area which once housed the Towe Ford collection. When the gallery is completed and opened to the public, sometime in April, there will be 285 linear feet of wall space to display the collection.

This is a private collection, and because it is private, it reflects the personalities and interests of the two principal collectors, Mr. and Mrs. Haynes. Western scenes, portraits of Indians and western folk types, stilllifes, seascapes, dramatic mountain scenery, and beautiful wildlife studies dominate. Living in Yellowstone for so many years and being close to nature and wildlife inclined Jack and Isabel Haynes toward a reverence of the wildlands and its beauty.

"Collecting art is a very personal thing," Mrs. Haynes told us recently. "I buy only what pleases me; I guess you might say I select what I like to live with. I have not collected any one particular artist, although I do like Conrad Schwiering, who does such lovely things in the Tetons."

The Haynes Collection includes an impressive variety of artists, from well known painters such as Olaf Seltzer, J. K. Ralston, Robert F. Morgan, Ace Powell and Elizabeth Lochrie, to newer artists such as Sheryl Bodily, Robert Kercher, and Helen West. The result is a collection which treats the spectator to a variety of styles as well as subject matter.

Isabel Haynes began a lifelong love affair with art and artistic things in her childhood days in Iowa. Her mother, Ida Clow Nauerth, drew, sketched, and painted, and entered her artwork in local Iowa exhibitions. "I have always loved to draw," Mrs. Haynes remarked, "and I expect that my mother's interest had much to do with it."

Mrs. Haynes also has a deep attachment to the West, and particularly to Yellowstone and the Tetons. She fell in love with Yellowstone as a park employee from 1921 to 1929. After graduating from the University of Iowa in 1921, she worked for the Old Yellowstone Park Company and soon began training in the hotel business, first under Mrs. Nellie Coffman at the Desert Inn in Palm Springs, California, and later under Mrs. Mack at Canyon Lodge in Yellowstone. For three years, in the late 1920's, she managed Roosevelt Lodge in the park.

"Those were the great days of Yellowstone," Mrs. Haynes reminisced, "when it took four and a half days to tour the park and guests stayed at Roosevelt Lodge as long as six weeks. Now tourists whiz through Yellowstone in one day. There was a festive atmosphere then, and we employees often sang to guests as they arrived and left our lodge. It was great fun, and the people I worked with were as nice and dignified as you can imagine."

The young lady from Iowa pursued her career in Yellowstone until she met Jack Ellis Haynes, son of the pioneer western frontier and Yellowstone photographer, Frank J. Haynes. Isabel and Jack were married in 1930, and from that time until she sold it in 1969, Mrs. Haynes worked as a partner in the House of Haynes. As the official Yellowstone Park photographer, Jack Haynes took photos of practically every aspect of life in the park, from buildings and tourists to geysers and grizzlies.

"To be a great photographer," Mrs. Haynes reminds us, "you have to be an artist. Jack's interest in art came naturally from his craft and the influence of his father. Our likes and dislikes in art were different, so we collected quite a variety of paintings and prints." Part of their collecting, of course, related to the House of Haynes.

On one occasion they made a rather unusual purchase. In order to buy a series of rare and exceptionally fine Thomas Moran chromolithographs of Yellowstone scenes, they purchased the entire art stock of the Detroit Publishing Company. "We filled a railroad box car with art and brought it directly to Yellowstone. It was the Morans we wanted so we might sell reproductions in the park," she explains. W. H. Jackson, the famous frontier photographer, had been a part owner of the Detroit firm, and a number of Jackson stone lithographs are included in the present Haynes Collection.

There are several works in the collection which deserve special mention and will undoubtedly attract visitors to the new Haynes Gallery. Perhaps the most unusual is an oil entitled "The Moneylender." The picture is from the hand of Marquard Treu, an eighteenth-century German master, and portrays a man examining coins and documents by candlelight. The collection also contains eight Thomas Moran chromolithographs of Yellowstone after watercolors painted by the artist during the famous Hayden Expedition in 1871.

DO NOT
CA
BY P

There are also early works by Ace Powell, and a rare Rosa Bonheur lithograph, first published in 1898. The Bonheur litho is a particularly striking view of a mounted plains Indian in pursuit of a buffalo.

"There is a tremendous variety in this collection," Museum Cataloger Patti Bell commented as she continued the cataloging process. "There is something for nearly anyone who enjoys western art, and there are more than a few surprises." All of the pieces are in excellent condition, attractively matted and framed. "The superb condition of the paintings," Bell added, "can only be attributed to Mrs. Haynes' great care in storing and protecting them."

Mike McCourt, Acting Museum Curator, plans to display the collection both according to artist and subject matter. "Much will depend upon how many paintings we can hang at one time," Mike tells us. "We probably will not have room to display all of them at once, so our plan is to rotate some of the collection."

The gallery itself will be a semi-permanent one, since there are plans for remodeling the entire museum area where the Towe Fords were displayed.

"We are very excited about opening this new gallery, although we sure wish we had funds readily available to carpet the entire gallery area," McCourt commented.

For most of us, the idea of having over 400 paintings in one's personal possession is staggering. How could you display them all in your home? Mrs. Haynes has a remedy for that dilemma. "I had an easel both at my home and at my office," she explained, "and I often rotated my favorite paintings on these easels. Thus I always had a beautiful and pleasing painting at hand when I wanted it."

Art collecting, however, has its traps, as Mrs. Haynes explained. She advises against collecting for speculation, although she notes that many artists' works increase in value quite rapidly, even before their deaths. "Collect what you like," she advises, "and keep up on what is happening in the art world."

Although she disclaims any expertise, it is obvious that she knows the western art field. Her collection at the Montana Historical Society will please visitors, and offer them a galaxy of western art which bespeaks the personality and tastes of a lady who has continued the traditions established in Montana so long ago by a remarkable father and son, Frank and Jack Haynes.

Jack Ellis Haynes, left, prepared to take another memorable picture in Yellowstone as official Park photographer, continuing the tradition set in 1881 by his father, Frank J. Haynes, whose camera had earlier recorded the frontier west from studios in Minnesota and North Dakota and from his famed "Haynes Palace Studio Car" on the Northern Pacific Railroad. Jack Haynes, who died in 1962, extended the work of the House of Haynes in Yellowstone, and the Haynes legacy has been vouchsafed for Montana by his working partner and widow, Isabel Haynes.

DEATH CLAIMS TWO OUTSTANDING MONTANANS

by VIVIAN A. PALADIN

When Joseph Kinsey Howard wrote his book, Montana High, Wide and Handsome, in 1943, he said in his acknowledgments: "No one who writes, or even reads, Montana history can adequately tell what he owes to Mrs. Anne McDonnell . . . of the State Historical Society Library. I can only add my thanks to those of other students who regard her with affection as a friend as well as the ultimate authority."

ANNE McDONNELL

In mid-December, last year, death came in Helena to Anne McDonnell, the lovely lady whom others have called "a walking encyclopedia of Montana history" and who outlived a great many of the more than twenty authors whose research at the Historical Society she guided towards publication. Indeed, at 93 years of age, she was able to communicate with only a few longtime friends who already knew the proportions of her contributions. Among them is Miss Bernice Boone, who until her retirement several years ago was in charge of our pictures collection, and was both colleague and close friend of Anne McDonnell.

Rather than a standard recital of vital statistics, then, it seems appropriate here to say merely that the McDonnell career began at the Society in 1923, and she worked with almost irreplaceable skill until her retirement in 1953. It is more appropriate, we think, to quote from a tribute which Dr. K. Ross Toole, then Director of the Society, wrote for MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, on that occasion:

". . . The fact is, Anne McDonnell knows more about Montana's history than any living person. But it is not simply a matter of knowing facts. She has that rare ability to distinguish between the important and the unimportant. It is an ability that many a professional historian lacks.

"Now, after a quarter-century on the job, Anne McDonnell has retired. During the course of her tenure she was the Historical Society. Today it is a research center of consequence, and this is the case largely because of her wisdom and competence. . . .

"Anne McDonnell will be at work with us again before long. At least, we're sure enough of it to have reserved a desk for her and to assure her friends that we have no intention of letting her get away. The other day we got a letter as a consequence of having got mixed up on a subscription to this magazine. The writer was justifiably irritated. He ended his letter by saying: 'well, no doubt you're doing the best you can, but Anne McDonnell must be out of town'. She was."

AUTHENTIC MONTANA MAN

Irvin (Shorty) Shope, who left his mark on canvas throughout the American West, died last November when he and his wife were visiting a daughter in Maryland, far from the scenes he loved to create, and his loss is deeply felt. The loss is especially poignant for us at the Historical Society, for not only was Shorty's home and studio in Helena only a few steps away from our building, but because some of the first dioramas created for our building contain his authentic artistic touch.

Shorty Shope, who was born on a ranch near Boulder, Montana, in 1900, was true to the adage that western artists should know at firsthand the scenes and subjects they are painting. He was a genuine article, an authentic cowboy in spite of a handicap to his leg which dated to a bout with polio when he was a boy. He knew Charlie Russell well enough in 1925 to hear some good advice: if you want to paint the West, stay in Montana. He studied at Grand Central School of Art in New York City under South Dakota's great Harvey Dunn, and he was helped and encouraged by such artists as Will James and Edgar S. Paxson.

A colorful, genial westerner, Shorty Shope was a highly successful artist, his realistic canvasses attracting commissions in a steady flow. Like many artists, he kept the family financed earlier in his career by doing commercial and promotional art. But when he went free-lance, there was never an interruption in his success. He was noted for the historical accuracy of his work, including four giant panels created for the First National Bank of Helena. As his reputation spread (he was elected a charter member of the Cowboy Artists of America in 1966) individuals interested in Montana history came in increasing numbers with commissions to do a scene of special significance to them, whether it was of Lewis and Clark, or a Montana ranch, a vigilante action, or an Indian battle. Shorty never let anyone down, for he did his homework well.

SHORTY SHOPE

In recent years, at the urgings of many, he committed his life story to writing, and at the time of his death, it was in the hands of a publisher. It is more than another success story of a western artist; it is the story of an authentic man of Montana, one who will be missed as much over a cup of coffee in Helena as he will in the many public places and private homes in which his work is represented.

IF YOU RECEIVE A DAMAGED MAGAZINE: RETURN IT TO US

The printing and binding process of any publication often results in less-than-perfect copies, and while MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY has quite a good record in this regard, there is always a chance of a slip here and there. This is especially true of the assembling and binding process, during which press runs or "signatures" can be in improper sequence, resulting in scrambled paging. If any reader at any time receives such an imperfect copy, we would appreciate its return so we can replace it with a good one.

CORRECTION

An error was made in the last Montana Post regarding Fort Missoula's Museum Cataloger, Sue Haselton. We incorrectly reported that Sue had been a Curator with the Park Service, when in fact she was a Museum Cataloger.

AS WE GO TO PRESS: DEATH TAKES ARTIST ACE POWELL

Another noted Montana artist, the man with the ruggedly interesting face who signed his works with the ace of diamonds, is gone. Asa L. (Ace) Powell, who got some sage boyhood advice from C. M. Russell and continued to work in the beautiful Glacier Park country and memorialize his friends, the Blackfeet, died at his home in Kalispell on January 25. Born in 1912 in New Mexico, Ace was brought to Apgar in Glacier Park at an early age, worked as a cowboy and packer guide, and became an expert and much sought-after woodcarver, sculptor and painter.

ZEALOUS BROADWATER C

Broadwater County MUSEUM and Historical Library

It would be intriguing to know just how many county historical societies in our nation have tried mightily to establish a truly first class local historical museum in their communities. It is an ambitious undertaking and few have succeeded as well as the Broadwater County Museum and Historical Library in Townsend, Montana. As is the case with other similar projects, Townsend's museum began as a dream of a few active individuals in that community just a few years ago. But unlike those who have tried and failed, the Broadwater County Historical Society succeeded in motivating a large proportion of the local population to support their plan and make a dream a reality. The result is an attractive museum-library building, measuring 3,200 square feet, which last year welcomed over 1,500 visitors to view their dioramas, displays, and special exhibits.

"It really surprised us," Museum Director Rose Flynn commented, "when so many people volunteered their time and energy to help us." Local participation was a key ingredient in the museum project, and the current membership in the Broadwater Historical Society, numbering over 400 persons, reflects a continuing interest and support in its activities. The fact that the museum planners proposed that their exhibits truly document Broadwater County's local history must have encouraged greater cooperation.

Troy Helmick, one of several who participated in the initial planning sessions, explained: "One of the first things we did was to identify our purpose. Just what kind of museum did we want, and how should we lay it out." Helmick, Mrs. Flynn, historical society president Laird Plymale, and others decided that the museum and library should preserve and record the history of Broadwater County and its people from prehistoric times to the present.

These activists asked a question familiar to others who have tried to establish an historical museum: where do we begin? Funding, of course, was a primary problem, but they decided early that the whole project should be accomplished without indebtedness, and without accepting large federal grants which might be restrictive. In addition to the one-half mill county levy earmarked for museums and a small grant from the Bicentennial Commission, the Broadwater County Historical Society relied upon contributed labor, donated materials, and generous donations from county residents. Forty-eight members, for example, enrolled as life members, contributing $100 each, and many others donated the same amount for memorial plaques on display at the museum.

Lloyd Heberle, chairman of the building committee, remembers how many alternatives they considered before deciding to construct a museum building. After they negotiated an indefinite lease of three lots in Townsend near the hospital on Oak Street, Heberle's committee began contracting for the actual construction, which commenced in April, 1974, and resulted in the completed structure in April, 1975. For the next fifteen months, Mrs. Flynn, Troy Helmick, and others planned the actual exhibit area before the official opening of the museum on July 4, 1976.

"We laid out our permanent exhibit areas with tape right on the floor," Mrs. Flynn remembers. "We wanted to be sure that each area was designed properly, and that we could fit all that we had planned into the building." The exhibits are arranged in a chronological order, depicting Broadwater County's history with everything from fossil remains to the advent of electricity. Each exhibit is designed to draw the visitor into the depicted scene.

"We did not want a museum with case upon case of curios that would just sit there and gather dust," Mrs. Flynn remarked. Instead they used discarded lumber, old shelving, school desks, and other items to reconstruct actual scenes as they might have been years ago. "The lumber in the old blacksmithing scene," Mr. Helmick commented, "actually came from a defunct blacksmith shop—including the charred wood by the furnace."

As if the museum was not enough to keep them busy, the Broadwater County Historical Society took on another ambitious project. While the museum was the result of over seven years of careful planning, Broadwater Bygones, the historical society's recently-published community history, took thirteen years to complete. The project began in 1964 during the celebration of the Territorial Centennial, when Grace Holloway, Eleanor Marks, Edna Gaab, the late Agnes George, Barbara Baum, and others started contributing historical articles to the Townsend Star.

The Bicentennial stimulated Grace Holloway and Eleanor Marks to compile these articles, write additional chapters, and solicit other writers to tell as complete a story of Broadwater County as they could. Local artists, an army of proofreaders, and four principal authors produced the 309-page book, which is now on sale at the Broadwater County Museum, the Montana Historical Society in Helena, and at area bookshops. Broadwater Bygones describes the history of the principal settlements and towns in the county, some of which have long since seen their last resident.

ITIZENS CREATE FINE MUSEUM/LIBRARY

The future looks busy for this zealous historical society. They plan to continue refining museum exhibits and expanding library holdings. The museum's historical library collections began with the late Mary Scheiner's donation of her historical notes and reminiscences, and the society hopes to build a collection which is strong enough to support local historical research on Broadwater topics. There are also plans to expand the museum building itself to incorporate a larger display area where farm machinery, surreys, and other large artifacts might be exhibited.

The Broadwater Historical Society has good reason to be proud of its achievements, but members quickly remind us that their museum is truly a community project. No small group of people can take all the credit. But for anyone who wants to see what local people can accomplish when they pursue an ambitious project and get real cooperation, stop for a visit at the Broadwater County Museum and Historical Library on Oak Street in Townsend, Montana, an area which has more history to boast about than you might imagine.

MORE NOTABLE COMMUNITY BOOKS HAVE EMERGED

In two issues of THE POST in 1977 (February/March and May/June) we published informal—and necessarily short—synopses of community or committee books published just prior to, during, and shortly after the Bicentennial year. At the time, we realized the task was staggering, that many would be missed. Although the latter may still be so, we capsulize here a few more volumes which have come to the Historical Society collections. Again, they reflect awesome group efforts to preserve community and town history.

NORTH TOOLE COUNTY

Two Home Extension groups, the Prairie Homemakers and Jayhawker Ridge, joined hands in 1976 to produce ECHOES FROM THE PRAIRIES, a history of North Toole County. The hefty 668-page hardbound volume, its cover handsomely gold-stamped with a drawing of the country which touches the Canadian border and has the Sweet Grass Hills as a backdrop, contains sketches of towns, but mostly people. Towns covered include Kevin and Sunburst (noted for oil discoveries and the traumatic loss of a large refinery in 1959), the border town of Sweetgrass, the near-ghost towns of Ferdig and Gold Butte.

BROCKWAY AND McCONE COUNTY

Almost as large, and also hardbound, is AS IT WAS YESTERDAY, compiled by the Brockway Homemakers Club. Although there are references to a few surrounding communities, this book zeroes in on the town of Brockway, located in east central Montana's McCone County, "in the heart of the largest body of undeveloped wheat lands in the Northwest," as an historic endsheet map expresses it. The book starts out with no preamble, going at once into family histories, arranged alphabetically. But a perusal of the total book reveals that, in text and an amazing array of pictures, a little-known part of Montana has been placed on the record by dedicated people.

LAND OF THE CHEYENNES

Rosebud County, created in 1901 in south central Montana and encompassing the Northern Cheyenne Reservation, produced a well-printed volume for the Bicentennial entitled THEY CAME AND STAYED. Containing 424 pages and the stories and pictures of hundreds of people, it is well arranged, starting off with a general history of the county. There are sketches and pictures of such towns as Forsyth (the county seat), Sumatra, Birney, Ashland, Rosebud, St. Labre (site of a well-known Indian Mission)—and Colstrip, where strip mining of coal has been going on for over half a century but now is in the national spotlight.

SIOUX-ASSINIBOINE COUNTRY

In over 1,000 pages of text and pictures, citizens of Roosevelt County tell the history of their area in an imposing hardbound book, TREASURED YEARS. Beginning with the earliest explorations of the eastern most portions of the Missouri River in Montana, which flows directly through the county, this community history deals with the Sioux and Assiniboine tribes and the Fort Peck Reservation, the creation of Roosevelt County, the history of the many small towns and settlements in the county, important cultural organizations, and many family histories, most of them illustrated.

LOLO CREEK REFLECTIONS

The Lolo History Committee has produced a balanced and informative history of the famous Lolo area of the Bitterroot Valley, where Lewis and Clark paused at Traveler's Rest in 1805 and 1806. The 115-page softbound volume, now in its second printing, is composed of two sections, one dealing with the early history of the Lolo Creek area, and the latter containing brief histories of pioneer families. Included are maps identifying the historic business district in Lolo in 1910 and the locations of homesteads along the creek and its tributaries. Family histories of early homesteaders constitute over half of this community history.

SERVICES OF SOCIETY DEPARTMENTS SET FORTH

A highlight of the Fourth Annual Montana History Conference last November 5 was an informal but lively business meeting, during which Director Ken Korte and Board President Toni Hagener fielded questions from the floor and invited broader individual member participation in the work and goals of the Montana Historical Society. At the same time, an invitation was extended by this publication to use these columns for expression of the needs of other historical museums and groups.

It seems appropriate in this issue to set forth the policies and services which are offered by the Library, Archives and Museum divisions of the Historical Society in Helena. We reiterate our desire to publicize or otherwise assist the efforts of others through this publication, while we continue to publish feature stories about the work being done in other communities.

LIBRARY:

Open Monday through Friday from 8:00 A.M. to 5:00 P.M., the Library is located on the second floor of the Society's building. All patrons must register daily, and researchers using archival materials must complete a registration form. Since library materials are contained in closed stacks, materials must be requested through the reference desk, except for volumes and periodicals shelved or displayed in the reading room.

Five microfilm readers (two of them are reader/printers) and one microfiche reader are available. The use of typewriters, tape recorders and cameras is permitted. Photographing in the photo archive requires prior clearance, however, and the use of flash in the case of very old materials is discouraged. Photocopying of most materials is possible, although very fragile materials may have to be microfilmed. Charges are 10 cents per page (do-it-yourself) or 20 cents per page if done by a staff member. Microfilm reader/printer charges are 25 cents per page.

High school students are permitted use of our printed and microfilmed holdings, but in all cases, researchers are required to do their work in a quiet manner. Smoking, drinking or eating are not permitted in the library.

Reference questions will be taken by telephone, and the number to call is (406) 449-2681. Requests which require considerable information or depth of research should be taken care of in person or by letter.

Inter-library loans are possible for most of the holdings. Obvious exceptions would be double-folio newspapers, extremely rare and fragile items, and those volumes used for continuous reference. Loans can be made only to libraries, not individuals.

ARCHIVES:

The manuscript and State Archives Collections, housed on the ground floor level of the Society building, are open during the same hours and there is free access. Ordinarily, however, high school students do not have access to original archives and manuscript materials because of their unique nature, fragility, and ease with which they might be misplaced. Exceptions to this policy may be made by the State Archivist where students (14 years or older) show merit and responsibility and have been recommended by their instructor. These students will be allowed to use primary materials which are available in typescript, microfilm or photocopy formats. At no time will students in groups of more than three individuals be allowed to use original materials, even if otherwise recommended.

Restrictions on certain materials have been imposed by the donor. In other cases, donor restrictions exist in the copyright law under which a writer or his heirs own the literary property in his writings, including the right of first publication. Unless these rights have been dedicated to the public, the user must secure the right of publication from the owner.

All patrons must register daily in the main reference room in the library. Briefcases, notebooks, and coats must be left in the security area near the registration desk. Typewriters and tape recorders are allowed. Researchers must not make marks on archival materials, must preserve the existing order and report any disarrangement, and exercise care to prevent damage to the collections.

Copying of material is permitted but the researcher must assume responsibility for conforming with the laws of copyright. Such reproductions will not be used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research. The Society reserves the right to refuse to accept a copying order if, in its judgment, filling the order would involve violation of copyright law.

Mail requests are permitted, but replies that require more than thirty minutes reference time cannot be honored because of staff limitations.

MUSEUM:

The Museum division accepts gifts from donors if they are relevant to Society collecting goals and to the history of Montana. The donor must relinquish all rights to the object or objects. By law, the Society cannot make appraisals of art or museum objects.

Loans to other museums and galleries are permitted, subject to approval of the director and board. Criteria, however, include proper day and night security, insurance coverage, and suitable climate-controlled housing for the objects under loan.

Research is permitted in the collections, including the Poindexter collection of modern art, the Johns gun collection, and the ethnological and costume collections, provided advance arrangements are made by individuals or small groups.

Tours of the museums and galleries, conducted by the docents, can be arranged by calling (406) 449-2694. "Touch and feel" tours for young children can also be arranged in this manner, as can "behind the scenes" tours, given by staff members upon prior request and arrangement.

The Museum division is prepared to offer consultation service to other museums, and will make talks to groups upon request, provided expenses are paid by groups outside Helena. Questions relating to conservation, display or other museum problems will be answered as fully as possible, or reference made to other institutions in specialized cases.

HELENA AT LAST HAS WESTERNERS CORRAL

History buffs in the Helena area have saddled up and are ready to ride under the aegis of a Westerners Corral. Westerners is an international organization designed to encourage historical research and popularize Western lore and history through publications, awards, and the preservation of materials or sites relating to the Old West.

Billings, Montana, has been headquarters for the Yellowstone Corral—Montana's only other Westerners group—now under the leadership of Sheriff John Willard. Helena residents are pleased to organize a second Corral in Montana.

Twenty interested individuals met at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Hal Stearns on January 24 to lay a foundation for the group. Mike Stephen, with the Lt. Governor's Energy Office and a former member of the Fort Worth Westerners Corral, rode herd on the meeting. A formal election of officers and the actual naming of the Corral was left for a future meeting, but those present agreed to meet the last Wednesday of each month from January-May, September-November.

Each meeting will feature dinner and a program—a chance to chomp and chat, then praise or haze the speaker, in the Westerners' terminology. For the new Corral, February 22, 6:30 p.m. the Stone House Restaurant are time and place for the next meeting.

Corral members set three classes of membership: $10.00 for individual members; $15.00 for families; and $5.00 for corresponding members—those more than a day's ride from Helena.

Following the business portion of the meeting, Helena's new Westerners recessed for refreshments then enjoyed a sparkling paper by Rex Myers, of the Society's library staff. His talk, entitled "Blackfoot City—A Hellroarin' Camp," dealt with the brief but colorful history of this former mining town along Ophir Gulch in Powell County.

The Helena Corral joins with its Billings counterpart in inviting anyone interested in becoming a part of the Westerners in Montana. In Helena it's Mike Stephen, 1500 Knight, Helena, Mt. 59601; for the Yellowstone Corral, it's John Willard, Box 355, Billings, Mt. 59103.

MERCHANDISING AND PRESERVATION STAFFS STRENGTHENED BY TWO

New to our Merchandising Staff is Anaconda native Dot Walther. Mrs. Walther is officially an Audit Technician, which means that she has responsibility for controlling inventory and ordering new merchandise. Edrie Vinson, recently from Lewistown, has joined the Historic Preservation Program staff as chief historian. Ms. Vinson, a native of West Virginia, graduated from Helena's Carroll College with honors in history in 1973, and then went on to receive an M.A. in Montana history from Montana State University. Edrie also worked in the Society library in 1972 and 1973, but in the last two years she has worked in the field of historic preservation as historian at the Bureau of Land Management office in Lewistown in charge of formulating a conceptual management plan for the Missouri River. For this work she received two awards, one from Secretary of the Interior Cecil Andrus. Edrie lives in Alhambra, south of Helena, with her two children, Thom and Leann, and an assortment of pets.

BIENNIAL MAGAZINE INDEX FOR 1976-1977 NOW AT PRESS

Readers of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY should by now have received the Winter issue, 1978, in which was enclosed a brochure for ordering back issues of the magazine, bound volumes, and —perhaps most importantly—the first Biennial Index of the magazine, to encompass volume years 1976 and 1977. Because of rising costs, we ask payment of $2.00 per copy, payable at the time of ordering, and in the brochure, we guaranteed delivery of the index by June, 1978. Because it is already going into type, however, we expect delivery by April 1. Thus, in the event you missed seeing the brochure or felt the time span was too long, we invite immediate paid orders from all our readers and others interested in the index. Checks should be made out to the Montana Historical Society and sent to 225 North Roberts St., Helena, Mt. 59601.

TALENTED YOUNG MONTANA PHOTOGRAPHERS SCHEDULED FOR TWO-MAN SHOW AT SOCIETY

In a light-hearted sort of preview, John Reddy is seen here holding a matted portrait of his colleague, Ed LaCasse. The event projected is a two-man showing of the photography of these gifted young men, slated for the month of March in the Society's Poindexter Gallery of Art. Entitled SYNTHESIS, the show will consist of a wide range of stunning photography created by the two, individually and in collaboration.

Reddy, who was raised in Helena, recently graduated in film and television production at Montana State University in Bozeman. Currently featured in a one-man show in the Metro Art Center in Louisville, Kentucky, he has participated in a number of exhibits in and around Bozeman and Helena. He is currently attending graduate school at MSU.

Now completing work on his degree in film and television at the Bozeman institution, LaCasse is also a Montanan, and before enrolling at MSU had studied journalism and philosophy at the University of Montana, where he worked as photographic editor for the MONTANA KAIMIN.

FRIEDA FLIGELMAN: A SEARCHING MIND THAT WILL BE MISSED

by WILLIAM L. LANG

It is hard to imagine that she is gone. The familiar purple tam, the purposeful stride, the inquisitive demeanor—all were hallmarks familiar to many of us. She was a constant participant in nearly every activity or meeting where learning and thinking took place in Helena and around the state. There was no mistaking Frieda Fligelman, a woman of scholarly accomplishment, a friend of anyone who pursued learning, and a constant reminder that the calendar has no necessary connection to the spirit or the mind.

When she died on the morning of January 16, she had just turned eighty-eight, but anyone who knew her understood that Frieda ignored age altogether. She was interested in what tomorrow might bring and what she could learn. Upon accepting Carroll College's Community Service Award in 1976, Frieda acted more like someone just discovering the world of learning than the veteran scholar she was. "I am still so eager to learn," she told the audience that night, and her life was a testimonial to that idea.

Frieda was born in Helena to a prominent Jewish merchant family on January 2, 1890. She attended local schools, where she first became attracted to a life of the mind. In 1907 she plunged into one of the most intense intellectual environments in the nation when she began studies at Columbia University in New York. The discipline of sociology was still very young then, but Frieda's interests were well beyond even the avant-garde sociologists. Columbia rejected her Ph.D. dissertation topic, "sociolinguistics," but she pursued her studies nonetheless, publishing in various journals, presenting papers at learned meetings, and receiving the honor of selection as a fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in 1967. Finally, in 1976, her field of study gained worldwide recognition with a volume published in Belgium, which, appropriately, carried a dedication to Frieda.

Her accomplishments aside, what we remember most about Frieda was her insatiable curiosity. A couple of years ago, in a casual discussion, when mention of Helena's turn-of-the-century black community was made, Frieda quickly picked up the topic, peppered us with little known facts, pumped us for what we had discovered about blacks in Helena, and then launched off on a dissertation on social conditions in historic Helena. At another meeting we remember Frieda surprising and shocking young historians and philosophers with her knowledge and wit on subjects as diverse as African religious practices and the history of feminism.

Frieda Fligelman was without peer—a one of a kind which we will not see again. She leaves behind a legacy to all who knew her. Our minds and spirits, Frieda demonstrated daily, should be free to pursue new ideas and to question every old idea. She showed everyone that the complexities and confinements of contemporary life need not limit anyone's curiosity or their search for knowledge, regardless of age. There is no one to take her place, save those who will ask "I wonder what Frieda might have said about that?"

PHOTOS NEEDED FOR STATE PARKS HISTORY

A history of Montana's state park system has been written by Dave Conklin, planner for the parks division of the Montana Department of Fish and Game.

A search is now underway for early photographs of state park areas in Montana to include with the history. Photos taken of state park areas before or after they were developed are needed, especially those showing people camping, picnicking, hiking, fishing, or participating in other outdoor recreational activities.

Photos are especially needed for the 1930 to 1950 period. Some of the early state park areas are: Pictograph Cave (Billings), Bitterroot Lake (Kalispell), Lone Pine (Kalispell), Missouri Headwaters (Three Forks), Hell Creek (Jordan), Rock Creek (Glasgow), Makoshika (Glendive), Bannack (Dillon), Fort Owen (Stevensville), Medicine Rocks (Ekalaka), James Kipp (Zortman), and Big Arm (Flathead Lake). If you have photos or negatives that you would like to see published and credited to you, please write or phone Dave Conklin, Parks Division, Montana Department of Fish and Game, 1420 East Sixth Avenue, Helena, Montana, 59601 (406) 449-3750.

READERS BEWARE: WE ARE BEING CONFUSED WITH OTHER JOURNALS

Because of the propensity of all of us to use the vernacular or shortened phrase, the Society's quarterly journal, MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, is being confused with at least two other magazines published in the state. The result is chaos, some really unfortunate failures to fill orders, especially for Christmas gift subscriptions, to say nothing of an inordinate burden on our circulation department. These days, someone is continually mad at them, and it is not their fault.

Here is what has happened: since its inception in 1951, MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY has been known as, simply, Montana Magazine. In 1971, a quarterly publication called MONTANA, MAGAZINE OF THE NORTHERN ROCKIES, aimed primarily at contemporary Montana, its scenery, sports and environment, began publishing, and by both promotion and common usage, has the shortened Montana Magazine title.

Less often, but persistently, we have also become confused with MONTANA OUTDOORS, the publication sponsored by the Montana Fish and Game Commission, and even with MONTANA CITIZEN, published by the Montana Chamber of Commerce.

Without going into the niceties of who is the culprit in this kind of confusion, or indeed into any possible prior right to a title, however shortened, we would like to urge our readers, or those ordering gift subscriptions to address us fully: MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, Montana Historical Society, 225 North Roberts St., Helena, Mt. 59601.

One more thing: many readers wonder if we have gift cards which convey greetings for any occasion other than Christmas. Yes we do. We have all-purpose cards adaptable to any occasion, sent to those to whom you wish to give MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. Incidentally, they also receive this publication and become members of the Montana Historical Society.

HISTORY MEET CONSENSUS: LET'S HAVE MORE

When the Fourth Annual Montana History Conference came to a close on Saturday, November 5, the consensus among participants and attendees was that the three-day meeting had been an unqualified success. In fact, this year's conference, again sponsored by the Society in cooperation with the Montana Heritage Foundation and the Council to Preserve Montana History and funded by the Montana Committee for the Humanities, was judged by many to be the best yet.

The nearly two hundred persons who attended the opening night events Thursday evening were treated to two exceptional historic media programs. In the Society's Poindexter Gallery, those interested in early photography and Indian culture inspected the magnificent photographs of Sumner W. Matteson, collected and arranged by George P. Horse Capture and scheduled to remain in the gallery throughout November. The collection includes remarkable scenes of Sun Dance ceremonies on the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation in 1904. The other presentation on Thursday evening featured two documentary motion pictures, The Plow That Broke the Plains and The River, with commentary and introduction provided by Prof. Thomas Wessel of Montana State University.

Regular sessions of the conference began Friday morning at the Colonial Convention Center, where concurrent meetings dealt with historic preservation in Montana and the history of the state legislature. Ken Korte chaired the session "Government Involvement in Historic Preservation," and he was joined on the panel by Floyd Sharrock of the Forest Service, Al Thompson from the Montana Historical Society, and Ms. Edrie Vinson of the Bureau of Land Management in Lewistown. Vinson and Sharrock discussed the varied nature of Montana's historic sites on public lands, and the importance of interpreting as well as preserving them. The focus of the session, as Thompson and Korte stated, was to explain the goal of the state historic preservation effort, and to discuss the actual processes by which specific communities and interested persons can involve themselves in the process.

Chairing the other morning session, "Montana's Legislature—A Political Body in Transition," was Prof. Richard Roeder of MSU who monitored a panel composed of two former state senators, David James of Joplin and Neil Lynch of Butte, MSU political scientist Jerry Calvert, and Donald A. Garrity, a Helena lawyer and lobbyist. The panelists offered differing views on the political composition of recent legislatures, but there was general agreement that historically it has been a remarkably stable body. Prof. Calvert noted the effect changing economic conditions have had on legislative behavior, Sen. Lynch identified the disparate voting patterns of liberal and conservative legislators, while Sen. James maintained that most issues before the legislators were non-partisan questions. Donald Garrity's evaluation, that the composition of 1961, 1967 and 1977 legislatures were remarkably alike, produced a lively discussion, typical of the entire session.

In an enthralling luncheon address, Prof. Joan Hoff Wilson, a Butte native and graduate of University of Montana and now on the faculty at Arizona State University, reviewed the life and career of Montana's battling feminist and pacifist, Congresswoman Jeannette Rankin. Dr. Wilson reminded her audience of Rankin's lifelong commitment to peace, a commitment which led her to vote, as a Congresswoman, against American participation in both world wars. But historian Wilson went well beyond a summary view of her subject's pacifism when she probed the Congresswoman's childhood, the impact of her first anti-war vote in 1917, and her immutable belief that only a women's crusade for peace could restrain men from trying to solve problems by going to war.

Harold Gray of Rocky Boy, Montana, addresses a Saturday morning workshop session "Legacies of Montana Indians: Culture and Traditions, Their Present State." Seated from the left are Joe Medicine Crow of Crow Agency, and Clarice Sanchez from the Flathead Reservation.

Jeannette Rankin's Montana background, Dr. Wilson concluded, may well have been the source of her dedication to pacifism, but there were other salient factors. Jeannette was strongly influenced by the writings of British sociologist, Benjamin Kidd, and her own lifestyle suggests that she originally embraced pacifism in the context of a much broader non-materialistic approach to life. Whatever the sources of her beliefs, Jeannette Rankin's determination remained unquestioned, for she ended her long life in active opposition to one of America's most controversial wars in the 1960's and 1970's.

During her address, which touched upon nearly every phase of Rankin's public life, the speaker paused to encourage all individuals who possess letters, memorabilia, or other Rankin materials to deposit them at the Montana Historical Society before they are lost or destroyed. Large gaps in Jeannette Rankin's life remain, Dr. Wilson noted, because so many materials are held by private parties and have thus been withheld from historians. There is still much we do not know about Montana's famous lady, but Joan Hoff Wilson made it clear that what we do know should make us stand in awe of her six decades of public service to an ideal vision of a better world.

The afternoon concurrent sessions included a long overdue look at the history of stock raising in Montana, and a lively panel discussion on Jeannette Rankin. Prof. Jeffrey Safford of MSU chaired the meeting entitled, "Critical Transitions in the Montana Livestock Industry," which began with a paper presented by Prof. Robert Smith of Eastern Montana College. Smith's paper, "Texans Come to Montana: Corporate Cattle Business in Montana, 1890-1910," drew comments from the audience and panelists, who included Erwin Miller and Lillian Miller Smith of Chinook, John Schlebecker of the Smithsonian, and Mons Tiegan of the Montana Stockgrowers Association. The discussion centered on the changes new technology, population increase, and the federal government have wrought in the livestock industry.

Jeannette Rankin, her person and career, continues to draw attention among historians and the general public, and this was evidenced in the interest the Rankin panel generated. Prof. Michael P. Malone of MSU chaired the meeting which included as panelists, Frances Elge, a former aide to the Congresswoman; Lawrence Pettit, Montana Commissioner of Higher Education; Norma Smith, a biographer of Rankin, and Joan Hoff Wilson. The panelists pursued many of the issues raised by Prof. Wilson in her luncheon address, but introduced other questions about Rankin's decision to live an austere life, to settle in Georgia, and her relationship with her brother, Wellington, noted attorney, stockman and political leader.

After the Friday afternoon sessions, Director Ken Korte and Society President Toni Hagener chaired the first annual Montana Historical Society general meeting. At the present time, as Korte explained, there really is no active membership in the Society. Subscriptions to MONTANA the magazine of Western History and The Montana Post constitutes membership, but there are many individuals who hope that an active, participatory membership can be developed. At the Friday meeting, suggestions included the institution of classes of membership, the expansion of volunteer programs, the formation of an adjunct private historical association to aid the Society, the improvement of Historical Society services to local museums and historical societies, and an expansion of services at the Society itself. The consensus of those attending the meeting indicated a strong interest in an expanded type of Society membership, and magazine editor Vivian Paladin urged those who have ideas concerning the Society and its operations to use The Montana Post as a forum. Paladin emphisized that the Post is the best place for local historical societies, museums, and interested groups to explain their activities, suggest new directions in historic preservation, and to generally communicate with other members of the Montana Historical Society.

Of the 300 or more persons who attended the conference, those who came to hear John T. Schlebecker of the Smithsonian Institution at the Friday evening banquet were not disappointed. For many years a noted teacher at University of Montana and Iowa State University, Dr. Schlebecker was famous among his students for his wry sense of humor and entertaining lecture style. As our banquet speaker, he was entertaining, but he also gave his audience many sage words of advice on how and why we should save the "Things of History" which crowd our museums. We should preserve what is representative of each era, Schlebecker said, not that which is odd, useless, expensive, or merely curious.

MRS. HAGENER AND KEN KORTE

Early in his address, Dr. Schlebecker suggested that preserving the past is as much a spiritual experience as it is educational. People save things, he said, because this or that artifact may represent a highly personal experience or phase of their lives, but that does not mean that these items should be found in our museums. Museums ought to contain artifacts which can genuinely instruct us about the past, and we can find out more about the ordinary people of other eras by collecting, preserving and inspecting representative artifacts.

Dr. Schlebecker ended his presentation with a plea to his audience to collect and preserve the representative artifacts of today, and to build museums which will instruct our descendants about the nature of our lives. It is the artifact, Schlebecker reminded us, which carries the fingerprints of the average man and woman of each era.

The Fourth Annual Montana History Conference concluded Saturday morning with two concurrent workshops, one covering Indian culture and art, and the other discussing the management of historic sites in Montana. Earl Barlow, Superintendent of Schools in Browning, Harold Gray of Rocky Boy, Montana, Joseph Medicine Crow of Crow Agency, and Clarice Sanchez from the Flathead Reservation discussed the current state of Indian education with particular emphasis upon the preservation of their traditional culture. The second portion of the Indian workshop centered on Indian art, past and present. Richard Pohrt, an expert in historic Indian art, presented a detailed discussion of the problem of tribal identifications in Indian beadwork. Following Mr. Phort was Neil Parsons from the College of Great Falls who demonstrated, with a slide presentation, the abstract imagination of Indian artists practicing nearly a century ago.

The success of the conference testifies to the growing interest in all aspects of western and Montana history. The enthusiasm of those involved in historic preservation, the excitement of the many persons who viewed the Matteson photographs and discussed Indian culture, and the involvement of the audience in all of the sessions suggests that the Montana History Conference has become a permanent autumn fixture. We are already looking forward to next year.

BELEAGUERED

For well over a century, since the incorporation of the Montana Historical Society in 1865, the archival collections at the Society have grown without respect for storage space, physical condition, or trained people to handle these precious materials. When the Society's incorporators decided to solicit and preserve documents, diaries, and other historic records of Montana's beginnings, they had little idea that the archival collection alone would eventually total over 8500 cubic feet. For years dedicated librarians at the Society continued to collect and preserve historic materials, but the size of the collections and their complexity finally demanded professional management and scientific preservation.

It was not until 1969 that the Society had a professional archivist on its staff, and it was only seven years ago that a modern storage facility, the building addition which also includes the Russell and Poindexter Galleries, was built to house and protect Montana's manuscript treasures. In addition to the manuscripts resulting from over a hundred years of collecting, the Society was designated the official Montana State Archives in 1969, which charged us with the responsibility of preserving and processing all permanent state records. Consequently the collections have grown enormously, and in fact have quadrupled since 1971.

Until this year, State Archivist Brian Cockhill could point to shelf upon shelf of unprocessed materials and only wonder when he and Assistant Archivist Jeffrey Cunniff could hope to process it all. Relief came in the last session of the Legislature. Added to the Archives Department are two professional archivists, Sue Jackson and Ellie Argiumbau, and two archival technicians, Frank Marron and Barbara Townsend. With the added personnel, Brian Cockhill notes, "we have at least a chance of keeping up with the incoming material."

"For several years now," Cockhill said, "we have been in the embarrassing position of owning thousands of cubic feet of material, but unable to make it available for use." A cubic foot of material, which is the standard of measurement used by archivists, approximates the contents of one half of a standard file drawer and might contain as many as 2,000 individual pieces. Processing archival materials is a laborious and technically demanding job, and in listening to Brian Cockhill's description of the procedures involved it is easy to see why the new archivists were needed so desperately.

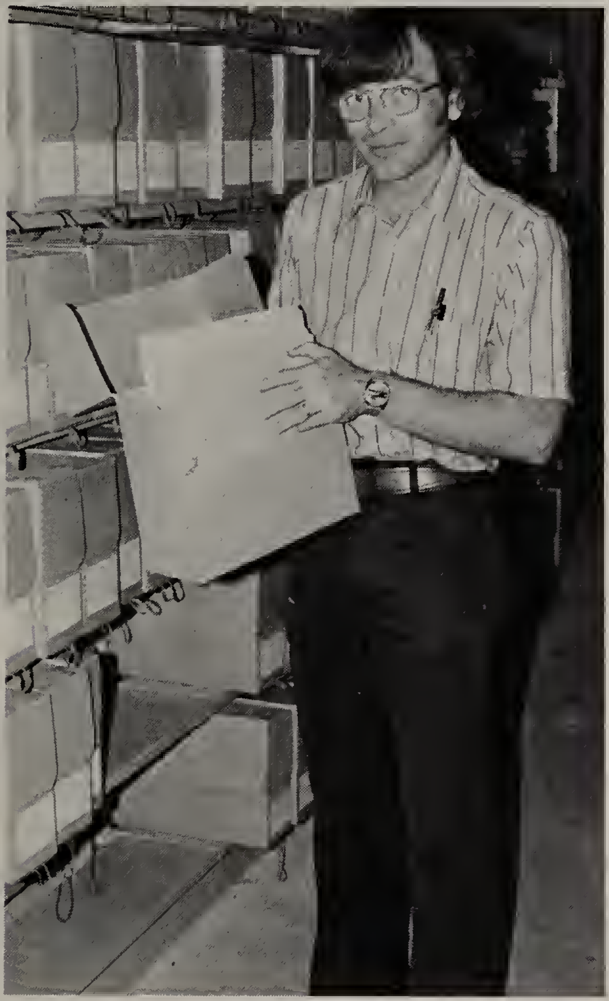
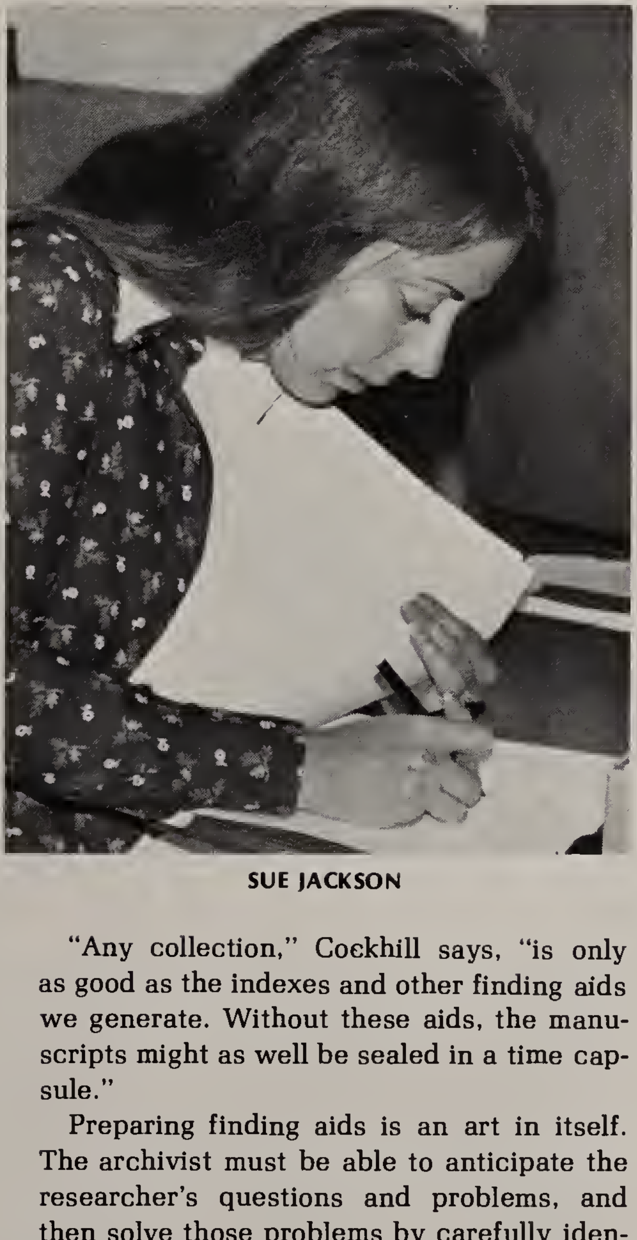
The job of an archivist begins when an archival collection, which might arrive encrusted with years of dirt and grime, is donated to the Historical Society. The first step in processing materials requires that an initial inventory be completed and the donor be given a receipt, which is then signed by the donor assigning ownership to the Historical Society. Once the material is officially part of the archival collection, archivists work up a preliminary description and place it in specially constructed boxes. The actual processing begins with a thorough cleaning, which includes unfolding letters, removing staples and pins, and separating all non-manuscript materials from the collection.



BRIAN COCKHILL

In a cleaned state, the manuscripts are weeded, ordered and sorted. Extraneous material is removed and the entire collection is then categorized and organized according to document type, whether it is correspondence, business records, chronology, or correspondents. At each step the archivist must decide how best to organize the material for use. His ultimate responsibility is to transform a disorganized jumble of papers into an historical resource—a usable documentation of our past.

FRANK MARRON, JEFFREY CUNNIFF, BARBARA TOWNSEND



SUE JACKSON

"Any collection," Cockhill says, "is only as good as the indexes and other finding aids we generate. Without these aids, the manuscripts might as well be sealed in a time capsule."

Preparing finding aids is an art in itself. The archivist must be able to anticipate the researcher's questions and problems, and then solve those problems by carefully identifying significant subjects, personalities, and topics which should be described in guides and indexes. Each individual folder is labelled and the contents described in a general collection guide, a biography is compiled of the central personality associated with the collection, and an index and a main catalog card are prepared.

The other charge to the archivist is to protect and preserve historical materials. The Montana Historical Society is fortunate to have one of the best archival facilities in the northwest. The entire storage area environment is controlled. The relative humidity is maintained at 35% to 40%, and the temperature never rises above 70° or drops below 66°. In addition, all paper materials are placed in acid-free folders and boxes in order to retard the chemical disintegration of the paper. Finally, the archives is a closed and secure area, and the use of all materials is carefully monitored.

"What we hope to do," Cockhill explained, "is to begin processing some of our most important collections, while still serving the needs of historians, state employees, and others who use our materials regularly." Brian Cockhill's new archivists are experienced and well prepared, but even they admit that the challenge is enormous.

"There is so much unprocessed material here," Ellie commented, "that I sometimes wonder how we will ever catch up." In the few months they have been on the job, however, the archivists have already made a sizable dent, and they plan to upgrade the indexing system, a task which could not have been attempted before now.

What is most gratifying about the new attention given to the archives is the realization that finally some of Montana's most valuable historical documents will soon be useful to historians. What the documents will disclose is not known but we can be certain that Brian Cockhill and his archival staff will not leave them buried for long.

OLD FORT MISSOULA BEGINS NE

This last summer, during the centennial of the Flight of the Nez Perce, over 4,000 people visited a new historical museum in Missoula, Montana. The attraction was more than the spirited and graphic Nez Perce commemorative displays, for it also marked the resuscitation of the historic fort itself. Begun by the efforts of local historians and the Western Montana Ghost Town Preservation Society, the Fort Missoula Historical Museum is now just one year into its new life, but already it shows promise of becoming one of the major museums in Montana. Located on a 32-acre tract of land on the grounds of old Fort Missoula, the history of the Fort, since its original construction in 1877, vies in interest with the story of how the museum became a reality in 1976.

In 1877 the Army's Department of Dakota, under the command of General Alfred H. Terry, began an expansion of garrisons in Montana Territory and Fort Missoula was one of the new outposts constructed that year. By the time of the Nez Perce outbreak in Idaho later in the year, Fort Missoula's construction had begun, and soon a small garrison manned the new post, commanded by Captain Charles C. Rawn.

The Fort played no significant role in the Nez Perce campaign, and during the 1880's it remained a rather isolated post, its primary function being the protection of strategic Mullan Road, which stretched from Fort Benton on the Missouri to Wallulah Gap on the Columbia. In the next decade the famous black infantry regiment, the 25th, came to Fort Missoula, and in June, 1897, the black infantry's bicycle corps made its celebrated cross-country ride to St. Louis and back.

During the Spanish-American War there was little activity at Fort Missoula, although it was a staging area for volunteers from Montana. It was just before World War I that most of the barracks and major construction was completed, including a sizable hospital. After the war, Fort Missoula was de-activated for a time, but during Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal it was pressed back into federal service as the regional office of the Civilian Conservation Corps operations.

*Pictured below is the historic NCO Quarters at old Fort Missoula which is being renovated by members of the Western Ghost Town Preservation Society. # W LIFE AS HISTORIC PARK AND MUSEUM

It was during World War II, however, that Fort Missoula saw its most unusual duty, when it became an internment camp for enemy aliens. Over 1,600 Japanese and Italian aliens came to Missoula from the Pacific Coast and from the Ellis Island internment center in New York harbor. The first aliens arrived at the Fort in May, 1941, and all had left by 1944, although some of those interned returned to Missoula to make their permanent homes.

After World War II, Fort Missoula served many federal departments and agencies, especially the National Guard and the Forest Service. On the original three hundred acres the Army Reserve, Forest Service, National Guard, Missoula Community Hospital, and the University of Montana all currently have installations. In the heart of the old Fort grounds stands the Fort Missoula Historical Museum, housed in the old Quartermaster's Building and surrounded by thirty-two acres which will eventually serve as an historic park devoted to the history of western Montana.

"The story of how we acquired this property," Museum Director Frank Grant comments, "and how the museum came to be is really an epic." There were many individuals and groups in Missoula who were responsible for creating the museum, but, as Grant says, "in the end it was county officials who finally decided to accept the responsibility for the property and programs."

In the late 1960's, when the General Services Administration began looking for some use for Fort Missoula, several groups quickly spoke for portions of the Fort grounds, including the Western Montana Ghost Town Preservation Society. They feared that the historic buildings might be demolished, including one built in 1878, if something were not done, and it was the Ghost Town Society members who made it possible for Missoula County to use their museum appropriation to fund the project.

"I guess we are beginning an ambitious project here," Grant admits, "but there is so much history in this region which needs telling; the potential is really staggering." Frank Grant and Museum Curator Sue Haselton are both committed to the proposition that a museum is really a primary educational institution which must serve the community first. Both Frank and Sue have strong backgrounds in historical and museum work. Frank holds an M.A. from University of Montana in western history, and is now completing his Ph.D., while Sue has worked as a museum curator with the Park Service at Grand Teton, Lapwai, Idaho, and most recently at the Grant-Kohrs Ranch near Deer Lodge.

"The summer Nez Perce show went so well," Sue says, "that we are really looking forward to our upcoming displays, and hope that anyone in the Missoula area, or visiting, will stop in to see what we have."

In October and November the Montana Ghost Town Society will feature a display, and at Christmas, Frank and Sue plan to show a collection of turn-of-the-century clothing, furniture, toys, and decorative arts reflecting the yuletide season. In the spring there are plans already laid for a large show of frontier printing and the early journalists of Montana.

Museum Curator Sue Haselton and Museum Director Frank Grant stand alongside a George Washington printing press which is on permanent loan to the museum from the University of Montana's School of Journalism.

The overall plan for the Fort Missoula historical park includes the construction of villages depicting Indian life, frontier living conditions, a logging camp, and a military outpost. The setting is spectacular with the Bitterroot Range as a backdrop and the Bitterroot River nearby. There is no question that Fort Missoula will soon be a major attraction, and the Missoula area will find out how educational and exciting a museum of this nature can be. They are located just off highway 12 on Missoula's western perimeter on the way to Lolo and the tracks of the Nez Perce a century ago.

A glaring, basic need for specialized Montana maps is rapidly being filled by a skilled, no-nonsense man named Bob Taylor, whose academic title is professor of geography, Montana State University, Bozeman. At the Society, in 1974, we grew accustomed, not only to Bob Taylor's face, but to the distinctive outline of our state when he produced two historic maps, now rapidly becoming collector's items. One shows the sites of military installations, the other fur trade posts of the dim past. Half the proceeds from the sale of these beautiful wall size maps helped the Society purchase cases to hold our map holdings; the other half went to the Endowment and Research Foundation, based at MSU, to produce more Taylor-made maps. And there are many—one of the latest being a physiographic map showing land forms and surface structures of Montana on which Bob is working in the picture seen here. Upcoming is a complicated but extremely important population dot map. Maps depicting such things as waterways, urban and rural population trends, employment, precipitation, types of farming and many others are included in MONTANA IN MAPS, an atlas published in 1974. So popular has this proved that another atlas, zeroing in on historic Montana, is planned.

DEATH CLAIMS TWO PIONEER NEWSPAPERMEN OF MONTANA

In August, we learned of the death of J. R. (Rusty) Larcombe, longtime editor of the Phillips County News of Malta. We were pleased that copies of the summer 1977 issue of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY had reached him, for it contained a humorous but eminently accurate story about the creation of Phillips County out of parts of Blaine and Valley Counties in northeastern Montana in 1914. Rusty had co-authored this gem with E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte.

As we go to press, we are informed of the passing of another giant of Montana journalism, T. J. (Joe) Hocking of Glasgow, who came to the state in 1910 and operated a number of newspapers in northeastern Montana before establishing the Glasgow Courier in 1913. For nearly a half century, until he sold it in 1958, Mr. Hocking published what is considered one of Montana's finest weekly newspapers.

NEW BOOK TELLS OF BILLINGS PIONEERS AND ZIMMERMAN TRAIL

Charles Zimmerman, who came to the Billings area with his family in 1890, when he was four years old, tells about himself in Along the Zimmerman Trail, but more importantly about the people and the place where he has lived for over 87 years. Zimmerman's book is available at $5.00 by writing Charles Zimmerman, 4743 Grand Ave., Billings, Mt.

AFTER 27 YEARS, WE GET A FACELIFT

Millions of feet have walked on this corner of Roberts Street and Sixth Avenue on the Montana capita campus since the chilly March day in 1950 when Governor John W. Bonner broke ground for the Veteran and Pioneers Memorial Building, the home of the Montana Historical Society. As Architect A. V. Ivor an Contractor W. A. Carson looked on, Governor Bonner described to the assembled crowd plans for a handsome limestone building which would at last adequately house the collections of museum, library an archival materials which had been gathering since 1865. In 1977, this area, at the front of the building received its first thorough-going renovation. The reason: the front walkway was sinking, and there was need to eliminate a step in favor of a gradual ramp for the benefit of the handicapped. The result: stabilit and beauty with the planting of new trees, rest and relaxation with the installation of redwood benche and easy access.

1978 MONTANA HISTORICAL CALENDAR

NEW PERSONNEL ON THE SOCIETY STAFF

Staffing for the newly expanded archival program, under the direction of Archivist Brian Cockhill, has been completed with the arrival of two young professional women who bring to their tasks extensive experience and solid archival training.

When Sue Jackson joined us in September, the Dwight D. Eisenhower Presidential Library in Abilene, Kansas lost one of its best archivists. She earned undergraduate and graduate degrees in history at Wichita State University and an M.A. in Library Science from the University of Texas at Austin. Previous to her work in Abilene, Sue got a taste of the classroom as a Teaching Assistant at Wichita State. With four years at the Eisenhower Library, she is experienced in dealing with a large and varied collection, but tells us that she finds working in Montana collections to be a new and exciting challenge.

Ellie Arguimbau comes to Helena from the University of Colorado in Boulder, where she worked for five years in the Western History Collection as an archivist and research assistant. She earned a B.A. in history at Swarthmore College in Pennsylvania and received her M.A. in history from the University of Colorado. While on the staff at Colorado, Ellie was the compiler and editor of three manuscript guides. She has found Helena and the Historical Society to her liking, as she remarked, "The people here and the materials we have to work with are about as genuine as you can find."

Another new member of the archival staff is Barbara Townsend, who is a native of Helena and a recent graduate of Montana State University. As an Archival Technician she replaces Judy Brown, who took a new position at the Employment Security Division. Barbara joins Frank Marron in the technician category, and currently is deeply involved with the picture collection, under supervision of Lory Morrow.

FUR TRADE CONFERENCE SET

The third North American Fur Trade Conference is scheduled for May 4, 5 and 6, 1978, at Winnipeg, Manitoba, with the program to include papers of interest to students, laymen, historians, geographers, anthropologists and archaeologists. Speakers from Canada, the U. S. and Europe are scheduled. Information is available by writing Fur Trade Conference 1978, P.O. Box 835, Winnipeg, Manitoba R3C 2R1.

Patti Bell, the new Museum Cataloger, says that she has always hoped she could combine her training in archaeology with museum work. After museum training at the University of Kansas and Arizona State University and experience in field archaeology as BLM District Archaeologist in Lewistown, Patti finds her new position in the Society's museum program a perfect spot. Cataloging our collections, Patti admits, is quite a job, but full of possibilities not to be found elsewhere.

Ken Grieb, the new Business Manager of the Historical Society's Libby Dam Project, returns to his hometown after several years' absence. Ken and his wife, Lois, are both Helena natives, and for 16 years Ken was Purchasing and Contracting Officer at the Montana National Guard Armory here. In 1967 he went to work for the Selective Service, a job which took him to Chicago, San Francisco and Los Angeles. Ken is pleased to return to Helena, and his administrative experience adds considerable strength to the Libby Project staff.

Terrie Clancy Casey changed departments and responsibilities when she moved from merchandising to publications. Terrie graduated from Helena High in 1976, and recently married Tom Casey, who is employed by ASARCO in East Helena. Terrie's new duties, under Circulation Manager Bonnie Nelson, include all of those small, but essential, details which assure the circulation of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History. Terrie, who replaces Imogene (Jimmy) Barnes in the department, has a long association with the Society, having worked in the sales area as a student. She is the daughter of the late Dan Clancy, for a number of years our chief accountant.

New at the information desk and involved with the docent program is Pam Bengtson, who was born in Missoula and graduated from Helena High in 1977. When she is not at work greeting visitors or handling incoming phone calls, to say nothing of arranging for field trips and other activities of the volunteer docent group, Pam likes to spend her leisure time sewing and waiting for the first snowfall to pursue her newest activity, skiing.

At the same time we were welcoming new people to the society staff, we were saying goodbye to one of our favorites, Betty Tarvin, who has been with us since she joined the Library staff late in July, 1969. Since 1971, she has been on the merchandising staff, first as assistant to Merchandise Manager Dorothea Neath, and, since July of 1974, as inventory controller. Betty, who lives far up the beautiful Rimini canyon road west of Helena, has all manner of exciting plans for continuing to enjoy life in the outdoors, and we wish her well.

SOCIETY REPRESENTED AT WESTERN MEETINGS

October was a month for travel and professional activities for several Historical Society staff members representing the archives, publications, museum and library. Professional meetings took them to Denver, Salt Lake City, and Portland, where they discussed the latest developments in their various fields.

Attending the national meeting of the Society of American Archivists in Salt Lake City, October 4-7, were archivists Brian Cockhill, Jeffrey Cunniff, Lory Morrow, and Sue Jackson. In several days of meetings they heard discussions about important developments in the archives field, including explanations of the new copyright law.

Acting Museum Curator Mike McCourt and Museum Cataloger Patti Bell spent October 9-15, in Denver attending two conferences, the American Association of Museums Mountain Plains Conference and the Western Association of Arts Museum Conference. Their trip included visits to several museums and exposure to new ideas in exhibits and museum storage.

The Western History Association, of which the Montana Historical Society is a Sponsoring Member, held its annual convention in Portland, Oregon, October 12-15. Two Society staff members and Board member Dr. Michael Malone participated in the meeting. Dr. Malone, who is taking over as a book Review Editor for Montana the magazine of Western History upon the retirement of Dr. Robert G. Athearn of the University of Colorado, also serves on the WHA Council.

At the WHA Convention, Research Librarian Rex Myers and Assistant Editor Bill Lang participated in a session on Blacks in the American West. Dr. Myers chaired the meeting and Dr. Lang presented a paper entitled "A Chapter in the Black West: The Afro-American Community in Helena, Montana, 1870-1920." Dr. Lang's paper documented the existence of a viable and active black community in Helena, which included a description and analysis of their social, cultural, familial, and political activities.

GREAT FALLS GROUP PRESENTS GENEALOGY OF PARIS GIBSON, FOUNDER OF ELECTRIC CITY

A delegation of six members from the Great Falls Genealogical Society visited our building late in September to present a copy of the genealogy of Paris Gibson, the New Englander who, in partnership with Empire Builder James J. Hill, planned and founded the city located at the Great Falls of the Missouri in 1883. This impressive record was compiled by the visiting group, which also publishes a quarterly journal, The Treasure State Lines, dedicated to genealogical study in Montana.

The delegation was led by its president, Bessie Johnson, who is pictured here presenting the Gibson genealogy to Director Ken Korte. Others present were Virginia Lewis, Thelma Marshall, Juanita Harpine, Hazel Nelson, Jayne Welton, and Grace Hoxey.

Only two years old, the Great Falls group recently moved into quarters at Paris Gibson Square, a renovated, historic corner in the Electric City, and along with its other activities recently hosted the Montana State Genealogical convention.

GREAT RUSSELL BRONZE COMES HOME

One of C. M. Russell's largest and most impressive pieces of sculpture, CHANGING OUTFITS, has come to the Society Collection, a gift from Ed Honnen of Denver, retired heavy construction contractor and supplier, and a distinguished collector of Western art. This massive bronze, which measures 32 inches long and nearly 12 inches high, is one of ten cast from the original models a quarter century after the artist's death. Russell originally created three separate pieces, the pack horse, and the two riders, in 1916. Happily, the decision was made to incorporate all three in one massive piece, when the originals were cast in 1951.

Mr. Honnen, who collected Russell bronzes for some three decades, and eventually amassed a total of 34 pieces, willed CHANGING OUTFITS to the Society in 1961, reserving the privilege of keeping it in his personal collection for an indefinite time. Recently, he has dispersed his vast collection, giving a number of pieces to the Colorado Springs Fine Arts Center and specifying that CHANGING OUTFITS would come at last to its permanent home in the Society's Russell collection. The piece was brought to Helena from Denver by Acting Curator Mike McCourt, who was in the Colorado city attending two professional meetings. Because of its massive size, a specially designed pedestal is being prepared for its display in the Russell Gallery on our main floor. It becomes the largest Russell bronze in the Society's collection, which contains more than forty bronzes and original models by the Cowboy Artist.

NEZ PERCE SURRENDER 100 YEARS AGO COMMEMORATED

On the grassy slopes along Snake Creek south of Chinook, in northern Montana, the surrender of the Nez Perce a century ago was brought back to life as the leading participants, Chief Joseph with the remnants of his band, and Col. Nelson A. Miles with his cavalry forces, were portrayed by both Indians and whites. The scene culminated a series of events marking the centennial of the flight of the Nez Perce, which began in Idaho early in the summer of 1877. Some 375 Chief Joseph Appaloosa Trail Riders, who have been searching out and following the trail for some 13 years, were on hand, all of them riding the spotted horses associated with the tribe. There were informative remarks by Dr. Merrill D. Beal of Pocatello, Idaho, a recognized authority on the subject; Harold G. Stearns of Helena, former president of the Historical Society, and a follow-up review of Nez Perce history after the surrender by Harlin Lucas of Harlowton, Montana.

WILSON, SCHLEBECKER CONFERENCE SPEAKERS

DEC 17 1979

JOAN HOFF WILSON

Joan Hoff Wilson and John T. Schlebecker, both nationally recognized scholars, will address the Fourth Annual Montana History Conference to be held November 3-5, 1977, at the Colonial in Helena. The Conference is sponsored cooperatively by the Montana Heritage Foundation, the Montana Historical Society, and the Council to Preserve Montana History, with funding provided by the Montana Committee for the Humanities.

At the Friday luncheon, Ms. Wilson, whose special fields are twentieth century American foreign policy and political history, will treat the career of Montana's famous suffragist and Congresswoman, Jeannette Rankin. Joan Hoff Wilson is Professor of History at Arizona State University and is the author of several books and articles including Herbert Hoover: Forgotten Progressive (1975), and American Business and Foreign Policy, 1920-1933 (1971). Her address on Jeannette Rankin promises to be a revisionist view of the nation's first woman to serve in Congress.

John T. Schlebecker will speak at the Friday evening banquet on "Things in History," reflecting on his lengthy career in the classroom, museum and at the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., where he is currently Chairman of the Department of Industries. Dr. Schlebecker has written more than ten volumes on the history of American agriculture and published widely in professional journals.

In addition to their major addresses, Drs. Wilson and Schlebecker will participate in panel discussions. Joan Wilson will be a participant on a Friday afternoon panel with K. Ross Roole, Norma Smith, and Belle Winestine entitled "Jeannette Rankin, a Woman of Controversy." In another Friday afternoon session, "Critical Transitions in the Montana Livestock Industry," John Schlebecker will join Erwin Miller, Robert Smith and Mons Teigen.

Anyone desiring more advance information on Conference plans, accommodations, and activities may contact Rex Myers, Research Librarian at the Society.

KOOTENAI HISTORY EXPLORED AT SEMINAR

Historians, educators, archeologists, anthropologists, librarians, and curators gathered at the Libby Dam Visitor Center in the Northwest corner of Montana on June 24 and 25 to discuss the Kootenai historic region, which incorporates territory on both sides of the U.S.-Canadian border. The meeting, which was officially called "Waters of Wealth: A Seminar in the Kootenai Region of the United States and Canada," was sponsored by the Montana Historical Society and the Army Corps of Engineers through a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH). Over 150 persons attended one or more of the six general sessions, which featured nearly twenty speakers, making the seminar an unqualified success.

The seminar idea first germinated in 1976 with Claire Munzenrider, then Acting Curator of the Visitor Center, and Bob Gant, Museum Curator at the Montana Historical Society. But it was Jennifer Jeffries, Curator of the Visitor Center, who submitted a grant proposal to NEH, acquired the necessary funding, and organized the two-day meeting, which focused on the rich archeological, anthropological, and historical resources of the region inundated or affected by the Libby Dam on the Kootenai. The seminar began Friday morning and concluded late Saturday afternoon.

The intent of the sessions as stated in the NEH proposal, was "to encourage the study and preservation of the history of the Kootenai Region of northwestern Montana, northern Idaho, and southeastern British Columbia . . . to assemble and disseminate the information available and to charge those present with the concern and urgency necessary to proceed with the preservation of the Kootenai heritage." The central topic of the meeting was the historic interaction between man and the Kootenai environment, what should be done to preserve that story, and how to interpret it.

Gathering historic artifacts, preserving those remnants of the past, and generally identifying historic sites was the central topic of two sessions on Friday and Saturday afternoon entitled "So Now You Want to Preserve Your History." tana Historical Society engaged the audience in lively and informative discussions exploring the whole topic of historic preservation. These sessions, as well as the remainder of the meeting, were very instructive, providing attendees with difficult to obtain information. University of Montana's Office of Continuing Education recognized the seminar's instructional merit by granting one hour of graduate credit to those who enrolled.

In his welcoming remarks, Ken Coffman, Project Manager at Libby Dam, set a keynote for the seminar by alerting all to the centrality of the Kootenai River itself. Using the analogy of the human life cycle, Coffman portrayed the life of the Kootenai, from glacial youth to meandering maturity, as a living influence on the environment and mankind. Dr. Carling Malouf, University of Montana anthropologist, then introduced the audience to the overall study of man's activities in the region. Dr. Malouf's most telling point was the importance of the role of the less-than-famous persons who inhabit a region. These often inarticulate individuals do not create their own monuments through deeds, Malouf reminded everyone, but nonetheless embody the daily history of man.

David Thompson, the Hudson Bay Company operatives, and other famous persons who left heavy footprints in the region were not, however, ignored at the seminar. Donald Spritzer, a Missoula librarian and historian, H. D. Smiley of Eureka, and David Chance of the University of Idaho discussed the David Thompson types and their influence. Dr. Smiley's talk enlivened the session when he detailed the many myths and legends concerning the first European and American explorations of the Kootenai.

One of the highlights of the seminar was Dr. William O. Green's banquet address on Friday evening. Dr. Green, a physician from the Cranbrook, B. C. area, spoke of his father's and his experiences as physicians in the region since the early years of this century. It is the personal experience such as Dr. Green's that Ed Eschler of the Office of Public Instruction spoke of as the "spirit" or ambiance of life in the Kootenai. Time and again the discussions came back to those indefinable links between the development of man's culture and a changing environment.

Wayne Choquette, a Canadian studying at the University of Idaho, cited some excellent examples of the archeological evidence indicating the patterns of native life in the Kootenai. Choquette and other archeologists believe that ancestors of the Kootenai Indians arrived in the region 12,000 years ago, and that it is likely they were nomadic, either travelling through the area or returning seasonally. Choquette emphasized how much research needs to be done on the archeological and historical sites.

The Kootenai Indians lived with the river, but, as Frank Netherton, Curator of History at Fort Steele (B.C.) Historic Park, and William Gurney, Interpretive Specialist at Fort Steele, told the conferees, Americans and Canadians have been busy putting the river to their own uses. Beginning with mining activity in the 1860's, Mr. Gurney explained, there was the suggestion that a canal might be gouged linking the Kootenai with Columbia Lake. Gurney entertained his audience with the tragicomic tale of Baille Grohman's completion of the canal in the 1880's, only to have it ruined by two oversized boats which tried to navigate the narrow waterway.

If the seminar delivered a singular message, it was that from pre-historic to contemporary times the river and man have lived in fragile harmony. "Each human group borrowing from the region has left a mark: a legend, a path, or the remains of what was once important to him. These now quiet cultures recede more as time passes and soon will be unknown." This excerpt from the seminar's statement of purpose summarizes the feelings of those who attended the meeting. "It was a great success," Jennifer Jeffries said, "because so many enthusiastic people met and shared their ideas and knowledge about the Kootenai heritage." Jennifer and the other participants hope to hold similar conferences in the future, and it is an idea which other historic regions in Montana ought to consider.

MELOY RETIRES FROM LIBRARY POST

Harriett C. Meloy, one of Montana's most involved women, especially in the field of education, rounded out two decades of service to the Historical Society Library when she retired early in May. Meanwhile, she continues as a member of the Montana Board of Education, to which she was appointed in 1970 and which she served as president in 1976. And, along with membership in the League of Women Voters and the American Association of University Women, she recently took on more responsibility as a member of the board of Helena's Symphony Society.

A native of North Dakota, Harriett has lived in Helena since 1929, when her father, the late C. H. Crittenden, joined the administrative staff of Intermountain College. Harriett is married to District Judge Peter Meloy and they are the parents of five children, all of whom are as involved in civic and governmental affairs as are their parents. Their oldest son, Mike, is a leader in the Montana House of Representatives.

Harriett joined the Library staff of the Society in 1957, and upon the retirement of the late Mary Dempsey in 1969, became Librarian. Her successor has not yet been named.

Aside from her long tenure and her familiarity with the holdings of the Society, Harriett's wide acquaintance in Montana and other states, especially among those working in the field of western history, has been a decided asset, and she is greatly missed by patrons and colleagues alike.

A COMMITMENT BY ALL MONTANANS: "MAGNIFICENT RUSSELL" WILL STAY

On May 10, seated at an antique desk in front of the great Russell oil painting, WHEN THE LAND BELONGED TO GOD, and using a borrowed pen, Gov. Thomas L. Judge signed into law a legislative appropriation for $300,000 to purchase the masterpiece from the Montana Club of Helena. With $150,000 in privately raised funds, the appropriation made the transaction possible. At the same time, Gov. Judge signed a bill providing $50,000 for preservation and security of art works at the capitol complex. Commenting on his own deep commitment to keeping Montana's cultural heritage intact, the chief executive added: "Russell preserved for this and future generations the life and vitality of the West when it was first encountered by trappers, prospectors and cattlemen who settled this region. His paintings—their color, drama and size—bring home to us forcefully the dreams of independence and reverence for nature which underlie the quality of life we Montanans work hard to nurture and defend." In the picture below, officials of the Montana Club joined Director Ken Korte (seated, right) in signing documents transferring ownership of the painting to the State of Montana. Signing is M. Herbert Goodwin, president of the Club, while in the background Club Manager Edith Tanner joins members of the organization's board: Russ Ritter, Ward Shanahan and Peter Pauly.

SOLID, ENTERTAINING BOOKS FROM THE WEST

BUFFALO WOMAN by Dorothy M. Johnson. A favorite Montana writer has come up with what may well be her best book in years, this time a portrait of an Indian woman. Although the subject lived during the calamitous fighting days of Sitting Bull and Crazy Horse, the focus is on the daily life of Buffalo Woman. With the solidity of research we have come to expect, along with her well-known storytelling gifts, Dorothy Johnson has captured this Indian woman—alive. Dodd Mead. $6.95.

JAMES MADISON ALDEN: YANKEE ARTIST OF THE PACIFIC COAST, 1854-1860, by Franz Stenzel, M.D. A well-known collector and art authority here tells, in a superbly illustrated and crafted book, about the life and work of a New Englander who came to California right after the gold rush but traveled the West Coast to delineate, with the sensitivity of an artist but the pragmatism of a draftsman, life in Oregon, Washington's Puget Sound, and the territories controlled by Hudson's Bay. This beautiful book is the result of eight years of painstaking research. Amon Carter. $25.00.

ADVENTURES IN WESTERN ART by Dean Krakel. With startling behind-the-scenes candor, one of the American West's most successful museum/gallery directors and entrepreneurs tells his adventures—first as director of the Gilcrease Institute in Tulsa, and for the last dozen years as head of the Cowboy Hall of Fame in Oklahoma City. There is controversy here, and single-minded drive. But there is much to learn and to be instructed by, as Dean Krakel tells his own experiences in developing two great institutions—literally from scratch. Lowell Press. $11.95.

WILLIAM CLARK: JEFFERSONIAN MAN ON THE FRONTIER by Jerome O. Steffen. For too long, the co-captain of the Lewis and Clark Expedition has been seen as an unlettered, though ruggedly efficient, frontiersman and leader in the field. In this new appraisal, we learn much more, including Clark's remarkable career after the famous 1803-1806 journey, and his development, along with the country, during the Jefferson-to-Jackson period. U. of Oklahoma Press. $8.95.

40 YEARS' GATHERIN' by Spike Van Cleve. One of the most successful books of the current publishing season turns out to be a natural Montana product, told by a natural Montana product, Spike Van Cleve of Big Timber. Using the vernacular straight, this gifted story-teller keeps the reader so enthralled with humor, philosophy and sensitive observations of life in Montana that he evokes thoughts of Will Rogers and the other "naturalists" who have enriched our lives. The rarest kind of reading treat. Lowell Press. $11.95.

CONSERVATORS USE TECHNOLOGY AND IN

For two months this summer, two enthusiastic smock-clad art conservators were rummaging through the museum collections at the Society, taking an over-all look at our holdings and proposing ways to conserve, store and restore as necessity demands. Dee Minault and Claire Munzenrider, advanced students at the Cooperstown (N.Y.) Graduate Program in Conservation of Historic and Artistic Works, were working at their annual eight-week summer project here in Helena. The Society is fortunate to have had these dedicated and knowledgeable conservators, for even a brief time, because, like most museum collections, ours demands immediate care.

Minault, who graduated from Wellesley College in 1969 with a B.A. in art history, first got interested in art conservation while she was employed at the Worcester (Mass.) Art Museum. Beginning her studies at Cooperstown in 1975, specializing in the conservation of paintings, Dee will initiate her internship next year at the Clark Art Institute in Williamstown, Massachusetts.

Munzenrider, a Helena native, is a graduate of Carroll College in history and has worked at the Museum of the Rockies in Bozeman and as Acting Curator at the Libby Dam Visitor Center in 1976. She says she first realized the importance of art conservation, however, while she was in Florence, Italy, during her senior year at Carroll. Claire entered the Cooperstown program in 1976 after she completed studies in chemistry and art history at Montana State University and spent one year apprenticing at the Baltimore Museum of Art.

During their stay with us, Claire and Dee have carefully evaluated the physical condition of the museum pieces, designing new storage facilities, and instructing the Society staff in the proper handling of museum materials.

"The art and artifacts at the Montana Historical Society," Dee Minault told us, "really are in no poorer condition than other similar collections, but they do need intensive work immediately, particularly some of the larger paintings and delicate ceramics."

The work of the conservator is exacting, highly technical, and often tedious, both women explained. A thorough knowledge of applied chemistry, microscopy, and even geology is an essential preparation for work in the conservation field. This is necessary, according to Munzenrider, because so many museum objects are literally in the process of chemically destroying themselves. Oil paintings, for example, are composed of organic and inorganic materials which are actually fighting each other. After a century, and often much sooner, nearly all paintings need conservation if they are to survive.

An art conservator's training includes hours of classroom instruction in art history, chemistry, other applied sciences, and the history of restoration and conservation itself. But most of their training, Dee and Claire told us, takes place in the laboratory, where museum objects are meticulously examined, repaired, and their beauty preserved, using the latest techniques. These techniques have been developed through practical application.

"We are not studying a theoretical field," Dee reminds us, "because what we do with, say, a magnificent Charlie Russell, can well mean a shortened or extended life for that painting."

There is even more to the work than mastering various specialized techniques. There is practice, practice, and more practice, for so much of what a conservator does requires a dexterous hand, an eye for microscopic detail—and, above all, concentration.

The program at Cooperstown requires three years to complete, two years in residence and a one year internship. It is an intensive program and competition for the ten available slots each year is stiff. Graduates receive an M.A. degree from the State University College at Oneonta, New York. Being in Cooperstown has its advantages, since tourism and museology are practically the life blood of the small upstate community. The town is home for the New York State Historical Association, the National Baseball Hall of

STINCT TO PROTECT MUSEUM, ART OBJECTS

Fame, and four other museums, while in nearby Oneonta there are three more.

Working for museums during their summers, as Dee and Claire were doing here, provides students with valuable experience in actual conservation problems, and the problems are as varied as the collections. Regardless of the specific museum object, the conservator must first examine it thoroughly and determine its precise condition. If there are signs of deterioration, the conservator then decides on the best method to arrest it. Often objects are in such fragile condition that internal reconstitution is necessary. To remedy this, conservators apply specially prepared glues and cements, and in some extreme cases preservation requires that synthetic waxes be injected into the object's cellular structure. It is easy to see how and why art conservation has become so technical and sophisticated.

Even something as obvious and simple as cleaning requires great care and knowledge. A carved bowl, an old sword, or other relic of the past rarely comes to a museum in good condition. Years of dirt or oxidation might obscure much of the detail, but cleaning it improperly might do enough damage to lessen its historic value. More than cleaning, though, it is repairing museum objects which require the maximum of the conservator.

When paintings and other pieces require repair, conservators are careful not to alter the integrity of the object itself. Instead of restoring a painting by simply coloring over blemishes, for example, conservators strive to preserve the original work as much as possible.

"If we need to retouch a painting," Munzenrider explained, "we are sure to make our additions reversible to avoid any permanent tampering with the original." Repairing paintings, or any other material, requires a complete knowledge of its physical composition and the means to stabilize and retard its deterioration.

One element of art conservation which the uninitiated usually overlook is storage.

"Dee and Claire have aided us greatly in this area," commented Acting Curator Mike McCourt. "For years we have had inadequate storage facilities," Mike noted, adding "and this only multiplied the poor storage techniques."

Each object should be stored in a controlled environment, and each material demands specialized treatment. Paintings, for example, should never lean one against another, and their frames should always rest on a padded surface. Paper articles should be jacketed in acid-free envelopes and folders, and textiles should not be folded or sharply creased when stored. Photographs, ceramics, wooden articles, and so many other materials each require tailored handling and storage procedures.

In addition to refurbishing the museum storage areas, Dee and Claire assisted Mike McCourt and Jim Warner of the curatorial staff create a new receiving area for museum pieces. Incoming objects, Dee explained, must be kept separate from the stored collections where they can be inspected and fumigated, if necessary, to prevent contaminating the entire collection.

All of us concluded that the more one learns about art conservation the more imperative it becomes for every museum to have access to trained personnel, a laboratory, and the latest materials. The Montana Historical Society collections contain such a variety of objects, from Indian beaded and quilled vestments to heavy Russell oils, that conservation efforts will require great expertise and experience. Society Director Ken Korte said it best when he noted that conservation is not a luxury. It is simply the best insurance the people of Montana can buy for their historic treasures in the Historical Society.

Finding qualified art conservators, however, is not as easy as it sounds. In fact, art conservation itself is a relatively young field. Although art restoration can be dated as early as the ancient Greeks, conserving and preserving art and artifacts is a 20th century means of protecting objects from the ravages of time. Instructional programs in conservation are even more recent. The Cooperstown program began in 1969, and it is only in the last few years that any but the nation's largest art museums have established conservation departments. But awareness of the importance of conservation is growing, and regional centers, such as the one planned in Denver, will soon be able to service smaller museums.

The Montana Historical Society is one of nearly fifteen member institutions who form the museum consortium funding the regional conservation center at Denver University. Once the center is staffed and labs are completed, probably within a year, consortium members can expect technical aid in preserving their collections and a training program available to their own museum staffs.

"This capability," Ken Korte remarked, "can bring professional art conservation within our grasp. It is long overdue, and the work Claire and Dee have done here demonstrates just how much attention our collections need."

COMMUNITY EFFORT PRE

The first Mormon church edifice ever built in Montana with permanence in mind has become headquarters for Anaconda's Copper Village Museum and Art Gallery, lending itself well to the display and preservation of the history and culture of Marcus Daly's famous smelter city. At left is a close-up of one of the stained glass panels designed by Sister Joeann Daley and crafted by Fr. James Barry for the building. Below is one section of display cases containing objects and art reflecting the region's history.

Anaconda, Marcus Daly's historic planned city at the southern end of Deer Lodge valley, is home for a unique art gallery and historical museum, which is housed, appropriately, in one of the city's historic buildings. Just north of the magnificent Deer Lodge County Court House, visitors to Anaconda can find the Copper Village Museum and Art Center located in a solid and unpretentious building, now owned and maintained by the county. Built in 1926 by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, it was the first church erected by that denomination in Montana. Since October, 1971, when the museum and gallery first opened, this building has served a dual purpose, housing historic artifacts and preserving itself as a useful civic structure.

The art gallery occupies the main floor of the old church where art shows by regional and national artists are scheduled regularly.

"When we first got the building in 1971," one museum volunteer remembers, "there were still pews in the main room."

The story of the acquisition of the building, which the Salvation Army had purchased from the Mormons in 1955, is a testament to what can be achieved when a small group of interested citizens gain the cooperation of local government in pursuing a worthwhile goal. Sister Joeann Daley, an artist and Dominican nun, Florence Johnson, a local artist and historian, along with several others, were interested in establishing a gallery and museum for years before this opportunity came. With the use of permissive millage funds, Deer Lodge County officials agreed to save the structure and provide a home for the newly conceived Copper Village Center.

It was not long after it opened that the art gallery featured well-known artists and generated considerable interest. The historical museum, which occupies the basement level, boasts handsome display cabinets containing artifacts as different as nineteenth century gowns and mining paraphernalia.

When Copper Village first opened, Florence Cortright remembers, "We had a number of museum pieces but no means to display them properly, so we set them up behind a chicken-wire screen. It was primitive, but at least we preserved them."

The new display cabinets, exceptional for a small museum, are the work of Art Baumgardner, who patterned his designs after museum cases in the Montana Historical Society. Marian Geil, an Anaconda librarian who volunteers a great deal of her time to the museum, works with Mr. Baumgardner designing and arranging the exhibits. The museum artifacts on display depict a variety of occupations and life styles which exemplify the history of Deer Lodge valley.

Liz Cortright, director of Copper Village, is an accomplished artist who received an M.F.A. degree from University of Montana and studied in Paris. Two of her sculptures and a mural decorate the new University Library in Missoula. Liz emphasizes that Copper Village is truly a cooperative endeavor, and that it serves the historically-minded population in Anaconda as a meeting place and center of interest.

SERVES HISTORY OF DALY'S SMELTER CITY

LIZ CORTRIGHT, director of Copper Village, looks over an intricate, historic camera which recently came to the collections and which will be integrated with the versatile displays in the museum and cultural center which has been steadily growing in Anaconda since its opening in 1971.

Increasing interest in local history and historic preservation in Anaconda spawned two new organizations in 1976. The Heritage Committee, organized in the fall of 1976, reflects the concern of many citizens that historic buildings and designated areas in Anaconda and Deer Lodge County be preserved and maintained as historic sites. They are an ambitious group who hope to have Anaconda declared a National Historic District. If they succeed in placing the Anaconda Historic District on the National Register, the buildings preserved will be eligible for federal support funds. Immediately, though, the Heritage Committee is struggling desperately to save Marcus Daly's famous Montana Hotel on Main Street from possible demolition.

In October, 1976, as a result of interest in Bicentennial activities, several local historians, many of whom took part in producing Under The Shadow of Mount Haggin, a community history, organized the Tri-County Historical Society. Alice Finnegan, one of the organizers, is optimistic that the Society will be able to write a new history of Anaconda using both oral history and traditional sources. Mrs. Finnegan began historical research, as have many other local historians, by researching her own genealogy—a search which led her to Daniel Murphy from County Cork, Ireland, who mined on Silver Bow Creek in 1863.

Mrs. Finnegan, Florence Johnson, Dr. Mabel Tuscherer, and other Tri-County Historical Society organizers know that writing a definitive history of Anaconda is quite an undertaking, but the enthusiastic efforts to save historic buildings and the Copper Village Museum activities indicate broad interest in preserving Anaconda's history. They encourage general participation in their projects.

"I have quite a bit of donated historical materials piling up in my home," Alice Finnegan says, "but I am not complaining."

She hopes that soon the Society will have quarters of their own to preserve these materials properly.

The Tri-County Historical Society is active also in historic preservation. Presently they are trying to save another piece of Anaconda's history from the wrecking ball, St. Paul's Catholic Church, built in 1888. Between the Heritage Committee and the Historical Society, Anaconda's historic structures have more than an even chance of extended life, and it is the Copper Village Museum which has been a hub of all this activity and more.

Any day you might wander into the Copper Village and Art Center and see art lovers, artists, local historians, historic preservationists, and those just fond of museums mingling. It is quite a unique place, blending complementary interests and proving to be an attraction in Anaconda.

WHEN THE MONTANA SILVER SERVICE (AND THE U.S. NAVY) WERE YOUNGER

The elegant, historic silver service set, created for the State of Montana in 1907 and placed aboard the USS MONTANA at its commissioning at Norfolk, Va. on July 21, 1908, was photographed on that occasion with the heavily engraved pieces resting on a platform erected on the quarter deck of the gallant cruiser. Now in the Montana Historical Society for public display, the set was shown in a modern picture we published in the last issue of THE POST. The story and picture inspired the accompanying letter from Captain William H. Galbraith, a man who remembers with nostalgia and humor this magnificent silver aggregation, which contains some 1600 ounces of pure silver and has served symbolically aboard a series of naval vessels with Montana-related names.

The photograph appearing in your May/June issue awakened some nostalgic memories for me. The old USS MONTANA formed a part of a cruiser division of which my own NORTH CAROLINA was a member during World War I and after. When the war ended, this division cruised to the west coast along with the newly-formed Pacific Fleet. But, being superannuated, they were left with greatly reduced crews to swing idly about their anchors off the Puget Sound Navy Yard until, by about 1925, they were sold to the ship breakers for scrap.

During this period, these two ships lost their names to newly laid down battleships, the MONTANA becoming the MISSOULA and the NORTH CAROLINA, the CHARLOTTE.

The MONTANA silver service was, as is the custom, returned to the donor State, and was doubtless presented to the second HELENA. Then, upon the outbreak of World War II, upon stripping the ship for action, the service must have been landed and again returned to the State. The third HELENA, as you state, then received the silver.

In its first period of service following 1907, when the Navy was yet alcoholicly unregenerated, the beautiful punch bowl must have often contained punch packing a real wallop, for in those days, as I am told by my elders, the liquor flowed very freely in the officers' messes. But after Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels made the U.S. Navy a grape juice affair, I doubt that the silver service saw any real service other than display in the passageway leading to the Captain's cabin. For who can wax enthusiastic over such an emasculated beverage as one consisting only of fruit juices and soda pop?

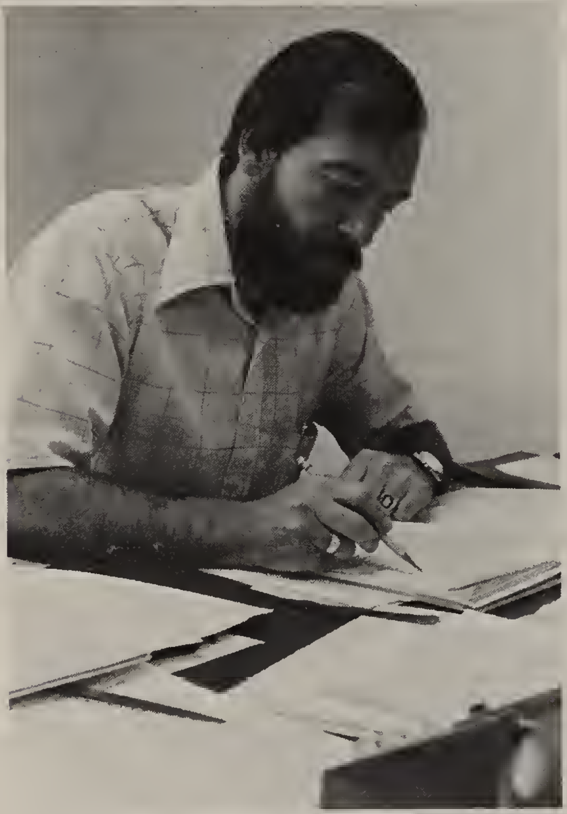
PUBLISHING, ARCHIVAL STAFFS AMONG SOCIETY DEPARTMENTS AUGMENTED BY NEW PERSONNEL

With the beginning of a new fiscal year, and especially because of a greatly expanded Montana State Archives program under aegis of The Historical Society, we have welcomed some new faces this summer, with the prospect of introducing more to our readers as they arrive in the coming months. Expected to join the staff of Archivist Brian Cockhill will be two professional archivists, while replacements are expected for Librarian Harriett C. Meloy and Curator Bob Gant.

At the same time, some introductions are in order for other departments. William L. Lang, who has taught history at Helena's Carroll College since 1971, has joined Editor Vivian A. Paladin in the publications division, replacing Dee Ann Koehnke, who left to pursue a career in public relations.

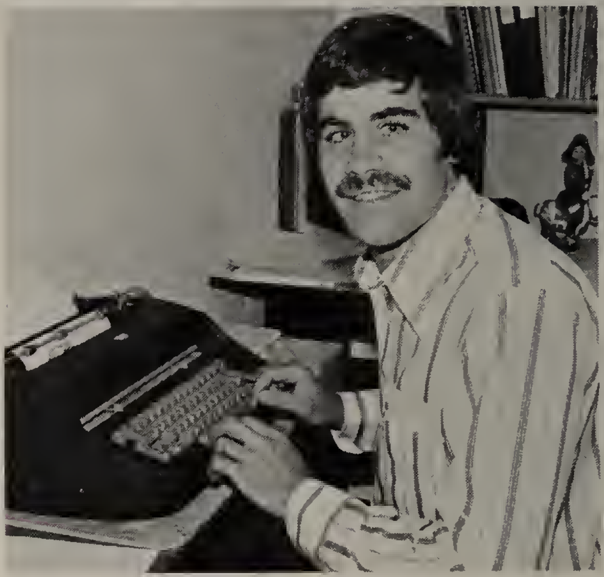


BILL LANG

A native of Portland, Ore., Lang received his B.A. in 1964 from Willamette University, Salem, Ore., and his M.A. two years later from Washington State University in Pullman. He earned his Ph.D. in 1973 at the University of Delaware in Newark, writing his dissertation on the subject: "Black Bootstraps: The Abolitionist Educators' Ideology and the Education of the Northern Free Negro, 1828-1860." His subject reflects his continuing interest in ethnic history, an interest which garnered him a NEH Fellowship in Ethnic Studies at Columbia University in 1976, and led to a recent paper entitled "The Nearly Forgotten Negroes on Last Chance Gulch, 1900-1912" which he delivered in April at the Pacific Northwest History Conference in Ellensburg, Wash. He will present another approach to this subject in October at the Western History Association meeting in Portland.

Oral history, another enthusiasm of Bill Lang, resulted in a continuing project of recording history undertaken with Prof. Jeff Safford of Montana State University. Meanwhile, before he cuts ties with teaching, he will fulfill a prior commitment to teach during July and August at the University of Delaware.

JUDY BROWN



FRANK MARRON

"Bill Lang's strengths in history are greatly appreciated by the Society's publishing division," Editor Paladin commented. "This is especially true because he was willing to give up a successful career in teaching to enter the sometimes perilous but always exciting arenas of publishing."

Two new positions have been added to the Montana State Archives staff. The Archival Technicians, as the positions are called, include duties ranging from handling accessioned manuscripts and records to preparing library catalog cards. These two new persons will strengthen the archives program by freeing the archivists to process the many collections begging for attention.

Judy Brown, one of the new Archival Technicians, graduated in history from University of Montana in June, where she worked with U.M. Archivist, Dale Johnson. She also worked four successive summers for the U.S. Soil Conservation Service in Bozeman, where she worked in such diverse fields as map making and teletype operation. Judy, who was born in Lewistown, is pleased that she can remain in Montana while pursuing a career in archival management.

Frank Marron, the second Archival Technician, also received a B.A. in history from Missoula in 1975. He taught American History and Sociology at Beaverhead High School in Dillon the year after his graduation, and then returned to Missoula for additional studies in 1976. As a new staff member, Frank is returning to his hometown with his wife, Annette, who works for the Montana Hardware and Implement Association in Helena.

New to the staff of Merchandise Manager Dorothea Neath is Earlis Schultz, a native of Bozeman and widely experienced in office procedures. She replaces Joan Huth, who has moved to Miles City. Widow of the late Ken Schultz of the Montana Highway Department, Earlis says she finds the infinite variety at the Society intriguing, ranging as it does from Russell art to Indian artifacts to the latest books on western history.

ART OF BETTY BILLUPS WELL RECEIVED BY GALLERY VISITORS

A treasure of Indian portraiture in oils and pen and ink, some remarkable landscapes and even a sepia-tone portfolio of prints, most of which is available at surprisingly low prices, is on display throughout August in the Poindexter Gallery. They are the work of Betty Billups, well known California artist whose sympathy for the Indian people goes back to her childhood. The show's title, INNER FEELINGS, expresses well Billups' philosophy and artistry.

PLANS SET FOR HISTORY CONFAB

The famous "Lady from Montana," Jeannette Rankin, the history of the State Legislature, Montana's livestock industry, and burgeoning plans for historic preservation will provide topics for discussion during the Fourth Annual Montana History Conference, slated for November 3, 4 and 5, with headquarters at the Colonial Inn in Helena. Like the first three such sessions, the 1977 conference will feature a potpourri of lectures, panels, practical workshops, and movies, all designed to bring together professional historians and all those interested in Montana history.

Sponsored by the Montana Heritage Foundation in cooperation with the Montana Committee for the Humanities, the Montana Historical Society and the Council to Preserve Montana History, the conference will begin Thursday evening, November 3, with registration and an open house at the Historical Society's building across Roberts Street from the capitol. Featured that evening will be two movies, "The Plow that Broke the Plains," and "The River." Registration will continue Friday morning at the Colonial.

Formal sessions, all of which are consonant with the Committee for the Humanities theme, "Traditions in Transition," will begin Friday. Joan Wilson, a nationally recognized authority on Jeannette Rankin, will deliver the luncheon address Friday, discussing the political career of this first woman ever to serve in Congress. Ms. Wilson then heads an afternoon panel, during which the public is invited to discuss varied aspects of Miss Rankin's career, including her two wartime terms in Congress.

Neil Lynch, former State Legislator from Butte, heads a second Friday session focusing on the controversial history of Montana's territorial and state legislative assemblies. Dr. Jeff Safford, Montana State University, and Dr. Bob Smith of Eastern Montana College, are among participants in another Friday panel entitled "Twentieth Century Transitions in the Montana Livestock Industry." Participants will include Montana ranchers who can relate first-hand experiences with the industry's growth and problems.

John T. Schlebecker of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., will be the banquet speaker Friday evening, taking as his subject, "Things in History." Advance information indicates that his remarks will constitute a lively and informal reminiscence about the delights and puzzles of working in the nation's largest museum, and the "things" we save to illustrate our traditions.

The rapidly growing field of historic preservation will be explored during a session Friday and again at two Saturday workshops. Society Director Ken Korte heads the Friday panel designed to examine the role of state and federal governments in historic preservation. Saturday's workshops will be highlighted by a discussion of Methods of Preserving Indian History in Montana, headed by Professor George Horse Capture of the College of Great Falls. For Montanans who want to preserve the complete history of their community or region, this workshop is a must. Members of the Society's Historic Preservation staff, including Program Manager Al Thompson, will provide a second workshop on procedures and techniques for saving Montana landmarks.

A new addition to this year's schedule is a business meeting Friday afternoon for all members of the Montana Historical Society. Director Ken Korte notes that the purpose of this meeting is to provide an exchange of ideas and to create an "active" Society membership. The conference will adjourn before lunch on Saturday, so participants can return home that day.

Further information and registration forms will be mailed to Society members in late summer. More conference details will also be found in the next issue of THE MONTANA POST.

SOCIETY FUNDING LOOKS FAVORABLE

The Montana Historical Society can look forward to better days ahead as a result of its successes with Montana's 45th Legislature. Thanks to the efforts of legislators, friends and patrons, and a hard-working Board of Trustees, the Society can face the coming biennium with increased general fund support of many of its program areas.

After July 1, the museum and galleries program will no longer depend on earned revenue for salaries and operational funds. The general fund will pick up salaries and a portion of the program's operating expenses. While supporting the publishing program, including all salaries and expenses, the earned revenue account will hopefully flourish to the point where savings can be earmarked for conservation and restoration work in the library and museum collections. A new secretary will be added to the museum program to assist with the deluge of mail and the continued cataloging and collections responsibilities of that department.

Effective January 1 of this year, the Society assumed responsibility for the historic preservation program from the Parks and Recreation Division of Fish and Game. An advisory board appointed by the Governor assists with program direction and will work with the present and future staff on program priorities. Al Thompson, who transferred to the Society staff, presently manages the program. The Historical Society Director, through appointment by the Governor, serves as State Historic Preservation officer. A historian, historic architect and an archeologist will be added to the program staff after July 1 to meet state and federal guidelines. More about this exciting new adjunct to our responsibilities will be dealt with in more depth in forthcoming issues of THE POST.

The archives/manuscripts program of the Society, however, received the most significant increase in general fund support. One of the crucial activities of the Society, the archives has fallen further and further behind in the past decade in its ability to cope with the increasing backlog of materials acquired for preservation and research. Just as importantly, there has been no opportunity for seeking out new materials.

Major emphasis was given to increasing the budget for the archival program by the Society administration for the coming biennium. Happily, the legislature, too, recognized this great deficiency and as a consequence a significant upgrading of staff will take place with the opening of the next fiscal year on July 1, 1977.

THE CROWDED ARCHIVES

"With these staff additions," Archivist Brian Cockhill explained, "it will be possible to process and insure preservation of a large percentage of our backlog, and expand our acquisitions program as well. While our ability to seek out collections will still be hampered by lack of travel funds, we hope to secure as much historic material as possible, within these limitations.

"In cooperation with several national organizations we also intend to begin work on a guide to manuscripts and records in Montana which will greatly lessen the burden for the researcher when using state historical materials."

BLIND, HANDICAPPED CAN "READ" SOCIETY'S JOURNAL

Katherine (Kit) Thomas, who by any ordinary standard would have much to keep her busy as a housewife and mother of five children, devotes from an hour to an hour and a half each day, while her children are in school, to read and record MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY on 90-minute cassette tapes for the blind and physically handicapped. Kit Thomas began recording the magazine in October, 1974, as part of a project sponsored by the Montana State Library's Division for the Blind and Physically Handicapped (DBPH). With minimal equipment — a small, portable recorder checked out from the State Library — Mrs. Thomas sits on the carpeted floor of her bedroom and carefully reads and records.

"It is not at all glamorous," she commented when she saw the picture of herself at work, adding, however, that "it really is a privilege to record this magazine and to be able to share it with people who cannot read it on their own."

Born in Chicago and raised in Columbus, Montana, Kit Thomas has a deep interest in Montana history: "When I was in high school I remember wishing that we could read about famous people in Montana . . . or read things written by Montanans. It is so nice to find this wealth of fine material in your magazine. I learn so much myself while I record."

Each copy of the magazine is recorded on three to four cassette tapes, depending on the length of the issue. The total process, from describing the cover, carefully reading the text including footnotes, book reviews and letters to the editor, and describing the illustrations, takes Mrs. Thomas from three to four weeks.

She pre-reads the magazine before taping, checking for proper pronunciation of names, which are "oftentimes almost impossible to find." Her final master tapes are then made into sixty-four copies for circulation on a rotation basis to from 150 to 200 subscribers in Montana. In addition, four sets of tapes of the magazine are sent on an exchange basis to the regional libraries for the blind and physically handicapped in Utah, Arizona, Idaho, and South Dakota, where copies are made for their patrons. Arizona Highways, Gourmet, Idaho Yesterdays, and the Observer (Montana Association for the Blind Newsletter) are taped at these other regional libraries and exchanged with the Montana State Library for MONTANA.

In addition to cassette tapes, the Montana State Library, working with a national network of cooperating libraries, provides a collection of Braille and "talking" books and magazines that can be checked out by any person who, because of visual or physical handicap, is not able to read conventionally printed material, hold a book or turn a page.

Because of the cost of the cassette tapes, which averages about $1.50 each, the Montana State Library recycles most of their tapes of periodicals, including MONTANA. However, a master tape of each is kept on file at the library. A bulk eraser that will clear approximately 500 tapes in twenty minutes was recently donated to the Montana State Library by the Montana Association for the Blind.

The Montana Historical Society is grateful to Mrs. Thomas, the other volunteers, and the staff at the State Library for their hard work and time in this very worthwhile project providing the blind and handicapped with the opportunity to "read" our magazine, plus the many other periodicals and books. Should you know of anyone who may qualify for these library services, have them contact the MONTANA STATE LIBRARY, DIVISION FOR THE BLIND AND PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED, 930 EAST LYNDALE, HELENA, MONTANA 59601.

PERSONAL RUSSELL GALLERY REDESIGNED

The "gallery-within-a-gallery" concept, which has been a popular feature for several years in the formal C. M. Russell gallery, has been redesigned by Mike McCourt and Jim Werner of our curatorial staff to give the viewer a better sequential glimpse of Russell as both man and artist. This is achieved by using color-coordinated, dated segments, along with personal artifacts, enlarged photographs and Russell subjects, including models and bronzes, which point up those periods in his life: "Kid Russell" - 1864-1886; "Some Dreams Come True" - 1886-1896, and " . . . Dead Man's Prices" - 1896-1926. A central display case contains a collection of Russell's personal letters which are arranged for close-up, easy reading.

Park Service Prepares to Open Hi

Located less than a mile north of the present town of Deer Lodge in southwestern Montana is the Grant-Kohrs Ranch, one of the first cattle enterprises in the Territory and home of the largest and best-known of this region's 19th Century ranching operations. Some 219 acres of the ranch, a small remnant of its former size, have been established as a National Historic Site that is expected to open in mid-June for public tours under direction of the National Park Service. Restored with authentic furnishings, artifacts and buildings dating as early as 1862, the "working ranch" will be in full operation, providing a glimpse of an important part of America's past.

The Historical Society's corps of volunteer docents and several regular staff members were given a sneak preview and tour through the ranch house and grounds earlier this month with three Park Service rangers acting as hosts and answering questions in preparation for the official opening this summer.

The ranch house, the largest home in Montana Territory and still large by today's standards, was built by Canadian Johnny Grant in 1862 near the mouth of Cottonwood Creek, now known as the Clark Fork of the Columbia River. Now restored as it was in the 1860's, with hewn logs, white clapboards and green shutters, the home would rate a similar description to this one, which appeared in 1865 in THE MONTANA POST, published at Virginia City: "The dwelling house, which is large and two storied, is by long odds the finest in Montana. It appears as if it had been lifted by the chimneys from the bank of the St. Lawrence, and dropped down in Deer Lodge Valley."

Grant, who had been a trapper, hunter and mountaineer, became the first major stockman in the Northern Rocky Mountain region. After his wife, Quarra, died, Grant left the fertile valley and headed for his native Canada to ranch and raise his children without fear of the Plummer gang and other characters who were threatening the peace in Montana. His Deer Lodge spread was sold on August 23, 1866 to a tall blonde German immigrant named Conrad Kohrs. For $19,200, Kohrs became owner of Grant's herds, 30,000 acres of rich farm and graze land, an elegant farmhouse, stables, corrals, some sheep, goats and grain, along with all the wagons and farm implements, and household furniture.

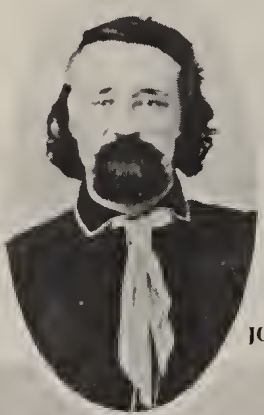
Kohrs arrived in Montana territory in 1862 at age 27, and like many others, tried his luck as a prospector. His interests soon changed, however, and he worked first as a butcher, then eventually became one of the giants in the livestock industry. He formed a lifelong partnership with his half-brother, John Bielenberg, when he took over the Grant ranch.

In spite of such set-backs as the rigorous winter of 1886-87, the Kohrs-Bielenberg cattle empire, stretching for hundreds of miles over the prairies and foothills of Montana, continued to flourish. Kohrs, who by now owned retail butcher shops at many mining camps in Montana, monopolized much of the local trade from production to consumer in a well-managed, scientific business. The CK brand of the Kohrs and Bielenberg Company appeared on cattle on the Sun, Tongue, Snake and Powder Rivers as herds expanded. The partners began to buy up several existing spreads, including the D-H-S of Davis, Hauser and Stuart, which became the Pioneer Cattle Co. The home ranch grew to 25,000 acres by the turn of the century, with 365 carloads of CK cattle shipped one fall. In addition to the purebred cattle and Montana's first herd of Herefords, thoroughbred stallions helped build the reputation of the operation.

Entrepreneur Kohrs, an active representative for cattlemen on state and national levels, helped organize the Montana Stock Growers Association with the encouragement and support of his close friends, Granville Stuart and Theodore Roosevelt. Often called the "Cattle King of Montana," Kohrs eventually gained control of over a million acres in Montana, Colorado, Wyoming, Idaho and Canada.

The Grant-Kohrs Historic Site today, however, cannot be visited without feeling the strong influence of the woman of the ranch, Mrs. Augusta Kohrs. She and Con Kohrs had been friends when they were both children in Germany. Two years after purchasing the Grant place, Con traveled to Cincinnati, where Augusta had emigrated with her parents, courted her for a few weeks, married her in 1868 and returned by steamboat up the Missouri.

Although not too impressed with the ranch at first, Augusta soon overcame her homesickness and devoted herself to enlarging, redecorating and refurnishing the house. Lifelong bachelor Bielenberg was not thrilled with the changes. "Things were nice here till that woman showed up," were his first comments about the new bride as he stormed out of the house, mounted his horse and rode



JOHNNIE GRANT

The Grant-Kohrs ranch house, once one of Montana's most imposing residences and now restored, was sketched in the 1860's by Granville Stuart. Established by Johnny Grant in 1862, contemporary with the first Montana gold strikes, it became a part of the ranching empire of Conrad Kohrs, whose wife, Augusta, brought taste and elegance to its enhancement as a residence. As administered by the National Park Service, however, it will remain a working ranch—thus combining beauty with a practical glimpse of early Montana ranching.

CONRAD KOHRS

off, staying away from the new Kohrs partner for two years. However, when he returned he moved into a small room off the parlor in the ranch house and he and Augusta soon became good friends.

As the Kohrs estate prospered, Kohrs and his wife traveled widely, bringing back furnishings from all parts of the world, many on display in the house today. In 1893, the Kohrs bought a house in Helena with summer visits to the Deer Lodge home where they had raised their three children, William, Anna and Katherine. After the death of her husband in 1920 and that of Bielenberg in 1922, Augusta continued the traditional summer visits to Deer Lodge. She died in 1945, leaving most of the original furnishings.

The ranch today stands much as it was in Augusta's time. Since 1932, a grandson, Conrad Warren, has managed the main portion of the original land and later bought it from the Kohrs Company. Realizing its historic value, Warren sought designation as a National Historic Site. Choosing from several locations that could appropriately commemorate the American cattle industry, the National Park Service selected the Grant-Kohrs Ranch as one of the best remaining examples of a 19th Century ranch headquarters, naming it as a National Historic Site in 1972.

In preparation for public showing, the Park Service has put in countless hours of researching documents, poring over photos, and reviewing the diary of Conrad Kohrs. Most of the personality and color of the original owners have been preserved through carefully preserved interiors decorated with actual furnishings from several decades. In addition to the stories told about the finely furnished, two-storied home, mention is made about the still-standing buggy shed, built in 1875 and cut in half in 1907 when a second set of railroad tracks ran through the front section of the ranch land. Half of the shed was left, while the other half was moved to the lower yard. Also intact is "bunkhouse row," built in the 1860's and added to in the 1890's. This was probably where Grant and his family first lived while they were waiting for the larger house to be built. Two carpenters, Alexander Pambrun and "McLeod the hewer" cut, hauled and hewed the logs for the large French Canadian home.

Such structures as the coal shed, blacksmith shop and garage, all built in the early 1900's, can be seen in much the same condition they were when the ranch was in full operation. One of the most interesting buildings in the yard, however, is the barn, originally constructed in the 1880's and then converted into a cattle show barn in 1914. Today this building, thanks to assiduous collecting efforts of Con Warren, displays almost every type of horse-drawn vehicle ever used on the ranch, including wagons, buggies, sleds, sleighs, farm machinery, and a road grader, purchased in 1887.

All other farm structures, including the chicken house, granary, buggy shed, and even the outhouse, or privy, have been preserved to add to the authentic setting.

In full operation with chickens, horses and cows, along with several farmhands who plow the land, plant potatoes and wheat, and herd cattle, the Grant-Kohrs Ranch is indeed a living record of the ranching tradition.

PART TWO:

VAST ARRAY OF PAPERBACKS COMPLETES

As indicated in the last issue of THE MONTANA POST, this time we will include Part II of our survey of Montana community and county books likely inspired by the Bicentennial and published from 1970 to 1976. The publications dealt with here will feature paperback or softcover books, whereas the last issue was concerned with the hardcover volumes. We appreciated the numerous responses we received about the first article. Many were requests to buy the books mentioned, others provided us with copies or names of books we did not have in our library collection.

TWO MORE HARDCOVERS

One book we missed in our survey of hardcover books is a large volume called FANNING THE EMBERS, compiled by the Miles City members of Range Riders, Inc., and the Range Riders Reps, the women's auxiliary branch of the organization. As suggested by the title, the book aims to keep alive the memories of pioneers and their families who settled in this area of ranchland along the Yellowstone River in eastern Montana. This attractive book, featuring 1903 and 1907 official map endsheets of Custer County, where Miles City is the county seat, began through the mailing of questionnaires to gather history about the famous "cowland capital of the world." The compilation took three years, and resulted in a well-bound volume of over 400 pages of biographies, thousands of pictures, and a unique section called "Art and Poetry," which includes contributions from such "greats" of the area as J. K. Ralston and Casey and Christian Barthelmess. Another section called "Range & Town Memorabilia," includes a roster of cowboys registered at the first Range Riders Reunion in 1936 with each brand listed alongside the names. The book concludes with several poems, or "Rhymes From the Range," and an index listing the people mentioned in the text.

A second hardcover book that just reached our desk as we prepared to go to press was a handsome hardcover volume called HOMESTEAD FEVER. Opening with a well-written historic panorama of the Judith Basin area of northeastern Montana, the text leads into a collection of short biographical sketches of hundreds of people living around the small communities of Denton, Danvers, and Coffee Creek. Several references are made to an early emigrant of Montana named Granville Stuart, who was very impressed when, in 1880, he visited this beautiful area surrounded by the Judith, Belt and Big Moccasin Mountains. The compilers of this over 400-page volume, the Denton Heritage Committee, made an interesting comparison in the first pages: "A quilting bee was a common activity in homestead days. The compilation of this book has been like the making of a quilt—put together from the bits and pieces contributed by friends and neighbors."

THE BICENTENNIAL PAPERBACKS

High marks for lay-out, design, artwork and picture reproduction are due "a group of persons interested in preserving local history" who compiled SOME BITTERROOT MEMORIES, a "homey account" of the community around Florence, located south of Missoula in western Montana's beautiful Bitterroot Valley. This is a modest-sized saddle-stitched paperback, but it manages to impart a great deal of history and information (including the fact that lumber baron A. B. Hammond named the main town encompassed by the text for his wife, Florence). There are sensibly arranged sketches of other communities dealt with: Carleton, Eight Mile, and Sweeney Creek, and an equally sensible alphabetized list of pioneer settlers at the back of the book. Chapter headings feature good typefaces, imaginative drawings and commendable organization.

In an effort to recall their past, the Shepherd Historical Book Committee compiled "LEST WE FORGET . . .," a soft-cover book containing over 200 pages of family histories and picture collections, along with a 50-page section to acquaint the reader with the early history of the Shepherd area, its churches, clubs and organizations, schools and teachers, and businesses. Located in southcentral Montana near the Yellowstone River and not far from Billings, the town of Shepherd sits near the "Custer Trail" where Brevet Major General George A. Custer led one segment of the Yellowstone Expedition in 1873. Reminiscing in a family-annual style, this Bicentennial history book from Yellowstone County indicates how a small community can cultivate a lively spirit in recording its past.

Surrounded by a woodgrain paper cover, the pages of a book called CROSSCUTS AND RAILS provide a brief background of three pioneer communities named Whitepine, Belknap, and Alger that once flourished in extreme northwestern Montana and are now a scattering of farm houses. Primarily devoted to stories about the loggers, ranchers, miners and railroad settlers of the region, this was a two-year project of a small group of local women, the Whitepine Homemakers, and includes an accumulation of interviews, stories and pictures from some of the original pioneers or their descendants still living in this area of Sanders County. After describing their quest for material, the compilers comment that they avoided printing any "gossip or scandals," adding a thought, one to which most workers on community books could relate: "We feel that the best sources of information lie buried in the local cemetery, and this fact saddens us."

collected in a paperbound volume called PICTORIAL HISTORY OF MINERAL COUNTY. With a brief written account to supplement the over sixty pictures, some covering the full page, this booklet highlights the significant historic events of the area where Captain John Mullan and his topographical corps, believed to be the first white people to pass through the area, began in 1858 to clear a wagon road from Fort Benton, Montana to Walla Walla, Washington. Mineral County, created in 1914 and named for the abundance of minerals discovered in the area, is the home of such scenic communities as Superior, St. Regis, DeBorgia, Henderson, Taft, and Quartz, the origin and history of each being explained in word and some really fine pictures.

A paperback volume of more than 200 pages entitled SETTLERS AND SODBUSTERS was started as a Bicentennial project by the Hot Springs Historical Society and is composed of individual stories of early pioneers and homesteaders who settled, beginning in about 1910, around Camas Hot Springs, a few miles southwest of Flathead Lake in Flathead County. The book does what the introduction says: it contains illustrated biographies of these relative late-comers, although not all of them, and it "does not attempt to be a history of the area." Historically, this is rather a shame, for the Hot Springs area, including the natural waters of Camas and other hot springs, and the beautiful Camas Prairie where early tribesmen held their annual bitterroot feasts dates far back from the homestead period. But the compilers succeeded in their task, and indeed the many pictures of the hot springs, the succession of more and better facilities for taking advantage of the waters — "Mother Nature's gift to us" — by themselves make this a worthwhile volume.

Golden Valley in central Montana was created in 1920 as one of the last of the state's 56 counties, and, according to a statement on the back page of the modest little booklet produced last year by a committee of fourteen residents, it is one of the most "happily named." With Ryegate as the county seat, this area has a notable transportation heritage, being crossed by two railroads and by the Buffalo Trail Highway from Cody to Billings, thence north to Great Falls. Also in the area and well described in BICENTENNIAL GOLDEN VALLEY COUNTY, HERITAGE '76 is the old stage station of Lavina, established by Fort Benton tycoon T. C. Power on the south bank of the Musselshell. The station was operated for Power by one Walter Burke, who named it Lavina in honor of an old sweetheart. There is information about an obscure town named Barber, and in the opening pages and in its cover design, the booklet calls attention to the spot where Chief Joseph and his band of Nez Perce crossed the Musselshell on September 17, 1877, during their retreat towards Canada.

Working together as members of their O.N.O. Homemakers Club, twelve women combined enthusiasm and effort to compile, early in our time frame, a handsomely bound volume called ANDERSON BIEM COMMUNITIES 1917-1971. An active club since 1962, the O.N.O. Homemakers, who proudly explain in the beginning of their book that their initials stand for "Our Night Out," have sponsored a great many community activities by "getting away from our home duties and working together . . . to do what we consider beneficial projects." Their book opens with a township map locating settlements of the early pioneers and homesteaders who first came to the rolling hills of this part of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation of Roosevelt County in northeastern Montana, known as the Anderson and Biem Communities. To leave no doubt as to the area covered, there is a detailed explanation: "14 miles north of Brockton, 20 miles west of Froid, 30 miles northeast of Poplar, 40 miles southwest of Plentywood, 40 miles southeast of Scobey." After introductory comments explaining the club itself and listing goals, the book then deals with the history of churches and schools, leading into some 100 pages of biographies, highlighted with a large variety of pictures.

One of the best written and presented Bicentennial publications of any type or size emerged late in 1976 from Big Horn County, famed for early exploration, cattle, Indians and now coal — some of this accounting for the title, GRASS, TIPIS AND BLACK GOLD. Four people, Eloise Pease, Adrienne Johnson, Torrey Johnson and Richard Fox, Jr., are credited with the writing, and it is good writing indeed. There are many notable features, including a detailed geographical history of the area, and an orderly account of such highlights as the first explorations, the fur trade, Indian wars and establishment of Fort C. F. Smith, final definitions of the county lines, and growth of such communities as Lodge Grass, Hardin (the county seat), Pryor, Kirby, Busby and others. Touching with sympathy and accuracy on the modern development of the "black gold" of this historic region, the great old cattle outfits, like the Spear-O and Faddis-Kennedy and the redoubtable sheepman, Charlie Bair, are also given textual and pictorial treatment. And not overlooking any segment, the people and leaders of the Crow tribe are given full historical and modern-day attention — again, through the use of excellent text and pictures.

The Bicentennial publishing efforts of the people of one small town in northern Montana's Valley County could well serve as a footnote to our survey. Although it is a paperback of modest size, it has a great title, THEY THOUGHT THE LAND WAS FREE! and it tells, in a warm and remarkably well organized way, the story of the homestead town of Hinsdale, located west of Glasgow on the route of the Great Northern (now the Burlington Northern). The foreword, written by members of the Hinsdale Woman's Club, sets forth a truism which must have struck the compilers of all the community books we have reviewed: "We're glad we got the notion to do this during our country's Bicentennial year. We've already waited too long. Thirty years ago a lot of our oldtimers were still living. We should have done it then. Now even the second generation memories are growing dim. In a few more years there would be no record at all of these early times."

MONTANA SILVER SERVICE ON DISPLAY IN MUSEUM LOBBY

Representative pieces from the fabulous 21-piece silver service, commissioned by the State of Montana in 1907 for use aboard Navy ships bearing the names U.S.S. MONTANA and U.S.S. HELENA, are on display in the main floor lobby, attracting the attention of many Montanans and visitors who have never had a chance to see it. Heavily engraved with historic scenes, the Great Seal and appropriate epigrams, the full service, designed by Reed and Barton of Taunton, Mass., contains more than 1600 ounces of pure silver. It was last aboard the third U.S.S. HELENA, launched in 1945 and now retired in the nation's mothball fleet.

LEGISLATURE, BANKS IN MONTANA HELP KEEP ART OF C. M. RUSSELL AT HOME

A special appropriation by the recently adjourned Montana Legislature and some unique Bicentennial fund-raising efforts of the Society in cooperation with Montana bank affiliates of Northwest Bancorporation have combined to insure that Charles M. Russell's great painting, WHEN THE LAND BELONGED TO GOD, will remain in Montana. Commissioned by the Montana Club of Helena at a cost of $3,000 in 1914, the large oil, which depicts a herd of buffalo coming up out of the Missouri, is considered one of Russell's most important paintings.

With the appropriation of $300,000 and the check for nearly $100,000 presented by the banks, the painting will be purchased from the Montana Club and will remain in the Society's galleries, where it has hung for a number of years. During legislative sessions, it will be on display in the State Senate chambers. Visitors to the capitol during the sessions will thus be able to see this great painting at the same time they view Russell's mural, LEWIS AND CLARK MEETING INDIANS AT ROSS' HOLE, which was commissioned for the House chambers in 1912.

Beginning in May, 1976, the Montana Northwest Bancorporation affiliates, representing eight Montana cities, joined with the Society in producing and selling a limited edition Montana Trapper bronze and a series of Bicentennial belt buckles, both created and designed by Robert Scriver of Browning, well known western sculptor. A total of 100 bronzes and nearly 12,000 belt buckles were sold, with profits going into a "keep Russell art in Montana" fund.

"It was timely indeed that the Montana Club decided to sell the Russell painting just as the money became available from the banks, and the appropriation was made by a concerned legislature," Director Korte says. "In addition, many contributions to this fund, which will continue to be used for this purpose, have come in from Montanans all over the state and from those living in other states."

The unique and unselfish efforts of the banks were coordinated by Alan Johnson, marketing officer for Northwestern Bank of Helena, who commented that the edition of belt buckles and bronzes is now completely sold out and that the response to both "amazed us all." Indeed, the banks and the Society found it difficult to keep up with the demand for the buckles, long after the edition of bronzes had been sold.

"Efforts such as these on the part of the private sector, both commercial and private, are a vital source of funds for preserving our state's cultural resources," Director Korte said. "In addition, the busy legislators of Montana deserve a salute for demonstrating the forward-looking thinking that led to funding for this worthwhile project."

Hundreds of guests, including Gov. Tom Judge and members of Montana's 45th Legislature, were conducted through the museums, galleries, library and archives of the Montana Historical Society Thursday evening, Feb. 3 — and even more importantly, "behind the scenes," in storage "impact" areas, where, in recent years, problems of overcrowding have grown more serious. Assisting the Society staff in hosting the guests were members of our board and a team of docents, who arranged for refreshments and acted as guides to all departments. In the photo at top left, Director Ken Korte chats with Gov. Judge, while Editor Vivian Paladin, left, talks with Rep. Francis Bardanouve of Harlem. Curator Bob Gant, in the picture above, points out to Sen. Pat Regan of Billings the need for restoring a portrait of Butte "Copper King" W. A. Clark. In the background is a part of the great Johns Gun Collection, with a portrait of Collector Sam Johns clearly visible. A unique handmade, animated model of a mine, created in 1895 and awaiting restoration in museum storage, gets the full attention, right, of Sen. Allen Kolstad of Chester and Rep. David Aageson of Gildford. More pictures of scenes and people are on the next page.

WOMEN, CHILDREN, HISTORY CAPTURED IN ZEMSKY ART

Jessica Zemsky, who brings to her work a trained artist's eye and the sensitivity of an eastern woman in love with the west, will be featured in a one-person art show beginning Friday, March 4, in the Poindexter Gallery adjacent to the C. M. Russell Gallery on the main floor of our building in Helena. The show, which will be formally opened by the museum staff and the artist at 8:00 P.M., will be available for viewing for about four weeks, according to Curator Bob Gant.

Eighty works, including paintings, drawings, and the remarkable collages for which Zemsky is especially well known, comprise the exhibit, with some sixty of the pieces available for sale. Not for sale but certain to evoke interest is a series of twelve sepia watercolors of Virginia City and Nevada City, commissioned by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bovey, restorers of the two Montana mining camps. Facsimile prints of the collection will be available during the show.

Zemsky is a graduate of Pratt Institute in Brooklyn, New York, and has had a varied background as artist, teacher, author, photographer and designer. An automated slide-sound lecture series she produced on the great art museums of the world is currently in use on ships of several well known steamship lines. For some twenty-five years, Zemsky worked as designer, illustrator and writer for New York book and periodical publishers until a few years ago, when she came to Montana on a vacation trip and "fell in love" with the state.

Now married to Montana artist Jack Hines, she has settled near Big Timber in western Montana, and with her husband travels throughout the region — sketching, photographing and conducting professional level workshops in art. She also manages to spend a great deal of time in her studio, producing evocative art which captures especially well the life and feelings of women and children. Her collages, for example, employ such actual objects as toys, flowers, Indian dolls, blankets, and domestic items.

All her work reflects a thought Zemsky recently passed along to us: the people of the west "demand that art be honest and real." She also commented that living in Montana is for her a "live history lesson — on location, with books offered, and conversation available and reference material of all kinds at the ready."

Then she added: "So I learn, and what I learn I draw and paint, and write, to perhaps tell and show others the taste and feeling of days past that still flavor today. I hope in this exhibit in Helena to somehow thank everyone for their loving help — and hope they can tell from my work what a giant lesson I have been learning."

OUR HERITAGE AND HOW IT GREW

A Survey of Bicentennial Publishing In Montana: Part I

No one is likely to dispute the fact that when all the parades and pageants were over, when the last medal had been struck and the last gew-gaw sold at reduced prices, the most enduring projects undertaken just before and during the Bicentennial year concerned the published record — specifically, the historical record. If and when a national survey of all published Bicentennial histories is ever done — presuming anyone ever dares try one — the nation's 200th birthday bibliography will be monumental indeed. Attempting a survey of community and county books produced in Montana alone has brought us into perilous waters in recent weeks. So prodigious was the assignment when we got into it that we must preface our initial efforts here with some apologies, at least some tentative guidelines, and a call for help in completing the list. There are apologies in the fact that with this issue, we are able to deal only with hardcover, stitched books. In the May/June number, we will hopefully catch up with hardcover volumes not yet in our collection, along with as many paperback or softcover books as we know about — and there are some very good ones. All publications dealt with here and in the next issue of THE MONTANA POST are or will be in the collections of the Historical Society and all are community, committee or groups efforts — that is, no one person was so entirely responsible for it that his or her name appears in a by-line. Compilation or publication must have occurred no earlier than 1970 — our thinking being that most community histories published since that time were inspired by the approaching Bicentennial. Books that were compiled during 1976 but not yet completed or distributed as we go to press with this issue also qualify. Thus our objective is two-fold: The Historical Society wants a copy of every book of this genre for its collection, and we want to tell our readers about it. If a hardcover book is not included here, we would like to know where copies are available. If you know of a qualifying paperback, drop us a line and we will check to make sure we have it for inclusion in the next issue.

THE MASSIVE 1,000-PAGERS

In terms of size, scope, early settlement and sales success, at least one of the granddaddies of all Montana Bicentennial publications must be PIONEER TRAILS AND TRIALS, a hardbound volume of more than 1,000 pages dealing with southwestern Montana's historic Madison County. Indeed, in his excellent introduction, Dr. Merrill G. Burlingame calls this "without a doubt the most important county in Montana in its first decade." For the gigantic undertaking represented by this book, now in its second printing, there were dedicated workers from such communities as Sheridan, Virginia City, Ennis, Cameron/Varney, Pony/Harrison, Twin Bridges, and Alder. Working together as the Madison County History Association, the compilers organized late in 1973 to prepare "a written memorial to the people of Madison County who were born in 1895 or before, and who had come to the county before 1920." With Dr. Burlingame's introduction setting the historical tone, the book then deals with communities and people in the Madison and Ruby Valleys, illustrated, not only with pictures in juxtaposition with hundreds of biographies, but with a large picture album at the back of the book.

It is interesting to note that Richland County, created in 1914 on the extreme eastern edge of Montana, shares "big book" honors with Madison County. In fact, at 1,078 pages, it is really the largest volume among all those we have seen. This attractively bound book, with the admirable title, COURAGE ENOUGH, carries a foreword by DeLyle Jarvis which suggests a contrast with the history of much older Madison County: "This book sets down the personal stories of the courageous families and individuals who were in fact the very last in the nation to settle under the Homestead Act. And in the telling we find this spot in Eastern Montana and Western North Dakota to be where the last of the Indians surrendered and the last of the buffalo were hunted." COURAGE ENOUGH contains not only illustrated histories of people, but the story of the area known as Mon-Dak (there once was a town by that name, smack on the North Dakota-Montana border), the growth of the town of Sidney, coupled with the development of irrigation on the Lower Yellowstone.

One of the first of the really large books produced by Montana communities and barely "under the wire" in our time frame of the 1970's, was SHERIDAN DAYBREAK, a hardbound volume of more than 1,000 pages which was so successful that it has seen a second printing. This is the story of one of Montana's most interesting counties. Located in the extreme northeast corner of the state, Sheridan County was the scene of vast open range cattle raising, homesteading, boom and bust, and — perhaps most interesting to many — the place where real live Communists flourished in the early 1930's, their gospel spread by a firy editor named Charles "Red Flag" Taylor. All this and much more is told in the fine introduction to the book, written by Magnus Aasheim who as general chairman was largely responsible for its compilation. In the tradition of most community books of its genre, SHERIDAN DAYBREAK contains hundreds of biographies of people who lived in the towns and communities involved. They are, in alphabetical order: Antelope, Archer, Coalridge, Commerton, Dagmar, Dooley, Homestead, Medicine Lake, Outlook, Plentywood, Raymond, Redstone, Reserve, Volmer, and Westby.

HARDCOVERS: 500 PAGES PLUS

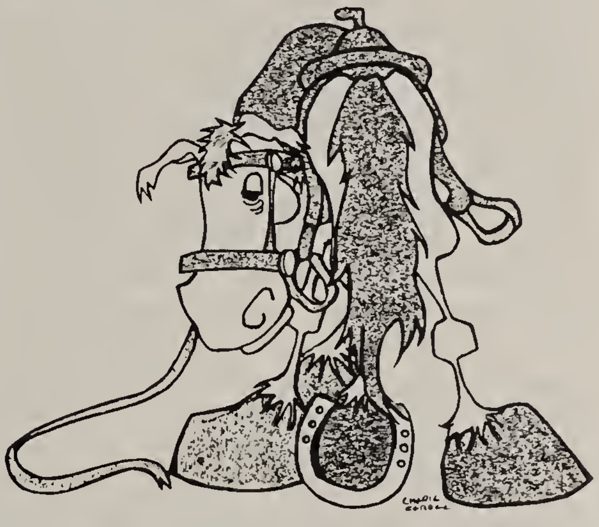
Original drawings, attractive typography and some stunning full-color photographs are some features of the large (some 550 pages) hardbound volume published by the O'Fallon Historical Society of Baker, Montana. Called O'FALLON FLASHBACKS, this covers a vast area of rangeland and awesome geological formations encompassed within the boundaries of southeastern Montana's Fallon County, created in 1913. There is a great deal of information here, including the bitter fight with the town of Ekalaka before Baker won county seat honors. Through hundreds of biographies and pictures, we get to know the people who settled such communities as Willard, Ismay, Knowlton, Plevna, Ollie, Webster and Westmore. Hundreds of cattle brands are illustrated, including the famous Hash Knife and Mill Iron and Teddy Roosevelt's Maltese Cross. There are drawings by Helen Bergstrom Lacasse used as endsheets, and the intriguing line saddle horse caricature by Cherie Ferrel used on the title page and embossed in gold on the front cover.



One of the last of the larger books to appear in the Bicentennial year is a hardbound volume of more than 500 pages called OUR HERITAGE: HISTORICAL EVENTS IN LIBERTY COUNTY. A modest preface by the hardworking committee points out that many things had to be edited down or left out and promises that "all our records and materials are open to any other group that would care to continue what we have started." At the same time, it is apparent that as with all community books of this magnitude, a prodigious amount of effort has been put forth — in this case to tell in admirable detail and with commendable accuracy the story of this northcentral Montana county, created in 1920 (late in the "county-splitting" era) from parts of Chouteau, Hill and Toole. A word must be said for the excellent historical introduction by Iva Kolstad, who did much of the editing and collating of the material — a process which began in 1969 on behalf of the Liberty County Museum.

Coming Up Next: The Paperbacks

COLORFUL TITLES, UNSELFISH COMMUNITY

In order to portray early life in the remote foothills south of Great Falls, fourteen members of the Eden Area Historical Society took on the task of compiling a 516-page book of stories and pictures called A CENTURY IN THE FOOTHILLS, A HISTORY OF THE EDEN AREA. Billed as a "story of human courage and frailties," this Bicentennial project relied heavily on the memories of old-timers or those who knew them. Modestly, the committee admits that the stories are not all documented accounts but are rather anecdotal and reminiscent. "Therefore," says the candid preface, "the accuracy of names and dates may have been dimmed by the passage of time, but the pride of recalling the past and preserving it for the future remains." Indeed it does, for this is a notable book, not only for excellent pictures of people and places but for information about a part of Cascade County (thanks to the presence of Great Falls one of Montana's most populated counties) which is relatively obscure, even to Montanans, who may not be familiar with Eden, to say nothing of such communities as Black Butte, Calvert, Giffen, Pleasant View and Red Butte.

Humor, good pictures and a commendable degree of organization characterize the 500-page GRIT, GUTS AND GUSTO, a history of Hill County, located adjacent to Jim Hill's Great Northern route in Northern Montana, and named for him. The humor is suggested, not only by the title, but by the addition on a masthead page of "one John Doe," to whom any errors may be attributed. The pictures, many of them from the great Al Lucke collection, suggest the quality of the graphics. Most importantly, the organization of the book is suggested by the table of contents. Even the biographies of pioneers are given the thematic approach: there are the railroaders, cattlemen, sheepmen, and homesteaders, doctors and hospitals, town mayors, church leaders and school teachers, and even "unusual characters." Center stage, of course, is the lively town of Havre, the name with French overtones. But smaller communities, some of whose names also bring to mind foreign climes, are covered, again in the same well-organized manner: Amos, Assinaboine Station, Box Elder, Casady, Cottonwood, Fairchild, Fresno, Gildford, Goldstone, Hingham, Inverness, Kremlin, Laredo, Miller, Oldham, Pacific Junction, Rudyard, Simpson, and Toledo.

WHEELS ACROSS MONTANA'S PRAIRIE is the title of a hardbound book of nearly 700 pages which, except for a brief foreword which sets the historical pace, contains an alphabetical, illustrated compilation of biographies of people who settled in Prairie County in east central Montana. This is Yellowstone River country, and the town of Terry, named for the army commander whose orders George Custer is said to have disobeyed, is the county seat. A large format map, used as endsheets in the front of the book, indicates that Fallon, Ismay and Mildred are other place names and that there was a lot of land to settle. An unusual feature is a modestly printed but interesting supplement, "published locally in the true spirit of '76." Tucked at the back of the hardbound book, this supplement means, to us, that members of the Prairie County Historical Society were dedicated publishers indeed, for in these last-minute pages we find a great deal of interest, including a description of a station on the Northern Pacific named Zero.

THE SMALLER HARDCOVERS

High marks for professional excellence in every department must go to the history of the Stevensville area of the Bitterroot Valley, published in 1971. This 288-page book, called MONTANA GENESIS, has a vast amount of fascinating material, for Stevensville, located in western Montana's Ravalli County, is the state's oldest town and the home of historic St. Mary's Mission, established in 1841 — the first church and the first school in the Northwest. After an introduction by Montana historian K. Ross Toole, sixteen chapters trace the story of this majestic region where Father Pierre DeSmet arrived with his oxen and Bible in 1841 and Major John Owen settled in baronial comfort in 1850. In addition to the well written and researched chapters, highlighted with nearly a hundred first-rate illustrations, there is a section of selected references and an index, making this a book of genuine and lasting value.

Another community book, this one on southcentral Montana's Wheatland County, had its beginnings in advance of the Bicentennial year. Published under title YESTERYEARS AND PIONEERS in 1972, this 412-page clothbound volume, compiled by the Pioneer History Committee and the Harlowton Women's Club, contains nearly 300 pages of family histories alone. There are individual memories, poems, memorials and many pages of pictures with simple one-line captions. Quite naturally, there is a great deal of information about the town of Harlowton, named in 1900 for a visionary man named Richard Harlow, father of a Montana railroad with the intriguing name of "Jawbone" (Harlow literally "jawboned" or "talked" his dream railroad to reality).

Members of the Big Horn County Historical Society, living in an area that has experienced events of far-reaching historical interest, published their Bicentennial book under the title LOOKIN' BACK. This hardbound volume of over 300 pages features map endsheets showing the dimensions of Big Horn County in Montana's southcentral border with Wyoming, site of the Crow Reservation and the Custer Battle. Still, except for a well-done segment about the tribe and reservation by Robert Yellowtail, this is not about Indian battles or Indian people. Rather, like most of the books under discussion, it is a compilation of biographies and pictures, and points up much local color and the courageous qualities of people who settled around such communities as Hardin, Lodge Grass, Toluca and Wyola.

ROUNDUP ON THE MUSSELSHELL, a relatively slender but well-bound volume, published in 1974 by and for the Musselshell Valley Historical Museum at Roundup, Montana, is an example of a "potpourri" book — one that contains some valuable history along with some original art (one by the great J. K. Ralston and two by the redoubtable sheepman-artist, Bill Stockton) and some original writings. One of the best of the latter, in our opinion, is Stockton's column about the habits of the wily coyote. There is surprisingly little about the coal industry in this area of central Montana, except for an interesting sketch about the mine at Klein, Montana. But there is a lot of color about homesteading around such communities as Broadview, Molt and Acton.

A second book about the Musselshell area takes a more personal and broader view of individual settlers in this valley. The book titled HORIZONS O'ER THE MUSSELSHELL, was compiled by a committee appointed by the Musselshell Valley Pioneer Club. After publication in 1974 only three active members were left from the original six who organized in February, 1958, to accomplish the task of compilation. In a prodigious array of some ninety stories from old-timers or their sons and daughters, a collection of historic photographs and records along with excellent sketches by Ben Steele, Jr., this hardbound volume concentrates on the events of the area before 1900.

An area in central Montana, full of history and back-dropped by an unusual geological formation in the Little Belt Mountains known as the Twin Sisters, is covered in a 294-page hardbound volume called IN THE SHADOW OF THE TWIN SISTERS. While the task of compiling began in 1970 and the first edition emerged in 1973, this can rightly be classified as a Bicentennial effort. Specifically, four communities in this Judith Basin area, beloved by early cowboys including "Kid" Russell and characterized by other geological wonders such as the unusual Balancing Rock and scary Buffalo Canyon, are covered here: Ubet, Garneill, Straw and Buffalo. Besides hundreds of pictures, this book contains a lot of information, about the transition from open range cattle raising to homesteading to large corporate agriculture and missile sites. Another gem has to do with how the town of Ubet got its name: A. B. Barrows ran a stage station, and when a stranger came by and asked if he could stay all night, he was given the hearty assurance "You bet!"

EFFORTS HIGHLIGHT HARDCOVER BOOKS

Both the history and the present-day economy of a section of Chouteau County south of the Missouri River are suggested in the title of a 310-page hardcover volume produced by the seven-member Geraldine Historic Committee. SPOKES, SPURS AND COCKLEBURS, says the dedicatory statement, points up the two primary products of the area: wheat and cattle. The cocklebur "represents the trials, the hardships and sorrows encountered along the way these past 100 years." Some 365 pictures are used in this attractively bound book (they are conveniently numbered) along with hundreds of biographical sketches of people who, according to the compilers, were asked to write their own histories which were published "very much as they wrote them." There is more, however, which adds to the value of the book: there are good articles on the open range period, including information about the great cattle companies and associations, and information about the nine communities represented: Geraldine, Square Butte, Montague, Square Butte Bench, Hawarden, Graceville, Clear Lake, Eagle Butte, Shonkin.

In western Montana's beautiful Frenchtown Valley, so named because of the large numbers of early French settlers, a committee of six people formed the Frenchtown Historical Society Book Committee in 1975 and proceeded to compile a "little booklet" which grew into a 170-page hardbound volume called FRENCHTOWN VALLEY FOOTPRINTS. Using both pictures and text to good advantage, this is one of the few Bicentennial community books which eschewed the use of family histories. Rather, it re-creates much of the color and vitality of the area which was first noted by white men when Lewis and Clark described it in 1805 and again on their return in 1806. Located northwest of Missoula, this area has often been referred to as the "garden of the gods." The compilers of the book, who graciously accept any blame for errors but credit many hundreds who helped in the project, have retained the geneologies for future projects.

Just off the presses is a handsome volume with a bright red cover titled, simply, DEARBORN COUNTRY. In its over 300 pages we are treated to the history, both early and recent, of the beautiful area bordered on the north by the Dearborn River (named by Lewis and Clark for Jefferson's secretary of war), on the east by the Missouri, and on the south by Wolf Creek, with the mountains of the Continental Divide as the backdrop to the west. Located between Helena and Great Falls, this has been classic cattle country since the 1880's, and remains so today. Aside from illustrated histories of pioneers, there are many interesting accounts, from early geological periods to a memorable blizzard, circa 1943. There are accounts of saddle, rodeo and garden clubs, folksy recipes and even an illustrated feature on cooking and heating stoves. The beautiful Wolf Creek Canyon north of Helena, the towns of Wolf Creek and Craig, are all described and illustrated.

WE CALLED THEM BACK is a hardbound book of modest size which concerns a corner of Cascade County north of Great Falls, bounded by the Sun River and Muddy Creek and edged on the west by the towns of Vaughn and Power. In the center of the area is a homestead era postoffice called Wilson, no longer on modern maps. Yet it is this designation, the Wilson P.O. Community, that inspired a group of individuals, the Gettel Home Demonstration Club, and the Fairfield Times publishers to gather the histories of the homesteaders who settled there. From the original verse WE CALLED THEM BACK by Mabel Johnston, one of the compilers, to the alphabetical list of homesteaders and many of their brands, as well as the individual stories, this is a book of nostalgia and tribute.

Many community books reflect changes on the face of Montana, particularly the "county-splitting" period from 1909 to 1919, when 23 of the present 56 counties were created, leading to wars between towns for county seat designations. The boom finally ended in 1919, when state legislation in this fourth largest state provided for higher property valuation restrictions. Thus, from 1919 to 1925, only six new counties emerged to complete the map of Montana.

CHILDREN EXPERIENCE, "FEEL" HISTORY

The word comes from the Latin "docere" meaning "to teach" and at no time since they were organized to act as guides and lecturers at the Society has our corps of "docents" lived up to their name so thoroughly. Indeed, during their five years of service, we have stopped explaining the derivation of the word and have instead recognized more fully the contributions of this volunteer group of Helena women who give a number of hours of their time every week conducting tours through the museums and galleries. The constantly changing and expanding program is directed by Linda Miller of our staff.

The newest and perhaps most exciting program utilizes the "touch and feel" technique for involving young children directly in the learning experience. Working out of a small room on the third floor of our building and using actual objects from the Society's collection, the docents have started with Indian culture and have geared the presentation to children of kindergarten to third grade level. The hope is to expand to other fields, including homesteading and ranching, and to involve older children and perhaps even adults. However, the room now being used for the Indian presentation is small, and is also occasionally used by veterans groups, which makes it impossible to expand the program for larger groups or to have any permanent displays.

In spite of these handicaps, however, and as the accompanying pictures show, young children, with rapt expressions, are center stage as Docent Mignon Waterman talks to them and lets them "feel" Indian history. By gathering the children in a circle around a raccoon rug, giving each child his own little square of carpet to sit on, Mrs. Waterman explains some of the Indian legend and lore while giving each child some item to examine—touch and feel. In the end, all the children get to see and hold such things as a headdress, moccasins, war shield, arrowheads, feathers, tom-tom, and Indian dolls, while the origin and history of each item is explained and several Indian stories are told.

Linda Miller tells us that many of the docents and some of the museum staff are trained to give the program on request. In an amazingly short time there have been twenty-four presentations, with fifteen to twenty children in each, with enthusiastic comments following in every case.

Another Enthusiastic Docent At Work

Carol McKerrow, another of our docents, found that language was no barrier to enthusiasm for Montana history and art as she conducted a touring team of Japanese all-star wrestlers through the museums and galleries in mid-January. Accompanied by a group of host Helena high school wrestlers, the Oriental visitors asked searching questions, Mrs. McKerrow told us, and exhibited intelligent interest in everything they saw, especially the art of C. M. Russell, one of whose bronzes she is describing in the photo here. The wrestlers were on a three-week cultural exchange tour, and had little difficulty, either, in defeating Montana teams arrayed against them. In Helena, their hosts, five-man teams from the two high schools, managed to win only one of ten matches, but all agreed they enjoyed the encounter.

A FREE SPIRIT FROM MONTANA IS GONE

by VIVIAN A. PALADIN

Almost exactly a decade separated the time we wrote and published an article in MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY about a cowboy-artist named Dan Muller and the day we learned that death had finally set his spirit free from wheelchair, cane and sickbed. It is a story which began and ended on a note of "this can't be true." The subject, although he spent his last 40 years in Wisconsin, his world increasingly restricted by illness, was larger than life, his paintings and writings reflecting authentic roots in Montana and the open range life of the American West.

We first heard about him early in 1966, when friends of the Society told us he lived near Port Washington, Wisconsin, but that he was born in Montana, had written and illustrated three books, painted the three largest murals for the Century of Progress show in Chicago in 1933, had appeared as author and illustrator in the first issue of Esquire magazine, and in his youth had been a ward and companion of Buffalo Bill Cody. Little wonder there were thoughts of "this can't be true."

But it was true, and there was much more than we were able to publish—more, in fact, than Dan Muller seemed willing to tell us or anyone else. When a voluminous correspondence began, however, it was obvious that if he had never known Buffalo Bill Cody or if he couldn't paint at all, Dan Muller was worth knowing and writing about. His own short biographical sketch served as both nucleus and inspiration as we began:

"I was foaled north of Choteau, Montana, on the Teton in 1888. My dad, Carl, was a quarter-blood Piegan and long-time friend of Buffalo Bill Cody. As free-lance scouts they operated in the Dakotas and formed a lasting friendship—a friendship so lasting that when Dad lost an argument with a bronc and his spirit went to the Sandhills, it was Buffalo Bill who assumed responsibility for raising this wildcat to the dubious ways of the white man. Colonel Cody legally adopted me when I had seen nine winters, and for 18 years, on and off, I was in his Wild West Show.

"I am of the old school, when cowboying was done with a tough bronc, a good saddle and a stout rope, when one followed the chuckwagons and slept under the stars. I am not upholstered with any elegancies of diction, my education being badly corrupted with years of surrounding cattle, hosses, cards, and—a mite of hoss larceny. I have traveled from the Canadian border to Mexico, just with my saddle and pack ponies. Have worked for many large and small cow outfits along the way and feel heap enriched by these travels and hair-raising experiences which I now try to put down on canvas."

The article, which appeared in the Autumn issue, 1966, led to a showing of Muller art in our galleries in Helena, and a good deal of reader response. Dan, who said he had been back to Montana with the Cody Wild West Shows but had never revisited the home ranch near Choteau, planned to come out to see the show and "palaver." Unfortunately, illness led to the loss of one leg, and to increasing sadness in his letters: "I never did feel that I was any great shakes on foot at best, but on the back of a bronc I felt like a king. Since leaving my home range and coming east I have felt myself going downhill. Never missed the smell of sage as I do now."

The reason Dan Muller stayed in Wisconsin was explained later by another Montanan, George M. Smith, who lived close to Dan in Wisconsin. He explained that the article hinted at a romance, but then "completely omits any reference to Dan's wife, Edna, the finest woman this side of Hades."

"I know them both," Smith continued, "and mention of this connection would have accounted for his presence in Wisconsin. They were married in Elko, Nevada, in 1936, but she wanted to come home to care for her aging father. After the father's passing, they just stayed on. There probably isn't another spot in the world more unsuited for painting 'westerners' than Port Washington, but Dan Muller doesn't need that environment. He has it all in his head. By the time he finishes one picture, he already has two or three sketched in."

In recent months, we have been kept informed about Dan by another friend of the Mullers, Norman H. Wilbert, who lives in nearby Kohler. Aside from visiting, he kept open the possibility of a book-length treatment, at last, of a remarkable man who seemed unwilling and too modest to tell it all.

Preservation Program Moves To Society

By executive order of Montana Governor Thomas L. Judge, the Society assumed important new responsibilities the first of this year when the Historic Preservation Program was transferred to this institution from the Department of Fish and Game. At the same time Director Ken Korte becomes State Preservation Officer and thus Montana's liaison with the National Park Service in furthering the program. Transferring as program manager is Al Thompson, who brings a broad background of experience in parks and historic site acquisition and preservation. The transfer, made with full approval of the Society's board, the Fish and Game Commission and the Governor's Advisory Council on Historic Sites and Antiquities, underscores the obvious relationship between the preservation program and the historic goals and mission of the Society. To activate the program fully and to conform with federal guidelines, the Society's board has requested legislative funding for three new positions — a staff historian, architect and archaeologist, all professionally qualified. These positions, according to Korte, will be filled at the beginning of the next fiscal year pending approval of funds.

AL THOMPSON

While historic preservation work has been underway in Montana for several years, particularly by numerous private individuals, the program as now envisioned adds new dimensions, and funding—half of it federal, half from the state. The program, managed by Thompson, will continue to benefit from the Governor's Advisory Council, whose members presently are: Dr. M. G. Burlingame and Dr. John DeHaas, both of Bozeman, Dr. Dee Taylor of Missoula, Mons Teigen of Helena, and Dale Hawkins of Billings.

Scope of the new program, Al Thompson tells us, is comprehensive indeed, concerned with all remaining physical evidence of our historic past, yet recognizing the practical limitations that apply in dealing with them. For convenience, these properties are grouped as historical sites, archaeological sites, and historic/architectural structures. Historic objects are also of concern, although the Society during its long existence has been in the vanguard of collecting and preserving these.

The major objective of the program is preservation, wherever feasible, with a long range goal of developing a balanced program of restored sites and structures that reflect every element of the historic patrimony. The concern, however, is not only for sites of national and statewide significance, but those of local interest as well. Thus the modest log cabin on an early ranch or farm looms in importance along with the extravagant mansion of a mining baron. Also of vast importance, and even more difficult to accomplish, is locating and protecting obscure archaeological sites. Anonymity is the strategy for most of these, and the program must adapt its procedures to them. Thus relatively few such resources are likely to become generally known to the public and available for viewing, such as the Pictograph Cave near Billings.

A variety of methods to achieve preservation are used, Thompson says, the most obvious one being the use of public moneys to preserve and restore known structures, such as Pierre Wibaux's home in the town named for him in eastern Montana. Or funds may be spent to purchase, outright, private property containing an historic site. An example is the purchase by Montana of certain properties within the townsite of Bannack, our first Territorial capital, in western Montana.

Listing a property on the National Register of Historic Places, when it qualifies, inevitably enhances the probability of preservation, and indeed such a listing is necessary to qualify for federal funding. There are other benefits, too, including tax advantages. For certain kinds of sites, Montana's Antiquities Act can be used to provide a measure of protection, including specific penalties for vandalism. In each case, an agreement between the private owner and the state must be prepared specifying the responsibilities of both parties.

Because more than 95 percent of all known historic properties in Montana are privately owned, the program continues to have enormous responsibilities in dealing with the private sector. Thus while much time is spent in researching and reviewing sites, arranging for meetings with federal officials, and preparing criteria, there is an over-riding need for contacting individual owners of property and enlisting their cooperation in preserving historically significant sites and structures.

Major Russell Painting Given As Memorial to Henry Hibbard

One of the most important Russell paintings to come to the Society's collection in recent years is an 11-3/4 x 17-3/4 inch watercolor entitled ROPING BY MOONLIGHT. Director Ken Korte is seen here accepting the painting from Mrs. A. T. Hibbard of Helena, who has donated it in memory of her son, Henry Sieben Hibbard, prominent rancher and civic leader. Mrs. Hibbard explained that the painting has been in her family since 1917, when she and her late husband received it as a wedding gift.

Third Montana History Conference:

LIVELY TALK ON PROVOCATIVE THEMES

Informative papers, stimulating discussions and workshops, along with unseasonable sunshine, all contributed to the success of the third Montana History Conference as over 300 enthusiastic history buffs from all over the state gathered in Helena November 4, 5 and 6. Under a grant provided by the Montana Committee for the Humanities, the conference was again sponsored by the Historical Society and the Council to Preserve Montana History, an informal group of Montana librarians, archivists and historians.

Dr. John DeHaas, professor of architecture at Montana State University and an active advocate for Montana ghost town preservation, started the conference off Thursday evening with a splendid slide show encompassing many aspects of historic preservation, and the lack of it, in Montana. The Historical Society was opened during the evening for a special showing of watercolor paintings by Richard Baker of Seattle, formerly of Helena.

Dr. Robert Peterson from the University of Montana initiated an animated session Friday morning with his provocative paper, "Questions on the Northern Pacific Land Grant in Montana." Setting the stage for a lively discussion among audience and panel participants, Peterson outlined facts of the NP's land grant, then posed questions on its application and significance. Panelists Dr. K. Ross Toole from the University, John Willard of the Burlington Northern's Public Relations Department, and Warren McGee, former NP conductor from Livingston, responded to initial questions with diverse views characteristic of the land grant controversy since 1864. Session participants, moderated by Dr. Rex Myers of the Historical Society, stressed differing aspects of the land grant and NP actions in Montana. Dr. Toole focused on 19th Century abuses of timber cutting rights, mitigating his accusations with realities of poor and restrictive federal legislation. Willard documented the NP's role as a valuable citizen, maintaining that through taxes paid, jobs provided and economic stimulation, the railroad and its successors contributed far more to Montana than the worth of the grant itself. McGee concluded with observations that the sheer size of NP holdings, particularly in eastern Montana, created a position of corporate dominance which spread beyond property boundaries into political and social realms.

The concurrent session on Friday morning on "The Ethnic in Montana History" dealt with minority study programs and questionnaires used to implement them in Montana. The panel, moderated by Manuel Machado, history professor at the University of Montana, compared that institution's Black Studies program with similar efforts elsewhere in the country. Foreign Language Professor Anthony Beltramo, also from UM, outlined a survey which attempts to identify ethnic groups in Montana through language. Glenn Barth, UM business professor, described his role as a member of the Black Studies program review committee at Missoula, and its impact on the curriculum. Thomas Wessel, MSU history professor, suggested that ethnic studies should not be isolated into separate departments, but incorporated into the humanities curriculum.

A solid highlight of the conference was the luncheon address Friday noon of Dr. Norris Hundley of UCLA on the enormously complicated question of western water rights, specifically its implications in this century for both Indians and whites. Tracing the historical reality that "possession is nine-tenths of the law," Hundley suggested that water rights and dealing with them has been less a province for historians than for lawyers, who have more often been advocates for white settlers and entrepreneurs than for Indians.

Although he discussed recent efforts at clarification and justice, including a Supreme Court decision that state courts are empowered to adjudicate matters of water law and water rights, Hundley concluded that the subject is still fraught with more confusion than equity, that although there are some bright spots, the situation remains "confused law, which is really no law at all."

Water in Montana was the subject for discussion again at Friday afternoon's session, chaired by Dr. Roy Huffman of MSU, with Prof. Hundley as commentator. The audience heard first-hand accounts from three widely known and experienced authorities on the subject: D. P. Fabrick, former member of the Montana Water Conservation Board; Harold E. Aldrich, former regional director of the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation, and Claiborne W. Brinck, former director of the Environmental Sanitation Division, Montana Department of Health.

The need to record and publish Montana history at the grass roots level, rather than leave it all to the "ivory towers" of academia was the theme of Dr. K. Ross Toole in his banquet address Friday evening. Describing his efforts to answer provocative questions from his own small son, the speaker emphasized the importance of fostering the interest of young people in their own heritage before it is "killed by the dull knife of textbook or teacher."

TOOLE

Dr. Toole had high praise for the hundreds of community publishing projects completed during the Bicentennial year. Although they vary widely in quality and depth, he said, all reflect the one important and lasting benefit of the celebration; they record the human, personal experiences which add up to Montana history.

Saturday morning sessions began with a workshop on genealogical research, chaired by Dennis Richards, Documents Librarian of the University of Montana, and librarian of the Missoula Branch Genealogical Library of the LDS Church. Ruth Phillip of the Daughters of the American Revolution spoke on the importance of genealogy for the family and society and shared her personal experiences in tracking down her Southern origins. The third member of the panel, Leona Clatworthy, spoke enthusiastically about doing research in the cemeteries of the Bitter Root Valley and brought along samples of genealogical supplies.

Saturday's luncheon speaker was Nan Rickey of Evergreen, Colorado, a museums specialist for the National Park Service. Her very practical remarks concerned local museums, which have proliferated greatly during the Bicentennial year. Local museums were the subject of the concluding Saturday afternoon session, which took the form of a workshop, chaired by Bob Gant, Historical Society curator. Papers on designing local museums "on a shoestring" and methods of fund raising and instituting outreach programs were presented, respectively, by Mike McCourt of the Historical Society and Jennifer Jeffries, curator of the Society's branch museum at Libby Dam.

Many conference registrants took advantage Saturday afternoon of an alternative bus tour of Helena's historic homes and places, conducted by Jean Baucus, author of the recently published guidebook, "Helena: Her Historic Homes."

THE WAGON TRAIN: RUN-AW

by ROBERT F. MORGAN

Don't tell me that the "Wild Bunch" is dead and buried — I've seen them, rode with them, and can tell you that the Seventh Annual Milk River Wagon Train in Phillips County is an experience and an honest-to-God revelation in these modern times. In the shadow of the Little Rocky Mountains, still grumbling with the ghosts of Kid Curry and Pike Landusky, the train assembled on September 2, 1976, a short distance from the storied old mining town of Zortman on Ruby Gulch. Ahead was a seventy-odd mile, three and one half day journey to Malta, where the train would meet some northern compatriots who were assembling at Whitewater, near the Canadian border.

As the sun rose on the clear eastern reaches of the prairie, your editor, Vivian Paladin, and I arrived at the Zortman camp in the able hands of Louie Perry, chairman of the wagon train organizing committee, within an hour after leaving our diggins' in Malta. After a myriad of introductions, we sat down at the hospitable table of Betty Garrett of Billings for a breakfast befitting the occasion. After a few more introductions, I scouted around for suitable subjects for my camera and found that at every turn there was something. Campfires were doused, teams harnessed and numerous camp chores rushed to completion. We were shown the wagons we were to ride in and then we were introduced to the drivers.

Editor Paladin climbed aboard the lead wagon, owned by Bud Hasler and driven by Billy Young, a short, wiry, weathered remnant of what seemed like another time. After a brief moment of getting settled, passing a few pleasantries and enjoying the serenity of the morning, off they went — hell-bent-for-election for the first hill on the trek to Malta. Although we didn't know it at the time, this hell-bent pace set by the four-horse lead wagon team as the morning started had some hair-raising portent.

I rode next in line on a wagon owned by Roger Ereaux and driven by Bert Brown, one of the biggest men on the train, weathered by the prairie sun and slightly bent by the sixty-odd years of living and working in the Little Rockies. He followed the Hasler wagon and let the two black mares out to follow the quickening pace of Billy Young up ahead. We hit the base of the hill and Bert coaxed the two mares up the steep grade with the expertise of an experienced hand. Meanwhile, in front of us, the lead wagon spewed dirt, dust and rock on the quiet countryside, just now bathed in the warmth of the rising sun.

As I looked back, the train followed, the score of wagons seemingly at home and in place as we moved into the lush woods and meadowland ahead. The teams soon worked into a steady pace, with an occasional spurt here and there as they fought the bit and the drivers' reins of authority. We proceeded through the foothills of the Little Rockies across a meadow dotted with range cattle, imagining to ourselves that those were buffalo and that we'd have camp meat at the evening stop.

As we drove along, Bert told me of his parents' arrival in the Malta area some sixty years before, with all their belongings packed on a rail car. They left the rails east of Malta and after securing a pair of broncs at dray horse prices, they proceeded to the "breaks" of the Missouri River to homestead. I countered with my grandparents' pilgrimage from Iowa to Grasshopper Creek, Montana Territory in 1863, and their eventual farm in the Canton Valley along the Missouri near present-day Townsend. We bantered back and forth and I would check the wagons to the rear every once in a while and follow the antics of your editor's wagon ahead of us.

At one point the wagons stretched out across a long grassy meadow where they could all be seen at one time, surrounded by fifty or more "outriders," ranging from five to ninety-two in age, moving easily among the wagons — a beautiful sight to behold.

We were approaching the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation land and a series of gullies, winding terrain and wooded foothills demanded the attention of the driver, so the chatter ceased. It's one thing to sit comfortably in a moving auto and take in the sights as you slip through the countryside on asphalt, but it's another story when sitting tight on the seat of a Studebaker dead-axle wagon. After a bit, we pulled into a mountain meadow and rested while the other wagons closed up and the train assembled once again.

It was here that an old word with a new meaning crept into my vocabulary. For many years, "gouge" was a word associated with damaged furniture, something wrestlers did when the referee wasn't looking, and a standby tactic for football linemen. Here in the wilderness, Bert calmly asked if I cared for a "gouge." Not knowing whether to say yes, and wondering if I had offended my amiable compadre, I hesitated in answering, while Bert rummaged about in the wagonbox. When he brought forth a bottle with a genuine well-known spirit label and offered it to me, we proceeded to make a liar out of Daniel Webster then and there. Putting the wagon back in order and checking the harness, discussing the country we were in, and selecting a good site for a homestead, occupied the short rest stop. We admired the outriders and the stock they rode. Dick Schwartz, trail boss, J. J. Smith, wagon boss, and Bud Hasler rode by, not interested in a "gouge" right then, and in a moment or two we were off again.

AY ADVENTURE, GOLDEN REMINISCENCE, FIN

"BOO" MacGILVRA of Butte, "Mr. Montana" to many of us and official host to the Helena group whose adventures with the Milk River Wagon Trail are recounted here, is seen, left, conversing near an evening campfire. The friendly horse in the background seems to be interested in the conversation; as it turned out, he was more interested in the bale of hay on which Boo is seated. At right, standing by the wagon he drove, is Bert Brown, man of few but well-chosen words, and expert driver. Below, the lead wagon, driven by Billy Young, has just emerged from the foothills, well guarded by outriders. No one, including the passenger from Helena, Editor Vivian Paladin, could know that moments later the team would be in full flight, the light-colored wheel horse on the left down on his side.

I knew your editor was still riding the lead wagon, because we had seen the outriders pick up her hat a couple of times, but not until the lead wagon broke off to our left, going downhill, did I actually see her hanging on to the wagon seat, and on the bow of the wagon bed, as they attacked the flat below. We started our descent in a respectable manner, with Bert setting the brake and applying more pressure as the momentum of the wagon increased, which allowed us to reach the flat below without losing any gear and keeping the harness in place. As we reached the flat, we noticed the lead wagon was setting a new speed record across the flat, outdistancing even the outriders. Bert commented that if Billy kept that pace up, he and his passenger would be in Malta yesterday. When the wagon started to loop and sashay, cutting figure eights and performing gyrations that rivaled any Hollywood stunt team, we realized we were witnessing an honest-to-God runaway.

The outriders were desperately trying to catch the leaders and turn the team, but one of the wheel horses was down on his side and the other wheeler was trying to stay to the right of the skidding animal, with the leaders going to the left, all at full tilt. In a swirl of alkali dust, the outriders caught the leaders and brought them to a halt, with the wagon sitting in an outlandish position. We jockeyed in close and gave a sigh of relief when Billy poked his head over the top of the wagon box, with regained reins aloft. As Editor Paladin dismounted, rather more hastily than she had mounted earlier, Bert commented wryly, "I think Billy just lost a passenger."

A quick check revealed no one hurt and Vivian in the sure hands of Lou Perry for a ride to the noon camp via a modern pick-up camper. I rejoined Bert on the wagon while the fallen and "skidded" wheelhorse was urged back to his feet by his driver, who reflected vociferously on the horses' background, parentage and general intelligence. After the harness was repaired and the downed horse was checked for serious injury we had a "gouge" to relieve our taut nerves and slake the dust of the alkali flat. We continued in a northerly direction, leaving the forested Little Rockies behind us and entering the broad plains stretching endlessly toward Malta and the rendezvous with the Whitewater wagons.

I joined up with your editor, her husband, Jack, and our faithful Little Rocky Mountain guide, E. E. "Boo" MacGilvra, who homesteaded, ran the Ruby Gulch recovery process in its heyday, and who is generally acquainted with some of the oldest residents of this area. "Boo" came to this country a few years after Kid Curry and his gang held up the baggage car and passenger car of the Great Northern train west of Malta and scurried for sanctuary in the Little Rockies. It was here that we left the train for the rest of the day to continue our journey through the past.

In the course of our travels, this time by four-wheel drive modern transport, all thoughts of near-disaster had left us, and as always with "Boo," many things were learned and savored. We found out that individuals don't just pass away in this country, they "hump-up and die." We learned that the Little Rockies rival better known ranges in scenic beauty and grandeur, and is hiding a cave known as Azure Cave that rambles forever, somewhere. We saw the original Coburn Ranch where C. M. Russell often stayed, the Matador Ranch, abandoned homesteads that now belong to the Bureau of Land Management, but recalled as a nice place to rest a spell, or make up a batch of baking powder biscuits if no one was home, but only after milking the cow, picking up the eggs (hen fruit) and cutting a little firewood as any good neighbor would do. We now know that old friends are greeted as "you old Billygoat" or "you old Pelican," and if somewhat portly, "he's taken on a little tallow — may have to ship him."

We passed a roadbed faintly visible in the new sage and overgrown with grass that had been a busy thoroughfare with teams and coaches in years long gone. We were told the story of the Malta to Zortman stage that wandered from the road to the vast prairie during a northern blizzard, how the passengers and driver searched for the road again and made it safely to Malta with "nobody frostbit."

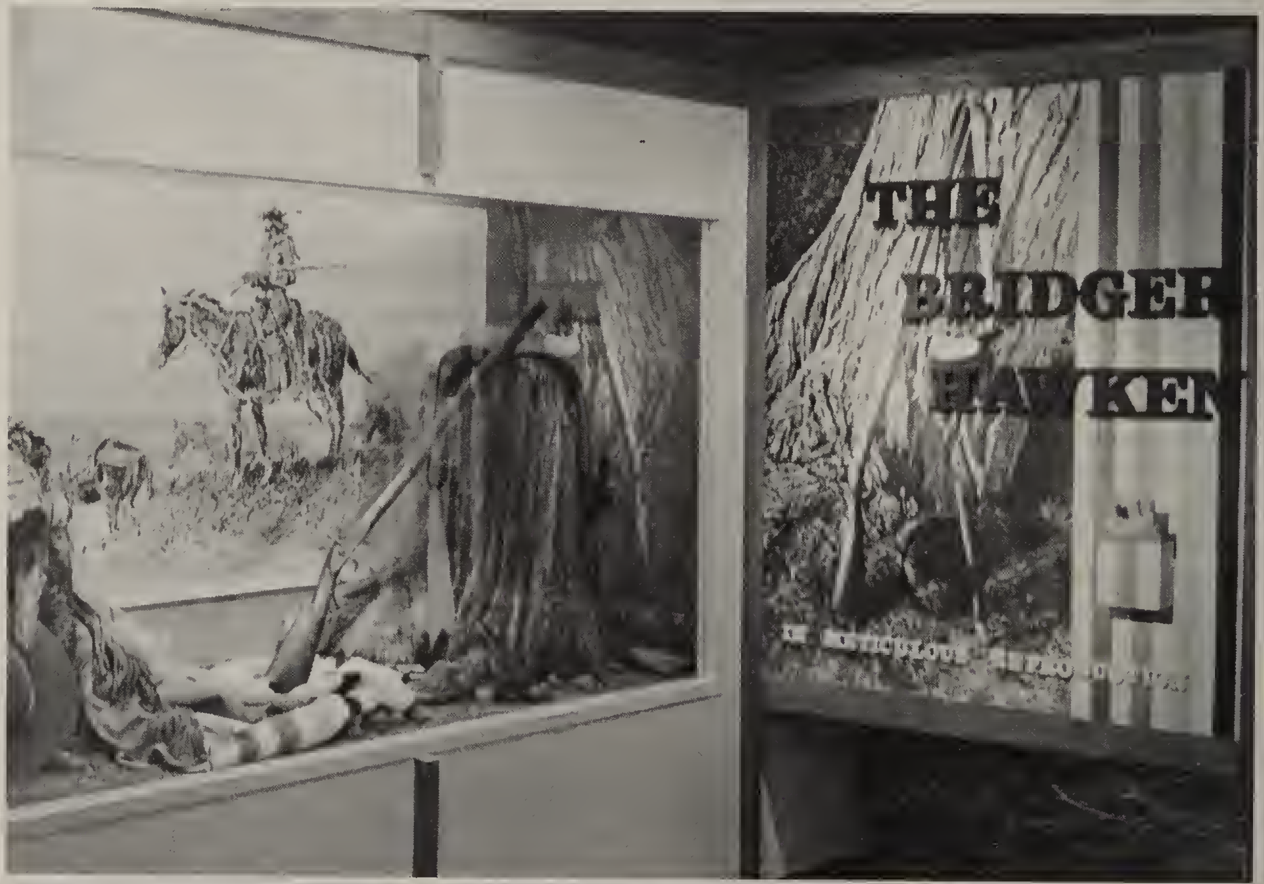
At one point we headed for the Missouri River Breaks via Antelope Springs and passed through an area where firefighting crews were mopping up a lightning-caused fire in rough timbered terrain. We arrived at Jim Kipp vantage point and were treated to a magnificent view of the Missouri River, and the spectacular limestone formation cliffs that rival the Grand Canyon in raw beauty. Stretching to the west was an intermittent view of the shimmering ribbon of the Missouri and just below was an abandoned homestead nestled in a river meadow and flanked by the cliffs of Bull Creek and Cow Creek. It was here, in late summer, 1877, that Chief Joseph and his Nez Perce crossed the Missouri, following Cow Creek up to their final stand near the Bear Paw Mountains south of Chinook, Montana.

The country varies so much that each hill crest provides a different panoramic view, with cold water springs here, a warm water spring there, narrow blade yucca on one side of the road, aromatic sage on the other. SLIPPERY ANN on the signs marking a creek is a misnomer, we are informed. It should be CYPRIAN, as that was the name of the man, Cyprian Matt, for whom it was named. Mapmakers take note.

We journeyed north and found the Whitewater wagons as they prepared to ford the Milk River, and watched as the well-groomed outfit moved through the tall cottonwoods and sage toward the riverbank. Each wagon moved easily into place and edged, single file, into the river. The drivers urged their teams forward as the depth of the water increased and they lunged forward, free of the water and up the opposite bank. The outriders moved easily alongside each leader and escorted the wagons to the top of the bluff overlooking the river below. The train assembled and began to fade into the cottonwoods along the river on the final drive to Malta. They were to camp that night on the outskirts of Malta and join the Zortman train the next day for the festivities of Labor Day in Malta. The trek concluded with a parade through Malta, a big barbecue, fun and games for all, and, I would imagine, a friendly "gouge" here and there among old friends.

I rode the train again and would have gone back for more. I think Vivian would have, too. You cannot forget these fine, congenial people. They work hard and play hard, but they are gentle. Their generosity and courtesy harken you back to another time you knew as a youngster, and the sudden jolt of holiday traffic on the journey home to Helena made us wish things didn't move so fast today.

There are so many recollections of the whole trip that one could branch out in a dozen ways to complete the story. For myself, I was eager for the next day, the teams, wagons, outriders and passengers, new faces, new vistas and new experiences. It was just too much, all in such a short time. Maybe I should have been on the Oregon Trail with my forebears.



A faithful reproduction of Jim Bridger's prized Hawken Rifle has been given full visual treatment in this display case, prepared for the main floor sales area by Jim Werner and Mike McCourt. Produced by the Green River Rifle Works of Roosevelt, Utah, the replica is the first of a numbered series being offered by The Society. An informative brochure, giving all specifications of Bridger's weapon, which he carried during the 1860's as he guided military and civilian expeditions into Montana Territory, is available on request. Ordering procedures will be included, of course. Address Ken Korte, Montana Historical Society, 225 North Roberts, Helena 59601.

A Year-End Report About Our Staff:

NEW FACES, NEW RESPONSIBILITIES, FOND FAREWELLS

The Bicentennial year has brought a number of new faces to many departments of the Society, there have been some changes in responsibilities for others, and we have had to say farewell to some old friends who have left. In this last issue of THE MONTANA POST for 1976, we bring our readers up-to-date about these changes, along with some informal data about the people who do the day-to-day staff work of this many-sided institution.

NELSON

Early this Summer, Eleanor (Jiggs) Dickey retired after serving for 18 years as circulation manager of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. This important post, to which Jiggs brought both humor and a high standard of efficiency, has been ably filled by Bonnie Nelson, who joined the Library staff in 1974. A Helena native, Bonnie has had a great deal of office experience, including four years with the Montana Chamber of Commerce. Remaining in the "good right arm" spot in the circulation department is Imogene (Jimmy) Barnes.

KOEHNKE

Also new to the masthead of the magazine, as editorial assistant to Vivian Paladin, is Dee Ann Koehnke, a native Montanan who holds B.A. degrees, including one in journalism, from the University of Montana. An enthusiastic 23-year-old with high academic credentials and a deep interest in Montana history, Dee succeeds Carolyn J. Mattern, who left in September to take a position in the archives of the Wisconsin Historical Society. Carolyn, who earned her Ph.D. in history from the University of Wisconsin in April, had been on our staff for three years.

McCOURT

Mike McCourt, who grew up in Cut Bank, Montana, is a versatile young man who has seen service with the Society since student days at Carroll College, learning the rudiments of exhibit design under Bob Morgan, former curator. After his graduation in 1969, however, Mike went into teaching, serving on the faculties of schools in Eureka and Browning. In 1974, with full concurrence from his wife, Mary, he decided that his first love was the museum field. Early this year, he became Assistant Curator, joining Curator Bob Gant and Preparator Jim Werner in creating new exhibits and enhancing existing ones — a long-term project indeed. Mike continues to "double in brass" as photographer for all divisions of the Society, and, just as important to us, as official gourmet chef for staff dinner parties.

SHEEHY

There has been a change in responsibility for Dennis Sheehy, who succeeded to the post of business manager this Summer following the illness and death of Dan Clancy. A graduate of Helena High School and Carroll College, Dennis has had quite a long tenure with the Society, including part-time work during his student days. He joined us full-time in September, 1974, doing chores in various departments until he began working as an accountant under Clancy in January, 1975.

BARNETT

Working with Dennis in the business office as accountant is Dorothy Barnett, a 1969 graduate of Carroll College. Born in Miles City and raised near Forsyth, Dorothy has held a number of accounting positions, in banking and with the State of Montana. With her husband, Charles, she shares such hobbies as writing, hunting, fishing and skiing. The business and merchandising divisions have also recently been strengthened with the addition to the staff of Joan Huth, who grew up on a ranch near Terry, Montana, and now lives in Townsend with her husband, Jim, and 11-month-old daughter, Justine.

MARKS

There has been a change of both scene and responsibility for Debbie Marks, who began working for us part-time in the museum sales division when she was still in high school. Until her recent move to the Library office staff, where she handles myriad chores, including details for the third annual history conference, Debbie was at the information desk, the first person visitors see as they enter the building. A native of East Helena, Debbie is married to Gary Marks and lives in Clancy, south of Helena.

MILLER

The new smiling face at the information desk belongs to Linda Ross Miller, a former Great Falls resident and a graduate of the University of Montana. Although her job keeps her busy, Linda has enough energy to run from three to five miles a day, ride her bike, and cross-country ski in winter. She is married to Dick Miller, who also holds a degree in recreation from the University of Montana. It should be added that the information desk post involves not only answering the telephone and responding to questions of visitors (we had more in 1976 than any year in history) but coordinating the Society's important docent, or volunteer, program. Under this expanding activity, thirty-eight Helena women volunteer to serve in many ways, including guided tours through the building.

HIRST

Zaneta Hirst, who attended Carroll College and formerly worked for Montana's employment division and as an outreach worker and secretary for the Helena Indian Alliance, has joined the staff of Librarian Harriett Meloy, handling the organization and filing of newspapers, periodicals, microfilm and books. Married and the mother of three sons, this busy young woman, who is proud of her Indian heritage, replaces Rex Martin, who left early this Summer to accept a scholarship at St. Andrews University in Scotland.

FERDERER

The hundreds of people who visit the Society's facilities (the average was 900 a day this past Summer) spend a great deal of time at the sales counter. Newest member of the group of attractively garbed young women who see to their many requests for books, prints and other items is Daria Ferderer, a native of Great Falls. Veteran of the group is Marie Spurlin, who has been with us the past six years, and Karen Diehl, who works part-time. The entire operation is under the direction of Merchandise Manager Dorothea Neath.

Finally, we introduce to our readers Jennifer Jeffries, a native of Illinois and a graduate of Kalamazoo College in Michigan, who recently began her duties as curator of the Libby Branch of The Montana Historical Society. Succeeding Kermit Edmonds in the post, Jennifer is responsible for the Visitors Center at Libby Dam, located in the extreme northwestern corner of Montana, a project which has involved many of our Helena museum staff people the past four years.

RANCH DEDICATED TO JEANNETTE RANKIN

Jeannette Rankin, "The Lady From Montana" would have approved the setting, and enjoyed the golden autumn sunshine on Sunday, November 7, as the Rankin Avalanche Ranch thirty miles east of Helena was dedicated as a National Historic Landmark. She would have marked well the occasion, too, for it was the 60th anniversary of her election to the U.S. Congress as the first woman to ascend to the highest law-making body of any nation anywhere in the world.

She would have enjoyed the informal remarks of Belle Winestine of Helena, the small, dynamic lady who had been her administrative assistant in 1917 and 1918, and those of Frances Elge of Billings, who filled the same spot a quarter century later, when Miss Rankin cast her second vote against the country's entry into a major war.

For the dedication ceremony, the National Park Service was represented by Philip Iverson, superintendent of Glacier National Park. The address of the day was delivered by Dr. Merrill G. Burlingame, Professor Emeritus, Montana State University.

"You can no more win a war than you can win an earthquake," Dr. Burlingame quoted Miss Rankin in his cogent remarks, during which he traced her remarkable career which did not end until she was nearly 93 years old, in 1973. Born to above-average advantages, she was a defender of the disadvantaged, including women and children, long before it was fashionable to do so.

Because Miss Rankin spent so much of her later life in other places, Dr. Burlingame suggested that there might be some conjecture about the suitability of a Montana ranch as a memorial. "It is appropriate," the speaker said, "that something as tangible as a ranch house is being designated as a landmark in her memory. Ranch homes are characteristic of Montana, of Miss Rankin, and of the Rankin family. . . . She and her brother, Wellington, with whom she always worked closely, continued to maintain a steady and intense affection for the land."

You are invited . . .

We are proud to extend to you an invitation to the 1976 Christmas Exhibit, sponsored by the Montana Historical Society, to take place December 3 through December 19 in the Poindexter Gallery of our museum. In a variety of media, from pottery to paintings, twenty-one well-known artists will exhibit some fifty pieces, ranging in price from $25 to $300. A reception for the public to meet and greet the artists will open the exhibit on December 3 at 8:00 P.M. If you are in the area, please stop in. We are sure you will enjoy it!

DALICH NAMED TO SOCIETY'S BOARD AS BURLINGAME ENDS LONG SERVICE

After serving on the Society's Board of Trustees for twenty-seven years, Dr. Merrill G. Burlingame of Bozeman announced his retirement this Summer, although he will continue to offer his counsels as a member of the Editorial Board of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. His successor on the 15-member body, announced in August by Governor Tom Judge, is Anthony Dalich of Great Falls, a well known sports official, coach, scout and manager, who is equally interested in western history.

Long familiar to Montana State University students as a member of the history faculty, Dr. Burlingame is one of Montana's best known historians. His well written and arranged Montana Frontiers, published in 1942 and long out of print, is still considered a standard reference work on territorial and state history. With K. Ross Toole, he authored the three-volume A History of Montana, published in 1957, also out of print. It has been the private hope of many of us that Dr. Burlingame will find time, in his retirement, to republish the solid text materials on Montana history with which he has been concerned in the past. Finding time, however, poses a problem with Merrill Burlingame, as it does with so many involved people who find themselves busier than ever on retirement.

BURLINGAME

Besides his work with the Society's board, Burlingame served on the Governor's Advisory Council on Historic Sites and Antiquities for fifteen years, is a founding member of the Montana Institute of the Arts (he was named a Fellow of that institution in 1959), and was instrumental in opening the Museum of the Rockies on the MSU campus in 1956, serving as a director until 1968.

Meanwhile, with Mrs. Burlingame, with whom he has collaborated on many research, writing and editing projects, Dr. Burlingame continues to travel a great deal and continues to lend his knowledge and enthusiasms to many activities,

DALICH

Tony Dalich, who comes to the board with an equal zest for and interest in western history, is a native Montanan. He attended Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., before entering Montana Tech in Butte, from which he graduated. Long a resident of Great Falls, Dalich has been active in the field of sports in many capacities, including official, manager, scout and coach. A deeply concerned man, Dalich served as athletic coach for the School for the Deaf and Blind in Great Falls, and recently retired as director of the Senior Citizens Center in that city. He is a charter member of the Montana Officials Association, and for a decade, between 1940 and 1950, he was a baseball talent scout in the Intermountain region for the Brooklyn Dodgers and St. Louis Browns.

We enjoyed our first contact with Tony Dalich in 1964, when we began working with him on an in-depth study of the Dempsey-Gibbons prize fight which put Shelby, Montana on the map for all time in 1923. The article, which appeared in MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY in the Summer issue, 1965, has led Dalich to more research and writing on the history of sports.

Dalich is married to the former Mildred Conrad of Kalispell. A daughter, Mrs. B. Walden, lives in Great Falls. A son, Charles, teaches western history at Mt. Hood College at Portland, Oregon, and for the past eight years has coached the varsity ski team.

With his appointment of Dalich to the board, Governor Judge at the same time announced the reappointment of Joseph E. Reber and Doris Marsolais Marshall, both of Helena.

THIRD STATE HISTORY CONFAB SET

The Montana Historical Society and the Council to Preserve Montana History, an informal association of historians, recently announced plans for the third in their series of jointly-sponsored state history conferences. Once again the sessions will be held at the Colonial Hilton in Helena, and the conference will begin on Thursday evening, November 3 and adjourn on Saturday, November 5. The program is being principally funded by a grant from the Montana Committee for the Humanities, an affiliate of the National Endowment for the Humanities. Consequently the conference will explore the Committee's 1976 theme, private rights and public choices, as it relates to various aspects of Montana's heritage and its current problems. As might be expected in view of the national anniversary, several speakers have indicated that they will talk about the "Bicentennial phenomenon."

Both of the previous conferences, which featured a mix of lectures, panels, and practical workshops, were well attended and generated considerable enthusiasm, and it is hoped that the third conference will meet with a similar response. Program plans which are now finalized are detailed below and more details and registration forms will be mailed to all Society members in Montana later this summer. Others desiring forms may write the Society, 225 N. Roberts Street, Helena, Montana 59601.

At the luncheon Friday, November 4, Norris C. Hundley, Jr., will address the conference on western water rights and their Twentieth Century implications. Professor Hundley is a member of the history department at UCLA and editor of the prestigious historical journal, the Pacific Historical Review. Dr. Hundley's particular field of interest is water resource history in the West, and he has published two titles on the subject: Water and the West: The Colorado River Compact and the Politics of Water in the American West and Dividing the Waters: A Century of Controversy Between the United States and Mexico.

Later that afternoon Hundley and Robert Dunbar of Montana State University will chair a session (the only session scheduled for that afternoon so all may attend) on Montana's water resources. Along with a panel of experts representing various points of view, Hundley and Dunbar will examine the public and private use of Montana's finite water resources in the past and will speculate on prospects for their continued social and economic development in the future.

Following the banquet that evening K. Ross Toole, Hammond Professor of Western History at the University of Montana and a former director of the Montana Historical Society, will speak on the state of Montana's history in the Bicentennial year. A popular and entertaining speaker on historical and environmental subjects, Toole is the author of Montana: An Uncommon Land and Twentieth Century Montana: A State of Extremes.

The third conference speaker will be announced in the registration materials, and is scheduled to address the noon luncheon on Saturday, November 5.

In addition to the panel on water resources, two other sessions have been scheduled for Friday morning. In contrast with the more free-wheeling discussions which characterized previous conferences, each session will include one or more brief papers to be followed by group discussion. The Northern Pacific Land Grant is to be the subject of a session being co-ordinated by Robert Peterson of the University of Montana and Rex Myers of the Society staff. The two historians will discuss new research concerning the utilization of corporate land with individuals both sympathetic and opposed to past and present utilization of the original grant. Participants will include Warren McGee, a retired N.P.R.R. conductor; John Willard, a representative of the Burlington Northern and Dr. Ross Catronio of the Oregon College of Education.

At the same time Manuel Machado of the University of Montana History Department, will discuss the much neglected subject of ethnic history in Montana with Paul Miller, University of Montana Sociology Department, Thomas Wessel, Montana State University History Department, and Arthur Dohlman of the History Department of Northern Montana College.

The Saturday morning workshop will feature a discussion of genealogical research conducted by Dennis Richards, Documents Librarian at the University of Montana. Later that afternoon the curatorial staff of the Historical Society, Robert Gant, Michael McCourt, and James Warner, will present a practical approach to organizing and operating a small museum that will range from the establishment of a local historical society to the construction of the actual exhibits.

The registration fee (not including meals) for the conference is $2.00 and people who plan to attend are reminded that they must make their own room arrangements.

See you there!

TOOLE, HUNDLEY TO ADDRESS NOV. MEETING

Glendive's Krug Ho

photos by Stephen Hammer

LOCATED A SHORT distance from Yellowstone River, the Charles Krug house in Glendive stands today as a testament to the early history of eastern Montana. Although classical in its inspiration, the brick residence constructed in 1907 is both a product and a reminder of significant developments in western settlement.

Charles Krug and his sister came to the West from Michigan about 1878, seeking a climate to help her asthma and an area in which to establish a business. By 1880 the pair had settled in the bustling, new railroad town of Glendive, where Chas., as he always signed himself, worked for the Northern Pacific.

The unfenced rangeland in the area seemed to offer excellent opportunities for amassing wealth, and every payday, Krug invested in a few cattle. By 1885 he had 500 head grazing on the area now known as Krug Creek. Like many other cattlemen, Krug lost nearly his entire herd during the terrible winter of 1886-1887. Discouraged but by no means defeated, he started again, this time investing in sheep, and from this time on Krug's rise was rapid. By the turn of the century his herd was one of the largest in eastern Montana. His technique for building up his herd was to go into business on a shares basis with young Scandinavian immigrants; most of the boys did very well for themselves—and Krug.

At the same time, Krug expanded his land holdings until he owned over 54 sections (one and a half townships) of land, 800 acres of which were under irrigation. Krug purchased much of the land from the Northern Pacific at prices ranging from 75¢ to $1.50 an acre; ultimately he resold much of it to land-hungry settlers at ten times that price.

In 1900, at age 54, Krug married Mrs. F. B. Ketcham, the divorced mother of two small daughters, and in subsequent years the Krugs became the parents of five more children. Befitting a man of his success and stature within the community, in 1907 Krug moved his growing family from his ranch near Hoyt into a new, twenty-five room mansion at the corner of Bell and Douglas Streets in Glendive.

Like many other men of means, Krug attempted to diversify his holdings; not all of these ventures were to be as successful as his ranching however. In 1912 he became an investor in eastern Montana's first oil exploration. Unfortunately the well yielded no oil. An even larger venture was the Glendive Milling Company, incorporated in 1914 with $44,000.00 in capital stock. With Krug as chairman of the board, a large mill was completed in 1917. After producing Strongheart Flour for four years, the firm dissolved during a price war in 1924, and Krug emerged as the sole owner. At various times Krug also helped finance a sawmill, a creamery, a machine company, an apiary, none of which did well, and a hotel in Seattle, Washington.

When the Merchant's Bank was reorganized in 1915, Krug became president and a leading stockholder. Following World War I, drought and low prices forced many of the state's banks to fail, but Charles Krug was personally responsible for the unusual situation in Glendive. With Harry Dion, president of the Exchange State Bank, Krug made a pact to come to each other's assistance in the event of a "run." Krug backed up his pledge with a public announcement that, if necessary, he would put up every cent he had to keep his banks solvent (in addition to the Merchant's Bank, Krug was also a stockholder in the Scandinavian-German Bank), and go out of Glendive as poor as he had been when he arrived 45 years earlier. Since the 79-year-old Krug was known as a man of his word, the confidence engendered prevented a panic, and all of the Glendive banks survived. Unfortunately during the midst of the crisis Krug suffered a stroke and he lingered, partially paralyzed, until his death in 1929.

This past winter Charles Krug's beautiful residence was named a state historic site and it recently received a similar designation on the National Register of Historic Places. Thus, loom exciting possibilities for restoration for the people of Glendive.

MARIE MacDONALD
Glendive, Montana

use to be National Historic Site

WHEN CHARLES KRUG determined to build his Glendive mansion he evidently desired to move his family to a home befitting his success. Since there were no architects within several hundred miles, he engaged a St. Louis firm, headed by Herbert G. Chivers, to prepare the architectural drawings and structural specifications. Chivers responded to the challenge by designing a grand facade in the neo-classical style so popular at the turn of the century. To withstand the rigors of the hard winters and hot summers of eastern Montana, Chivers determined that the house should be solidly built of Hebron brick, and to do the work, he imported highly skilled masons from Michigan. Today their stonework, limestone door and window sills are as handsome as when the house was completed almost sixty years ago.

Chivers' plan called for the first floor to be raised four feet above the ground on a stone foundation, with windows in the foundation providing daylight to the full basement. The entrance to the two-story, 25-room structure is classical in design, and features a wide porch ascended by stone steps and square wooden columns supporting a triangular pediment which forms the roof over the entry. This pediment, the most prominent single design element of the front elevation, is decorated with attractive medallions, column capitols, and denticulation in the pattern work. The cornice which encircles the entire building features detailed alabaster designs of classical derivation. The classical appearance is further enhanced by symmetrically spaced windows and their keystone treatment and by the exterior front corners of the house. Here projecting brick quoins create the impression that they support the hipped roof. The slate roof is capped with galvanized iron finials, three tall chimneys and dormer windows on each side. Overall, the house measures 53 by 42 feet.

Inside, a generous central hall provides access to the rooms. On the first story the rooms are large and airy and feature eleven foot ceilings. The main floor includes a parlor, sitting room, and dining room on the southeast side, with an office, chamber, and kitchen across the hall. Two corner fireplaces, in the parlor and dining room, feature glazed porcelain tile fronts and oak pillars. The interior throughout features quarter-sawed oak decoration, hardwood floors, and leaded glass windows.

An elaborately decorated stairway leads to the second story bedrooms and also extends to the partially finished attic where the maid and valet and visiting ranch hands were housed. The basement included not only a furnace room, laundry room, tool room, and vegetable room, but a wine cellar with a steel door once used in the First National Bank of Bismarck and a playroom with a merry-go-round for the children.

The home, which is still owned by Krug's four living children, is generally in excellent condition. In the Krug house is a grand expression of life at the turn of the century, reminding the current generation of the timeless values of fine construction.

T. C. Power Papers Opened for Research

Processing and inventorying of the Thomas C. Power Papers, perhaps the most significant body of private manuscripts held by the Montana Historical Society, has recently been completed and the collection is open for research. The documentation provided by these materials will go far toward supporting historical interpretation of Montana from the 1860's to 1920. While his papers are primarily a business collection, Power himself touched so many facets of Montana's formative years that few studies of the era will be complete without consultation of these records.

One of the Northwest's major entrepreneurial figures, Thomas C. Power was born in Dubuque, Iowa, in 1839, the son of Irish immigrants. During his youth Power contributed heavily to the work on the family farm while completing the limited education offered in the area schools. In 1860, he accepted a job with a government survey and spent the next four years working for the government and private firms in the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, and eastern Montana. In 1866, he became a minor partner in a wholesale merchandising firm which supplied several frontier areas.

This investment, together with his familiarity with the West, led Power to locate at Fort Benton, Montana, the head of navigation on the Upper Missouri, and in 1867 he opened his general mercantile firm in the bustling riverfront community. His brother, John W. Power, followed later with a stock of goods, and Power's initial company, T. C. Power and Brother, was formed.

The firm was ideally located, for not only did it trade with residents of the locality, the military garrison, and Indian tribes of the region, but as the upper limit of navigation on the Missouri, Fort Benton offered unique advantages as the hub of a freighting network to the towns and camps of the isolated territory. Power rapidly exploited this situation and in 1868 began supplementary freighting operations while expanding the range and quantity of his merchandise.

By the 1870's T. C. Power and Brother and I. G. Baker and Company dominated the trade and freighting on the northern plains. The rapid expansion of the two firms led them to invest in the construction of the steamer Benton to supply goods for their operations and carry gold, silver, hides, and other goods down river. In 1874 this investment resulted in the formation of the Fort Benton Transportation Company, and in subsequent years they built or purchased other steamboats to expand this facet of the trade. In the late 1870's, Power bought out Baker's interest in the steamer line and continued to dominate the Upper Missouri commerce until the advent of the railroad. In 1879, as an adjunct to this interest, Power formed several stagecoach lines.

While retaining his investments in the Fort Benton area, in 1878 T. C. Power settled in Helena which was rapidly emerging as the focus of Montana's finance and trade. In subsequent years he became active in the capital's economic, political and social life, maintained several commercial firms, built and operated the American National Bank, and speculated in real estate and regional mining companies. Clearly, T. C. Power's entrepreneurial interests were unusually broad; he founded or invested in over ninety-five companies in the course of his long career. During the years from 1880 to 1920 he invested in cattle and sheep ranching, real estate, lumbering, coal mining, electric power generation, hotels, automobile distribution, military and reservation supply, agricultural implement sales, banking, grain milling, municipal water supply, mining, oil and irrigation—this in addition to his major interests in merchandising and transportation!

Interest in politics paralleled Power's diverse business career. A lifelong Republican, he served as a delegate to the abortive 1884 constitutional convention. In 1889 he was defeated in the first state gubernatorial election, but in 1890 he was selected by the divided state legislature as one of four senators, two from each party, to fill Montana's two seats in the U.S. Senate. Power and the other Republican, Wilbur Fisk Sanders, were seated by the Republican-controlled U.S. Senate over bitter opposition from Democratic contenders. His one term in the upper house (1890-1895) was characterized by concentration on Montana's interests.

About 1895, Power's son, Charles B. Power, joined his father in the management of the business interests, and following T. C. Power's death in 1923, his son succeeded to ownership and operation of the remaining firms.

The Power Papers came to the Society in 1968 as a gift of the great-grandchildren of Thomas C. Power: Judith, Jane, and Thomas Tobin, with the support of their parents, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Tobin, of Helena. In the years since the papers were donated, the Society searched for means by which the materials could be made available for research, but the very size of the collection made this difficult.

Because state funds were limited, the Society looked to private sources, and in 1970 sufficient funds were secured to permit Dr. John Hakola, of the University of Maine, a former Montanan, to complete preliminary inventorying. With the knowledge gained from this first step, efforts were begun to secure outside funding to complete the task. From 1971 to 1974, approaches were made to several private and governmental sources. This search produced little until the Montana Bicentennial Administration agreed to provide funding for the project. Although significantly different from most activities funded by that agency, the processing of the Power Papers was seen as a valid expression of the Bicentennial's "heritage" theme—a method of preserving, clarifying and making acccessible a significant resource relating to the state's history.

The Bicentennial funds were matched by monies from the Thomas Teakle bequest to the Society. Before his death, Teakle, a teacher and western historian, stipulated that his estate be used to further the study of Montana history.

Together these funds were sufficient to hire an archivist for one year and to purchase some of the necessary materials. In June, 1975, William Massa, Jr., a graduate of the library school of the University of Wisconsin with archival training at the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, began work on the collection. His devotion to the project made it possible to complete the most significant segment in the relatively short period of time (and money) available for the job.

Historians interested in using the Power Papers are invited to write to the Society for a more detailed description of the collection and its contents.

MHS, BANCO LAUNCH CMR PURCHASE FUND

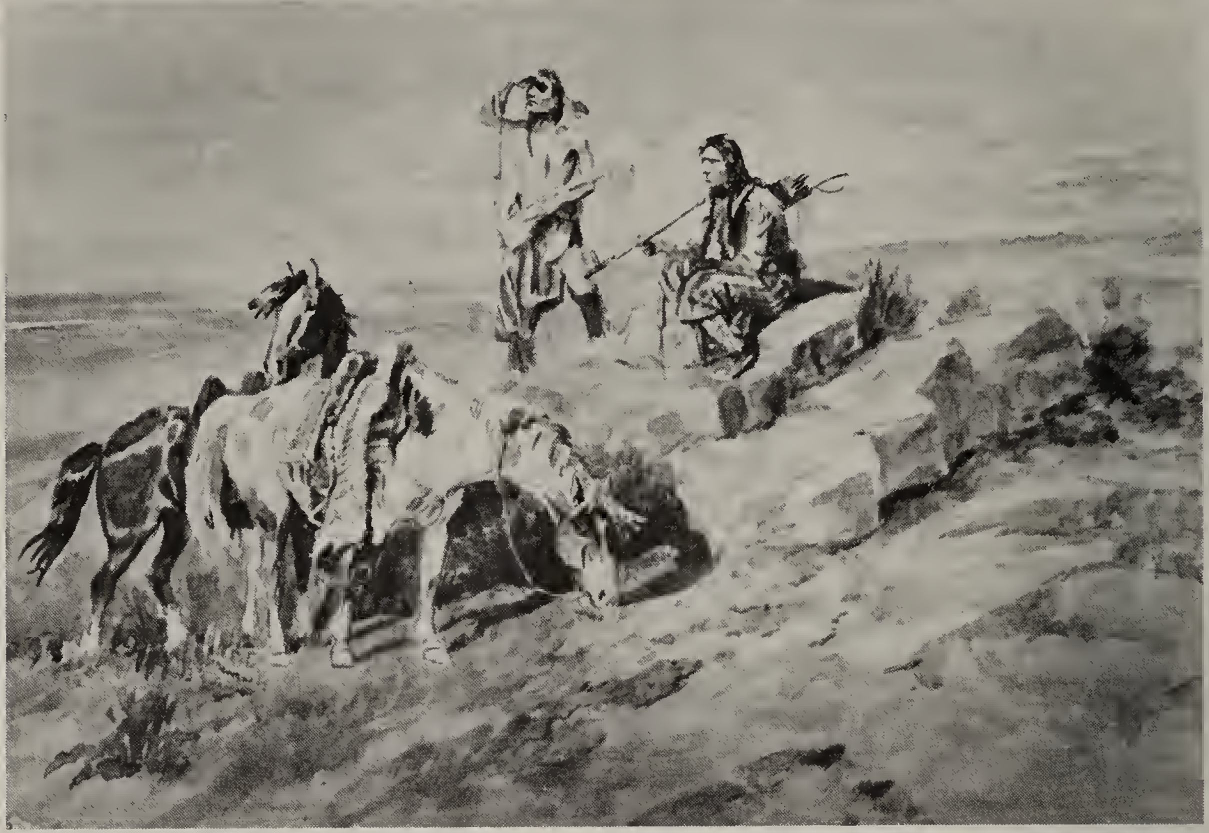
Recent coverage in the Montana press has focused attention upon the proposed sale by the Montana Club of Helena of its magnificent Charles Russell painting, "When the Land Belonged to God," and has raised concerns that the canvass might be sold outside of the state. In May, 1976, the Club announced that the large painting might be offered for sale, but offered the Society the right of first refusal. In other words, the Historical Society would be permitted an opportunity to match the highest bid. The only difficulty with this proposal is that the Society has an extremely restricted acquisitions budget. (If you read elsewhere in this publication, you will realize the similar handicap that budgetary restrictions impose upon archival and artifact acquisitions.)

In an effort to raise the required sum, the Montana Historical Society has joined with the Montana Affiliates of Northwest Bancorporation and the Montana American Revolution Bicentennial Administration to sponsor a unique Bicentennial project which is aimed at keeping Russell art in the state.

The partners commissioned Bob Scriver, the famous western artist and sculptor from Browning, Montana, to create a sculpture piece and belt buckle which would be sold throughout the state. Profits from the project will be used to establish a C. M. Russell Art Acquisition Fund for the Society. Although sales so far have been excellent, the fate of "When the Land Belonged to God" is still in doubt as we go to press. Whatever the outcome, it seems certain that the funds will be of inestimable value to the preservation of Montana's unique cultural heritage.

Scriver's handsome 16" high sculpture depicts a typical early-day Montana mountain man. Only one hundred of these bronzes have been cast, and they will be sold at a cost of $950.00 each. In addition, Scriver designed a bronze belt buckle which depicts the same rugged trapper and which has been designated as the official Montana Bicentennial belt buckle. The buckle will be sold at a price of $12.00.

Both the sculpture and the belt buckle are being sold by Montana Banco banks and by the Montana Historical Society. For further information, contact either the Society or your nearest Banco bank.



The newest addition to the Historical Society's collection of Charles M. Russell art is an 18½ by 11½ inch watercolor, THE SCOUTING PARTY. Now on permanent loan, the painting comes to the Society through the generosity of W. Leonard Renick, a San Francisco investment counselor. Under provisions of his will, the painting will ultimately become the property of the Society. This fine watercolor, which is signed with Russell's signature and skull, depicts two Indians, one seated and smoking, and the other standing. While taking a minute's rest during their reconnaissance mission, the attention of both the scouts and their horses is transfixed by something (unseen to the viewer) on the distant horizon.

PICTURE COLLECTION CLOSED; NEED FOR CONSERVATION CITED

In order to insure preservation of a valuable historical resource and to complete a reorganization project, the Historical Society recently closed its photographic archives to patron use. The collection will reopen for research on July 1, 1977. Although the Society's Board of Trustees was reluctant to take the step, it was determined that conservation and care of the collection were essential if the photographs were to be available for future generations. In further explaining the move, Society Director Ken Korte noted that many of the old photographs and negatives were already in an alarmingly deteriorated condition because of the Society's inability to fund proper preservation techniques in the past. He cited the escalating use of the collection on the part of historians, authors, and publishers as a reason for this deterioration and noted that this utilization has greatly increased during the Bicentennial observance.

Although the photograph collection will be closed to patron use until July, 1977, the library and archives staff asks us to remind members and potential donors that all donations of photographs will still be gratefully accepted.

LEE PAPERS CONTRIBUTE LOHMILLER ARTIFACTS

Thanks to the generosity of the Lee Foundation, an adjunct of Lee Newspapers, Inc., Davenport, Iowa, the Montana Historical Society has recently acquired Colonel Matthew Lohmiller's excellent collection of Montana related Indian artifacts. It is only as a result of gifts such as this that the Society is able to overcome a severely restricted acquisitions budget.

The bulk of Colonel Lohmiller's collection was assembled by his father, Major C. B. Lohmiller, on the Fort Peck Reservation from 1893 to 1917. From 1893 to 1905 Major Lohmiller was on assignment with the military on the reservation; in 1905 the Army transferred him to the Indian Service to permit him to act as Superintendent, a position which he held until 1917. Because of Colonel Lohmiller's interest in his father's collection, the artifacts have been maintained in excellent condition.

Curator Bob Gant tells us that the new acquisition is a major ethnographic collection worth considerably more than its purchase price. In addition to its intrinsic value to collectors he noted the fact that the collection, which consists chiefly of Sioux and Assiniboine items from the late Nineteenth and early Twentieth Century, fills a number of gaps in the Society's holdings of Indian artifacts. Moreover, because of the joint occupation of the Fort Peck Reservation by the Sioux and Assiniboine, the acquisition will be an excellent resource for ethnologists interested in intertribal relations.

Gant also noted that many of the items in the collection are extremely rare, if not one of a kind. He cited one particular specimen—a Sioux winter count—as probably the most important and most unusual single item in the collection. Gant explained that the winter count served as a pictorial record of tribal experience and that this painted buckskin hide, which is one of only about a dozen known to be in existence, would be a most valuable historical document once its pictographs had been completely interpreted.

McKAY PHOTOS ARE MAY GALLERY FEATURE

During the month of May the Poindexter Gallery will feature an exhibition of the exquisite Indian photography of Rollin H. McKay.

McKay came to Missoula as a young man in 1906. He worked for a time as a barber, and in 1908 opened his first photography shop, the McKay Art Company, in Missoula's old First National Bank Building. He operated his photographic store and black and white photo finishing plant there until 1924 when he built his own building on North Higgins Avenue.

McKay was an avid photographer. When the Higgins Avenue bridge washed out in 1908 he was on the spot with his camera. He washed his prints in the flooding Clark Fork and gave them their final wash in his home bathtub, then sold them as souvenir postcards. During the years 1908 to 1917 McKay would load his 7" x 11" view camera and his heavy equipment into his Maxwell and head out to photograph Indian life.

McKay retired from business in 1946 and died in 1960. In 1968 the company was moved to its present location in the Hammond-Arcade Building, and in 1969 the business, along with McKay's boxes of old glass plate negatives, was purchased by Douglas Brown, a skilled photographer. The business is now known as Haugen's, and is still a widely known photographic store.

Brown was impressed by the exceptional photographic quality of the glass negatives, and even more impressed by McKay's proficiency as an artist. Technically and aesthetically, the photographs are sensitive, perceptive views of a particular time and place.

Brown, with his skills as a photographer and appreciation of the historic importance of the plates, printed the negatives on McKay's original 8" x 10" Elwood enlarger, using Kodak Ektature X paper and Kodak Rapid Selinium toner. The prints are all executed by hand, matching as closely as possible the tonal range in each print, as mass production is neither possible or desirable. The prints are available in sets of ten in a finished size of 15" x 19" mounted on hard board. Accompanying the photographs is a beautifully printed brochure written by Indian historian Harold E. Gray. After 200 sets are sold, the negatives will be donated to the Montana Historical Society, to be used for reference only.

Some of the best of McKay's photographs were taken of the Flathead Indians during their early days on the reservation. All of these indicate a humanist's compassion for Indians and and an historian's awareness of a fast-disappearing way of life. In the collection is an Indian woman scraping a deer skin, a Kootenai canoe, an Indian Praying, a tipi camp at Arlee, and portraits of numerous tribal leaders. The exhibitions which will open May 7 will also include many other subjects relating to Montana at the turn of the century.

—LOIS McBRIDE

Titled simply "Kootenai Canoe" and "Squaw Tanning Deerskins" these two studies typify the sensitive Indian studies by Missoula photographer Rollin H. McKay.

STATE DOCUMENTS

"COURAGE IS THE WORD" — ONE

In the midst of all the Bicentennial activities, those of us at the Montana Historical Society almost missed an important anniversary of our own—the one hundredth anniversary of historical publishing at the Society. Actually 1976 calls attention to two landmarks in publishing at this institution—the one hundredth anniversary of the first publication of the Contributions to the Historical Society of Montana series and the twenty-fifth anniversary of MONTANA, the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY.

While not the sort of event that prompts speech-makers to exalted hyperbole, the beginning of historical publication at the Montana Historical Society in 1876 was an event worthy of note. Thirteen years before Montana became a state, while most of the region was still untamed frontier, a few dedicated members of the Society demonstrated great commitment to preserving and disseminating knowledge about Montana's origins so that it would be available for future generations. Their achievement is all the more noteworthy because it was accomplished in the face of great indifference.

The story is not without its irony, however. Although greatly concerned with the importance of preserving the historical record, the Society's own organizational records are fragmentary and incomplete for much of its early existence. Information about publishing efforts and the objectives and motivations for launching the program can only be gleaned from obscure and rather dry references in the official minutes and reports.

In a manner of speaking, it was literary pursuits which led to the formation of the Historical Society. In Virginia City, during the winter of 1864, Granville Stuart drafted a promotional-historical volume entitled Montana As It Is. While the book was still being prepared, Stuart read portions of it for criticism to a "little group of congenial spirits" which included his brother, James; Wilbur Fisk Sanders; Hezekiah Hozmer, and E. M. Thompson. Their discussions prompted a suggestion that an organization should systematically preserve the record of the events in which they were participants.

On December 21, 1864, Thompson introduced into the territorial legislature a bill to incorporate the Historical Society of Montana. The bill, which received final approval on February 2, 1865, mandated the organization to "collect and arrange facts" pertaining to Montana, but said nothing about responsibility for publishing such information. Nevertheless, this was already being contemplated by the members. In fact, it is likely that the Society originally envisioned that its meetings would be much like the literary group which had assembled to criticize Stuart's volume. In commenting upon activities at the Society's second meeting, Thomas Dimsdale wrote: "There will now be an opportunity for all our citizens to become members . . . and to contribute such facts as may be of interest to the present and future inhabitants of this country. It is proposed to have such contributions read at its meetings and when enough papers are contributed to fill a volume to have its transactions published."

Despite such aspirations, the decline in the mines near Virginia City led to a dispersion of population, and the Society fell into what one later historian termed "a condition of suspended animation." Not until October 24 and 25, 1873, was President Sanders able to reassemble the membership. This meeting was primarily occasioned by a legislative amendment to the original act of incorporation to require an annual meeting. The same legislation also granted the Society the munificent annual appropriation of $150.00 to be used to purchase books and manuscripts and to pay for "necessary printing." Apparently interest in publication was keen, for the membership adopted a resolution noting the recent death of James Stuart, one of the corporate members, by directing his brother to prepare a memoir "to be published in its [the Society's] collections."

Not long afterward, Sanders transferred the Society's small collection to his law offices in Helena. On January 9, 1874, while Sanders was absent attending the legislature, his office, along with most of downtown Helena, was consumed by flames. Sanders wired Cornelius Hedges, the recording secretary, "Hear historical society wholly burned. Courage is the word."

Rather than discouraging the Society, the disastrous fire spurred the group to greater efforts and eventually to publication by demonstrating the fragility of the historical record. Although the membership did not meet again until April, 1875, Sanders initiated an effort to rebuild the Society's collections.

In order to call attention to these rebuilding efforts, by the latter part of 1874 the officers were convinced of the necessity of publishing a portion of their collections. Although dissemination of historical information was an important motive for the project, equal in importance was the building of the collection through contributions and exchanges.

By September, 1875, the Society had accumulated both sufficient funds (contributions and a special appropriation of $500.00) and materials to publish one volume early in 1876 and they expected that it would be followed almost immediately by a second. Editorial work for this volume was done by Charles Rumley, the librarian, in association with Sanders and Granville Stuart. The three also received valuable assistance in this effort from the publisher, Robert Clarke of Cincinnati, Ohio.

Demonstrating the respect in which his fellow pioneers held him, a large portion of the first volume was devoted to James Stuart. In addition to the aforementioned biography by Granville, the book included James Stuart's journal of the Yellowstone Expedition of 1863, edited by Samuel T. Hauser, and a paper Stuart wrote shortly before his death on the history of the upper Missouri. The volume's only illustration was a steel engraving of Stuart especially rendered for the Society by J. C. Buttre. Other materials included a biography of Malcolm Clark, written by his sister, an account of an expedition up the Snake River by Walter DeLacy, and three other papers written by honorary members of the Society.

The volume was distributed to other societies and libraries and sold to individuals at a cost of $2.50 each. For the most part the first volume of the Contributions was favorably received by historians nationally, but there was some criticism locally because the volume did not present a narrative history and because the manner of presentation gave undue importance to some events. This article-like format was adhered to in all subsequent volumes because, as a later librarian explained, efforts to interpret Montana's past should be left to the historians.

Despite the acclaim which the volume received, the book was no best seller. In the first year following its publication, the Society sold only twenty books, although it distributed 250 complimentary volumes during the same period. For many years sales hardly defrayed the original publishing costs ($400.00 to the publisher and $112.00 to the engraver), but the volume did accomplish its purpose, bringing to the Society many valuable contributions and exchanges.

Although the membership had anticipated publication of Volume II during 1876, "events which . . . the society could not foresee . . . greatly delayed preparation." Precisely what these difficulties were, the Society's records do not make clear. Sanders wrote the governor late in 1876 that matters were not in "such an advanced state of completion as to justify a prediction of the exact date of its issue," but it is likely he had no idea that it would be twenty years before the second volume appeared.

Certainly publication was much discussed during the intervening years. In 1878 the eminent historian, Francis Parkman, acknowledged his honorary membership in the Society by stating that he looked forward to the "intended publication." The minutes during the 1880's and 1890's are full of references indicating a desire that the book be published promptly.

Although finances were undoubtedly the chief explanation for the delay, it is likely there were other reasons not disclosed in the official records. In 1879 the legislature authorized an appropriation "whenever the historical society of Montana shall cause to be published any one or more additional volumes of contributions." Even with the funds at hand, no volume appeared. In 1889 the project advanced as far as sending the materials to the printer, but still no volume was published. In 1891 the Society became a state department and the legislature mandated the organization to publish a biennial report of its collections and transactions for which it appropriated the sum of $750.00. Still no volume appeared.

Finally, in 1895, the legislature mandated an annual volume (significantly, the legislature failed to authorize funds for the project) and in 1896 the second volume of the Contributions came off the presses. Edited by Librarians William S. Wheeler and H. S. Wheeler in co-operation with Granville Stuart, the volume contained materials chiefly related to events in Montana in 1876.

This sensitive portrait of James Stuart engraved by J. C. Buttre for the Historical Society served as the only illustration for Volume I of the CONTRIBUTIONS.

In spite of the subject matter, sales were uninspiring and in an 1898 report, Wheeler took Montana to task: "It does not reflect credit upon us," he said, "that of volume 2 over 700 copies are yet on hand of the 1,000 published." He suggested that a copy should be in every home in the state in which books were found and devised a plan to promote sales among the state's schools. In spite of such worries (or perhaps because of them) the book paid for itself by 1900.

Officers of the Society frequently expressed a desire to publish annually in fulfillment of the legislature's directive, but lack of funds plagued their efforts. In her annual report in 1900, Librarian Laura E. Howey stated that it was unwise to omit publication for a single year and noted that many younger historical societies had better publishing records than Montana. Although the Society published volume III later that year and achieved its best record in the next seven years (Vol. IV, 1903; Vol. V, 1904; Vol. VI, 1907), it never did meet the annual standard.

The volumes produced between 1900 and 1910 were illustrated with many photographs and each book was characterized by a theme: Volume IV featured the construction of the Capitol, Volume V featured the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, and Volume VI was dedicated to the Lewis and Clark and Louisiana Expositions.

In addition, a portion of Volume IV was reserved for the reminiscences of pioneer women, an oversight which had been noted by the Society as early as 1898. Occasionally the materials selected for publication met with criticism. In 1908 Librarian William S. Bell received a letter from one reader. "I have recd Vol. 6th," she said, "and it is a nice looking book, and I am pleased to have it, altho disappointed in it; there are 145 pages about the Presbyterian church, her founders etc., if all the other churches are written up so generously we'll have no room for other matters."

For the most part, however, the Contributions sold well and during the period, the reserve supply of Volume I was completely exhausted. Senator William Clark paid for a second edition of 300 copies which was sold out almost immediately.

Following this brief flurry of activity, publishing efforts at the Society languished once again as the legislature's failure to allocate specific funds for the purpose took its toll. In the face of limited appropriations, the Society reassessed its priorities, and although not abandoning interest in publication, determined that its money should be devoted to collecting manuscript material. During these years discussion of the Contributions in the biennial reports took on a rather humorous repetitiveness. Year after year, the Society's librarian noted "the Library has not published its annual book of contributions this year." Nevertheless, the Society did manage to publish Volume VII in 1910 after "many unavoidable and vexatious delays." Volume VIII appeared in 1917, and five years later Volume IX came off the presses.

Even such limited efforts were not without their hazards, however. Librarian W. T. Pemberton reported to the governor that to gather the materials for Volume VIII the library had employed several persons in different parts of the state. "We regret most sincerely to state," Pemberton wrote, "that while engaged in this research work, Mr. A. J. Noyes, a most enthusiastic and efficient worker, was killed by a vicious bull. We have found it difficult to fill Mr. Noyes' place."

Although funds for the Society had been limited during the second decade of the century, they were even more so during the 1920's. Then with the onset of the national depression in 1929 the institution's financial outlook worsened even more. In spite of what he understatedly termed "trying times," Librarian David Hilger hammered away in his biennial reports at the importance of disseminating historical information and noted the inconsistency of requiring an annual volume but failing to appropriate funds for it. When this failed to bring a response, Hilger attempted to shame Montana's record in comparison with other states, but these efforts were no more successful.

Regardless of the financial discouragement, plans for a tenth volume continued to receive discussion, and the materials were selected in the event that such a volume might be published in the future. Having selected two journals from American Fur Company posts, in 1939 the Society sent Assistant Librarian Anne McDonnell to St. Louis and St. Paul to engage in some background research. Such efforts coincided with an infrequent liberality toward the Society on the part of the legislature—a $2,000.00 appropriation earmarked for publication. It is little wonder, then, that when the volume finally appeared in 1940, the foreword revealed more than a hint of annoyance: "The publication of . . . this volume is a matter that should have been done some years ago, but it has not been an easy work to prevail upon . . . Legislative Assemblies to furnish funds."

Although it was not immediately apparent, Volume X was to be the final volume of the Contributions series. During the 1940's the Society's librarians selected materials for a possible eleventh volume and continued to lobby unsuccessfully for funds for the project. In 1949 Lucinda B. Scott wrote the Board that "apparently the average contemporaneous legislator is interested only in the publication of history in which he figures. How Montana reached its present seat in the sun and who put her there is of no interest to him." By the following year, both Scott and the majority of the Board had abandoned the Contributions series in favor of a more regular form of historical publication, a practice that was growing in popularity among all state historical agencies.

Revitalization of the publication program also coincided with the legislative reorganization of the Historical Society in 1949. In order to attract an enlarged membership for the Society, members of the Board realized that a publication was absolutely essential. Thus at a meeting on July 30, 1949, Albert J. Partoll introduced a resolution that a committee be named to discuss the possibility of publishing a quarterly journal or some other form of regular historical publication.

Because of difficulties attendant to the construction of the Society's new building and the hiring of a director, nothing of a concrete nature was done for several months. Interested members of the board continued to correspond on the matter, and they contacted the state printing contractor to secure an estimate. At the same time the librarian searched the Society's files for possible articles.

On April 2, 1950, Norman Winestine, president of the Board, met with a committee which included several of the most eminent Montana historians—Merrill G. Burlingame, Paul E. Phillips, and H. G. Merriam. Their discussions concluded that a quarterly journal devoted to Montana history was a meritorious undertaking, although they realized that once begun such an enterprise imposed a form of obligation upon the Society. The group resolved that the publication should have a new name, The Montana Magazine of History, to keep it distinct from the Contributions.

As to contents, the group expressed the desire that the magazine should be a "living publication" that reflected the state's diversity. All present agreed that materials must be factual and thoroughly researched yet enjoyable to a broad audience. Cost of publication was not discussed; apparently revenue from subscriptions was expected to pay for printing. Personnel was a difficulty, however, for the Society than had a staff of only two much overworked employees.

In its meeting later that fall, the Board accepted the committee's suggestions and resolved that publication should begin as soon as possible. To launch the magazine, Partoll volunteered to edit the first issue in conjunction with an editorial committee and his offer was gratefully accepted.

Work commenced on the project almost immediately, although the voluntary character of the editorial staff and difficulties with the printer pushed the publication date from January to well into February, 1951. When it finally emerged the 88-page, 6" x 9" magazine bore the legend "to preserve, to publish, and to promote interest in the History of Montana." Bound in wood grain paper (to salute the timber industry, a commemorative pattern that was followed through the first volume year), the magazine contained articles written by members of the Board of Trustees and the editorial board.

The little magazine received a generally favorable reception. Paul Phillips commented on its "high quality" and suggested that it would foster a real understanding of the history of the territory and the state. The general public also supported Montana. After the first issue almost 400 people had purchased subscriptions ($3.00 per year) and after the first year the magazine was nearly self-sustaining.

Over the years there would be many changes both on the masthead and in the magazine's physical appearance. Montana generally added more illustration both in color and in black and white, and increasingly sophisticated design concept, and a larger page size. In 1953 the word "the" slipped from the title. In 1955 an enlarged scope was reflected in the new name, MONTANA, the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. After the second issue the editorship was handed to Director K. Ross Toole. He was followed from 1958 to 1966 by Michael Kennedy. In 1966 Vivian A. Paladin succeeded to the editorship. Under her tutelage the magazine has grown to become one of the most widely read and highly regarded publications in the field.

HISTORY STAYS!

At a meeting on March 9, 1976, the State Board of Public Education voted to retain American history as a required course for graduation from Montana high schools.

The proposal to make American history an elective rather than a required course was offered by Jim Burk, Supervisor of Secondary Education. Burk proposed to drop one course each now required in American history, language arts and mathematics and to replace them with electives. He stated this would allow students and guidance counselors more flexibility to select courses suited to student abilities, interests, and goals without reducing the number of credits for graduation.

The proposal regarding American history attracted the most attention of any proposed standards revision in recent years. A citizens' committee headed by K. Ross Toole, professor of history at the University of Montana, was organized to vocally defend maintenance of the requirement in the state's press. A letter from Toole printed on the pages of this publication in December prompted an unusually strong response from the membership of the Society.

In its decision the board went along with a recommendation from Dolores Colburg, Superintendent of Public Instruction, to leave the existing graduation requirements unchanged except for special circumstances. In recommending a compromise that kept present requirements but recognized the need for more flexibility in courses of study for individual students, Colburg said her proposal followed directives of the state's 1972 constitution.

Daily, it seems, the newspapers headline the destruction of physical reminders of our past. In recent years, however, citizens have become aware of the value of maintaining and preserving these reminders, be they architectural masterpieces or rude cave dwellings. In response to the upsurge of interest in historic preservation, the Recreation and Parks Division of the Montana Department of Fish and Game has developed a plan to guide state efforts.

A three-part 1975 edition of the plan has been recently printed. Volume I is a summary of Montana history and a background of the preservation effort. This volume also contains lists of legislation affecting historic preservation in Montana, museum and historical organizations across the state, and a glossary of terms. Volume II is a statewide inventory of cultural resources consisting of nearly 3,000 sites listed by county for easy reference. Volume III is the current fiscal year preservation program, containing a detailed accounting of historic preservation projects scheduled for the current year, as well as the cost of each. Some projects, such as the restoration of historic buildings at Bannack State Monument, are carried out directly by the division. Others, such as the restoration of buildings in historic districts in Helena and Fort Benton, will be done by private organizations.

Copies of the Montana Historic Preservation Plan have been sent at no cost to all major public schools, libraries, planning departments, museums, and historical organizations throughout the state, as well as to state and federal agencies and representatives to insure that anyone who so desires might know the state's role in preservation. If the demand exists, the plan will also be reprinted and made available to individuals at a cost of $6.00 per copy.

Much of the department's responsibility in the field of historic preservation is described in the plan. For example, the department administers both the national and state programs for registration and protection of historic properties, including co-ordination of federal financial assistance on a dollar for dollar matching basis.

Much research and documentation is required for a property to be recognized, accepted into the statewide inventory, afforded protection, and become eligible for financial assistance. At this point the Montana Historical Society and local historical groups are important sources of documentation.

In future issues of the Montana Post, some of these historic sites will be featured in hopes that the Society membership will supplement the department's research with vital first-hand information.

Recently the Society has received appeals from two different sources concerning pending legislation in Washington, D.C., that is of great concern to historians. Our correspondents ask that we bring the matters to the attention of our membership so that they might participate in a letter writing campaign.

First came a letter from Speaker of the House Carl Albert concerning HR2556, which if passed would effectively close all manuscript United States census records to search by historians and genealogists. Albert noted that last year a similar effort was made to withhold the 1900 census from all researchers including geneaologists, historians, and physicians. The bill which was sponsored by Congressman Richard White of Texas, received endorsement from the Bureau of the Census and the Office of Management and Budget.

Albert also stated that there was pending before Congress HR10686 introduced by Paul Simon of Illinois which would make each successive census available to researchers after 75 years. The Speaker added that he supported this piece of legislation and urged all interested citizens to write their Senators and Representatives.

The second letter comes from the National Trust for Historic Preservation. Their letter notes that the administration's proposed budget for the fiscal year 1977 would reduce the federal matching funds available for preservation under the National Historic Preservation Act of 1966 by fifty percent.

The current spending in behalf of preservation of our historic and cultural heritage is $20 million. James Biddle, president of the National Trust, suggests there is today a backlog of preservation projects equal to $4 billion over the next ten years. A budget proposal for only $10 million in federal grants in 1977 for such projects fails to reflect the great popular interest in historic preservation throughout the nation. Biddle said that the proposed cut is only a minute fraction of the overall federal budget and he joined with many preservationists and historians around the country who noted that the proposed restrictions on funding make a mockery of the nation's Bicentennial celebration.

Representatives for the National Trust further stated that even at current levels, the United States lags behind almost every nation in terms of expenditures for preservation of its heritage, and added that historic preservation is no mere antiquarian activity, but part of an integrated outlook on the part of today's society which also includes environmental protection and energy conservation.

The National Trust noted that at the same time legislation has been introduced in both the House and the Senate which would authorize federal matching funds for preservation at considerably high levels. Again, the National Trust urges all concerned citizens to write their legislators.

DeCAMP PAINTINGS, PHOTOGRAPHS FEATURED IN POINDEXTER GALLERY THROUGHOUT FEBRUARY

During the month of February the Society's Poindexter Gallery will feature an exhibition of the work of one of Montana's triumvirate of outstanding artists—Ralph Earll DeCamp. (If you need ask, the other two are Charles Russell and Edgar Paxson.) DeCamp, who expressed himself equally well by means of both the paintbrush and the camera, is primarily noted for his depictions of the scenic beauties of the Northwest, but this exhibition also features his work in portraiture and photography. This display is comprised of work selected from the Society's own collection as well as subjects from private collections loaned especially for the show.

Ralph E. DeCamp was born in Attica, New York, in 1858. Shortly after the end of the Civil War his family emigrated westward to a suburb of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, where the young man received instruction from a noted local artist. In 1871, the DeCamp family moved again, this time to Moorhead, Minnesota. Although he was a teenager, DeCamp's talents were recognized by the residents of the Red River Valley, and he developed a considerable local reputation and even offered lessons.

In 1878 DeCamp married Edna Blanchard, supporting his family (which soon included a son Edward) by means of a threshing business. Within two years, however, DeCamp was a widower and perhaps as a result of his loss he spent the year 1881-1882 studying at the Pennsylvania School of Art.

After his year of training DeCamp returned to Minnesota to resume his career as an artist. His work soon attracted the attention of Charles Fee, the passenger agent for the Northern Pacific Railroad. Fee engaged DeCamp and O. E. Flaten, a photographer, to spend the summer of 1885 in Yellowstone Park doing paintings for the railroad's home office in St. Paul.

Enroute home from this trip DeCamp made a stopover in Helena. Apparently he was impressed by the town because after finishing his paintings for the N.P., DeCamp returned to Helena and resided there for 50 years.

In Helena DeCamp supported himself by working as a draftsman for the U.S. Interior Department and for the Helena Title and Abstract Company and continued to paint on the side. About 1890 DeCamp and Charles Russell cooperated in the formation of the Helena Sketch Club. As a result of this early association the two became lifelong friends, and at one time they even contemplated collaborating on a painting. After Russell's death DeCamp did the restoration on the fire-damaged "Finding the Trail."

During the early 1890's one of DeCamp's many excursions into the field to paint took him to the Hilger Ranch north of Helena. There the artist met Margaret Hilger and in 1892 the couple was married. They had one son, Renan.

Gradually De Camp's highly individualistic technique and use of color began to win attention both locally and nationally. The artist later stated that he never had to seek a purchaser for his oils and that he always had more orders than he could handle.

In 1902 DeCamp accompanied O. D. Wheeler, author of the Trail of Lewis and Clark, in the capacity of illustrator as Wheeler retraced a portion of the explorers' trail, and a number of DeCamp's sketches from this trip were used in Wheeler's book.

In 1912 the State of Montana commissioned DeCamp to paint six panels depicting the scenic beauty of Montana to be used as decoration for the state's law library in the Capitol. Each panel was four feet by eight and it took DeCamp over a year devoted solely to travel and painting to complete the series. In 1927 the legislature commissioned four more panels by DeCamp to complete the decoration of the room. This series includes "The Gate of the Mountains," perhaps his best known subject, and a more unusual subject, "Montana Power Plant at Holter."

Following his wife's death, DeCamp moved to Chicago to live with his son and died there in 1936 at the age of 78.

HELENA'S OLD HIGH SCHOOL DEMOLISHED FOR NEW

In Montana no urban community as self-consciously mirrored the ideals and attitudes of the Gilded Age as did Helena, and few buildings in Helena as clearly represented the Victorian ethos as did the old high school. For Helena, the years from 1885 to 1893 were, much like the nation as a whole, a blatantly prideful and optimistic period. Measuring herself by the rampant materialism of the period, Helena felt she had just reason to be proud. Beginning as a rough mining camp, in thirty years she had become a wealthy and sophisticated community whose civic institutions equalled those of the larger, more established communities. The construction of a structure such as the high school, which was at the same time pretentious and essentially conservative, precisely reflected Helena's reverence of material respectability.

The movement for the construction of the school began in 1889, the year in which Montana became a state. Helena very much wanted to become the permanent state capital, and looking ahead to the 1892 election, the city fathers perceived that flourishing civic institutions would improve their chances for winning the coveted honor. Equally as important to them was the fact that a stable community life, typified by vigorous schools, churches, and civic organizations, would promote the economic investment and immigration necessary for the city's continued development. Of even more pressing concern was the fact that in 1889 Helena's primary schools were severely crowded. Although there were only two graduates from the high school in that year, the inceasing enrollment at the lower levels and the trend toward the establishment of high schools in the East suggested a future need. As a result, the school board proposed a bond issue for $100,000.00 for school construction and a separate high school building. Despite the large sum of money involved, Helena voters exhibited a great commitment to educational concerns and overwhelmingly approved the bond issue in a special election on April 5, 1890.

All of the foregoing considerations dictated that the school should be a lasting benefit to the city and Helenans were willing to spend money lavishly to gain their desire. The school board hired John C. Paulsen, one of Montana's pre-eminent architects, to design the new building. As a partner of the firm of McConnell and Paulsen, this architect was partially responsible for a list of public and residential structures that is both staggering for its length and indicative of great versatility. The list included the Jefferson County Courthouse in Boulder; the Higgins Western Bank and the Hammond Block in Missoula; the Penn Block, the Pittsburg Block, the Novelty Block, the Montana National Bank, the Granite Block, the first Montana Club, and the Broadwater Natatorium, all in Helena, and over 150 private homes in Lewis and Clark County. Following the dissolution of the partnership in 1891, Paulsen was solely responsible for designing four buildings on the campus at Bozeman, one on the campus at Dillon, and one at the School of Mines in Butte.

After Paulsen presented his design, construction began almost immediately, and in an elaborate ceremony on October 25, 1890, the town fathers laid the cornerstone. Paulsen's original design for the structure is not known, but it is known that the finished structure differed considerably from his original conception. Nevertheless, the old high school emerged as an imposing example of the Romanesque style, which was then so popular for public buildings. Constructed of roughly hewn stones, the four-story building featured the customary round towers and Romanesque arches reminiscent of medieval periods. The general solemnity and restraint of the design was offset, however, by two soaring chateau-like towers. Although the design did not hold faithfully to the medieval model in this respect, the towers reflect Paulsen's individuality and creativity. The interior of the structure, which was equally as imposing, featured eighteen classrooms, four massive pillars supporting a double stairway, brass hardware, elaborate brick and tile decorations, and golden oak woodwork.

O "PROGRESS": RKING LOT

If the original appearance of the building was drastically altered during the course of construction, so was the cost. The board had originally budgeted $60,000.00 for the high school, but construction was not far advanced before maddening delays, controversy with the contracting firm of Whalen and Grant, and Paulsen's altered design began to raise the price. When it appeared that the finished building was going to cost over twice the original estimate, the school board lost patience, broke the contract, and took over supervision of the project. Under this system the building was completed by January, 1892, and several classes were immediately moved in.

Helena was pleased with the high school, which was generally considered to be one of the most attractive in the Northwest. Nor did the outward appearance give a deceptive impression of the quality of education offered inside. During a period when teachers were frequently little better educated than their students, the Helena high school faculty was exceptionally well prepared and committed to its task, and their students went on to outstanding achievements.

For the next forty years, the old building provided the setting for quality education for a generation of Helena teenagers. By the early 1930's, however, it became apparent that although the city fathers had "thought big" in 1889 when they planned the school, they had not thought big enough. Finally, overcrowding was such a problem, that in 1935 the city built a new, larger high school. Because the old building no longer reflected the thoughts and aspirations of the city's residents the old high school stood as a silent memorial to Helena's past until its recent demolition.

John Ruskin, the noted English critic, wrote that architecture expresses the character of a people; if that be so, then the recent demolition of Helena's old high school and its replacement by a parking lot is as much a commentary on today's generation as it is on the Victorians who conceived and built the structure.

ERNEST OSGOOD RECAL

When destruction of the old stone high school building was almost complete and we decided to feature it in these columns, we remembered that Dr. Ernest S. Osgood, one of this country's most widely respected historians and teachers, had begun his long teaching career within its walls. We wrote him the news, and asked if he would share some memories with us and our readers. Recovering from his initial reaction—("If you had written that they were going to level Mt. Helena, I would not be more incredulous")—Dr. Osgood sat down and wrote, not indignant rhetoric, but excitement—excitement that comes to all who succeed in bringing knowledge to others. His memories reach back more than six decades when, fresh from Dartmouth College, he accepted a teaching post at Helena High. He spent ten years here, during which he made a strong impression on his students, imparting to them both his reverence and his enthusiasm for learning. In later years, Dr. Osgood received his Ph.D. from the University of Wisconsin, and for many years brought excitement for learning to students at the college level, at the University of Minnesota, Mills College in California, and, finally at Wooster College in Ohio. Although widely known for books such as "The Day of the Cattleman" and "The Field Notes of William Clark," Dr. Osgood remains primarily a teacher. Not only did his experience in Helena begin his career, but, happily for us, his love affair with Montana as well.

The news has just come to me that the old Helena High School has been demolished. I find it hard to believe that it is now only a pile of rubble. When I saw that citadel of learning for the first time, its forbidding walls of granite seemed stout enough to withstand, for centuries, the assaults of man or time. Of course no forty centuries were looking down on me as the pyramids looked down on Napoleon, but I did feel the High School must be close to a century old and should last for a couple centuries more.

The day after my arrival in Helena in November, 1914, I walked up the hill to take a look at the High School and its curious but interesting architecture. It was not difficult to imagine that it could have been a medieval castle. Of course changes had been made. The narrow slits through which the bowmen shot their arrows were gone and in their places were wide glass windows reflecting the sun and dispelling some of the granite harshness. Instead of the heavy metal portcullis at the gate, barring all entrance, the doors were wide open. Apparently the garrison within was not defending itself against a host of barbarians (or were they?) but providing a sanctuary for the young against the assaults of ignorance.

I turned to survey the town, and in the distance the splendor of the mountains. All this was new and exciting to me, for I knew little or nothing about the West, and for most of us in New England, it was the Wild West. As a youngster I had seen Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show as had most of my pals. We knew that somewhere "out there" was a region of indefinite boundaries where the trappers trapped beaver, the army chased Indians, the Indians chased buffalo, the miners dug gold and chased road agents, the missionaries chased sin, and the cowboys chased cows. Most of us felt that it would be wise to wait around for a while until things "out there" sort of quieted down. New Englanders are a cautious lot.

It was not until I graduated from Dartmouth College and was without a job that I ventured west. I was notified by a teacher's agency that the High School in Helena, Montana, needed an English teacher. I applied immediately and was accepted. Then I had to consult a map to find out where such a town "out there" was located before I set out. I left my wife behind, not because she might be in danger if she came with me to Helena, but because I simply did not have money enough to pay for two tickets.

After I had spent a day or two getting settled and had looked at the exterior of the citadel on the hill, I decided it was about time I reported to my new employer, Albert J. Roberts. He greeted me with a smile of welcome and invited me to come into his office. He then told me that I would be expected to teach two courses in English. I cannot for the life of me remember one of those courses, but the other class I shall never forget. I asked him if he knew what the class had been reading when the previous teacher left. He said that he believed they were working on Palmer's translation of the Odyssey.

The Odyssey! Here I was with three years of Greek behind me! In those years I had come to love ancient Greece and the whole reach of the civilization it had given to the world. Thanks to all the gods on Mt. Olympus, I had the chance to discover if I could give to a class some of my excitement and love for that past. Mr. Roberts told me that the class would meet at ten the next morning and would be waiting for me in a classroom on the third floor.

At the appointed time I climbed the two flights of stairs and opened the door. It was then that I began those ten wonderful years of teaching in Montana. There waiting for me were twenty or thirty boys and girls. They were very quiet, and as I walked over to the desk I felt that I was under inspection. In their minds at that moment was the question, "What kind of a bird are we going to get this time?"

I introduced myself and said I was glad to be in Heleener, Montanerr and hoped we would be able to work together. They appeared unmoved by that suggestion. As I burbled on I noticed that they were looking more and more puzzled. Most of them were hearing the New England patois for the first time. Years later some of them told me that at first they didn't understand half of what I was saying.

On the desk in front of me was a pile of loose-leaf notebooks. I picked up one, opened it and there was page after page of mimeographed questions with brief answers scribbled in with a pencil. Such questions as "Why did Telemachus visit Nestor? How many years was Odysseus away from home? How many at the siege of Troy? What does 'rosey fingered' mean?" I was shocked. To set these young people to such a task was like bidding them tear to pieces a painting by Rembrandt or Titian to find out what kind of materials, paint and canvass the artist used. How could this be? Before these boys and girls was this epic, this testament of the human spirit, a living thing emerging out of an ancient culture, a tale of high adventure and its magnificent words and phrases spoken long before they were written down in metric form. Did these students, as they labored over such questions as "Why was Poseidon angry?" or "What is meant by 'rosey fingered'?" hear the roar of the sea as it beat against the unyielding shore or see the sunrise over the "wine dark sea" as "Aurora, the rosey fingered, oped the gates of day"?

I suggested that before the next meeting each one would turn over the pages of the Odyssey, some of which they had all read, and choose some passage that they liked. Then each one would have a chance to say why he or she selected that particular passage and all the class would talk about it. It seemed the best way to turn things around. I told them that before they left, they could pick up their notebooks and that we would try to get along without them. So the days passed, and the class hour seemed to get shorter and shorter. The students became less self-conscious, and there was an emerging spontaneity as everyone seemed determined to have his or her say.

In one of our early meetings I told them I was going to read to them a half-dozen lines of the epic in the original Greek. I prepared them for its metrical form by reading a line from Longfellow's Evangeline: "This is the forest primeval / the murmering pines and hemlocks." I told them that this was the same meter that they would hear in the Greek and that the pause was called the cesura, for here the bard struck a note on his lyre. So I began, and as I looked at them they were intent as they heard the beautiful Greek words and followed the metrical beat. When I had finished, a fairhaired, blue-eyed girl looked up at me and in awed tones asked, "Do you understand every word of that?" I confessed that I did.

It finally occurred to me that, good heavens, I had used up nearly three weeks on this performance. I went to Mr. Roberts and confessed to such a miscalculation. His reply revealed the quality of his mind and his understanding. "Take all the time you want on Homer, a month or more if you want to." Here was a man who understood that if education was merely the measuring out of a daily dosage per pupil, the teacher would soon end up talking to himself.

I do not remember whether we ever "finished" the epic. I do know that some of the members of that class told me, years later, that they were still "finishing" the adventures of "the long tried hardy Odysseus."

I thank those young people in that first class, for unwittingly they gave me confidence that I could pass on to others my excitement and love for the past. From then on I wanted to go on doing what I began with them. I have done so for sixty years.

Somehow that citadel of learning on the hill will always be a place of remembrance for all that Montana has given me: the love of teaching, all the precious friendships I have made and the chance to share with them the blessing of forest and stream and the timeless splendor of the mountains.

I often stood at my class room window and looked across the valley to the Big Belt Mountains just to remind me of how lucky I was to be there, happy and content with what I was doing. On a clear winter day I could pick out in those mountains the ridges and gulches and the hunting trails I had followed. Even now as soon as I arrive in Helena I look for them. I am fond of imagining that an ancestor of mine who once taught history centuries ago in an ancient seat of learning is still moving along those trails. I shall continue to look for him. "For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace; the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing and all the trees of the fields shall clap their hands."

PHYLLIS FALLON JOINS SOCIETY'S LIBRARY STAFF

Phyllis Fallon, who joined the staff of the Historical Society in October, brings both efficiency and a generous sense of humor to her new position as cataloguer for the Library. A native of Detroit, Michigan, Ms. Fallon doubts that she is a relative of the famed Indian agent after whom Fallon County was named.

She attended Western Michigan University in Kalamazoo where she received an undergraduate degree in History and a M.A. in Librarianship.

PHYLLIS FALLON

After graduation, a friend invited her to Montana for a vacation, and having secured employment as a cataloguer at the Great Falls Public Library, she stayed. Immediately prior to moving to Helena, she was employed by an insurance firm in Olympia, Washington.

Ms. Fallon replaces John Mason who resigned to accept a position with the University of Melbourne in Australia.

NOT IN PRECIOUS METALS ALONE TO BE ISSUED IN SCHOOL EDITION

Response to the special pre-publication sale of the Society's manuscript history of Montana, NOT IN PRECIOUS METALS ALONE, has been so overwhelming that the Historical Society has decided to publish a special paperback educational edition of the volume. Although the contents and size of the paperback version will be identical to the hard-cover edition, it is hoped that the reduced price of the paperback version will make the book an attractive instructional tool for teachers of Montana history on the high school and college levels.

NOT IN PRECIOUS METALS ALONE is a special collection of published material derived from the Society's archival collections. The volume will present Montana's total experience from the onset of written documentation with the white man's first arrival down to the very recent past. But rather than developing the state's history by means of a chronological narrative, this volume will allow the ordinary Montanan—the miner, the cowboy, the ranch wife, the storekeeper—to tell Montana's story in their own words. In addition each segment will be introduced by a brief commentary prepared by members of the Society's staff which will place the item in historical perspective. It is felt that the publication of primary materials dealing with Montana's past will be of inestimable value to teachers who are searching for stimulating instructional materials.

The text is divided into three segments or books: the first, titled "First Arrivals: A Land to Subdue," will include records of Lewis and Clark and the traders and missionaries who followed them and will carry Montana's story up to the arrival of the first gold seekers in the 1860's. The second, "A Society Evolves: Securing the Land," will chronicle the years of Indian-white confrontations, the origins of the cattle and mining industries, and the emergence of a new society. The third, "New Perspectives: The Land Mastered," will deal with the attempts to master the land by the homesteaders of the Twentieth Century, as well as the political, social, and economic happenings of the 1920's and 1930's, and will close with a selection of materials reflecting the differing attitudes and emphases of the recent past.

The special paperback edition is being offered at $7.50 per copy, and teachers are encouraged to write to the Society at 225 North Roberts, Helena 59601 for further details. Of course, the hard-cover version is still available at the regular price of $18.50. The delivery date for both versions is September 15, 1976.

You may not be interested in a reader's view [but] here are those of this reader. The character portrayed at the head of the column [of the "Public Forum" column of the Nov.-Dec., 1975 issue of the Montana Post] is certainly appropriate as applying to the Superintendent for Secondary Education. Heaven help the students who have to be guided by such an individual. These students most certainly will need Heaven's help, for they cannot expect to receive much help from [him] .... What subjects does Mr. Burk propose to be emphasized, if he recommends downgrading of History, English and Mathematics?

Your reader is well aware that he is exposing himself to adverse criticism after such a diatribe, but after living 75 years [with] 17 years in educational institutions . . . he can take it . . . .This reader as an individual wishes to congratulate K. Lest the membership of the Montana Historical Society feel that all Helenans are unfeeling about their heritage, I should like to explain that for many months the Committee for the Preservation of the Old High School worked to demonstrate that alternatives other than the demolition of yet another historic landmark existed. Although in the end some Helenans were forced to resort to legal action, the issue involved much more than just legal technicalities.

Helena's charm and grace are the result of the interplay between our physical setting and objects like the old High School. The most enjoyable cities in the world are those that have taken the time to understand and maintain the things which make their cities unique. There is a human need here which cannot be dismissed as "mere sentimentality or nostalgia." It is the need to feel that we are really at home in the landscape, that this is indeed our hometown.

In this light it is hard to imagine any city destroying an object as important in the home landscape as the old High School. Especially with so little justification and with such a dismal replacement as another parking lot. Why, then, did Helena destroy the building?

First the school district wanted a new administration building. Unfortunately for them the voters did not. The remedy? To sell the old High School site to obtain the money to begin construction.

Second, the city wanted to bow out of its promised multilevel parking structure. Although multilevel parking is preferable to paved lot parking due to more efficient land use, it is also more costly. Thus, to city and Urban Renewal officials, the demolition and acquisition of the old High School site was only natural. It allowed them to back out of their Jackson Street commitment, save money, and still meet their parking quota.

In this Bicentennial year, Helena stands head and shoulders above all other cities in the Northwest in its capacity to destroy the very history that we are supposed to celebrate. At one time Helena had many unique and beautiful structures, but no more.

PLANS FIRMED FOR SECOND HISTORY MEET

The Montana Historical Society and the Council to Preserve Montana History recently announced the speakers for their second annual joint history conference, MONTANA AND THE WEST: NEW DIRECTIONS, to be held at the Colonial Hilton in Helena, October 23- 25. Since all sessions will center around the current theme of the Montana Committee for the Humanities, PRIVATE RIGHTS AND PUBLIC CHOICES, the three speakers will address themselves to the manner in which public policy has been reconciled with individual rights in Montana during the Twentieth Century as well as touching on prospects for future developments.

An unusual amount of interest was generated at the first conference held last fall.

RICHARD RUETTEN

At the noon luncheon on Friday, October 24, Richard T. Ruetten of San Diego State University will speak on the life and times of Montana's late senator, Burton K. Wheeler. Ruetten, who is a native of Havre and who received his advanced degrees from the University of Oregon, is widely known as an authority on Senator Wheeler. In addition, he has authored several publications dealing with the Truman era including QUEST AND RESPONSE: MINORITY RIGHTS AND THE TRUMAN ADMINISTRATION.

Following the banquest that evening, Montana's Pulitzer Prize winning novelist, A. B. Guthrie, Jr., will present a talk entitled "Montana Then and Now." Although Guthrie is best known for his fiction, including such novels as THE BIG SKY and THE WAY WEST, it is from his position of leadership in the environmental movement in Montana that he will speak to the conference.

RICHARD ETULAIN

The third speaker will be Richard Etulain who is a member of the history faculty at Idaho State University, Pocatello. Since receiving his Ph.D. in history and literature from the University of Oregon, among the many publications to his credit are WESTERN AMERICAN LITERATURE, A. BIBLIOGRAPHY OF INTERPRETIVE BOOKS AND ARTICLES, OWEN WISTER, INTERPRETIVE APPROACHES TO WESTERN AMERICAN LITERATURE, and THE POPULAR WESTERN, ESSAYS TOWARD A DEFINITION.

In addition, a series of five panel discussions will provide an opportunity for a dialogue between those attending the conference and the academic historians and resource people present. Topics will include Agrarian Radicalism (panel members: Harry Billings, Gorden Twedt, Michael Malone, Harry McDean and Ruetten); The role of Women in Montana Politics (Doris Ward, Carolyn Mattern, Dorothy Eck, Gretchen Billings and Belle Winestine); Indian Rights and White History (Herbert Hoover, Thomas Wessell, Edward Barry, Robert Carricker, Harold Gray, and Joe Little Coyote); Post World War II Politics (Richard Roeder, William McKay, Thomas Payne, Ted Schwinden, and Francis Bardanouve), and Montana's Heritage in Western Liturature (Leslie Drew, Guthrie, and Etulain).

The Society will sponsor a workshop on Saturday, October 25 that will be of special interest to people working on local histories for the Bicentennial. In addition to Society staff members, Brian Cockhill, Rex Meyers, Vivian Paladin, and Lori Morrow, Jeff Safford of Montana State University and Claire Rhein, who has considerable experience with writing local history, will be available.

The registration fee (not including meals) for the conference is $6.00 and people who plan to attend the confernece are reminded to make their own room arrangements. Further information and other details may be obtained by writing the Historical Society. Inquiries should be directed to Librarian Harriett Meloy.

RENDEZVOUS '75 SET FOR OCTOBER

Art for the 4th Rendezvous of Western Art being received at the Historical Society as we go to press confirms what has been thought since the planning for the event began several months ago—that this year's Rendezvous will be the biggest and best show in the four year series. The month-long exhibition which is scheduled to open Saturday, October 4, 1975, with a full day's program of special events will bring together twenty-four of the best artists and sculptors now working in the field of western art.

Excitement surrounding the show also stems from the fact that Dr. Harold McCracken, Director Emeritus of the Whitney Gallery of Western Art and the Buffalo Bill Historical Center in Cody, Wyoming, and the author of many books and articles on western art, has accepted the honorary chairmanship.

In addition, the honored artist will be J. K. "Ken" Ralston of Billings, Montana, one of the few living artists who can call upon his own experiences and recollections to paint the open range. A special display of his widely acclaimed historical paintings will be gathered from several important private and public collections for display throughout the Rendezvous.

The artists and sculptors in addition to the honored artist who will be participating in the Rendezvous are, in alphabetical order: Richard Baker, Helena; Joseph Bohler, Monument, Colo.; Jodie Boren, Abilene, Texas; Harley Brown, Calgary, Alberta; Ronald Crooks, French Gulch, Calif.; Lincoln Fox, Alto, N.M.; Grant Hagen, Jackson Hole, Wyo.; Bill Hampton, Apple Valley, Calif.; Marge Hart, Great Falls; James M. Haughey, Billings; Jack Hines, Big Timber, Mont.; George Kosanovich, Fullerton, Calif.; Ted Long, North Platte, Neb.; Robert Morgan, Helena; Don Polland, Prescott, Ariz.; Don Prechtel, Creswell, Ore.; Don Putman, Redondo Beach, Calif.; Mondel Rogers, Sweetwater, Texas; Tom Sander, Creston, Mont.; W. Steve Seltzer, Hermosa Beach, Calif.; Tucker Smith, Clancy, Mont.; Betty Reynolds Thomas, Wilson, Wyo.; Robert Wagoner, Bishop, Calif., and Bob Wolf, Fort Collins, Colo.

In announcing the list of artists who accepted invitations, Director Ken Korte noted that this was the first appearance at the Rendezvous for many. "We feel," Korte added, "that one goal of the series should be the exposure of good, upcoming artists whose work is valid and yet is priced within the reach of collectors with modest means. At the same time, although they won't be with us this year, many of the better known artists will be invited again in succeeding years."

In addition to the formal opening of the exhibition and sale at 8:00 P.M. on October 4, a popular feature of last year's show, the "quick draw" at which the exhibiting artists do sketeches to be auctioned on the spot, will be held at 11:45 A.M. in the Colonial Hilton. Preceding the "quick draw" an artists' brunch will be held at 10:00 A.M. which will provide guests with an opportunity to meet and talk informally with the artists and sculptors present.

At 2:00 P.M. Honorary Chairman McCracken will discuss the contemporary revival of interest in western art and speculate on future trends based upon his long experience with the subject. Then Harold G. "Hal" Stearns, director of the Montana American Revolution Bicentennial Administration, will present a humorous and nostalgic talk on Kan Ralston whom he has known for many years both as friend and collector. Both Ralston, a superb story-teller who speaks with as much life and color as he paints, and McCracken will be available afterward for questions from the audience.

Because of the large crowds which have been attracted to the Rendezvous in earlier years, this year the Poindexter Gallery will be open for a preview showing during the evening on Friday, October 3. In addition, a 56-page, illustrated catalogue prepared by Vivian Paladin and featuring all of the art on display, much of it in full color along with biographical information on all of the participating artists, will be available several weeks prior to the exhibition. As in past years, however, the art will be for sale only after the formal opening and then at a stated price on a first-come, first-serve basis with Merchandise Manager Dorothea Neath in charge of details.

WORKERS AT HELENA INDUSTRIES HELP SPEED MONTANA MAGAZINES ON THE WAY TO YOU

When we began our 25th year of publishing with the Winter issue, 1975, we also began an association with a whole new "crew" of workers at Helena Industries, a local sheltered workshop, and it is a happy association indeed. These handicapped but enthusiastic and capable people insert MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY in plastic bags, heat-seal them, attach labels, and arrange the magazines according to zip codes.

Reader response so far has been favorable—the magazine apparently comes through the mails unscathed, and perhaps the display of our full color covers has gained us some new friends along the way (as of yet, no returns are in on the increase in circulation among postal employees). Our new colleagues at Helena Industries have taken a heavy load from the Society staff, and all of us appreciate their enthusiasm, their good will, and their efficiency.

THE MORE THINGS CHANGE THE MORE THINGS REMAIN (SOB) MUCH THE SAME

CHARLES KESSLER

The Kessler name is one associated with Montana from its earliest days. Nickolas Kessler, founder of the line, was a German immigrant who migrated to Montana via Pike's Peak in 1863. Settling in Helena, he managed Charles Beehrer's brewery and in 1865 purchased the plant. In 1866 he expanded into the manufacture of pipes and bricks and before his death in 1901 his operation had grown into one of the largest and best equipped manufacturing plants of its kind in the Northwest. Kessler's sons, Charles and Frederick, succeeded to management of the business, Charles serving as president and Frederick as secretary-treasurer. Both matched their father in prominence in the business, financial, and social life of Helena.

Thus it was only natural, in 1922, that Gov. Joseph M. Dixon turned to a member of such an eminent family in making an appointment to the Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society. In his official response to the governor, Charles Kessler said that business commitments prevented his acceptance. But, in a personal letter to Dixon, dated January 13, 1922, and reprinted below, he indicated that his real reasons arose from the state's lack of financial commitment to preserving the priceless record of its past. Although written over a half century ago, Kessler's comments are unhappily of continuing relevance:

. . . It is painfully true that the appropriations for the purchase of much needed material have been so very limited that much good material on the West which the Historical Library should have, has not been secured. This is particularly to be regretted because of the fact that everywhere . . . in the East as well as farther West, the larger libraries are awake to the value of Western books and manuscripts, etc. and are buying these things at unheard of prices, and it is well known that once an item is added to the catalogue of any of the larger libraries, it is a permanent addition to their shelves. Were the editions all modern, or available in large quantity, perhaps this would not be so serious, but many of these items are becoming so rare that in a year or so, it will be impossible to secure the same for the Historical Library at any price. Of course this can only be remedied by a more generous attitude on the part of the Legislative Assemblies, and it is to be hoped that they will make such appropriations as will allow of at least the necessary purchases to be made.

This situation is well known to yourself, as well as the management of the Library itself, and is not offered as anything new. Montana's History is well worth preserving; material should be gathered before it is too late because of its having been secured by other states, and not available to the future generations to come. . . .

Not only that, but the great majority of the participants in our early history have already passed away, but much remains which should be collected and filed for safe keeping, such as letters, manuscripts, books, maps and numerous other items of similar character. I personally know of instances in which valuable material is suffering from utter lack of care, and which some day will be most urgently sought by those who come after us. Needless to say they will have just cause for reproach, for no real history of Montana has yet made its appearance, and when it does, all available good material should be at hand to assist those who may have the honor to write it.

EXCELLENT NEW BOOK OF MONTANA MAPS NOW AVAILABLE

A new tool for digging up a variety of information about Montana is found in MONTANA IN MAPS, prepared by geographers and cartographers from the state's two universities. Carefully drawn and researched maps, many in color, give visual impact to data about such subjects as geology, climate, soils, vegetation, water resources, population, employment, agriculture, lumbering, mineral resources, transportation and land administration. Funded by the Endowment and Research Foundation at Montana State in Bozeman, the attractive large format book is the work of Robert L. Taylor and Milton J. Edie, professors of geography at Montana State, Bozeman, and Charles F. Gritzner, visiting professor of geography at the University of Montana, Missoula. Cartographic assistance was given by Robert Bellandi, Mark Leighton, and Mark McElwain. Copies are available at $7.50 by writing Big Sky Books, Montana State University, Bozeman, Montana 59715.

ONCE-BOOMING GAL

by JOHN N. DeHAAS, JR.

Only a few stone foundations and an often-remodelled two-story log building remain to mark the site of a once-prosperous town located beside the headwaters of the Missouri River in southwestern Montana. The area, a favorite summer hunting ground for numerous Indian tribes, is steeped in the history of the settling of the west.

On July 27, 1805, Lewis and Clark arrived here and discovered and named the three rivers which come together to form the mighty Missouri. The next day, Meriwether Lewis recorded in his journal that ". . . we called the S.W. fork, that which we meant to ascend, Jefferson's River in honor of this illustrious personage Thomas Jefferson. The Middle fork we called Madison's River in honor of James Madison, and the S.E. Fork we called Gallitin's River in honor of Albert Gallitin [Gallatin]."

Only four years later, in 1809, Fort Henry, a fur trading post, was established at this point, but it was short-lived because of harassment by Indians. Today the precise location of Fort Henry's stockade in still debated. It was near here that the loquacious John Colter, who had been with Lewis and Clark but left to try his hand at fur trading, made his famous nude run to elude Indian captors. Tradition also holds that Kit Carson, scout and trapper, camped in the area.

But it was gold, not furs, that gave birth to Gallatin City, for the gold fields of California required a link to the East. One such route, explored by the Reynolds-Maynadier expedition of 1859, passed through the headwaters area known as Three Forks, named for the rivers that meet here.

The first building of Gallatin City is reported to have been erected on the west bank of the Missouri by Frank J. Dunbar in 1862. Frank and his brother, Tom, arrived in the area in November, 1862, from Bannack, the site of the first major gold strike in Montana Territory. The next year they built a ferry to handle the growing traffic caused by the gold rush. The site of the ferry, still visible today, is located less than a mile south of the junction of the Jefferson and Madison rivers. Shortly thereafter the settlement was moved to the east bank of the river and was easily reached by the land route from the east.

Gallatin City grew because of the discovery of new gold fields, such as Alder Gulch and Last Chance Gulch (Helena), as well as growth of the mining district around Radersburg. It served as a way station between the mining camps and Fort Benton, not only for miners, but for teamsters and settlers who were attracted to the region by dreams of instant riches and/or a new way of life. It was also a stage stop and freight station on the road from Utah to Helena and other mining areas.

LATIN CITY AWAITS RESTORATION

TARGET FOR RESTORATION—GALLATIN CITY HOTEL-TURNED-BARN

The fast-growing community proudly boasted a hotel (the remains of which are pictured here), a blacksmith shop, saloon, store and numerous permanent residences. It was the dream of its citizens that Gallatin City would become the hub of transportation for the rapidly developing territory. Freight traffic grew and so did the city, to the point where she boasted sixty-eight buildings.

The first fair was held in Gallatin City in 1866 on Major Campbell's property. Campbell had a race track erected as well as buildings for exhibits. The fair was an annual event for many years. The first district court met in Gallatin City in July, 1867, and it was the site of the first county seat of Gallatin County. As the agricultural importance of the valley grew, so did businesses associated with this new industry. The first grist mill in the valley was built at Gallatin City and others in the vicinity followed shortly.

While Gallatin City prospered, a new town, Bozeman, about thirty miles to the east, was also growing rapidly. Bozeman's proximity to Fort Ellis gave it an advantage and within a short time became the real hub of the Gallatin valley. As the population dwindled in such mining camps as Bannack and Virginia City, the usefulness of Gallatin City as a ferry site and way station also declined. By 1881 she no longer held the important status of earlier years, and when the Northern Pacific built a mile or so south, the little town collapsed.

Only the hotel, which became a barn, and a few foundations and a log cabin testify to the location of a once lusty and growing community. The site of this second Gallatin City on the east side of the Missouri is part of the Headwaters State Park, administered by the Parks and Recreation Division of the Fish and Game Department. This agency plans to develop the site because of its importance as a historical landmark.

Plans are now underway to restore this building, but pertinent structural data and early photographs are lacking. Help is solicited from any who can help in locating this information and who share an interest in converting the structure from a tumble-down barn to its former status as a Montana frontier hotel.

Dr. DeHaas, who teaches architecture at Montana State University, Bozeman, is president of the Montana Ghost Town Preservation Society, a four-year-old organization aimed at educating the public on the importance of preserving physical evidence of Montana's past. Membership, open to anyone, costs $6.00 a year and brings a quarterly newsletter containing information about ghost towns and historic sites. Information about the Society is available by writing Dr. DeHaas at P. O. Box 607, Bozeman, Montana 59715. At the same time, anyone having information or photographs relating to Gallatin City, described in this article, is invited to contact Dr. DeHaas at the same address.

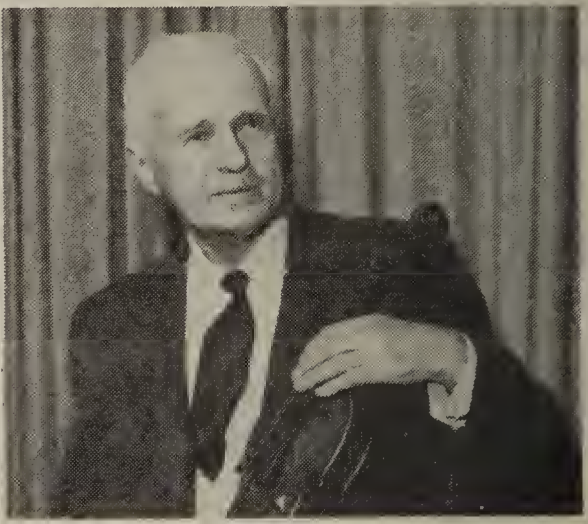
DEATH CLAIMS NOTED VIOLINIST, FRIEND OF MANY MONTANANS

by VIVIAN A. PALADIN

Late in 1966, we began a warm, rewarding friendship with Frederick William Kuphal, which resulted, early the next year, in a widely illustrated article for MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. It traced his birth in Germany in 1880, his coming to Helena with his family at the age of two, his study of the violin, his teaching of that instrument and direction of the Helena High School Symphony, and his more than forty-year tenure as violinist, personnel manager and librarian for the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra.

Yet life was then far from over for Fred Kuphal, for he kept up regular visits to Montana, and during the years, many honors came to him. In 1968, when he was in Helena, the City Council named a grove of trees on Mount Helena for him.



FRED KUPHAL

In 1968, the Montana String Teachers Association recognized him as one of the first string instrument teachers in Montana. When he retired from the Los Angeles Philharmonic in 1960 at the age of 80, Mrs. Norman Chandler signed a hand-lettered certificate recognizing his 41 years of service to music.

Fred Kuphal was still young at 90, still making fairly regular trips and still keeping up a vigorous correspondence with many of us in Montana. Not long before his death last May, at the age of 95, he wrote about an advancing illness, but one from which he fully expected to recover. Then, typically, he added a statement about an art he himself knew so well, that of "awakening the ordinary mind to a higher consciousness." To support his statement, he quoted Longinus, the ancient Greek philosopher: "Nature set us men apart as no vile or low animals, but introducing us into life and the Univeral Cosmos, and inspiring our souls with an irresistible and eternal love of all that is good and great . . ."

MONTANA AND NBC—As early morning viewers of NBC's TODAY show know, all fifty of the states are being treated to special two-hour features relating to their history and present-day aspects as a salute to the country's Bicentennial. It will be Montana's turn on Friday, August 15, and we at the Society were happy to have played a role. In this picture, NBC Reporter-at-large Paul Cunningham, right, talks with Fred Renner of Washington, D.C., center, as cameramen zero in on C. M. Russell's great oil painting, CHARLES M. RUSSELL AND HIS FRIENDS. Renner, recognized expert on Russell art, accompanied the NBC crew to Great Falls and Helena late in June to film a segment on the Cowboy Artist for the Montana show.

JOE de YONG DIES

Joe de Yong, the only man who could claim with truth that he was a protege of Charles M. Russell, died in a Los Angeles hospital in April at the age of 81. Ironically, he outlived his mother, who had reached the century mark, by only two years. His remains were returned to Montana for burial at Choteau beside his parents, with whom he came to the state as a small boy.

In 1913, at the age of 19, de Yong was working as a cowboy extra with a Tom Mix movie company on location in Arizona when he was stricken with spinal meningitis. It left him totally deaf, and it was then that he turned to art, spending some twelve years in close association with Russell, who was at the height of his success in Great Falls.

After the death of Russell in 1926, the de Yong family moved to Los Angeles, where Joe became a scenario research consultant for Cecil B. De Mille. He was long considered one of the movie industry's top experts on Western Americana. He was both writer and artist, and for many years maintained a studio in Santa Barbara, illustrating books, including many by Frank Linderman, and producing covers for national magazines.

We at the Montana Historical Society had long admired the work of this talented man. Because of his close friendship with Branson Stevenson of Great Falls, former member of our Board of Trustees, we had always hoped to elicit the full story of his association with C. M. Russell.

SOCIETY PLANS MANUSCRIPT HISTORY

The most exciting single publishing venture ever undertaken by The Montana Historical Society has all of us in three departments—Library, Archives and Publications—busier than usual these days. We are, in short, going to publish a book, the contents drawn almost entirely from unpublished materials in the Society's collections. Entitled NOT IN PRECIOUS METALS ALONE: A MANUSCRIPT HISTORY OF MONTANA, the volume will be published in 1976 to commemorate a century of publishing by the Society and the nation's Bicentennial. The project will be partially supported by a grant from the Montana Bicentennial Administration.

In announcing the project, Director Ken Korte indicated the reason for the unusual title, NOT IN PRECIOUS METALS ALONE. It was, he said, drawn from an 1863 letter, written at Bannack by James K. Fergus to James L. Fisk concerning Montana and the reason for increasing emigration to the region: "It is not in precious metals alone," Fergus wrote, "that [Montana] presents attractions to the seeker after fortune."

The large format volume will be profusely illustrated from the Society's collections, and will carry an introduction by Dr. K. Ross Toole of the University of Montana addressing the place of the publication in the historiography of Montana. Original art and calligraphy will be provided by Robert F. Morgan, former Society curator.

NOT IN PRECIOUS METALS ALONE will present Montana's total experience, from the early period of the white man's first arrival in the area down to the very recent past. But rather than presenting a historical narrative, the unique format will allow ordinary Montanans—the miner, the cowboy, the ranch wife or the shop keeper—to tell Montana's story in their own words. This approach will make the book of inestimable value to teachers searching for material to supplement their courses as well as providing lively reading for anyone interested in Montana's exciting past.

The text is divided into three segments or books: the first, entitled "First Arrivals: A Land to Subdue," will include records of Lewis and Clark and the traders and missionaries who followed them and will carry Montana's story up to the arrival of the first gold seekers in the 1860's. The second, "A Society Evolves: Securing the Land," will chronicle the years of Indian-white confrontations, the origins of the cattle and mining industries, and the emergence of a new society. The third, "New Perspectives: The Land Mastered," will deal with the attempts to master the land by the homesteaders of the Twentieth Century, as well as the political, social, and economic happenings of the 1920's and 1930's, and will close with a selection of materials reflecting the differing attitudes and emphases of the recent past.

NOT IN PRECIOUS METALS ALONE is now being offered at a special prepublication price of $12.00. After December 31, 1975, the cost will be $18.00. Society members will be receiving special reservation forms in the mails soon, but an inquiry to the Society at 225 North Roberts, Helena 59601 will bring extra copies.

The Montana Junior Historian program has folded. This program encouraged Montana high school students to learn history, particularly Montana and local history, by doing what historians do, by actually working with the materials from which written history is constructed. It was begun five years ago, funded through a grant from the Hill Family Foundation. The original grant and supplementary funds have now run out, and neither the Historical Society nor the University have adequate funds to underwrite the continuation of the program.

The financial problems, however, have been consistently overshadowed by a problem of far greater significance. During the course of the program it became very evident that many Montana high school history teachers were themselves inadequately prepared to embark on a program which involved the very essence of history—research, interpretation, and writing. That history is often poorly taught and found to be a bore by the students should not, however, be surprising. Requirements for certification to teach history in Montana schools are minimal and college courses on how to teach history are likewise appallingly deficient and ineffective.

If properly taught, history can be stimulating and exciting, and the critical and analytical skills involved in researching and understanding the past—whether the subject is Europe, the United States or Montana—are of broad application.

Moreover, because it is only possible to understand what is happening in the world today through a comprehension of what went before, one wonders how it will be possible for tomorrow's voters to understand the complicated political, economic and social problems which face Montana today without a background in how these problems developed.

For example, the effects of the so-called "War of the Copper Kings", over 75 years in the past, are still evident in Montana politics. The public distrust of large corporate interests sill prevails as a result of the gross political abuses of Clarke, Daly, Heinze, Hauser and Hammond. (This is not to say that business interests have not also learned from the past and refined their practices to a more palatable form.) Thus the study of history allows us to understand how we as political, social and economic beings arrived at the condition in which we find ourselves. Understanding this, decisions affecting our future hopefully will be wiser.

Despite the lack of adequately trained history teachers and support from administrators, in a real sense the Montana Historian program was a success. The students and teachers who participated have helped to preserve in writing some little known and sometimes little understood portions of our past and this knowledge and the students' greater understanding of the world around them is of value to us all.

KERMIT EDMONDS NAMED LIBBY CURATOR: WILLIAM MASSA JOINS ARCHIVES STAFF

Recently joining the Society staff is Kermit Edmonds, who will serve as Curator of the Society's branch museum in the Visitors' Center at the Libby dam. A graduate in history from San Francisco State University with graduate work at Berkeley and the University of Montana, Kermit brings a broad background in museum work to the position. He has served as director-curator of the Mohave Pioneer Historical Society Museum, Kingman, Arizona; curator of the Wyoming State Museum, Cheyenne, and park ranger-historian at Big Hole National Battlefield, Wisdom, Montana. In addition, he has had time for several years of teaching history in Montana high schools as well as pursuing his special interests in American military history and historic sites archaeology.

KERMIT EDMONDS

Installation of the exhibits at the Visitors' Center at Libby Dam began on July 15 and, Edmonds tells us, is expected to be completed in time for the August 23, 24 dedication ceremonies. Although many of the programs to be implemented are still in the discussion state, Edwards will be in charge of the formal museum and education programs at Libby during the summer months as well as initiating an acquisitions program and community outreach program.

Joining the Society staff in Helena is William Massa of East Prospect, Pennsylvania, who will be working with our Archives people on a special one-year project. Massa, a history graduate from Elizabethtown College, Elizabethtown, Pa., recently received an M.A. in Library Science from the University of Wisconsin. In addition he has been employed as an archives technician at the Smithsonian Institution and received archival training at the State Historical Society of Wisconsin. While in Helena, Bill will be responsible for processing the papers of Senator Thomas C. Power, a large (over 500 cubic feet) collection of materials relating to the political and economic career of one of Montana's outstanding pioneer entrepreneurs. Processing of the collection, which also includes preparation of an index and finding aid is being funded through grants from the Bicentennial and from the Dousman Foundation.

KEN KORTE NAMED SOCIETY DIRECTOR

Kenneth L. Korte, who has been acting director of the Society since October, 1974, was named permanent director at a full meeting of the Board of Trustees in Helena on April 18. Wilbur P. Werner of Cut Bank, president of the board, said the action was unanimous and effective immediately.

KEN KORTE

Korte came to the Society in 1973 as museum curator, and upon the retirement of Sam Gilluly in October, 1974, became acting director. Gilluly, veteran Montana newsman, had held the post the past seven years, and is now secretary-manager of the Montana Press Association, with headquarters in Helena.

A native of Torrington, Wyoming, Ken Korte received his education at Eastern Wyoming College and Chadron State College in Nebraska. He taught for a number of years in Nebraska schools, spending summers with the National Park Service at various posts. He later became an exhibits and interpretive specialist at the Fort Laramie National Historic Site in Wyoming. More recently, he worked for a private museum interpretive service based in Sheridan, and was involved in planning, layout and construction of a number of interpretive centers and museums.

"The board has been pleased with administrative strengths which Ken Korte has shown during his service as acting director," Werner said in making the announcement. "He has demonstrated a knowledge of and sympathy for the many activities and functions of the Society."

In other board action, Robert Gant, who has worked in the curatorial department the past six years, was named acting curator. A native of South Dakota, Gant is a graduate of the University of South Dakota and before coming to Helena had worked extensively in the museum field. His experience has included assistant director of the William H. Over Museum, Vermillion, S. Dak.; curator of anthropology at Nebraska Historical Society, Lincoln, and museum curator at South Dakota Historical Society, Pierre.

4TH ANNUAL RENDEZVOUS OF ART SET

As we go to press, twenty-four artists have accepted invitations to participate in the fourth annual Rendezvous of Western Art, scheduled to open Friday, October 3, in the Poindexter Gallery on the main floor of the Society's building. Dr. Harold McCracken, Director Emeritus of the Whitney Gallery, Cody, Wyo., will be honorary chairman of the event, and the honored artist will be J. K. (Ken) Ralston of Billings. Ralston, whose historical paintings have found wide acceptance throughout the country, will be represented by a number of his best known works, including those related to the Custer Battle.

Director Ken Korte, in announcing the participants, said some have been in previous shows, but there are many new ones. "We feel that one goal of the series should be the exposure of good, upcoming artists whose work is valid and yet is priced within the reach of collectors with modest means. At the same time, although they won't be with us this year, many of the better known artists will be invited again in succeeding years."

Artists who have accepted invitations so far are listed alphabetically: Richard Baker, Helena, water colors; Harley Brown, Calgary, Alta., pastel portraits; Jodie Boren, Abilene, Tex., oils; Ronald Crooks, Kalispell, oils; Lincoln Fox, Alto, N.M., sculpture; Grant Hagen, Jackson, Wyo., sculpture; Bill Hampton, Apple Valley, Calif., oils; Marge Hart, Great Falls, oils and water colors; Jim Haughey, Billings, water colors; Jack Hines, Big Timber, Mt., water colors; George Kosanovich, Fullerton, Calif., sculpture; Bob Morgan, Helena, oils and water colors; Don Polland, Prescott, Ariz., sculpture; Don Prechtel, Creswell, Ore., oils; Don Putman, Redondo Beach, Calif., oils and water colors; Mondel Rogers, Sweetwater, Tex., oils; Tom Sander, Kalispell, water colors; Bill Schimmel, Scottsdale, Ariz., water colors; Tucker Smith, Clancy, Mt., oils; Betty Thomas, Wilson, Wyo., oils; Robert Wagoner, Bishop, Calif., oils.

Korte said that details for the sale and show will be annouced in the next issue of the Post as they are firmed up. Events will include, however, a repeat of the highly successful "quick draw" during which artists will not only be entertained at an informal "get acquainted" brunch, but will do quick sketches to be auctioned on the spot. A reception at the Governor's Mansion is also planned.

The Rendezvous series, which has become bigger and better with the years, features a stated price sale of the works on exhibit at the opening event. All paintings and sculpture will, however, remain in the gallery for a month following, with pieces unsold during the opening viewing and show available for sale throughout the period. Editor Vivan Paladin and her assistant, Carolyn Mattern, have already begun work on the catalog for the 1975 Rendezvous, which will feature biographies and pictures of the artists, along with full color and black and white reproductions of their works.

EXHIBITS FOR LIBBY DAM PROGRESS

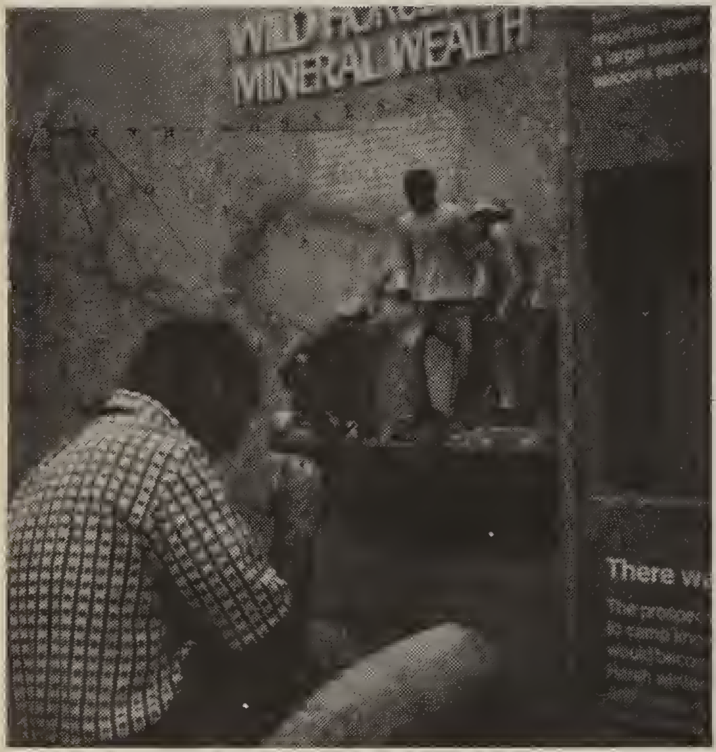
Canadian history, including the coming of law and order and mining the mineral wealth of the Wild Horse area, is an important part of the exhibits for the Visitors Center at Libby Dam. These displays, in process of execution, are two of twelve inserts which will visually treat with the history of the Kootenai River region.



It has now been over a year since the Historical Society entered into a formal agreement with the U.S. Corps of Engineers, Seattle District, to construct and install museum exhibits at the Visitors Center at the Libby Dam-Lake Koocanusa project, and work is rushing along toward the dedication deadline. The dedication, tentatively scheduled for August 24, 1975, is planned as an international celebration attended by dignitaries from both the United States and Canada.

The Libby Dam, which harnesses the Kootenai River, in the extreme northwest corner of Montana, is one of the most significant projects ever undertaken by the Corps of Engineers. International overtones arise from the fact that Lake Koocanusa (a contraction of Kootenai, Canada, and U.S.A.), which is formed by the dam, extends many miles into British Columbia. The project is also unique in that it is the only dam designed by an architect in order to insure aesthetic values. Special concern has also been given throughout the project to environmental and historical factors.

It is this last consideration which led to the Montana Historical Society's involvement in the project. The Society's responsibility involves historical displays, tracing the history and geology of the area, which are to be located in the Visitors Center. A number of displays will also be placed in the Treaty Tower which rises above the dam and in the Grotto, located in the dam's interior.

The initial phase was a research project carried out by historian Donald Spritzer, who surveyed the history of the Kootenai area from the dim period of pre-history to the Twentieth Century. Then Spritzer's work was translated into interpretive plans, including conceptual drawings and specifications by Robert F. Morgan, former Society curator. It was from these plans that Ken Korte has co-ordinated the efforts of the museum staff and the subcontractors to prepare the museum inserts.

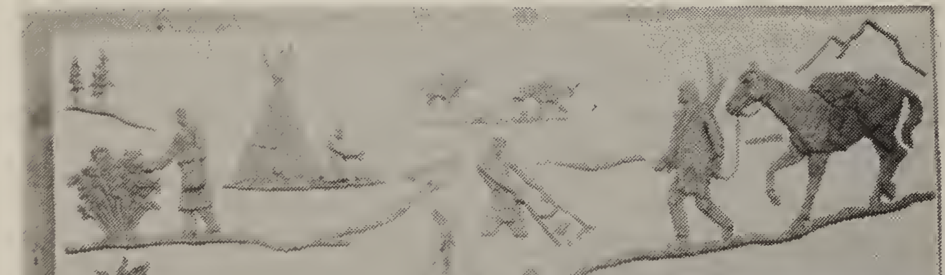
Actual fabrication of the twelve exhibits inserts was done by Jim Warner. Meanwhile, Bob Gant, Anita Miller, and Korte organized volunteer historical groups in the Libby area and the personnel of the Fort Steele Historic Site in British Columbia to collect artifacts for the exhibits to supplement the Society's own holdings.

Some weeks ago the inserts were shipped to Salt Lake City where Exhibits Graphics Groups, a museum planning and design firm, had subcontracted to do the fabrication of the displays. A sampling of the work that has been done to date may be seen in the photographs. The inserts will be returned to Helena soon for the installation of artifacts prior to shipment to Libby.

In additional to the historical displays, in recent months the Society sponsored an invitational competition for a sculptural mural to be located in the observation lounge within the Treaty Tower. The contract was awarded to the well-known sculptor John Weaver, formerly of Montana and now of Edmonton, Alberta. The winning design, a bronze bas-relief, will be fourteen and one-half feet by eight feet and will depict the pre-history of Kootenai area. The model of Weaver's winning design concept which includes scenes of fishing, hunting, travel, camp life, and the preparation and gathering of food is seen below. In addition, a second major sculpture piece is being planned for the Grotto area.

The Society has also awarded a contract to Montana Film Productions of Helena for a fifteen minute orientation film. The film, which will be historical in emphasis, is to be shown in the auditorium of the Visitors Center.

On June 1 the Society's involvement with the Corps of Engineers in the Libby project enters another phase. At this time the Society will begin operation of the Libby museum as a branch of the Historical Society. At this point, Ken Korte tells us, the Society expects to operate the Libby museum for three months during the summer under supervision of a full-time curator and twelve seasonal interpreters.



The working model of Sculptor Jack Weaver's concept, chosen for the Treaty Tower observation lounge. The finished bronze bas-relief will be 14½ feet long and 8 feet deep and will depict highlights in the pre-white existence of the Kootenai tribes.

ERIC MYHRE JOINS SOCIETY BOARD

Eric J. Myhre of Great Falls, western art enthusiast and advertising executive, has been named to the Society's Board of Trustees by Governor Tom Judge. He replaces Mel Ruder, Columbia Falls publisher, who resigned. Ruder had served since his appointment in 1962 to a five-year term.

A native of Spokane, Wash., Myhre was raised in Billings. After graduating from Billings High School in 1959, he studied journalism at the University of Montana, then joined the Myhre Advertising Company in 1963. He moved to Great Falls in 1970, when operations were expanded to that city.

During his residence in Great Falls, Myhre has increased his interest in western art, not only adding to his personal collection which he began in 1964, but serving as an active patron of the C. M. Russell Gallery and a participant in the highly successful C. M. Russell Art Auctions. In 1973-74, he was president of the Great Falls Advertising Club, which sponsors these annual events.

Myhre is married to the former Nina Harrison, daughter of Supreme Court Judge and Mrs. John C. Harrison of Helena. They have a daughter, Aidan.

CLARK SPENCE TO WRITE OFFICIAL BICENTENNIAL HISTORY OF MONTANA

Clark C. Spence, professor of history at the University of Illinois, has been selected by the American Association for State and Local History, Nashville, Tenn., to write the Montana volume for a series of 50 state histories planned as a lasting historical contribution to the Bicentennial era. Funding for the project comes through a grant from the National Committee for the Humanities, with Gerald George directing the total project for the AASLH.

Spence, who spent two weeks early in April researching in the Society Library for his writing project, is a native of Great Falls. He grew up in Idaho and graduated from the University of Colorado with a M.A. in history, then completed his Ph.D. at the University of Minnesota. After a tenure at Pennsylvania State University, he joined the Illinois faculty.

Although Spence's primary interest has been in western mining, particularly foreign investments in mining, he has written and researched widely on Montana history, and has been a contributor of four articles for MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. Currently he is working on a biography of Benjamin Potts, Montana's most successful territorial governor.

IMPORTANT MATERIALS ACQUIRED BY SOCIETY

The first quarter of 1975 has brought the Society a wide range of collections of papers and artifacts from contributors who are concerned about the preservation of historical materials for future research.

From the estate of Harvey Griffin of Bozeman, we received a fine collection of antique furniture, glassware, china, and silver. Consisting of over 170 lots, the collection dates from the 1850's to the 1920's. The collection also includes a number of Chippewa-Cree Indian artifacts primarily dating from the 1920's, a large number of photographs and miscellaneous papers documenting Griffin's involvement in agriculture in the Bozeman area, and his autobiography and editorial writings for the Gallatin County Tribune. Perhaps the single most interesting item in the collection is a chair carved by Brigham Young that was presented to Griffin's father.

From Glenn Mountjoy of St. Ignatius, the Society has acquired an important collection of twenty-four Indian items. These artifacts, which date from the 1860's to the 1920's, pertain chiefly to the Flathead and Blackfeet tribes, but there are a number of very rare Kutenai items as well. The majority of the collection was purchased by Mountjoy during the 1930's from Elizabeth Ashley, a member of the Flathead tribe; the remainder was acquired by the donor's sister, Opal, while she was a teacher on the Blackfeet Reservation. Particularly outstanding items in the collection are a Flathead buckskin dress heavily decorated with beads and fringe, a Flathead saddle decoration crafted from ermine skins and decorated with bells and beads, and a Flathead cradle board made of beaded white buckskin.

The work of Montana sculptor John Clarke is represented in the collection given to the Society by Mr. and Mrs. Lester Dukes of Seattle, former residents of Cut Bank, Mont. The collection is noteworthy for its documentation of Clarke's little known abilities as a painter. It includes eight watercolors, two charcoal pencil drawings, seven wood carvings and a volume of twenty illustrated letters written by Clarke to the Dukes.

The Library has received a collection of photographs, artifacts, and miscellaneous papers from the estate of Arthur "Punk" Ward of Helena. Until his recent death the oldest member of the Montana Club, Ward had gathered a fine collection of photographs documenting turn-of-the-century life in Helena. For many years Ward served as bookkeeper and accountant for the Goodkind Company, a Helena company with diverse agricultural and mercantile interests, and primarily as a result of his interest, the Society has received the existing financial books and papers of this firm.

From a convalescent home in Nebraska the Society has received two diaries kept by Lowell R. King while living in Montana. Mr. King recently died while a patient at the home. The first volume is an unusually literate commentary on the social life of Butte in 1904 while King was apparently doing student teaching in the city; the second, dated 1910, pertains to King's employment with the Milwaukee Road as a construction surveyor.

HARRIET MELOY HONORED FOR CONTRIBUTIONS TO EDUCATION IN MONTANA

Librarian Harriett C. Meloy's many years of commitment to Montana education on all levels was recognized on April 25 during the course of the Montana Education Association's 52nd delegate assembly with the awarding of the coveted Golden Apple award. A member of our library staff since 1957 and Librarian since 1970, Mrs. Meloy has been an active member of the League of Women Voters, the American Association of University Women (of which she is a past state president) and the Montana Board of Education—all of this combined with a busy home life in which she and her husband, Judge Peter Meloy, have raised five children.

PLANS GO AHEAD FOR SECOND CONFERENCE ON STATE HISTORY

Plans are now being firmed for Montana's second annual history conference, Montana and the West: New Directions which is scheduled to be held in Helena October 23 to 25. Again the conference is being jointly sponsored by the Historical Society and the Council to Preserve Montana History, an informal organization of Montana librarians, archivists, and historians. Because of the large attendance and enthusiasm developed by last year's session, it is expected that the meetings will bring together professional and amateur historians for interesting and informative discussions on Montana's history. Application is being made to the Montana Committee for the Humanities for grant monies to assist with the funding.

The general theme selected for the conference is the balance between individual rights and community interests. Three speakers have been invited to address themselves to the various ways in which public policy and private rights have been harmonized in Montana's Twentieth Century political experience. These speakers will be announced at a later date.

In addition, a number of sessions will develop the general theme through panel discussion and audience participation. Topics are "Twentieth Century Legislative History," "Agrarian Radicalism," "The Fight for Power," "Indian Rights and the Reservation in White History," and "Women in Montana Politics." Workshops of special value to local historical societies and those involved in community history will deal with oral history and photography as historical sources.

Registration blanks will be provided to all Society members later in the summer.

THREE JOIN OUR STAFF

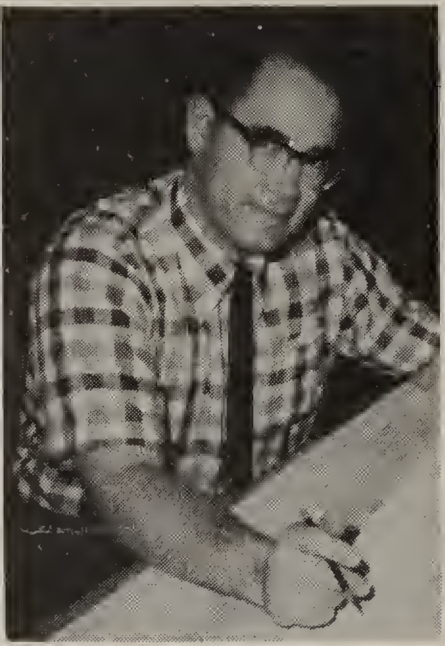
Rex C. Myers, who recently joined the Society staff as reference librarian is already familiar to readers of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY who have enjoyed his "Trolleys of the Treasure State," (Spring, 1972) and "3-7-77: A Re-examination" (Autumn, 1974). A native of Colorado, Myers is a graduate of Western State College, Gunnison, Colo., and received both his M.A. and his Ph.D. degrees from the University of Montana. Since then he has been on the history and political science faculty of Palo Verde College, Blythe, California. Myers' research interests are largely concerned with railroading; his Ph.D. dissertation dealt with the origins of Montana's Railroad Commission and his master's thesis, which discussed Helena's street railroads, has been published as Montana Trolleys Vol. 1. In addition to these publications, Myers has also co-authored Marble Colorado, City of Stone as well as articles in Colorado, Idaho Yesterdays, Montana Journalism Review, and the Bulletin of the National Railway Historical Society. Myers brings an extensive background to his position, and we are glad to have him. For his part, Rex notes that he and his wife, Trinda and their 18-month-old son, Gary, are happy to return to the Big Sky.



REX MYERS

Also joining our staff is Cindy Fleming, another newcomer from California. Not only will Cindy be on duty at the new information-orientation desk in the lobby, but she will also coordinate activities of the volunteer docent program. A former resident of Santa Maria, Calif., Cindy attended Alan Hancock Junior College in that community. She was recently married to Helena native Jim Fleming.

Cindy, who is photographed at the new information-orientation desk, is modeling the new Historical Society uniform which will also be worn by Marie Spurlin and the other personnel at the sales and information desks in main floor lobby. Approriately made of Montana blue and gold, the costumes consist of slacks and handsome tailored blazers.

CINDY FLEMING

MIKE McCOURT

Rejoining us as a permanent staffer is Mike McCourt of Cut Bank, who worked here in 1967 while taking a course in museum management under the direction of former curator Bob Morgan. A graduate of Helena's Carroll College, Mike will be working with the museum staff in preparing exhibits and doing photography. With new photo lab equipment installed, he will be engrossed in not only doing contemporary photography for this publication and the news media but in copying historic pictures and documents for the library, archives and MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY.

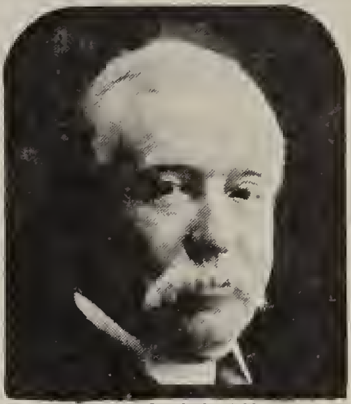
BITTER CAPITAL FIGHT OF '94 RECALLED AT SOCIETY'S LEGISLATIVE OPEN HOUSE



MARCUS DALY

If balloting on Friday evening, January 17, had any legality, the city of Anaconda would now be the capital of Montana, and the 44th Legislature, which began its sessions in Helena on January 6, would be in the process of moving desks, podiums, records, lobbyists and attaches to the Smelter City, some eighty miles to the southwest.

But it was all in fun, and it took place as a feature of The Historical Society's annual legislative open house. Theme of the evening, pointed up by old pictures, broadside banners and bunting, was the historic election between Helena and Anaconda in 1894 which determined, after years of contention, which city would be the capital. It was an election which has been called by some "the most wretched in the annals of Montana."

Depicting the theme involved some research—and a refresher course for all of us at The Society. We thought it would be interesting to share some of the story with our readers.

As the issues heated up in 1894, the capital matter became almost secondary to the titanic clash between two of the most colorful characters in Montana's past—Marcus Daly and William A. Clark. Although temperamentally opposite, these men had much in common. Both had become fabulously wealthy mining magnates through the mineral resources of Butte. Both had a common interest in establishing a favorable political climate for their mining enterprises.

Nevertheless, they were driven apart by an all-consuming personal rivalry—the origins of which remain uncertain. Their struggle became so intense that all of Montana was ultimately drawn into the circle of their hatred during the famous War of the Copper Kings from 1889 to 1898. Its effect lasted long after the death of Daly late in 1900.

The capital election of 1894 proved to be just one facet of this struggle. There had been another election in 1892, when, under provisions of the 1889 constitution, the state voted on its permanent capital. Seven communities vied for the honor: Helena (territorial capital since 1875), Anaconda (Daly's company town), Butte, Deer Lodge, Boulder, Bozeman, and Great Falls. While Helena received 14,032 votes to Anaconda's 10,172, no clear majority emerged. Thus in 1894, the two cities were forced into a run-off. Daly obviously chose to support Anaconda, where his smelter was located. By process of elimination, Clark sided with Helena. Both jumped ardently and enthusiastically into the fray, checkbooks and newspaper front pages at the ready.

Anaconda was clearly under the corporate thumb of Daly's Anaconda Mining Company. Daly was president of the city's electric light company, vice president of its largest bank, president of its water company, and chief stockholder of the only reputable hotel in town. There was a Marcus Daly Engine and Hose Company and a Marcus Daly Hall. Many of the town's 8,000 citizens were foreign-born workers who had come to labor in the smelter. Yet Anaconda was unlike most manufacturing communities, for it had been laid out with clean, wide streets, clean buildings, and a pleasing view of the mountains.

Helena, with a population of about 14,000, prided itself on being the most cosmopolitan city in the Northern Rockies. During the 1880's the city had grown rapidly—almost as rapidly as its social pretensions. Magnificent business blocks, prosperous banks and elegant Victorian homes all testified to Helena's refinement and wealth. Its schools and culture were considered to be without equal in Montana.

Indeed, as the Anaconda Standard testified, Helena was too culture-conscious, too socially pretentious, and its staff made fun of Helena in a delightfully satirical pamphlet called "Helena's Social Supremacy." Taking the role of the Helena supporter, the Standard enumerated the reasons why Helena should be the capital:

"Helena is an authority on all matters of etiquette and refinement, and some of her society people are always ready to impart needed information to visitors of limited advantages and inferior breeding, thereby insuring their ease, comfort and happiness. Helena's criminal classes are uniformly courteous and gentlemanly, never doing more injury to your person or feelings than the necessities of the occasion absolutely demand. Helena possesses one of the largest, best-planned, most luxuriously furnished and heaviest mortgaged club houses in the country. By special arrangement with Providence, Helena is exempt from disease and death. In proportion to population, Helena has more balls, parties, hops, routs, toots, soirees, receptions, musicales, drive whists, pink teas, high fives, and low dresses, drinks more champagne, runs bigger bar bills, keeps later hours, dances longer, kicks higher and practices a larger number and greater variety of bows, scrapes, courtesies, obeisances, genuflections, salaams, salutes and squirms than any other city East or West."

On the other hand, the same editor facetiously pointed out the disadvantages to Anacanda's selection: "Anaconda is lamentably lacking in tally-hoes, four-in-hands, drags, waxed floors, dress suits, Browning clubs, theosophical societies, ceramics, art coteries, eight-course dinners, ten-button gloves, skirt dancing and other social facilities. It is impossible to walk the streets of Anaconda without seeing workingmen and their wives and children, and when the streets are crowded one cannot escape brushing against them. The workingmen and their families are addicted to large quantities of solid food, and the thick, nauseous fumes of corned-beef and cabbage settle over the town like a pall, blasting all vegetation and constituting a perpetual menace to health and life. The whistles that blow at 7 o'clock every morning, so soon after society have retired, are an intolerable nuisance. The heavy ore trains in ascending the trestles . . . cause such a jarring of the earth for miles around that it is impossible to elevate and hold a glass of liquor to the lips without using both hands, monkey fashion, a disgusting and abominable breach of etiquette. Neither

Marcus Daly nor any other citizen of Anaconda has ever asked Helena's permission to live. Anaconda tolerates social gatherings of all kinds within her corporate limits with no requirements in the way of evening dress. It is said that people have been married there without gloves . . ."

Montana voters laughed, probably realizing that the issue which Daly attempted to raise concerning Helena's airs contained more than a germ of truth. However, Clark through his voice, the Butte Miner, also had a potent argument. The Miner warned of undue corporate influence if the capital were located at Anaconda. "Are the voters of Montana," asked one anti-Anaconda pamphlet, "now ready to turn over in perpetuity the legislative, executive and judicial departments of government to struggle and gasp in the restricting toils of the Anaconda Mining Company?"

The Clark forces hit away repeatedly at the impending danger of subservience to the company, and they manufactured thousands of little copper collars which they distributed to sympathizers.

Daly responded with innuendoes that Clark money was being used to import voters. A group of distinguished Helenans, known as the "Spellbinders," including Clark, Thomas H. Carter, Joseph K. Toole, Wilbur Sanders and Martin Maginnis, organized to publicly advocate the cause of Helena. Back and forth the argument swayed, led by journalists unrestrained by any necessity for truth or objectivity. It was reported that for the first time, registration for the general election in the state topped 50,000.

On November 7 the electorate went to the polls and declared Helena the victor by a majority of 1,500. "Helena Wins!" the Helena Herald crowed, "The Capital Stays Here! Boodle and Bossism Rebuked at the Polls by Our Patriotic People!"

Yet as Merrill Burlingame and K. Ross Roole have pointed out, these claims were overstated: "While Helena won, and while in a sense that fact could be interpreted as a repudiation by a wary populace of corporate participation in local government, the victory for political rectitude was more apparent than real, for in the fight over the capital more than a million dollars was poured out indiscriminately. Whether it went to buy votes directly or indirectly is of little moment, and whether expended by Clark or the company is beside the point. The edge of political integrity was dulled to the precise extent to which the capital fight encouraged popular acceptance of the alliance between the dollar and the vote."

Regardless of the lessons to be learned, Helenans were determined to celebrate the victory they felt they had won. Setting aside November 12, 1894, for its official celebration, the city was splendidly decorated and all banks and offices were closed. W. A. Clark came from Butte to attend the parade and was escorted through town by a cheering crowd. The parade in the evening featured fireworks, decorated carriages, bands and soldiers. It was after 9 o'clock when the last division of the parade arrived at the hall, packed to the rafters with the biggest crowd of people ever to assemble under one roof in Montana.

A somewhat smaller group of legislators and friends of the Society gathered in our building on January 17 to relive that exciting and momentous election. In both the Library and the Museum Lobby campaign literature, objects, and photographs were on display and staff members, many dressed in handsome period costumes, distributed facsimile copies of capital campaign broadsides. Territory Junction on the ground floor was also decked out for the occasion with red, white and blue bunting as costumed high school students showed visitors through the shops. Throughout the evening a collection of photographs of Helena and Anaconda dating from the period were flashed on the Lobby wall and music from a player piano entertained guests.

As we said before, there was an election booth, and when the ballots were counted, Anaconda won over Helena by five votes. Perhaps reflecting the many Montana towns and cities represented by the Legislative guests, there were some other choices for Montana's capital. Four votes were cast for the town of Lambert, and three thought Bozeman should have the honors. Such colorful names as Tampico, Two Dot, Emigrant, Teigen, Zortman and Hellgate got one vote apiece. They would not, probably, have had the support of either Marcus Daly or William A. Clark, but it would be interesting to know which town would, in 1975.

BURTON K.WHEELER (1882-1975): BEN

1904—LAW STUDENT: Massachusetts-born Burton K. Wheeler (center, back row) was 22 years old when he posed with fellow law students at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. Taking his degree in June, 1905, he immediately headed west, hoping to establish himself well enough to marry Lulu M. White, whom he had met while selling books door-to-door. Wheeler landed in Butte in October, 1905, and an ill-advised poker game was, by his own recollection, the reason he stayed on to become a lawyer, prosecutor, legislator and U.S. Senator. He went back to Albany, Illinois in September, 1907, to marry Lulu. Their marriage, which lasted until her death in 1962, was known for steadfast devotion.

1913—U.S. DISTRICT ATTORNEY: Seated in his Butte office, B. K. Wheeler had begun his term as U.S. District Attorney which was to last through the critical months of World War I, when he had to deal with radical elements, including the I.W.W. and anti-German extremists. Sponsored by his long-time political ally, Senator T. J. Walsh, Wheeler filled the post with cool-headed distinction, and gained for himself a reputation, even among his enemies, for fearless honesty.

1935—NEW DEAL SUPPORTER: A happy Senator Wheeler joins his colleagues in Washingon as President Roosevelt hands a souvenir pen to his aide, Tom Corcoran. He had just signed the controversial Public Utilities Holding Company Act of 1935. In the background are, left to right, Senators Alben Barkley, Wheeler and Fred H. Brown; Federal Power Commission Solicitor D. A. DeVane, and Congressman Sam Rayburn. Two years later, Wheeler split with Roosevelt in the famed Supreme Court controversy.

1940—WITH JOHN L. LEWIS: The heavy-browed labor leader, long a friend of the Senator from Montana, supported Roosevelt's third term in 1940. Roosevelt, who never forgot Lewis' caustic reference to John Nance Garner as "a labor-baiting, poker-playing, whiskey-drinking evil old man," more than once enlisted Wheeler's help in lining up the support of Lewis.

LA FOLLETTE
WHEELER

1924—VICE PRESIDENTIAL RACE: B. K. Wheeler, who had taken his seat in Congress to begin his controversial career as a U.S. Senator only a year before, decided, in 1924, to bolt the Democratic Party and run with Wisconsin's Bob LaFollette on the Independent Progressive ticket. Although he returned to the fold soon after and was himself under serious consideration for the presidency nearly two decades later, the LaFollette-Wheeler ticket garnered the biggest third party vote in history in 1924.

1946-1975—LATER YEARS OF ELDER STATESMANSHIP: When Burton K. Wheeler lost his bid for a fifth term in the Senate in 1946, many of his enemies crowed that Montanans had at last rid themselves of their "Bolshevik" solon. Yet the years brought a remarkable degree of "I told you so" moments to Wheeler. Mellowing with the years, however, the Senator took few occasions to express them. Maintaining a prestigious law firm in Washington, he and Lulu and their large family continued to enjoy leisure times at their summer home in Glacier Park. Late in 1961, just before he lost Lulu, Wheeler, working with writer Paul F. Healy, completed his autobiography. It was published in 1962 by Doubleday under title YANKEE FROM THE WEST. The book, a candid document, is strikingly characteristic of its author, who died at his home in Washington on January 6, a month short of his 93rd birthday.

DEATH CLAIMS JUDGE LESTER LOBLE, EMINENT JURIST, SOCIETY FRIEND

JUDGE LOBLE

The Historical Society has lost an inordinate number of friends and supporters lately, and has had the unhappy duty of reporting them in these pages. When we report the death of Judge Lester H. Loble, however, we do so with one over-riding thought in mind: he was responsible, in no small measure, for the roof over our heads. As a member of our Board of Trustees for many years and as president of the Sons and Daughters of Montana Pioneers, he was the moving force behind the erection of the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building which houses the Society. The building was dedicated in 1952, a monument to Judge Loble as much as to any other individual.

Lester H. Loble, who died at his winter home in Palm Desert, California, the first week of last December, was, indeed, a national figure. This was largely attributable to his judicial contention that the main deterrents to juvenile crime are "fear of punishment and fear of publicity." His views, translated in the early 1960's into what has become known as the Loble Law, are still subject to some controversy. But his own distinguished record for helping youth toward rehabilitation and a notable drop in juvenile crime under the provisions of his law are unassailable. One of Judge Loble's proudest achievements, indeed, was the founding of the Judge Lester H. Loble Foundation, under which fees and royalties from his lectures and publications help youths toward rehabilitation.

A native of Helena, Lester Henry Loble was from a pioneer Montana family. After finishing law school at New York University, he returned to Montana in 1914 and quickly launched a legal and political career. He was only 21 when he became a city alderman. In 1916, he became Lewis and Clark County Attorney and was reelected two years later.

He served two years in the Montana Legislature, and in 1923, as a freshman lawmaker, wrote the nation's first old-age pension law. A decade later, President Roosevelt summoned him to Washington to assist in drafting the first U.S. Social Security legislation.

During a career or more than forty years as a lawyer, Lester Loble not only established one of Montana's most distinguished legal firms, but was deeply involved in a myriad of civic activities. But it was as a jurist—he was elected judge of the First Judicial District in 1956—that nationwide attention came to him and to Montana in the process.

Since his retirement from the bench in 1971, Judge Loble continued to keep occupied with many things, including the writing of a series of historical essays based on his experiences and memories for The Historical Society. For us, his contributions to this institution had come full circle, from the months in the late 1940's and early 1950's when he fought and won a separate home for the collections of The Society to the 1970's when his own record of a remarkable life came back to enhance those collections.

RANDALL SWANBERG, GT. FALLS ATTORNEY, HISTORY BUFF, NAMED TO HISTORICAL SOCIETY BOARD

Randall Swanberg, the newest member of the Society's Board of Trustees, says only a quirk of fate kept him from being a third generation, native Montanan. Swanberg was born in Washington, D.C. in 1909 while his father, a resident of Montana, was attending Georgetown University law school.

Swanberg grew up in Great Falls, attended local schools, and graduated from the University of Southern California. Since 1935 he has been a practicing attorney in Great Falls, and is now a senior partner in Swanberg, Koby, Swanberg, and Matteucci. His law practice has been featured in the Saturday Evening Post and the Wall Street Journal.

RANDALL SWANBERG

Mr. Swanberg's civic activities are numerous. He has served as president of the Great Falls Chamber of Commerce, the Montana School Board Association, and the Cascade County Bar Association. He was chairman of the Board of Directors of the Montana Deaconess Hospital and has served on several state committees investigating crime and delinquency.

A history buff all his life, Swanberg says his interest now focuses on Montana history and the Civil War era. He is a favorite after-dinner speaker on historical topics. In addition, he has done some true field research in pursuit of his interest in history. With Montana's famed author, Bud Guthrie, he has retraced the route of the Oregon Trail and floated the Missouri to visit Lewis and Clark campsites and fur trading posts.

The kind of pragmatic enthusiasm which Randall Swanberg brings to all his activities suggests that his contributions to the Society's work will be versatile and meaningful.

Thoughts From The Director's Office

As one who has been caught up in the extraordinary administrative excitement at The Montana Historical Society these past several months, this writer has had little time to reflect. But reflections must and do become a part of all days (and sometimes nights) and some have come to me. I'd like to share a few.

Particularly noteworthy, if one is interested in dates and anniversaries and landmarks, are some which especially effect The Montana Historical Society. One is that this institution, Montana's oldest, became 110 years old on February 2, 1975. It was on that date, in 1865, that an Ohioan named Sidney Edgerton signed Council Bill 15 which provided "That in order to collect and arrange facts in regard to the early history of this Territory . . ." a group of men including "H. L. Hosmer, C. P. Higgins, John Owens, James Stuart, W. F. Sanders, Malcolm Clark, F. M. Thompson, William Graham, Granville Stuart, W. W. DeLacy, C. E. Erwin and Chas. J. Bagg—their associates and successors, are hereby made and constitute a body politic under the name and style of the Historical Society of Montana."

Edgerton, a lawyer from Talmadge, Ohio, had been granted a political favor from President Lincoln in 1863 when he was appointed chief justice of Idaho Territory, which then encompassed present-day western Montana but whose seat of government was in far-off Lewiston. Accompanied by his growing family, Edgerton had arrived in the mining camp of Bannack in 1863, fully intending to press on to Lewiston when weather and road conditions permitted. It was not to be. He installed his family in a log house in Bannack, leaving them to cope with life in a raw mining camp in the dead of winter while he journeyed to Washington to plead, successfully, for separate territorial status for Montana. He returned to Montana as Territorial Governor, and struggled to bring some legal and civil order out of chaos.

Signing Council Bill No. 15 must have given Edgerton some satisfaction, for even then, it showed that there were men of vision and breadth of thought in the new territory. A coterie of them realized, almost from the beginning, that the records of the new government and society they were establishing were the material of history, and that these records needed to be preserved. In very simplistic terms, they were doing what we still try to do today at The Society: preserve the record.

Through the years, of course, complexity has come, in the form of many museum objects, greatly expanded library and archival materials, and publishing. Speaking of publishing: the other anniversary which comes to mind is that of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, which first appeared in January, 1951, as Volume 1, Number 1. With the Winter issue, 1975, mailed in January, the magazine arrived at Volume XXV, Number 1. This means a quarter century of publishing will have been completed at the end of this year. And of course next year, 1976, will mark not only the 200th birthday of the nation as a whole but the 100th anniversary of a momentous year in Montana and the beginning of a new quarter century for MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY.

When we reflect on all these things, another thought comes to mind: that all our readers are members and all our members are readers. With this new year, our hope is to drive home this point more and more often: more meaningful involvement of our readers and our unseen audience with the work of the entire Society. There will be much more to say about all this in the weeks to come. We want your involvement in the work we try to do here. That means all of you, wherever you may live.

It goes without saying that as we try to achieve the goal of more member participation any thoughts you might have will be welcome, whether they be written or verbal. For while no display or collection or publication can please everyone, it is implicit in an endeavor involving the public good that there be communication and expression. Be assured that the lines for both are open at The Society, along with the welcome mat.

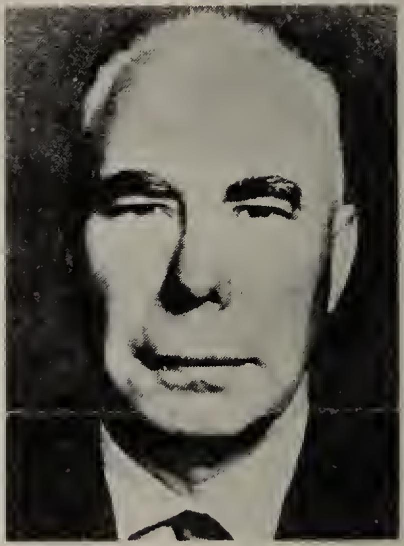
GEORGE POINDEXTER, ART PATRON, PIONEER FAMILY MEMBER, SUCCUMBS

Word was received in Montana recently of the death of Everton George Poindexter, an eminent Historical Society benefactor, on January 1 in a Bridgeport, Connecticut hospital. He was president of Commodity Brokers, a New York based wholesaler of flour and food products.



Born in Dillon in 1889, Poindexter attended Beaverhead County High School and Helena High School before moving to Hawaii with his family in 1917. He graduated from Punahou Academy, Honolulu, in 1918. That same year he returned to Montana to enroll at the University of Montana which he attended for two years. He graduated from Columbia University.

Poindexter is best known to those of us at the Historical Society because of his generous bequest of 82 paintings in 1964 made in honor of two distinguished Montana pioneers: Poindexter's maternal grandfather, Lt. Col. Everton Judson Conger, who was member of the party which captured John Wilkes Booth and later became a supreme court judge in Montana Territory; and Poindexter's father, Hon. Joseph Boyd Poindexter, who was a widely known Montana lawyer, judge and attorney general before serving as governor of Hawaii from 1934 to 1942.

During the 1950's George Poindexter began collecting abstract, expressionist, and contemporary paintings. His gift to Montana includes an impressive array of the works of thirty-five artists of the New York School and those whom they influenced.

"I have given them as a major collection," said Poindexter at the time of their donation, "in the hope that some of the pleasure they have given me can be shared by the people of my beloved and beautiful native state."

Among the artists represented in the collection—believed to be one of the largest and most representative of its kind—are Willem DeKooning (4), Robert DeNiro (19), Jackson Pollack (1), Arshile Gorky (2), and Franz Kline (1).

ENTHUSIASM MARKS FIRST HISTORY MEET

More than 250 enthusiastic history buffs and academic historians from Montana and neighboring states attended Montana's first state history conference on November 1 and 2, and virtually all of them expressed the hope that the event would become an annual affair. Coordinated by Society Librarian Harriett C. Meloy, the sessions were sponsored jointly by the Council to Preserve Montana History and the Montana Historical Society, with funds provided by the Montana Committee for the Humanities.

The theme of the program, "Montana and the West: New Directions" was explored from various perspectives, yet all pointed to a general conclusion: that the relation between the past and present is a continuum rather than a sharp break and that the problems of today were shaped by the events and ideas of the past. In order for others to better understand these problems, the conference speakers repeatedly stressed the need for western historians to begin the study of the much neglected recent past. A second theme repeatedly touched upon was the fact that Montana's problems are not unique, but shared by the other Rocky Mountain States.

On Friday morning, Richard Roeder chaired a lively discussion of Montana politics since 1945 with Thomas Payne, K. Ross Toole, Harry Billings, and Bill Mackay as participants. At the same time, Allan Clarke led Robert Murray, William Poole, and Marie MacDonald in a discussion of the role of community histories and the need to direct such studies toward more interpretive history.

At the noon luncheon, Francis P. Prucha, S.J., Marquette University, presented a scholarly exposition of Indian tribal sovereignty in relation to the American government. Later in the afternoon he led a discussion by Henrietta Whiteman and Earl Barlow on the matter of Indian identity in white history. At the same time a discussion was taking place on the role of technology and environment in Montana history. Participants included Robert Smith, John Willard, Robert Calvert, and L. Tuffly Ellis.

At the evening banquet, Robert G. Athearn of the University of Colorado pointed out the parallels between Colorado and Montana from their initial settlement to recent discussions of environmental questions.

Discussion on Saturday morning was devoted to workshops on the problems of local historical societies. The collection, storage and arrangement of manuscripts and photographs were discussed by representatives from the Historical Society and the University of Montana, while Jeffrey Safford, Joseph Cash, Lee Ann Cooper and Brian Cockhill discussed the problems of establishing an oral history program.

At the closing noon luncheon on Saturday, W. Eugene Hollon of the University of Toledo summarized many of the themes raised in earlier discussions in a talk entitled "The Changing Face of the West."

Speaking for the Society as well as for the Council to Preserve Montana History, on which all Montana academic institutions are represented, Librarian Meloy expressed the hope that those who attended the first conference write to her giving any suggestions or comments regarding future meetings.

Hundreds of art patrons crowded the lobby and galleries of the Society building Saturday evening, September 7, for the official opening of our third annual Rendezvous of Western Art. Before the evening was over, nearly $30,000 worth of contemporary art in all media had been sold, and there was unanimous agreement that it was the most successful event in the Rendezvous series.

In addition to the opening of the exhibit itself, during which Board President Wilbur P. Werner of Cut Bank presided, a full schedule of special events had taken place earlier in the day.

A brunch honoring participating artists was held in the morning at the historic Montana Club, attended by nearly 300 guests. A highlight was a "quick draw" auction which brought enthusiastic response. The artists present were given twenty minutes in which to do a sketch or small work of art, and at the end of the period, auctioneer John Mandeville of Bozeman and his son, Steve, handled a lively sale. They were assisted by Ginger Renner of Washington, D.C., who provided colorful highlights on the artists.

Mrs. Renner and her husband, Fred, well known Russell authority, were featured in a two-part lecture in the afternoon, with each segment followed by question and answer periods. Renner discussed the myths which have grown up about the Cowboy Artist as well as the factual basis of the tradition which Russell represents. Mrs. Renner emphasized the contemporary western art genre, pointing out why, in the hands of good artists, it has become a valid school of art as opposed to a slavishly realistic "cowboy and Indian" fad.

In addition to the honored artist, sculptor Robert Scriver of Browning, Montana, participating artists included, in alphabetical order: Joe Beeler, Sedona, Ariz.; Bill Bender, Oro Grande, Calif.; Jim Boren, Clifton, Texas; Harley Brown, Calgary, Alberta; John Clymer, Teton Village, Wyo.; Jay Contway, Great Falls; Fred Fellows, Bigfork; Jim Haughey, Billings; Glen Hopkinson, Cody, Wyo.; Harold Hopkinson, Byron, Wyo.; Bob Morgan, Helena; Bill Moyers, Albuquerque, N.M.; Les Peters, Great Falls; Don Polland, Grants, N.M.; Rex Rieke, Billings; Gary Schildt, Kalispell; Bill Schimmel, Scottsdale, Ariz.; Shorty Shope, Helena; Ben Wagner, Whitefish; Bob Wagoner, Bishop, Calif., and Joan Wright, Sepulveda, Calif. A memorial showing was held for LeRoy E. Greene of Billings, who, before his death on April 22, 1974, had planned to exhibit at the show.

A special feature of the evening included the dedication of the Charles Russell Gallery on the main floor of the museum as the Mackay Gallery of Russell Art. Members of the family of the late Malcolm S. Mackay whose great collection of Russell originals forms the nucleus of the Society's Russell collection were present for the dedication.

A fully illustrated catalog of the exhibit, prepared by Editor Vivian Paladin, includes color and black and white illustrations of the art of exhibition, along with biographical material and information on media and dimensions. A limited number of these are still available, at $5.00 each, by writing to the Society.

SAD NEWS FROM MONTANA: HELENA'S

For almost a century, visitors to Helena have been struck by a fantastic, rambling frame structure on the west side of town. But they will marvel no more. This year, on September 21, 22 and 29, the elegant 85-year-old Broadwater Hotel, once known as one of the Seven Wonders of the West, was sold piece by piece at public auction. As we go to press, the last unsold vestiges are disappearing.

Hundreds of people from all over the state, even many from out of state, witnessed the final rites. Some came to pick over some very high quality antiques; others were just interested in getting a last look at the old hotel and perhaps reliving a time when the hotel was the center for refinement and culture in Montana. A prominent civic group offered tours, others sold sandwiches and soft drinks, and laughing children played under the same trees that had shaded youngsters in earlier years. It would have been a most enjoyable fall weekend—if it hadn't all been so sad.

The tragic thing about losing the Broadwater is not that it was a beautiful building. It wasn't. It was, however, a fabulously interesting building—a visual feast of gabled dormers, towers, porches, and stained glass. Pictures indicate that the Moorish natatorium that was fatally damaged in the earthquake of 1935 was even more spectacular. Although decayed, the Broadwater ruins still suggested the high level of craftsmanship and skill that went into its construction.

BOOKLET ON BROADWATER AVAILABLE FROM SOCIETY

In 1969, MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY published a well illustrated article about the Broadwater Hotel and Natatorium, and because of wide interest in the subject, we printed a booklet using the material. This was sold out long ago, but with the recent auction and ultimate demolition of the hotel generating renewed interest, we reprinted. There are still a few left, and they are available by writing to The Montana Historical Society, 225 North Roberts, Helena 59601. The Price: $1.25, postage prepaid.

ELEGANT BROADWATER BOWS TO AUCTIONEER'S BLOCK

The real importance of the Broadwater was that it was a perfect representation of its time. As physically imposing and yet as ungainly as Montana was in 1889, the year of its construction, the Broadwater was built for the munificent price of $500,000. The resort was the dream of Colonel Charles A. Broadwater as part of his plan to make Helena the commercial and cultural center of Montana, indeed THE metropolis of the Rockies.

Nor was Colonel Broadwater the only Helenan to envision such a roseate future. Virtually everyone foresaw thousands of pleasure-seekers coming to Helena to bathe in the hotel's hot springs, enjoy its fine cuisine and elegant accommodations, and admire its nearby scenic grandeur. All the time, they reasoned, Helena would be growing and prospering.

Many visitors, including some prominent national figures, did come to the Broadwater, but there were never enough to make the hotel financially successful. By itself, Montana lacked sufficient population to permit a resort like the Broadwater to prosper.

Colonel Broadwater himself, at the age of only 52, died in his suite in the hotel in 1892, still believing, no doubt, that his dream would not die or fall into disuse and decay. Gaudy days came in the 1930's, when the graceful front entrance was marred with a neon sign, and the lower floor rooms were given over to gambling tables and slot machines. Altogether, from its opening in 1889 until it was finally closed in 1941, the Broadwater had seven operating owners.

There have been latter-day hopes for restoration, one coming during World War II, when the federal government proposed, with local participation, to restore the hotel as a rest and recuperative center for servicemen, with the facility reverting to the city after the war. The plan failed. Local legend has it that there were other lost opportunities, but for some time now, it has been obvious that the day for feasible restoration was gone forever.

Thus, these pages must report the passing of another symbol of Montana's opulent past. The demise of Butte's glorious old Columbia Gardens was featured here a year ago.

Branson Stevenson Honored; Swanberg Named to Board

At a meeting on October 11, former Board member Branson Stevenson, Great Falls, was given a resolution of appreciation and a lifetime membership in the Society for his years of service.

Stevenson, one of Montana's towering artistic talents, first came to the state in 1920. He soon established himself as an artist competent in many mediums; indeed, he invented two of the media in which he now works—emulsion wax watercolor and clay-in-clay inlay. A founding member of the Montana Institute of the Arts and an organizer of the Archie Bray Foundation in Helena, Stevenson made significant contributions to the Society during his ten years of service, not only through his knowledge of art but his appreciation of our goals and mission. His artistry has been a welcome subject for exhibit in the Society's galleries for many years.

Governor Judge recently announced the appointment of Randall Swanberg, Great Falls attorney, to replace Stevenson on the body. The new Board member will be pictured and introduced to our readers in a later issue.

NEW STAFF MEMBERS

At the end of the summer two new people joined the Society staff, both bringing personality and varied experiences to their jobs. Bonnie Nelson, born and raised in Helena, replaces Betty Lindsay, who resigned to enter the teaching profession in Helena. Bonnie who attended the University of Montana tackles the many and hectic duties that go with the position of library assistant with unflustered good humor. She has travelled widely, living in Texas, Germany and Washington, D.C., while her husband was in the Air Force. She brings to the Society four years of experience with the Montana Chamber of Commerce.

Chris Carter, originally from Phillipsburg, joined the staff to assist the merchandise department implement a new inventory system of stock control. A newcomer to Helena, Chris is a graduate of the Great Falls Commercial College and has a diploma from the Missoula Technical Center.

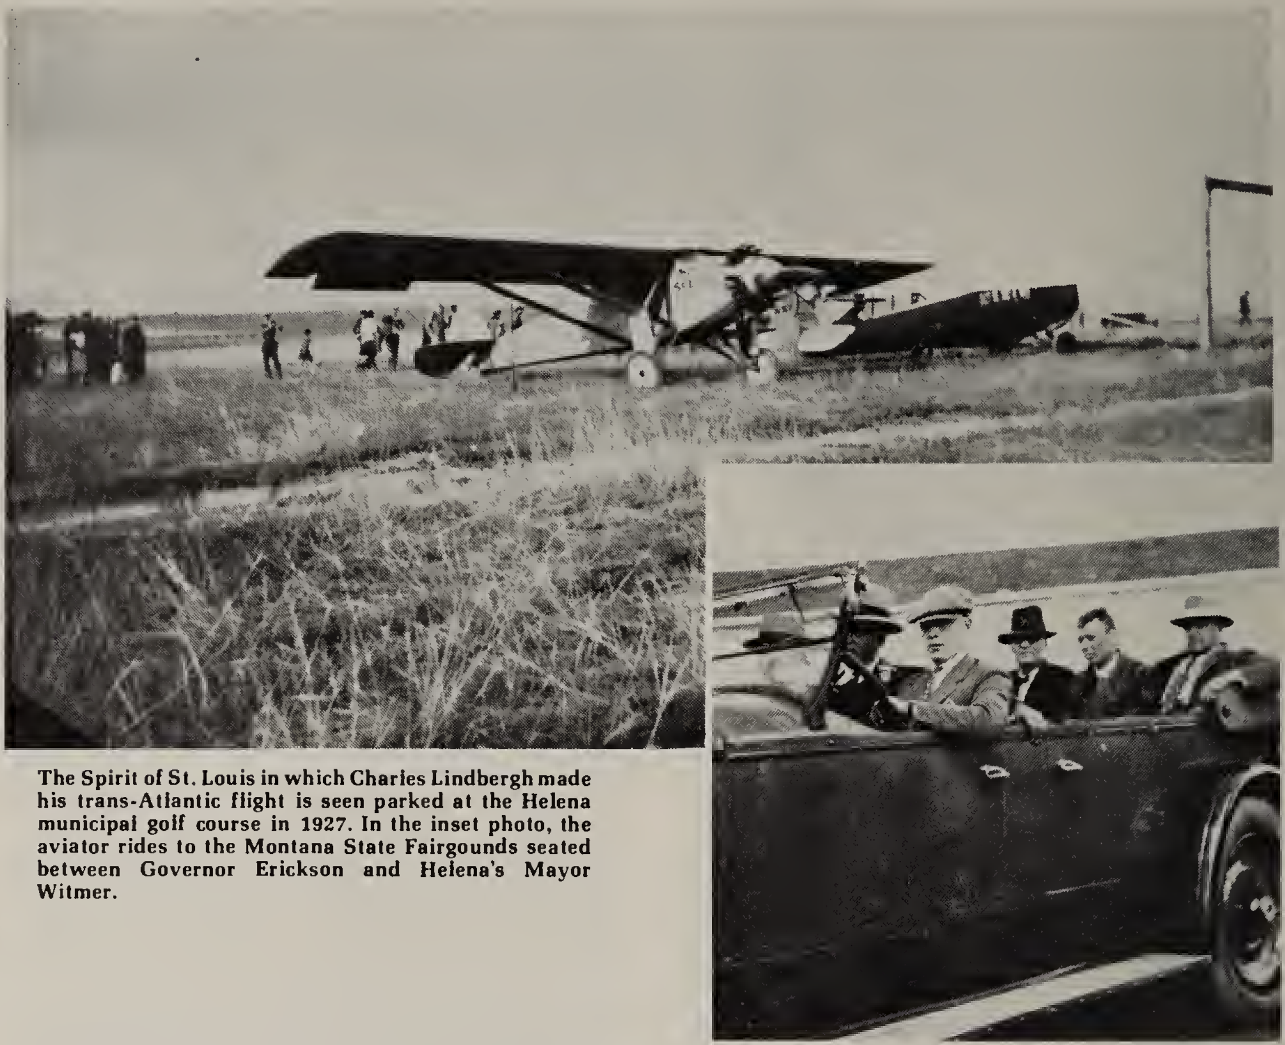
LONE EAGLE HAD A SPECIAL KINSHIP WITH MONTANA FOR HALF A CENTURY



The Spirit of St. Louis in which Charles Lindbergh made his trans-Atlantic flight is seen parked at the Helena municipal golf course in 1927. In the inset photo, the aviator rides to the Montana State Fairgounds seated between Governor Erickson and Helena's Mayor Witmer.

On May 20, 1927, Charles A. Lindbergh, Jr., flew from New York to Paris and into the hearts of his countrymen. As the first man to brave the Atlantic alone, Lindbergh won instant acclaim from a nation which identified strongly with the ideals of courage and self-reliance he represented.

In noting his recent passing, Montanans recalled the "Lone Eagle's" many visits to the state, perhaps sensing that the pilot had a special relation with the Big Sky. In his first visit to Montana as a public figure in September, 1927, Lindbergh came to the state during a cross-country tour of 76 cities to promote commercial aviation. This was not, however, the young aviator's first visit to the state; in 1922 he had been an unknown 20-year-old barnstormer in the Billings, Red Lodge, and Lewistown areas of eastern Montana. In later years as he attempted to withdraw from the tragedy, controversy and public attention which sought him out, he found respite in Montana's mountains. When his son, Land, began ranching near Greenough, his visits to the state became even more frequent. Two years before his death, Lindbergh came to Montana to warn us of the threat to our scenic beauty.

In 1927, Montanans were overjoyed to learn that the young aviator would visit several Montana cities and the State Fair in Helena. Citizens let out all the stops in their plans to honor him, for as some Helenans put it: Lindbergh was "the product of American ideas of liberty, independence, initiative and free opportunity . . . inspiring us to fresh hope and courage and giving us new confidence in ourselves."

A crowd estimated at 15,000 was on hand as Lindbergh landed at the Butte municipal airport on September 5. One local newspapersman reported that no thrill could equal the sight of the "great silver eagle"—the Spirit of St. Louis—as it circled the mining city four times before landing. Later, at Clark Park, Lindbergh made a short talk before riding in a parade to the cheers of 50,000 spectators. It was the most enthusiastic welcome ever afforded anyone in the Mining City.

The following morning, Lindbergh took off for Great Falls, where he dropped a hand-written greeting before flying on to Helena, where he landed at the municipal golf course. While his plane was given special protection by national guardsmen, the shy young flyer joined Governor John E. Erickson, former Governor Sam Stewart, and Helena's mayor Percy Witmer in a parade to the State Fairgrounds.

The largest crowd ever assembled in Montana then heard Lindbergh give a "short but interesting" talk on commercial aviation. The local reporter was too generous. Lindbergh was no orator. He stuck to his subject, never once enlivening his talk with any personal references. The admiring crowd, however, did not seem to mind. Cheering, the crowd surged forward, and it was reported that children screamed and women fainted.

Later that evening, 1,200 banquet guests heard Lindbergh give another short talk on the same subject. Then the following morning he took off for Billings and Bozeman, greeting both cities with messages from the sky before returning to Butte.

The Montana newspapers noted that the young aviatior seemed exhausted by his schedule of public appearance. They said that during the parades he waved but did not smile. It must have been with a great deal of relief that Lindbergh flew from Butte to Elbow Lake for a few days of relaxation. This lake was later renamed Lindbergh Lake as a permanent memorial from Montana.

Although Lindbergh visited the Lindbergh Lake area in the Mission Mountains several times in intervening years, his second and last official visit came forty-five years later, on February 18, 1972, when he came to address the Constitutional Convention's Distinguished Speakers Series. This time he spoke, not of aviation or technology, but about the dangers which technology posed to Montana's environment.

KEN KORTE ASSUMES SOCIETY LEADERSHIP

Administration of the Montana Historical Society changed hands in rapid succession in recent weeks, but without interruption of continuity in our many and varied activities. These included two highly successful events, the third annual Rendezvous of Western Art in September and October, and the first annual Montana History Conference on November 1 and 2 in which we were deeply involved.

Sam Gilluly, who has been director since 1967, retired in mid-October and was succeeded by Lawrence C. Skoog, former field historian for the Oregon Historical Society in Portland. After being in Helena for about a month, Skoog tendered his resignation at a Board of Trustees meeting on October 11, citing personal reasons.

KENNETH L. KORTE

Kenneth Korte, who has been the Society's curator the past year, assumed acting director duties, with Gilluly staying on as consultant before taking over his new post as secretary-manager of the Montana Press Association. Korte, who came to Helena with considerable administrative experience, has been deeply concerned with administering the complex Libby Dam Visitor Center project to be completed next summer by the Society. His assumption of administrative chores in the director's office on an acting basis but for an indefinite period was made official by Board action on October 31.

A native of Torrington, Wyoming, Korte is a graduate of Eastern Wyoming College in Torrington and of Chadron State College in Nebraska. He taught high school art classes in Nebraska for three years before becoming an exhibits specialist for the National Park Service at Fort Laramie and later for a design and interpretive planning service in Sheridan. He succeeded Robert F. Morgan as Society curator in 1973. He and his wife, Joann, have a son, Jason.

In becoming secretary-manager of the Montana Press Association, Sam Gilluly returns to Montana journalism in which he was active for many years, including some thirty years as editor of the Glasgow Courier. His seven years with the Society have been marked with unusual growth, in terms of increased building space, new galleries, staff members and activities.

GREAT COLLECTION OF BARTHELMESS PHOTOS ENRICH SOCIETY HOLDINGS

The Christian and Casey Barthelmess Memorial Collection, several hundred outstanding negatives from original photographs depicting life in eastern Montana before the turn of the century, was presented to the Montana Historical Society in September. It is the gift of Mrs. Casey Barthelmess of Miles City and her children: Bob, Miles City; Leo, Malta; Mrs. George Zettler and Ward, Los Angeles; Dick, San Jose, California, and Randall, Billings. In accepting the gift Director Sam Gilluly noted that it represented "one of the really important western photographic collections."

The pictures are the work of Christian Barthelmess, who enlisted in the U.S. Army as a musician in 1874. Although Barthelmess was an amateur photographer, Photo Archivist Lory Morrow notes that his technical ability and artistic sensitivity were superb. She noted that he did much of the work in the field under primitive conditions, using the cumbersome glass plates and for many years without his own studio to work in. Nevertheless Barthelmess' mastery of his hobby was so great that in later years he worked in that capacity for the army.

A number of the photographs in the collection pertain to Barthelmess' army service in Arizona, New Mexico and later the Philippines, but the majority were taken at Fort Keogh near Miles City, Montana. In addition to capturing every facet of life on a frontier military post, Christian Barthelmess was also a frequent and welcome guest on the nearby Northern Cheyenne reservation, leaving behind a rich legacy of sensitive portraits and numerous life studies.

The collection is also named in honor of the photographer's son, Casey Barthelmess, former member of the Society board. He had carefully preserved and identified his father's work. The photography of Christian Barthelmess is also represented in the collections of the Smithsonian Institution, the Library of Congress, the National Archives, and the United States Signal Corps.

RENDEZVOUS '74 OPENS SEPT. 7

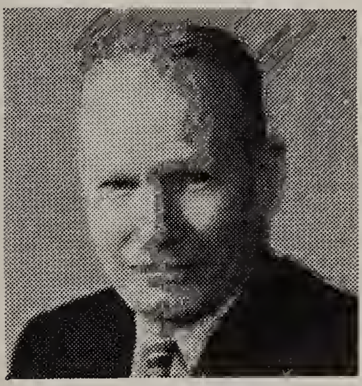
Preliminary plans are rapidly progressing for the Society's third annual Rendezvous of Western Art, scheduled to open Saturday, September 7, 1974, with a program of special events. The art, which will include one to three works by twenty-three of the best artists in the American West, will remain on view in the Poindexter Gallery on the main floor of the museum throughout September and the first week of October.

A fully illustrated catalog, much of it in full color, is now in preparation by Editor Vivian Paladin and her assistant, Carolyn Mattern, and will include biographical material and pictures on each of the artists, along with illustrations, media and dimensions of the art to be shown. Copies of the catalog will be available from the Society before, during and after the Rendezvous.

Director Sam Gilluly has announced that Mr. and Mrs. Fred Renner of Washington, D.C. have accepted honorary co-chairmanship of the event, and will participate in an afternoon discussion on western art to be held at Jorgenson's Restaurant in Helena from 2:00 to 4:00 P.M. on September 7. Renner, a recognized authority on the work of Charles M. Russell, has a long association with the Montana Historical Society, including consultation on Russell art for Montana, the Magazine of Western History. Mrs. Renner, the former Ginger Schimmel, is well-known as an art gallery owner and operator, and as a recognized collector of and authority on contemporary western art. Current trends in western art will be discussed by Mrs. Renner, while her husband will explore the myths and untruths which have arisen about Russell as man and artist.



FRED RENNER

GINGER RENNER

Robert Scriver of Browning, Montana, one of the best known living sculptors of western subjects, will be the honored artist and his work will be represented by a collection of his superb wildlife, rodeo, and range action models.

BOB SCRIVER

The artists and sculptors who will be participating in the Rendezvous in addition to the honored artist are, in alphabetical order: Joe Beeler, Sedona, Ariz.; Bill Bender, Oro Grande, Cal.; Jim Boren, Clifton, Tex.; Harley Brown, Calgary, Alberta; John Clymer, Teton Village, Wyo.; Jay Contway, Great Falls; Fred Fellows, Bigfork, Mont.; Jim Haughey, Billings; Glen Hopkinson, Cody, Wyo.; Harold Hopkinson, Byron, Wyo.; Bob Morgan, Helena; Bill Moyers, Albuquerque, N.M.; Les Peters, Great Falls; Don Polland, Grants, N.M.; Rex Rieke, Billings; Gary Schildt, Kalispell, Mont.; Bill Schimmel, Scottsdale, Ariz.; Shorty Shope, Helena; Ben Wagner, Whitefish, Mont.; Bob Wagoner, Bishop, Cal.; and Joan Wright, Sepulveda, Cal. In addition there will be a memorial showing for LeRoy E. Greene, who, before his death on April 22, 1974, had planned to exhibit at the Rendezvous.

An artists' brunch will be held from 10:00 A.M. to noon on September 7 at the historic old Montana Club on Last Chance Gulch to provide guests with an opportunity to meet and talk with the exhibiting artists.

The show will be formally opened at 8:00 P.M., with Wilbur P. Werner of Cut Bank, president of the Society's Board of Trustees, presiding. A special feature of the evening will be the dedication of the C. M. Russell Gallery on the main floor as the Mackay Gallery of Russell Art. Members of the family of the late Malcolm S. Mackay, a close friend of the artist and whose great collection of Russell originals forms the nucleus of the Society's Russell holdings are expected to be present for the dedication.

Curator Ken Korte says there will be a 30-minute viewing period when the gallery opens, followed by a first-come, first-serve sale of the art, with Merchandise Manager Dorothea Neath in charge of details.

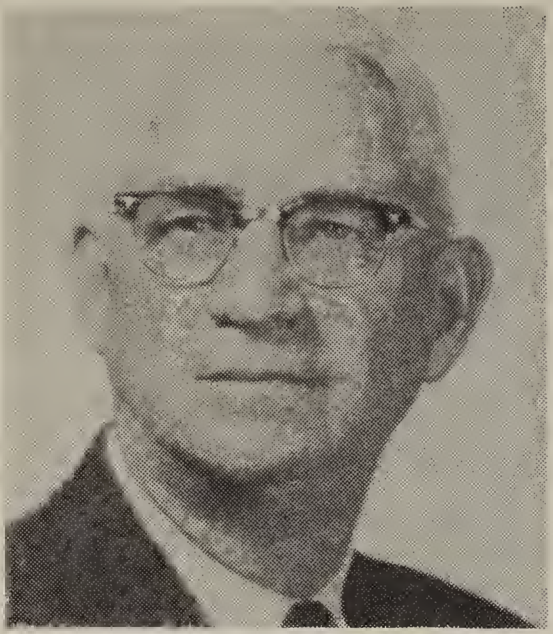
SOCIETY LOSES TWO FRIENDS: FORMER TRUSTEES JOHNSON, SPEAR



JUDGE HOWARD JOHNSON

The Historical Society was saddened to hear of the death of Howard Johnson on June 8, 1974 in San Leandro, Calif. Judge Johnson was for many years one of this institution's most faithful friends and supporters, serving as a member of our Board of Directors from 1951 to 1966, part of that time as president.

Johnson came to Montana from Wisconsin in 1915, and in 1917 graduated from the law school at Missoula. He went to Butte and joined the law firm of E. B. Howell before enlisting in the Army Air Corps. He received his training with the famed La Fayette Escadrille and during distinguished service was wounded and decorated by the French and American governments.

After discharge, he returned to Butte to practice law, and in 1921 was elected to the Montana House of Representatives from Silver Bow County. Later he moved to Whitehall, and upon election as Jefferson County Attorney, he moved to the county seat at Boulder. In 1929, he came to Helena as Assistant U.S. District Attorney under Wellington D. Rankin.

He returned to Butte in 1931, and in 1939 became Chief Justice of the Montana Supreme Court, the first graduate of the state law school to do so. He served on the high court until 1946, and since that time had maintained a law practice in Butte with his son, Keith.

Judge Johnson married the former Alice Schwefel of Butte, who died in 1969. He married the former Cecile Mailler in 1972. He is survived by two sons and six grandchildren.

A month after Judge Johnson's death, the Society learned that on July 11 it had lost another firm friend and former Board member, Willis Benton Spear, who will always be known to his many friends throughout Montana as "Junior." Spear, who was a year older than Montana, served as a member of our Board for many years, bringing to it his first hand knowledge of the open range and the cattle industry, as well as his commitment to serving the public good.

Although Spear was born on his family's famous Spear O ranch near Big Horn, Wyoming, in 1888, his association with Montana dates to his grandfather who came to the gold mines at Gold Creek in 1875. Spear's father and grandfather both turned to ranching, and Junior was only twelve when he began breaking horses. At nineteen he was wagonboss for a cattle drive for Thomas Cruse's famed N-Bar ranch. Later he turned to ranching, filing a claim on Powder River. He also found time for business college training in Nebraska, and a short course in agriculture at the University of Iowa. He returned to Montana over 50 years ago to establish his present ranch on Corral Creek on the Crow Reservation.

During the 1930's, Spear entered local politics as Big Horn County sheriff. In 1946 he was elected to the Senate from his county, serving until 1961.

Spear's wife, Ruth, whom he married in 1913, died in 1973. Survivors include two sisters, Elsa Spear Byron, Sheridan, Wyoming, and Jessamine Spear Johnson, Buffalo, Wyoming, and a nephew and niece, Mr. and Mrs. Torrey Johnson, who live on the Spear ranch.

JEANNETTE RANKIN RECEIVES RECOGNITION FROM LEGISLATURE, SOCIETY

With the recent emphasis on women, it is understandable that Montana's Jeannette Rankin, the first woman elected to any national legislature, should be much in our thoughts at the Society, and often on our working agenda as well. Librarian Harriett Meloy tells us that every week brings new research requests for material on Miss Rankin's life, and we in publishing were pleased to feature Belle Winestine's recollection of Jeannette in our special summer issue on Women in the West.

A recent addition to the photographic archives from Louise Rankin Galt, which will aid future students of Miss Rankin's life is a small but important collection of family photographs including Jeannette and her brother Wellington, a long-time force in the Republican Party in Montana.

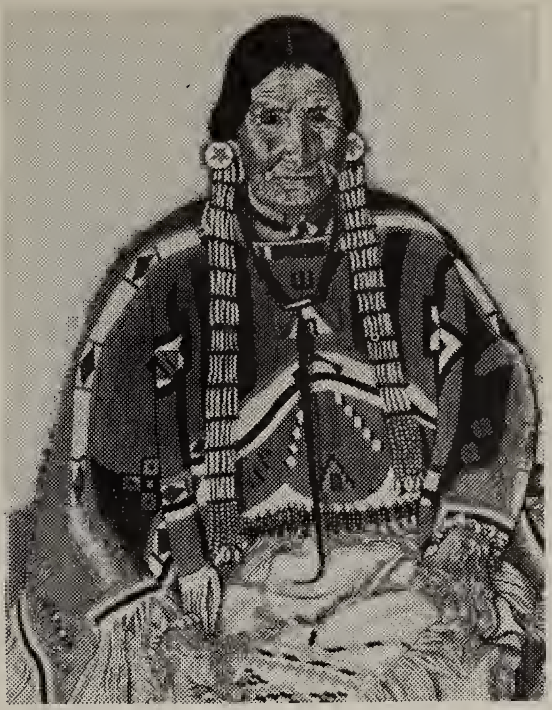
We were also pleased to note that in passing the ERA (a move she would have applauded) the 43rd Legislature also took steps to memorialize Miss Rankin, a long overdue recognition of one of Montana's outstanding political figures. Realizing that Jeannette Rankin is important nationally as well as to Montana, a resolution authorized the Montana Arts Council to honor her with a statue in the Capitol in Helena. Under State Representative Ora Halvorson and Maxine Blackmer of the MAC, a committee has been organized, consisting of Blanche Judge, Jerry Metcalf, Scottie Byerly, and David Nelson. This group will be responsible for commissioning an artist and raising the necessary funds. More importantly, they contemplate establishing a foundation to further the political ideals for which Jeannette Rankin stood. Any interested person should contact David Nelson, Montana Arts Council, 235 E. Pine, Missoula, MT 59801.

HILL FAMILY'S WINOLD REISS INDIAN PORTRAITS IN POINDEXTER GALLERY

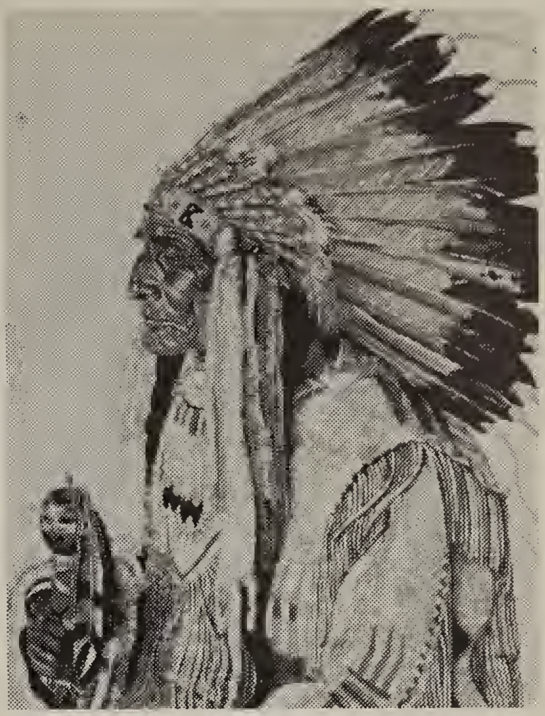
Eighteen portraits by Winold Reiss, also known by his Blackfeet name, Beaver Child, have been featured throughout the summer in the Poindexter Gallery on the main floor of our building in Helena. Most of the art comes as a loan from Cortlandt T. Hill of Monterey, California, although two represent recent gifts to the Society from an anonymous donor in the Midwest. The loaned portraits were all commissioned by Hill's father, Louis W. Hill, Sr., of the famed railway family that left such an important mark on the Northwest. Arrangements for their showing here were initiated by Dr. A. R. Little of Helena during a recent visit in California.

Winold Reiss was born in 1888 in Karlsruhe, Germany, and studied at the Royal Academy in Munich. A youthful interest in American Indians was inspired through the novels of James Fenimore Cooper and the works of the romantic German writer about Indians, Karl May. Reiss was in his twenties, however, when he finally arrived in the United States to begin his Indian painting in 1913. He made his first trip to the Blackfeet Reservation in 1919 on the advice of the noted journalist, H. V. Kaltenborn. After that, Reiss made many more visits to the reservation and his colorful and realistic portraits have been hung in major galleries both in this country and in Europe. During the 1930's Reiss founded an artist's school near Upper St. Mary's Lake in Glacier Park through which he was able to share his genius with several contemporary Blackfeet artists.

Many prominent Blackfeet are in the collection at the Society, but particularly significant are the portraits of the older Indians. John Ewers, senior ethnologist at the Smithsonian Institution and former director of the Museum of the Plains Indian at Browning wrote in a 1971 article in MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY that ". . . most important for the historical record are his (Reiss') many fine portraits of the older Indians. They were members of the last generation among the Blackfeet Indians to have actively participated in the life of the buffalo days. They were the hardy survivors of the frightful period following the extermination of the buffalo, when many of their age-mates starved to death. Few of them had even been to school. Few of them spoke English. Yet they had to learn to make a living for themselves and their families in unfamiliar pursuits. Their strength of character and their will to carry on with dignity under extreme adversity are written on their faces."



Julia Wades-in-the-Water



Wades-in-the-Water

Wades-in-the-Water (1871-1974), for example, is said to have been the last Piegan to take an enemy scalp and for many years was chief of police on the reservation. His wife, Julia Wades-in-the-Water (Under Owl Woman) is pictured as she posed in a beautifully beaded Sioux dress. Another is Shot Both Sides, head chief of the Bloods. Many older Montanans who visited Glacier Park will recognize Two Guns White Calf, who, according to legend, was the model of the Indian on the nickel coin.

Many people are most familiar with Reiss' portraits through a series of large full-color reproductions published by the Great Northern on their annual calendars beginning in 1933. It is a mark of the artist's stature that today even these reproductions are regarded as collector's items.

BICENTENNIAL OFFERS STAMPS TO COLLECTORS

The Montana Bicentennial Administration is currently offering a special series of commemorative cachets at $1.00 each, plus a special collector's envelope bearing the postmark of Camp Baker, an early Montana fort which was closed in 1879. This limited edition of 500 sells at $5.00 and the original postmarking device, lent by John Quigley of Helena's Frontier Town, has been employed.

Each envelope bears a distinctive design representing historic sites and events in Montana, and the rare stamps used conform to the subject. The entire series of 10 cachets can be obtained for $10 plus a dollar for postage. The address to write is Montana Bicentennial Administration, 225 N. Roberts, Helena MT 59601.

MUSEUM STAFF SPENDS BUSY SUMMER,

In earlier days, visitors who toured the Montana Historical Society museum, then housed in the basement of the capitol building in Helena, pointed pridefully to the display cases filled with stuffed, dried, and mounted flora and fauna, specimens of minerals and ore-bearing rocks, Indian curios, Custer Battle swords, gilt-framed portraits of bearded Montana greats, and, according to local legend, three (count them THREE), skulls of the notorious sheriff-highwayman, Henry Plummer.

In the last two decades all of this has changed. No longer does the museum resemble your aunt's cluttered attic storeroom. Instead, like other progressive museums, the Montana Historical Society INTERPRETS history. That is, the museum staff sees its function as primarily instructive, giving the visitor a sense of the flow and sequence of Montana's interesting and varied history through imaginative and attractively displayed objects and artifacts.

The hit-and-miss, boring displays of flora and fauna are gone (except for the mounted remains of the great white buffalo, Big Medicine, always a favorite with children), and today numerous handsome and well-designed cases portray such "peaks" of development as Montana's Indian heritage, early white settlement, the cattleman's frontier, the homestead period, and the growth of a modern mining, oil, and industrial economy.

Since 1952, the museum, along with the Society's other varied activities, is housed in the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building across the street from the Capitol. Since 1971, the museum and galleries have expanded into a new addition, sharing space with the archives and work areas. On the lower level is Territory Junction, a recreation of a 19th Century frontier town. On the main floor is found a new gallery for the Russell collection, a fine room to be dedicated this Fall as the Mackay Gallery of Russell Art. Adjacent to the Russell gallery is the new Poindexter Art Gallery, in which art shows are hung throughout the year, including the annual Rendezvous series. The Towe Antique Ford Collection, another favorite with visitors, is also on the main floor.

Not content to rest on past accomplishments, the museum's interests and activities have of late been expanding in both depth and scope. The most dramatic new project concerns the Society's contract to construct and install historical displays at the Libby Dam-Lake Koocanusa Visitor Center and Treaty Tower in the northwestern corner of Montana. The major construction pact was signed by the Board of Trustees at a meeting in Helena on April 19.

LAUNCHES NEW PROJECTS

In cooperation with the Seattle District of the Corps of Engineers, the Society has already completed the two initial phases of the project. This included research on the history of the Kootenai River area by Donald Spritzer, a young Montana historian. His research set forth the interpretive story line which was then converted into display plans and schematic drawings by Robert F. Morgan, former Society Curator. Under the supervision of Curator Ken Korte, it is from these plans that the curatorial staff will carry out the actual construction of the exhibits to be installed in the cases.

Because of the increased work load of creating these cases before the August, 1975, dedication deadline, two much-needed new positions have been added to the museum staff. Anita Miller, a talented young artist has come to us from Philadelphia via Germany, as musuem assistant. As a "jill-of-all-trades," she is in charge of coordinating the docent schedule, arranging tours, exhibitions, and assisting in exhibit arrangement.

James Warner, a former Stevensville guidance counselor and Helena contractor, has brought to the staff his skills for the preparation of shop drawings and the actual fabrication of the Libby exhibits. Korte tells us that the musuem has also made arrangements to sub-contract a small portion of the construction to Exhibit Graphics Group of Salt Lake City, Utah, a free-lance interpretive planning and design firm specializing in museum work.

Korte explained that one problem to be overcome in the project is that the Society does not have a strong collection of artifacts for a number of the topical areas that are to be interpreted at Libby Dam. Assistant Curator Bob Gant is thus in charge of coordinating the efforts of local volunteer historical groups in the Libby area and the personnel of the Fort Steele Historic Site in Canada to collect artifacts on these topics. Their supplementary collecting will be very helpful, Gant says, in the areas of the Kootenai Indians, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the early lumbering industry, the exploration of the area, and the development of transportation.

The museum staff has also initiated a series of continuing educational programs and lectures in order to constantly improve the knowledge and techniques of the docents, a group of Helena women who generously volunteer to assist the museum. They recently heard a talk by K. Ross Toole, University of Montana history professor and former director of the Historical Society, on the importance of the docent program, whose tours provide the chief contact between the society and the general public.

In addition, Bob Morgan presented a series of three lectures on western art to the group and on May 7 and 8 a group of 21 docents and members of the staff made a bus tour of the historic Bitterroot Valley. They visited the Big Hole Battlefield, St. Mary's Mission, Fort Owen, and the Stevensville museum, the grounds of the Marcus Daly mansion, and the Rocky Mountain Spotted Fever Laboratory in Hamilton.

For the first time this spring, the museum has also co-operated with the Helena school system in the Senior Exploratory Program. This program, which permits high school seniors to investigate career possibilities by actually working in the field, brought us Patty Ingram, who is interested in a career in museum work. Under staff supervision, Patty researched and assisted with the fabrication of "Wa-Pa-Sa," a temporary exhibit in the main lobby featuring headdresses of the Mountain and Plains Indians.

Meanwhile, however, work on our own formal museum has not been neglected. The Lewis and Clark exhibit, which has stood on the Library balcony for several years, has been cleaned, reworked and modernized, and now stands in the main floor lobby. Technician Ken Gibson has also recently completed work on storage racks for the Society's collection of contemporary and western art which are practical and innovative in view of the limited space and funds available.

At the same time, work by the entire museum staff on the fur trade exhibit for the formal museum has been completed. Thus, these busy people have been constantly updating and improving what is recognized as one of the finest small museums in the country.

MONTANA HISTORIANS, BUFFS TO MEET OCT. 31–NOV. 2

Plans are now being finalized for Montana's first state history conference, "Montana and the West: New Directions." Scheduled for October 31 through November 2 at the Colonial Hilton in Helena, the seminar is sponsored by the Council to Preserve Montana History and the Montana Historical Society.

Featured speakers at the three-day conference will include Robert G. Athearn, noted historian and book review editor for Montana the Magazine of Western History from the University of Colorado; Eugene Hollon, a historian from the University of Toledo; and Paul Francis Prucha, S. J., an expert on Indian history on leave from Marquette University.

In addition the conference will feature a number of panels and roundtable discussions. Members of the panel on Indian Identity in White History include Joe Medicine Crow of the Society Board; Henrietta Whiteman, Director, Native American Studies Program at the University of Montana; and Earl Barlow, Superintendent of Schools at Browning. Discussing Montana Politics Since World War II will be K. Ross Toole and Thomas Paine, both from the University of Montana, labor leader Harry Billings, and Tom Haines a member of the Montana House of Representatives. # HILL FAMILY'S WINOLD REISS INDIAN PORTRAITS IN POINDEXTER GALLERY

Eighteen portraits by Winold Reiss, also known by his Blackfeet name, Beaver Child, have been featured throughout the summer in the Poindexter Gallery on the main floor of our building in Helena. Most of the art comes as a loan from Cortlandt T. Hill of Monterey, California, although two represent recent gifts to the Society from an anonymous donor in the Midwest. The loaned portraits were all commissioned by Hill's father, Louis W. Hill, Sr., of the famed railway family that left such an important mark on the Northwest. Arrangements for their showing here were initiated by Dr. A. R. Little of Helena during a recent visit in California.

Winold Reiss was born in 1888 in Karlsruhe, Germany, and studied at the Royal Academy in Munich. A youthful interest in American Indians was inspired through the novels of James Fenimore Cooper and the works of the romantic German writer about Indians, Karl May. Reiss was in his twenties, however, when he finally arrived in the United States to begin his Indian painting in 1913. He made his first trip to the Blackfeet Reservation in 1919 on the advice of the noted journalist, H. V. Kaltenborn. After that, Reiss made many more visits to the reservation and his colorful and realistic portraits have been hung in major galleries both in this country and in Europe. During the 1930's Reiss founded an artist's school near Upper St. Mary's Lake in Glacier Park through which he was able to share his genius with several contemporary Blackfeet artists.

Many prominent Blackfeet are in the collection at the Society, but particularly significant are the portraits of the older Indians. John Ewers, senior ethnologist at the Smithsonian Institution and former director of the Museum of the Plains Indian at Browning wrote in a 1971 article in MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY that ". . . most important for the historical record are his (Reiss') many fine portraits of the older Indians. They were members of the last generation among the Blackfeet Indians to have actively participated in the life of the buffalo days. They were the hardy survivors of the frightful period following the extermination of the buffalo, when many of their age-mates starved to death. Few of them had even been to school. Few of them spoke English. Yet they had to learn to make a living for themselves and their families in unfamiliar pursuits. Their strength of character and their will to carry on with dignity under extreme adversity are written on their faces."

Wades-in-the-Water (1871-1974), for example, is said to have been the last Piegan to take an enemy scalp and for many years was chief of police on the reservation. His wife, Julia Wades-in-the-Water (Under Owl Woman) is pictured as she posed in a beautifully beaded Sioux dress. Another is Shot Both Sides, head chief of the Bloods. Many older Montanans who visited Glacier Park will recognize Two Guns White Calf, who, according to legend, was the model of the Indian on the nickel coin.

Many people are most familiar with Reiss' portraits through a series of large full-color reproductions published by the Great Northern on their annual calendars beginning in 1933. It is a mark of the artist's stature that today even these reproductions are regarded as collector's items.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

The Montana Historical Society will open its Third Annual Rendezvous of Western Art with a full day's program on Saturday, September 7. It will feature displays of the work of twenty-three contemporary Western artists, undoubtedly the best collection we have had for this fall show and sale.

An important sidelight for the Society and all lovers of Russell art will be the official dedication that evening of the Mackay Gallery of Russell Art.

Without question, the greatest single gift that has come to the Society during its long existence is the Mackay collection of Russell art. Originally acquired by Mr. and Mrs. Malcolm S. Mackay, Sr., it was after her husband's death that Helen Raynor Mackay and her family decided that the collection should come to the Society.

The senior Mackays were not only longtime friends of the Russells; they were also discriminating art collectors. Their magnificent gift to Montana was and is one of the best, and it has since stimulated others to follow their example, to our great benefit.

Dedication of our gallery to the Mackays is only a small token of our appreciation. We regret that Mrs. Mackay, whose home is in New Jersey, will not be with us, but her children will be. We all will be thinking of her and her love for Montana and its people.

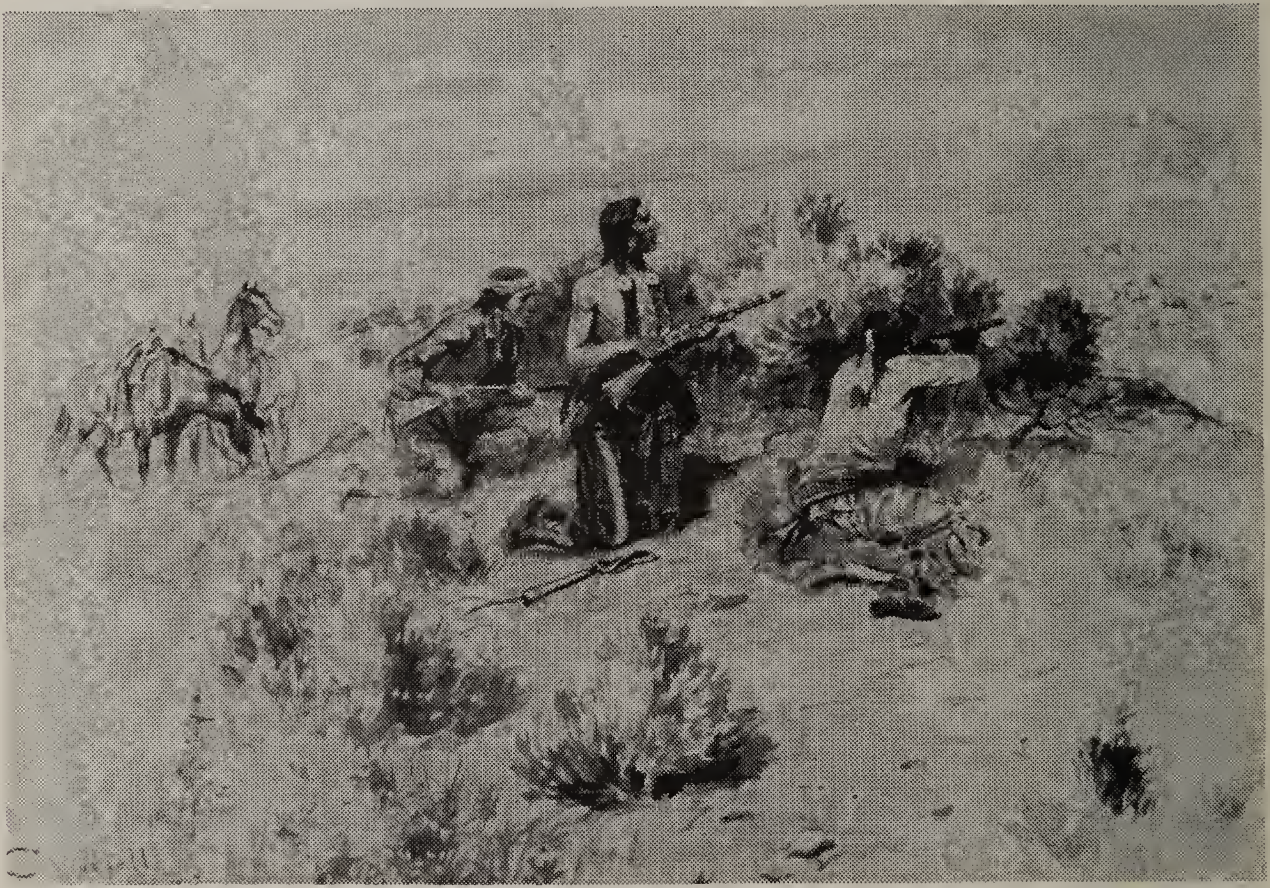
—SAM GILLULY

SPECIAL WOMEN'S ISSUE ATTRACTS WIDE ATTENTION

We in publishing here at the Society have been pleased to note that our special issue, "Women in the American West" of MONTANA, the MAGAZINE OF WESTERN HISTORY has already stirred an unusual amount of interest. Editor Vivian Paladin has already appeared on Norma Ashby's "Today in Montana" television program which is broadcast over MTN from Great Falls, and she is scheduled to talk on a local radio talk show broadcast over KBLL from Helena.

We were also pleased that the annual convention of the Big Sky Chapter of the American Women in Radio and Television has selected the issue as the theme for their October 12 meeting in Lewistown. Vivian Paladin will be moderator of a panel discussion on the role of women in the west that will include two authors of articles in the issue, Belle Fligelman Winestine and Dorothy Johnson, and Assistant Editor Carolyn Mattern.

During the first week in July, Ralph Ehrenberg, director of the National Archives' cartographic division was in Helena to advise the Society on the preservation and cataloging of its map collection. Dr. Ehrenberg's consultation was made possible through a gift from the late Mary K. Dempsey, former Society librarian. Also seen above is Marge Virostko who has been carrying out the actual processing of the maps during the summer.



The Historical Society has recently received another fine addition to its collection of Charles M. Russell art—this an 1897 watercolor entitled THE ANTELOPE HUNT. The painting, valued at upwards of $45,000, is the bequest of Louise Treacy Tomlinson who died in Helena, May 21, 1974, and was given in memory of her father, Dr. William Treacy, and her brother, Dr. John Treacy, both well known Helena physicians. Although one of Russell's early works, it is considered to be an unusually fine piece for that period. It depicts, as can be noted by Russell's noteworthy attention to detail, three Indians on a hunt apparently sometime after settlement on a reservation.

RENDEZVOUS '74

Twenty-three of the best artists living and working in the American West have indicated they will participate in the Society's third annual Rendezvous of Western Art, scheduled to open Saturday, Sept. 7, with a program of special events. The art, which will include from one to three works by each of the participating artists, will remain on view in the Poindexter Gallery on the main floor for a month following the opening.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Renner of Washington, D. C., have accepted honorary co-chairmanship of the event, and will participate in an afternoon panel discussion of western art. Renner, a recognized authority on the works of C. M. Russell, has long been associated with the Society, including consultant in his field for MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. Mrs. Renner, the former Ginger Schimmel, is a well known art gallery owner and operator, and a recognized collector of and authority on contemporary western art.

Robert Scriver of Browning, Montana, one of the best known living sculptors of western subjects, will be the honored artist for the third annual Rendezvous, and will be represented by a collection of his superb wildlife, rodeo and range action models.

Ken Korte, Society curator, expressed gratification at the initial artist responses to the invitational Rendezvous. Besides the honored artist, they are, in alphabetical order: Joe Beeler, Sedona, Ariz.; Bill Bender, Oro Grande, Cal.; Charles Biel, Red Deer, Alberta; Jim Boren, Clifton, Tex.; Harley Brown, Calgary, Alberta; John Clymer, Teton Village, Wyo.; Jay Contway, Great Falls, Mont.; Fred Fellows, Bigfork, Mont.; Jim Haughey, Billings; Glen Hopkinson, Cody, Wyo.; Harold Hopkinson, Byron, Wyo.; Bob Morgan, Helena; Bill Moyers, Albuquerque, N.M.; Les Peters, Great Falls; Don Polland, Grants, N. M.; Rex Rieke, Billings; Gary Schildt, Browning; Shorty Shope, Helena; Gordon Snidow, Belen, N. M., Ben Wagner, Bishop, Cal., and Joan Wright, Sepulveda, Cal.

THE SOCIETY'S ROLE AT LIBBY DAM

A contract to construct and install historical displays in the Visitors Center and other areas open to public viewing at the Libby Dam-Lake Koocanusa project in the extreme northwestern corner of Montana was signed by members of the Society's Board of Trustees at a meeting in Helena April 19. The signing represents the third phase of a program involving the Society and the U. S. Corps of Engineers, Seattle District, which will culminate in August, 1975, with the dedication of the gigantic international project harnessing the Kootenai River.

The Society's responsibility involves historical displays, tracing the history and geology of this beautiful region. Most of these will be in the separate Visitors Center, located adjacent to the dam. But there will be participation as well in creating displays for the Treaty Tower, which rises above the crest of the dam itself and leads downward into an interior Grotto, where visitors will see many significant displays, including murals, artifacts and objects depicting regional geology, animal, plant and fish life.

Participation of the Society has been negotiated for the Corps of Engineers by Planner-Engineer Brad Luton of Seattle, who was present for the construction contract signing.

The initial phase was a research and writing project, completed by Don Spritzer, young Montana historian, who delved into the dim period of pre-history and geology, the heyday of the Flatbow and Horse Indians, the fur trade, first white missionaries, two successive mining booms, and the timber industry.

The "story line" as developed by Spritzer's research was then translated into display plans, including schematic drawings and specifications, created by Robert F. Morgan, former Society curator. It is from these plans that the Society's curatorial staff, under the direction of Ken Korte, present curator, will build and install the cases.

Libby Dam, one of the most significant projects ever undertaken by the Corps of Engineers and the only one designed by an architect to insure aesthetic values, has had international overtones since the inception of planning in 1952. This is because the Kootenai River "loops" into Canada, and its resulting Lake Koocanusa (named for "Kootenai," "Canada" and "USA") will be 90 miles long, nearly half of it crossing the border into British Columbia.

International treaty negotiations, one of the world's longest railroad tunnels, the rerouting of both rail and highway routes, special concerns for the environment and preservation of the historical record of a corner of Montana and British Columbia, have all been part of this unique project. The latter, which has become an over-riding concern of The Montana Historical Society, is not, we think, by any means the least important in an important list of priorities.

HISTORIC GREY MATTER PRESENTED

A minuscule bit of grey material, recently presented to the State of Montana and now displayed in the lobby of the Historical Society, is no ordinary piece of rock. It is a fragment from the Taurus Littrow Valley of the moon, presented on March 22, 1974, to Governor Thomas Judge by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. Although similar presentations are being made to all 50 states and 136 foreign countries, we like to think this presentation was quite special, for at his own request, Navy Captain Eugene Cernan, who commanded the Apollo XVII mission to the moon, came to Helena to do the honors. Seen here with Governor Judge and Society Director Sam Gilluly, the commander expressed his fondness for the state, recalling to reporters a backpacking trip to Glacier Park which he and his family had taken in 1973, with Governor Judge as host. The moon rock, which weighs one gram, is part of a 2957-gram rock found in the Taurus Littrow Valley, where the final Apollo crew landed with studied accuracy early in December, 1972.

Son of one of Montana's best known cattle ranchers, Walt Coburn was a complex, warm-hearted man whose talent for writing led to a career of more than four decades, during which he produced an average of 600,000 words a year, all of them published. He was called "King of the Pulps," but he was much more than that. He was a Montanan, a dynamo of action, a "hell-raiser" and a gentle introvert. This is his own story, his last testament in print. It should be in the library of every collector of Western Americana.

INITIAL PLANS FIRM FOR FIRST MONTANA HISTORY CONFERENCE

Preliminary plans are now being firmed up for Montana's first state history conference, "Montana and the West: New Directions." Scheduled for October 31 through November 2 at the Colonial Hilton in Helena, the sessions are sponsored by the Council to Preserve Montana History and the Montana Historical Society. The aim is to bring together for the first time professional historians and non-professional "buffs" who share the same love and fascination for Montana history.

Featured speakers at the three-day conference will include noted historian and writer from the University of Colorado, Robert G. Athearn, who is also the book review editor for Montana the Magazine of Western History; Eugene Hollon, noted western historian from the University of Toledo and Paul Francis Prucha, S.J., a noted expert on Indian history, now on leave from Marquette University.

In addition, the conference will feature papers, panel discussions, workshops, and a roundtable discussion. Subjects will include technology and the West, the Indian identity, and new interpretations of Montana history. Workshops will be set to deal with the more practical problems of local historical societies and museums.

HISTORICAL

Although many people think of The Montana Historical Society as "The Museum" or perhaps "The Charlie Russell Gallery" or even a vague place in Helena from which a quarterly journal of history known as MONTANA emerges, its activities and concerns are considerably more diverse. In truth, the Society, Montana's oldest institution, is a many-sided one, growing from a collection of early journals and diaries, stuffed birds and animals and portraits of bearded pioneers in gilt frames, to a complex archival, museum, publications and merchandising operation.

In future issues of THE MONTANA POST, we propose to feature the activities of these various departments, with emphasis on the people who do the work. It will be done in picture as well as word, hopefully in such a way that our readers will be taken, vicariously, behind the scenes—into the stacks, the workrooms, the storage areas.

We start with the Library and Archives in this issue, not only because things have been moving there lately—we mean the word "moving" quite literally—but because it is in the Library that the beginnings of the Society are to be found. It is not the purpose here to go into the total history of the Society's beginnings in February, 1865. It is nonetheless true that legislation creating it was enacted by the first Territorial Legislature which met in the raw mining camp called Bannack that year, a scant nine months after Montana Territory itself was created under the signature of Abraham Lincoln in May, 1864.

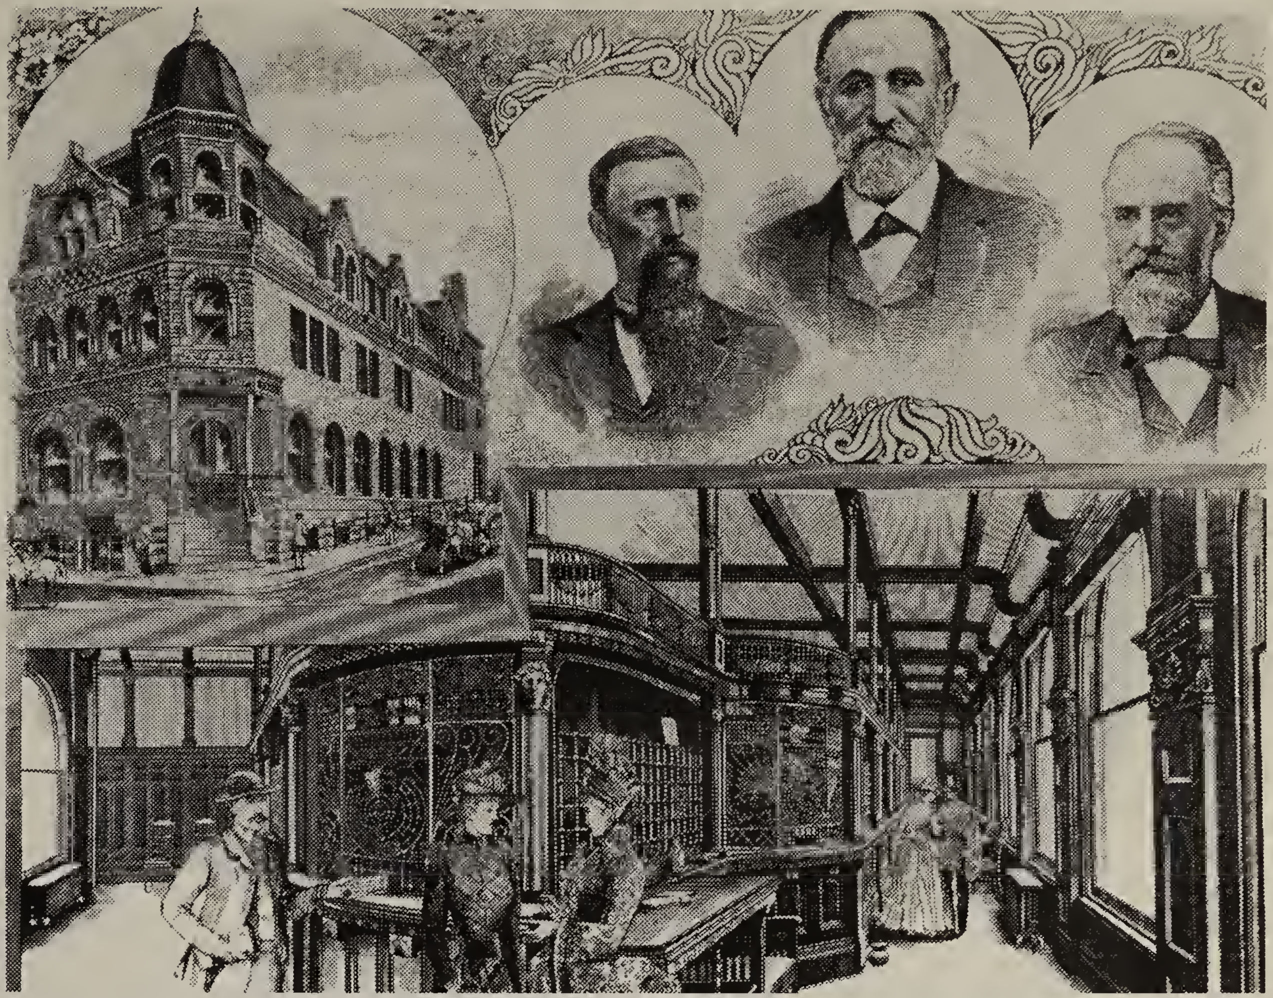
It is also true—and this is very nearly unique for this part of the country—that at this early stage, there were enough concerned people already in the Territory to sense that the documents and records of pre-history and Territorial enactments had better be preserved. Although these early collections were destroyed by fire in 1874, many of the same people realized the need to start collecting all over again. This fresh effort, now a century old, forms the basis of the present library and archival holdings of the Society.

As we said, things have been moving, quite literally, in the Library, headquartered on the second floor of the Society's building across Roberts Street from the capitol. We should add that the Library holdings are stored in five stack levels, and, since our addition was completed in 1971, the archives occupy additional rooms on the ground floor level.

But it is on the second floor that most of the moving has taken place. The volumes in the Genealogy Room, where countless people have found the tracks of Montana forebears, have been reshelved in a patron reference area in the second floor

MONTANANS JOIN TO RESCUE HISTORIC HELENA BUILDING

In 1886, the First National Bank, considered Montana Territory's most solidly successful pioneer banking house, moved into a handsome new stone and pressed brick building on the corner of Main and Grand Streets in Helena. Founded twenty years earlier by Samuel T. Hauser and other prominent Montana pioneers, the bank boasted assets of nearly $3,000,000 when it hired a St. Paul architectural firm to design its new home.



A prideful trio of pioneer Montana businessmen were pictured with their new First National Bank home in this engraving, published in 1890 in HELENA ILLUSTRATED, produced by the city's Board of Trade. President Sam Hauser is flanked on the left by T. H. Kleinschmidt, on the right by E. W. Knight, Sr. Patrons in the lobby admired the same wall and ceiling woodwork still intact in this historic building.

Apparently Hauser, who was by then Territorial Governor, joined with his associates in giving the firm of Hodgson, Wallingford and Stem full freedom to use the somewhat flamboyant architectural license of the day. The result stands today, almost nine decades later, as one of the finest examples of "Romanesque Revival" architecture in the American West. Now known as the Securities Building, it has received top historical and architectural ratings for feasible restoration under Helena's current Urban Renewal program. But it will take dedicated sharing on the part of Montanans to bring it about.

In 1885, the contracting firm, Shaffer and Weller, used native stone as the main building material when construction began. Recent demolition of a building to the north indicates that while some repair and strengthening is needed on the north wall, the stone, mortising and foundation of the entire building are amazingly sound. Wisconsin sandstone used in the beautifully fashioned arches and columns, combined with classic pressed brick, complimented the heavy stone on exterior bearing walls.

Exceptional craftsmanship is evident, especially on the east, south and west walls. The slate mansard roof has also aged gracefully, and a supply of slate is available for necessary replacements.

The interior of the building has deteriorated to some extent, but is structurally sound. Unscathed by time are the original carved woodwork, beams and paneling which embellished the main floor when the prideful First National Bank tellers opened their cages to customers in 1886.

In the present age of inflated costs, it is nostalgic to learn that Hauser and his associates paid only $75,000 for their building. Restoration, which must include an elevator and stairway on the north wall to conform with fire regulations, runs to several times that figure. However, with federal restoration funds available, an initial $90,000 will start the project.

The Montana Historical Society commends to its readers the unselfish efforts of a group of Helena residents who have set up a non-profit committee to save the Securities Building. Shares, at $200 each, are being offered to individuals and groups in Montana. As soon as pledges reach a minimum of $90,000, they will be called in and the work will begin. # SOCIETY LIBRARY AND ARCHIVES: WHERE IT ALL S stacks, and the rapidly expanding photograph archives shifted into their place.

Unusually shaped printed materials always present a storage problem for librarians, who find conventionally bound volumes much easier objects to work with. In the stack storage area, Librarian Harriet Meloy (above) checks the present storage of the Society's map collection. Below, Photo Archivist Lory Morrow, Library Assistant Betty Lindsay, and Cataloger John Mason select pictures for a display of Montana photographers recently prepared for the Library reading room on the second floor.

The Society's photo collection, which dates to the 1870's, chiefly documents Nineteenth and early Twentieth Century Montana, and now numbers some 35,000 pictures. As with many collections, its very size has created problems of storage and retrieval. For many years, needs of the collection and filling requests from it were the responsibility of Miss Bernice Boone, who retired in 1972.

As the photo collection grew (and it grows almost daily) its use also rose dramatically, accountable in part by the proliferation of illustrated books and documentary films about the American West.

The Montana American Revolution Bicentennial Commission allocated federal "seed" money in 1972 for one year to provide for a system of refined cross-referencing. Lory Morrow, a graduate of the University of Montana, was hired to begin the processing. In addition, funds were included to allow for a better system of photo preservation. With ARBC funds limited, the recent legislative session appropriated funds to continue the project.

Photo Archivist Morrow tells us that one of the most recent acquisitions and now in process is a gift from Curley Meek, long active in Montana's oil industry. This collection of pictures documents an oil strike at Cat Creek in Petroleum County in the 1920's and early cable drilling near Shelby. Taken together, these pictures are important to our knowledge of Montana's economy in the earlier years of the present century. This is a period on which the Society will be increasingly focusing in its collecting—and, indeed, publishing—efforts in the years to come.

Chief Librarian Harriett C. Meloy tells us that another neglected area in the Library will be receiving attention this summer through a bequest from the estate of the late Mary K. Dempsey, Chief Librarian at the Society from 1958 until her retirement in 1969. These funds will bring to Helena Ralph Ehrenberg of Washington, D.C., director of the National Archives' cartographic division. He will consult with the staff about storage, preservation and cataloging of maps. Mrs. Meloy pointed out that the Society's map collection, large and important though it is, is virtually unusable without proper organization. The remainder of the bequest will be used to match a grant from Western Interstate Compact for Higher Education (WICHE) to pay a graduate student intern to carry out the actual processing of the maps.

Archivist Brian Cockhill, from his office on the ground floor level, notes an important new acquisition in his department: the Frances D. Logan Papers of Frances Logan Merriam. Well known in Western Montana as an advocate of rights for women and concern for the environment, Mrs. Merriam is a former Democratic National Committeewoman. A substantial portion of the 10 cubic foot collection deals with her involvement in the Knowles-Paradise Dam controversy of the late 1950's and early 1960's over alternate sites for a dam on the Flathead River. The collection also contains material on Mrs. Merriam's long interest in Planned Parenthood.

Cockhill explained that the Merriam collection is intended by the donor to supplement the Lee Metcalf papers, which have been coming to the archives and are now an important part of the Society's manuscript collections, particularly in the field of Twentieth Century politics.

Meanwhile, the library's goal of microfilming every Montana weekly newspaper has been reached. Much of the microfilming of these and other materials is now done on site by Library Assistants Rex Martin and Betty Lindsay. As part of the program, Cockhill and Assistant Archivist Jeff Cunniff have been preparing for filming the minutes of all standing legislative committees.

In the cataloging department, John Mason has quietly launched a pilot project with Harold Chambers, Documents Librarian of the State Library in Helena, designed to save money through centralized cataloging. Mason explains that the cost of individual cataloging of the important reports, papers and other documents distributed by the Montana State Library to its designated depositories is estimated to be $35,000 a year. This project aims to provide cards with the cataloging done at a central location and at a considerable financial saving to the respective libraries, while at the same time allowing improved reference use.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

It is surprising, even in this day of supposed enlightenment, how many whites have opposing attitudes about Indians. I see those who adopt the Noble Red Man concept, a concept which has had its followers for at least a century. There are others who still see the Indian as "Poor Lo," not far removed even yet from the untutored, savage aborigine. It was this attitude, of course, most often espoused a century ago by the most "civilized" among whites. The only answer to the "Indian question" to those of this persuasion was annihilation or total submission to the white man's ways, history and goals.

Just a few months ago, death came to a man who had spent a great deal of his life seeking to show us what his people, the Indians, really were and are. He was James Larpenteur Long, author of THE ASSINIBOINES, based on accounts he had obtained from the "old ones" of his tribe in Northeastern Montana. The book was first published in 1942 under the title LAND OF THE NAKODA.

Jim Long's death came in Hamilton in Western Montana, distant from the Fort Peck Reservation, where his roots were. His credentials for telling the story of the Assiniboines were excellent. As First Boy, he was brought up by his fine halfblood mother, Annie, and his grandmother, First Cloud Woman. He was a descendant of Charles Larpenteur, and sometimes used his name in writing. Larpenteur was for many years the factor in charge at the old fur trading post at Fort Union, located at the confluence of the Yellowstone and Missouri.

THE ASSINIBOINES reveals to us a people who had adopted a logical, honorable and viable way of life on the plains. Their family customs, their government, their religion (and it was deeply experienced) were not as structured as those of the whites. But they were deeply ingrained, and, generally, the grandfather or grandmother spent many hours with the young, inculcating by their stories those customs that kept a great people together.

Jim Long told all of this in his book, and in many other writings, graphically and with a humor which never left him. And he would travel miles to talk to groups of whites, young or old, acting thereby as a sort of ambassador for the Assiniboines—an ambassador who brought understanding to hundreds of us.

Jim was a gentleman and a gentle man who did much to bridge gaps, not only between generations but between races. May his journey to the Spirit World in the east be on pleasant pathways.

ANOTHER SUCCESSFUL RUSSELL SALE

Naah (Pidg) Beery, noted actor and collector of Western Americana, shares a moment of humor with an audience which included Montana Governor Tom Judge at the sixth annual C. M. Russell Auction in Great Falls last month. Forty art dealers from thirteen states were among hundreds who gathered for the event, during which $137,000 in original art sales were chalked up. The C. M. Russell Gallery in Great Falls was presented with a check for $25,000, bringing the total amount donated in six years to $147,000. Now recognized as one of the leading art auctions in the country, the event has been planned and executed through the years by the Advertising Club of Great Falls, which is already planning for March, 1975. A new feature this year, and one that will be continued, was a seminar on collecting western art. The discussion, moderated by Dr. Van Kirke Nelson of Kalispell, featured these well known art experts and collectors: Fred Renner, Washington, D.C., Malcalm Mackay, Jr., Lang Lake, Minn., Bill Sherman, Portland, Ore., and Bob Rackwell, Corning, N. Y.

Daniel J. Clancy, former U.S. Internal Revenue Service official, brings years of experience and a generous supply of Gaelic affability to his new position as head of the Society's accounting department. A native of Butte, he joined the IRS in 1945, after four years of World War II duty with the Air Force. He retired in 1966 for health reasons. During his 21-year career, he worked in a number of capacities, including chief of accounting in the Helena Internal Revenue office. Since 1966, Dan has been employed by the office of Montana's Secretary of State and Industrial Accident Board, and for the past four years has operated an insurance business. He and his wife, Ann, who have resided in Helena since their marriage, have four children, and just before we went to press, welcomed their first two grandchildren.

DEER LODGE PRISON HAS COLORFUL PAST

by CAROLYN J. MATTERN

A special exhibit in the Poindexter Gallery, March 7 to April 29, will feature the artistic talents of the prisoners at Deer Lodge. This exhibit also calls attention to one of the oldest, but also one of the most discussed of Montana's institutions. From its original location in Deer Lodge in 1868 to recent proposals for a new multi-million dollar "campus" facility, the legislature, the public, and the prisoners themselves have found the fortress-like facility to be a source of continuing debate.

Because plans for the prison were launched when Montana was still a territory, construction and operational expenses were borne by the Federal government. In 1868 the Secretary of the Interior designated a warden-elect and ordered him to select a site in Deer Lodge, then one of the most important towns in the territory. In addition to the purchase price of $500, in 1869 the government appropriated $50,000 for construction of a prison building. On July 2, 1871, the Mansard-style building received the first of its twelve prisoners, and U.S. Marshall B. F. Wheeler was designated as the prison's first warden.

In 1873, Montana Territory requested financial responsibility for the prison, but operation of the facility proved so expensive that the federal government was forced to resume control in 1874. Until statehood, Montana paid only an annual fee of $1 for the care of its territorial prisoners.

Wheeler, who also resumed his position in 1874, indicated that concern over the nature of the prison existed quite early. A report of 1877 notes the bleakness of prison existence and the absence of any constructive efforts at rehabilitation. Wheeler felt the great misfortune to the prisoners was that Deer Lodge was too small to afford any employment opportunities. (There had been, however, a limited amount of such labor during the territory's administration.) He also bemoaned the fact that there was little reading matter for the prisoners, and that religious services could only be offered irregularly.

Deer Lodge Prison seen about the turn of the century.

When the state of Montana assumed responsibility in 1889, it instituted a contract system to care for the prisoners. The firm of Conley and McTague won the first bid for 74 cents per prisoner per day, and Frank Conley became the new warden, a position which he held for over 30 years. The outstanding figure in the history of the prison, Frank Conley, strongly influenced the institution's progressive development. However, later accused of stealing funds from the state, Conley was also one of the prison's most enigmatic and controversial figures.

Despite limited appropriations, Conley was determined to make Deer Lodge, which was then still a single stone building, a few log outbuildings, and a wooden stockade, into a model penal institution. In his first years he replaced the fence with a stone wall, and in 1896 constructed an enlarged cell house and separate womens' quarters. Although state law forbade prisoners working outside the walls, Conley minimized the expense to the state by employing prison labor. To minimize the worst aspects of convict labor, Conley introduced an honor system.

130 YEAR OLD PRISON SAW LABOR CAMPS, RIOTS

First prison building and yard erected by Federal government.

Despite Conley's efforts to develop a far-sighted and humanitarian penal program, it is clear that life at Deer Lodge was not easy in the 1890's. By law each prisoner's hair was shaved upon arrival, he bathed once a week in cold or tepid water, and wore the characteristic striped uniform. Unnecessary talking was forbidden and correspondence was severely limited. Although corporal punishment was absolutely forbidden, in 1899, 176 prisoners spent a total of 1327 days in darkened, solitary cells, eating only bread and water. In addition four prisoners spent six months each in chains. Attempts at rehabilitation were at best haphazard; although religious services were required, the prison school provided only English language instruction, and this by the prisoners themselves. The 1899 report states there were 328 prisoners at Deer Lodge that year, including "1 Aeronaut, 1 Actor, 1 Baseball player, 1 Pugilist, and 4 Gamblers."

In 1908 the State terminated the contract maintanence system and assumed direct control. Conley, who apparently had a great deal of influence in Helena, was reappointed warden. Conley had already exercised this influence in 1893 to prevent moving the prison to Billings.

Almost immediately Conley encountered difficulties because of the state's lack of funds and the large increase in the number of inmates. As a result, in 1909 the state passed a law in effect validating the system of prison labor already instituted by Conley, as well as permitting labor within the prison. Although organized labor strenuously protested this entry into the free labor market, during the second decade of the century as much as 50% of the prison population was employed on these work projects. Generally limited to projects of direct benefit to the state, these projects were responsible for the construction of miles of Montana roads, several new buildings at Warm Springs and Galen, and well as most of the new construction at the prison. In 1911 the prisoners enlarged the stone enclosure, built a bridge and a power plant, and in 1912 they built the new 200 cell prison from bricks also manufactured at the prison.

During the Progressive era when prison reform became a national concern, Conley was in the forefront of the movement in Montana. Although skeptical of many of the reformers' schemes, he was adamant in supporting his parole and honor systems against criticism. While other states chained their road gangs, Conley's honor camps lived in tents, unchained, and their guards unarmed. In 1910 he abolished stripes, and at a time when few prisons had movies, he found that deprivation of attendance at the films constituted the prison's most effective form of punishment.

Conley was apparently also farsighted in his theory of criminal behavior; he speculated that 50% of the prisoners required mental treatment rather than imprisonment, and that early home training was crucial in preventing antisocial behavior. He repeatedly stressed the importance of maintaining each prisoners' identity and of providing useful work. Thus Conley's tenure saw a constant expansion in number and variety of recreational and work programs.

In 1921 Conley was forced from his position for political reasons and brought to trial for embezzlement of funds owed the state. Although he was acquitted, the following years witnessed the gradual termination of most of Conley's programs. By the 1930's all forms of out-of-prison labor were ended, and a strict silent system was reinstated. In order to make the prison, increasingly self supporting, the employment programs at the prison were expanded.

During the 1950's much of the public discussion of the prison focused upon the political appointment of the warden and the high turn over rate of the prison staff. In 1957 a bloodless riot partially corrected this situation. In 1959 the second riot in the prison's history was put down by National Guardsmen. This time several prisoners and a deputy warden were killed, and the resulting public outcry brought to light deteriorating conditions within the prison. Despite an almost universal feeling that the century old prison complex was inadequate, the discussion over the nature of a modern institution and its function within society continues as a topic of debate into the present.

ST. MARY'S – FORT OWEN DEED OF SALE, MONTANA'S FIRST LEGAL DOCUMENT PRESENTED TO MANUSCRIPTS LIBRARY

On November 5, 1850, Father Joseph Joset, representing the Jesuit fathers, sold their holdings in the Flathead Indian country of the Bitterroot Valley to trader John Owen. This bill of sale, which is the first legal document in present-day Montana, was a recent gift to the Historical Society from State Senator and Mrs. William Bertsche. More importantly, however, the simple document marks the transition between two phases in the settlement of Montana.

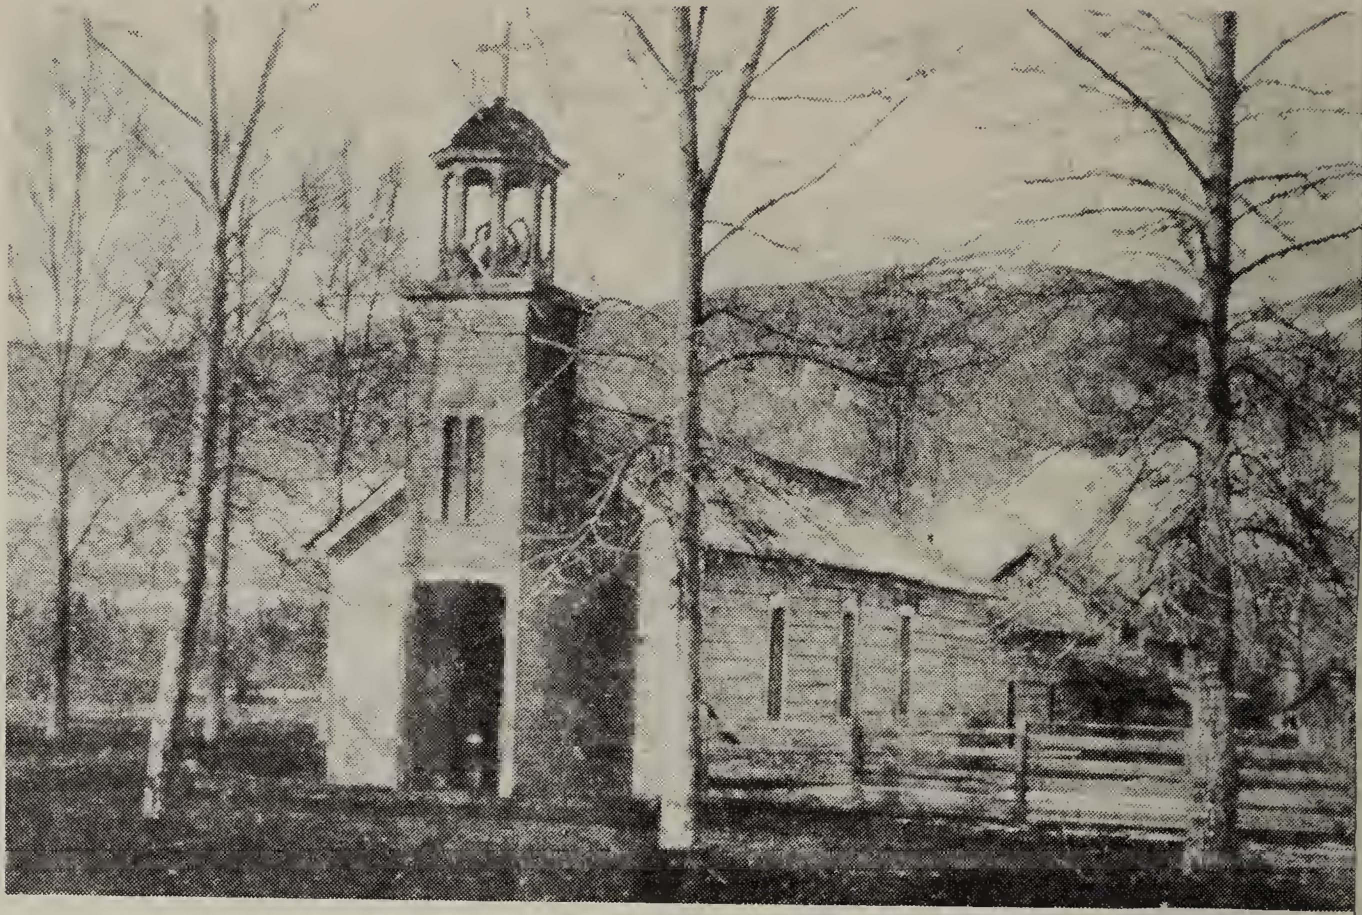
Among the first white men to penetrate the unexplored Northwest, the Jesuit missionary Father Pierre Jean DeSmet arrived in the Bitterroot Valley in 1840, invited by Flathead Indians who had heard of the religion of the "Black Robes." In 1841 DeSmet returned with two Jesuit fathers, Gregory Mengarini and Nicolas Point, and three lay brothers to found St. Mary's Mission near present-day Stevensville. In the log church which they built, the brothers carried on religious instruction while also introducing the Flatheads to agricultural pursuits. After DeSmet's promotion in 1843, his work was ably carried on under the leadership of Father Antony Ravalli.



St. Mary's Mission Church near Stevensville, circa 1880.

Despite the fathers' good intentions, the mission began to have some harmful effects upon the Indians. Traders attracted to the mission, often offset the fathers' influence. More importantly, the Indians began moving away from the mission area in search of the buffalo herds. Thus it was with a sense of defeat that the mission was closed and sold to trader-Indian agent John Owen in 1850.

On a site near the mission, Owen established his trading post which soon became an isolated center of civilization in the wilderness. In its prime during the 1850's and early 1860's Fort Owen was famous for the hospitality which it offered to the numerous trail-worn travellers who paused there on their way west.

In 1866 Father Ravalli returned to reopen the mission to the Flatheads. A new mission church was reconstructed on the site of the old church, and the complex enlarged to include a blacksmith shop and a hospital-pharmacy. However social forces again took a hand in the history of St. Mary's Mission. During the 1880's the influx of whites into the valley forced the Indians out, and soon after the remaining Flatheads under Chief Charlot were moved to the reservation in the Jocko Valley in 1891, the mission was closed for a second time.

This time, fortunately, the mission was not totally forgotten. As early as 1922 the Jesuits and interested citizens began the efforts which still continue to restore the old church in commemoration of the site's significance to early Montana history.

OPEN HOUSE ATTRACTS GUESTS, LEGISLATORS

At the annual Historical Society Open House on January 18, 1974, guests and legislators had an opportunity to view Montana both past and present through the photographer's eyes. Greeted by hostesses in authentic Victorian costume, visitors looked first at Montana Past. In the lobby a slide show projected from the Library balcony highlighted the holdings of the Library's photographic archives and challenged the guests' memories. In the Library Reading Room an exhibit developed by Lory Morrow, Photographic Archivist, in conjunction with the museum staff featured four prominent 19th Century Montana photographers. Focus of the exhibit was a recreation of the "City Photography Gallery" of Helena photographer Edgar H. Train, including a display of the development of photographic equipment and techniques. Train whose early awareness of the artistic nature of photography is evidenced in his business cards, "E. H. Train . . . Artist," captured on film Helena's early days as a roaring gold mining camp. Later his work turned toward portraiture, reflecting the young town's growing urban pretensions.

Director Sam Gilluly and hostesses Joanne Korte and Nancy Dennis.

Also featured was the work of Evelyn Cameron, Fred E. Miller, and L. A. Huffman. Mrs. Cameron, a most remarkable woman, was married to the son of a British earl and was frequently referred to as "Lady Cameron." She and her husband visited Montana on a honeymoon hunting trip in 1889 and were so impressed that they returned to settle in the Marsh-Terry area where Mrs. Cameron soon became an enthusiastic participant in ranch life. Her sensitive photography features the sheep rancher's life and the bleak, but beautiful eastern Montana homestead frontier.

Fred E. Miller, who spent most of his life in Montana working for the Federal government, was, nevertheless, a trained photographer, and he left behind a small but precious legacy. Although the majority of his work is now lost, most of that still in existence dates from the period at the turn of the century when Miller served as land clerk at the Crow Agency. These photographs clearly reflect his concern and attachment to the Crow people.

L. A. Huffman, one of the best known of the early Montana photographers, graphically preserved many aspects of frontier life. Huffman first came to Montana as post photographer for Fort Keogh. Later residing in Miles City, Huffman caught on film dramatic scenes of cattle ranching and cowboy life, as well as life on the frontier military posts. His remarkable Indian portraits and his studies of buffalo slaughter, in particular, have won him lasting reknown among photographic historians.

Highlighting the evening was the opening of an exhibition in the Poindexter Gallery of the photography of Garry Wunderwald, currently one of the state's top professionals. A Great Falls native, Wunderwald is photographer-writer for the Montana State Advertising Unit of the Highway Deaprtment. His work, both in color and in black and white, ranks him as a true creative artist with a camera.

Wunderwald graduated from Shattuck School in Faribault, Minnesota, and from Montana State University, where he majored in history and minored in photography. Joining the staff of the Highway Department in 1965, his work has ranged through all aspects of photography. His work has appeared in highway information and technical publications and in publications of the Montana Historical Society. In his position with the State Advertising Unit, which he has held since 1971, he has photographed wildlife and landscapes for national advertising. His current exhibition in the Poindexter Gallery features breathtaking color photography displayed in natural setting. Many photographs were taken using a telescopic lense, providing a close-up not only of the grandeur of Montana's outdoor wonderland, but also of Garry Wunderwald—artist with a camera.

In addition to the special photography exhibits, all Society departments and the museum were open for tours with the assistance of the Society staff, and in the office wing lobby, transformed into a Victorian drawing room by the museum staff, hot cider and doughnuts were served to the many guests to conclude an enjoyable and informative evening.

The Accreditation Commission of the American Association of Museums announced November 30, 1973, that the museum of the Montana Historical Society was among twenty-one museums newly identified as meeting the standards of operation established by the museum profession. This evaluation was made, Director Sam Gilluly said, after a rigorous examination by the AAM, including completion of a detailed questionnaire, on-site investigations of the museum's operation by a visiting committee, and final review by the full committee in Washington, D.C.

Noting that the Society's museum was the first to be so recognized in Montana, Gilluly commented that the value of accreditation is that it helps serve the ever-increasing cultural and educational demands of the public by aiding the museum to measure its performance.

To date, the two year old accreditation program of the AAM, which is supported by the Smithsonian Institution and the Rockefeller Brothers Foundation under authority of the National Museum Act, has found 284 museums throughout the United States and Canada to meet its rigorous standards of quality.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

In this issue we have a guest columnist —Mike Reynolds of Hamilton. He brings us news of the activities of another organization interested in historic preservation in Montana. Mike Reynolds is presently a member of the Board of Directors of the Custer Battlefield Historical and Museum Association, Inc., and Chairman of its Custer Battle Centennial Committee. He is the son of the late Major S. G. Reynolds, who was Agent of the Crow Indians from 1902 to 1910. Last year, he became a member of the Council on Abandoned Military Posts—U.S.A., and was authorized by Col. Herbert M. Hart, its National Secretary, to form a Montana Department of the Council. Below, Mike Reynolds describes what it is doing and what it hopes to do in Montana. We of the Montana Historical Society welcome another group to the field of historic preservation, for certainly our policies and goals are in consonance with it.

The Council on Abandoned Military Posts —U.S.A. was founded in 1966 as a non-profit corporation whose members are interested in the identification, location, restoration, preservation, and memorialization of old military installations and their history and traditions. Chapters are being formed in the towns near the old fort sites.

The Council is presently interested in the reconstruction of old Fort C. F. Smith situated on the old Bozeman Trail south of Hardin and the preservation of historic buildings at Fort Keogh, near present day Miles City. CAMP is also interested in locating and marking other original fort sites in Montana. All persons sharing this interest are invited to join without restriction, and should contact Mike Reynolds, P.O. Box 429, Hamilton, Montana 59840.

NEW MUSEUM ACQUISITIONS

The Historical Society has recently received several important, new additions to its collection of contemporary Western art. The Julius C. Peters Jr. Foundation of Great Falls has presented "Fresh Snow," a fine protrayal of western wildlife by Leslie H. Peters, a Great Falls artist. Peters, whose work includes the backdrop paintings for several dioramas in the Society's formal museum, is widely known for his realistic depictions of Montana scenery and wildlife.

An anonymous donor has presented two Indian portraits, "No. 2 Portrait of Both Striking Woman" and "No. 48 Portrait of Weasel Trail" and loaned two others—"Double Steel and Two Cutter" and "Chief Shot on Both Sides." All four are the work of German-born artist Winold Reiss who has exhibited in the galleries of the Montan Historical Society.

KORTE NAMED MUSEUM CURATOR

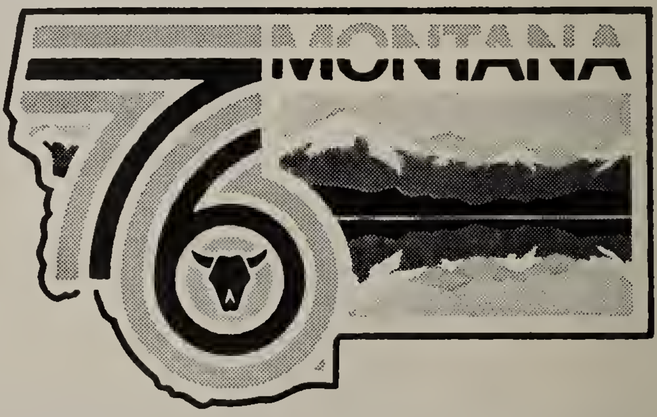
Kenneth L. Korte, who has an extensive background in history, art, and interpretive museum work throughout the West, recently joined the Historical Society staff as Curator of the museum. Korte has been most recently associated with Western Interpretive Services of Sheridan, Wyoming, a professional firm involved in planning, layout, and construction of interpretive work and art. In this capacity, he did layout and construction on such projects as a new mining room wing of the Arizona Historical Society in Tucson, McNary dam in Oregon, Bear Creek Recreation Area in Montana, South Pass Historical Mining Area in Wyoming, Ash Hollow State Park in Nebraska, and Chief Joseph Dam in Washington.

A native of Torrington, Wyoming, Korte received an A.A. degree from Eastern Wyoming College and a B.S. degree in education, with a major in art and a minor in history from Chadron College in Nebraska.

After teaching art in Nebraska schools, Korte worked for ten years with the National Park Service as an exhibit and interpretive specialist at Fort Laramie National Historic Site, Sheridan, Wyoming. At Fort Laramie, Korte was involved in restoration, cataloging and installation of furnishings in historic buildings; design and construction of visitor center exhibits; development of lectures for visiting groups, developing interpretive tours and training docents; and illustration and design of brochures and pamphlets, In addition to teaching ceramics, sculpture, oil and watercolor painting, and commercial art, Korte was also involved with adult education and a local artists' guild.

BICENTENNIAL DISPLAYS ATTRACTIVE NEW LOGO



Correspondence from the office of Bicentennial Commission Director Hal Stearns has recently born a distinctive new logo. Designed for the Montana Bicentennial Commission by Helena artist Frank Holub, the design is printed in red, white, and blue, and is indicative of the Treasure State. The "76" symbol of the Bicentennial incorporates famed Montana painter Charles M. Russell's trademark—the buffalo skull. A mountain and lake scene was also protrayed as most representative of Montana, whose name comes from the Latin adjective for "mountainous."

The Montana Bicentennial Commission will soon issue a limited number of special commemorative envelopes bearing a sketch of Fort Benton and a Bicentennial stamp along with a rare Lewis and Clark three cent stamp issued 20 years age. Of great interest to stamp collectors, the distinctive envelopes will be sold for $1 and will soon be available from the Bicentennial Commission, Historical Society Building, Helena, Montana 59601.

The Commission also plans to issue subsequent commemorative envelopes with other rare stamps, such as Statehood, Louisiana Purchase, Chief Joseph, Northwest Territory, Washington Territory, and Oregon Territory issues. A very limited number of envelopes will bear the rare post mark of Camp Baker which existed as a military post in the 1870's. Proceeds from these sales will go toward providing funds for Bicentennial projects in Montana. To date the Commission has provided $40,000 in matching fund monies to a number of Montana communities, and is awaiting further funding.

AN ERA'S END: COLUMBIA GARDENS GONE

by CAROLYN J. MATTERN

NOV 26 1973

When Columbia Gardens, Butte's historic entertainment resort, opened on Labor Day for the final day of the 1973 season, the atmosphere was charged with more nostalgia than gaiety, for it was more than the end of a season. Everyone knew that after nearly a century of giving pleasure to people of all ages, but especially to children, Columbia Gardens would soon disappear forever into anticipated expansions of the Anaconda Company's mining operations in Butte.

Columbia Garden's history as an amusement park dates to within a decade or so of Butte's own colorful beginnings. In 1876, one William Adams located a beer garden, dance hall, and race track in a natural canyon amphitheatre in the mountains near Butte, and named it Columbia Gardens in honor of the nation's 100th anniversary. Although the Gardens consisted of only a few rustic buildings, during the 1880's and 1890's Butte miners and their families found it an enjoyable diversion from day to day life in "the greatest mining camp in the world."

Before the turn of the century, Butte developed into the greatest metropolis in Montana, but unfortunately it also assumed the worst aspects of an urban community. This, coupled with the noxious fumes from nearby copper smelters, virtually destroyed vegetation for a considerable distance from the town. Priding itself on the modernity of its civic institutions, this situation was an increasing source of embarrassment to the growing city.

In 1899, William A. Clark, one of Butte's famous copper barons, was sufficiently disturbed by the sight of children playing in the streets that he determined to provide a beautiful spot where youngsters "might commune with nature in all her primeval holiness." After investigating a number of possible locations, he purchased Columbia Gardens, and set about establishing his park.

Although his battles with fellow copper king Marcus Daly are notorious for the bribery and political corruption involved, in this effort Clark seems to have been entirely sincere and high-minded in his desire to improve the community that had enriched him. Like many turn-of-the-century urban reformers, Clark expected the pastoral atmosphere of the park not only to beautify the community, but to have a beneficial moral and spiritual effect on residents of all ages.

A balloon ascension was one feature of a day crowded with activities when this panoramic view of Columbia Gardens was taken at the height of its glory. Seen are many of the facilities, including a zoo, picnic grounds, roller coaster and countless other rides to gladden the small fry, a dance pavilion, promenade and other delights for their elders.

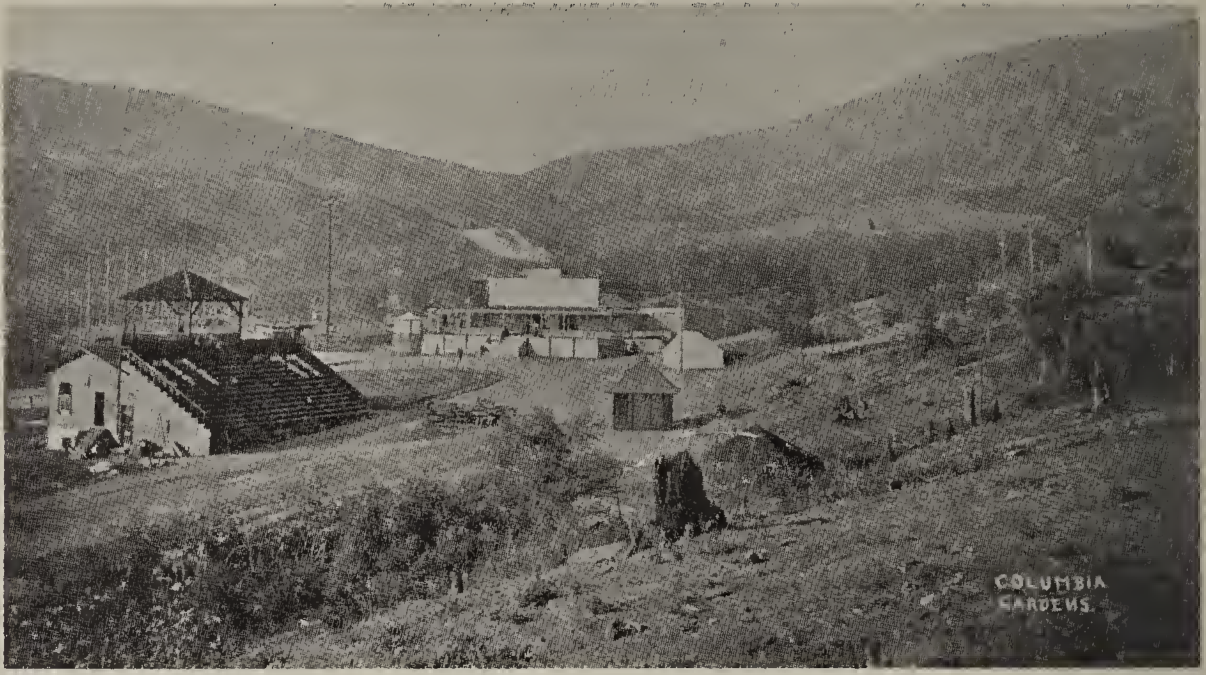
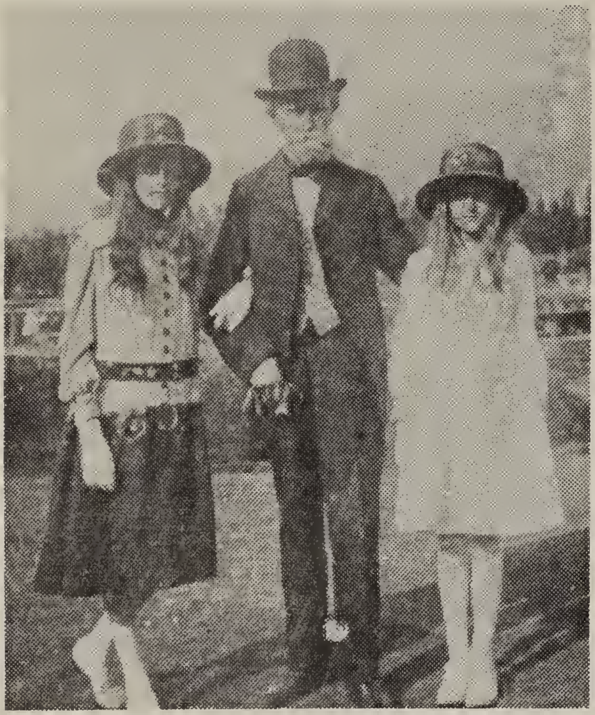
COLUMBIA GARDENS, WILLIAM A. CLARK'S PASTORA



COLUMBIA GARDENS AS IT LOOKED BEFORE DEVELOPMENT

William A. Clark considered the Gardens as his personal hobby, lavishing $100,000 of his private fortune on it during the first three years of operation. In addition, he stipulated that all profits from his Butte Electric Railway Company, which was charged with administration of the facility, be spent on improvements, and that admission to all attractions be completely free for children. In later years, Clark maintained his personal interest in the project, and many of the attractions were of his own conception.



W. A. CLARK AND HIS DAUGHTERS, pictured at the recreation mecca on which the copper baron lavished both time and money.

From its beginning the children of Butte (and their parents), frequently numbering as many as 30,000 on a single day, flocked to the grounds, where the pastoral atmosphere carried "the pleasure seeker's thoughts away to rural and sweet country life." Quickly earning a reputation as the Beauty Spot of the Rockies, Columbia Gardens, civic leaders testified, made Butte a desirable place to live. Nor was this a mere reflection of civic pride, for visitors noted that the Gardens were comparable to any resort in "the States."

Truly an inviting park, Columbia Gardens' landscaping was a charming combination of rusticity and Victorian formalism. According to Clark's instructions, it was designed to offer something for every age and class—or, as a turn-of-the-century observer quipped, "all the chaste spots and pleasures made possible by the achievements of modern art and invention."

Located on a sloping hill and topped by two towers and floating flags, the original Main Building dominated the grounds. This building was reached by means of a wide stairway on both the east and west sides. Running the entire length of the building was a wide veranda which led to a semi-circular balcony where Butte's famed Boston and Montana Band held open-air concerts. In case of inclement weather the first floor provided shelter. It also housed a first class restaurant, the Gardens Cafe. For those seeking a less elegantly served meal, there was the Morris and Company Ice Cream Parlor whose handsome fountain was "only exceeded in attractiveness by the young ladies that served its contents."

The top floor of the Main Building, with its 130 x 80-foot dance floor, was reputedly one of the finest in the Northwest. On evenings when dances were held, hanging baskets of flowers and thousands of Japanese lanterns and incandescent lights decorated the pavilion while hundreds of couples whirled to orchestral music. In 1907 the original pavilion burned, but it was replaced in 1908 by an even larger and more imposing structure.

The entire grounds, which grew from 20 acres to 80 acres, were handsomely landscaped by a professional horticultural staff. Although thousands of flowers were planted in formal flowerbeds representing flowers, butterflies, and other artistic designs, and hundreds of transplanted Balm of Gilead trees marched along the garden paths, the overall landscaping effect was one of undisturbed nature.

Pathways followed rippling streams through the woods to bowers and nooks where picturesque pagodas invited strollers to pause for conversation. In other areas, benches and tables were provided so picnickers might "unpack their hampers of eatables." For the hardy, access was provided through nearby gorges to mountain trails.

Although there was much to amuse the adults (some, no doubt, bemoaned the prohibition against alcohol on the premises), Columbia Gardens was really a wonderland designed for the delight of children. Every Thursday, it celebrated a tradition conceived by W. A. Clark—Children's Day. On this day of days, Butte youngsters could make the 30-minute trolley ride to the grounds for free. There, near the Main Building, they found a children's playground with swings, slides, and "purveyors to physical exercise and culture."

A GALA SUNDAY AFTERNOON AT THE GARDENS

L DREAM FOR BUTTE, WAS FUN FOR EVERYONE, BUT ES

Until 1934, a favored attraction was the zoo and menagerie, where Mac, the cinnamon bear, and Mike, the talking parrot, were the childrens' favorites. A large Moorish-style building housed the aquarium, fish hatchery, and greenhouses, and on the man-made lake, children might enjoy swimming and boating.

By far the most popular of the early attractions, however, were the chutes. Although declared entirely safe, chuting the chutes was a highly exhilarating experience. "All those who have shot the chutes," one contemporary observer reported, "unite in saying that the sensation produced delirious little thrills that chase themselves up and down the chute-shooter's spinal column in curves and spirals and zigzags, and a few rides make an old man young and invariably charm the girls. Visitors to the Gardens will find a ride down the chutes a better restorative of youth than Brown-Sequard's elixir or Ponce de Leon's spring."

ALL ABOARD FOR CHILDREN'S DAY—FOR FREE

Butte Miners' Day at Columbia Gardens invariably meant the dri test (above) and an appearance by the famed Boston and Mont conducted by Sam Treloar, center front.

Later Clark added other rides, including a merry-go-round and a roller coaster. Children also enjoyed sports events at the Gardens' outstanding baseball stadium, as well as Levy's moving pictures, McKenzie's picture machines, Seymour's phonographs, and Newman's shooting gallery.

Over the years, Columbia Gardens established itself as an integral part of civic life in Butte. It attracted throngs of miners for the annual miners' union outings. Public addresses such as the one by President Theodore Roosevelt in 1903 were held in the attractive surroundings, and during the Big Band era, such nationally known groups as Guy Lombardo, Tommy Dorsey, and Harry James drew crowds from all over the Northwest. Other events held at the Gardens ranged from rodeos and sports events to ladies' luncheons and religious gatherings.

Away from the excitement and along the Garden walkways, a place for picking wild flowers and opening a picnic basket.

ECIALLY FOR KIDS

In 1928, the Clark estate sold the Gardens to the Anaconda Company, which made numerous improvements and modernizations. In 1962, control was transferred to the Columbia Gardens Foundation, through which the Anaconda Company served as sole financial support. Faced with rising costs and a proliferation of other forms of entertainment during the 1960's and early 1970's, operating the Gardens became an increasing financial burden. Robert Corbett, president of the Foundation, estimated that by 1973 the Gardens operated at an annual loss of $50,000.00.

Faced with this situation, the Anaconda Company began exploratory drilling tests in the area, and rumors were rife that a new pit was to be opened. These rumors were confirmed by Robert C. Weed, president of Anaconda's Primary Metals Division in an address to a Butte civic group on February 22, 1973. Although reaffirming the company's dedication to the interests of the community, he announced that the Gardens were to be closed at the end of the 1973 season to make way for an expansion of pit mining.

The legality of the sale of the mineral rights by the Foundation to the company stirred considerable comment among Butte residents, for a local tradition persisted that a provision of Clark's will prohibited the use of the Columbia Gardens tract for anything save recreation. They pointed to a court decision during the 1950's to substantiate their claims. The precise nature of William A. Clark's final wishes, however, remained obscure. In the absence of any concrete evidence to the contrary, opponents of the plan were unable to mount a counteroffensive, and the company proceded with its plans. On September 5, 1973, Butte's Columbia Gardens became a memory.

AUNT JULIA, BELOVED OF HER TRIBE, LIVED OUT A CENTURY

Julia Ereaux Schulz, whose lifetime encompassed more than a century of Montana history, died August 21 at a nursing home at Malta, where she had been a resident for the last three and a half years. This daughter of a French-Canadian father and Gros Ventre Indian mother was known as Aunt Julia by hundreds who came to know her for her unselfish devotion to the heritage as well as the health and welfare of her tribe.

As we go to press, we are informed that the personal collection of this remarkable Indian woman, much of it consisting of artifacts and other material relating to the Gros Ventre tribe, will come to the Historical Society for processing and display.

Julia Schulz was born in Augusta, Montana on September 2, 1872, the daughter of Lazure Ereaux and Mary Standing Bull. As a child, she attended St. Peter's Mission school and Augusta grade school. When she was 15 years old, in 1887, her family settled in the Bear Paw Mountains near Havre, and as a teen-ager, Julia assisted with the instruction of Indian children at St. Paul's Mission at Hayes, located in the Little Rockies in Eastern Montana. This was the area which was to be her home for so many years. In 1890, she married Al Schulz and they settled on a ranch on Peoples Creek, near Dodson.

AUNT JULIA AT AGE 100

Throughout her life, Julia Schulz maintained a deep interest and concern for Indians, particularly the Gros Ventre tribe. She served as a member of the tribal council for three years—an unusual distinction for a woman—and was state and district chairman of the Indian welfare committee of the Montana Federation of Women's Clubs of which she was a life member.

Much of Mrs. Schulz's work for Indians was concerned with matters of health. In 1972 she was honored for 50 years of volunteer service to the National Tuberculosis and Respiratory Disease Association.

During the 1930's she attempted, on her own initiative, to lessen the hardship among the Indians on the Ft. Belknap Reservation with instructions on gardening and food preserving, as well as gathering used clothing for distribution on the reservation. From 1936 to 1942 she headed a WPA project that was chiefly responsible for reviving dying arts and crafts among Indians.

Schulz died in 1950, and although she had no children of her own, Aunt Julia continued to provide a home for several nieces and nephews, both related and "adopted."

TWO JOIN STAFF OF HISTORICAL LIBRARY

The Library staff was strengthened in September with the arrival of Delores J. (Lory) Morrow, who will work in the photo collections, and Rex A. Martin, who will assist in general library work. Three people, who have been with the Library during student days, have left to resume studies. They include Rick Davenport, who spent his entire high school career working part-time, and has enrolled at the University of Montana at Missoula; Edrie Vinson, a recent honor graduate of Helena's Carroll College, who will undertake graduate work at Montana State at Bozeman, and Marjorie Virostko, a senior in library science at the Missoula campus.

REX MARTIN and LORY MORROW

Lory Morrow brings enthusiasm and experience to the Society's picture archives. She has had several years of experience in archival work, both as a processer and researcher. She has worked in the University of Montana Archives, and during the summer of 1973 served as Acting Archivist. During 1972 she was a researcher for the Society's museum on the lumber industry in Montana.

Rex Martin, a native of Ponchatoula, Louisiana, attended St. Johns College in Santa Fe, and was an honor graduate from Helena's Carroll College in 1973. His senior thesis was entitled "Russo-Finnish Relations, 1937-1947." He hopes to continue his studies in European diplomatic history on the graduate level.

SECOND ART RENDEZVOUS APPLAUDED

The Society's second annual Rendezvous of Western Art attracted hundreds of art patrons and guests as the month-long show officially opened Saturday, September 15, with a full day of activities. First on the agenda was a brunch at Helena's historic Montana Club, with participating artists meeting visitors on an informal basis.

PAUL ROSSI

The development of western art as historical documentation and comment was traced by Paul A. Rossi of Tucson, Arizona, who appeared as guest lecturer in the afternoon. Former director of Tulsa's Gilcrease Institute, Rossi is not only an authority on western art and history but is a talented artist and sculptor. His illustrated talk covered a broad spectrum of art in the western genre, from the very early delineators of the Southwest through the greats of this century.

Director Sam Gilluly, who introduced Rossi, later presented Carl C. Seltzer of Great Falls for some nostalgic and humorous remarks about his father, the late Olaf C. Seltzer, honored artist for this year's show.

BOB ROCKWELL

Showing and sale of works by fifteen contemporary western artists, a number of whom were present, officially opened in the evening, with Society President Wilbur P. Werner of Cut Bank presiding. There were remarks by Robert Rockwell of Corning, New York, this year's honorary chairman, greetings from the State of Montana by Lt. Gov. E. W. (Bill) Christiansen, and brief remarks by Mr. Seltzer and Mrs. Elizabeth Lochrie of Butte, the first woman artist to be represented in the Rendezvous series. Present again this year were Malcolm Mackay, Jr. of Long Lake, Minn., last year's honorary chairman, and Olaf Wieghorst of El Cajon, Calif., honored artist in 1972.

Participating artists included Bill Bender, Oro Grande, Calif.; J. Shirly Bothum, Clarkston, Wash.; Robert MacD Graham, Jr., Kansas City, Mo.; Glen S. Hopkinson, Cody, Wyo.; Harold Hopkinson, Byron, Wyo.; Mrs. Lochrie of Butte; Les Peters, Great Falls; Don Prechtel, Creswell, Ore.; Cecil A. Smith, Kalispell, Mont.; John D. Free, Pawhuska, Okla.; LeRoy Greene, Billings; Gary Schildt and Bob Scriver, both of Browning, Mont., and Irvin (Shorty) Shope of Helena.

Sales of art began briskly during the evening after the gallery was formally opened, with Dorothea Neath and Betty Tarvin of the merchandise staff in charge. The entire show, which remained hanging through October 15, produced the sale of fourteen pieces, including oils, water colors and sculpture.

Plans are already underway for the 1974 Rendezvous, which promises to grow in both participation and attendance.

HISTORY DISCUSSIONS EVINCE WIDE INTEREST

For five weeks, beginning October 18, two young historians from Montana State University, Profs. Mike Malone and Richard Roeder, have delighted and instructed large audiences at the Highway Department auditorium on the capitol campus with lectures and discussions about Montana history. The last in the series, sponsored by the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Helena Branch of the American Association of University Women and the Society docents, was held November 15. The topic: the New Deal and World War II. Others have been on Territorial politics, Populism of the 1890's, the Homestead Era, and World War I.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

Grotto Foundation of Saint Paul, Minnesota, has made a grant of $3,000 to the Montana Historical Society to further activities of the Montana Young Historian movement in conjunction with the University of Montana. Good news indeed.

The grant will assure publication for the current school year of The Montana Historian, a publication that prints selected original research papers by high school pupils. It will also assure prizes for the 1973-74 school year in the annual writing contest, again for high school students, which provides most of the papers published in The Montana Historian.

The mini-magazine is a lively and interesting production, in which Vivian Paladin, editor of the Society's own MONTANA, The Magazine of Western History, and Dale L. Johnson, University of Montana archivist, collaborate.

The Young Historian program is not new in the United States, and is a project sponsored by many state historical societies. It was pioneered in Texas, where it is indeed an important aspect of activity at high school level.

The idea first came into being in Montana a few years ago, and was launched with a grant to the University of Montana from the Hill Family Foundation of Saint Paul. When this grant was exhausted, funds to keep publication and program going were given the past year by the Montana American Revolution Bicentennial Commission. Now, we are given life for another year by the Grotto Foundation grant, which was initially approved by A. A. Heckman, Foundation Secretary.

To us in the business of history, the involvement of young people in local lore is a needful and beneficial movement. Too often, history—and especially local and state history—is a neglected field of the humanities at secondary level.

Young historians can be organized on an extra-curricular basis in any high school. And club activities, not necessarily limited to writing, can be fun. We all hope the movement will become permanent in our state.

—SAM GILLULY

The ten-minute strip, produced by Montana Film Productions of Helena, is designed to prepare students of elementary or secondary age for a visit to the Society's museum, galleries, and library.

"Probably 30,000 Montana students visit the museum annually," Director Sam Gilluly says, "many of whom come without any fore-knowledge or idea of what they will see or what it signifies. The strip will be helpful to classroom instructors in preparing for a tour."

The film is accompanied by descriptive tape, and both may be borrowed by any school in Montana for the cost of return postage only.

Director Sam added that guided tours, although on Winter hours of 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., are still available Monday through Friday by advance appointment.

TRAIL OF 1973 LEWIS AND CLARK EXPLORERS LED TO HELENA AND A CONFAB WITH EXPERTS

Late in August, the Historical Society was visited by four of the five young men who, as the 1973 Lewis and Clark Expedition, were retracing the explorers' 4,500-mile trek. The group included Robert Miller, 23, an Albuquerque photographer; Gary Kimsey, 23, a writer and photographer from Independence, Mo.; Mike Cochran, 29, an illustrator from Grand Junction, Colorado; Clay Asher, an 18-year-old outdoorsman from Twin Falls, Idaho and Mike Wien, 21, Chicago, the group's spokesman. All except Asher were fellow students at Colorado State University, and the trip was the outgrowth of a desire dating from their student days to float the Missouri.

The journey began June 7 at the site of Fort Clatsop, near Astoria, Oregon, where Lewis and Clark spent a cold and cheerless winter in 1805-1806. The group then travelled up the Columbia and Snake Rivers in two canoes and a kayak. At Lewiston, Idaho, they began a 435-mile portage to Dillon, Montana, near the place where Sacajawea had found her Shoshone people and aided in securing horses for the journey westward 168 years ago. The young men floated as much of the Missouri as modern dams allow, including a trip through the picturesque Gates of the Mountains north of Helena, named by their predecessors.

While at the Society, the 1973 voyagers met with Hal Stearns, Montana co-ordinator of the Bicentennial observances, and E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, a member of the Society's board of trustees. Honorary membership patches in the 1973 Lewis and Clark Expedition were presented to both men, known for their interest in and knowledge of the expedition.

E. E. MacGilvra of Butte, left, emphasizes a point about the Lewis and Clark journey as Hal Stearns, background, discusses amother aspect for the benefit of the modern-day explorers who ended their land-water trek in St. Louis just as we go to press.

SOCIETY RECEIVES INITIAL SEGMENT OF METCALF PAPERS

Congressional papers of Montana Senator Lee Metcalf, already totaling 350 linear feet of archival space, have been deposited at The Montana Historical Society, with more to come. Archivist Brian Cockhill tells us that the papers that have already arrived constitute a wealth of research material on topics such as national and state politics, environmental issues, and many others.

The papers covering Metcalf's years in the U. S. House of Representatives from 1953 to 1960 and his 1961-1969 Senate years were processed before deposit by Dale Johnson, University of Montana archivist, who worked on them in Washington, D.C. during a University leave from September, 1970 through July, 1971. Currently, Archivist Johnson is again on leave and is in Washington working on Senator Metcalf's papers which cover the period through 1971. This later segment, when processing is completed, will arrive at the Society at a later date.

Cockhill added that because of the sensitivity of some of the material, permission to use the collection must be secured in advance from Senator Metcalf. A complete inventory, however, is currently available for use at the Society Library.

A SHORTAGE OF BEEF YET!

Close to Montana's boundary with North Dakota is the town of Poplar, agency headquarters for the Sioux-Assiniboine Tribe. Its weekly paper, THE POPLAR SHOPPER, is informal, engaging, and friendly enough to publish wedding and anniversary announcements which invite the entire community to the festivities.

In a recent issue, we noted a boxed item which sounded more indignant. In a crisp, no-nonsense public notice, Rancher R. E. Nesbit of North Poplar had this to say:

"To the person who hit the Nesbit cow on the Railroad Sunday night: There are housewives all over the nation crying over the price of beef and you run off and leave one in the ditch. If you had notified me, I could have saved ¾ of a beef. As it is, I didn't find the animal until the next morning and there was no salvage."

1973 RENDEZVOUS OF ART SET

Plans for the second annual RENDEZVOUS OF WESTERN ART at The Society's galleries are rapidly firming up as we go to press, with opening events set for Saturday, September 15. Works by fifteen contemporary artists will remain in the building through October 15, and virtually all will be available for purchase.

Olaf C. Seltzer, the Danish-born artist whose work in the western genre is finding increasing acceptance, will be posthumously honored at the month-long event. He will be represented by his son, Carl Seltzer of Great Falls, who has furnished major works from the family collection for showing. There will be some major Seltzer paintings from the collection of E. B. Craney of Butte, along with a unique Seltzer-Russell collaborative painting, owned by E. E. MacGilvra of Butte.

Robert Rockwell of Corning, New York, well known collector of western art, will be honorary chairman for the Rendezvous, and guest lecturer at an afternoon seminar on opening day will be Paul Rossi, former director of the Gilcrease Institute in Tulsa. A public reception for participating artists and guests is planned for Saturday evening at 8:00. A special catalog, including art reproductions and biographies of the artists, is being prepared by Editor Vivian Paladin.

Participating artists include: Bill Bender, Oro Grande, Calif.; J. Shirley Bothum, Clarkston, Wash.; Harley Brown, Calgary, Alberta; John D. Free, Pawhuska, Okla.; Robert MacD Graham, Jr., Kansas City, Mo.; Glen S. Hopkinson, Cody, Wyo.; Harold I. Hopkinson, Byron, Wyo.; Don Prechtel, Creswell, Ore., and the following from Montana: LeRoy E. Greene, Billings; Elizabeth Lochrie, Butte; Leslie Peters, Great Falls; Gary Schildt, Kalispell; Robert Scriver, Browning; Irvin (Shorty) Shope, Helena, and Cecil Smith, Kalispell.

Members of The Society, who include our readers, are cordially invited to participate in the opening day activities, which begin with a "Meet the Artist" brunch at historic old Montana Club in downtown Helena at 10:00 A.M. Paul Rossi's lecture, slated for 2:00 P.M., will be held at the Montana Highway Department Auditorium, located across the street from the Society's building. At 8:00 P.M. comes the public reception in our main floor lobby. Catalogs may be reserved in advance at $3.00 each, while brunch tickets are $3.75 and lecture tickets $2.00 each. We invite your reservation for the events and the catalog by mail, addressing Director Sam Gilluly, Montana Historical Society, 225 North Roberts, Helena, Mont. 59601. We hope to hear from members as early as possible so we can be sure firm reservations can be made.

WILBUR WERNER ELECTED PRESIDENT OF SOCIETY

Wilbur P. Werner, Cut Bank attorney who has been a member of our Board of Trustees since 1969, was elected president of the Society at a full board meeting July 27. He succeeds Harold G. Stearns of Harlowton, who resigned to become coordinator of Montana's Bicentennial program. Elected vice president was Henry S. Ruegamer of Hardin, while Mrs. Louis W. Hagener of Havre was reelected secretary. Joining the officers on the executive board will be Mrs. Charles A. Bovey of Great Falls and E. E. MacGilvra of Butte.

Attending his first meeting was Joseph E. Reber, Helena attorney, who was appointed by Governor Tom Judge to replace Stearns on the board. Earlier, Governor Judge had reappointed MacGilvra, Manson H. Bailey of Glasgow, and Newell Gough, Jr. of Helena.

The new president, a native of Fall City, Nebraska, has practiced law in Cut Bank since 1937. He attended Creighton University and took his law degree from the University of Omaha. A civic leader in Cut Bank for many years, Werner is also a totally committed history enthusiast, especially of the Lewis and Clark Expedition and the notorious Whoop-Up Trail which runs north into Canada. A member of the Montana Lewis and Clark Trail Commission, he has been instrumental in locating and designating the Two Medicine site where Meriwether Lewis and his small party exploring the Marias River met near disaster at the hands of Indians on the return journey in 1806.

CENTENNIAL SUMMER WOES: CUSTER'S DISASTER,

The Centennial Summer of 1876 was hot and dry almost everywhere east of the Rocky Mountains as a proud nation looked back over its first century. A glaring sun beat down on General George Custer and his command in the dust of Southern Montana as they fought the allied Sioux and Cheyenne. Death brought an end to their thirst, but not that of men in Major Marcus Reno's command who had withdrawn in panic at first and then lived to endure fresh tortures of thirst. Pebbles held in the mouth seemed to help some, and a few raw potatoes were distributed among them, but soon, as one survivor put it, "Our throats were parched, the smoke stung our nostrils, it seemed as if our tongues had swollen so we couldn't close our mouths, and the heat of the sun seemed fairly to cook the blood in our veins."

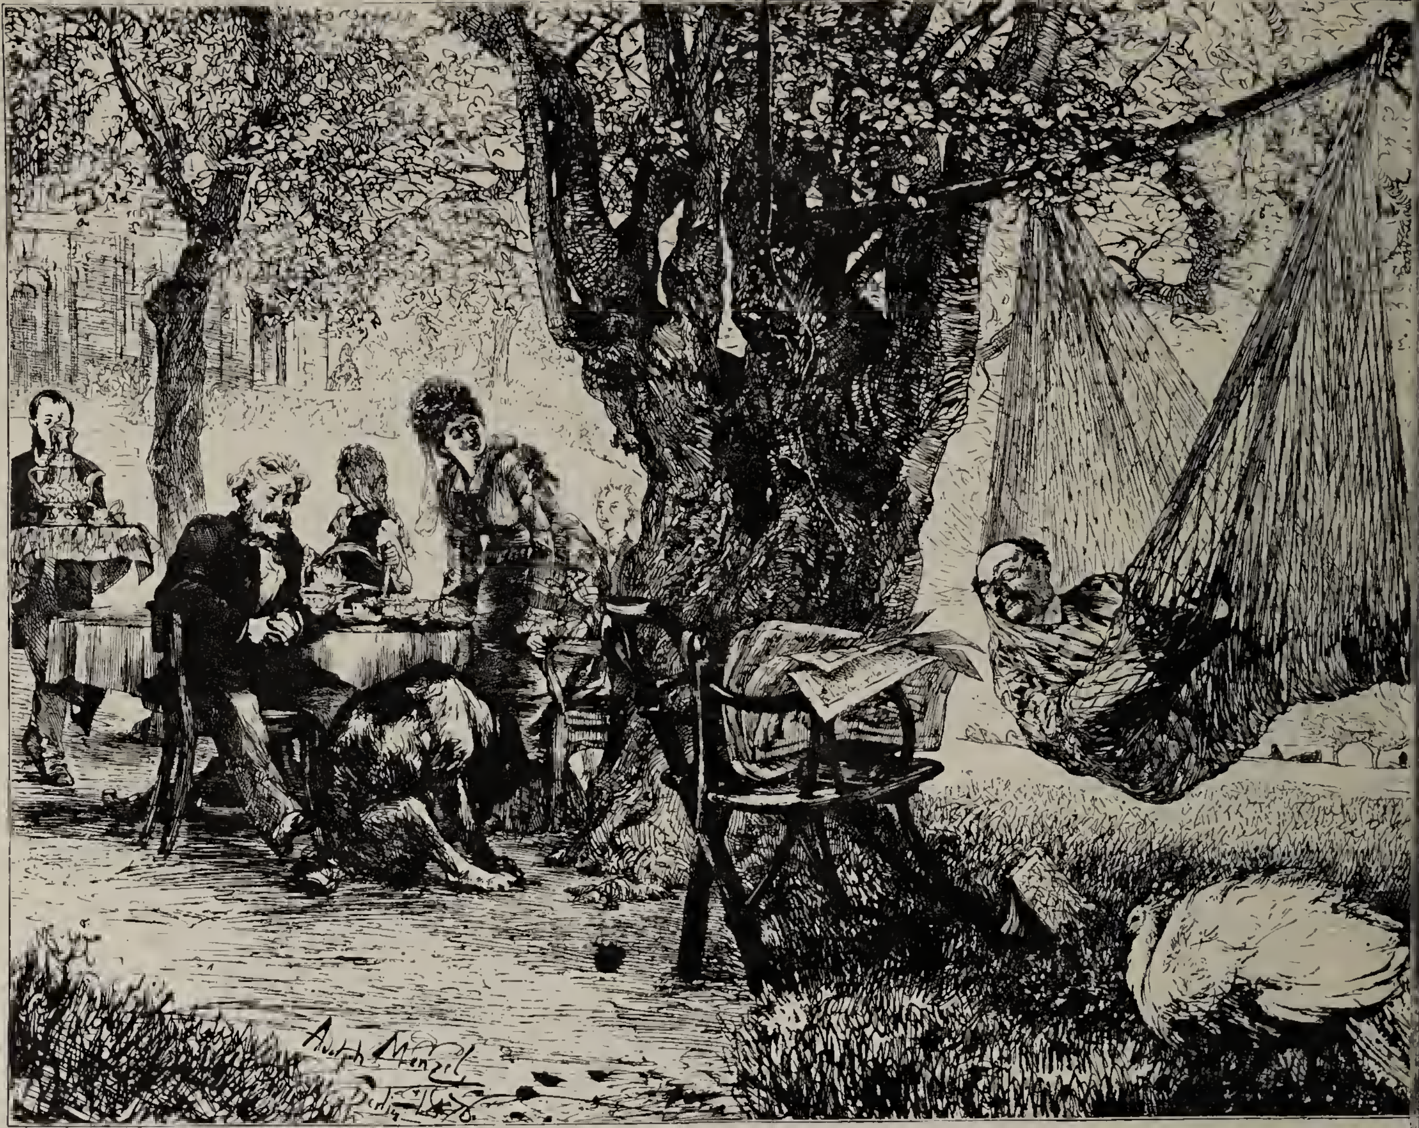
The same merciless sun beat down on Centennial celebrants in the eastern centers of population that summer, and, according to the 1876 issues of The Harper's Weekly, on file at The Montana Historical Society, there was little relief throughout July, August, and much of September.

In its issue of August 5, Harper's seemed to be favoring more sensible clothing as one way to cope with hot weather discomfort: "The New York Tribune comments at some length upon the incapacity of our people to temporarily vary their habits to suit the intense tropical heat of summer. Gentlemen groan under their black coats and bandaged necks, and ladies suffocate in close-fitting silks . . . 'Perhaps,' remarks the Tribune, 'some ages hence, when common sense shall be a recognized factor in social life, our descendants may meet the . . . tropical summer with open throats and loose sleeves, may walk the streets in wide trousers, and dine in linen jackets . . .'."

The first shock waves of the Custer disaster had long since washed over the nation, and in August and September, there began to appear shorter, follow-up items in Harper's. There were some editorials, too, which were surprisingly wise and dispassionate, and some on-the-scene reportage about Indians as people. Early in August, a short, grim aftermath item appeared: "Twenty-four destitute widows and fifty orphaned children—made so by the Custer Massacre—are now at Fort Lincoln. They need the results of the first contributions from sympathizing citizens."

Early in September there was another short statement:

"Several men who were reported killed with General Custer have come to life again. They were not with his command." And in the same issue (September 2) there was an improbable little statement that may give comfort to devotees of such creations as Little Big Man, but hardly to serious Custer buffs: "One of the chiefs who led the Sioux against Custer on the Little Big Horn has unmixed white blood in his veins. He was born in Pike County, Missouri, his father being one of the pioneers of Missouri and a veteran of the Mexican war. He was captured by the Indians when a boy, grew up among them, and finally became their chief."



THE SIESTA (drawing by Adolph Menzel) Harper's Weekly, Sept.

There was renewed interest in the American Indian, how he lived and how he dressed. In its issue of August 12, Harper's published a full-page drawing by W. M. Cary of "An Indian Toilet," and a text describing the scene:

"No dandy of civilization is more fastidious in regard to his 'make-up' than a young Indian warrior, or 'buck', as he is called on the plains, whether in preparing for the warpath, a big feast, or an important council. As may be seen by our illustration, engraved from a drawing made by our artist during a peaceful sojourn in an Indian village, the costume presents a curious mixture of the garments of civilized and savage life, and the effect is most ludicrous.

"The work of the toilet of an Indian warrior is always performed by the squaw, who takes great pride in adorning the person of her own particular 'brave' in the highest style of savage art. Generally the first stage of the proceeding is the painting of the face. This is an affair of the greatest importance. In winter, black appears to be the favorite color; in summer, reds and yellows are regarded as the fashionable tints. Paint serves a double purpose in an Indian toilet: while it adorns the face, it covers up the accumulated dirt, and saves the disagreeable necessity of washing . . ."

Harper's Weekly Sept. 23, 1876

As the Centennial Summer wore on, Harper's supported Rutherford B. Hayes in his campaign for the presidency against Samuel J. Tilden, who, it maintained, was a lackey of Tammany Hall, Boss Tweed, and the Democrat "machine" in general.

Harper's wondered, though, why anyone craved to be President of the United States in view of the fact that he had to live in the White House. It was, according to the editor, "by no means a desirable residence."

He went on to some details: "The grounds at the rear of the house run down to the edge of the Potomac River, which at that point is little better than a stagnant marsh. At all seasons of the year malaria arises, and when summer heat renders the decaying vegetation putrid, the malarial poison constantly penetrates the windows of the Presidential mansion. Moreover, the building is by no means supplied with the conveniences of modern times. The sewerage is defective, the supply of water is often inadequate, and rats abound."

Then in its issue of September 2, Harper's stopped worrying about the discomfort of the First Family in the White House, the dress or toilets of either whites or Indians, and devoted its entire front page to the plight of children of the poor in the hot, crowded cities during the hot summer a century ago. There was a large drawing of two children "walking side by side in the sweet summer fields, with flowers about their feet and butterflies fluttering overhead."

SUMMER IN THE COUNTRY Harper's Weekly, Sept. 2, 1876

By contrast, the editor said, it reminded him that poor city children "rarely have an opportunity to breathe the pure air of the country, and refresh their eyes with the sight of flowers and grass." Lest he forget that poor people lived in the country, too, he added that although their lot was not without its unpleasant side, "it is paradise compared with that of the poor children of the city."

To complete his front page, the editor republished a poem by Stoddard called THE POOR IN SUMMER which he had printed a few years before:

The many shut in cities
Amid the smoke and dust,
Whose lives are sternly ordered,
Not as they would, but must;
Between the bier and cradle
Who draw no idle breath;
Dreadful to them is Summer—
Another name for Death!

The children, oh, the children,
That every hour are born,
To suffer, like their parents,
To live and die forlorn!
The puny babe that suckles,
The child upon the floor,
And the larger ones that wallow
In the mud about the door—
God pity them in summer,
Poor children of the poor!

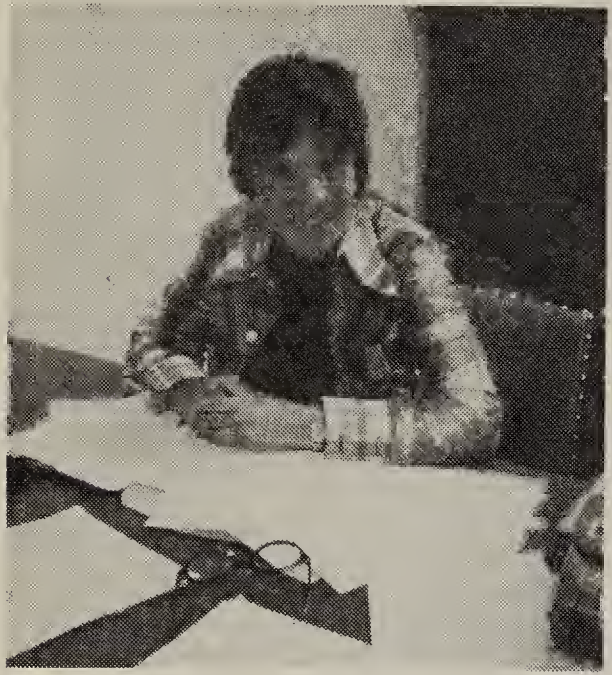
CAROLYN MATTERN JOINS OUR PUBLISHING STAFF

Carolyn J. Mattern, whose interests, education and experience encompass both history and historical editing, joined the staff of Editor Vivian Paladin early in August. A native of Pennsylvania, she has most recently been employed at the State Historical Society of Wisconsin in Madison, working on special archival projects and editing a number of publications, including the papers of Robert M. LaFollette, Nathaniel P. Tallmadge, and the International Workingmen's Association. Currently she is a doctoral candidate in American History at the University of Wisconsin.



Carolyn graduated cum laude in 1967 from Ursinus College, Collegeville, Pa., and received her Master's degree from the University of Wisconsin in 1968. Her master's thesis was titled "Camp Randall, 1861-1865: A Study in Civil-Military Relations." Her doctoral dissertation, due for completion next summer, concerns politics during the 1940's.

The new staff member is married to Phil Driscoll, a native of Charlo, Montana, and a graduate of Helena's Carroll College. He holds an M.A. in history from the University of Montana, and recently completed a year at the Wisconsin State Historical Society Archives. He is now Records Management Supervisor for Montana, serving under the Department of Administration in Helena.

Society Official From "Down Under" Visits

An enthusiastic and articulate June visitor at the Society was William Foster, M.A. and Fellow of the Royal Australian Historical Society. He serves as vice president of that Society, based in Sidney. In his party, which was touring Western Canada and the western part of this country, were Mrs. Foster, their son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. George Foster, and a sister of Mrs. George Foster. The George Fosters live in Palo Alto, California, where he is completing doctoral studies in business administration at Stanford University. William Foster is shown here visiting with Director Sam Gilluly, talking about his Society's rare manuscript collections, which include such items as Captain Cook's original journals. He remarked, during the conversation, that the Montana Historical Society's exhibits are "the finest of all the museums we have seen so far in the States."

An Exciting Summer for Guests and Guides

The Society's volunteer tour directors, our indispensible docents, have had a busy summer, most of them remarking about the large number of touring groups from Japan and Hawaii.

Sue Wright remarked that she has conducted two separate busloads of Hawaiian guests, all of whom displayed great interest in the exhibits but talked very rapidly in idiom hard to understand. Mrs. Wright also handled a number of tourists who arrived with the Airstream Trailer Caravan, which inundated the city of Bozeman and the campus of Montana State University as they gathered in annual convocation this summer.

Another busy docent, Sue Brooks, told us that a number of tourists have asked if the paintings and other works in the C. M. Russell Gallery are originals, then almost at once realized they are indeed originals. One small lad in a group of older tourists asked with some sophistication, "Do you mind if I sketch?", whereupon he began a busy session with his drawing pad. A budding cowboy artist, no doubt.

Docent Nicki Keller is seen in the left of the accompanying picture, taken this month in the Russell Gallery, chatting with Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Odom, Jr. of Fort Pierce, Florida, who were on a nostalgic visit to Helena. Former residents, they had not been back since 1921, and remarked about the unbelievable changes in Montana's capital city, the spreading growth in outlying areas which were once rolling foothills, and the advent of Urban Renewal which has done startling things to old downtown streets and buildings.

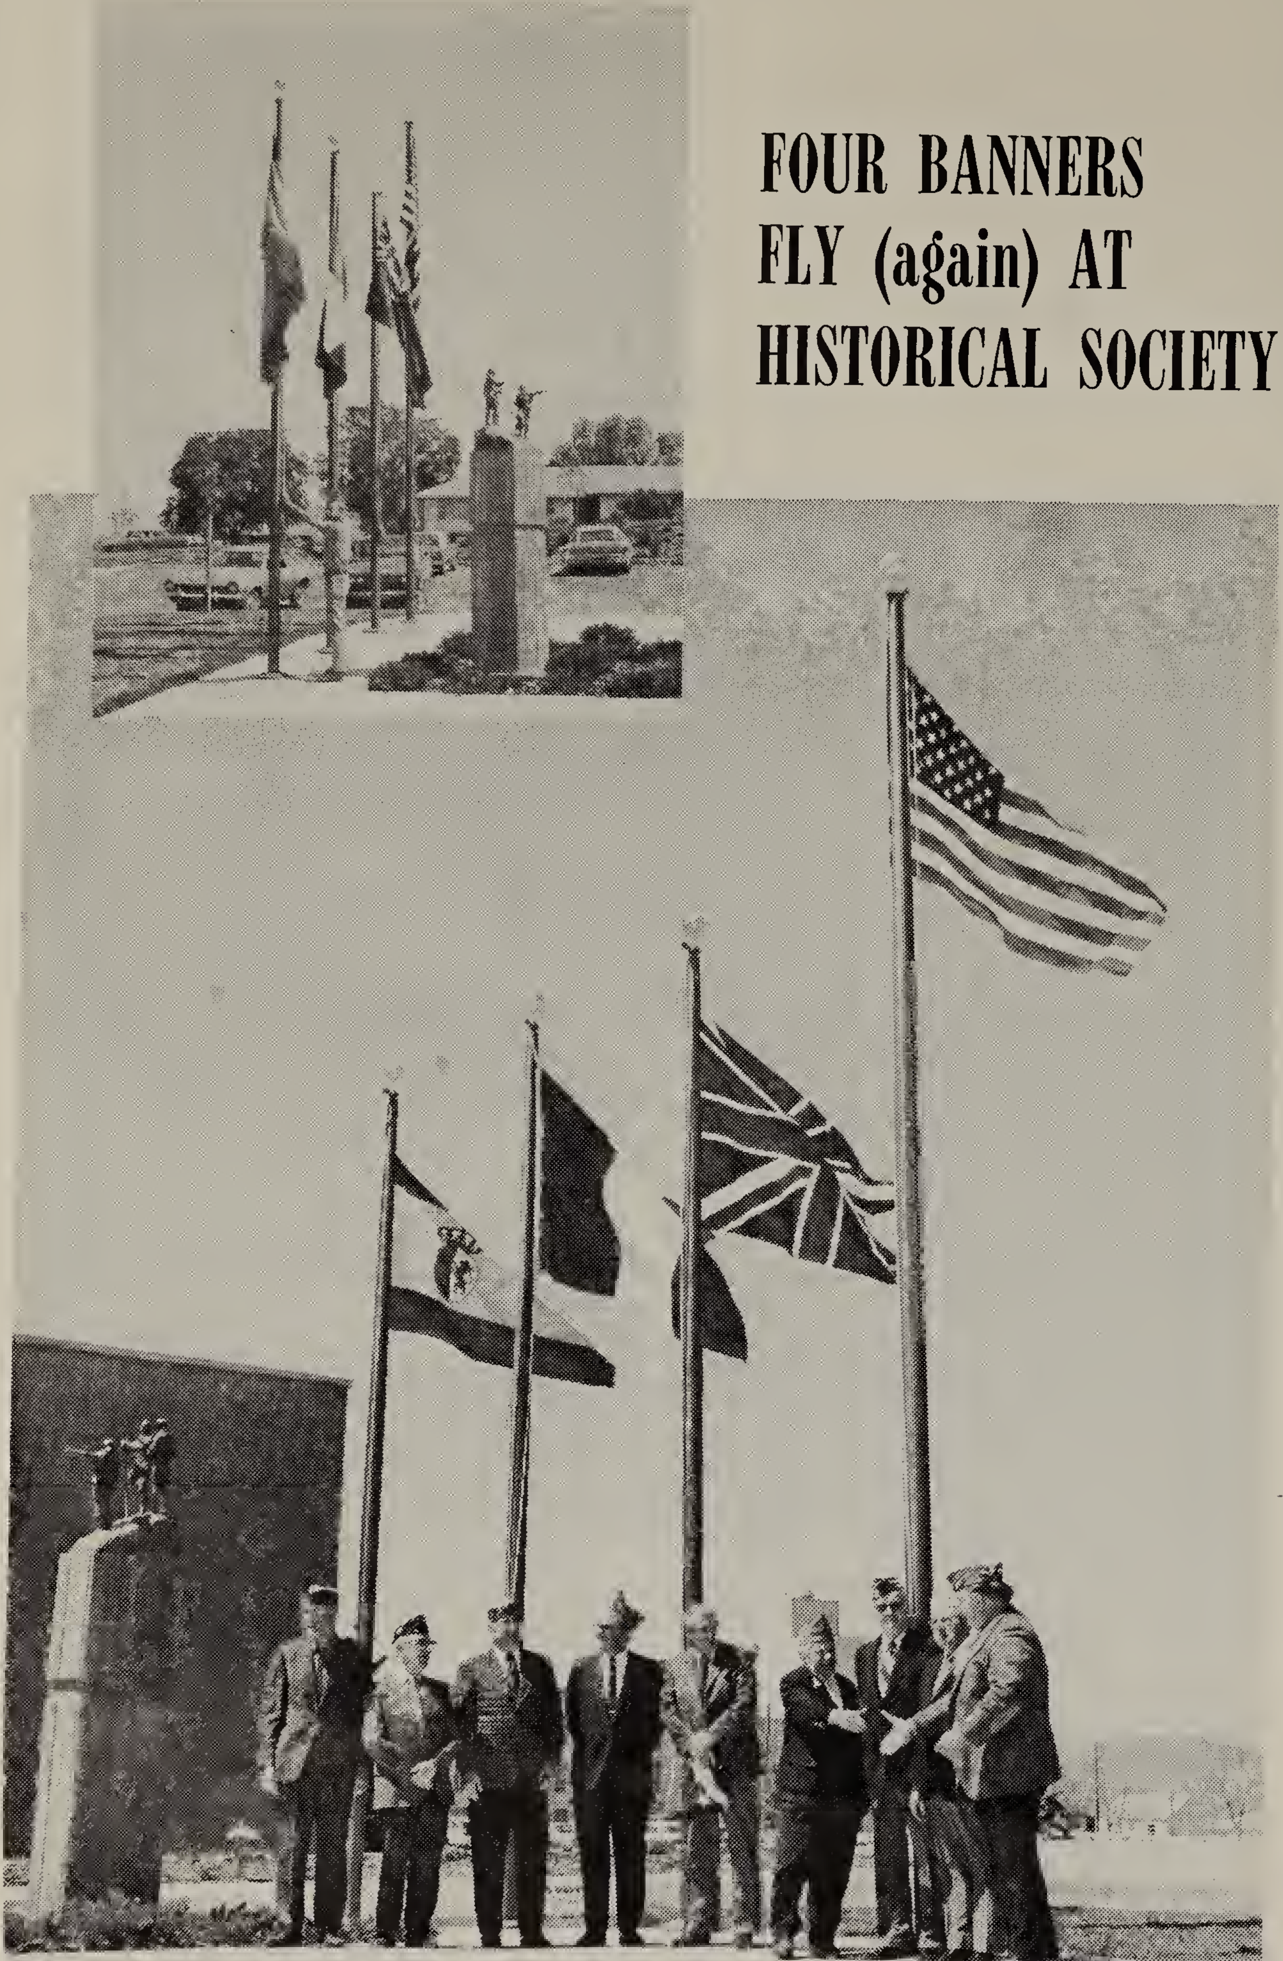
FOUR BANNERS FLY (again) AT HISTORICAL SOCIETY



Early in May, leaders of Montana veterans and military organizations gathered at the court in back of the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building which houses the Society's museums and galleries, to dedicate the flags of Spain, France, England and the United States, all countries which have governed the area which is now Montana. The flags were illuminated so they could fly day and night, and so it was done. But an improbable kind of thievery a few weeks later made it impossible to fly the flags at night: all four were stolen, their heavy nylon ropes cut. So it was that Acting Curator Ken Gibson (inset photo) had to replace the banners with new ropes and a new curatorial duty to take them down at nightfall.

It was an impressive ceremony on May 11, however, that raised the flags, with the Stars and Stripes dominating by height. Located close by the 40 and 8 French railroad car in the court, the flags were presented by the following men, left to right: C. C. Strong, Missoula, Commander, Veterans of World War I Barracks: Chet Shore, Helena, Retreads and Reserve Officers Assoc.; Jack Sloan, Helena, State Adjutant, DAV; Dan Killeen, Helena, 40 and 8; Hal Stearns, Harlowton, then president of The Montana Historical Society; Sam Hiner, Helena, 40 and 8; Bub Durkee, Helena, State Commander, V.F.W.; Henry Samson, Anaconda, Department Commander, American Legion, and Charles Follick, Great Falls, Department Commander, V.F.W.

ATTORNEY JOE REBER IS NEW BOARD MEMBER

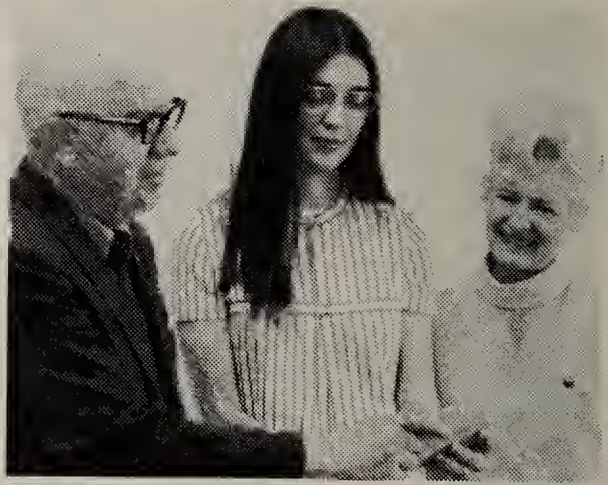
Helena Attorney Joseph E. Reber has joined the Society's Board of Trustees, appointed by Governor Thomas H. Judge to a seat vacated by Harold G. Stearns, who resigned to become executive director of Montana's Bicentennial Commission. Born in Butte in 1940, Reber graduated from the University of Montana in 1962 with a degree in history and political science. He took his J.D. degree from the University's Law School in 1965, and has been in private practice in Helena since that time, specializing in real estate, property management and tax matters.

The new member, who has broad business and civic interests, has maintained a lifelong interest in history, especially of the American West, and has become an avid collector of Western art. He is deeply interested as well in historical renovation, both as a member of the National Trust for Historical Preservation and as a general partner, with a Helena architectural firm, in the restoration of one of Helena's great historic buildings. The Diamond Block, built in 1888 in downtown Helena, is the first designated building to undergo renovation and restoration by private capital.

Reber's interest in art is reflected in his membership on the board of the Blackfeet Indian Arts Council and the Helena Arts Council, which he currently serves as vice president. His business interests are equally as varied, including general partnership in the Western Care Nursing Home, officer and director of the Reber Realty and Development Company, New Finlen Hotel Company of Butte, and the Reber Company, well known Montana contracting firm.

Women's Group Presents Commemorative Plates



Director Sam Gilluly is seen accepting a blue Bicentennial plate, issued January 1 this year and featuring Patrick Henry's famous words, "Give me liberty or give me death." The plate, handmade by Fenton, is number one in a series of four, and was presented to the Society as a project of the Montana Federation of Women's Clubs, represented here by Mrs. Stephen D. Babcock of Thompson Falls and Mrs. Ray Babcock of Bozeman. While they were in Helena, the women presented a similar plate, in white, to Governor and Mrs. Tom Judge.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

That cowhand stew I wrote about last go-around in THE POST evidently came in several styles. The recipe I mentioned involved various "innards" of livestock, but now I find there is another. So I'm turning over most of the rest of this column to a letter from Mrs. Viola Seiler, who hails from Miles City, Montana's best-known cowtown. Here it is, in part:

"I especially enjoyed the note about Son-of-a-Bitch-In-a Sack. Never before have I heard one called a stew. I have spent 61 years of my 73 living among cowboys and sheepherders. The cowboy cooks I know and have known used dried mixed fruits (it really is a pudding). After putting the fruit with some suet in a flour sack, a place is left for expansion of the fruit.

"A fine Scotchman I knew was cooking for his children while the Mother was in the hospital. Deciding to cook a Son-of-a-Bitch-In-a-Sack for them, he made the mistake of not leaving space for the fruit to expand. The result was really something. Dad had made quite a deal of the procedure, telling his youngsters they would have one better than Mother ever made. 'You'll never again see the likes of this one,' he told them.

"While cleaning the mess from the kitchen walls and floor, the smallest boy remarked, 'You are right, Dad, Mother has never made one like this Son-of-a-Bitch'."

Mrs. Seiler writes that more polite, modern cooks call this mixture Son-of-a-Gun-In-a-Sack. But she's a purist, and still uses the old cowboy name.

She also adds another bit: "Cowboy cooks did not use yeast in creating their delicious biscuits and pancakes. Neither do I. I learned how to create my own yeast—I married a cowboy who taught me the art. From what I read about sourdough nowadays, it seems to me few people know what sourdough really is."

Thank you, Mrs. Seiler, for adding to our knowledge. We hereby name you Cowboy Dietetics Advisor for The Montana Historical Society.

—SAM GILLULY

Harriett C. Meloy, the Society's head librarian, was honored in May by the Helena branch of the American Association of University Women. # STEARNS HEADS UP BICENTENNIAL PROGRAMS

In the last two issues of THE MONTANA POST, we have used the 1876 issues of The Harper's Weekly to cast a backward look at America in its 100th year. It was a momentous year, marked by pride of accomplishment in industry and westward expansion and the arts, but marred by growing contentions with the western Indian tribes, scandals in the Grant administration, and the shocking annihilation of the dashing hero, George Custer, and his command in far-off Montana Territory.

In less than three years, this country will observe its 200th birthday, and Montana and all the states are summoning citizens to assist in planning projects that will forge a new national commitment—a "New Spirit for '76."

Harold G. Stearns, well known Montana publisher, historian and civic leader, recently took up his duties as executive director of Montana's Bicentennial observance, with offices on the third floor of the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building in Helena which also houses the Society's museums, library, galleries and offices. To take the post, Hal Stearns retired from publishing weekly newspapers from his plant in Harlowton, and retired as well from the Society's Board of Trustees which he had recently served as president.

The Montana Bicentennial Commission, Hal tells us, is ready first of all to provide information on how to apply for matching grant monies. Initially, the state has $40,000 available for projects in keeping with the objectives of the ARBC. Money will be allocated to pay for up to half the cost of the projects. More funds will be available during the next two years through the sale of coins and stamps on a national basis, and Montana can augment its funds by marketing its own state coin. A statewide competition will be developed soon to design a coin and symbol for Montana.

Readers in other states will recognize the three Bicentennial themes which will apply to them as well as to Montana:

HERITAGE '76: Deals with our historical background, accomplishments of our ancestors and with contemporary problems as well. Some projects to consider under this theme might be historical research, preservation and restoration of historic sites, marking routes, trails and sites, pageants and educational programs on all levels.

FESTIVAL U.S.A.: A program to organize activities and events that will stimulate travel, encouraging people to expand their personal knowledge of the country and to extend a particular welcome to visitors in their own communities. Especially encouraged will be participation by ethnic and minority groups, international activities, fairs, expositions and special exhibits.

HORIZON '76: A challenge to all to undertake at least one significant project in every community, manifesting pride, priorities and hopes for the future. Beautification projects, pollution control, public transport improvement, recreation programs and improvement of public health are but a few possibilities.

Those wishing to apply for grant money or to present ideas are urged to write to Executive Director Hal Stearns, Montana ARBC, Montana Historical Society, 225 North Roberts, Helena 59601.

CUNNIFF BOOSTS YOUNG HISTORIAN PROGRAM

Montana's Junior Historian Program will get an anticipated boost this month as Jeff Cunniff, assistant archivist for the Society, launches a series of meetings with junior and senior high school instructors at six key locations in the state. Accompanied by members of the State Department of Public Instruction, Jeff will conduct orientation workshops of an hour and a half covering such subjects as writing local history, methods of research, and the basic elements of writing history. A segment will be devoted to oral history, and he will conclude with a slide presentation on the history of each area visited.

The first session will be in Helena on August 23, followed by Glasgow on August 27, and, on succeeding days, Miles City, Billings, Great Falls and ending at Missoula on Friday, August 31.

The Society has a deep interest and concern with the Junior Historian Program, aside from the publication of THE MONTANA HISTORIAN, published during the school year and containing selected student-written articles which have emerged.

AMERICA'S CENTENNIAL PRIDE IN 1876

Back in 1776, when the republic was born, the wilderness of the Ohio and the Cumberland represented the frontier to most Americans. The Far West was so mysterious that its very existence was but dimly imagined. Most of the nomadic tribes had not yet seen a white man, probably not even a fur trading engage' of the acquisitive British or French. But in 1876, when a prideful America celebrated its 100th birthday, the Indians had seen a great many white men, their instrusions altering forever the tenor of tribal ways.

In the editorial offices of The Montana Historical Society, we make practical use of — and have a great deal of fun with — a full volume of Harper's Weekly, the tabloid-sized ''Journal of American Civilization'' for the year 1876. Its pages are replete with beautiful steel engravings of the country's centennial observances, the parades and crowds, the imposing buildings, the oratory of President U. S. Grant and other notables from bunting-draped balconies. The country had much to boast about in 1876, and the columns of Harper's Weekly and other publications of the day harked back to the days of 1776, and the Colonial period which preceded it, with nostalgia, and, sometimes, wry humor.

Ten years in the planning, the huge Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, which opened on May 10, and closed six months later, was the first truly international show ever held in America. It cost more than $11 million, and covered some 450 acres in Philadelphia's Fairmount Park. There were 167 buildings in all, some of which housed exhibits from 50 nations. The visitor total eventually passed the eight million mark.

The show was a prideful one, and stressed the fact that the Machine Age had arrived. Commenting on one exhibit, a replica of a New England farm house of 1776, Harper's Weekly said, with understandable sophistication, ''Their very simplicity makes them incomprehensible to the victim of modern improvement.''

In the midst of all the pride and patriotism on these fascinating pages, however, there appear with growing frequency references to what was happening in the American West. In its issue of May 13, 1876, Harper's gave more editorial preference to an article entitled THE INDIAN QUESTION than it did to the centennial. Discussing the proposed transfer of Indian affairs from the Department of the Interior to the War Department, the article said the move seemed necessary because many of the Indians on the reservations were on the verge of starvation. There had been scandals in the post traderships, some of them involving President Grant's own brother, and the Indians were hungry and angry. ''Fears are entertained, considering their present temper,'' said the article, ''that they will make a raid on the whites.''

For at least a decade, in truth, many of the tribal chiefs had realized that the presence of white men among them was not a transitory thing. The intruders now were no longer free-wheeling trappers and traders who sought beaver pelts and the temporary delights of an Indian lodge. These men hungered for gold at first, but soon they coveted land on which to settle family and friends.

As America prepared to celebrate its birthday in Philadelphia, then, the climactic drama of Indian-white confrontations on the western frontier was about to begin. In the midst of the centennial summer, the disaster that overtook dashing young Civil War hero George Custer and his command on the grassy slopes of the Little Big Horn in Southern Montana burst upon the cele-

Flags of many nations flew from the main building at the corner of Elm and Belmont Avenues as the Centennial Exposition opened in Philadelphia on May 10, 1876. There was a crush of carriage traffic and pedestrians with 1776 banners waving as the nation celebrated a century of growth and the advent of "The Machine Age" in the first truly international show ever held in this country.

As the country now prepares to mark its 200th birthday in 1976, it is interesting to note than in 1876, the colonial period was already an anachronism. But the American Indian was no anachronism: dark news from the Far West was filtering eastward, climaxed, in the centennial summer of 1876, with the unbelievable news that the Sioux and Cheyenne had wiped out a national hero in far-off Montana.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

WITH A COUNTERPOINT OF DARKER NEWS

brants. The news, which reached the nation's large cities just as the Fourth of July was about to receive its loudest and most patriotic observance, came close to upstaging everything else in the press.

Harper's Weekly, pointing out that details of the terrible disaster had been adequately covered in the daily press, headlined an article in its issue of July 22 with the words THE MONTANA SLAUGHTER. Accompanied by a map of the gold regions of the Black Hills which Custer had scouted out two years before, the site of the ''massacre of General Custer's troops,'' and the Indian reservations and military posts in the west, the article said, in part: ''. . . Comes the news of a disaster on the Little Horn River so terrible and ghastly in its details that at the first announcement it was considered incredible or grossly exaggerated. Later dispatches, however, confirmed the dreadful story in all its shocking particulars.''

In its issue of August 5, Harper's did not call for extermination of the Indians as did many publications. To honor the fallen Custer, it urged a more ''intelligent, moral and efficient Indian policy'' rather than monuments of brass or marble. It denounced the policy of breaking treaties, starving Indians by failing to send enough supplies, of perpetuating in the field dishonest men ''swindlers and knaves of all kinds,'' who, they said, were treating the Indians like men ''and then hunting them like skunks.''

AN OLD-TIME NEW ENGLAND FARMHOUSE is the way this composite engraving was captioned by Harper's in its issue of May 15, 1876. The housewife of 1876 had much more sophisticated furniture and appliances to boast about, and so did her menfolk, caught up in the excitement of "The Machine Age."

The moment of triumph for the Sioux and Cheyenne, which the death of Custer and his men represented for the western tribes was, of course, a brief one. Punitive campaigns during the coming winter were already being mounted while Harper's reflected on the need for safer theaters and public gathering places after a fire swept the Boston Theater on a cold Tuesday evening, December 5, killing almost half the audience of 900 which had come to see ''The Two Orphans''.

THE BOSTON THEATRE FIRE

HARPER'S WEEKLY, DEC. 23, 1876

It was twilight, too, for the nation's birthday celebration. ''The Exposition goes off in a chill and a shiver,'' a correspondent for Harper's wrote early in December. ''Fogs rise night and morning from the Schuylkill, and roll through the village made by the buildings; the Japanese garden shows but rows of leafless stalks hedging in bronze storks and stone pigs; the stretches of flower beds, crimson and gold a week ago, are blackened and rotting, and the wide avenues between are full of little puddles and mud . . .''

Ulysses S. Grant was ending his unhappy second term, and Harper's quoted from his message: ''Mistakes have been made, as all can see, and I admit. . . History shows that no Administration from the time of Washington to the present, has been free from these mistakes; but I leave comparisons to history, claiming only that I have acted in every instance from a conscientious desire to do what was right, constitutional, within the law, and for the very best interests of the whole people. Failures have been errors of judgement, not of intent.''

As for the state of affairs in the Far West, Harper's, in its issue of December 16, 1876, published some graphic drawings of the winter headquarters and movements of the Powder River Expedition under General George Crook. Said the accompanying text: ''Military operations on the plains have been pushed forward with great activity for the past few weeks, and with a success that will probably result in teaching the hostile tribes the necessity of keeping at peace.''

Independence Hall in Philadelphia was illuminated and the air filled with exploding fireworks as the country celebrated its 100th birthday on July 4, 1876. Harper's carried this engraving in its issue of July 22, along with many other prideful celebrations throughout the eastern part of the country. The news of the Custer disaster had reached the celebrants, however, and Harper's began reporting the winter campaign against the hostiles. The wintry engraving, below, depicting General George Crook's headquarters at Fort Fetterman, appeared in the issue of December 6, 1876.

Major Gallery Event: Showing of 200 Indian Portraits by Scheuerle

Two hundred portraits of American Indians, painted from life, will be featured in a very significant showing in the Society's main floor Poindexter Gallery from May 24 throughout the month of August. The paintings, owned by Dr. and Mrs. Thornton I. Boileau of Birmingham, Michigan, represent almost the total artistic output of the late Joe Scheuerle, an enthusiastic and friendly man who became a close friend of Charlie Russell and who painted Indians during vacation periods for some three decades, beginning in 1906.

DR. AND MRS. THORNTON I. BOILEAU HOLD SELECTIONS FROM THEIR COLLECTION OF 200 INDIAN PORTRAITS BY JOE SCHEUERLE WHICH THEY WILL BRING TO THE SOCIETY FOR SHOWING FROM MAY 24 THROUGHOUT MOST OF THE SUMMER.

The portraits, with supporting text by the Boileaus, were featured in the Fall issue, 1971, of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, and a monograph resulting from that publication will be available during this important exhibit.

The monograph contains a complete listing of the portraits, by tribe, and it reveals that Scheuerle depicted members of almost all of them. The Sioux, both Hunkpapa and Ogalala, constitute the longest list, with 44 paintings. Next in line are the Cheyenne, Crow and Blackfeet. But wherever he could find them—Arapaho, Assiniboine, Flathead, Shoshone, Gros Ventre or Nez Perce — Joe Scheuerle made friends with the Indians and painted their pictures. What is perhaps even more important — and certainly unique — the artist inscribed caricatures or action cartoons, along with some explanatory text, on the backs of many of the portraits.

Expected to be present for the opening of the show, along with Dr. and Mrs. Boileau, is Mrs. Margaret S. Grierson of Santa Cruz, California, the artist's only daughter. His widow, who has lived in California since his death in New Jersey in 1948, will be unable to attend because of illness.

Montana Institute Of the Arts to Mark Important Milestone

The Montana Institute of the Arts, which for the last quarter century has represented culture in the truest sense of that word, will celebrate its 25th birthday in June with a four-day festival in Great Falls. Slated for June 21 through 24, headquarters for most events will be the new Heritage Inn and the Russell Museum, according to Normand Dahl, who heads up arrangements.

Emphasis will be on workshops, with visiting artists and artisans in charge. Examples: workshops and demonstrations on weaving and fibers, printmaking, ceramic sculpturing, graphics and design, and Raku firing.

Other features, aside from the important exhibits through which Montana members will display their works, will be a writing contest, the annual film competition, the spring juried art show, and the annual awards banquet.

Activities in Great Falls suggest the deep and varied impact of the MIA during its first 25 years. Formally organized in March, 1948, with just under a hundred members, the organization now has 19 branches in Montana communities, publishes a very good magazine called Montana Arts six times a year, has a fine permanent collection of art, and sponsors numerous activities on local and state levels.

Dr. H. G. Merriam of Missoula, professor emeritus, University of Montana, is credited with the initial idea for such an organization in 1941, but efforts were held up by World War II. When MIA was formally launched in 1948, Merriam became its first president. His philosophy, and that of other founders, however, prevailed: ''Culture, in its true and fine sense, is its own reward, both to the individual and to society. We will take care to avoid the sentimentality and snobbishness that lurk in the word culture. We want members who are doers, not merely dabblers or talkers or art-conscious snobs.'' Plans for the 25th anniversary festival suggest that the philosophy still prevails.

WATERCOLOR BY RUSSELL GETS FIRST PUBLIC SHOW

Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Word of Clancy, Montana, are pictured, left, in the C. M. Russell Room as they presented a major C. M. Russell painting, never before shown publicly, for indefinite loan display in the gallery. Director Sam Gilluly, right, accepted the painting for the Society. The action-filled canvas, somewhat reminiscent of Russell's famous THE HERD QUITTER (the wild cow in the foreground has similar markings in both paintings), was done especially for Mr. Word's father, the late Robert L. Word. The purchase price was something like $100.00; it was recently appraised at $50,000.00. Edward Word, who has retired from the State Board of Equalization, is the grandson of Samuel Word, who came to Montana in 1863 when Montana was still part of Idaho Territory. A well known lawyer, Sam Word was appointed an Associate Justice of the Montana Supreme Court at the age of only 33, and was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1866.

Archers Honor Gant

Bob Gant of our curatorial staff was presented with the Medal of Merit of the National Field Archery Association at the state indoor archery tournament in Billings early in April, and if one is a bowman, one realizes the extent of the honor. It is the highest award the association can give, and it is not given lightly. Gant, who came to our staff from Pierre, S.D., organized the Last Chance Bowmen in Helena four years ago and was its first president. He has been a tireless worker on behalf of archers, making frequent contacts with members of the Montana Fish and Game Commission and others. He was recently chosen to represent Montana, with two other team members, in the National Bow Hunt in Douglas, Wyoming this fall.

LIBRARY STAFF CHANGES

Brian W. Cockhill, a native of Butte and a graduate of the University of Montana, Missoula, has been named Society archivist to succeed John Coleman, who left to enter private business. Cockhill, formerly on the archival staff at the University, has been assisting Coleman here the past two years. Joining the staff as assistant archivist is Jeff Cunniff, also a graduate of the University of Montana. Jeff has been with us for the past year, engaging largely in field work, gathering historic pictures, interviewing pioneer residents and speaking before civic groups. His particular responsibility in recent weeks has been the Library's picture collection, long in charge of Miss Bernice Boone, who retired earlier this year.

New Tools for Researchers Available

Those who search for the primary materials of Montana history will be aided by a long needed tool, ''Guide to Manuscripts in Montana Repositories.'' Compiled and edited by Society Archivist Brian Cockhill and Dale L. Johnson, archivist at the University of Montana, Missoula, this neatly printed and bound book contains over a thousand items. The materials, found in The Montana Historical Society, the University of Montana at Missoula, Montana State University at Bozeman and Eastern Montana College in Billings, are not only keyed as to where they reside but are described as to author or source, subject, and size in linear feet or numbers of volumes. Copies are available at $3.50, and inquiries may be directed to Archivist Cockhill, Montana Historical Society, 225 No. Roberts, Helena, Mont. 59601.

Another useful aid to librarians, teachers and others is an attractively printed bibliography, MONTANA IN PRINT, compiled by Mrs. Marie P. MacDonald of Glendive and Harold L. Chambers of Helena. Published by the Montana State Library, it contains a selected list of publications about Montana, including, in order, adult fiction, junior fiction, non-fiction and periodicals. Mrs. MacDonald, who is a member of the Society's Board of Trustees, is librarian at Glendive Public Library, while Chambers, former cataloguer in the Society Library, is now documents librarian for the Montana State Library.

Copies of the bibliography can be had, without charge, by writing the Montana State Library, 930 East Lyndale, Helena, Mont. 59601.

GLASGOW'S MUSEUM POINTS UP A COLORFUL PAST

Welcome, Friend. We're glad you rode in. Tie up and visit a spell. We are just starting to put this outfit together. The trail boss has a round-up going now putting a gather on everything that will tell the story of FROM BUFFALO BONES TO SONIC BOOM. And a story it is. See it now in Colt size, then watch it grow!

These words, printed in large aspect, greet visitors to the Pioneer Museum in Glasgow, Montana, and indicate not only the vernacular but the forward-looking attitude of a group of tireless workers. For after nearly a decade of effort on the part of the Valley County Historical Society, the round-up is still on and no one is yet content to rest on what is already a very considerable accomplishment.

The museum in this lively and concerned city in Northeastern Montana started in 1964 with a donations goal of $40,000—and what is perhaps even more important, a valid approach to telling the varied history of the town and the surrounding area.

Like almost all of the great prairie and grassland country of the eastern half of the state, this area went through certain historical ''peaks'' of development, and the founders wisely chose to point them up as fully and accurately as possible. Items: the heyday of the Indian tribes (Assiniboine and Sioux in this area); the Lewis and Clark Expedition which, moving westward in 1805, named the Milk River (''the water has a peculiar whiteness, such as might be produced by a tablespoon full of milk in a dish of tea . . .''); the fur trade, characterized here with the building of Old Fort Peck during the winter of 1866-67, covered now with the waters impounded by Fort Peck Dam.

The open range cattle period, during which Texas herds were driven northward to feed on free grasses, comes in for excellent attention, as does the coming of the Great Northern Railroad in 1887 which marked the beginnings of perhaps the most fateful ''peak'' of all, that of the homesteader. Family pictures and portraits and biographical sketches honor a great many of those who came during the ''peaks'' of development, especially the ''honyockers'' who heeded the call of Jim Hill to settle on the land his railroad served.

Not neglected in the displays are irrigation, with emphasis on the building of Vandalia Dam, the sheep and dairy industries, and the development of education on the prairies. The building of Fort Peck Dam during the Depression 1930's is well treated, and finally there is the day of modern aviation, including the B-17 training base of World War II and the now deactivated Strategic Air Command and Air Defense Command facility which accounted for the sonic boom.

Formal dedication of the museum was held a year ago, in June, with Society Director Sam Gilluly, long-time editor of The Glasgow Courier, as dedicatory speaker. There was much to recount and many hands to credit, among them Miss Iva Holladay, Home Demonstration Agent who spearheaded the efforts of County Home Demonstration Clubs to get the project started. Then there is Manson Bailey, Jr., now museum curator and a member of our Board of Trustees. Past presidents of the Valley County Historical Society honored were Sylvia Heikens, Carl Lanzendorfer, Mrs. Charles H. Brocksmith, Ted McIntyre and Iver ''Scotty'' Martin. Glasgow Mayor Jim Christinson is now president, with Mrs. Everett McInerney as secretary and Gene Gamas, treasurer. Mr. and Mrs. Wib Dolson, local historians, were caretakers for the first season.

More progress has been made since the dedication, notably a diorama of sculptured figures depicting an Indian buffalo hunt, created by Mrs. James Montfort of Vandalia with construction assistance from her husband. Underneath this is a display entitled ''Trail to the Past,'' with the full skeletal remains of a buffalo and a simulation of C. M. Russell's famous hand-writing on a bleached bone. Curator Bailey has imposed Russell's famous misspelled philosophy in the words, ''You sleeping relick of the past if I but had my way Id cloth your frame with meat an hide an wake you up today.''

Charlie Russell, sadly aware of the passing of another era when he approached death in 1926, would have applauded the efforts of the hard workers of the Valley County Historical Society, who have had so much more to record. And he would have given full approval of the use of his own words calling for the reawakening of the buffalo to replace the sonic boom.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

On my desk as I write is a sampling of books in which the Montana Historical Society has had a part. I see Der Wilde Westen, a recent publication from West Germany, and a copy of Leisure Asahi, which is subtitled Japan's Guide to World-Wide Leisure Pastime and Travel.

While it is rare, having such a cosmopolitan tone across the desk, still we see almost every week publications of many kinds in which we have had a very real share.

Librarian Harriett Meloy and her staffers in the historical library have constant calls from writers, publishers, all sorts of media people and others asking for help in finding the ''right'' photographs for their use.

Our photographic collection now numbers about 30,000 prints or negatives, some dating back more than 100 years. Some of you probably have heard recently of a new series by Time-Life on the West. Time-Life researchers spent many hours in our library working with our qualified staff people and making selections for the series.

Sometimes, a credit to the Society also gets us in trouble. A reader of the Time-Life book on the American Cowboy read a recipe in the book on Son-of-a-bitch stew. The recipe came from our records. The reader tried it, he wrote, and the results were disastrous. Somewhat plaintively, he suggested that in the future we test all our recipes. Perhaps the Society will have to add a consultant in the field of comestibles!

Just as heavily in demand are reproductions of our Russell and other art.

The point here is that a Historical Society does not simply collect; it seeks to diffuse its holdings and its knowledge. And in the process, literally thousands learn more about the history of the West and Montana.

JOHN C. EWERS, senior ethnologist at the Smithsonian in Washington, D. C. and a recognized expert in museum planning, was guest speaker May 12 at the annual meeting of the Museums Association of Montana. Chaired by Mrs. Lewis W. Hagener of Havre, president of the organization, the sessions were held in the Society's meeting rooms in Helena and attended by representatives from many Montana local and community museums. Dr. Ewers, who retains a deep interest in Montana, guided the construction of the Museum of the Plains Indian in Browning and was a consultant when the Society's present museum was planned in the early 1950's.

SOCIETY RECEIVES VALUED JOHN TATSEY MANUSCRIPTS

Jeff Cunniff, right, assistant archivist for the Historical Society, receives from Milo Fields of Shelby the original manuscripts of the late John Tatsey, Blackfeet Indian policeman who wrote columns for the Glacier Reporter, weekly newspaper published in Browning. The collection, valued at several thousand dollars, will be placed in the Society's permanent archives. Fields and his wife, Irene, collected and catalogued the manuscripts between 1956 and 1969, when they owned and operated the newspaper. Tatsey, who died in 1972, was well known as a humorous, candid and non-grammatical writer who told of unusual incidents on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, especially near his home at Heart Butte. His articles were quoted in many national publications, including the Congressional Record and Time Magazine. Selections were published in book form in 1971 by The Curtis Gallery of Spokane. Entitled The Black Moccasin, the book was edited by Paul T. DeVore and illustrated with line drawings by Albert Racine, well known Blackfeet artist.

New Storage Racks for Society Paintings

The Historical Society's large collection of fine art not currently on display will soon have a newer and safer storage facility in the form of fourteen 9x9-foot movable racks. Due for completion by the end of June, the project is being financed with non-appropriated funds, utilizing a bequest made to the Society by the late Ulric LaChapelle, who was a rancher in the Augusta, Mont., area.

Acting Curator Ken Gibson said the racks, which slide on tracks attached to the ceiling of the storage area, are covered with a fine mesh hardware cloth from which the pictures will be hung. In all, some 3,000 square feet of storage will be provided for framed works of art. Very rare or valuable pieces will continue to be kept in locked vaults, and of course most of the Society's C. M. Russell collection is on permanent display.

The sliding rack storage concept is especially valid for us, since the collection has almost tripled in size in recent years. The old bin-type storage became totally inadequate, Ken points out, with access not only difficult but chances of damage to the canvasses increasing along with their numbers.

VELVA WEDEMAN TUOHY, a key member of our staff for 17 years, retired in March as secretary to the Director. She has been succeeded by Mrs. Gene (Dode) Brown, a member of the Library staff the past two years. Velva, who will continue to make her home in Helena, has been concerned with myriad details of Society operations since March, 1956, only three years after we moved into our present building, and has thus seen a great many peaks of growth and development. The Society's farewell gift to Velva was especially appropriate: an oil painting of The Rialto, operated for many years on Helena's Historic Last Chance Gulch by her husband, Michael Tuohy. The painting is by Bob Morgan, former Society curator, and long a colleague.

MONTANA POST

VOLUME ELEVEN, NUMBER ONE FEBRUARY - MARCH, 1973

PERIODICALS

This plaster mold of the larger-than-life statue of Montana's Cowboy Artist has reposed, in several pieces, in storage areas of the museum, for some 15 years. Now, restored and refinished by the Society's curatoral staff, it has been placed in our C. M. Russell Room. For the first time, Montanans and others will see what the imposing bronze statue of Russell looks like in Statuary Hall in Washington, D. C., for this is the plaster mold of the sculpture by John B. Weaver which won out over statewide competition in 1957 as the best sculptured portrait of the artist. The bronze casting was placed in Statuary Hall on March 19, 1959, as Montana's first and only entry in that historic room in which each state is represented by one or two sculptures. Weaver, who now lives in Edmonton, Alberta, was Society curator at the time he executed the work and is responsible as well for many dioramas and sculptures in our Formal Museum.

MONTANA'S ROLE IN BICENTENNIAL WILL FEATURE FIRST AMERICANS

Harriett Meloy, Historical Society librarian, represented the Society and the state at the Regional American Revolution Bicentennial Committee meeting in Chicago last December.

She said each state has received $45,000 ''seed money'' to be applied toward planning that state's participation in the celebration of the nation's bi-centennial. Mrs. Meloy stressed the importance of involving Indians in Montana's plans, noting that they were the state's only inhabitants in 1776.

An immediate result of Montana's participation in the bicentennial observance is the work of Jeff Cunniff in gathering historical pictures, interviewing pioneer residents, both Indians and white, and promoting the Junior Historian program in Montana high schools.

Under consideration, too, is a joint project with North Dakota for production of a documentary film on the Battle of the Little Big Horn, which occurred in 1876, the year the nation celebrated its centennial.

Pacific Northwest History Conference Slated in April

The Historical Society is pleased to join with Montana State University and the Museum of the Rockies in hosting the 26th annual Pacific Northwest History Conference, April 5 through 7 at the Holiday Inn in Bozeman. Our participation will include the appearance of two Board members, President Hal Stearns and Pulitzer Prize-winning editor Mel Ruder of Columbia Falls, on a panel entitled "Montana Journalism and Politics." This panel, on which A. B. Guthrie, Jr., another Pulitzer Prize-winner will also participate, will be chaired by Director Sam Gilluly.

Banquet speaker will be Robert E. Burke of the University of Wisconsin, while luncheon speakers will include James Kearney of Arizona State University and Arlen Fowler of East Illinois University.

On the agenda, too, are papers on Senator T. J. Walsh of Montana, on recent Indian research, the history of science in the Northwest, and transportation and economic development in the Pacific Northwest. "The Pacific Northwest as a Cultural Region," is the title of a second panel discussion.

Vivian Paladin to Conduct Seminar in Austin, Texas

Editor Vivian Paladin will conduct a three-hour session entitled ''The Historical Society Now: Publications'' at a seminar on the administration of historical agencies and museums, slated for March 25-April 6 at Austin, Texas. Sponsored by the American Association for State and Local History, and hosted by the Texas Historical Society, the sessions will be attended by some 25 beginning professionals in historical society, museum and publications work. Mrs. Paladin said her presentation will be a practical demonstration of how to approach the publishing of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY and the Historical Society's many other publications, including THE MONTANA POST.

LEGISLATIVE OPEN HOUSE HOSTED 200

More than 200 Montana legislators, officials, members of our Board of Trustees, their spouses and friends, attended the Society's annual Legislative Open House on Thursday evening, January 18. Again the accent was on hospitality, not on special interest lobbying, as guests enjoyed coffee and punch, served from the famous silver service from the USS Helena. There were conducted tours through the Library, archives and work and storage areas by members of the Society's volunteer docent program and regular staff members.

Plans for the event were made by Mrs. Dorothea Neath and Mrs. Velva Tuohy, with assistance from Mrs. Paula Coleman and Mrs. Ellie Posey, and staff members Betty Reis, Edrie Vinson, Marie Spurlin, Betty Tarvin, and Dode Brown. Pouring were Mrs. R. D. Warden of Great Falls, and the following Helena residents: Mrs. A. T. Hibbard, Mrs. A. T. Towle, Mrs. Amos Little, Mrs. William Sweeney, Mrs. Charles Greenfield, Mrs. Harold Longmaid, and Mrs. Robert Burke.

DEATH TAKES A NOTABLE MONTANAN

The Society, particularly its publications, will miss the contributions and sage counsels of Robert Henry Fletcher, who died at his home in San Diego on November 20, 1972. Perhaps Bob Fletcher is best known to people all over the country as the man who wrote the pungent text for Montana's highway historical markers. But he was also the original lyricist and composer of the song, Don't Fence Me In, later published by Cole Porter. He wrote a number of volumes of western verse, and most imposing of all, a definitive study of the range cattle business, entitled Free Grass to Fences, which appeared in 1960.

For many years, Bob Fletcher, who lived in Butte before moving to San Diego in 1964, had been a member of the Editorial Board of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. During the 1950's, he contributed a column for the magazine, in which he told of historical things in spritely and humorous prose. A mining and civil engineer by profession, he worked, variously, for the Bureau of Reclamation, the Montana Highway Department and in the public relations department of The Montana Power Company. But Bob Fletcher's real vocation was western history and lore and its telling. We will miss him.

FORMER GOV. FORREST H. ANDERSON RECALLS SOME SIMILARITIES IN HIS ADMINISTRATION WITH THAT OF JOE DIXON DURING DEDICATION CEREMONIES.

Joseph Moore Dixon, the Montana Progressive whose political career was cut short by his stubborn adherence to what he believed right, was enshrined in the rotunda of Montana's capitol building on November 17, 1972. Present for the occasion was 90-year-old Burton K. Wheeler, Montana's famous Senator who defied President Franklin Roosevelt and was all but alienated from the Democratic Party. Dixon, best known for his battles against entrenched corporate interests in Montana, defeated Wheeler for the governorship in 1920, but in the words of the old campaigner, ''he did me one of the greatest favors of my life,'' for Wheeler went on to become U. S. Senator from Montana, serving from 1928 to 1946. Leif Erickson, the man who defeated him then in the democratic primary election, was also among those present for the unveiling of the Dixon bust, executed by Sculptor John B. Weaver of Edmonton, Alberta, former curator of The Montana Historical Society. Among the things which Governor Dixon unsuccessfully espoused during his term was the complete reorganization of state government. Forrest H. Anderson, who finished his gubernatorial term shortly after the dedication, referred to the fact that reorganization was finally implemented, a half century after Joe Dixon proposed it.

Branson Stevens # Exciting Retros

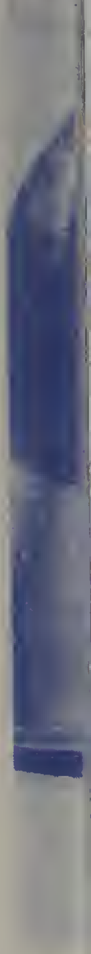
The unbelievably versatile art of Branson G. Stevenson of Great Falls will grace our contemporary gallery throughout the month of March. It is an event to which the Society looks forward with more than usual enthusiasm, for we rather claim Branson Stevenson as one of our own. He has been an effective member of our Board of Trustees for nearly a decade, but more than that, he is one of Montana's towering artistic talents.

A native of Georgia, Stevenson's first real interest in art came when he was a sophomore in high school in Balboa, in the Canal Zone. He began sketching and ''paying more attention'' to other artists' work. From that time, although he held a variety of jobs, he continued working on his art in his spare time.

After graduation from high school, he worked for the U.S. Consul in Colombia, South America, who was interested in art and encouraged him to keep experimenting and learning, some of the latter at the Institute National, Escuela de Pintura, Panama.



BRAN

Branson Stevenson moved to Montana in 1920, and soon afterwards entered the Montana State Fair in the amateur artists division. He received an award, which, he says, ''encouraged me . . . to keep on keeping on.'' When Stevenson moved to Great Falls in 1921, he became acquainted with Charlie Russell and his protege, Joe DeYong. DeYong interested Stevenson in etching, which he says now is his ''first love'' in art. He worked for a time as an artist for the Swanzey Advertising Agency, studying ceramics on the side. Later he served as advertising manager for the Sunburst Oil and Refining Co., and in 1931 became Montana manager for Socony Mobil Oil Co. He retired from that post in 1960.

At least two of the mediums in which Stevenson works, emulsion wax watercolor and clay-in-clay inlay, are his own inventions. He says that dreams led to his development of many new artistic endeavors, including the clay-in-clay inlay device. ''I thoroughly believe in dreams and the potency of the subconscious mind,'' he said, ''the still small voice of God that leads us to the best we do.''

His oils, water colors, lithographs, etchings, engravings (on both wood and metal), serigraphs (silk screening), and ceramics have been widely exhibited at such places as the National Academy in New York, Society of American Etchers in New York, Library of Congress, Carnegie Institute in Pittsburgh, Seattle Art Museum, Los Angeles Art Museum, and the Denver Art Museum, among others.

on to Appear in pective Art Show

ON STEVENSON WORKING AT POTTERY

Other Stevenson media are buon fresco painting, the medium Michelangelo used in painting the Sistine Chapel in Rome; sculpture in stone and bronze casting of the sculpture, pen and ink drawings, cartoons, and pottery. He is currently making gold and silver jewelry with a process he invented, using molds for the molten lead made of a refractory paper pulp that will withstand over 2,400° F. without distortion.

Another amazing accomplishment: he carried out "The Story of Paper" in glass on the mezzanine of the new Public Library in Great Falls, making all the 232 colored glass pieces that make up the design and which are luted together in a stained glass effect with black epoxy cement.

Stevenson is a founding member of the Montana Institute of the Arts and, with Archie Bray and others, founded the Archie Bray Foundation in Helena, widely acclaimed for its work in the field of ceramics. Curator Tom Posey tells us that the retrospective show here will contain examples of virtually all media in which this talented man works or has worked. We look forward to it with much anticipation.

Death of Librarian Dempsey Announced in St. Louis, Mo.

As we go to press with this issue, we are informed of the death, on February 6, of Miss Mary K. Dempsey, who retired as our Historical Society Librarian in 1969. Miss Dempsey had been ill for several weeks and recently had undergone surgery at St. Mary's Hospital in St. Louis, where death occurred. Funeral services were scheduled for February 9 at St. Leo's Catholic Church in Tacoma, Washington.

Miss Dempsey brought to us a high degree of professional excellence when she became our Librarian in 1959. A native of Manistee, Michigan, she received her B.A. from St. Mary-of-the-Wood College in Indiana and her B.S. and M.S. degrees from Columbia University, New York. For many years, she served the New York Public Library, specializing in that institution's Library for the Blind. Before coming to Helena, Miss Dempsey had spent 10 years with the Marquette University Library in Wisconsin, rising to the position of Director of Libraries.

SNIDOW SHOW SCHEDULED

Gordon Snidow, who lives and works in an historic adobe house at Belen, New Mexico, not only depicts the contemporary cowboy as well or better than any artist now living, but makes his own comment about the subject. One of the youngest members of the Cowboy Artists of America organization, Snidow will be featured in a one-man show at The Society's contemporary gallery from April 2 to May 20. It is an event we look forward to, and in honor of it, a special catalog is being prepared by Peschel Publishers of Boulder, Colorado. For the show in Helena, Snidow will be represented by 50 pieces of art, half of which will be for sale. There will be watercolors, oils, drawings, lithographs and sculpture. The contemplative cowboy pictured here is typical of Gordon Snidow's realistic yet marvelously sympathetic treatment of his favorite subject, the contemporary cowboy.

DIARY OF

by DICK PACE

Among historic items displayed in Dr. A. A. Dodge's office in the Historical Society's Territory Junction street museum is a medical kit which made its first appearance in Montana in 1863. Belonging to Joseph Alexander Emery, the kit was recently given the Society by his granddaughter, Mrs. Rubee DeLamarter of Santa Fe, New Mexico.

Mrs. DeLamarter's daughter, Jeanne DeLamarter Bonnette, loaned the Historical Society Library for microfilming a copy of Emery's diary and of young Nettie Emery's recollections of the trip west and life in Virginia City. A Bible, carried west by Emery's father-in-law, Jacob Witting, will be given to a Virginia City museum for a display including photos of Emery, Witting and Emery's family.

JOSEPH ALEXANDER EMERY

Joseph Emery first went west in 1862, spending part of the following winter in Bannack, Montana Territory's first capital, but returning east in the spring of 1863. In Omaha he was hired by the famous Creighton Brothers to take a wagonload of merchandise to the new gold camps.

Leaving Omaha by buggy on May 31, 1863, Emery, his wife, a daughter, Nettie, and Witting joined the wagon-train party at Hazen's ranch near Omaha that night, and headed west the next day. By the time the train reached Bannack they had learned of the newer discoveries in Alder Gulch and decided to head for Virginia City, which became, in turn, the Territory's second capital.

John and Edward Creighton later built one of the first stone buildings in Virginia City where they had a business for several years. The building, Creighton's Stone Block, still stands on the corner of Van Buren and Wallace in the old mining camp. The Creightons, by the way, are the men for whom Omaha's Creighton University is named.

LITTLE GIRL ILLUMINES PAST

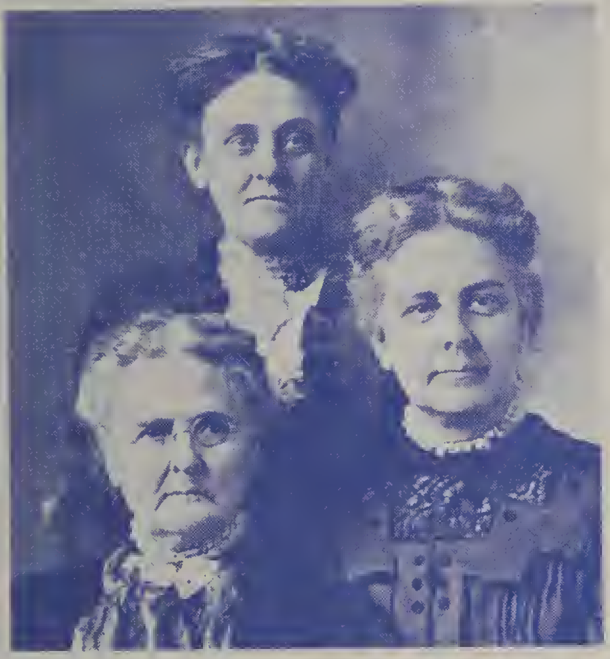
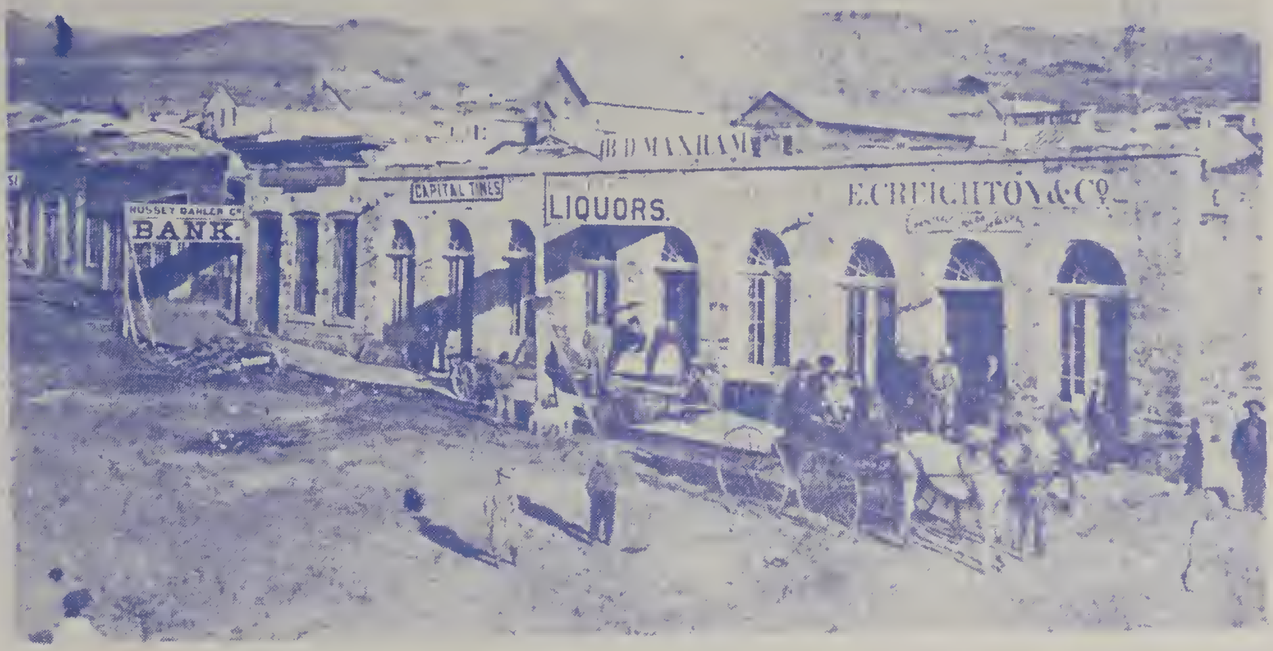
After disposing of Creightons' merchandise, the Emerys lived in their wagon until he finished building a cabin, one of the first in the area to have a floor and a stove, according to the family legend. During part of that first winter Mrs. Emery took in boarders at $18 per week.

The Emery's second daughter, Betsy, was born March 29, 1864. After several rather successful mining ventures, Emery sold his claims and took his family back to Omaha. Their gold was carried in a buckskin bag which Mrs. Emery wore around her waist on the return trip.



MRS. J. A. EMERY AND DAUGHTERS, NETTIE EMERY WILSON AND BEE EMERY

Nettie, just eight years old when she went west, later wrote her memories of those early days on the trail and in Virginia City. She attended Thomas Dimsdale's private school (remembering his name as Dinsmore) and was chosen to represent the Goddess of Liberty in the big Fourth of July parade in 1865. Twenty girls were used to represent the various states, Nettie said, and white material had to be sent for in Helena to make the costumes.



MONTANA HIST. SOC. PHOTOS

CORNER OF WALLACE AND VAN BUREN, VIRGINIA CITY, M.T.

Although written between 1916 and 1927 when Nettie, by then Mrs. George Wilson, was in her 60's and had forgotten some people or had confused them with others (for instance, he refers to the wife of "Governor" Sanders assisting at her sister's birth) her memories of those days are well worth reading for a picture of life in a mining camp as it was seen by a young and impressionable girl.

On her way home from school one day (Dimsdale's school was at first near his home on Daylight Creek) Nettie saw the body of Joe Slade hanging from the corral gate after his execution by Vigilantes. Her Mother, she remembered, later loaned Mrs. Slade a black veil for her trip out of the gulch with Slade's body, said to have been preserved in a lead-lined coffin.

Emery's diary covers only the trip west and is mainly a record of the various campsites, river fords and other details useful to the Creightons for future wagon-trains. One point of interest is the description of the other trains met, passed and traveled with, showing the large migration west during the mining era.

C. M. Russell was always the most comfortable when he was portraying scenes and action he knew at first-hand. When he attempted other subjects and other times, like the great oil painting CARSON'S MEN, which we now offer for the first time as a full color, large (20x30), lithograph on canvas, he consulted people who did know. In the case of this painting, the original of which is in the Gilcrease Institute in Tulsa, Okla., he wrote to the noted Montanan, Granville Stuart, asking where he could find out about saddles worn in the Southwest during the Santa Fe trade of the 1830's and 1840's. He did find out, for once more the Russell touch of authenticity is in this great painting. One of the most colorful of all major Russell oils, you'll want this one for your collection.

ODYSSEY OF HARRY TRUMAN IN MONTANA

NEWCOMERS RUSH TO REGISTER FOR HOMESTEAD LAND IN GLASGOW IN 1918.

It is nearly 60 years ago that a 29-year-old farmer named Harry S. Truman, from Grandview, Missouri came out to Glasgow, in Northeastern Montana, to register for a homestead. It was the first of six known visits which this irrepressibly ''common man'' was to make to Montana. Except for the 1913 trip, during which he was one of thousands, most of them nameless now, Mr. Truman's visits were well publicized. Indeed, his campaign of 1948, following which he triumphed so surprisingly over Thomas E. Dewey, reached a high-water mark in Montana. Until his life ended the day after Christmas, 1972, Truman himself maintained there was no doubt that his famous '' 'Give 'em hell' Harry'' style got its start when he addressed a crowd of nearly 10,000 at Butte's Naranche Stadium on June 8, 1948.

Well known, and sometimes criticized, for his flat, midwestern delivery, President Truman's remarks in Butte were anything but dull. He defended his programs and blasted the 80th (''Do Nothing'') Congress. His hard-hitting, no-punches-spared style was set from then on. Moreover, Butte became one of his favorite cities, and he never forgot it.

But in September, 1913, these things were far in the future for Harry Truman. World War I, a haberdashery in Kansas City, a judgeship, the U.S. Senate, the vice presidency and the shattering death of Franklin D. Roosevelt were worlds removed from the life of a young man trying to establish a livelihood to support his younger brother and sister and someday make it possible for him to marry his childhood sweetheart, Elizabeth Wallace.

In that September of 1913, some 1,600,000 acres of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation near Glasgow were thrown open to homesteaders. To avoid the land speculators and ''musclemen'' land grabbers who dominated many earlier land openings, a drawing was held for the Fort Peck land.

No record remains describing young Truman's thoughts as he visited the small Montana town between September 1 and 21 to register for a chance for land. Over 12,000 people registered for the 8,405 homesteads of 160 acres each.

Apparently an unsuccessful registrant, Truman went back home to Grandview, where, in the same year, he bought a second-hand Stafford touring car to make it easier for him to court the golden-haired Bess, who lived in Independence.

It was over three decades later, in 1944, that he made his next visit to Montana, in behalf of Franklin D. Roosevelt, whose death soon after he began his fourth term in 1945 propelled the farm boy from Kansas to the presidency.

In 1944, Vice President Truman began his love affair with Butte. He donned a hard hat and descended, along with the four reporters covering his trip, into the Leonard mine. He and this group formed the ''Hard Rock Club,'' to which he referred many times on subsequent visits to the state. The presence of only four reporters, however, suggests the lacklustre news value of the trip.

But June, 1948, was a different story. Now Truman came to Montana as President of the United States and drew an estimated 40,000 people along his parade route in Butte. This time, he was accompanied by 58 newsmen.

It was in 1948 that Truman lashed out at the 80th Congress and defended himself and the policies he had begun. ''They have been telling you a lot of things about Harry Truman,'' he said, ''but the country has been pretty well run in the last three years. . . .''

President Truman returned to the Big Sky Country in 1950 and again spoke in Butte, before a crowd of 6,000.

He defended U.S. government involvement in business and other areas, pointing to low cost housing and unemployment insurance, on which many miners in Butte had recently been forced to depend.

Introduced by Montana's U.S. Senator Mike Mansfield as a ''man of the people,'' Truman said his 1950 trip was not political, but was to ''report to my boss—the people.''

In 1952 President Truman was back in Montana to set off the dynamite charge that moved the first earth for the Tiber Dam Project near Chester and later to put Hungry Horse Dam at Columbia Falls into production by throwing a switch in the Kalispell gym.

In his speech, he backed Montana democratic candidates for office, and spoke warmly for the Adlai Stevenson-John Sparkman ticket. But the Eisenhower-Nixon team won in Montana by 51,181 votes.

In 1956, Harry Truman came out of his ''retirement'' to again travel the campaign trail, this time for Stevenson and Estes Kefauver. He made only one speech in Montana, and requested that it be given in his favorite city. It was a nostalgic visit, a remembrance of old days and old glories. To Montana's U.S. Senators Mike Mansfield and James Murray, the former President said, ''It's like old times. I'd give my right eye to be back in the Senate with you.''

He told his audience, ''It was in Butte where I began telling people about that do-nothing Republican Congress. You know what happened after that. The people took proper care of the Republicans when election day rolled around. . . . A lot of people were surprised at the outcome of the 1948 election. I think the same people are going to be surprised this year—because I think Stevenson and Kefauver are going to win.'' But they lost, and in Montana, Eisenhower and Nixon won by 38,695 votes.

Harry S. Truman, with whom historians are expected to deal kindly, apparently sensed, in Montana, and especially in Butte, that people knew him for what he was, a ''common man'' with uncommon courage. An interesting supposition, now that he is gone, is what history might have had to say about him had he drawn a good number that day in Glasgow, Montana, nearly six decades ago.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

Working, as we do in the Society, in the quality magazine field, we all were dismayed at the demise of Life Magazine. The story, reflecting the financial problems of publications, got a strong play in the Montana press, with reproductions of the cover of Life's first issue in the 1930s. But, with one exception, the press did not point out (probably was not aware) that the first cover embodied a Montana subject and locale.

Life's cover portrayed the towering spillway gate structure associated with the Fort Peck dam across the Missouri in Northeastern Montana. The photographer was a great name in graphic presentation, the late Margaret Bourke White.

In 1933, this part of Montana, like most of the nation, was prostrate—a primarily agriculture area hit by drouth and depressed prices. It was near the beginning of Franklin Delano Roosevelt's first term as President. It was then that top echelons from the Corps of Army Engineers began to visit Glasgow and Fort Peck.

Officers accompanied civic officials to the site of a great bend in the Big Muddy. They explained how they wanted to construct a mammoth barrier—four miles long and 250 feet high at a maximum. Glasgow Mayor Leo B. Coleman looked at them in amazement. And, as he often told the story later, exclaimed, "Hell, a dam like that might cost a million dollars!"

An epic of construction began to unfold. Political considerations entered and a campaign was launched by powerful navigation interests. It was Montana Senator B. K. Wheeler who ultimately received the blessing of F.D.R. and an allocation of $15 million as a starter. More than $150 million eventually was appropriated.

The dam was an economic shot in the arm. At its peak, 10,000 were on the payrolls. And around it burgeoned shacky boom towns such as Wheeler, New Deal, Delano Heights and many others.

It was to this scene that Margaret Bourke White came, and became fascinated, not only with construction, but with the rough, raw settlements.

Now, except for some remnants, all of them are gone and so are the magazine and its ace photographer. And now, historians are beginning to delve in the records of this first of the great Missouri River dams. Some day, we may have the story of these communities—another kind of ghost town, as surely as the old gold camps elsewhere in the Big Sky country.

ART ENTHUSIAST BILL SHERMAN NAMED HONORARY CHAIRMAN FOR FIFTH ANNUAL RUSSELL AUCTION

William P. (Bill) Sherman of Portland, Oregon, collector of Western art and friend of anyone whose enthusiasm is to preserve and promote the heritage of the American West, will be honorary chairman of the fifth annual C. M. Russell Auction of Original Western Art, slated for Thursday and Friday, March 15 and 16, at the Rainbow Hotel and C. M. Russell Museum in Great Falls.

Sponsored by the Advertising Club of that city, the annual event, held during Russell's birthday month, has become nationally known and attracts dealers and collectors from all over the country. Last year, when proceeds reached $460,000, a total of 145 pieces of art was offered at the main auction, including eleven original Russell works. Fifty contemporary Montana artists were featured. Net proceeds, which last year totaled $33,000, are donated to our sister gallery in Great Falls.

So far as we are concerned, our colleagues in Great Falls have succeeded again in choosing an outstanding honorary chairman for its annual event. Bill Sherman, who spent his early life in Helena, has built up a million dollar manufacturing firm (fireplace screens and accessories) in Portland, was named Oregon's Small Businessman of the Year in 1970, and, is, according to Ed Fackler, executive vice president of his firm, "the one person I've ever known who completely and totally fits the description, unique." We would agree with that appraisal. Bill Sherman's knowledge about and enthusiasm for western art cannot help but add lustre to the events in Great Falls in March. Inquiries about details of this year's show, by the way, may be addressed to the Ad Club, Box 619, Great Falls 59401.

HONEST ART OF STOCKTON IN SHOW

"I haven't the faintest idea of what art is, and I haven't read an art magazine in 15 years," says Bill Stockton, who lives and works on a sheep ranch at Grassrange, near Lewistown, Montana. Yet his art, ranging from drawings of sheep to sensitive and notably strong and honest arc-welded sculpture formed a unique one-man show at The Society's large contemporary gallery from Jan. 27 through Feb. 25.

This ruggedly honest man, who says he has more respect for a good sheepherder than he has for a mediocre artist, included in his show a three-part welded sculpture which he executed as a commissioned memorial to the late Hugh Galusha, who became president of the Federal Reserve Bank in Minneapolis but whose heart and enthusiasm remained in his native Montana.

Very dominant in the Stockton show was a large oil painting, sensitively done, of the Nez Perce trek across Montana in 1877. His studies of sheep, some of them anatomical and others pastoral, lined the walls of the large gallery, with his distinctive sculptures placed in juxtaposition around the room.

The gallery, located behind the formal C. M. Russell Room, was the setting, from December 3, 1972 to January 21, 1973, of another memorable one-man show. Thirty-six pieces of art, including oils and bronzes, by Gary Schildt, young Blackfeet artist whose studio is at Hungry Horse, near Glacier Park, were shown with notable success, in terms of viewing enthusiasm and sales.

THE RENDEZVOUS: A GREAT BEGINNING

Hundreds of guests at the first annual Rendezvous of Western Art crowded our lobby before the ribbon was cut. Some of them were photographed from the mezzanine balcony by Garry Wunderwald. At the sales desk in the background, Mrs. Marie Spurlin was among our merchandise crew kept busy throughout the evening providing copies of the hardbound commemorative book published for the occasion. As soon as patrons received their copies, they sought out autographs from the twelve participating artists who were present. The merchandise staff, headed by Mrs. Dorothea Neath, was also involved in the brisk sale of paintings and bronzes as soon as the ribbon was cut to open the show formally. Artists who were present included, besides Olaf Wieghorst who was especially honored: Sheryl Bodily, Columbia Falls, Mont.; John Clymer, Teton Village, Wyo.; Fred Fellows, Bigfork, Mont.; Walter Graham, Wenatchee, Wash.; Harold Hopkinson, Byron, Wyo.; J. K. Ralston, Billings, Mont.; Tom Ryan, Lubbock, Tex.; Gary Schildt, Kalispell, Mont.; Bob Scriver, Browning, Mont.; Irvin (Shorty) Shope, Helena, and Elmer Sprunger, Bigfork. Unable to be present were Joe Beeler, Sedona, Ariz.; R. Brownell McGrew, Cottonwood, Ariz.; Bill Moyers, Albuquerque, N. M.; William Schimmel, Scottsdale, Ariz., and Gordon Snidow, Belen, N. M.

The atmosphere was one of excitement, anticipation and friendly greeting as more than 500 patrons of the arts, friends of the Society from many states, staff and board members gathered in our lobby on Saturday, October 21, and waited for the opening of the first annual Rendezvous of Western Art. The unmistakable conclusion was that an important new annual event had had its debut. Seventeen of the best known living artists of the American West were represented; twelve of them were present, including the honored artist, Olaf Wieghorst of El Cajon, California. A number of paintings and bronzes were sold during the evening and since, but all remained here for public viewing through Sunday, November 19. A list of artists and subjects still available for sale can be furnished to any Society member who requests it. That's true also of the commemorative book, which features the participating artists and their work and which will be a valid permanent addition to the library of any aficionado of Western Art. In this issue, we publish a number of pictures of participants and events of The Rendezvous, all taken by Garry Wunderwald of Helena, who had to move about quickly to record the opening itself and the Cowboy Breakfast the next morning, hosted by Mr. and Mrs. Wayne Curtis of the Curtis Galleries in Spokane.

"SIX REINS TO KINGDOM COME," UNIQUE RUSSELL MODEL, GIFT TO SOCIETY

A unique work of Charles M. Russell, a model of a stagecoach and six horses called "Six Reins to Kingdom Come," combined with a background painting, has been donated to the Society by Mr. and Mrs. John Baucus of Helena and Mrs. Baucus' parents, the late Mr. and Mrs. Fred B. Sheriff.

Now on display in the museum lobby, the model was originally made in 1901 for Maurice S. Weiss, Montana restaurateur and hotel man. He sold it to Sheriff in 1944, with the hope that the model and painting would stay in Montana. He also told Sheriff the story of the model's creation:

"About 1899, after many Montana men returned from the Alaskan gold rush, Charlie Russell became interested in making a dog team according to their description, and I bought the miniature model dog team from him.

"Inasmuch as he had never seen a dog team, some slight inaccuracies developed, and the criticisms that came to him bothered Charlie Russell a little bit, so when August Fack (owner of Helena's California Wine House, a famous old-time Helena drinking emporium) asked to buy the dog team from me, Charlie Russell said, 'Sell him the damn thing and I will make you something they cannot criticize!' He then made for me, in 1901, the stagecoach with six horses, and I have never been able to find an old time stage driver who could find any fault with it. . . ."

Weiss said he felt it appropriate to sell the model to Sheriff because his father had operated an early stagecoach line around 1890, and Mrs. Sheriff's father, Henry Sieben, had driven an ox team from Utah to Montana at an even earlier date.

KUDOS TO PRESIDENT HAL

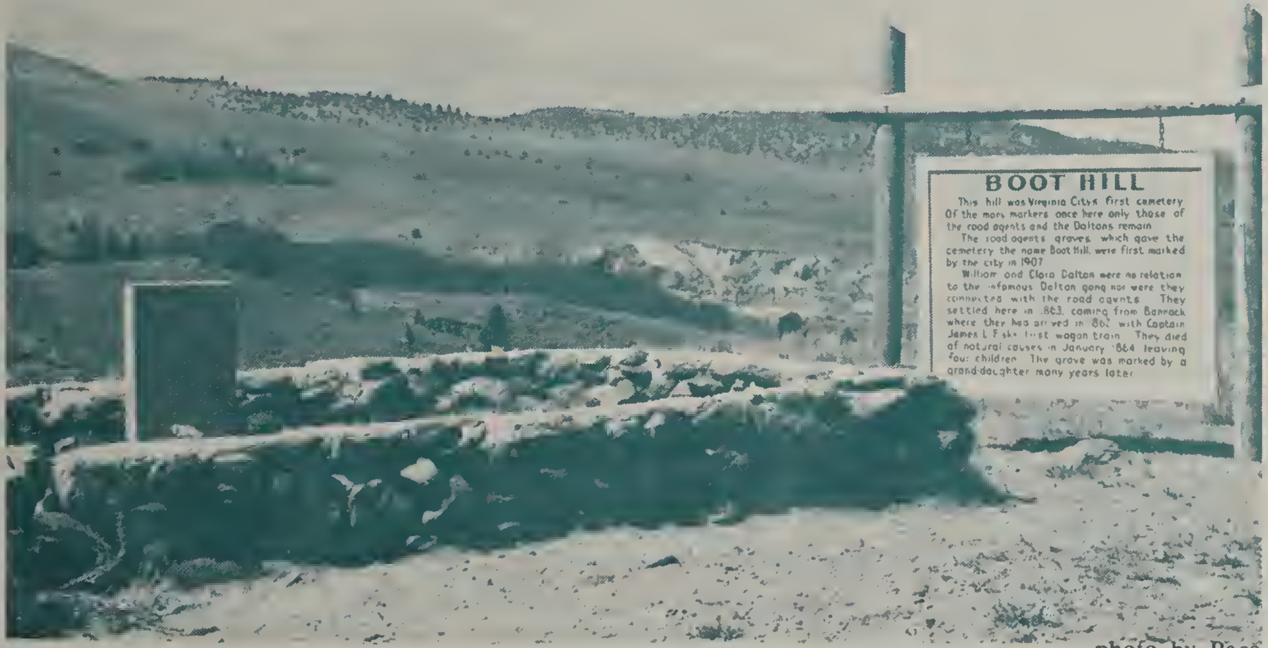
Harold G. (Hal) Stearns, newspaperman, raconteur, history and sports fan, and the Society's Board President, was one of three men who won the 1971 "Philip A. Danielson Awards for excellence in western historical writings" by Westerners International. Carrying a cash prize of $100.00, Hal's citation was for a paper entitled "Great Opportunities on New Frontiers," published in the August, 1971, issue of "Hoofprints," publication of the Billings Corral of Westerners. The text had been given earlier as a talk to the Billings Corral, one of the newest and liveliest Westerners groups and the first such organization in Montana.

GETTING THINGS STRAIGHTENED OUT AT BOOT HILL



BOOT HILL
This hill was Virginia City's first cemetery. Of the many markers once here only those of the road agents and the Daltons remain.
The road agents' graves which gave the cemetery the name Boot Hill were first marked by the city in 1907.
William and Clara Dalton were no relation to the infamous Dalton gang nor were they connected with the road agents. They settled here in 1863 coming from Bannack where they had arrived in 1862 with Captain James L. Fisk's first wagon train. They died of natural causes in January 1864 leaving four children. The grave was marked by a granddaughter many years later.

Some time in the 1920's, newspapermen and Chamber of Commerce people began referring to the old cemetery in Montana's famed Virginia City as "boot hill." By that time the only markers left in what had been the town's original graveyard were those of five members of the Plummer gang and a couple, William and Clara Dalton. Over the years many visitors to the old mining camp decided the Daltons must also have been outlaws, especially since the name conjured up visions of outlawry. To clear the names of this perfectly respectable couple and explain the story of "boot hill," Virginia City residents recently erected a sign between the Dalton graves and those of the road agents. The Daltons, from Wisconsin, had come west with the first Fiske expedition in 1862 and had moved to Virginia City the following year. They died in 1864 of natural causes. The sign, painted by Ace Kindrick of Helena, is styled after those of the Highway Department's historical markers.

RENDEZVOUS CLOSES; NOTABLE NEW SHOWS SLATED FOR GALLERY

The 45 paintings and eight bronzes comprising the first Rendezvous of Western Art were scheduled for removal on November 19 from the Russell and Poindexter Galleries. The Society's Russell collection, most of which was stored during the Rendezvous, was returned to the Russell Gallery. The Poindexter Gallery will be the scene of several interesting one-man shows during the next several months. Some examples:

GARY SCHILDT

Gary Schildt of Kalispell, Montana, a participant in the Rendezvous, will exhibit from December 3 through January 21. Known primarily for his portraits and portrayal of everyday life on the Blackfeet Reservation, Schildt experiments freely with style and color. The paintings and sculpture of this young artist are gaining recognition in the art field.

An exhibit of the sculpture and paintings of Bill Stockton, Grass Range, Montana, will follow. With a philosophy that an artist "cannot separate himself from the land," Stockton runs his sheep ranch and at the same time produces notable art. His mediums include arc welding, tempera, drawings, metal signs, furniture and lamps.

GORDON SNIDOW

Gordon Snidow of Belen, New Mexico, also featured in the Rendezvous, is scheduled to show in April and May. One of the youngest members of the Cowboy Artists of America, Snidow is a sensitive chronicler of today's cowboy through his paintings, drawings and sculpture. He often works along with the cowboys on the ranches he visits, gaining firsthand knowledge of the way of life he portrays in his art.

LEWIS AND CLARK SESSIONS INSPIRING

Some 90 people from 18 states, all of them imbued with the history and excitement of the Lewis and Clark Expedition, gathered in Helena August 9 through 11 for a remarkably informative and inspiring series of meetings. It was the annual meeting of the Lewis and Clark Trail Heritage Foundation, dedicated to the preservation of sites along the trail of the explorers, and the promotion of research and knowledge of "America's epic."

Among many special guests were three descendants of members of the "Corps of Discovery": William Clark Adreon of St. Louis, a direct descendant of Captian William Clark; Mrs. Darlene Fassler of Helena, whose antecedent was the redoubtable Patrick Gass, and Mrs. E. Stiles of Cherokee, Iowa, a descendant of George Druilliard, the expedition's dependable hunter.

The Foundation, which will hold its 1973 meeting in St. Louis next August, elected Lynn Burris, Jr. of Topeka, Kansas as its president. Robert E. Lange of Portland, Ore. was named vice president, while Joseph Jaeger, Jr. of Jefferson City, Mo. was re-elected treasurer. G. Edward (Gus) Budde of St. Louis, who edits the organization's newsletter, was elected secretary.

Reflecting its deep concern for preservation, the Foundation passed resolutions supporting the Lewis and Clark Trail under the National Trails System Act, and legislation to preserve the Missouri River Breaks, Beaverhead Rock near Dillon in Western Montana, and development of Camp Dubois near Wood River, Ill.

Above, Karen Larson of Helena, lovely young Gros Ventre Indian, gave an inspiring sign language presentation of the "Lord's Prayer" as Harold Paulsen, right above, sang the words to open a banquet program of the Lewis and Clark Trail Heritage Foundation. The evening's speaker was the eminent Lewis and Clark historian, Dr. Ernest S. Osgood of Wooster, Ohio, who is seen, at left, accepting a Meritorious Achievement Award from Dr. E. G. Chuinard of Portland, Ore., who made similar presentations the same evening to E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte and Editor Vivian Paladin. The handsome plaques, prepared especially for the Foundation, include the words, "For outstanding contributions in bringing to this nation a great awareness and appreciation of the Lewis and Clark Expedition."

The Historical Society has recently acquired, on an indefinite loan from Madison County, a handwritten report by Major James Brisbin relating to the investigation of frauds committed in dealing with the Indian reservations. Society authorities believe the papers contain the field notes gathered by Major Brisbin, as well as contributing affidavits.

The papers were discovered when workmen cleaned out the vault under the old Clerk of Court's office in the Madison County courthouse in Virginia City after the destructive fire there last summer. The collection will be restored and kept on file at the Historical Library indefinitely.

Tom Posey, Formerly of Truman Library, New Curator at Society

The Historical Society's new museum curator, Tom Posey, began his duties October 1, replacing Bob Morgan, who left to devote more time to his career as an artist, although still serving as a consultant for the Society.

Tom, who holds a B.A. in art history from the University of Missouri and his Master's Degree, also in art history, from the University of Kansas, is a newcomer to Montana. A native of New Mexico, he has been teaching art history at the Metropolitan Junior College in Kansas City, Missouri, on a part-time basis, while also serving as curator in charge of Audio Visual Production at the Harry S. Truman Library and Museum in Independence, Missouri, for several years.

Tom, who arrived just in time to become acquainted with many of the Society's members at the October Rendezvous of Western Art, says he plans no major changes for the museum in the near future, other than developing a better system of storing acquisitions in the museum's limited storage space.

He and his wife Ellouise (Ellie) have two sons, Doug, 12, and Scott, 10.

Brian Cockhill Finds Archival Convention Sessions Interesting

Brian Cockhill of our archival staff has returned from the annual convention of the Society of American Archivists at Columbus, Ohio, attended by some 600 members from every state and several foreign countries, including Australia. The conference was, as Brian put it, a "working" one, and only in a purely social sense could it be considered a flop, since socializing was kept "to a very bare minimum." Convention visitors, however, were treated to detailed tours of the building and operations of the new $12 million Ohio Historical Society Center.

Cockhill attended sessions on such subjects as Restrictions on Access to Manuscripts and Archives, The Invasion of Privacy vs. the Right to Know: the Harding-Phillips Letters, Ethical Responsibilities of the Researcher, and State and Regional Archival Organizations. He had special praise for a morning-long workshop on archival preservation of photographs. In view of the Montana Historical Society's present program of increased attention to its large picture collection, he found this session particularly valuable.

Former Montanan Reports On Congress of Archivists In Capital of the Soviets

Lionel Van Kersen of the Masonic Library of Southern California in Los Angeles recently reported on the VII International Congress on Archives, held in Moscow, U.S.S.R., to members of the Historical Society's archival staff. A teacher at Fergus County High School in Lewistown from 1924 to 1926, Van Kersen volunteered to represent the Society at the congress, which was attended by archivists from throughout the world.

A questionnaire on archival proceedings had been sent to all participating nations and Van Kersen discussed some of the results with John Coleman, Society archivist; Brian Cockhill and Jeff Cuniff, assistant archivists; Bob Gant, assistant curator, and Harriett Meloy, librarian.

Program Target: Historical Pictures

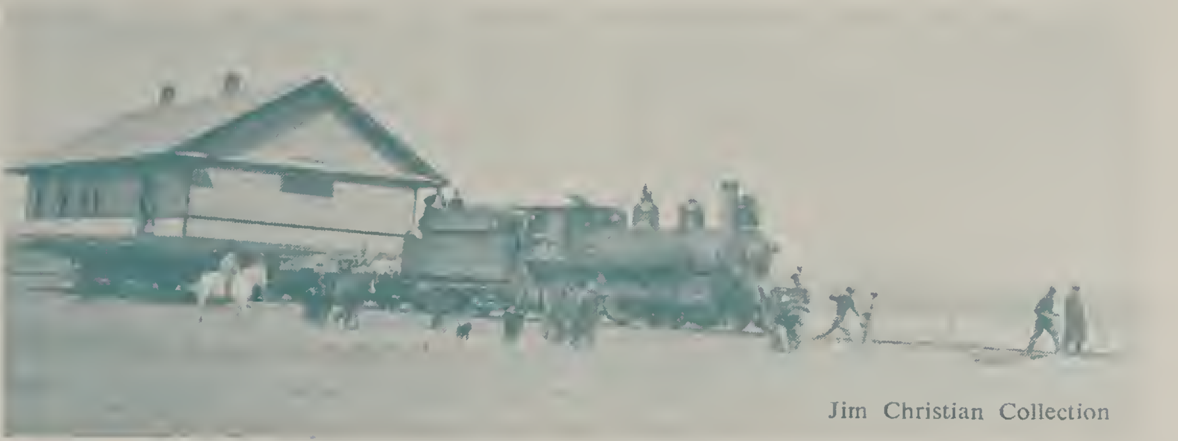
Jeffrey L. Cunniff, who recently joined the Historical Society staff as an assistant archivist, is employed through a grant to the Society from the American Revolution Bicentennial Commission. Jeff will spend most of his time working out a new system of cataloging the 30,000 photographs now in the Historical library's collection. He is also traveling throughout the state searching for records and photographs of Montana's past, giving slide presentations on his work to organizations to arouse interest in the history of Montana, and visiting high schools across the state to expand the number of Young Historian Programs, particularly in smaller communities.

In his search for old photographs, Jeff discovered this one of the Gilman, Montana train depot being moved to Augusta in 1925.



Jim Christian Collection

This picture was of special interest to Jeff since he had as the topic for his Master's thesis "The Failure of the Gilman State Bank." He is currently tracing the rivalry between Gilman and Augusta as they competed for dominance as the major commercial center of the Sun River Valley from 1912 to 1925. After the bank failed and the depot was moved to Augusta, Gilman ceased to exist.

A native of Great Falls, Jeff earned his M.A. from the University of Montana, Missoula. He and his wife, Kathy, a substitute teacher in the Helena school system, moved to Helena in August.

A SALUTE AND FAREWELL TO CASEY

Casey Barthelmess, beloved Montana pioneer and former member of the Historical Society's Board of Trustees, died October 9 in Billings at the age of 82. Known as "Howling Wolf" to the Cheyennes, into whose tribe he was adopted in 1959, Barthelmess served on our Board from 1959 to 1967.

Born July 18, 1890 at Fort Keogh, near present-day Miles City, Casey's interest in history began ". . . as soon as I was old enough to realize that Fort Keogh, and Miles City close by, were locations replete with history. . . ." His father, Christian, was a U.S. Army musician who became a photographer of the early-day scenes of Eastern Montana. In 1965, Casey collaborated on a book-length study of his father, "Photographer on an Army Mule."

The younger Barthelmess, who had a lifelong career in the cattle business, was, variously, an artist who studied in Chicago and St. Paul in 1916, a bronc rider who broke horses for the U.S. Army during World War I, and a top rodeo performer.

Barthelmess homesteaded on Mizpah Creek in 1913 and in 1921 married Anna Oby, a local schoolteacher. Survivors include his wife and their six children.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

A world heavyweight championship boxing match in Shelby, Montana? Preposterous and incredible! That it was and that is where it happened—on the Fourth of July, 1923. The antagonists were Jack Dempsey and Tommy Gibbons. The fight went the full 15 rounds to a decision for Dempsey, and the town of Shelby hasn't been the same since.

Stretching it a bit, Shelby in 1923 probably had 2,000 souls—a town where wheat, cattle and the beginnings of an oil field were making the citizens feel their oats. So, somebody said, "Let's invite the powers that be to have a world championship fight here." History is not clear—and present day Shelby residents themselves dispute the details—but the telegram was more a publicity stunt than a genuine offer. So, the boosters were more than surprised when a reply indicated interest. From there, things began to move.

Conditions were that Champion Dempsey was to receive $310,000. Tommy Gibbons was to receive 50 percent of all gate receipts after the first $310,000. Dempsey's manager, Jack Kearns, became the villain of the piece in its later stages, as the Montanans scrambled to raise the guarantee and Kearns kept issuing manifestoes that the fight would be off unless the cash was on the line. So it was an on and off thing until a few days before the final date.

Suffice it to say, the fight was held. News of the managerial infighting limited the crowd, although thousands came. Then ensued one of the greatest mass gate crashings in boxing history. Some say that probably half of those who saw the ring battle paid their way.

Fiscal effects on Shelby and Montana were sharp and negative. But Shelby was on the map. Montana historian Bob Fletcher remarked that more oil wells came in "and everybody lived happy ever after." In any event, Shelbyites are talking about a Golden Anniversary celebration next summer. Maybe Jack Dempsey will be there. And the oldtimers will continue arguments into the night about what really happened. In the perspective of 50 years, it still all seems incredible. But we have before us a copy of the official program. The front page art was sketched by "B. G. Stevenson." We know him as Branson Stevenson, a member of our Board of Trustees, living proof for us that it all happened.

Havre Museum, Community History Book Win Kudos

The H. Earl Clack Museum in Havre, under the curatorship of Mrs. Toni Hagener, a member of the Society's executive board, has won a national award from the American Association for State and Local History. The museum features local Indian artifacts, history of the Havre area and a small live wildlife division.

"Montana Genesis," a local history written by the Stevensville Historical Society, will also receive an award from the Association.

Sam Gilluly, Society director, said certificates of commendation will arrive soon and will be presented to both groups. He also noted that the two organizations were the only ones to be considered for awards this year by the Association.

New Institution at Sidney Honors Artist Ken Ralston

Formal opening of the J. K. Ralston Museum and Art Center in Sidney, Montana was held on Saturday, November 11, with an open house following on Sunday, during which Ralston, Montana's gifted artist-historian, made comments about a retrospective collection of his paintings which featured the opening. Hosts for the event, and the guiding lights behind the opening of this newest Montana museum and art center, were members of the Mon-Dak Historical and Arts Society. They do honor to "one of their own" at Sidney, for Ken Ralston, who now lives in Billings, spent many of his earlier years in this area of Eastern Montana, riding the range and getting to know its history. He has achieved mightily in recording both in his superbly researched paintings.

---

This copy of the front cover of the official program for the famed Dempsey-Gibbons fight, the subject of Director Gilluly's column for this issue, reveals only part of the fascinating information within. Statistics for both fighters were given, including the fact that Jack Dempsey was 28 years old (born in Manassa, Colo. June 24, 1895), that he started boxing in 1915, had had 60 fights up to this time, winning 40 by knockouts. He had been knocked out only once (by Jim Flynn, in one round), had been floored four times and boxed to four draws. He won the world's heavyweight championship on July 4, 1919, from Jess Willard at Toledo, Ohio. The "Manassa Mauler," as he was known, had the following measurements in 1923: Height, 6 feet 1 inch; weight, 188 pounds; neck 16½ inches; chest normal, 42 inches, expanded 45 inches; waist, 33; biceps, 18¼; forearm, 14¼; wrist, 9; thigh 23; calf, 15¼, and reach, 74 inches. Dempsey's hapless opponent, Tommy Gibbons, was 32 years old (born in St. Paul, March 22, 1891), and had been boxing since 1913. He had had 88 fights, won 37 of them by knockout, and had never been knocked out or down. Gibbons was just under 6 feet tall, and weighed 185 pounds. Other Gibbons measurements, in inches: neck, 17; chest normal 40, expanded 44; waist, 34; biceps, 14¾; forearm, 13; wrist, 9; thigh, 22; calf, 15¼; ankle, 9, and reach, 74 inches.

New Board Members Welcomed

Two Montana men have been appointed members of the Society's Board of Trustees by Gov. Forrest H. Anderson. The two, whose appointments became effective July 1, are Joe Medicine Crow of Lodge Grass and Mel Ruder of Columbia Falls. Medicine Crow replaces Mrs. Stella Foote of Billings, who has been on the Board for five years. Ruder replaces Whitney Smith of Whitefish, who has served on the Board since September of 1959.

At the same time, Governor Anderson announced the reappointment of Mrs. Charles A. Bovey of Great Falls and Virginia City. Mrs. Bovey, who has served since 1961, is a past president of the Board.

Medicine Crow, a member of the Crow tribe, is of Indian-French heritage. Married and the father of three grown children, he operates a wheat and cattle ranch near Lodge Grass. He holds a B.S. degree in sociology, an M.S. in anthropology and has done work toward his Ph.D. in anthropology. Interested in the traditions and legacies of his tribe, Medicine Crow has spent 10 years as official tribal historian and anthropologist. He has taught courses and for over 15 years and given lectures on Crow history. A director of the Custer Battlefield Historical and Museum Association at Crow Agency, he has written the historical outline and parts of the script for the annual Custer Battle Reenactment. He has served for 20 years as master of ceremonies for the All America Indian Days at Sheridan, Wyoming, and has been instrumental in discovering, recording and preserving archeological sites on and near the Crow Reservation.

Medicine Crow has a long career in service for the federal government. For 20 years he worked in real property and appraisal work and was recently reassigned to the branch of education, Bureau of Indian Affairs, where he is working with the Crow tribe in the formulation and establishment of a new and sophisticated education program.

Mel Ruder, editor of the Hungry Horse News in Columbia Falls since 1946, won a Pulitzer Prize for general local reporting in 1965 for his account of the 1964 flood, making his the only Montana newspaper to win this award. He holds a B.A. in journalism and an M.A. degree in sociology, both of which have been put to good use on his newspaper — which is published in a log building built in 1947.

Ruder learned the intricacies of photography as a newscameraman in Yellowstone during the summers of 1936 and 1937, working for the renowned Park photographer, the late Jack E. Haynes. His varied career includes teaching journalism at the University of North Dakota in 1940, a stint as an industrial relations specialist for Westinghouse Electric Corporation in Pennsylvania, and some time in public relations for American Machine and Foundry in New York City. He served in the U.S. Navy for three years and was discharged as a lieutenant.

Ruder's career in Montana journalism began when he heeded the words of a friend who told him in 1946: "Someone will be starting a newspaper in Columbia Falls again, and it might as well be you." Ruder says he has had to build his newspaper circulation "without Ann Landers, Dear Abby and the funnies." He and his wife, the former Ruth Bergan, have a married daughter, Mrs. Douglas Morton, and one grandchild.

Ruder was president of the Montana Press Association in 1957-58, is the chairman of the Board of Directors of the Bank of Columbia Falls, a former chairman of the District 6 School Board, and past president of the Columbia Falls Chamber of Commerce and the Flathead Associated Chambers of Commerce.

Medicine Crow and Ruder were welcomed to the Board of Trustees at the Board's July 21 meeting in Helena.

Historic Helena Hosts Lewis and Clark Trail Group's Annual Meeting

Helena was the scene, August 9 through 11, of the annual meeting of the Lewis and Clark Trail Heritage Foundation, and it was an occasion to remember. Scholars and laymen alike, all of them enthusiasts of the epic journey of the captains and their "corps of discovery," gathered from many states for a series of luncheons, dinners, and sessions of serious discussion.

Heading up Montana planning for the events were E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, a member of the Society's Board of Trustees, and Josephine Brooker, assistant director of the Montana Advertising Department. Sitting in, and participating, have been Society Trustees Hal Stearns of Harlowton, Wilbur P. Werner of Cut Bank, and Mrs. Stella Foote of Billings.

Dinner speaker Wednesday evening, August 9, was Dr. Ernest S. Osgood of Wooster, Ohio, noted western historian and an authority on the Expedition. Luncheon speakers included Mrs. Foote, who owns the famed landmark, Pompey's Pillar, near Billings, and Dr. E. G. Chuinard, Portland, Ore., physician who has played a leading role in the Foundation's efforts to mark the trail and campsites from St. Louis to the Oregon coast.

Stearns and Werner were also luncheon speakers during the three-day conference, which included such highlights as tours of the Society's galleries and museums, dinner atop MacDonald Pass at unique Frontier Town, and an excursion boat trip through the Gates of the Mountains north of Helena, the spectacular Missouri River Canyon described and named by Lewis and Clark.

Among special guests were three descendants of participants in the Expedition: Mrs. John Fassler, who recently moved to Helena from California and who is a direct descendant of Patrick Gass; Mrs. E. S. Stiles of Cherokee, Iowa, whose forebear was the hunter of the Corps, George Druillard, and William Clark Adreon of St. Louis, great great grandson of Captain William Clark.

Bob Scriver unveils his Gold Medal-winning sculpture, AN HONEST TRY, now in the permanent collection of The Montana Historical Society, to open the showing of his splendid series of rodeo bronzes. Assisting him is Bobbi Wirth of Wolf Creek, Mont., reigning this year as Miss Rodeo Montana, and model for another great model in the show, RODEO QUEEN'S GRAND ENTRY.

Opening day, Saturday, June 3, was officially proclaimed Bob Scriver Day in Montana by Gov. Forrest H. Anderson. Society Board President Hal Stearns of Harlowton here presents the sculptor with the proclamation, which takes note of Scriver's artistic achievements. Board Member Henry Ruegamer of Hardin is seen in the background.

SCRIVER SHOW OPENS

Former Curator Bob Morgan chats with the sculptor about the massive bronze, NOT FOR GLORY, which depicts the unsung heroism of the rodeo "pick-up men" who rescue many a cowboy from disaster in the arena. Morgan, who arranged the Scriver showing, slated to continue through September, is now a museums consultant for the Society.

Bill Cochran, veteran rodeo performer, was the model for the imposing AN HONEST TRY, a depiction of bull-riding, rodeo's most dangerous event. Cochran poses with the sculptor in this picture, taken just after the unveiling of the huge bronze, acquired for the Society and now on display in our lobby.

Karen Larsen, Proud
Represents Hope [illegible]or

Her name is Karen Larsen, the pure Scandinavian last name coming from her paternal great grandfather, the scrappy "Mormon Zack" Larsen, immortalized in word and picture by Charles M. Russell in his first Rawhide Rawlins book. Her other paternal great grandfather was Ragged Robe, the last tribal medicine man of the Gros Ventre tribe at Fort Belknap, in Eastern Montana. Except for "Mormon Zack," all her antecedents were Gros Ventre with a slight mixture of Assiniboine blood from her mother's side of the family.

She is 18 years old, and when we talked with her she was preparing to leave with the title Miss Indian Helena to compete in the annual Miss Indian America competition in Sheridan, Wyoming. Her older sister, now Mrs. Ruth Homer of Scottsdale, Arizona, was the fifth Miss Indian America in 1959. But it is not family succession that suggests Karen is a viable candidate for the honor, nor is it the reason why she represents the finest of Indian youth.

f Forebears, rdian Future

A serious, attractive and straight-forward young woman, Karen shares the hopes of so many that the Indian is on the threshold of finding, once and for all, his own cultural heritage—and that he is finding it through increasingly valid Indian studies programs at the college level. It is Karen's private hope that she can help initiate these same programs on the junior and senior high school levels, especially the latter. Her particular contribution, she hopes, will be in languages, which she will study at Montana State University in Bozeman, beginning this fall. She has a working knowledge of the Gros Ventre language, learned from her grandmother, Mrs. Angela Larsen, with whom she lives in Helena. Pointing out that the Gros Ventre language is rapidly disappearing, she feels an urgency about learning as much as she can.

A striking thing about Karen, and it is a hopeful trait of many young Indian people, is the fact that she freely talks about her Norwegian-born great grandfather, "Mormon Zack." One senses more pride, though, when she talks about Ragged Robe, who lived to be in his 90's on the Gros Ventre Reservation at Fort Belknap, searching about for his herbs and nostrums when he was totally blind but still practicing as a medicine man. Karen's grandmother remembers him telling about the olden times when he was a scout for his tribe and learning to become a medicine man.

Montana is proud of another of her young Indian women, 24-year-old Thomasine Hill of Crow Agency, Mont., a Crow-Pawnee who was Miss Indian America in 1969 and is now a pre-law student at the University of Arizona. Recently appointed by President Nixon to the American Revolution Bicentennial Commission, she was the keynote speaker late in July at the National Student Council's National Leadership Training Conference in Hot Springs, Arkansas. In addressing high school student council leaders recently in Chicago, Thomasine gave these thoughts on the significance of America's upcoming observance of its 200th anniversary: "If the Bicentennial serves to illumine the true diversity in the American people — and that great heritage inherent in the different peoples who made this country — that would be the greatest gift we could give ourselves in 1976."

CLASSIC OLD THRESHERS COME TO LIFE FOR CULBERTSON EVENT

by BELVINO BERTINO

It will be nostalgic threshing time in Culbertson, Montana, the last week-end in September as the ninth annual Northeastern Montana Threshing Bee and Antique Show gets underway. Crowds, which exceeded 5,000 last year, join the crews at sunrise for a hearty breakfast, served promptly at 6:30. Then the classic old steam engines of the tractors are fired up, their spine-chilling whistles announcing that the day's program of events is about to get underway. Bundle threshing brings back vivid memories to many of the older guests as they watch their favorite rigs perform. Sometimes an old-timer will clamber atop the loaded rack and show the youngsters how to pitch bundles.

Two days of packed activity feature races in which the heaviest tractors compete with each other, and there are races for lighter units, too. The last vehicle to cross the line in each division is the winner; a tractor throttled down so low that it stops in mid-course is disqualified. Then there is the belting-up contest, in which the operator lines up his tractor so the endless belt rubs neither separator or tractor. There are displays of old stationary engines, flour and feed and sawmills, a fresh strawpile for the kids to play in, oldtime fiddling and dancing on the grass.

This unique annual event started in 1964, when those who have collected or have a yen for old-time threshing rigs assembled six units for the first event. In 1971, over 90 restored steam engines and antique gasoline and kerosene tractors took part, and more are anticipated when sunrise comes the last day of the harvest month of September this year.

Bob Scriver Accepts For Himself—And Us

Bob Scriver of Browning, Montana, one of the West's most honored living artists, is seen here accepting a silver medal for his great rodeo sculpture, NOT FOR GLORY, at the recent awards dinner of the National Cowboy Hall of Fame in Oklahoma City. At the same event, he accepted a special silver medal award for The Montana Historical Society, honoring MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY for the most significant contribution to western art made by a publication during 1971. Shown with Scriver in the presentation picture is, left, Thomas Buechner of Corning, N.Y., one of the judges in the Cowboy Artists of America competition for which Scriver won his medal. The Historical Society, which is currently showing the entire 32-piece series of Scriver rodeo sculptures, is gratified at both awards.

Mrs. MacDonald Spoke For A Vast Area At Chicago Meet

Mrs. Marie MacDonald of Glendive, a member of our Board of Trustees, represented the Sagebrush Federation of Libraries at the American Library Association's annual conference in Chicago the last week in June, and reported that in the midst of professional sessions at the Chicago Historical Society and the Newberry Library, interest was shown in the fact that the Sagebrush Federation, encompassing seven counties in Eastern Montana, represents more territory than the six smallest states in the Eastern United States. Mrs. MacDonald, who is librarian at Glendive Public Library, pointed out that the federation provides library service, including bookmobiles and drivers, for the vast areas of Custer, Dawson, Garfield, Fallon, Carter, Powder River and Rosebud counties.

Bob Gant Embarks On Survey of Museums, Ethnic Education

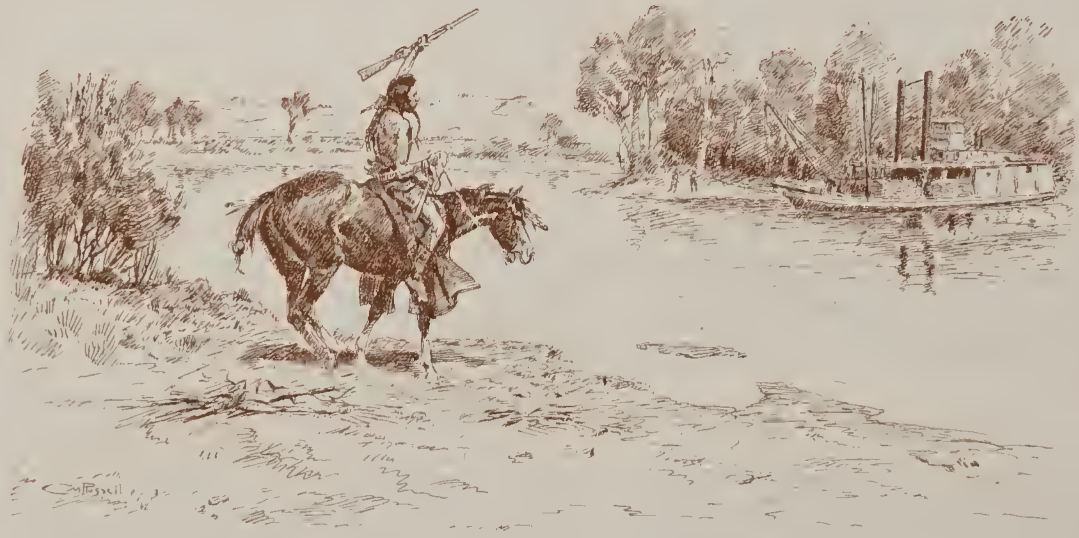
Bob Gant, assistant curator and registrar of the Society's museum in Helena, has received a $3,360 fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts in Washington, D.C. to conduct a three-month survey on methods being used in Indian education. He plans to begin field work later this month, followed by a period devoted to compiling his findings and suggestions.

"The trend in Indian education is toward establishing a cultural and tribal identity," Gant said, "but educators are having trouble deciding how to do this. The museum educational concept should be a good way to approach the problem, because the history involved is easily shown in film lectures and traveling displays."

Gant explained that the museum method would utilize textbooks, films and artifacts of the cultures the children are studying.

He also plans to develop programs to change the points of view of many museums, the majority of whose exhibits are still slanted toward the average white American. "The exhibits should also be oriented toward ethnic points of view," Gant stated. "For instance, the legends under exhibits could be in both English and the tribal language. They should utilize the Indian concepts and values and give the Indian side of the story—as the Indians felt it, not as the whites saw it. This would greatly promote better understanding between Indians and whites."

Curley Reaches the Far West With the Story of the Custer Fight



Now available in large size, suitable for framing, is Russell's dramatic drawing of the Crow scout, Curley, bringing the first news of the Custer tragedy to the steamer FAR WEST, moored at the mouth of the Little Big Horn on June 27, 1876, two days after the famous commander and his men met their fate. Now in the collection of the Rockwell Gallery of Corning, New York, the original is here faithfully reproduced in large (16 by 23 inches) size on high quality textured paper.

MONTANA MAGAZINES ARE VICTIMS OF FLOOD

Keith Cochran of Rapid City, South Dakota, a reader of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY since 1964, recently sent us the picture at left, along with a note: "In the stack of books by the house is a complete set of MONTANA, all of them bound. Several volumes were the limited editions put out by you with the Russell print on the cover." Thus the magazine became one more casualty of the devastating flood which hit Rapid City on June 9. It is our hope that we can assist Reader Cochran in replacing at least some of his collection of the magazine, now in its twenty-second year of publication. In case any of our readers want to help, too, perhaps by locating some collector's item issues, his full address is Box 628, Keystone Rt., Rapid City, S. D. 57701.

in MONTANA'S YOUNG HISTORIAN PROGRAM

Beginning with the school year 1970, an exciting program of classroom and field participation in research and writing Montana history was started in the junior and senior high schools of our state under joint sponsorship of the University of Montana's Department of History and The Montana Historical Society. One tangible result has been the publication, three times each academic year, of MONTANA HISTORIAN, a colorful, illustrated journal containing the best articles submitted by students involved in the program. We invite our readers to participate with us in this worthy and expanding program by becoming readers, through the mail, of MONTANA HISTORIAN. We can offer the first four issues at $8.00 per set, while the supply lasts. At the same time, all schools of Montana or any other state, students and all others who have an interest in the grassroots history of Montana are invited to subscribe to MONTANA HISTORIAN on a regular basis. Subject matter is as varied as Montana itself. All articles are illustrated with documentary photographs and art from The Montana Historical Society and the University of Montana Library. # Dialogue with the Director

We at the Montana Historical Society see a growth and resurgence of interest and activity in Montana's history and heritage. It couldn't come at a better time, for the next four years, nationally, and in states and communities, will build up to the Bicentennial of the American Revolution.

Although the Revolution came at a time before any recorded history in Montana, nevertheless we are being encouraged to emphasize our story as it was then. Governor Forrest H. Anderson has designated the Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society as ex-officio the American Revolution Bicentennial Commission for Montana. We were recently informed that our application for a grant of $45,000 in the current fiscal year has been granted to the Commission in Montana. These funds will be used to develop historical and related projects.

I said the effort couldn't come at a better time. Opened recently was a new county museum in Glasgow. This roadside structure has as its theme, "From Buffalo Bones to Sonic Boom," which is the title of a Valley county history written a decade ago by Vivian Paladin, now editor of our MONTANA Magazine and The Montana Post. The writer spoke at the official opening of the museum, which has a good start on its story line, both in exhibits and artifacts.

Scheduled for official opening later this year in Sidney is a regional museum that will honor J. K. Ralston, one of Montana's great artists who began his career as a ranch kid not far from Sidney. Our Society museum staff has given technical assistance and layout advice to Sidney's museum group.

Deer Lodge area residents are giving serious consideration to a museum location in that city. As one historian has remarked, anyone who lives in this valley must be close to Montana's past—and in many ways.

The roll call could go on to other Montana communities, and we are here listing only those with which the Society has worked closely in recent years.

The activity becomes even more meaningful as we look, in the next four years, at Montana's and the nation's past. Shortly, our Board, in its function as the ARBC for Montana, will be announcing plans to participate in and stimulate these activities.

"RENDEZVOUS OF WESTERN ART" TO BE MAJOR SOCIETY EVENT

At least sixteen of the American West's leading contemporary artists will be represented in the first annual "Rendezvous of Western Art" at The Montana Historical Society, from October 21 to November 21. This imposing aggregation of western art in all major media has been planned for many months by Bob Morgan, Society consultant, and the museum staff. Each artist will show at least three pieces, one of them a major work, and most will be available for sale during the nearly four weeks of showing.

Olaf Weighorst of El Cajon, Calif., one of America's greatest living artists, will be especially honored at the show, and will be represented by at least a half dozen of his major paintings from the private collection of Malcolm S. (Bud) Mackay of Long Lake, Minn. Mackay will be honorary chairman of this first annual event, and, along with Weighorst, will be a special guest at the opening events slated for Saturday, October 21.

"This is the most ambitious single art showing, and in many ways it is a unique showing, for the Society," Morgan remarked. "It will be so extensive, in fact, that both the C. M. Russell Gallery and the adjacent Poindexter Gallery will be filled." He added that he was sure Charlie Russell would "go along" with the concept.

As we go to press, the following artists have announced participation: Sheryl Bodily of Columbia Falls, Mont.; Gary Schildt of Kalispell, Mont.; Tom Sander of Kalispell, Mont.; William Schimmel of Jackson, Wyo.; J. K. Ralston of Billings, Mont.; John Clymer of Teton Village, Wyo.; Tom Ryan of Lubbock, Tex.; James Boren of Clifton, Tex.; Gordon Snidow of Belen, N.M.; Bill Moyers of Albuquerque, N. M.; Irvin (Shorty) Shope of Helena; Bob Scriver of Browning, Mont.; Fred Fellows of Bigfork, Mont.; Brownell McGrew of Cottonwood, Ariz., and Joe Beeler of Sedona, Ariz.

A large format, hardbound catalog, including full-color art reproductions and illustrated biographical sketches on the artists, will be published for the event by The Society in association with the Curtis Galleries of Spokane, Wash.

RODEO IN BRONZE BY BOB SCRIVER

If our excitement is showing, we have a reason. Scheduled for exhibit, from June through September, will be a showing of thirty-two bronzes depicting the uniquely American sport of Rodeo in all its action and beauty and danger. They were conceived, sculptured and cast in bronze by Bob Scriver of Browning, who has received virtually every honor the contemporary world of art can bestow.

The Scriver show, which will be honored with the publication of a fully illustrated catalog, is a long-held plan of Curator Bob Morgan, who is pictured here with Scriver at the artist's studio in Browning. The occasion was the final casting process of some of these immense sculptures in Scriver's own foundry in Browning, on Montana's Blackfeet Reservation. Morgan accompanied Photographer Garry Wunderwald of the Highway Advertising Department to make both personal and formal portraits of Scriver and his rodeo bronzes. Seen at the bottom of this page are just two examples, in small aspect, of these magnificent pieces.

The show, scheduled for the Poindexter Gallery on the main floor of the Society's building, will officially open on Saturday evening, June 3, with a reception for the artist and an unveiling of the great Gold Medal-winning bronze, AN HONEST TRY, which has been acquired for the Society's permanent collection

As the photograph demonstrates, the Society's "back yard" resembles a battlefield these days. The photo shows our rear entrance, with the Treasure State's Capital building in the background.

The Montana legislature, in its 1971 session, appropriated funds in the long-range building program to provide for surfacing our rear parking lot and landscaping the area. When State Architect Philip H. Hauck opened bids on the project, it was found that funds were sufficient for two additions to the original contract. One is a sidewalk along the entire north side of the Society's block in the Capitol Complex. Another will provide for an intriguing display of four flags representing the nations that have had dominion over present-day Montana, or parts of it. In this same grouping will be mounted the massive Henry Lion bronze depicting Lewis and Clark and Sacajawea, a graphic reminder of the Corps of Discovery's travels here in 1805-06. Appropriate lighting will set off the figures and flags.

The new blacktopped parking area, so much needed for our visitors, will be surrounded by carefully planted lawn, shrubs and trees. Cedar corduroy walks will help provide access from part of the parking area to the rear entrance. Sharbono Construction of Helena is the contractor, with Davidson and Kuhr of Great Falls as architects.

Since we are in the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building, and the state's major veterans' organizations are housed in our building, an object returning to the lot is the "40 and 8" boxcar sponsored many years ago by the veterans' group of the same name.

"Vot der hell fell?" groans a battered Adolf Hitler as the ruins of Berlin blaze in the background and a caption proclaims that "a little bit of Butte Hill fell from out the sky one day . . ." This is one of hundreds of humorous, sentimental, and unabashedly patriotic wartime cartoons produced by John J. Powers of Butte, who recently shared with us a vast collection of his work, spanning an amazing career and an amazing array of subject matter.

The battered Fuehrer cartoon is one of dozens which Powers produced for the Anaconda Company during World War II and which were printed in envelope size for enclosure with miners' pay checks. Hitler was not the only villain: there was a leering Tojo, an over-indulged Goering and a nervous little Goebbels. And there were heroes: a muscular Douglas MacArthur dealing a knock-out blow to a Nipponese enemy on Luzon as a caption admonishes the miners to "give him plenty of brass knuckles"; a handsome General Eisenhower ("American of German descent") whose boot, sheathed in U.S. metal, gives the "ultimate defeat" kick to a Prussian militarist who screams, "Himmel! First Pershing! Und now Eisenhower plays hob mit me!"

But these wartime cartoons are only a sampling of the work of John Powers, who retired in 1969 after serving for more than a quarter century as safety artist for The Anaconda Company. It was during this period that he produced a prodigious number of safety cartoons and posters which found their way to a worldwide audience, in several languages. One National Safety Council booklet pictures a miner leading two small boys through an abandoned mine, pointing out the dangers of foul air, rotting timber, and unused explosives. Powers' own experiences as a miner before he became a cartoonist are evident in all his work on mine safety. Many of his large posters, some of them reproduced by gelatin process, are still on display in the Butte Vo-Tech Center.

John Powers was born in Providence, Rhode Island, and was just over a year old when his miner-father found work on "The Hill" and moved his family to Butte. Like many future artists, John found his first exposure in his high school yearbook, The Mountaineer. After graduating from Butte High School in 1922, he took a correspondence course in cartooning and later put in some serious study at the Chicago Academy of Fine Arts and the Chicago Art Institute.

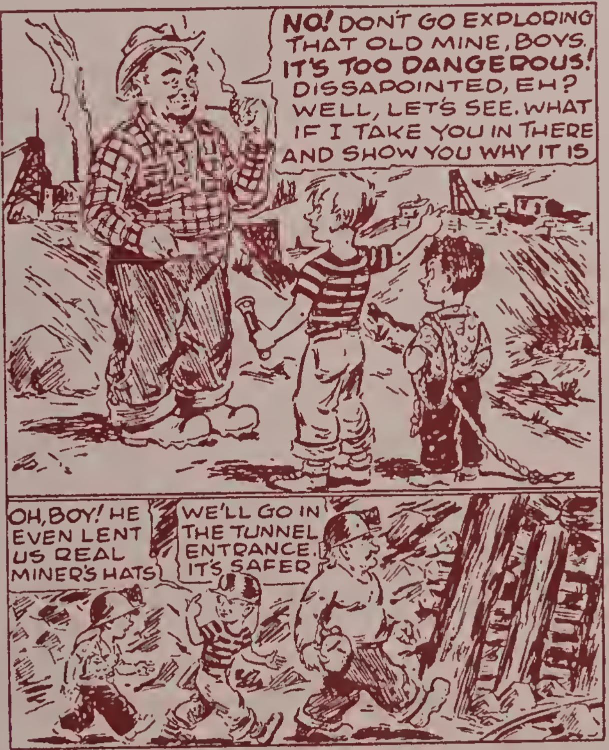
THE NAME "THE MONTANA POST" IS USED HEREIN WITH THE PERMISSION OF THE HISTORIC LANDMARK SOCIETY OF MONTANA.

John worked as a trammer, motorman and miner from 1925 until 1938, meanwhile picking up some free-lance assignments as an illustrator. Some of his earliest safety cartoons appeared in a company publication called The Anode. Also as a free-lancer, Powers produced a great number of political cartoons for The Montana American, The Butte Miner, Butte Daily Post and The Montana Standard, on assignment from such Montana editors as Byron Cooney, Dick Kilroy, J. H. Durston, Will A. Campbell, E. G. Leipheimer, Martin Hutchens, and Law Risken. Charles W. Towne and Joe Markham, well known Montana publicists, also used the skill of Powers to good advantage.

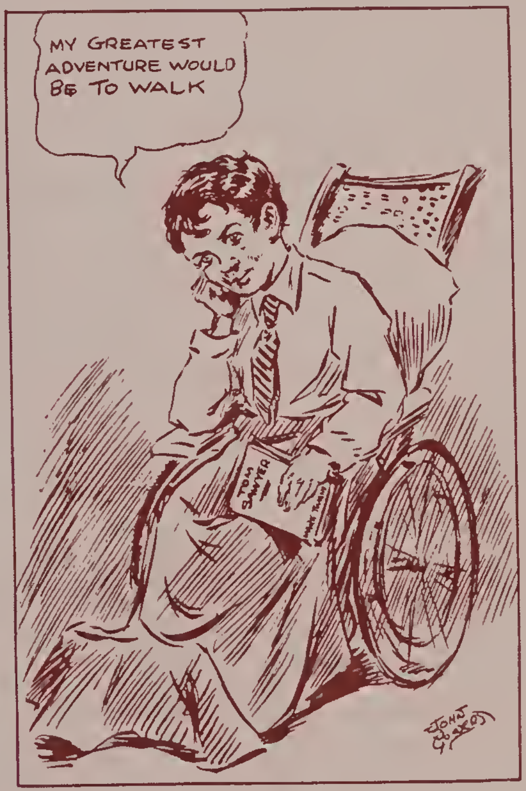
Early in 1932, John recalls that C. F. Willis, owner and editor of the semi-monthly Mining Journal of Phoenix, Arizona, "gave me a free rein" on the conception and execution of the so-called "Levity Lode" cartoons. These ranged from graphic commentaries about safety, as one in which the skeleton head of a painted siren calls out, "Come on, Honey, an' forget your safety first," to biting pictorial satires against those who set aside land for public domain while the voice of the mining men who wanted to stockpile war metals went ignored as "just a voice crying loud in the bewilderness." The Levity Lode series continued until 1947, when Willis sold his journal to The Mining World.



NO! DON'T GO EXPLORING THAT OLD MINE, BOYS. IT'S TOO DANGEROUS! DISSAPOINTED, EH? WELL, LET'S SEE. WHAT IF I TAKE YOU IN THERE AND SHOW YOU WHY IT IS
OH, BOY! HE EVEN LENT US REAL MINER'S HATS
WE'LL GO IN THE TUNNEL ENTRANCE. IT'S SAFER

Some of Powers' early cartoons were also featured in two medical publications, Clinical Medicine of Chicago and Medical Pickwick of New York.

It was in 1942 that Powers became safety artist for The Anaconda Company, but even after his retirement, the mining section of the National Safety Council's newsletter has continued to publish reruns as well as fresh cartoons from his facile pen.



MY GREATEST ADVENTURE WOULD BE TO WALK
JOHN POWERS

Today, after more than half a century as a published artist, John Powers still sketches at his easel at his home in Butte. And although people from many lands are most familiar with his mine safety illustrations or remember best his patriotic lampoonings of Hitler and Tojo, his own favorite is one he did for the March 20, 1934, issue of The Montana Standard. Aimed at collecting money for Butte's handicapped children, it depicts a child in a wheelchair who says, "My greatest adventure would be to walk."

COMPELLING FIGURE STUDIES BY YOUNG ARTIST DISPLAYED

A collection of sensitive, beautifully executed figure studies by Michael Moore, talented young Helena artist who recently received his M.A. in fine art from the University of Arizona, were slated for a three-week showing in the Poindexter Gallery in May, with a reception for the artist featured on Tuesday, May 18. Working in ink, charcoal, chalk and pastel, Moore is especially skilled in steroscopic drawing.

STATE LIBRARIANS ATTEND DAY-LONG SOCIETY SESSION

The annual meeting of the Montana Library Association, slated for May 11, 12 and 13 in Helena, meant busy days for The Society, and especially for our Librarian, Harriett Meloy. More than 300 librarians from throughout the state were entertained on the evening of May 11 with a reception in our building, but the really busy day was Saturday, May 13, when three separate sessions were held.

Dale Johnson, archivist for the University of Montana at Missoula, and Don Bird of the Helena High School history faculty, conducted an in-depth discussion of the Junior Historian program, launched nearly two years ago and now in need of broad support if it is to continue operations and publication of THE MONTANA HISTORIAN, a journal in which the best articles gathered under the program on the junior and senior high school level are published.

There followed two panels of discussion by historians and archivists about the Council to Preserve Montana History, a group recently organized on Montana University campuses, with the cooperation of The Society, the aim of which is to establish rapport and cooperation among all institutions concerned in gathering, preserving and disseminating historical information and records.

Participants included Archivist Dale Johnson and Historians Don McMillan and K. Ross Toole of the University of Montana; Librarian Minnie Paugh, Archivist David Horne and Historians Mike Malone and Jeffrey Safford of Montana State University at Bozeman, and the Society's Librarian Meloy and Archivists John Coleman and Brian Cockhill.

After the discussions, the librarians were taken on a tour of our stack levels and the new archival space on the ground floor level, where a vast amount of collections and materials are currently under process by Coleman and Cockhill.

ROBERT F. MORGAN, who has been associated with The Society in one role or another for nearly two decades, announced last month that he will leave our full time staff as Curator in order to devote more time to his own pursuit of fine art. He will continue to live in Helena and will serve as consultant for The Society for an indefinite time. A native of Helena, Bob Morgan is a self-taught artist whose versatile talents have been reflected in virtually every phase of our operations: museum displays, creation of the Territorial Junction street museum, sculpture, design and lay-out of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY and our many other Society brochures and publications.

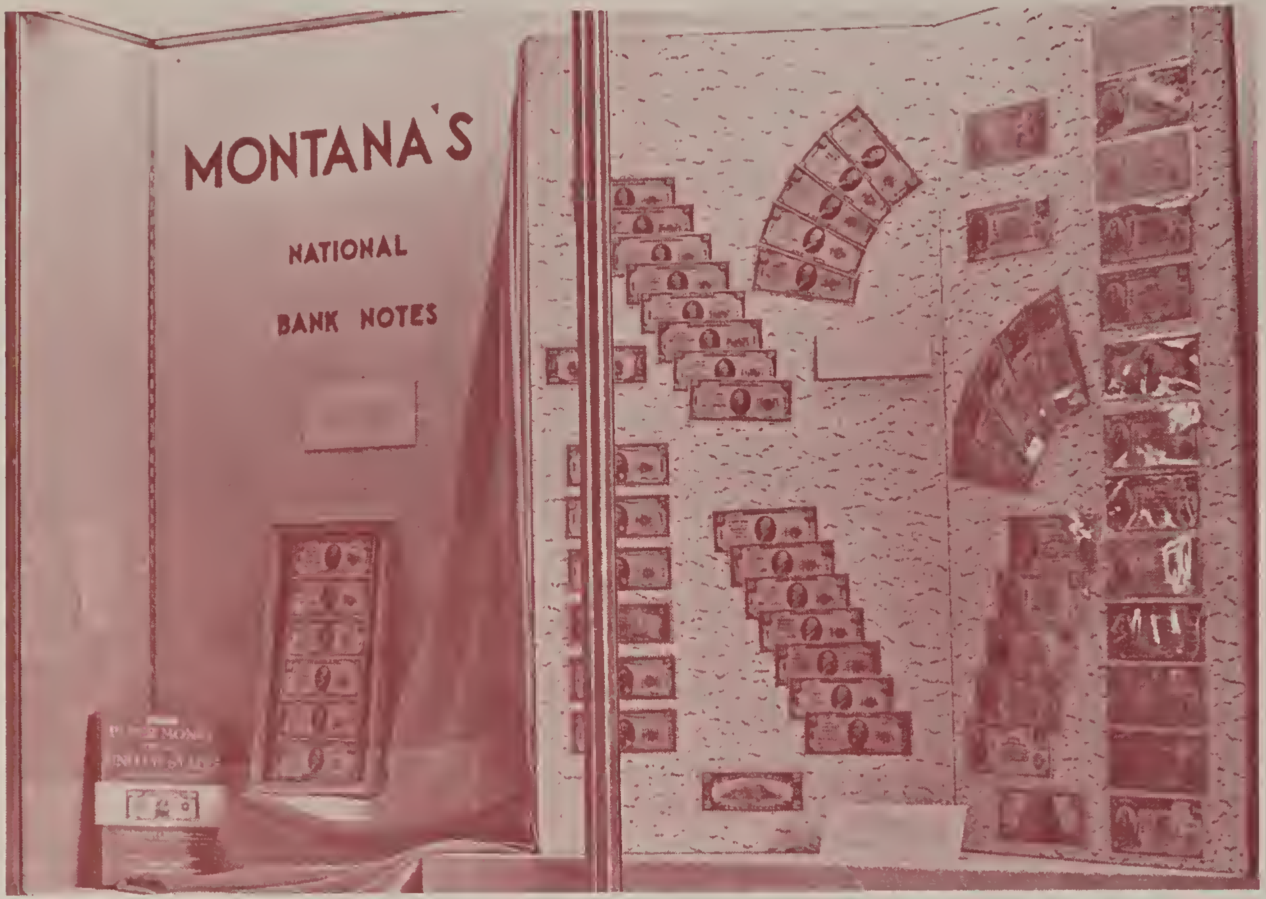
HISTORIC MONTANA BANK NOTES MAKE TANTALIZING VIEWING IN MAIN LOBBY



This collection of 45 Montana national bank notes, dating from 1908 to 1935, was on display in the Society's main floor lobby the last three months. The notes, valued at several thousand dollars, were part of the collection of Milton Sloan, Whitefish postmaster. Sloan began gathering the notes seven years ago when a New York dealer sold him an uncut page of six $10 bills issued by the Whitefish, Mont., bank. His most valuable note is a $50 bill issued by The First National Bank of Butte, for which he paid $325. Bank notes were printed by the Treasury Department after the individual banks posted government bonds to cover the face amount. The notes resemble regular bills, with two exceptions: the name of the bank is printed on each note, and the notes from 1908 to 1928 are larger than those printed from 1929 to 1935, which are the same size as today's dollar bill. Sloan said the earlier issues were called "horse blankets." Banks in 80 Montana communities issued the notes. Some of the banks, like those in Ismay, Raymond, and Roy, have long since ceased to operate.

Doings of the Staff

Mrs. Susan Bangs, who has been editorial assistant to Editor Vivian Paladin the past nine months, has returned to Missoula, where her husband, Rich, recently back from Viet Nam, is finishing work on his degree in journalism and currently serving as managing editor of The Kaimin, university newspaper. Joining the editorial staff in mid-May was Mrs. Mary Lou Connor, the former Mary Lou O'Neil of Havre. A graduate of Havre Central High School, Mary Lou took her B.A. in journalism from the University of Montana in 1970 after attending Northern Montana College for two years. She is married to John P. Connor, a graduate of the UM law school and now a member of the staff of Atty. Gen. Robert Woodahl.

Rick Davenport, a Helena High junior and part-time staffer in our Library, recently attended a meeting on the status of the nation's youth in Denver. Rick was one of three Montana delegates to NCSCCY (National Council of State Councils on Children and Youth). More than 150 delegates from the 50 states and five districts and territories attended.

We were gratified to hear that MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY took home the bacon for the eighth straight year in the annual writing contests of the Montana Federation of Press Women. It was another first place award, which means it will be automatically entered in the national contest in June when the National Federation of Press Women gathers in Seattle for its convention. Six times, the magazine has gone on to win first place national awards.

COLLECTION OF CLASSIC WATCHES FINDS PERMANENT HOME IN MUSEUM

A pocket and pendant watch collection of 274 pieces, valued at more than $6,000, has come to The Montana Historical Society from the late Edwin Paschke (left) of Billings, Mont. Paschke, who died in September of last year, was a body shop repairman whose unusual interests led to watch and clock collecting and flower gardening. Instrumental in making the gift to the Society were the late donor's brother, L. A. Paschke of Billings, and Dr. Paul V. Hoyer, also of Billings, who catalogued the entire collection. A native of Eastern Montana, Paschke began his search for timepieces in 1948. For over twenty years, he attended auctions and visited pawnshops in efforts to retrieve what are commonly called "railroad watches." These antiques (the "oldest" is 119 years old and still running), bear both famous and forgotten names. Some are gold plated with ornately engraved or initialed cases, others are silver plated with open faces. More than two-thirds of the timepieces still run. The collection will be on view in the Society's lobby early this summer. Later it will be on permanent display in the jewelry shop of Territory Junction, a frontier village facsimile on the ground floor of the museum. Appropriately, the shop will be renamed The Paschke Shop.

Dialogue with the Director

As the broadcasters remark, we have a pot-pourri of news and comments for this issue.

First is good news from Montana's recent constitutional convention.

Final section of the proposed constitutional article on environment and natural resources contains this language:

"CULTURAL RESOURCES: The legislature shall provide for the identification, acquisition, restoration, enhancement, preservation and administration of scenic, historic, archeologic, scientific, cultural and recreational areas, sites, records and objects, and for their use and enjoyment by the people."

Montanans will ballot on the constitution early in June. Several delegates to the constitution actively supported the section quoted and the writer testified in support of it at their invitation and by action of our Board of Trustees.

Environs of our Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building look like a battleground these days as the contractor pushes work on a state project for surfacing our new rear parking lot and landscaping this and other areas. Certainly, our environment will be improved and we will have more room for the summer rush of visitors.

An exciting part of the landscaping will be a special area with four flags showing the different nations that at one time or other had dominion over what is today Montana. With this will be mounted a large bronze showing Lewis and Clark and the Indian woman, Sacajawea.

All this show comes from a sketch plan by our Curator, Bob Morgan. Which leads us to news we regret to contemplate: Elsewhere you will read of Bob's decision to leave the Society and strike out on his own as an artist. He is well on the way to recognition in his field and we anticipate his success. At the same time, his diversity of talents and accomplishments will be truly missed by our staff and board. So many interpretations, so many improvements, so many exciting ideas have come from Bob's busy mind for the benefit of the Society. We all say "Thank You" and wish the best for him. — SAM GILLULY

Two of Our Ladies Are Honored

Mrs. Antoinette (Toni) Hagener of Havre, a member of our Board of Trustees, recently received her town's 1972 Woman of the Year award. After reviewing her long list of civic and state accomplishments, we can easily understand why the Havre Business and Professional Women's Club selected her for the honor.

Curator of the H. Earl Clack Museum in Havre for the past nine years, she has held both the vice presidential and secretarial posts of the Montana Museum Association and was appointed by Governor Forrest Anderson to the Historical Society Board in 1970. In 1971 she was named to the Society's executive board.

Toni is a member of the Montana Institute of the Arts, president of the Havre chapter of the Mental Health Association, past president and treasurer of the Havre American Association of University Women, and this year is a nominee for the office of state vice president of AAUW.

She earned a B.A. degree in science and medical technology from the University of Denver. Because of this training, she was asked to establish the lab at a Havre dairy in 1950 and worked there until 1969. An active member of the Methodist Church, she has served as a delegate to the World Understanding Leadership Conference held at the United Nations in New York City.

The mother of four children, Toni actively supports Havre youth activities. She is a member of the PTA, and advocates the establishment of a girls' state track organization and recognition of boys' and girls' swimming teams by the Montana High School Association.

She and her husband, Louis, dean of the General Studies Division at Northern Montana College, at Havre, will celebrate their 25th wedding anniversary in June.

Mrs. Doris Marsolias Marshall, another of our woman Board members, has also received a signal honor. Along with two other Helena residents, she received a plaque in recognition of civic service at the second annual Community Appreciation banquet held at Carroll College on April 26. This event, attended by more than 500, honored Mrs. Marshall for her long service as head of the Helena High School drama department and executive director of the Old Brewery Theatre, a nationally recognized summer theater. Also active in VFW programs, this honored lady recently presented an American flag to the Society for use in our third floor military museum. Donated by the Lt. Harold Joyce Post #1116 and its auxiliary, the flag was accompanied by pamphlets on flag etiquette.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONTRASTS

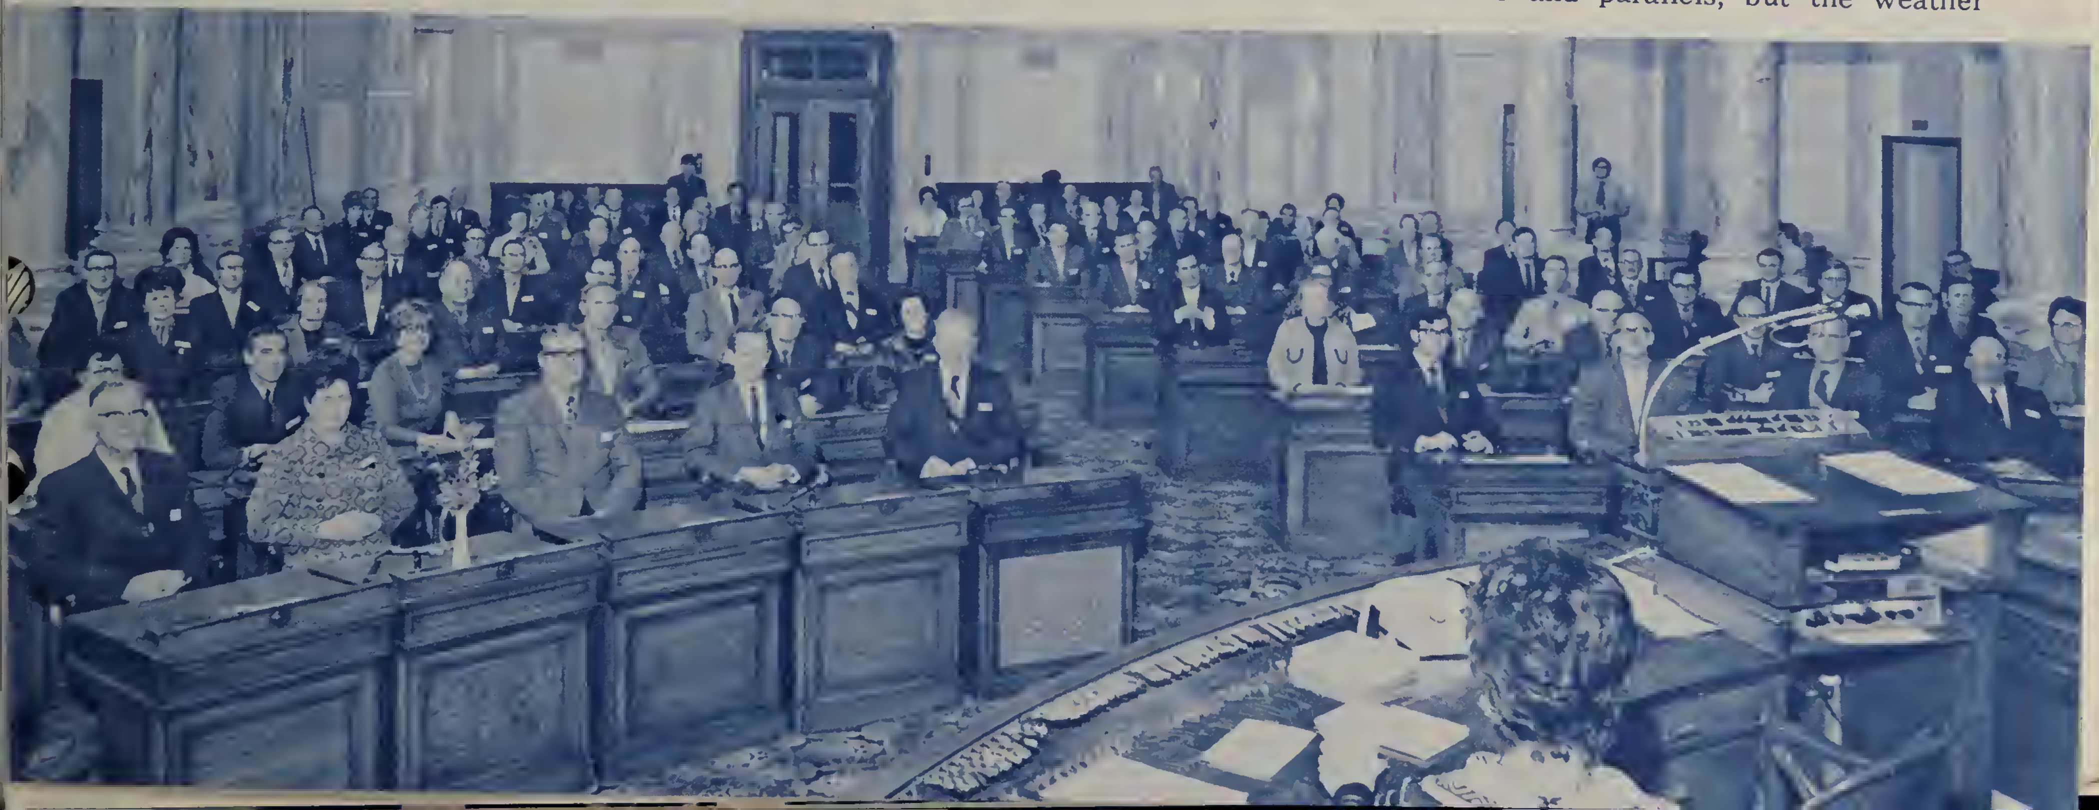
The absence of women delegates in 1884 is not the only contrast between these two official pictures of Montana constitution-writers. The delegates of 88 years ago had to sit quietly for six minutes before the shutter on Photographer O. C. Bundy's camera finally clicked. According to the Helena Independent of Feb. 8, 1884, "Every member of the convention put on his brightest smile for the occasion. When the people of Montana one hundred years from now celebrate constitution day they will gaze upon reprints of that photograph and say, 'What sweet dispositioned creatures the fathers were, to be sure'!" There were, in fact, some "sweet dispositioned" fathers who moved, and many betray the most solemn of six-minute stares. The 1972 convention, photographed (below) on one of the opening days by Marv Kalland and Travis Smith of the Highway Department, shows many more smiling faces and more than a few of them belong to women.



At the height of a winter which ranks with many historic seasons in both severity and length, The Society managed, last month, to create an atmosphere of warm hospitality to members of the Constitutional Convention, Montana's first such conclave in 83 years. The informal open house, some participants and features of which are pictured in this issue, was notable for music, conversation, food, guided tours of museums and galleries, and for the fact that, in spite of temperatures hovering near 30 degrees below zero outside, almost 150 guests were greeted at the door.

Entertaining delegates to this momentous convention, charged with revising or rewriting the constitution under which Montana has functioned since statehood, inspired us once again to look at some activities of the two earlier constitution-writing conventions, those of 1884 and 1889, and at an incredible highlight or two of the abortive convention of 1866, held when the Territory was only two years old.

This time we were looking for the light touch, hopefully for some entertainments to which the delegates were invited—at least those reported in the press. We found some interesting differences and parallels, but the weather was not among the parallels. The 1884 convention met in January, but on the 27th (the date of our open house, 1972) it was 16 degrees above zero, and the day was cloudless. The 1889 delegates came to Helena on July 4 (considered appropriate, for obvious reasons) and labored on during the heat of August. The strange proceedings of 1866 took place amid the pleasant zephyrs of spring. It was on April 14, 1866, that The Montana Post, the Territory's first bona fide newspaper, sarcastically announced that "The Convention, sired by the Acting One (Thomas F. Meagher), and damned by the people, having been helped along by a number of proclamations, is finally born."

The press reported two occasions, one in 1884 and the other in 1889, on which constitution writers were entertained with sumptuous food, and even more sumptuous oratory. Both involved excursions by train—as innovative then as a jet trip to the Bahamas might be today.

Late in January, 1884, William A. Clark, president of the convention (he served in the same post in 1889) read out a letter he had received from Samuel T. Hauser, president of the Helena and Jefferson Railway Company. Hauser, who was to become Montana's seventh Territorial Governor a little more than a year later, wrote: "I would be pleased to have you and the members of the convention visit the reduction works of the Helena Mining and Reduction Company at Corbin and Wickes. The Helena and Jefferson Railway Company is now running trains daily to Wickes and the trip would afford the members an opportunity to visit the flourishing towns of Jefferson, Montana City, Clancy, Jefferson City, Corbin and Wickes . . . "

It was moved that the invitation be accepted and a committee of three members was appointed to make arrangements. Ironically, one of the three was the venerable and outspoken James Fergus of Meagher county.

The trip to Wickes, slated for Sunday, Feb. 3, was approved by all but three of the delegates. Fergus was one of the dissenting three. Reared by stern, Scotch-Presbyterian parents, Fergus died an agnostic. Earlier he had opposed, as had two other delegates, the phrase, "So help me God," included in the oath of office written into the constitution of 1884. Despite his anti-religion stand, he was against 'constitutional' partying on the Sabbath. Later he said of his fellow delegates, "With a very few exceptions I was the only consistent member of the Convention."

Of the Wickes excursion, Fergus wrote to a friend: "Much of their conversation sounded more like the yells of a band of drunken Indians than a party of Christian Constitution makers and when they got home some of them looked like anything else than if they had been keeping the Sabbath . . . Now my own opinion is that there was not one staunchly religious man in the convention . . ."

The Helena Daily Independent viewed the Wickes journey with less critical, even admiring, eyes. "The run to Wickes was made in about an hour and a half, and was devoid of incident," the editor reported in the issue of Feb. 5, 1884. "The road is in excellent condition and so well ballasted that none of the jarring and very little of the swinging motion of the cars is noticeable, as with many of even the older established roads."

After touring the mills and concentrators of the Helena Mining and Reduction Company, the "Christian Constitution makers," settled down to a hearty repast. "After the substantials were cleared away" the Independent reports, "the popping of champagne corks announced the time for toasts and speeches."

An even grander celebration was in store for the delegates of the 1889 Convention. Colonel C. A. Broadwater, owner of the Montana Central railroad, supplied free transportation to Great Falls so delegates and wives could attend a Woolgrower's banquet meeting. The party, according to the Daily Independent, "sped rapidly through the Prickly Pear canyon and thence to the valley of the Missouri, where the visitors were lost in admiration at the towering boulders, the sparkling water and the broad plains of the Chestnut valley. The long train excited public attention along the route. Groups of people saluted the travelers at Craig, Cascade and Ulm, the new city of St. Clair supplying also a contingent of spectators."

Greeted at the Great Falls depot by well-wishers and a brass band, the party toured Sand Coulee, Giant Springs and Rainbow Falls. That evening, reports the July 17, 1889, issue of the Great Falls Tribune, a banquet was held in the Park Hotel. W. A. Clark was once again a featured speaker, as was Judge G. W. Stapleton of Butte. Judge Stapleton, almost overcome with the beauty of Great Falls, waxed ecologically eloquent: "I had no idea of finding so lovely a city. I find this young giant — only three years old — that has sprung into existence on the banks of the river, and it seems more like magic than anything else — this springing out of the wilderness. In '62, when I came to Montana, it was marked on the map 'unexplored;' it was fresh from nature's hand; it was one of the most lovely countries that anyone ever laid eyes upon; but it was the hunting ground of the savage and the pasturage of game of all kinds, roaming over the hills and valleys with no other keeper save their Maker. It looks sometimes like sacrilege to do away with all this natural beauty, but it is necessary, in order that the white man may have supremacy over this portion of the world, as he has over all the balance . . ."

As Judge Stapleton's grandiloquence suggests, the Great Falls affair was a crashing success, and, in fact, the constitution written during those hot months of 1889 resulted in statehood in November of the same year.

The results of the 1866 affair on the other hand, were not only frustrating, but politically divisive for the brand new Territory. The Montana Post, in its issue of April 21, published a stunningly sarcastic "letter" from its correspondent who signed himself "Everywhere." "To C. E. Irvine belonged the highest honor attained to by any of the 'delegates,' " the letter said, in part, "he moved to adjourn sine die."

Then, after describing a totally partisan caucus by the Democrats, the correspondent ended his dispatch with these words: "The members went on a glorious night, had speaking from the Crystal Palace balcony, proposed to squelch the radicals, with ballots, if they could, with bullets, if they must; dedicated the arch of bones from Virginia to Texas, to the Goddess of Liberty at Massachusetts; but signally failed in firing the popular heart. Smith made the best speech of the evening, an effort enthusiastically cheered, and which as an expression of our sentiments may appropriately conclude this letter: 'None of these conventionists desire office; but I venture to say there is not one of them who has not his dark bay eye fixed upon the gubernatorial or senatorial chair. They deserve your thanks for coming here uninvited, and working for nothing; they have made a good constitution, but I don't think there is one of you that will be fool enough to vote for it.' "

4TH ANNUAL RUSSELL ART AUCTION PROMISES TO BE BIGGER THAN EVER

Western art collector Malcolm S. (Bud) Mackay of Long Lake, Minn., will serve as honorary chairman of the fourth annual Charles M. Russell Auction of Original Western Art scheduled for Friday, March 17, at the Rainbow Hotel in Great Falls. Mackay's parents were personal friends of Russell and the famed Malcolm Mackay Collection of Russell art now resides at the Montana Historical Society.

Nearly $400,000 worth of original Western art, including major paintings and bronzes by Russell, will be sold, along with works by Frederic Remington, O. C. Seltzer, Edward Borein, George Catlin, and Earl Heikka. Over 60 contemporary Western artists, including our curator, Bob Morgan, will also be represented. Victor Hammer, owner of the Hammer Galleries in New York and last year's honorary chairman of the event, will assist auctioneer Jack Raty of Fort Shaw, Montana, in selling items during the sale period.

The auction, rapidly becoming the leading event of its kind, is sponsored by the Advertising Club of Great Falls for the benefit of the C. M. Russell Gallery in that city. In the three years it has been held, the auction has grossed nearly $200,000, attracting major pieces of western art and top buyers from throughout the country. In the 1971 auction, one Russell watercolor brought $50,000.

For the second year, the auction has promoted statewide recognition of March as C. M. Russell Month in Montana. On Sunday, February 27, the Cascade County Sheriff's Posse of 20 horses and riders rode from Great Falls to Helena carrying a proclamation from Great Falls Mayor John J. McLaughlin designating the month-long observance of Russell's birthday. The proclamation became official with the signature of Governor Forrest H. Anderson in ceremonies at the Society's building.

IMPORTANT PAINTINGS DONATED TO SOCIETY

Three paintings, one by the famous American artist, N. C. Wyeth, and another by Montana artist E. S. Paxson, have recently been donated to the Society's collections. The paintings have a total value of $13,000.

The Wyeth oil, titled "The Gunfighter," was presented by Fred B. Utter, Sr. of Spokane, Wash. Mr. Utter also gave the Society the oil painting, "A Man and His Horse," by Lon McGargee, an illustrator famous for his humorous cowboy depictions.

J. E. Corette of Butte is the donor of a Paxson water color of an Indian warrior. Paxson, noted Montana pioneer artist, is perhaps best known for his "Custer's Last Battle on the Little Big Horn."

Selected Works In Special Art Show

An especially selected showing of works from The Society's permanent art collection, some of them never before exhibited in public, will be featured in the large gallery adjacent to the Charles M. Russell Gallery throughout March, April and May. Such masters as Toulouse Lautrec, Gerome Gaspard and others will be represented, along with primitives and a number of unknown artists whose works provide an insight into the various moods and feelings of those who sought to portray the frontier.

Assisting Curator Bob Morgan in making the selections has been Larry Hayes, art instructor at Helena High School and a recent appointee of Governor Forrest Anderson on the Montana Arts Council. Hayes worked as a special consultant last summer in inventorying and cataloging the Society's art holdings. The selections for the show are one result of that survey.

Both Morgan and Hayes expressed the conviction that this special showing is not merely a "show-case" for our permanent collection, but rather is designed to give our visitors these next three months a rounded viewing experience. There will be primitives, classic art, and contemporary scenes of not only the American West but other parts of this country and foreign nations.

Nig: 3½" high
Coalie: 3¼" high
Price: $2,500

The old North Side Fire Station in Great Falls was a favorite meeting place for many years, and often a visitor was Charlie Russell, who loved both conversation and horses. During the Christmas season of 1903, the artist greeted his fire hall friends with these models of two great fire horses, Nig and Coalie, adding the words "Merry Christmas and Happy New Year, 1903" along with his full signature and skull trademark. For many years the model was in the home of Fire Chief Trodick, and it is by written contract with his family that 30 casts have been made, numbered one through thirty. None will ever be cast again. This is an unusual nostalgic bronze, the beauty of which cannot be captured by the camera. For full color photographs and details write

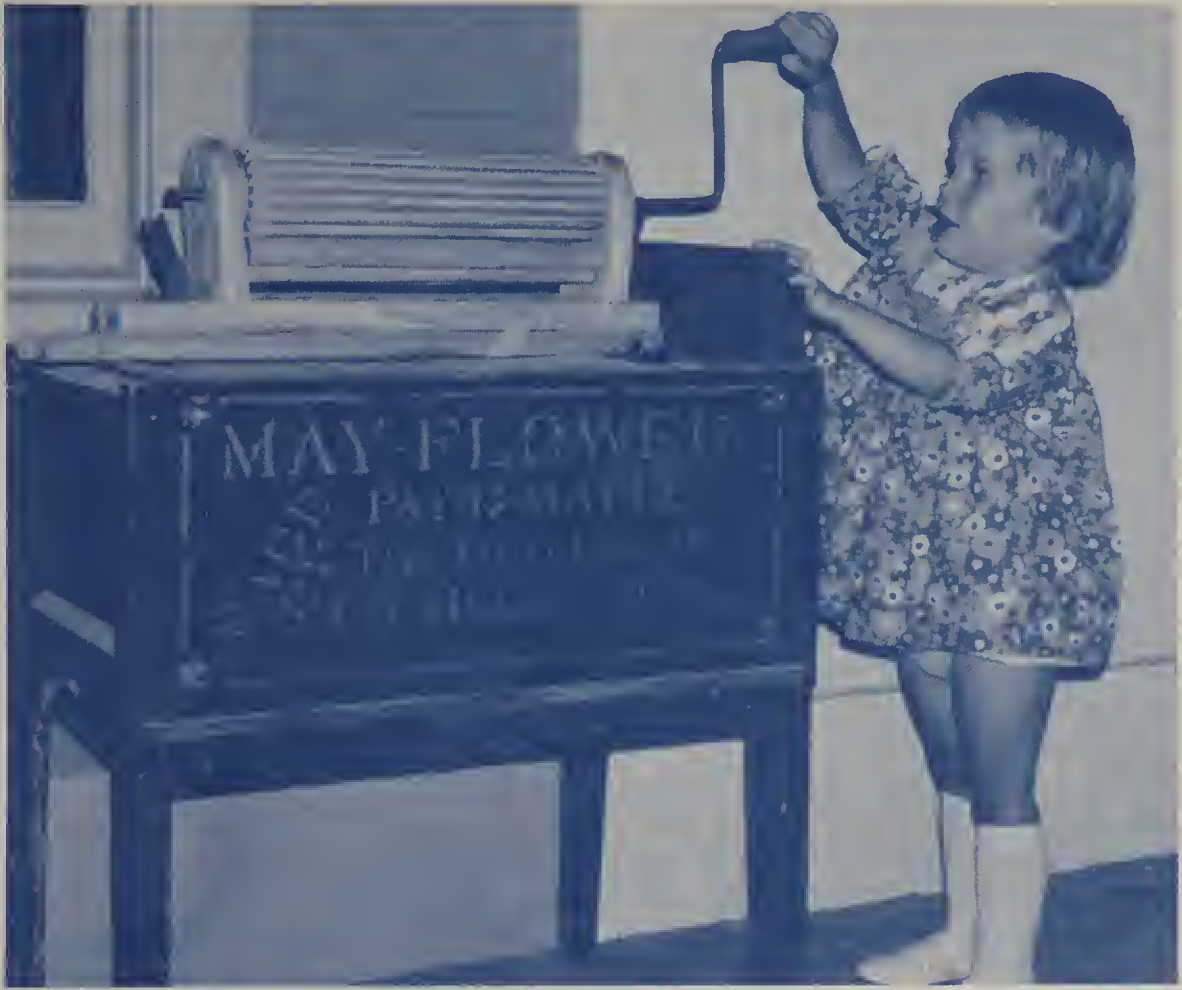
SMALL DESCENDANT OF PIONEERS DEMONSTRATES OLD-TIME APPLIANCE



KARIN MARIE HILGER, two-year-old descendant of Montana pioneers, was photographed recently in our Territory Junction street museum, turning the crank of a wooden clothes wringer, brought to Montana by mule-drawn covered wagon by her great great grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Calvin Beach in 1864. The wringer is now displayed in front of the Fullerton General Store, resting on top of a classic Mayflower washing machine, made in Helena by the Getchel Manufacturing Company. When she's a little older, Karin will be interested to learn that her great great grandmother had no washing machine to use with her wringer, but attached it to two washtubs on a bench, rubbing her clothes by hand. This historic object, no doubt envied by many on the Beach wagon train and later by visitors to the Beach home, was given to the Society a number of years ago by Karin's great grandmother, the late Mrs. Peter Hilger. Mrs. Hilger, a daughter of Calvin and Margaret Beach, was born in the Helena Valley in 1875. Her son, David, who was Karin's grandfather, was killed in an electrical accident in 1938. Her grandmother, the former Kathryn Bostwick, is now Mrs. D. T. Sutton of Citrus Heights, Calif., while her parents are Mr. and Mrs. Jerry Hilger of Mission Viego, Calif.

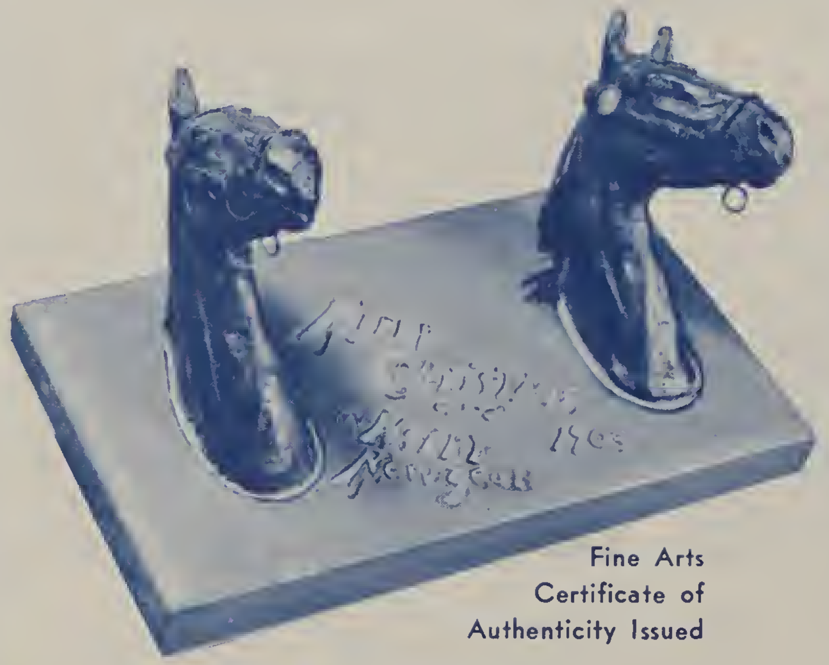
An especially selected showing of works from The Society's permanent art collection, some of them never before exhibited in public, will be featured in the large gallery adjacent to the Charles M. Russell Gallery throughout March, April and May. Such masters as Toulouse Lautrec, Gerome Gaspard and others will be represented, along with primitives and a number of unknown artists whose works provide an insight into the various moods and feelings of those who sought to portray the frontier.

Assisting Curator Bob Morgan in making the selections has been Larry Hayes, art instructor at Helena High School and a recent appointee of Governor Forrest Anderson on the Montana Arts Council. Hayes worked as a special consultant last summer in inventorying and cataloging the Society's art holdings. The selections for the show are one result of that survey.

Both Morgan and Hayes expressed the conviction that this special showing is not merely a "show-case" for our permanent collection, but rather is designed to give our visitors these next three months a rounded viewing experience. There will be primitives, classic art, and contemporary scenes of not only the American West but other parts of this country and foreign nations.

NIG AND COALIE: Classic Fire Horses Fashioned by Russell



The old North Side Fire Station in Great Falls was a favorite meeting place for many years, and often a visitor was Charlie Russell, who loved both conversation and horses. During the Christmas season of 1903, the artist greeted his fire hall friends with these models of two great fire horses, Nig and Coalie, adding the words "Merry Christmas and Happy New Year, 1903" along with his full signature and skull trademark. For many years the model was in the home of Fire Chief Trodick, and it is by written contract with his family that 30 casts have been made, numbered one through thirty. None will ever be cast again. This is an unusual nostalgic bronze, the beauty of which cannot be captured by the camera. For full color photographs and details write

Dialogue with the Director

Emily Preputin of Brady, Montana, an ardent supporter of our Society and one who has done much in preserving and promoting local history in her area, has called our attention to a column by Sidney Harris. Mr. Harris, nationally syndicated, has expressed cogently the reasons for the study of history.

Pointing to some young people today — not all — he says they "think they care about values, and mean to. They are full of noble words like peace and love and cooperation and environment and justice — but they have no real idea of what these mean or how they can work out or why they failed to work out with previous generations who used the same noble words."

And he adds that "good intention built on ignorance is the surest way to turn idealism into cynicism; as the Romans knew, and said, the worst is a corruption of the best."

Now to the main point: "Unless we understand something of history, unless we have absorbed and analyzed the past, we cannot make rational judgments about the present — it is as futile as expecting a self-styled 'doctor' to diagnose a patient without ever having studied medicine. No matter how much common sense, good will and natural aptitude he may have, he is not equipped to distinguish among ailments or prescribe for health."

Mr. Harris effectively utilizes Santayana's warning that "Those who do not understand the past are condemned to repeat it."

The statements tell you what history is all about, the reason for a Society like ours and for many others; they capsulize the purpose of our work.

Thank you, Emily Preputin, for sending the column. We can add that you practice what you preach with your own folk music compositions and in your efforts to promote the Young Historian program in your home school.

Introducing An Effective New Service Group And (for many of us) A New Word

It comes from the Latin word "docere," meaning to teach, and is most often used by German institutions to describe a teacher or lecturer (the Germans spell it "dozent"). To us at The Society, the word is "docent" and it means, quite literally, "a person who conducts guided groups through a museum or art gallery and discusses and comments on the exhibits." It also means that, thanks to the voluntary and enthusiastic help of the Helena ladies pictured below, the Society can now offer regularly scheduled and fully guided tours of the exhibits, galleries and other facilities.

The original enthusiasm was generated by Mrs. Ward Shanahan (second from right in the back row) and, with her approval and that of the rapidly growing group she inspired to join her, the word "docent" has come to be heard more and more frequently among the Society's staff members. For a number of days in January, Director Gilluly and staff members held orientation sessions with the docents, going into every phase of our activities. Most of the burden, of course, fell to the curatorial staff of Bob Morgan, with Assistant Curator Bob Gant charged with major responsibility.

In an amazingly short time, the genuine enthusiasm of these ladies has made them competent guides and lecturers; many have already conducted busloads of Montana students through our building, with many more to come. It is, then, with pride and with more than a little enthusiasm of our own that we introduce our docents—with no apologies at all for the word.

"UNTOLD GENERATIONS" TO GE

Later this month, Montana will begin facing an historical challenge, one which will result in a new or revised constitution. Those who come to Helena to write the document, as well as many of their constituents, will view with interest the three-part historical display, pictured below, researched by Librarian Harriett Meloy and her staff and created by Curator Bob Morgan and his associates. Here may be seen, through documents and pictures and maps, the three occasions on which Montana struggled toward statehood and toward writing a viable document the people would approve.

The convention of 1889, creator of the constitution under which Montana has functioned since statehood, was not the first attempt at writing such a document, nor was it to be the last, despite the oratorical assertion of William A. Clark. The famous Copper King, who had been president of both the 1884 and 1889 conventions, made the overblown statement in the latter year that the document just written would "stand as the basis of government in Montana for this and all the untold generations that are to follow."

The "untold generations" have lasted 82 years, and now the descendants of the electorate and conferees (some of them in direct line) will attempt to rewrite the document, in whole or in part.

In preparation for the display and for this issue of THE POST, there has been some delving into the historical record of Montana's constitution-writing efforts. The press of 1889, particularly, reveals some startling parallels with the present, some humor and some colorful jockeying for position.

The first attempt at writing a constitution, with statehood in mind, came very early in our Territorial history—less than two years after the Territory was created, in fact, when the population totaled scarcely 20,000 souls.

The flamboyant Irish revolutionary, Thomas Francis Meagher, serving as Acting Governor between the terms of Sidney Edgerton and Green Clay Smith, called the first convention to meet on March 1, 1866. A sign of the chaotic political times was the fact that the convention was called for Helena instead of Virginia City, then Territorial capital. But this was only one irregularity in this premature and ill-starred affair. No public funds were available, there was no public vote on the document written in six hectic days. Indeed, this constitution was never printed—it simply disappeared. Two versions of the disappearance persist. One has it that the document was lost in transit to St. Louis, where it was to be printed. The other version claims that it was kept among the private papers of Convention Secretary Horace N. Maguire and later destroyed in a fire.

The next attempt at writing a constitution came in 1884, when the Territory was 18 years older and boasted a voting population of some 20,000. Called for Helena (then the official capital city) in January, the convention had its work finished on February 9. It was properly printed and presented to the electorate, which approved it, 15,506 to 4,266. But this time there was trouble in Washington: a political deadlock between the Senate and House shut off the admission of any new states.

Five years later, however, the impasse ended, and once more Montana tended to the business of writing a constitution as a prelude to statehood. Fittingly, the first meeting was held on July 4. The result was voter ratification (26,950 to 2,274) in October, and swift admission to the Union (in an Omnibus Bill which also admitted the two Dakotas and Washington) on November 8, 1889.

But before all this was accomplished, there were some editorial blasts in the press of Montana, and some startling statements on the floor of the convention. The right to vote aspects of the document—whether the enfranchised voter was to be a woman or an alien—came in for some of the most colorful pronouncements, although as it turned out, Montana's constitution-writers were in tune with the times, no more or less prejudiced or misguided than most of their counterparts in other new states.

"It is somewhat uncomfortable to reflect," thundered Silver Bow (Butte) Delegate Charles S. Warren, "that a citizen of intelligence, property, and good moral character, and a keen sense of the responsibilities and dignities of his duties as an American citizen, may have his ballot offset by an Italian Lazzarone, exuding garlic at every pour (sic) of his otherwise unpleasant body, whose intelligence does not equal that of the monkey for whom he grinds the organ, and upon whose sense, industry and honesty he depends for his maintenance and macaroni."

Joseph K. Toole, a delegate from Lewis and Clark County and the man who was to become the new state's first Governor, commented on the right to vote issue in these words: "I would not consent to the proposed enlargement of the political franchise if I were in the legislature; much less am I willing to establish that right as an exorable principle in the constitution."

The Helena Independent tended to be conservative when it came to giving the vote to women. In the issue of July 19,

NEW CONSTITUTION

the editor said, "The Independent does not assume that women are not qualified to intelligently exercise the electoral privilege. Unquestionably they are equal to men in intelligence and probity. The argument at this time is not against woman suffrage, but against the extension of the right to vote to women or to any class of men not already endowed with the right until the question shall have been submitted to and decided by a vote of the people."

The rival Daily Herald editor, though, went all out for women: "The argument that suffrage represents physical superiority is not borne out by natural facts or history . . . Who has not seen an attenuated mother cat unhesitatingly mount the biggest dog and send him yelping from the premises while the tom cats were crawling under the barns . . ."

A couple of decades after the 1889 constitution writers had their document prepared, the issue of voting rights was federally resolved. And no one is concerned anymore about where a voter was born or whether or not he eats garlic. But there is an issue confronting the writers of the new constitution which also came in the considerations of 82 years ago: the bicameral versus the unicameral legislature.

On July 16, The Independent supported the one-house concept: "The House of Lords," the paper said, in part, "is tottering to its fall, and fifty years hence, it may be predicted there will be only the commons and the crown . . . It is not rational to elect one body to watch another, as is the theory of the two houses of state legislature. The time has not yet come, perhaps, for full recognition of the absurdity of this matter, but it will surely come, and when it does 'the senate must go,' so far as state legislatures are concerned . . . The argument will always hold that the existence of two houses of a legislature, both emanating directly from the people, is an extravagance and totally unnecessary."

Another extravagance, strongly criticized by The Independent, were high salaries: "The Constitutional Convention is disposed to be very liberal in the matters of salaries," the editor trumpeted. "The proposition to pay the Governor of Montana $5,000 invites comparisons . . ."

Besides choosing Helena as the permanent seat of government upon admission to the Union, the 1889 constitution read almost exactly like that of 1884. The delegates stayed for their allotted 60 days and went home, most of them presumably serene, as was their president, that they had written a document that would "stand as the basis of government in Montana for this and all untold generations that are to follow."

And publicly, at least, there were no "male chauvinist" cries from women. Montana women had, in fact, emerged with something: taxpayers among them were allowed to vote on questions submitted to taxpayers if they possessed other qualifications necessary to vote. They could take comfort in the fact that a surprising number of male delegates supported full franchise for them in 1889. And perhaps many of them agreed with Delegate Martin Maginnis of Helena when he said that woman remains "the regenerator of mankind," too pure to be contaminated by the politics of men.

BUSY STAFFERS BRACE FOR CHRISTMAS RUSH

Mel Hallauer, center, head of the mailing department, is aided by assistant Dennis Sheehy and Cathy Van Auken, normally of the accounting office, as they prepare to send out Christmas packages.

Circulation Manager Eleanor "Jiggs" Dickey, right, and her assistant, Imogene "Jimmy" Barnes, left, sort through hundreds of Christmas gift subscriptions to MONTANA THE MAGAZINE OF WESTERN HISTORY.

These serious and smiling faces reflect both gay and get-to-work moods at the Society these days. Thousands of orders for books, Russell prints, cards, and many other items have been filled by the merchandise department. Magazine gift subscriptions are also being processed in record numbers, many of them long lists from firms. In mid-October many of the Society staffers "doubled in brass" and congregated in the basement to mail Christmas offerings to members and friends of the Society. "The results," according to Mrs. Neath, "have been beyond our highest expectations." All this means, perhaps, that when it comes to gift-giving, whether to friends or business associates, publications and items related to Western History rate higher than the turkey, the bottle of cheer, or even the mink-covered whatcha-ma-call-it for the one who "has everything."

BRIAN COCKHILL JOINS SOCIETY'S ARCHIVAL STAFF

The newest member of The Society's permanent staff is Brian Cockhill, a native of Butte who earned his M.A. in Western History from the University of Montana in 1968 and has spent two years working toward his doctorate in the same field. A member of Phi Kappa Phi and Phi Alpha Theta, both academic honoraries, Brian graduated from the Montana institution with honors in 1964 before beginning work on the higher degrees. He has worked as both assistant and acting archivist on the Missoula campus. Since joining the archival staff of John Coleman in August, Brian has been deeply immersed in cataloging and appraising in depth a number of collections which crowd the Society's new archival areas.

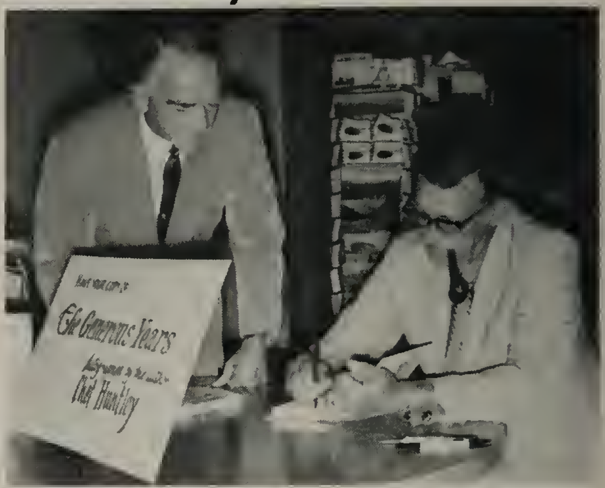
Author-Historian Edgar Stewart Donates Significant Custer Collection To Society Library

Dr. Edgar I. Stewart of Vancouver, Washington, noted authority on the Battle of the Little Big Horn and for many years a valued contributor to, and consultant for, MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, has donated to the Montana Historical Society his very significant collection of books and other memorabilia concerning Custer and his final battle. While Dr. Stewart has, over a period of years, made a number of gifts to the Society and its library, the latest increment includes a large collection of books and microfilm which, according to Librarian Harriett Meloy, will open doors to fresh research.

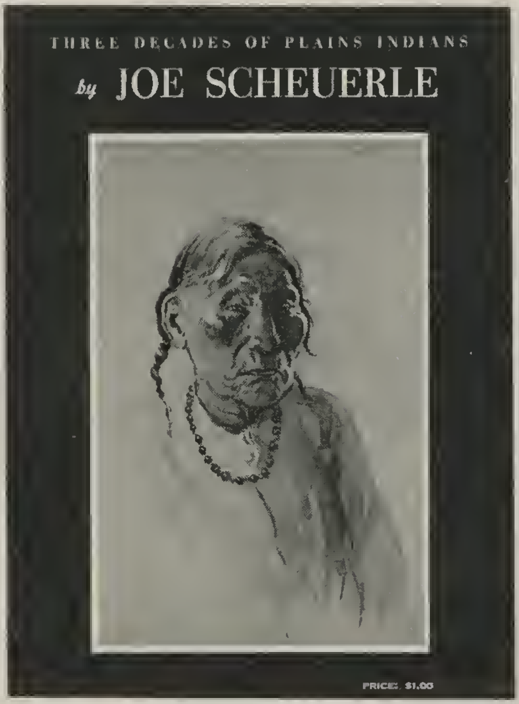
Author of what many, including us, consider the most definitive single volume on the Custer affair and the circumstances which led to it, Dr. Stewart has given the collection as a memorial to his mother and also in recognition of his wife, Jane, who is a noted Western history author and editor in her own right. Dr. Stewart's book, as many of our readers know, was published by the University of Oklahoma Press in 1955 and is entitled "Custer's Luck."

A contributor of many articles to the magazine, most of them on various facets of the Custer affair, Dr. Stewart is now retired as Distinguished Emeritus Professor of History from Eastern Washington State College in Cheney. His latest book, "Penny-an-Acre Empire in the West," describes the conflict between George Custer and his famous contemporary, General William B. Hazen, over western land values.

Newsman Chet Huntley Autographs His Book For Society Visitors



CHET HUNTLEY, nationally known newscaster who has returned to his native state, is pictured (right) in the lobby of our building as he autographed copies of his warmly written book of Montana memories, THE GENEROUS YEARS. Huntley, who heads a recreational and home development south of Bozeman, spent a very busy afternoon with us, chatting with hundreds who came to meet him and receive his autographed book. The "customer" pictured here with Huntley is one of the Society's favorite members and supporters, Bill Sherman, of Portland, Oregon, who, with his wife, was visiting his hometown of Helena on autograph day.



The life and much of the work of Joe Scheuerle, the modest man who for three decades painted portraits of hundreds of western Indians from life, is now available in one neat package at a modest price. This is a published first, for little has ever been known about the man or his work. Reprinted from MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, this is a full-color summation of a remarkable career and collection.

Dialogue with the Director

Montana has gone through one of the most portentous elections in its history—the selection of delegates to a constitutional convention. These people will begin their labors soon to replace a document that was whittled out in 1889.

One of the items of debate in pre-election days was discussion of the need for an environmental protective clause in the constitution. Candidates talked about basic protection of the Big Sky Country's air, water and other precious resources. Good, but how about protection of our historical environment? To us, that seems as important as any other of the elements involved in the current ecological debate.

What am I talking about? In less than the writer's lifetime, he has seen two fine old mining towns near his boyhood home in central Montana (Kendall and Maiden) literally disappear—torn down and carted off. In the past year, fire or man has taken similar toll near Helena at old Marysville and Elkhorn. Lost or gone up in bonfires have been many valuable historical documentary collections—letters, records, photographs.

Small groups of historical "nuts" and some state and federal agencies are seeking to halt this toll. They need all help possible, but most of all they ask an awareness by their friends of the need for historical preservation.

Montanans, for example, when they get a few extra dollars, will fly off to Egypt to see the pyramids or travel to view the missions and pueblos of the Southwest. We ask that they become aware of the fact that in their own environs they have objects just as worthy of preservation as the pyramids and pueblos elsewhere.

Will they do this? Will our constitutional convention delegates—if they get into the environmental debate—recognize this situation? We involved in history hope they do. —SAM GILLULY

AND SPEAKING OF PRESERVING . . .

Speaking, as has Director Gilluly in his column, left, of the need to preserve our historical environment, one of several bright spots is the recent organization of Montana's professors of history, archivists and librarians into a cooperative group known as "The Council to Preserve Montana History."

At a meeting held at The Society's building in Helena on November 5, at which Librarian Harriett Meloy presided, the organizers eschewed any stultifying strictures. They mean to collect, preserve and make optimum use of historical materials on a warmly cooperative basis, to publish a newsletter to advise members of new acquisitions among the libraries and archives, to republish a comprehensive list of manuscript collections in Montana depositories for distribution to libraries throughout the country.

A list of those who came to Helena for the organizational meeting suggests the scope of this commendable effort. Montana State University at Bozeman was represented by History Professors Jeffrey Safford, Pierce Mullen and Michael Malone, Librarians Alice McLain and Minnie Paugh and Archivist David Horn. Professor Robert Peterson, Librarian Erling Oelz and Archivist Dale Johnson came from the University of Montana campus at Missoula, while Northern Montana College at Havre was represented by Professors Harrison Lane and Carl Gunderson. Along with Librarian Meloy, The Society's role in the new organization was supported by Director Gilluly and Assistant Archivist Brian Cockhill.

Gant Speaks At New Ralston Center

Assistant Curator Bob Gant addressed a lively group at the J. K. Ralston Museum and Art Center in Eastern Montana's city of Sidney last month, counseling care in interpreting the area's art and history heritage but commending those present for enthusiasm and work well done so far. The Center, named for Montana's great artist-historian, J. K. (Ken) Ralston of Billings, whose roots go deep into this area of Montana, is temporarily housed in a former Sidney hospital. A permanent building, displays of museum items, and Ralston paintings and regular classes in fine art are all in the plans of this enthusiastic group.

A RECORD SOCIETY SUMMER:

ONE OF THE NEW INTERPRETIVE EXHIBITS IN THE INDIAN-FUR TRADE ROOM SHOWING TRADERS' INFLUENCE ON INDIAN ACCOUTREMENTS

Record breaking crowds, totalling over 1,000 daily during June, July, and August have visited our museums and galleries this Summer. We have, thanks to the get-it-done efforts of Curator Bob Morgan and his assistants, Ken Gibson and Bob Gant, been able to put our best foot forward. This has included the completion of four more interpretive exhibits in the Indian-Fur Trade Room, one of them pictured at the left.

It also includes two stunning art shows in the gallery directly behind the Charles M. Russell Gallery. Major oil paintings by the great contemporary artist, Olaf Wieghorst of El Cajon, Calif., all of them from the collection of Malcolm S. Mackay, Jr., were seen through the last of June.

Then on July 1, a superb showing of 71 oils, watercolors, and sketches by the late W. H. D. Koerner was hung in the gallery and will delight visitors through September. These imposing works, most of them done during the 1920's and 1930's as illustrations for The Saturday Evening Post and for such western classics as The Covered Wagon, The Long Rifle, North of '36 and many others, are now in the collection of the artist's daughter, Mrs. Ruth Koerner Oliver of Santa Barbara, Calif. A catalogue of this show, much of it representing Koerner's work in Montana, where he spent many artistically productive summers, has been produced by the Society in association with Mrs. Oliver.

It has, withal, been a busy summer for both our permanent staff and a number of temporary and volunteer enthusiasts who have joined us for the season and whose picture and identities are found elsewhere in this issue. As of mid-August, as we go to press, a total of 108,056 visitors had been counted for 1971 as they lingered in our lobby on their way through the Museum and galleries.

SHOWS, DISPLAYS FEATURED

HAL STEARNS ELECTED SOCIETY PRESIDENT

Harold G. Stearns, Harlowton, Mont. publisher, was elected president of The Montana Historical Society at a full meeting of our Board of Trustees on July 29. One of Montana's best known editors and publishers, raconteurs and history enthusiasts, Hal Stearns is seen, left, in the place where he is most comfortable: at his editorial desk at the Harlowton Times, surrounded by mementoes suggesting a part of his varied interests. Stearns, who succeeds Mrs. Charles A. Bovey as our top officer, is a native of the Deer Lodge Valley and a graduate of the University of Montana. His interests are endless: his University, the Lewis and Clark Expedition, education on all levels, sports, his family, his newspapers (he also publishes the Ryegate Clarion). A member of our Board since early in 1967, he was recently reappointed by Governor Forrest H. Anderson.

Wilbur P. Werner of Cut Bank was named vice president of The Society, and Mrs. Toni Hagener of Havre, secretary. Joining the three elected officers on the Executive Board will be Henry S. Ruegamer of Hardin and Mrs. Bovey.

SOCIETY WELCOMES TWO NEW BOARD MEMBERS

At its meeting July 29, the Society's Board of Trustees welcomed two new members, both appointed earlier in the month by Gov. Forrest H. Anderson. They are Mrs. Doris Marsolais Marshall of Helena and Manson H. Bailey, Jr. of Glasgow. Mrs. Marshall replaces Albert J. Partoll of Missoula for a five-year term ending July 1, 1976, while Bailey replaces Dr. Ray O. Bjork of Helena for an unexpired term ending July 1, 1973.

Reappointed to the Board were Harold G. Stearns, Harlowton publisher, and Dr. Merrill G. Burlingame, professor emeritus of Montana State University.

Mrs. Marshall, a face long familiar to Helena High School students as THE drama teacher, was born in Sultan, Washington and graduated with a B.A.B.S. at Washington State University. Before retiring in 1969, Mrs. Marshall had been a dramatics, English and speech teacher for 43 years.

Hers is an active retirement. Currently she is executive director of the Frontier Town Players and the Bandit Players of the Brewery Theater in Helena. She holds the same position with the Rockin' Horse Childrens Theatre, which specializes in productions for Helena's youngsters every summer. She has held this active schedule for 20 years and shows no signs of stopping. In 1969 she received the First Lady of Drama Award of the United States; in 1967 her players were given the Eaves Costume Award for outstanding dramatic work; and from 1955 to 1960 she was the national president of the Thespian Society.

In addition to her many activities in drama, Mrs. Marshall has found time to participate in many civic activities. She is a member of the steering committee for the Helena Model Cities program, and has been the recipient of many national awards for community service including citations from the Veterans of Foreign Wars, American Legion, and McCall's.

During her long career in education, Mrs. Marshall taught on the summer faculty at Carroll College in 1951 and the summer faculty at Montana State University from 1954 to 1969.

Manson Bailey, a three-term member of the Montana House of Representatives (1963-1967), has been a lifelong resident of Valley County in Eastern Montana. In 1912 his father came from Maine to work on an irrigation project on the Milk River and ended up homesteading near Vandalia. His mother came to Valley County a year later with her parents who homesteaded south of Glasgow. His maternal grandfather, Bailey says, "was 63 years old when he broke up Montana sod."

Currently, Bailey is the Executive Director of the Valley County Development Council. He and his family also operate a farm-ranch on the Milk River.

Bailey has had a long career in public service. He has been chairman of the Valley County Soil & Water District for four years; on the Board of Directors of the State Association of Soil & Water Districts; member of the Montana Fish & Game Commission from 1952-56 and chairman of the Commission in 1955. He is now a member of the Glasgow City-County Planning Board and on the Executive Board of the Yellowstone Valley Council.

He holds membership in the Valley Ridgerunners Saddle Club, Valley County Livestock Association, Kiwanis, Valley County Historical Society, National Association of Security Dealers, Society of American Military Engineers, and the Montana Water Development Association.

DORIS MARSOLAIS MARSHALL

MANSON H. BAILEY, JR.

Sandra Jaksha, Butte high school junior, won the first prize of $50.00 for her essay on the two decade period, 1890-1910, when Chippewa and Cree lived on the city dump of the famous Mining City, and staged a tragic-comic battle on July 20, 1898, for possession of the grounds. Sandra's article, along with seven others produced by Montana students, was printed in the second issue of MONTANA HISTORIAN, published by the University of Montana and The Montana Historical Society. The first issue, printed last Fall, launched Montana's long-awaited Junior Historian program, initial funds for which were provided by the Louis W. and Maud Hill Family Foundation and the University of Montana Foundation.

SUSAN BANGS JOINS EDITORIAL STAFF

Susan Van Koten Bangs, a 1971 graduate of the University of Montana's School of Journalism, joined our editorial staff in mid-July, replacing Barbara Fifer Rackley, who moved to Cogan Station, Pennsylvania with her husband earlier this summer. Susan, a native of Great Falls, has lived in Helena since 1960, graduating from Helena High School in 1967. After a year at Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa, she entered the University of Montana at Missoula and completed work on her degree. She was married in April, 1971, to Richard D. Bangs, also a journalism major who is currently serving in Vietnam.

SUMMER STAFF DOES YEOMAN DUTY

Our hard-working helpers, who have been of vast assistance in many areas of Society work this summer, took time out for a carefree moment in the Ed Towe Ford Collection gallery, contributing an adequate load for the classic 1913 express wagon in the collection. Seated, from left to right in the vehicle are John Holter, Betty Reise, Stefan Fechter, Kitty Smith, Cathy Van Auken, Allen Miller and Dennis Sheehy (in the driver's seat). Seated on the running board in front is Tom Butler. According to the label on the express wagon, its price, in 1913, was $675.00. In 1971 parlance, we wouldn't take a million for the services of these young people, a number of whom are volunteers to the cause of seeing that thousands of visitors get what they want at the counter and through the mails, and otherwise helping the hard-pressed permanent staff.

UNION PACIFIC COUNTRY
by Robert G. Athearn

This imposing volume, termed by one reviewer as the book from which all future studies of the Union Pacific will begin, is now available through The Montana Historical Society. Unlike most railroad studies, this one does not concentrate entirely on the main line. It relates, in the readable and authoritative style for which Dr. Athearn is well known, "the story of how the American west was penetrated, settled, and developed with the aid of steam and iron." It is, therefore, much more than the history of one westward-reaching railroad. It is western history at its definitive and readable best.

SECOND ANNUAL ZORTMAN TO MALTA WAGON TR

The wagon train will roll again this Labor Day week-end between Zortman and Malta in North Central Montana, and it will honor a man who could only wish he were there to re-live a bit of history of the land he loved and did so much to immortalize.

This unique event, which promises to be even bigger than last year's success, will start from the old mining camp of Zortman on Friday, September 3, and end at Malta on Sunday, September 5, where the Mon-Can rodeo will be held in the afternoon.

One of the first stops for the train after it leaves Zortman will be at the Norman Jaynes ranch, where a granite stone engraved with a freight outfit was erected in mid-June to the memory of early day freighters, cowpunchers, miners and ranchers as well as to those latter-day participants in the wagon train who died during the year, and to others who contributed to the region's colorful history.

Among these was Joseph Mathias Hartmann, who beginning in 1906, freighted along this route with his brother, Tim, and later ranched near Zortman. Last year, at the age of 87, Joe was not up to making the wagon train journey, but he gave those in charge of arrangements the benefit of his knowledge of every foot of the way. He died in January this year, his old ranching and freighting friends his honorary pallbearers.

It will be at the memorial site that the Rev. Fr. Martin will conduct a short memorial service September 3 honoring the memory of Walt Coburn, son of Robert Coburn who established the famous Circle C ranch on Beaver Creek in 1888. Walt, who died at his home in Prescott, Arizona on May 25, was a noted writer of westerns, using his Montana ranch youth as the basis for much of his material. His most recent and major book, "Pioneer Cattleman in Montana," told the story of his father's Circle C Ranch, later purchased by the Matador Cattle Company.

Walt Coburn would have enjoyed every minute of the second annual wagon train drive which does him honor this year. That would include a mutton barbecue for the trail crew the evening before, hosted by Fred Itcaina, who now owns the old Circle C spread where Walt began spending his summers as a boy of 14 and which he still, at the age of 82, called home.

Between 40 and 50 wagons are expected to make the three-day trek, four or five of them from Canada to add an international flavor. Beef and buffalo barbecues are scheduled along the route as the train ties up for noon rests and for the night.

Outriders, three to a wagon, will be alongside to take care of emergencies or dangerous situations, but as in the wagon trains of old, each wagon is a separate entity, the driver responsible for the welfare of his rig and its passengers. But also like the westward moving trains of our forbears, the wagonmaster—in this case Bud Hasler—will be the boss as soon as the wheels roll. Jake Wiederrick as trail boss has planned the route, while overseeing all the details of planning has been Chairman Lou Perry. If last year's event is a criteria, some 16 hours of actual driving time will be consumed between Zortman and Malta.

The wagons will circle at night, the horses will be unharnessed, fed and watered. Then will come the lighting of cook fires and the visiting and the bedding down. Chairman Perry has told us that last year some 2,000 visitors drove out in their cars during the evenings to participate, vicariously, in the adventure. They will be welcomed again this year, he said, but will not be allowed to impede the progress of the train on its daily drives. One can imagine that no wagon boss of old would have tolerated such interference either.

SOCIETY OFFERS LIVING MEMORIALS TO LOVED ONES

Family and friends of deceased Montanans, particularly those who have had an interest in the preservation of our history and art, are taking increasing advantage of the memorial program of The Montana Historical Society whereby such funds are set aside for the enhancement of our museum and library holdings, acquisition of original art, and other activities of The Society.

Donors received a beautifully engraved acknowledgment of such gifts, while a personal letter is sent by The Society to the family of the deceased person. The Director invites your inquiry about this program, including the manner in which you may use it to honor the memory of a loved one.

A beautiful 28-page, informative catalog produced by The Montana Historical Society of the imposing art of W. H. D. Koerner is now available to our readers. Containing reproductions, many of them in full color, of 71 major oils, watercolors and sketches by this great American illustrator, the catalog memorializes the second major showing of Koerner art at our galleries in Helena. But it is much more: it tells the story of the artist, the summers he spent in Montana and the West, and a great representative collection of his work.

IN WILL HONOR WALT COBURN, NATIVE SON

Scenes like this will be re-enacted this Labor Day week-end when the second annual wagon train gets underway from Zortman to Malta. Here Mayor George Haynes of Malta shakes hands with Bud Hasler, who is this year's wagon boss. Driving the lead wagon, with Mrs. Mary Stout as passenger, is Lou Perry of Malta, chairman of this year's event. The three-day trek will cover one of Montana's most historic freighting routes. Society Director Sam Gilluly was the featured speaker at the dedication of this superb diorama at the H. Earl Clack Museum in Havre over the Memorial Day weekend. Executed by Bob Scriver of Browning, one of the West's most honored contemporary sculptors, the diorama depicts the bleak afternoon of October 5, 1877, when Chief Joseph surrendered his band of Nez Perce in an unseasonably early snowstorm. It was the climax of an agonizing retreat of more than 1,300 miles, during which the tribe sought refuge in Canada. Gilluly's remarks were based on Joseph's famous speech of surrender, the opening words of which, "Hear Me My Chiefs," are used as a title for Scriver's moving depiction. The sculptor, who was present for the occasion, gave an informal resume of his search for accuracy in creating the diorama, explaining that his viewpoint is that of the Indian, contrary to earlier artistic conceptions of this famous scene. Adding to the history and dispelling some commonly held myths about Joseph's role in the affair were remarks by Hal Stearns of Harlowton and Wilbur Werner of Cut Bank, both members of our Board of Trustees, and by Al Lucke of Havre, an authority on the history of Northern Montana. Among guests were Mrs. H. Earl Clack, widow of the man for whom the museum is named, her son, Turner Clack of Spokane, Editor Vivian Paladin and her husband, Jack, former Havre residents, and many others. Mrs. Toni Hagener, a prime mover in development of the Clack Museum, is also a member of the Society's Board of Trustees and was in charge of the day's activities.

Dialogue with the Director

During its 106-year existence, The Montana Historical Society has been blessed by the brains and services of hundreds of men and women—all with a love of history and all seeking to further its preservation through our organization. It was, indeed, the foresighted persistence of a small group at the very beginnings of Montana's official history in 1864 that led to our creation.

The Society now regretfully says "farewell" to two men who have provided true citizenship service on our Board of Trustees. Retiring in July from Board membership were Albert J. Partoll of Missoula and Ray O. Bjork, M.D. of Helena.

A regional historian in his own right, Al Partoll was oldest, in point of service, on our Board. He was deeply involved in the fledgling days of our MONTANA Magazine in the early 1950's when, at times, its future seemed uncertain. He and other pioneering Board and staff members kept it alive in its early stages to help bring it to its present prestigious status. He remains a valued member of the magazine's Editorial Board.

Not so long in service, but certainly active and concerned has been Ray Bjork, with the enthusiastic participation of his talented wife, Mabel. Ray has had two careers already in his life. The first was as a school administrator (one of Helena's elementary schools is named for him). This was followed by completion of a medical education and active practice. This "schoolmaster" brought experience and judgment to our governing body. But he also directed many collections and materials to our historical library. Now the Bjorks begin still another career in Arizona, and we all wish them well.

These two retiring members have served to add to the tradition of a working, active and helpful group of Trustees. And they have added lustre to the concept of voluntary service in America, something we continue to need.

CALIFORNIAN CITED AS SOCIETY'S 100,000TH VISITOR OF THE YEAR

Director Sam Gilluly presents a copy of Chet Huntley's book of nostalgic Montana memories, "The Generous Years," to Mrs. Ruth Thomas of Sacramento, Calif., who, on Friday, July 30, was registered as the 100,000th visitor to the Society's museums and galleries so far in 1971. Touring the building with Mrs. Thomas and pictured to her left are her brother and sister-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Del Bryant of Davis, Calif. The Bryants' son, David, was also in the party.

A retired office worker, Mrs. Thomas was making her first trip through Montana, and was amazed at being stopped in the lobby to be told she was No. 100,000. It added, she said, to the friendly attention she and the Bryants had received throughout their tour, which included Salt Lake City, the Grand Tetons, and Yellowstone. They went on from Helena to Glacier, Banff and Lake Louise. The same thoughts were expressed by Mr. Bryant, who teaches science in Davis on the high school level.

The Society's busy sales staff was hard-pressed to count all our visitors fast and accurately enough to come up with the 100,000th this summer. An average of 1,000 people, a record, has toured our building, daily since the vacation period started.

CASCADE COMMUNITY HISTORY PUBLISHED

The increasing awareness on the part of many Montanans of the need for preserving the written history of their regions and communities has resulted in a number of illustrated histories, most of them containing individual biographies and pictures of pioneer settlers. The newest which has come to our attention is MOUNTAINS AND MEADOWS, an exhaustive 305-page paperbound volume which was three and a half years in preparation and is now available through The Montana Historical Society.

Compiled by the Cascade Historical Committee under the direction of Mrs. Jean Rowe of Great Falls, the book contains over 200 pictures and the biographies of some 240 settlers of the region on the Missouri River surrounding Chestnut Valley, 30 miles south of Great Falls. There are historical sketches of Chestnut Valley, established as a postoffice in 1878; the town of Cascade, first known as Dodge; the famous Catholic mission, St. Peter's, founded by the Jesuits in 1865; the town of Hardy, which sprang up with the railroad and became a postoffice in 1888, and the farming community of Castner Falls.

The Society's book order department will accept orders for MOUNTAINS AND MEADOWS at $7.50 per copy, plus 35 cents postage.

INDIAN-FUR TRADE COMES ALIVE

Four new display cases, seen here, greet the visitor to the Indian-Fur Trade section of our Formal Museum, while the sound of saw and hammer further on in the room beckon toward more to come. Curator Bob Morgan with assistants Ken Gibson and Bob Gant hurry to complete the last display segment in this area in time for the summer tourist season. Incorporating modern, motorized in-the-round technique, together with wall and glassed cases, this will complete the story of the Indian from his pre-historic state to final confinement on reservations. The cases seen here take him from his years of dependence on the buffalo, through the height of his native culture and finery, the change in his way of life with the advent of horses, his first meeting with white traders who penetrated his domain to harvest beaver and other furs, his confrontation with missionaries and whiskey traders, settlers and soldiers.

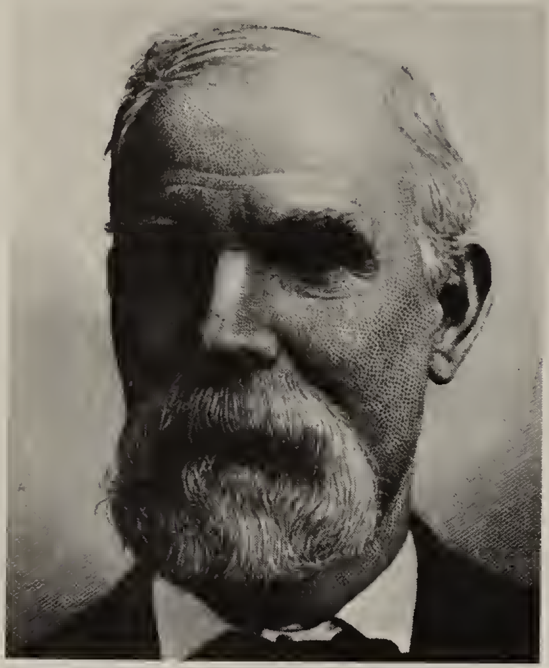
LIBRARY ARCHIVES ENRICHED BY PAPERS OF RANCHER COOK, MINER-BANKER CRUSE



TOMMY CRUSE

A. B. COOK

Archivist John Coleman has recently been working with two new acquisitions, promising treasure troves for research on early Montana business. One collection includes the complete personal and business papers of rancher A. B. Cook, whose Herefords took prizes throughout the nation during the early part of this century. The other collection, part of the papers of mining baron Thomas Cruse, partially fills a considerable gap in our research library.

A. B. Cook, on his ranches near Townsend and near White Sulphur Springs, totaling some 50,000 acres, developed an outstanding herd of Herefords, whose quality is attested by a carton filled with blue and purple prize ribbons. The business records of his operations extend from 1890 to 1928.

Cook also served a four-year term as State Auditor, beginning in 1892, and did extensive railroad construction work. He was in charge of building what is now Burlington Northern track between Great Falls and Butte, and received large contracts for Canadian railroad construction.

Photographs included with the collection depict procedures in railroad construction at the time, as well as the generations of pedigreed cattle of the Cook ranches. This collection comes to us from the estate of his son, rancher Hervey Cook of Townsend.

Efforts of Newell Gough Jr., member of the Society Board of Trustees, and a past president of the Society, resulted in receipt of the Cook papers.

The Thomas Cruse papers, Coleman predicts, will "put an end to speculation" about several facets of the mining man's career. The Society previously owned but three manuscript items pertaining to Cruse, the Irish-born man whose success story reads like Horatio Alger.

After mining and prospecting in California, Nevada, Idaho, and Montana for 13 years, "Tommy" Cruse struck the rich quartz lode at Marysville, a few miles northwest of Helena, which he named Drum Lummon after a parish in his native Ireland county. He went on to develop several mines in the area.

In 1887 he founded one of the first savings institutions in Montana, the Thomas Cruse Savings Bank of Helena. He made a major contribution to the city when he bought the site for St. Helena Cathedral in 1905 and subsequently donated a great part of the building expenses. Cruse's business interests in Montana also included oil properties and a cattle ranch in Fergus County.

The newly-acquired collection holds mining records of the company formed after Cruse's death, as well as some papers contemporaneous to him. It is a gift of William T. Cruse of New Jersey, grand-nephew of Thomas, who also provided funds which allowed us to purchase the Cruse family Bible.

The late T. B. (Tommy) Miller of Helena, a friend of Mr. Cruse, first put the Society in touch with the New Jersey resident. Mr. Cruse visited Helena in late winter and gave his full co-operation to our staff in securing the papers.

Through these papers, researchers can trace the sale of the Drum Lummon (for $1.5 million and one-third interest) to a British company; schematic diagrams and site maps provide detailed "pictures" of the mines; assay reports demonstrate their richness; photographs depict in detail the building of mines; and some knowledge of Cruse's private life comes from an estate inventory listing jewels and household furnishings.

CON KOHRS' DEER LODGE HOME IS HISTORIC SITE

This parlor in the historic Conrad Kohrs home near Deer Lodge is part of the original section of the house, built of logs by Johnny Grant, adventurous Hudson Bay Company trader who began ranching in the area in 1853. The ranch, purchased in 1866 by the Danish-born cattleman, Conrad Kohrs, has been designated as a national historic site by the National Park Service, with acquisition and preservation already underway. It will become the first unit of a series of sites devoted to the role of cattlemen in the history of the American West. Along with the ranch headquarters, of which this authentically furnished parlor is a part, goes a vast collection of equipment used at the ranch through more than 120 years of operation, preserved by Conrad K. Warren, grandson of Conrad Kohrs.

ASST. CURATOR GANT ATTENDS ARCHEOLOGY, MUSEUM GATHERINGS

Assistant Curator Bob Gant spent a busy three days in Eastern Montana last month, the highlight of which was attendance at the 14th annual meeting of the Montana Archeological Society in Havre. Gant, a member of the board of directors of that body, will head up plans for the 1972 meeting, scheduled for Helena.

A side trip to Harlem included a visit with Mrs. Four Souls, an aged Cree woman who remembers the early days of her tribe and who has gathered ethnographic materials relating to it. Gant then went east to Glasgow, where he met with members of the Valley County Historical Society and discussed plans for development of their historical museum.

THE REAL McCOY: BEAVERHEAD ROCK

In the last issue of THE MONTANA POST, we fell into what is apparently a common error, and one which is worthy of straightening out, not only for its significance to the Lewis and Clark Expedition, but because of present efforts to preserve it. We pictured the wrong BEAVERHEAD ROCK, using an old A. E. Mathews drawing (erroneously captioned for many years) of what is actually Rattlesnake Cliff south of Dillon. The real Beaverhead Rock, we are informed by Mrs. Elfreda Woodside, president of the Beaverhead Museum Association, is north of Dillon, just over the Beaverhead County line into Madison County. It is sometimes wrongly called Point of Rocks, even by oldtimers. "I think," Mrs. Woodside writes, "that this spot having been known by both names probably comes about by the location of two rocks as shown in the picture (see above). The old bridge at the left crosses the Beaverhead River with Beaverhead Rock in the background. You will note a low point of rocks jutting out in the right side of the picture and a road (next to the irrigation ditch) rounding this point. This was the early stage road to Virginia City. This picture was taken no later than 1920, perhaps earlier." This close proximity of Beaverhead Rock and the point of rocks is clearly shown on early government maps, and may help explain the confusion in nomenclature.

EXCITING GALLERY SHOWINGS OF ART BY O. WIEGHORST, W. H. D. KOERNER

Olaf Wieghorst and W. H. D. Koerner, two of the most distinguished delineators of the American West, are featured in one-man shows this Summer in the gallery of contemporary art adjacent to the C. M. Russell gallery on our main floor. Both these giants of the western canvas were foreign born, both are noted for bold, masculine renditions, coupled with unusually sensitive and subtle coloration, according to Curator Bob Morgan.

A collection of 21 oils by the Danish-born Wieghorst, who now lives in El Cajon, Calif., were hung the first of this month and may be viewed throughout May and June. All are owned by Malcolm S. Mackay of Roscoe, Mont., son of the late Malcolm S. Mackay whose fine collection of C. M. Russell original art constitutes the nucleus of The Society's permanent collection. Wieghorst, considered by many to be the greatest living artist of the western scene, is the subject of a recent book by William Reed, published by Northland Press of Flagstaff, Ariz., with introduction by Senator Barry Goldwater. His subject matter, which includes cowboy life, portraits, and landscapes, are captured with such depth and beauty that they are much sought-after by private collectors and galleries.

Some 50 works by the late W. H. D. Koerner, one of America's leading illustrators of the 1920's and 1930's, will be hung in the gallery in July for a two-month showing. A native of Germany, Koerner produced a prodigious number of magnificent canvases which adorned the covers and illustrated the stories of The Saturday Evening Post and other publications when Zane Grey, Emerson Hough and Eugene Manlove Rhodes were writing their famed stories of western romance. Koerner's paintings were largely unknown in art circles for many years between his death in 1938 and the death of his wife in 1964. Now his daughter, Mrs. Ruth Koerner Oliver of Santa Barbara, Calif., has taken charge of cataloging, restoring and displaying hundreds of his oils, watercolors, and superb drawings throughout the country. Two Koerner paintings have been used as cover subjects for MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY.

"It is seldom," remarked Curator Morgan, "that any western gallery is privileged to show two such imposing shows in succession, and we're especially happy that they have come when numbers of visitors to our galleries are at their height."

Suffering Behind for Estonian Artist-Medic

It's a long ways from tiny Estonia on the Baltic Sea to Montana's colorful mining city of Butte. The memories of Voldemar Podder go back a long ways, too. This 72-year-old man, who has known so much suffering and translated much of it in his art, is a patient now at a hospital in Butte, but there is no bitterness left and there is serenity and friendship around him.

Nearly 300 of his paintings and a number of other art objects, including woodcuts and wire and wood sculptures, recently came to the permanent collections of The Montana Historical Society from The Montana Heritage Foundation. Details were worked out by E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, a member of our Board of Trustees, and Judge Howard Johnson, also of that city, a former member of our board and now president of the Foundation.

Voldemar Podder, who came to Montana in 1956 and became a U. S. citizen in 1963 when he moved to Butte, has a life story as poignant as his art. He was 20 years old when the Russians invaded his native Estonia in 1918. He escaped, but his father stayed behind, dedicating his printing shop to the Estonian resistance, only to be captured, imprisoned, and broken in health. He died shortly after regaining his freedom.

Voldemar returned home after independence was renewed. Around him was "the first suffering I witnessed in my life." His compassionate reaction was deep commitment: "I decided on a profession in which I could undo some of mankind's anguish. So I entered medical school."

Before completing his studies, Podder was called into the Estonian army, which did not discharge him for 15 years. Invasion followed invasion like waves over the tiny nation. There was to be no chance for Podder to finish medical training.

VOLDEMAR PODDER

Russia occupied Estonia in 1940, to be driven out by the Nazis a year later. Podder's brother, Erich, had served in the Estonian army until entering a mental hospital. During the Nazi occupation, Voldemar sought to visit him, only to learn ". . . he'd suddenly died of some unknown illness. So had all the other inmates . . . on the same day. The Nazis had relieved the world of a hospital full of people."

The Nazis were driven out of Estonia in 1944, and Podder escaped to Germany and a series of refugee camps. He put his medical knowledge to work as much as possible during the next 10 years in the camps.

It was then he began to paint, "not for the eyes but for the soul," his portraits of the tortured, homeless people around him. These works, vividly documenting the horror of war's destruction of the human spirit, demand compassion from the viewer. They are surely an outgrowth of the same love of man motivating the artist toward medical work.

Podder actually began to paint from pride in his homeland. In 1946, a United Nations-sponsored "exposition of handicrafts" was scheduled. When Voldemar discovered that no Estonian work was to be entered, he produced several paintings so that his country would be represented.

After that, he found a release in the painting, and was encouraged by other refugees. His paintings were shown in many German cities.

In this manner, the years went by. Finally, he came to the United States in 1956, bringing 200 of his works with him. A job awaited him at Warm Springs State Hospital in western Montana, where he would stay for seven years, "a chance again to help suffering mankind." His only complaint was mild: When assigned to the night shift, he found it difficult to paint, preferring to paint by night.

He soon became actively involved in the Montana Institute of the Arts, travelling by bus to Butte for weekly meetings. His works were exhibited around the state, and some joined the MIA "Little Festival." He entered the annual Five-State Spring Exhibition in Scottsbluff, Nebraska, year after year, once having his exhibits voted third-most-popular in the show and always taking at least honorable mentions.

While showing over 200 pieces in a one-man show at the Russian Center, San Francisco, in 1959, Podder told Donald Canter of the San Francisco News that he was now done with the portraits of sorrowing, suffering people. "That's the Podder of the past," he said.

Reporter Canter had noted the artist's emphasis on hands: "Chained hands, empty hands, clenched hands, hands reaching through prison bars, hands desperately lifted toward Heaven." Podder assured him that "from now on I'll paint other things. Laughing faces and busy, happy hands."

In another interview years later he would call his work "for the soul not just the eyes," as it remains indeed, even during the period of picturing those happier with their lives. But "because I am in a free country," Podder has said, "I do not paint chained hands and haunting eyes any more."

RANCHER KINGSBURY OF MONTANA INSTALLED IN COWBOY HALL OF FAME

Adkin W. Kingsbury, pioneer Montana rancher and stockman, has been inducted into the National Cowboy Hall of Fame at Oklahoma City, appropriately in the 100th anniversary year of his ranching career, which began in 1871 when his firm, Davenport, Ray and Company, purchased 1,800 sheep which had been trailed from Oregon to Deer Lodge.

ADKIN W. KINGSBURY

Born in Howard County, Missouri, in 1842, Kingsbury came to Montana in 1864, living at Jefferson City until moving to Helena a year later. He became associated with the firm founded by William Davenport and Thomas Ray, both of Helena, and when the Chouteau Livestock Company was organized in 1882, he was named general manager. Ten years later it was succeeded by the Big Sag Land Livestock Company, and Kingsbury then moved to Great Falls. Kingsbury, who is the 13th Montanan to be elected to the Cowboy Hall of Fame, died in 1924.

Historical Society Director Sam Gilluly was pleased to work with the honored man's son, Wallace Kingsbury, and daughter, Mrs. Frank G. Menke, both of Carmel, Calif., in preparing the biographical brochure for presentation at Oklahoma City. Also helping with the project have been G. R. "Jack" Milburn of Billings, recently retired from the Hall of Fame's governing body, and Ralph Miracle of Santa Barbara, Calif., former executive secretary of the Montana Stockgrowers Association.

Another Award for Magazine; Editor Writes Book Intro

Editor Vivian Paladin has been notified that MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY has won its sixth national award from the National Federation of Press Women, whose convention is scheduled for Saturday, May 29, in Phoenix, Ariz. The magazine, since 1964, has been a consistent first place winner in state writing contests, and has gone on to national recognition.

The Society is also pleased to announce the publication of SCULPTOR IN BUCKSKIN, the autobiography of the famed sculptor of heroic statuary, Alexander Phimister Proctor, for which Vivian wrote the introduction.

Published by the University of Oklahoma Press, this manuscript came to the attention of the Society in 1964, when we published an article on Proctor, written by the editor. The exciting text, telling of Proctor's early life, and his rise to become one of America's most honored sculptors, was finished by his daughter and others, and, with a large portfolio of Proctor's works, is now published in unusually beautiful format. The book will be available, as we go to press, from The Society.

READER HAS NOSTALGIC MEMORIES OF SCULPTOR JOHN CLARKE'S WORKS

I received the February-March issue of the MONTANA POST and was surprised to read of John Clarke, the Blackfoot Indian sculptor. As a young girl years ago I saw this man in Kalispell, Montana, in one of the big stores. He had for sale so many of his wood carvings.

The mountain goat was $3.00 — at which time I had the money and walked back twice to see them. But as I was going to visit a girl friend away east of Kalispell who lived up in the mountains I hurried on. Many times have I thought of that goat, and how I wish I had gotten it.

I am an oldtimer of 1910 when my family homesteaded north of Dunkirk. The West still flows warm in my blood. And surely enjoy reading it.

So thanks for such news. It will go in my Montana scrap book . . .

NATIVE SPRUCE, PLAQUE PLACED IN HONOR OF MONTANA NAT'L. GUARD

Formally presented last September, a native spruce now grows on our front lawn. Recently, the commemorative plaque was added to designate this tree a "living symbol of the profound gratitude of our citizens to the Montana National Guard for its invaluable contributions to the history, growth, and honor of Montana from Territorial days."

Donors of this memorial are members of the 163rd Infantry Association, composed of veterans of the South Pacific theater in World War II. Members of a Montana National Guard regiment before the war, they were mustered into active duty as the 163d.

THIRD ANNUAL RUSSELL AUCTION A SMILING SUCCESS

These smiling faces at the head table suggest the atmosphere and success of the third annual C. M. Russell auction of original western art, held March 12 at the Rainbow Hotel in Great Falls, during which more than $149,000 worth of Russell and contemporary art was sold to a sell-out crowd of eager buyers. Left to right in this candid photograph are Fred Renner of Washington, D.C., Robert Rockwell of Corning, N.Y., and Victor Hammer of New York's Hammer Galleries, who served as honorary chairman of this year's events. Renner and Rockwell, both well known collectors of Russelliana, have served in this capacity at other auctions and were honored guests again this year. Sponsored by the Great Falls Ad Club, the lively all-day schedule of activities marks the birthday month of The Cowboy Artist and is staged for the benefit of our sister gallery in Great Falls, the C. M. Russell Gallery. Our Society was again pleased to be represented at the event by Director Sam Gilluly, Editor Vivian Paladin and Curator Bob Morgan.

This parlor in the historic Conrad Kohrs home near Deer Lodge is part of the original section of the house, built of logs by Johnny Grant, adventurous Hudson Bay Company trader who began ranching in the area in 1853. The ranch, purchased in 1866 by the Danish-born cattleman, Conrad Kohrs, has been designated as a national historic site by the National Park Service, with acquisition and preservation already underway. It will become the first unit of a series of sites devoted to the role of cattlemen in the history of the American West. Along with the ranch headquarters, of which this authentically furnished parlor is a part, goes a vast collection of equipment used at the ranch through more than 120 years of operation, preserved by Conrad K. Warren, grandson of Conrad Kohrs.

ASST. CURATOR GANT ATTENDS ARCHEOLOGY, MUSEUM GATHERINGS

Assistant Curator Bob Gant spent a busy three days in Eastern Montana last month, the highlight of which was attendance at the 14th annual meeting of the Montana Archeological Society in Havre. Gant, a member of the board of directors of that body, will head up plans for the 1972 meeting, scheduled for Helena.

A side trip to Harlem included a visit with Mrs. Four Souls, an aged Cree woman who remembers the early days of her tribe and who has gathered ethnographic materials relating to it. Gant then went east to Glasgow, where he met with members of the Valley County Historical Society and discussed plans for development of their historical museum.

THE REAL McCOY: BEAVERHEAD ROCK

In the last issue of THE MONTANA POST, we fell into what is apparently a common error, and one which is worthy of straightening out, not only for its significance to the Lewis and Clark Expedition, but because of present efforts to preserve it. We pictured the wrong BEAVERHEAD ROCK, using an old A. E. Mathews drawing (erroneously captioned for many years) of what is actually Rattlesnake Cliff south of Dillon. The real Beaverhead Rock, we are informed by Mrs. Elfreda Woodside, president of the Beaverhead Museum Association, is north of Dillon, just over the Beaverhead County line into Madison County. It is sometimes wrongly called Point of Rocks, even by oldtimers. "I think," Mrs. Woodside writes, "that this spot having been known by both names probably comes about by the location of two rocks as shown in the picture (see above). The old bridge at the left crosses the Beaverhead River with Beaverhead Rock in the background. You will note a low point of rocks jutting out in the right side of the picture and a road (next to the irrigation ditch) rounding this point. This was the early stage road to Virginia City. This picture was taken no later than 1920, perhaps earlier." This close proximity of Beaverhead Rock and the point of rocks is clearly shown on early government maps, and may help explain the confusion in nomenclature.

EXCITING GALLERY SHOWINGS OF ART BY O. WIEGHORST, W. H. D. KOERNER

Olaf Wieghorst and W. H. D. Koerner, two of the most distinguished delineators of the American West, are featured in one-man shows this Summer in the gallery of contemporary art adjacent to the C. M. Russell gallery on our main floor. Both these giants of the western canvas were foreign born, both are noted for bold, masculine renditions, coupled with unusually sensitive and subtle coloration, according to Curator Bob Morgan.

A collection of 21 oils by the Danish-born Wieghorst, who now lives in El Cajon, Calif., were hung the first of this month and may be viewed throughout May and June. All are owned by Malcolm S. Mackay of Roscoe, Mont., son of the late Malcolm S. Mackay whose fine collection of C. M. Russell original art constitutes the nucleus of The Society's permanent collection. Wieghorst, considered by many to be the greatest living artist of the western scene, is the subject of a recent book by William Reed, published by Northland Press of Flagstaff, Ariz., with introduction by Senator Barry Goldwater. His subject matter, which includes cowboy life, portraits, and landscapes, are captured with such depth and beauty that they are much sought-after by private collectors and galleries.

Some 50 works by the late W. H. D. Koerner, one of America's leading illustrators of the 1920's and 1930's, will be hung in the gallery in July for a two-month showing. A native of Germany, Koerner produced a prodigious number of magnificent canvases which adorned the covers and illustrated the stories of The Saturday Evening Post and other publications when Zane Grey, Emerson Hough and Eugene Manlove Rhodes were writing their famed stories of western romance. Koerner's paintings were largely unknown in art circles for many years between his death in 1938 and the death of his wife in 1964. Now his daughter, Mrs. Ruth Koerner Oliver of Santa Barbara, Calif., has taken charge of cataloging, restoring and displaying hundreds of his oils, watercolors, and superb drawings throughout the country. Two Koerner paintings have been used as cover subjects for MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY.

"It is seldom," remarked Curator Morgan, "that any western gallery is privileged to show two such imposing shows in succession, and we're especially happy that they have come when numbers of visitors to our galleries are at their height."

Dialogue with the Director

Publicity has been given the last few weeks to the coming Centennial of the first national park — Yellowstone. The anniversary occurs in 1972.

Some of the events planned for the Centennial will be held in nearby Grand Teton, and it appears that this decision has been made, in part, because of the partial downgrading of the environment in the first of all national parks. We hear even more alarming stories about some of the other parks.

While most of Yellowstone is in Wyoming, Montanans have had long interest in it and a stake in its development. In fact, it was a Montanan who first suggested that this still magnificent area be set aside for the use and enjoyment of all the people.

Judge Cornelius Hedges of Helena was a member of the Washburn Expedition of 1870. Nathaniel P. Langford, also a prestigious Montanan, wrote the story of that early trip.

In the waning days of the expedition, the party stopped at Tower Falls, visited the incomparable Grand Canyon, then moved around Yellowstone Lake and into the Firehole Basin.

One evening at camp where the Gibbon and Firehole rivers meet to form the Madison, Hedges planted his idea. The party was to leave the Yellowstone the next day; the men sat around the campfire discussing what they had seen and the possibilities of its development as a resort area for their own commercial gain. Hedges listened, then spoke. N. P. Langford's diary tells the story:

"Mr. Hedges then said that he did not approve of any of these plans — that there ought to be no private ownership of any portion of that region, but that the whole of it ought to be set apart as a great National Park, and that each one of us ought to make an effort to have this accomplished."

Thus a great idea was born. Cornelius Hedges contributed much in many ways to Montana's political and educational history. If he had done nothing more than the idea he broached around the campfire 101 years ago, his name would be revered.

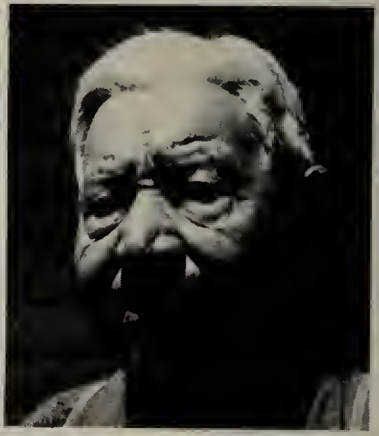
DEATH COMES TO JOSIAH REDWOLF, LAST NEZ PERCE FLIGHT SURVIVOR



Josiah Red Wolf, last survivor of the flight of the Nez Perce in 1877, whose poignant story was told by Dr. and Mrs. Gordon Alcorn of Tacoma in the Fall, 1965, issue of our magazine, died on March 23 at Lewiston, Idaho, his life falling only two years short of the century mark.

This gentle Nez Perce, grandson of Chief Red Wolf, was five years old when his people attempted to flee to Canada, only to be captured when they stopped too soon, a few miles from the border near present-day Chinook, Montana. His mother and infant sister were killed with a single bullet when the group was attacked in the Big Hole Basin of Montana. Young Josiah and his father were among those who made their way to the Bear Paw Mountains and defeat.

After spending his youth on several reservations, Josiah went on to complete the education available to Indians of that era. He attended the Chillico Indian School in Oklahoma, beginning at age 10, and went on to Carlisle Indian Institute in Pennsylvania.

At Carlisle, he learned to be a cobbler while playing in the school band. He learned cornet and saxophone, a highlight of his band career coming in 1893 when the Carlisle band combined with the Marine and Sousa bands in concert at the Columbian Exposition, Chicago.

Returning to his native country, Josiah worked as a cobbler in Lapwai, Idaho, before becoming — briefly — a bank cashier, and eventually a farmer. In 1897 he married Frances Raborn, a full-blooded Nez Perce. Of their seven children, only one, Mrs. Maisie Ramsey McConville, survived infancy.

The aged Josiah attended the dedication of the visitors' center at the Big Hole Battlefield, now a national monument, in 1969. He had also been an honored guest seven years before, at the dedication of the scenic highway over Lolo Pass. While the site was being noted as one traversed by Lewis and Clark, Josiah remembered it as part of the Nez Perce Trail over which his people passed in 1877, knowing soldiers followed close behind.

The Alcorns and others who knew him well report that Josiah did not become a bitter man, as well he could have, but remained a gentle, somewhat sad, person. His contributions to Nez Perce historiography have been invaluable, and will be greatly missed.

SAGE GREEN ADVICE: HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY

"I just love to go into a high school and start a conversation," Joshua Green, retired Seattle banker now nearing his 102nd birthday, said recently. "They are snappy and quick. If they have a fault, it might be they're a little too snappy." This is part of an item appearing in the March newsletter published by the Jefferson County Historical Society of Port Townsend, Washington and shared with us by V. J. Gregory, president of that lively group. The venerable Mr. Green went on to tell his interviewer about a personal conviction: "The longer a person lives, the more satisfied he is that honesty is the best policy. I've seen so many instances of bright fellows turning a little bit dishonest and going to pieces. I've seen some sharpies succeed temporarily but not all through their lives. Honesty is so easy to practice. I know it pays."

Society Entertains Lawmakers

Senior and junior members of Montana's 42nd Legislative Session were represented at The Society's open house. Above, David M. Manning of Hysham, referred to by his colleagues as the "Dean of the Senate," inspects a group of bronzes in the new C. M. Russell Gallery, as his wife, Ruth, looks on. Born in Wisconsin in 1897, Manning served in the House from 1933 to 1939, and has been in the Senate the past 30 years. Below, first-term Representative Thomas E. Towe of Billings looks at the Antique Ford Collection owned by his father, Ed Towe, Eastern Montana banker. Born in 1937 in Iowa, Representative Towe holds law degrees from the University of Montana and Georgetown University, Washington, D.C. His wife, photographed with him, is also named Ruth.

Associate Justice John Harrison of the Montana Supreme Court leaves the merchandise display area to greet a new arrival at the Society's open house. Guests are seen inspecting the Winter issue of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY and discussing the many items of Western Americana available at the Society.

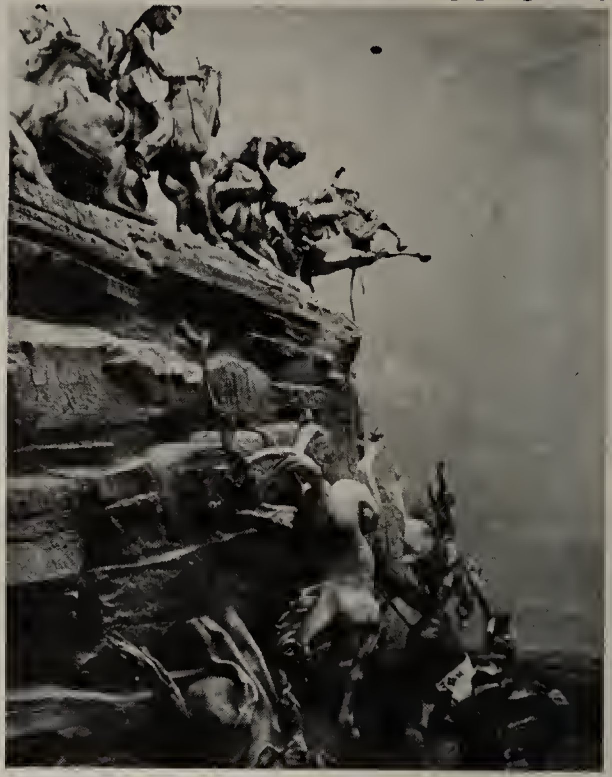
MONTANA HIGHWAY DEPT. PHOTOS

Representative Chase Patrick of Helena and his wife, Anne, enjoy a nostalgic look at the cutaway section of a homesteader's shack, which lends atmosphere to the Towe Antique Ford collection and points up the importance of the sturdy Model T to this period of Montana history.

The Baroque String Quartet from Helena's Carroll College added a musical dimension to the C. M. Russell Gallery during our Legislative open house. From left to right are Karen Gookin, flute; Dick Shackleford, violin, Joseph Munzenrider, harpsichord, and Mary Scott, cello.

Mrs. Charles Bovey, president of the Montana Historical Society, receives mementoes of a major railroading change in Montana from John Willard, Billings, who acted on behalf of John M. Budd, chairman of the board of Burlington Northern Railway. Mrs. Bovey and Willard are holding a "Vision Quest' Indian ornament and a silver switch key, symbolic of the relocation of railroad lines occasioned by the gigantic new Libby Dam on the Kootenai River in Montana's extreme Northwestern corner. Witnessing the presentation, which also included a scrapbook and other historical materials, are three Lincoln County legislators, Rep. William R. Baeth, Rep. Arthur H. Shelden, and Senator William F. Hafferman.

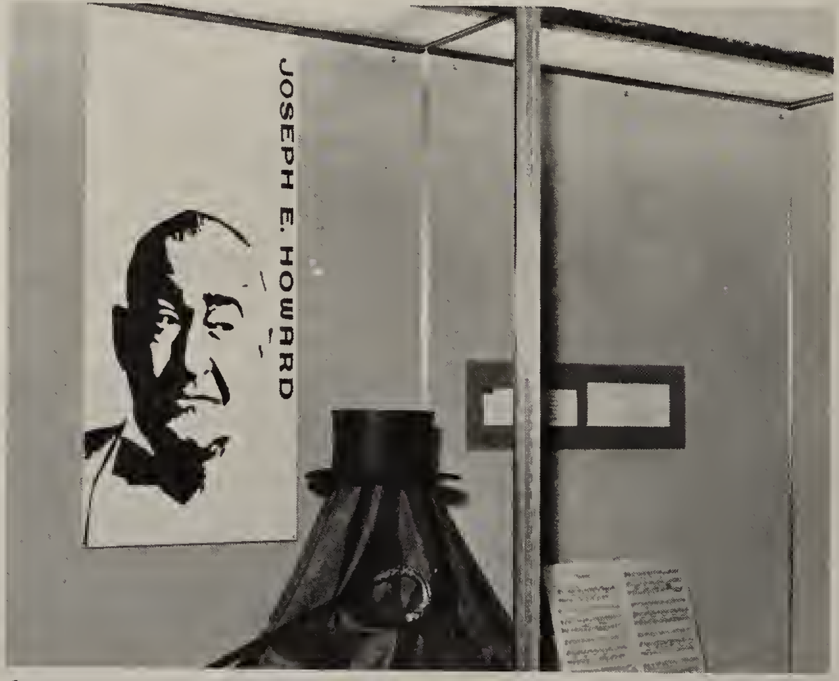
NEW DIORAMA AT BILLINGS DRAMATIZES CROW SUICIDE



Terrified, blindfolded horses carrying their Crow Indian riders to death on the rocks below the famous Rimrocks of Billings compose the theme of this graphic new diorama recently dedicated at the Yellowstone County Museum. Peter Yegen, Jr., museum chairman, greeted hundreds of guests who came to see this creation of Mrs. James Montfort, Eastern Montana sculptor-historian-housewife. It depicts Billings' Sacrifice Cliffs during the period in 1837 when hundreds of Indians are said to have committed suicide rather than face the dreaded smallpox.

Senator and Mrs. Hank Hibbard of Lewis and Clark County are served coffee from an historic Montana Silver urn by Mrs. Stella Foote, Billings, a member of the Society's Board of Trustees. Taking turns at the serving table were Mrs. Marie MacDonald, Glendive, also a Society trustee, and wives of Board and staff members.

DISPLAY CASE HONORS COLORFUL SHOWMAN JOE HOWARD, COMPOSER OF MONTANA SONG



Joseph E. Howard, the colorful theatrical personality who composed Montana's official state song, is featured in this special wall display case in our lobby. Curator Bob Morgan created a stylized portrait of the great showman, while the curatorial staff utilized such personal items as his white gloves, gold-headed cane and silk tophat to lend atmosphere. These items came to the Society from Howard's widow, now living in Vero Beach, Florida. His grand piano, also donated to the State of Montana, is in the Governor's reception room in the capitol. Howard, who died while performing in Chicago in 1961, wrote Montana's song in 1910 while he was appearing in a show at Butte. At a party at the home of Mrs. E. Creighton Largey after one performance, Butter Miner Editor Charles C. Cohan agreed to write lyrics to Howard's music. The stirring words and music were officially adopted as Montana's song in 1945.

LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTIONS PASSED WOULD PRESERVE LEWIS & CLARK LANDMARK, ANCIENT INDIAN WRITINGS

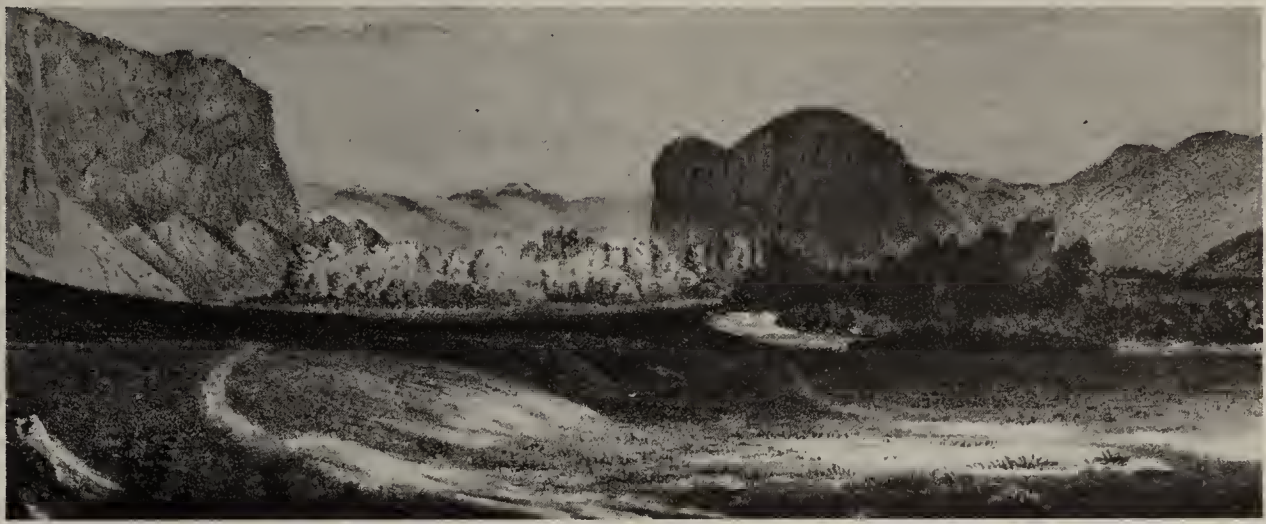
Joint resolutions introduced in the Montana Legislature this month have a particular interest to us at the Society, and to anyone interested in preserving the landmarks of history. We would like to share them with our readers, with the hope that verbal or other support might result.

A plea to preserve and prevent the destruction of Beaverhead Rock near Dillon in Southwestern Montana received the signature of all 55 Montana Senators when Senate Joint Resolution No. 16 was introduced on January 28. House Joint Resolution No. 22, introduced by Representatives Haines and Schoonover, calls for the protection of Montana's Indian rock paintings and pictographs, some of which have already been violated or threatened by curiosity hunters.

Beaverhead Rock, so named because of its remarkable resembance to a swimming beaver, and the landmark which, when sighted during the Lewis and Clark Expedition caused Sacajawea to remark, "now I KNOW we are on the road to the land of my people," was being threatened with demolition to secure rock and gravel for rip-rapping on the Beaverhead and Jefferson Rivers.

Before appreciable damage had been done, the alert was sounded by Mrs. Fred Woodside, director of the Beaverhead County Historical Museum in Dillon. The cause for preservation became the personal concern of E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, a member of our Board of Trustees. Owners of the property on which the landmark is located were cooperative, and if proper action can be taken, preservation is likely. It is the hope of all that the immediate area, including the historic old Point of Rocks Stage Station, can be included in the acquisition and restoration process.

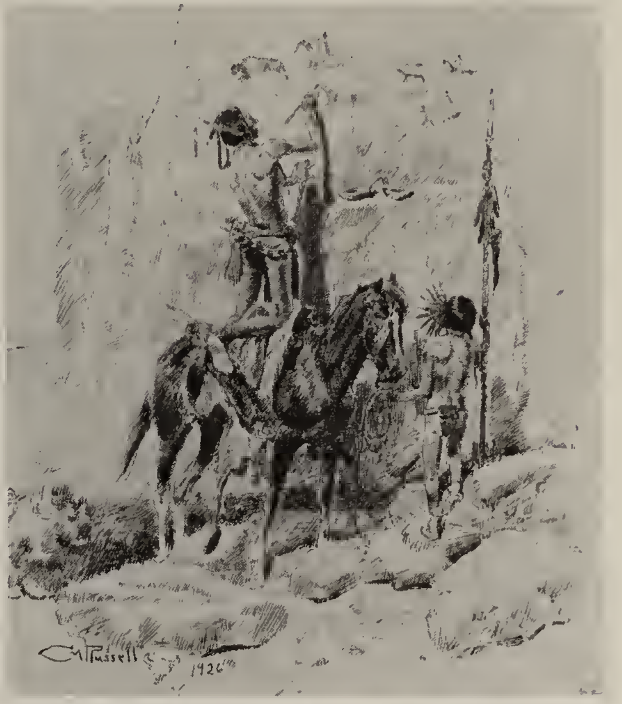
The Indian pictographs and rock paintings, some of which are from 300 to 700 years old, are a somewhat more complex problem because of the diversity of location. Larry Kurzenbaum, Missoula printer and collector of cartridges and other artifacts, has taken this particular problem as a personal crusade, pointing out that it would be unwise to definitely locate the sites because it might lead to more depredation. One instance is known of a 40-pound rock containing Indian drawings being removed and placed in the stone fireplace of a Montana homeowner. There are many instances of partial or total disfigurement of the drawings.



A. E. Mathews, early artist of the Western scene, depicted Beaverhead Rock in Southwestern Montana, but it looks much the same today unless modern man destroys it. Meriwether Lewis, in his journal on August 8, 1805, said that "the Indian woman" had just recognized this spot on the westward journey and knew they had reached the land of her people.

The Resolution dealing with this problem of preservation directs the Historical Society, along with the Board of Land Commissioners and the Montana Highway Department, to do whatever "may be necessary to protect" the pictographs located on lands owned by the State of Montana. Reasonable attempts are to be made to at least provide adequate protection for those located on private lands.

It is a matter of concern to both Senator Lee Metcalf and Senator Mike Mansfield, as well as Montana Congressmen John Melcher and Dick Shoup, that Montana's natural waterways and landmarks be preserved. Letters to them on the Beaverhead Rock and the Indian pictographs could not help but add strength to their efforts and those of dedicated Montana people.



C. M. Russell depicted an Indian painting on rocks and entitled it, appropriately, "America's First Printer."

HAMMER TO PRESIDE AT THIRD ANNUAL C. M. RUSSELL ORIGINAL ART AUCTION

Art Dealer Victor Hammer of New York City will serve as honorary chairman of the third annual Charles M. Russell Art Auction slated for Friday, March 12, at the Rainbow Hotel in Great Falls. Nearly $200,000.00 worth of original Russell art, includings paintings and bronzes from the Hammer collection, will be sold, along with the works of some 30 contemporary Western artists. Hammer, who operates the Hammer Galleries in New York, will assist auctioneer Jack Raty of Fort Shaw in selling items offered during the sale period. The auction, which climaxes a day of activity, is sponsored by the Advertising Club of Great Falls and is for the benefit of the C. M. Russell Gallery of that city. Mrs. Norma Ashby, Bill Samson and Tom Johnson are co-chairmen of arrangements.

The event has grown in scope and enthusiasm since its inauguration three years ago. It has promoted statewide recognition of March as C. M. Russell Month in Montana. On Sunday, February 21, a "sheriff's posse" of 20 horses and riders rode from Great Falls to Helena carrying a proclamation from Great Falls Mayor John McLaughlin designating the month-long observance of Russell's birthday. In ceremonies at the Society's building, the proclamation became official with the signature of Governor Forrest Anderson.

SCULPTOR AND CARVER OF THE BLACKFOOT DEAD AT 89

After 89 years of life, all but two of them spent in a world of silence, John L. Clarke died last November. His woodcarvings of wild animals, in homes and museums across the nation, are life-like memorials to his deep perception and joy in the earth. The part-Blackfoot whose people had named him Ca-ta-pu-ie ("The Man Who Speaks Not") spent most of his life in East Glacier at the edge of the Park, in a studio visited by many of his admirers.

Clarke was descended from Blackfoot chief Stands Alone as well as Montana Pioneer Malcolm Clarke, whose murder triggered the horrible Baker Massacre of a century ago. At that time, Malcolm's son, Horace, was left for dead by the Piegan in-laws who committed the murder. Horace recovered, eventually to become John Clarke's father.

When John was two, he survived scarlet fever, but lost his hearing. Because of the loss, he never learned to talk. Taught to read and write at Fort Shaw Indian School, he was sent to a series of schools for the deaf. At one such school in Milwaukee, Clarke was introduced to woodcarving through a vocational training course in furniture decoration. During the course, he specialized in altar carving.

Returning home, he began the wildlife carving which soon brought him fame. He usually worked with cottonwood, difficult to carve because of its soft, spongy texture. He turned the disadvantage into an asset, roughing the fibers into realistically shaggy animal fur.

Besides carving in various woods, he also did some stone carving, and had experimented with plastics. He painted landscapes, and sketched Indian, buffalo, and wildlife subjects.

Society Curator Bob Morgan tells of Clarke's replies to eager patrons who inquired when their works would be finished. They received a postcard, signed simply "John," on which was sketched the present state of the work. The sketch might show, for example, a jeep heading cross-country to observe a wild elk herd.

Clarke's wife, whom he and their friends called "Mamie," was formerly Mary Simon. She encouraged the artist's work, and also acted as his ears and voice until her death in 1947. Their daughter, Mrs. Joyce Turvey, and two granddaughters live in California.

A retrospective showing of Clarke's work is planned by the Society late in this year. Drawing from our holdings and the finer pieces of other collections, the curatorial staff plans to make the show a memorial as well as an exhibit.

Curator Morgan and John Quigley, proprietor of Helena's "Frontier Town," own the last pieces signed by Clarke. Morgan found the pair of mountain goats, unsigned, in an antique store and recognized them as Clarke's work. Board of Trustees member Wilbur Werner of Cut Bank took them to the carver to sign—and his visit happened to be one of the last anyone had with him. Trustee Werner represented the Society at services in which John Clarke was laid to rest near his beloved Glacier Park.

1970 Visitors

Some 114,000 people, representing most of the states of the Union and many foreign countries, visited The Montana Historical Society building in 1970. They came as individuals, as families, and as members of conducted tours. Understandably, the greatest single day count came on July 31, when the new addition to the building was dedicated. More than 2,500 visitors were officially counted, but many more filtered in to view the new C. M. Russell Gallery, the Towe Antique Ford displays, and other display and work areas.

DEATH CLAIMS JOHN JEWELL, RACONTEUR TO THOUSANDS

Hundreds of vistors to the Society's galleries and exhibits, especially those who came in groups, will miss the distinctive voice of John Jacob Jewell as he lectured (from first-hand acquaintance) about Charles M. Russell and about Montana history (a good part of which he had lived). And we of the Society will miss his wise counsel, his lively stories, his steady support of our aims and mission for many years past.

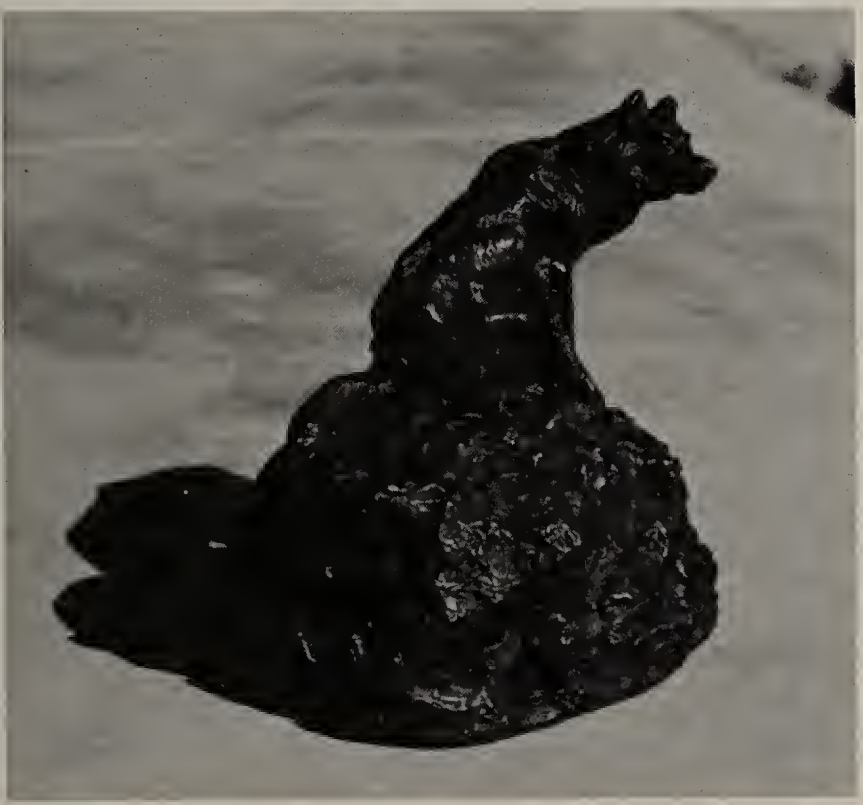
Death came suddenly to John Jewell just before Christmas, 1970, at the age of 84. Born in Decorah, Iowa, on August 14, 1886, John was one of those men to whom it was always difficult to attribute old age. His experience as a lawyer (University of Iowa, 1908) in Montana, beginning in 1910, his tenure as an official of the Montana Legislature, as executive secretary to Gov. Roy E. Ayres, as counsel for the Montana Automobile Dealers Association, and finally as lecturer and guide for the Historical Society and at the state capitol building only highlight the long and vigorous life of John Jewell.

It was our particular pleasure, in the November-December issue of THE MONTANA POST, to publish, with picture, a feature story of John's big 1907 football game for Iowa State, a game in which as a 158-pound left tackle, he blocked a kick, recovered the ball, and ran 75 yards for a touchdown against the University of Illinois. Just a few days before his death, John brought us a letter he had received from his old friend, Walter L. Stewart, now with a law firm in Des Moines, Iowa, and one of only two living members of the 1907 team.

Stewart, after seeing the feature story on Jewell's mighty run, had written, in part: "This game as to your performance stands out in my mind and I never forgot it being one game in which we defeated a team which was far better one than ours and beat them . . . simply because we didn't bother with a huddle and we ran our plays so fast that we sometimes had a play going before Illinois ever reached their defensive position. Orange and blue socks were lying all over the field and I remember your blocking the kick . . . I am more or less of the opinion that perhaps you should come back, secure Bill Carbarry's help as an assistant and coach the Iowa team. . . "

It is our opinion, at the Historical Society, that John Jewell could have done it.

THE MARAUDER by the incomparable C. M. Russell



A striking new bronze has been cast from Russell's model of a wolf, presented by the artist as a Christmas gift to Mr. and Mrs. Roy Page of Great Falls in 1918. It is based on the Blackfoot legend of a young woman captured by the Crows, who was aided in her escape by a wolf. After her return to her tribe, the wolf is said to have come every evening to a high butte, from where he sat gazing down upon her lodge. Only 30 casts have been made, and none will ever be cast again.

LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTIONS PASSED WOULD PRESERVE LEWIS & CLARK LANDMARK, ANCIENT INDIAN WRITINGS

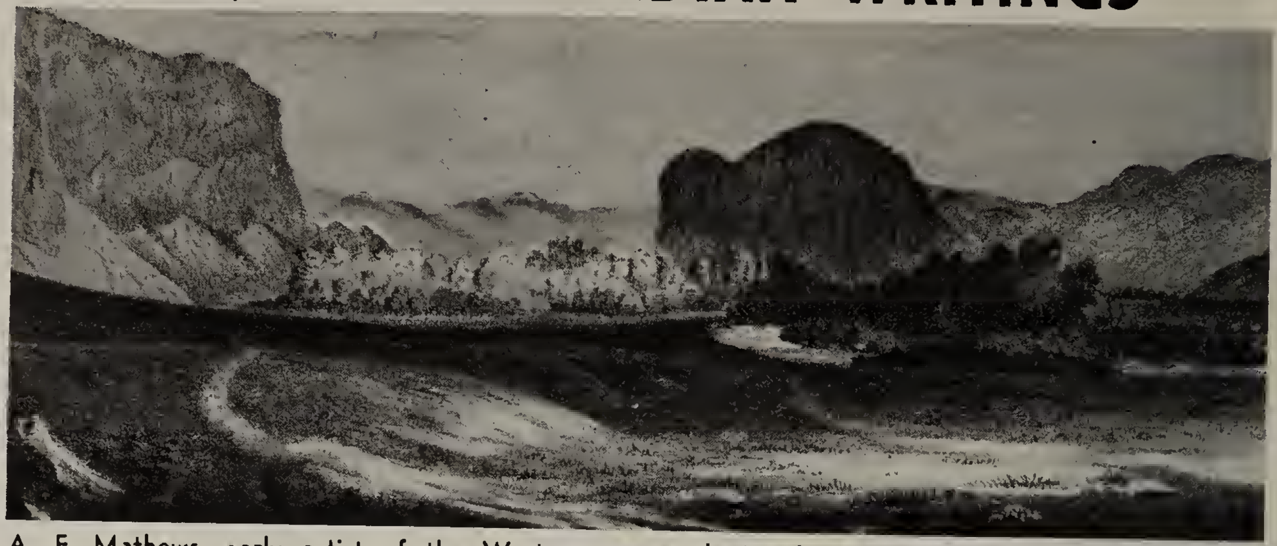
Joint resolutions introduced in the Montana Legislature this month have a particular interest to us at the Society, and to anyone interested in preserving the landmarks of history. We would like to share them with our readers, with the hope that verbal or other support might result.

A plea to preserve and prevent the destruction of Beaverhead Rock near Dillon in Southwestern Montana received the signature of all 55 Montana Senators when Senate Joint Resolution No. 16 was introduced on January 28. House Joint Resolution No. 22, introduced by Representatives Haines and Schoonover, calls for the protection of Montana's Indian rock paintings and pictographs, some of which have already been violated or threatened by curiosity hunters.

Beaverhead Rock, so named because of its remarkable resembance to a swimming beaver, and the landmark which, when sighted during the Lewis and Clark Expedition caused Sacajawea to remark, "now I KNOW we are on the road to the land of my people," was being threatened with demolition to secure rock and gravel for rip-rapping on the Beaverhead and Jefferson Rivers.

Before appreciable damage had been done, the alert was sounded by Mrs. Fred Woodside, director of the Beaverhead County Historical Museum in Dillon. The cause for preservation became the personal concern of E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, a member of our Board of Trustees. Owners of the property on which the landmark is located were cooperative, and if proper action can be taken, preservation is likely. It is the hope of all that the immediate area, including the historic old Point of Rocks Stage Station, can be included in the acquisition and restoration process.

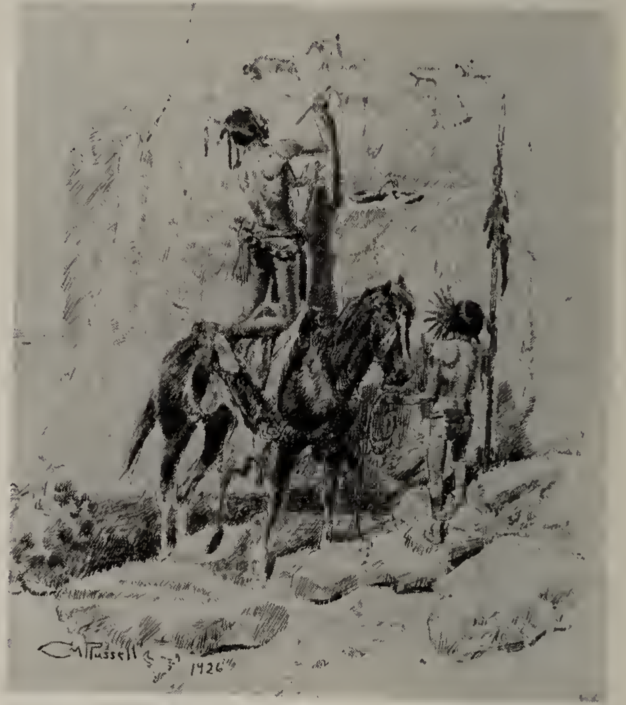
The Indian pictographs and rock paintings, some of which are from 300 to 700 years old, are a somewhat more complex problem because of the diversity of location. Larry Kurzenbaum, Missoula printer and collector of cartridges and other artifacts, has taken this particular problem as a personal crusade, pointing out that it would be unwise to definitely locate the sites because it might lead to more depredation. One instance is known of a 40-pound rock containing Indian drawings being removed and placed in the stone fireplace of a Montana homeowner. There are many instances of partial or total disfigurement of the drawings.



A. E. Mathews, early artist of the Western scene, depicted Beaverhead Rock in Southwestern Montana, but it looks much the same today unless modern man destroys it. Meriwether Lewis, in his journal on August 8, 1805, said that "the Indian woman" had just recognized this spot on the westward journey and knew they had reached the land of her people.

The Resolution dealing with this problem of preservation directs the Historical Society, along with the Board of Land Commissioners and the Montana Highway Department, to do whatever "may be necessary to protect" the pictographs located on lands owned by the State of Montana. Reasonable attempts are to be made to at least provide adequate protection for those located on private lands.

It is a matter of concern to both Senator Lee Metcalf and Senator Mike Mansfield, as well as Montana Congressmen John Melcher and Dick Shoup, that Montana's natural waterways and landmarks be preserved. Letters to them on the Beaverhead Rock and the Indian pictographs could not help but add strength to their efforts and those of dedicated Montana people.



C. M. Russell depicted an Indian painting on rocks and entitled it, appropriately, "America's First Printer."

HAMMER TO PRESIDE AT THIRD ANNUAL C. M. RUSSELL ORIGINAL ART AUCTION

Art Dealer Victor Hammer of New York City will serve as honorary chairman of the third annual Charles M. Russell Art Auction slated for Friday, March 12, at the Rainbow Hotel in Great Falls. Nearly $200,000.00 worth of original Russell art, includings paintings and bronzes from the Hammer collection, will be sold, along with the works of some 30 contemporary Western artists. Hammer, who operates the Hammer Galleries in New York, will assist auctioneer Jack Raty of Fort Shaw in selling items offered during the sale period. The auction, which climaxes a day of activity, is sponsored by the Advertising Club of Great Falls and is for the benefit of the C. M. Russell Gallery of that city. Mrs. Norma Ashby, Bill Samson and Tom Johnson are co-chairmen of arrangements.

The event has grown in scope and enthusiasm since its inauguration three years ago. It has promoted statewide recognition of March as C. M. Russell Month in Montana. On Sunday, February 21, a "sheriff's posse" of 20 horses and riders rode from Great Falls to Helena carrying a proclamation from Great Falls Mayor John McLaughlin designating the month-long observance of Russell's birthday. In ceremonies at the Society's building, the proclamation became official with the signature of Governor Forrest Anderson.

Dialogue with the Director

One of the great concerns of our Society and others engaged in history in Montana is making the people of our state aware of the importance of preserving personal papers and possessions of ordinary individuals. Our Society staffers and historians and librarians from Montana's University units and private colleges have now held two meetings to discuss co-operative efforts to collect such materials and, of course, keep them in Montana institutions, including ours.

The value of old letters, diaries, photographs, account books and relics is not easy for many people to understand. But they are vital in seeking to find and tell the story of Montana. We are reminded that, a few years ago, one Montanan wrote an entire book with one ledger as the main source.

Yes, we have many records of the great and near-great in politics, enterprise and military fields. This is far from the whole story. We know too little of how the miner lived and worked in Bannack or Virginia City or Last Chance Gulch. How was it in the prairie country for the honyocker who came from Iowa or Norway to make his fortune?

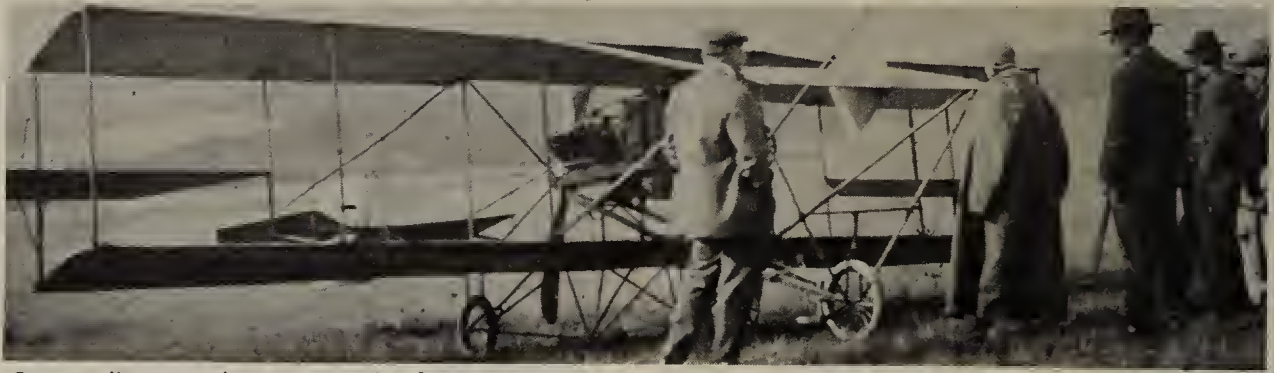
It is clear the very ordinariness of people who possessed papers or relics often contribute immeasurably to the historic value of the objects. And all too often, these are lost or distroyed before an historian can examine and evaluate them. These are source materials that should get careful preservation.

So often we have heard some one say, "Oh, I didn't think you would be interested in that." We are. We ask only that we have the opportunity to examine and determine its worth historically.

One famous antiquarian has written: "Most things in this world go through three stages. When they are new they are exciting and interesting; when they become oldfashioned they are dull and there is a revulsion of feeling against them. If they manage to survive this dangerous period they become interesting again, even what is called romantic."

For the historian, a new find, often a commonplace one, helps to place another brick in the wall of history. As Lincoln phrased it, "short and simple annals of the poor" are as significant as the stories of the captains and the kings. —SAM GILLULY

POST READERS RECALL 1911 FLIGHT OF CROMWELL DIXON, SPOTTED FEVER LAB



Cromwell Dixon (in overcoat) after landing on Continental Divide west of Helena, September 30, 1911. The daring aviator was killed at an air show at Spokane, Wash. two weeks later.

My husband just finished reading the November-December, 1970 MONTANA POST, and was especially interested in Sam Gilluly's column dealing with the memories of Judge Lester Loble. This touched his life, too, for he was born and raised in Helena and lived between the Broadwater Hotel and Fort Harrison. He rode in that same airplane, piloted by Cromwell Dixon, when he was 12 years old. He played hookey from school and helped Mr. Dixon assemble his airplane, and was rewarded for his efforts with a ride. That ride also led to his becoming a pilot. He is now a retired lieutenant-colonel in the U.S. Air Force.

I was very much interested in your November-December, 1970 MONTANA POST article and picture description of the diorama at Rickett's Memorial Museum in Hamilton, Mont. My interest was aroused because I personally knew the men pictured and, in a remote way, had something to do with the early fight against Spotted Fever.

As you probably know, the first Spotted Fever Laboratory, if you want to call it that, was set up in a ram-shackle old house in Victor, a village in the Bitterroot Valley. The house was not too far from the postoffice—and not too far from where I lived as a boy. Like most boys, I was always looking for a job and believe it was Dr. McCray who gave me a summer job gathering clover and alfalfa to feed the lab guinea pigs.

Later on my old friend, Frank Cowan (who now lives in Bozeman) and I had a job catching live cottontail and snowshoe rabbits for the lab. We also worked on the control of Columbian ground squirrels which play a part in the life cycle of the woodtick. This latter employment was when the laboratory had been moved to Hamilton.

Besides the doctors in the picture, I also knew well some of the early Spotted Fever workers who succumbed to the disease. Some of those I remember were Dr. McCray, William Gettinger and Henry Cowan, a brother of Frank. The diorama and its story bring back a lot of memories to me and inspires thanks to the dedicated doctors, laboratory and field workers who brought a once dread disease under control.

MONTANA POST

VOLUME EIGHT, NUMBER FOUR NOVEMBER, DECEMBER, 1970

SHELVED WITH PERIODICALS

IT'S THE AGE OF ACQUISITION

An article in the February-March, 1970, Montana Post provided a general overview of the Historical Society's archives program and discussed the work being done by Archivist John R. Coleman. Much progress has been made since then. Coleman completed a voluminous thesis titled Montana State Agencies and Documents, 1864-1970, and received a Master of Arts degree in June from the University of Montana in Missoula.

Archival acquisitions have come in at an all-time high; a catalog of manuscript collections went into published form; gradual movement into the new archives storage area began, and preparations for functioning as the official Montana State Archives repository continued.

Coleman commented that many years from now staff members will probably refer to this period of the Society's archive activity as "The Age of Acquisition," in view of the volume of material being gathered and the relatively small number of collections being processed into final storage form. In terms of linear footage, more historical manuscript material has been collected during the last two years than in any previous ten- or twenty-year period.

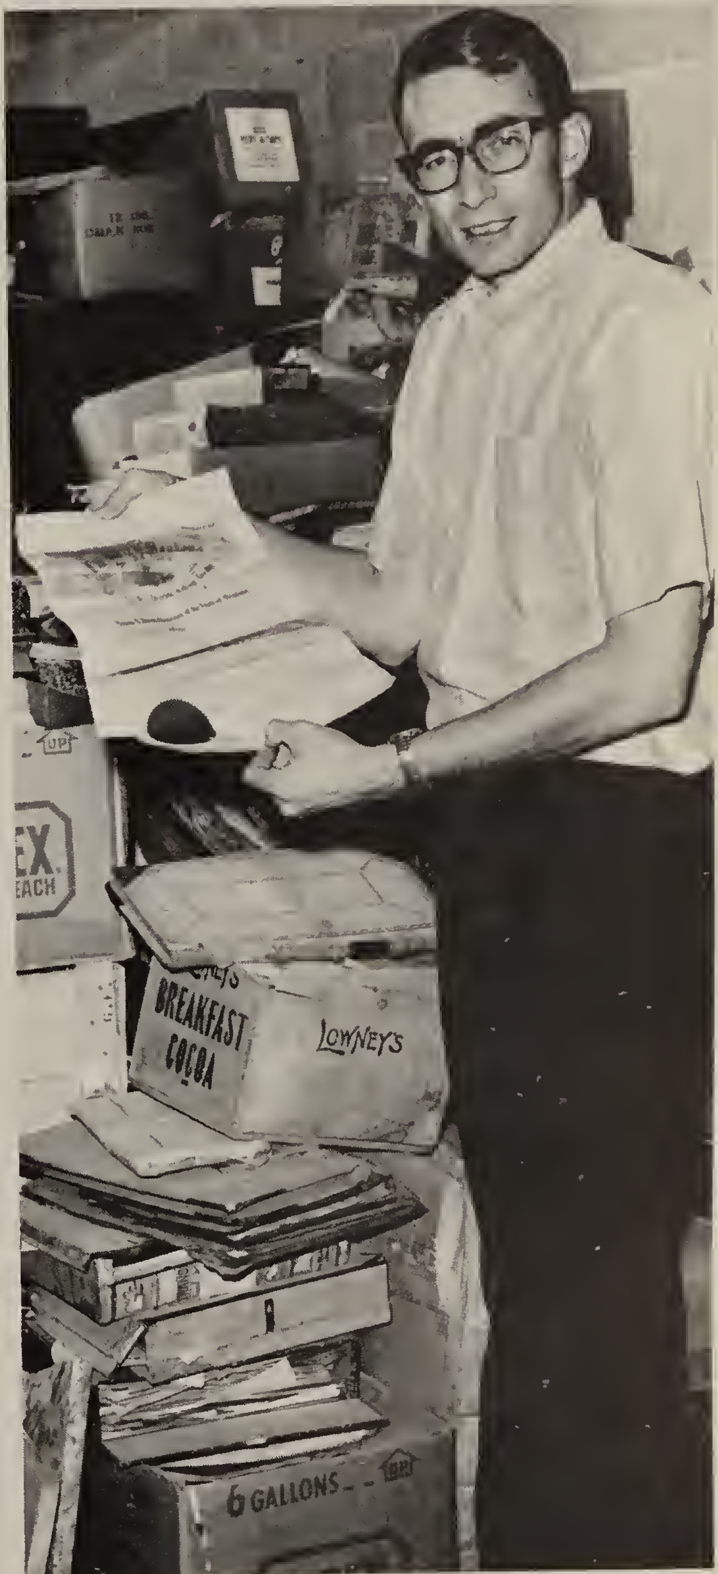
A high degree of selectivity is still practiced in acquiring material; but, urban renewal projects in Montana, increased awareness of the value of historic manuscript material on the part of many Montanans, and the desire of the various state agencies to better utilize expensive office space now committed to storage of non-current records, all have combined to cause a flood of material that must be dealt with now or possibly be lost forever.

The philosophy behind the emphasis on gathering material now and processing it later stems primarily from the fact that we will never again be this close, in time, to Montana's early days. People are continually cleaning attics and basements and throwing out things that appear to be junk. A letter, diary, ledger or photograph created in the 1860's is a unique thing and once destroyed can never be replaced. Thus, active collecting now and processing later is part of the archival policy being followed in an attempt to gather more documentation before it is all gone.

Cataloging and use of collections at the Society have not been neglected, however. A listing of 474 manuscript collections amounting to nearly 3,000 linear feet of material and unmeasured microfilm footage reached completion in August. This guide names and describes a large portion of the Society's holdings and appears in a volume prepared by the University of Montana Library, September, 1970, Manuscript Collections in Montana Depositories. The huge T. C. Power Collection has received a preliminary sorting and inventory, and small collections that arrive from donors are regularly being inventoried and recorded. It is a monumental task, one whose total impact in years to come can hardly be overdrawn.

An immediate impact of the collections, however, will be seen in the Winter, 1971, issue of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, published in January. Dr. John Hakola of the University of Maine, who made a preliminary evaluation of the Power papers this summer, alerted Editor Vivian Paladin to the great number of letters relating to the famous Hard Winter of 1886-87. In intimate and often frightening language, they delineated the disaster to the range cattle industry. Subsequently, Archivist Coleman ran across similar material in other collections.

Editorial Assistant Barbara Rackley was assigned the task of researching the material, relying heavily on this previously unpublished material to illuminate the well known aspects of this most violent and fateful winter which many historians credit with sounding the death knell of the open range cattle era.



Archivist John Coleman stands in front of the business records of the Largey Lumber Company, recently given to the Society by Bourke MacDonald, a member of the Largey family. When catalogued, this collection will document development of the lumbering and mining industries throughout Montana and Idaho from the 1870's. The photo illustrates the deterioration and bulk which must be overcome before researchers and writers can utilize material such as this. (Highway Dept. Photo).

THE T. C. POWER AND J. HUGO ARONSON COLLECTIONS

Behind a photograph of Senator Thomas C. Power (above) is only a small portion of the extensive T. C. Power Collection, a gift to The Society from Mr. and Mrs. Thomas D. Tobin of Helena. Destined to be one of the most historically important manuscript collections in the Northwest, it traces the beginning of Montana's economy from the Indian trade to modern merchandising, steamboat and stagecoach transportation to oil and automobiles.

Below is a portion of the J. Hugo Aronson Collection, containing all the papers and memorabilia of Aronson's career from his boyhood in Sweden to the governorship of Montana, 1952-1960. Scrapbooks, photographs and hundreds of artifacts are backed by business records and political papers, including movies, tape recordings and texts of speeches. Gov. Aronson, whose autobiography has recently been published, has made this massive collection a "gift to future generations of Montanans." (Mont. Highway Dept. Photos).

MUSEUMS GROUP HEARS VARIED PROGRAM AT MEET

The Museums Association of Montana held its annual meeting in Bozeman during the first three days of October this year, hearing a variety of outside speakers as well as reports from the museums represented in the Association.

Elected to the Board of Directors were Historical Society Director Sam Gilluly; Robert Zion of the Teton Trail Museum, Choteau; and Joe Dent of Miles City, to complete the term of resigning Dr. William Jellison, Ricketts Memorial Museum, Hamilton.

Reports from local museums showed that they receive a great amount of support, through donations of money, work, and professional services. Still, the various groups showed that increases in all of these can be well-used.

The Association listened to speakers both from within and outside the field of history. Miss Josephine Brooker, of the Advertising Department, Montana Highway Commission, described that agency's publicity of the state's museums. Del Siewert, who is executive vice president of the Montana Chamber of Commerce, announced that the coming year would see the seven cars of the Centennial Train placed at strategic entrances to the state. Information will be distributed to tourists through this new facility.

The use of limited range radios, transmitting with a small radius, for publicity of historic sites and museums, was outlined by Donald L. Brelsford, representative of a Bozeman firm which has supplied the radios to Yellowstone Park.

Dr. H. D. Hampton of the University of Montana told the Association members that museum displays must not promulgate one or another point of view. He further stressed the necessity of extensive record-keeping and selective acceptance of donations.

Montana State University's Dr. Jesse Lair reminded the group that the cost of artifacts continues to rise and time should not be wasted in preserving the past.

A field man for the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Robert Ross, narrated his slide talk with versified commentary, to the delight of Association members.

Lone Wolf Returns to the Soil of His Indian Forebears

The Blackfoot Indian Reservation this summer claimed the ashes of Lone Wolf, bronc-buster, story-teller and artist, as his widow, Naomi, and adopted son, Paul Dyck, carried out his last wish: that he be returned to the country of his Indian ancestors.

Lone Wolf, son of writer James Willard Schultz and his Blackfoot wife, Nataki (Fine Shield Woman), died at his home near Tucson, Arizona in February, his 88 years weighing heavily on him.

Hart Merriam Schultz (he always preferred his Indian name, Lone Wolf) was born on Birch Creek, close to the Joseph Kipp Trading Post at Robare, on February 18, 1882. He sold his first paintings — water colors — at the age of 12, to a clerk in the Kipp store. His artistic talent seems to have come from his mother, one of the few survivors of the Baker Massacre of 1870 where, while escaping the soldiers as a child of eight, she was shot in the hand and crippled for life. Despite her handicap, she was known for the beauty of her porcupine quillwork and fine beadwork. Lone Wolf's early artistic tutelage had been under his step grandfather, Yellow Wolf, as he drew in ochre and charcoal on buffalo shoulder blade bones.

Along the way there were other tutors: Charles Schreyvogel who gave him his first oil colors; Thomas Moran, during his 1909 stay at Grand Canyon, advised him. His art was known by Owen Wister, George Bird Grinnell, Theodore Roosevelt, Frederic Remington and Charles Russell. By the time of World War I, Lone Wolf was widely acclaimed across the country; his works are well represented in both public and private collections. He was also noted for his story-telling skills and for the fact that he could ride "anything with four legs and then make a picture of it."

The ceremony at the little cemetery on the old Champine place near Blackfoot on June 19 was simple and taken from Lone Wolf's Indian heritage, as he had wished. Four willow wands, each topped by an eagle feather, marked the corners of the grave of Last Rider (Louis Champine), an uncle. Susie Redhorn spoke an Indian prayer as Paul Dyck lowered the engraved copper container and Lone Wolf's widow replaced the first spadefuls of earth. Friends and relatives received the eagle feathers from the widow, tokens of times gone by which all remembered.

Montana's "Galloping Swede" Spins Yarns and Signs His Name

One of the celebrations for the 79th birthday of former Montana Governor J. Hugo Aronson, on September 1, was an autograph party in our lobby, where he signed copies of his newly-published autobiography, "The Galloping Swede." Seated at left is Aronson, with co-author L. O. Brockmann. Watching the signing are Society Director Sam Gilluly, Mrs. David Flaccus of the Mountain Press Publishing Co. of Missoula which brought out the book, and Society business manager Ron Gillie. Visitors during the afternoon were served cookies and coffee as well as a generous helping of Governor Aronson's inimitable stories.

DEATH COMES TO FORMER BUTCHER BOY WHOSE HERO WAS CMR

The Society has learned, with regret, of the passing of a good friend and supporter. Walter V. Lawrence, with whom we carried on a lively and edifying correspondence over the years, died at his home in Oakland, Calif. on July 24, two days before his 80th birthday. He and Mrs. Lawrence are pictured here on the occasion of their golden wedding anniversary in August, 1962.

As a small boy, Mr. Lawrence had lived in Great Falls near the home of Charles Russell. The artist became a hero for the boy, and a lifelong interest in Russell's work developed. Walter was then a butcher shop's delivery boy, and it was the beginning of a long career as a butcher. One of the high points of that career came in 1919 in Wainwright, Canada, when Mr. Lawrence butchered bison for the Duke of Windsor, then Prince of Wales.

Having moved to Alberta, upon his father's death in 1904, Mr. Lawrence remained there for 20 years. In 1912 he married Lizzie Porath and in 1928, the Lawrences moved to Oakland.

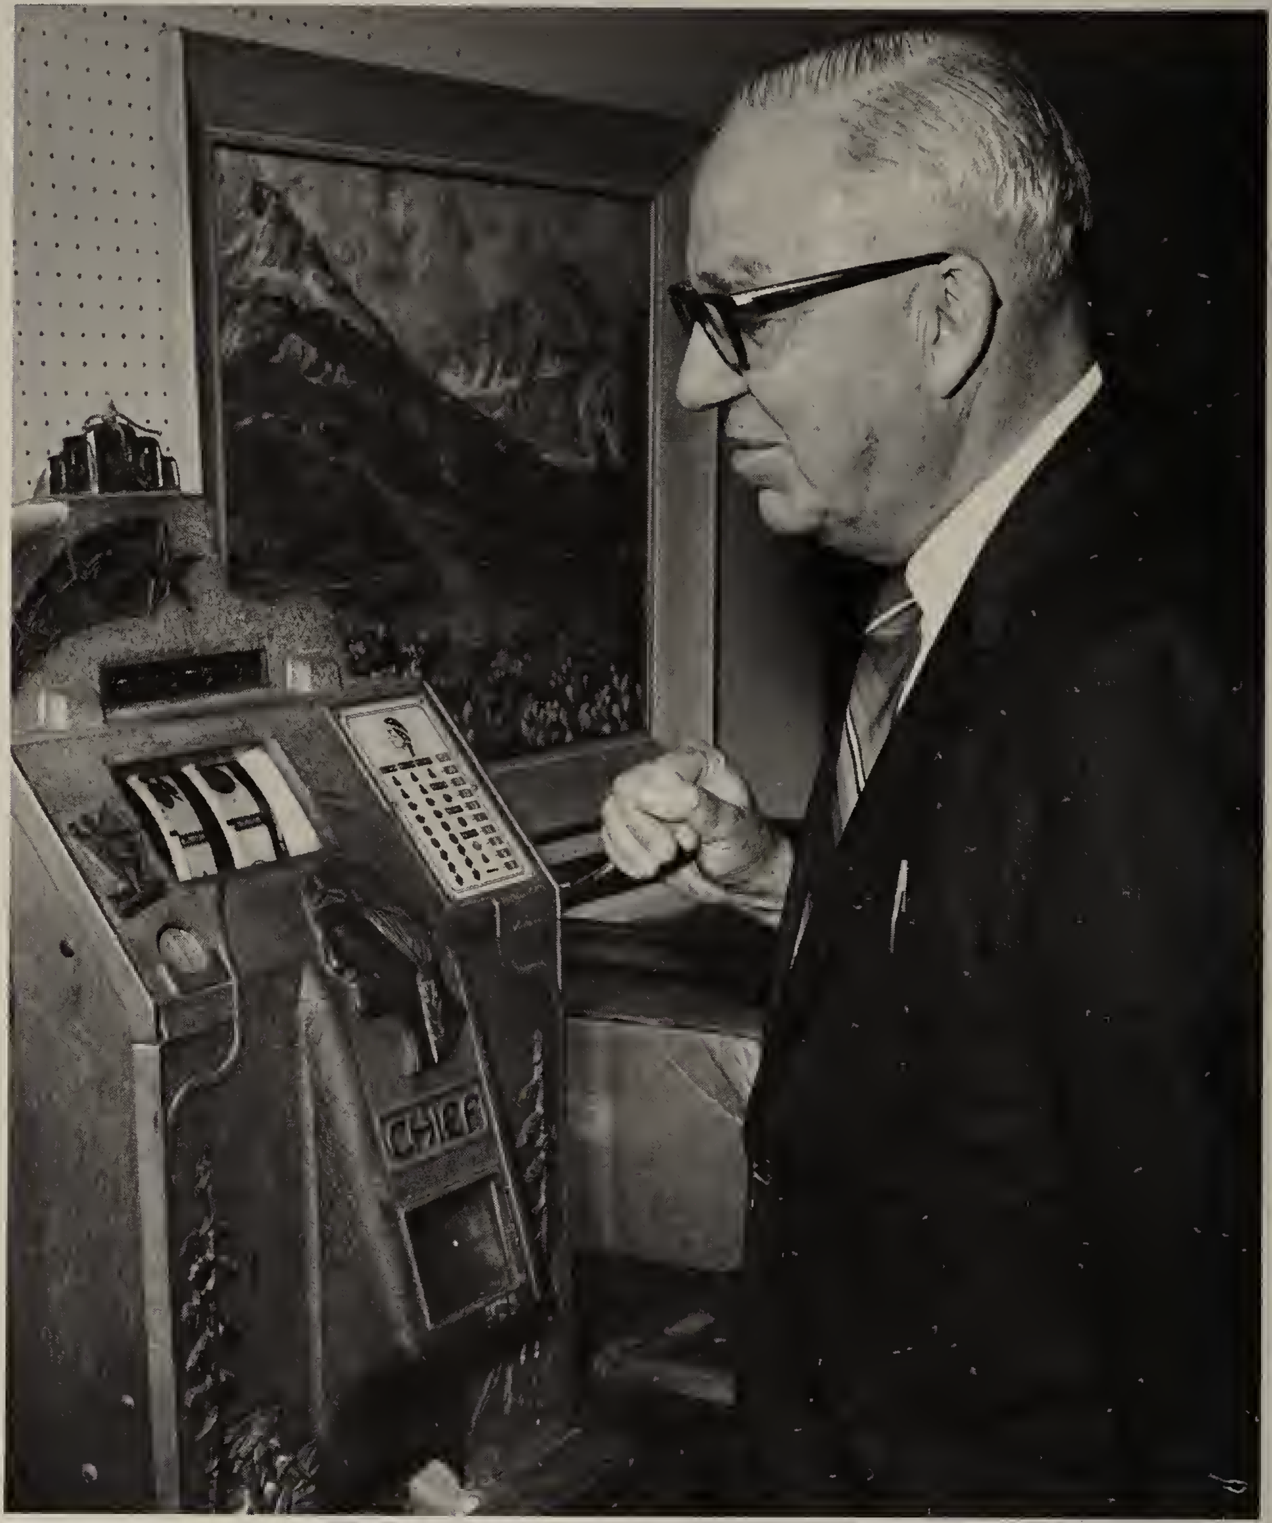
HISTORIC "ONE-ARMED BANDIT" COMES TO TERRITORY JUNCTION



"One-armed bandits," along with all other gambling devices, have been illegal in Montana for over 20 years now. In mid-October, during a burglary investigation, Helena's city police were unexpectedly rewarded with a basement-full of them.

The 38 machines found (including three electronic and three ticket models) the law says, had to be destroyed by the agency which found them. Society Director Sam Gilluly, hearing that one of the machines was an old-timer, asked that we receive it.

Judge Victor H. Fall, of the First Judicial District of Lewis and Clark County, described by Gilluly as "a friend of the Society," provided in his destruction order that one machine of Society choosing come here. Chief of Police Jack Williams offered his cooperation.

The 50-year-old machine seen above was the only historically interesting one of the group; the other 37 were bulldozed into oblivion, before witnesses.

The group of "bandits" had been in the basement "for 20 years or so," according to Chief Williams. The building had been closed for 15 years, and its owner knew nothing of its basement contents. Chief Williams told reporters that as police moved the machines onto the sidewalk, preparatory to trucking them away, a woman passing by managed to deposit several coins before she was stopped.

The newly-acquired nickel machine will be on display in the Territory Junction saloon—inoperable, of course, since that is the law.

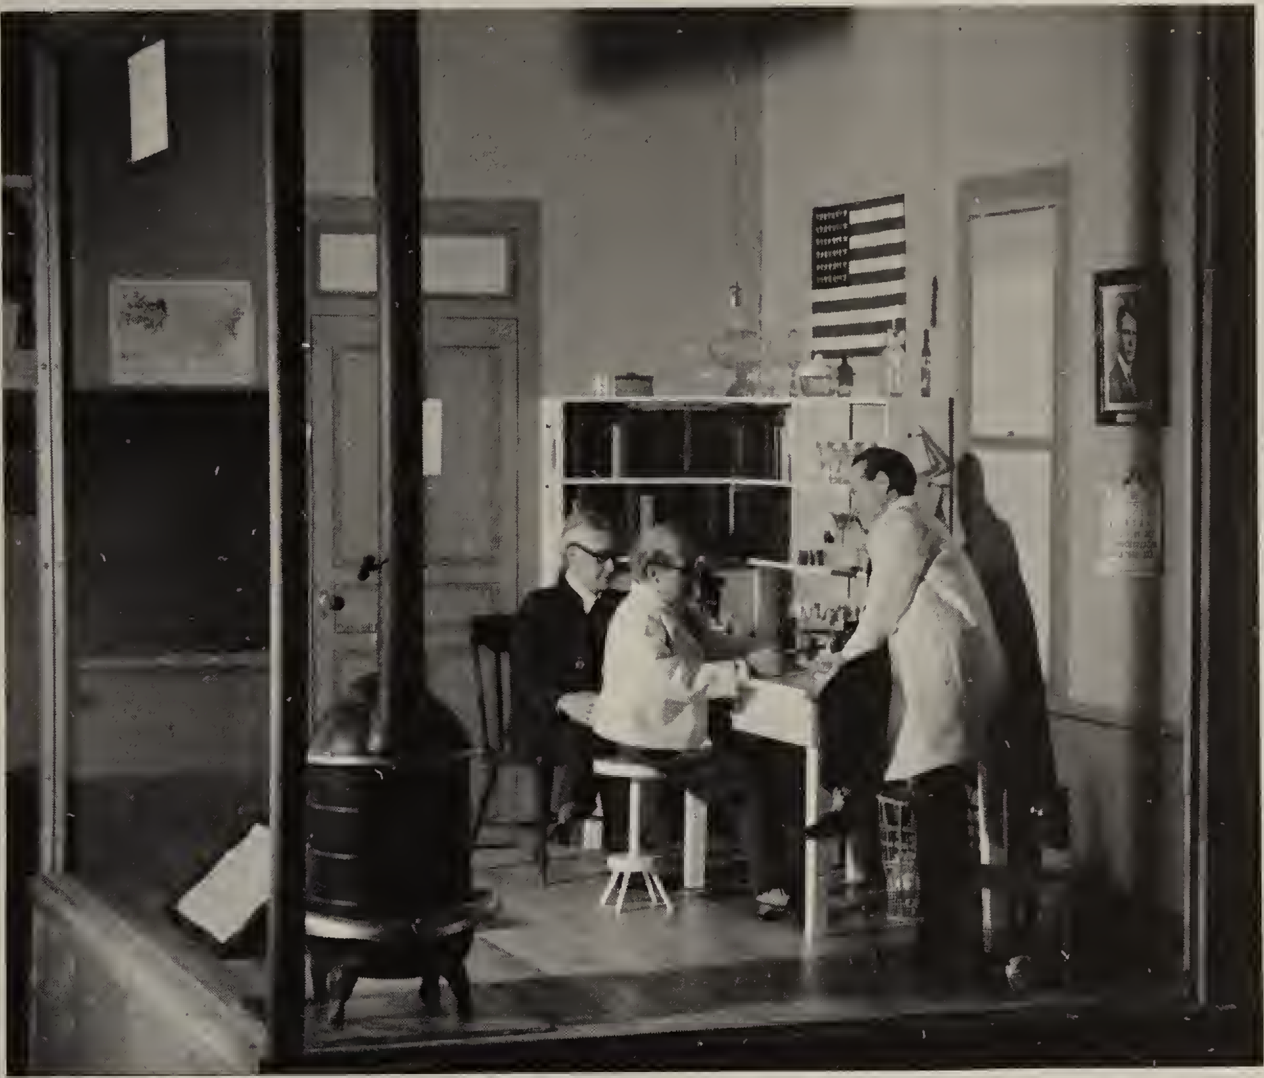
DIORAMA AT RICKETTS MEMORIAL MUSEUM DOES HONOR TO THE CONQUERORS OF SPOTTED FEVER



Working from a photograph and from descriptions by local people, Mrs. Charles (Kay) Brooks produced this diorama for the Ricketts Memorial Museum at Hamilton, Montana. Titled "From These Ticks We Will Make a Vaccine," it represents the 1923 beginning of the successful fight to provide immunization from Rocky Mountain spotted fever. The figures, left to right, are Dr. R. A. Cooley, Dr. R. R. Parker, and Dr. R. R. Spencer. On the wall hangs a portrait of Dr. Howard Taylor Ricketts. The laboratory, where the men are seen inspecting a tick-infested guinea pig, was in a schoolhouse—which became a museum largely through the efforts of Dr. William L. Jellison. A complex of buildings at Hamilton now houses those who carry on the work of Cooley, Parker and Spencer, at the United States Health Laboratory.

Price: $800.00

Charles M. Russell used pigments or wax to tell the story of frontier Montana. Frank Bird Linderman used his pen for the same purpose. It was natural that the men and their families became friends. It was in 1913 that Charlie Russell modeled a bear as a Christmas gift for Miss Verne Linderman. It was in this same period that the Linderman and Russell families spent many summers in the Glacier Park-Flathead Lake area of Montana. There Russell painted many masterpieces and Linderman wrote such books (illustrated by Russell) as "Indian Why Stories" and "Indian Old-Man Stories."

It is from this model that the Montana Historical Society now offers a limited bronze casting. The name is taken from the Blackfeet Indian language—SIK-KO-KIY-O—meaning, simply, Black Bear. The model was not signed but it has been in the possession of Miss Linderman since the day she received it. Its authenticity is unquestioned.

Dialogue with the Director

Judge Lester H. Loble of Helena saw it—the first flight of an airplane across the Continental Divide. Judge Loble, former Trustee of the Montana Historical Society and a great friend of ours, has been writing a series of his recollections. The latest is the story of Cromwell Dixon's aerial journey, 59 years ago, from the state fairgrounds in Helena to the crest of the Rockies.

In the span of a very eventful lifetime, Judge Loble saw that flight and then witnessed the first manned space flight to the moon. It makes one realize how rapid has been the pace of man's mobility in this century.

Cromwell Dixon was 19 when he accomplished his feat in 1911. Judge Loble knew Dixon as an engaging, courageous young man. He recalls his "flying machine" looked more like a box kite, the pilot sitting in front in full view.

"After the takeoff," Judge Loble recalls, "few could believe their eyes and were sure that at any moment the plane would plunge to the ground. He made the flight over the Rocky Mountains; at Blossberg, he landed, after clearing the crest of the Divide at 7,000 feet. He was guided by a smoke signal from a fire built by the co-operative people of Blossberg . . . He presented the dignitaries gathered there with a letter from Governor Edwin L. Norris . . . He then walked to the telegraph office in the depot and sent a telegram to the officials of the Curtiss Exhibition Company in New York, advising them of the accomplishment . . ."

The intrepid "bird man," as fliers were then called, took off, returned to the fairgrounds 20 miles distant, and landed in the midst of a wild and jubilant demonstration.

Judge Loble conveys the excitement of the fair crowd in his narrative and adds, "None of us who watched him head toward those peaks believed he would make it."

Tragically, Cromwell Dixon was killed a few weeks later in an exhibition flight at Spokane, Washington. His feat lives on in a bronze plaque at the Helena airport. Atop the Divide, not far from the scene of his flight, the Forest Service has built Cromwell Dixon Campground.

Jets now leave their contrails far above the site of Cromwell Dixon's landing. Judge Loble adds his salute to this aerial pioneer and many like him to whom we all owe a debt of gratitude.

JOHN JEWELL'S BIG GRID GAME

The big game of the 1907 football season at the State University of Iowa, Iowa City, was with the University of Illinois. When Left Tackle John J. Jewell blocked a kick, recovered the ball and ran 75 yards for a touchdown, he put the game "on ice" and led the way to the 26-12 victory for Iowa.

Jewell, a retired Montana lawyer and legislator, is now associated with the Society as a part-time guide and lecturer. The picture seen here is from the program of that Iowa-Illinois game, in which the only touchdown of John's football career was a vital one for his alma mater's victory. He points out, incidentally, that the uniform is from the previous season, since in 1907 no uniform was ordered small enough for his 158-pound frame.

Raised in Decorah, Iowa, John Jewell played left tackle for his four high school years. Taking advanced placement tests, he entered the university at junior level and completed the bachelor of laws requirements in two years.

Some of his team members there nicknamed him "Punkins" after the Decorah newspaper had reported him "some punkins" as a State University football player.

Following graduation in 1908, Jewell came to Montana and opened a law practice, refereeing high school football during leisure hours. Within a couple of years, the need for standards among referees led him to join the group that founded the Montana Officials Association. That organization, in which Jewell holds life membership registration No. 5, includes judges for all interscholastic high school contests.

He continued to referee until he was 70, Jewell says, and then the field "got too long for me to run."

Of the 1907 Iowa football team, Jewell knows of but two other members living, Walter Stewart, a Des Moines lawyer, and Bill Carbarry, a retired football coach in Sioux Falls, South Dakota.

MacGILVRA VICE PRESIDENT OF LEWIS & CLARK FOUNDATION

At its recent two-day meeting in Bismarck, the Lewis and Clark Trail Heritage Foundation named E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte as vice president. Dr. E. G. Chuinard of Portland, Ore. will serve as president. Other officers include John Greenslit, Bismarck, secretary, and Joseph Jaeger, Jr., Jefferson City, Mo., treasurer. Josephine Brooker, assistant state advertising director for Montana, attended the Bismarck meeting, which chose Sioux City, Iowa as site for its next meeting, January 15-16, 1971.

DEDICATION DAY AT THE SOCIETY

On the last day of July and under a big blue Montana sky, more than 2,500 friends and patrons of the Montana Historical Society gathered to see the results of efforts to enlarge the facilities where Montana's past lives on. The brevity of the dedication program, held on our front lawn, was in keeping with the general excitement of seeing the three new major galleries, housing the C. M. Russell collection, the Poindexter Collection of Modern Art, and the Towe Antique Ford Collection.

Director Sam Gilluly acted as the master of ceremonies for the program at, in his words, "what we believe is one of the finest museums in the American West." Introducing current and past Board of Trustees members was the Board's President, Mrs. Charles Bovey.

An honored guest speaker was Mrs. Malcolm Mackay, whose husband collected the major portion of the works of Charles M. Russell on display in our museum. She expressed a "deep satisfaction that the Malcolm S. Mackay Collection has found a very alive and substantial home for the future generations of Americans to have a glimpse of what our early west was like."

The day brought for Mrs. Mackay "a flood of happy memories" of her and her husband's friendship with Charles and Nancy Russell. She described it this way: "Charley's charming personality, his innate kindness, his fund of stories, his ever-ready human contact with people in whom he felt sincerity and response—are memories one cherishes."

Governor Forrest H. Anderson, in making the dedicatory address, spoke of the many aspects of Montana's history, "the machines and school teachers and preachers," as well as the outstanding men and the fabled places. He described the new wing as enabling the Society better to tell the story of Montana—"the story of a vast wilderness that became a great state."

He spoke of Charles Russell as "a man lost in time," whose lifetime saw the end of the wilderness under the advent of the "emissaries of civilization." Gov. Anderson also detailed the museum's depiction of how that civilization has changed, pointing out the modern aspects of the oil and communications displays, and the gallery of modern art.

He formally dedicated the new wing "to all Montanans—yesterday, today and tomorrow."

As the visitors went inside to see the results of their work, a memory of earlier days cropped grass on the lawn, a Brahma bull brought there by Helena's Last Chance Stampede committee. It was a startling but appropriate touch for a museum dedicated to making the past come alive.

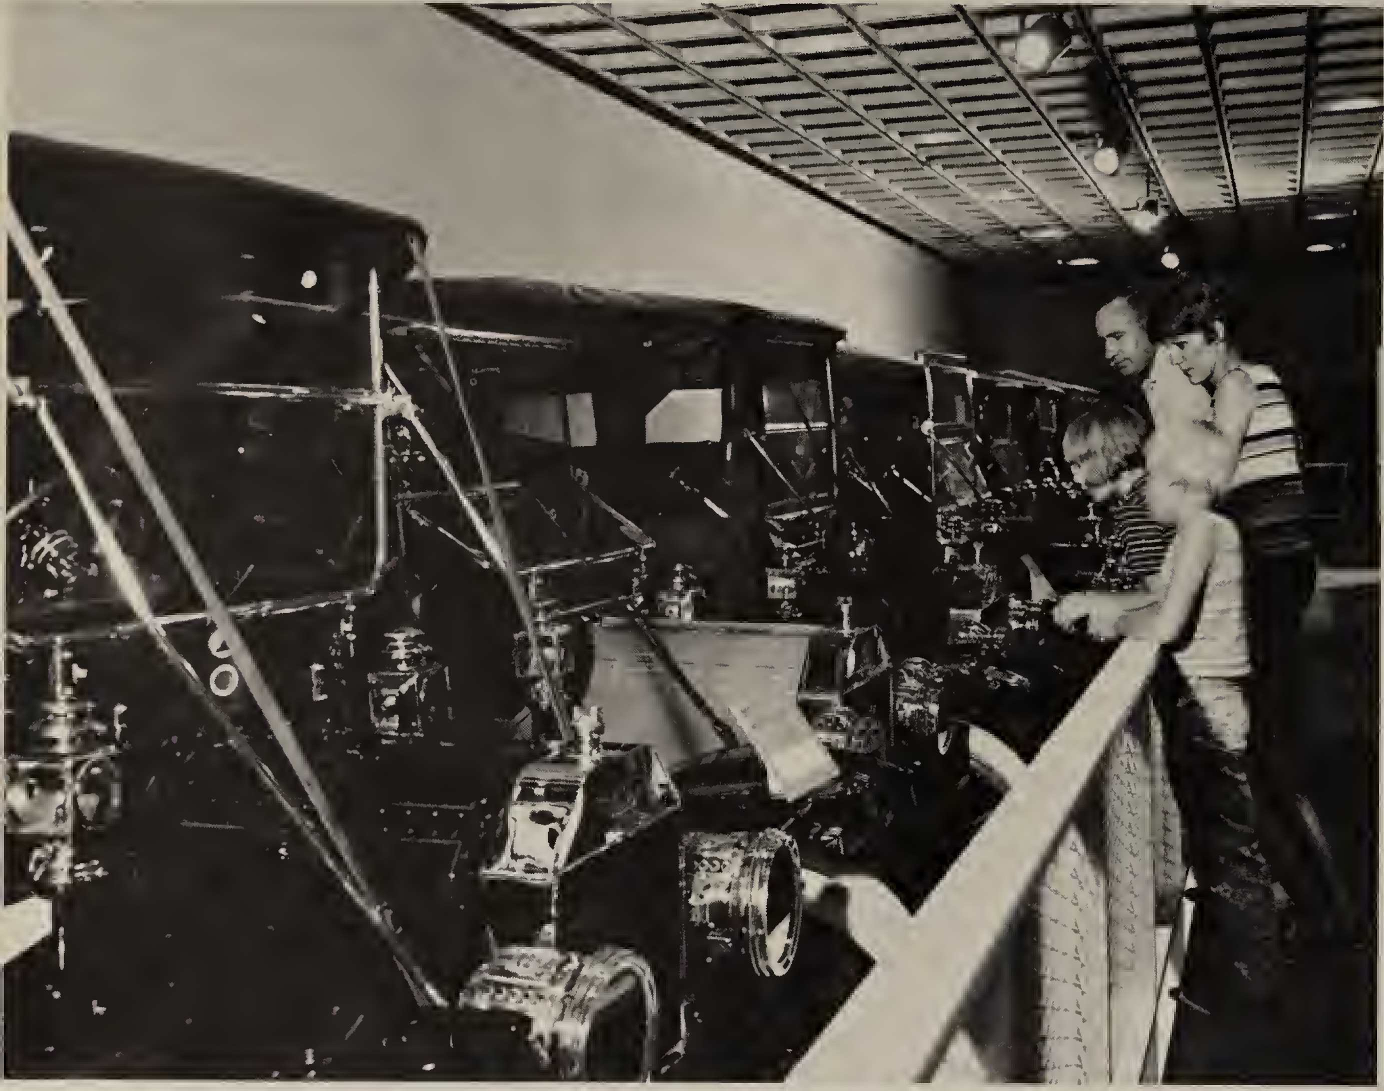
VISITORS STREAM IN TO SEE NEW GALLERIES AS S



Visitors entering the new Charles M. Russell gallery are greeted by a contrast of colors and textures which makes an exciting setting for the art displayed there. The soft carpet is marine green, the walls are covered with nubby beige cloth. Pedestals for the bronzes are of cast concrete with wood-textured surfaces. The grid ceiling conceals special lighting. Floor-to-ceiling beams support a floating panel portrait of the artist facing the entranceway; on the interior side is a portrait of Nancy Russell. Both were gifts to the couple by Canadian portraitist, William C. Kreighoff.

Free-standing cloth-covered panels have been used to produce a "room-within-a-room," a closed-off area where cases display small works of the artist: illustrated letters, sculptured models and other works, including the famed "Waiting for a Chinook" or "Last of 5,000."

Major Russell paintings hang at eye-level around the room. During this summer of dedication, special loans have been made to augment the Society's permanent holdings, from the collections of Richard Flood, Jackson, Wyoming; Frederic Renner, Washington, D.C.; and Robert Rockwell, Corning, New York, all of whom were able to attend the inauguration of the new area.

The versatility of the new gallery space is multiplied by use of movable walls separating the Russell and Poindexter galleries. These segmented walls can be completely or partially moved for a different arrangement of the collections.

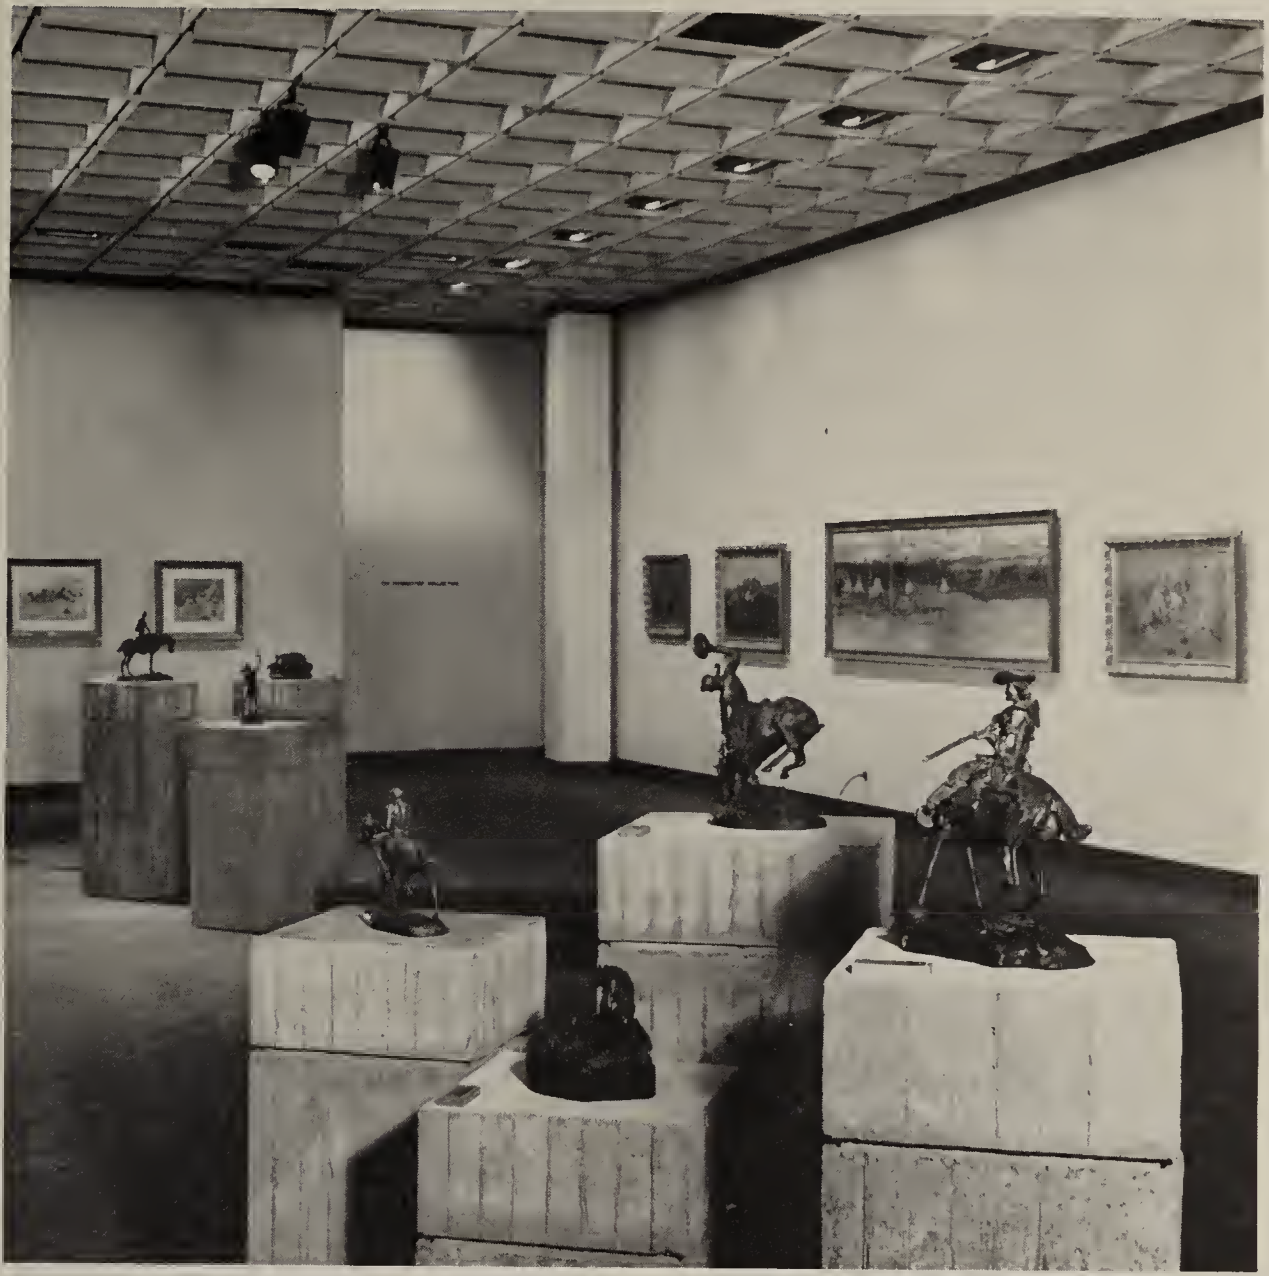
CIETY OPENS SPACIOUS WORKING, EXHIBIT AREAS



C. M. Russell bronzes fill the foreground in this view of the new Russell gallery. From left to right are seen an unnamed Indian warrior work, "The Weaver," "An Enemy That Warns," and "Jim Bridger." Major Russell oils hang in the background, including the large-sized Kootenai camp scene unfinished at the time of the artist's death in 1926. The grid ceiling and directional lighting can be seen, as well as the entrance (center, back) to the Poindexter Collection of Modern Art.

The visitor moves from the Russell room into the Poindexter Collection of Modern Art. With the same textures in the carpeting, ceiling and wall covering, a different feeling has been created by use of the "portable walls" to create a maze effect. Few paintings are visible from one vantage point, and the feeling of intimacy in the small areas emphasizes the energy and spontaneity of the works.

On display are selections from the "New York School" and artists influenced by it. Everton G. Poindexter of New York City collected the majority of the group during the 1950's, and has given them to the people of Montana "in the hope that the pleasure they have given me will be shared by the people of my native state." We were pleased that Mr. Poindexter could be with us as we opened this new area.

Among the artists represented in the nearly 100 paintings are Willem DeKooning, Earl Kerkam, Franz Kline, Jackson Pollock, Robert De Niro, and Robert Goodnough. Mr. Poindexter continues to add to the collection.

Opening from the main hallway is the Towe Antique Ford Collection gallery, where walkways take the visitor around the group of 40 automobiles in chronological sequence. Nearest the door is a 1903 Runabout; walking on, the visitor sees the development of Fords up to 1937, including early trucks and wagons.

Adding to the significance of the collection is a model homesteaders' shack, since Montana's homesteading frontier extended from the days of literal horsepower well into those of the internal combustion engine. Life-sized mannequins of a man and woman homesteader stand outside and in the cutaway shack. Curator Bob Morgan has displayed artifacts from the period in the realistic manner of our Territory Junction street, from the washtub hanging outside to authentic newspapers used as wallpaper.

Ed Towe of Circle, Montana, was present as the first visitors toured this area. Mr. and Mrs. Towe's Ford collection is on long-term loan to the Society.

Parts of the new wing were not filled with guests on that Friday of grand opening—those behind-the-scenes areas so useful in our fields of endeavor besides museum display. In the basement below the new exhibition areas are several improvements made available by the additional space.

The Circulation Department for MONTANA magazine, headed by Mrs. Eleanor Dickey, has been moved to that area, where the heavy floor allows additional equipment for processing subscriptions and addressing.

Archivist John Coleman now has a real office and has been able to move out of his previous cubbyhole amid the stacks of the library.

The mailing room in the building addition is now large enough to contain all the prints, books, and back issues of MONTANA magazine, which were previously divided into two very small rooms. Mel Hallauer and his helpers also have more space in which to package the quantity of these items sent out daily.

Increased storage area, a permanent boon, has been especially helpful this summer to Dr. John Hakola, a former Montanan now teaching at the University of Maine. He has been doing valuable preliminary study of the T. C. Power papers, filling a corner of the large new storage room with stacks as he separates the Power family's varied business and personal correspondence.

At the main floor entranceway, an enlarged sales area is in use, designed to display merchandise to better advantage for both visitors and sales personnel.

LOOK-ALIKE GREAT GRANDSON OF STATE PIONEER WILBUR FISK SANDERS VISITS

A London-based United Nations attorney was visiting relatives in Big Timber, Montana when he heard of the opening of new facilities at The Montana Historical Society. So Thomas Sanders Busha attended the dedication, seeing the latest developments at the institution with which his family had been so closely connected. He took time out to pose for Photographer Gary Wunderwald for this picture beside the statue of his great grandfather, Wilbur Fisk Sanders, in the capitol rotunda. The family resemblance is obvious.

Mr. Busha's grandfather was James U. Sanders, eldest son of Wilbur Fisk. The elder Sanders, incidentally, was the famed prosecutor for the Vigilantes, a founder and first secretary of the Society, and one of Montana's most famous pioneers. James U. Sanders, until his death in 1923, was Society Librarian and secretary of the Society of Montana Pioneers. He was four years old when his father moved his family to Bannack in 1863.

Mr. Busha's mother, Mrs. C. T. Busha, is one of six daughters born to James U. Sanders, and now makes her home in California. Thomas Sanders Busha, born in Helena and raised in Great Falls, makes a trip to this country each year, visiting his mother and aunts in California and friends and relatives in Montana.

CATTLEMAN WILLIS M. SPEAR HONORED BY NATIONAL COWBOY HALL OF FAME

Willis M. Spear, pioneer Montana and Wyoming cattleman, was elected to the National Cowboy Hall of Fame and Western Heritage Center in Oklahoma City recently. It was a move that can only be applauded by all Montanans and the Historical Society. Mr. Spear's son, W. B. (Junior) Spear, of Kirby, who has carried on the family's ranching tradition, was long a member of our Board of Trustees.

The new Hall of Fame honoree organized the Spear Bros. Cattle Company in 1896, in partnership with his brother, "Doc." Buying cattle in Texas and Mexico, the brothers eventually built their holdings to well over a million acres of owned and leased land in the Powder River country of Southern Montana, running 32,000 head of their own cattle and more than 25,000 head owned by others.

Mr. Spear served as a Wyoming state senator, and again carrying on a tradition, his son, W. B., has served in the same capacity for the State of Montana.

Harriet C. Meloy Appointed Librarian

Mrs. Harriet C. Meloy has been named by the Board of Trustees to the post of Librarian, after having served as Acting Librarian since the retirement of Miss Mary Dempsey a year ago. She has been a Library staff member for 13 years. Mrs. Meloy has maintained her career in addition to an active home life centered about her four sons and one daughter, and husband Peter Meloy, an attorney. Her civic interests include a current term on the Montana Board of Education, as well as membership in the League of Women Voters and the American Association of University Women.

NEW FACES AT THE SOCIETY

Governor Forrest H. Anderson announced appointment of three new members of the Society's Board of Trustees, and all were able to be with us on the day of dedication of the building addition. They are: Mrs. Louis W. (Toni) Hagener of Havre, Henry S. Ruegamer of Hardin, and James H. Vanderbeck of Virginia City. All have deep roots in Montana and have, in their personal and professional lives, shown unusual interest in preserving the record of our past. The new members fill the expired terms of Ben Harwood of Billings, W. B. Spear of Kirby, and Joseph S. Dent of Miles City.

Mrs. Hagener, a graduate of the University of Denver, since 1949 has been a resident of Havre, where her husband is dean of general studies at Northern Montana College. She has taught in both Colorado and Montana public schools, and has been Havre director of the Montana Institute of the Arts history group for nine years. In 1963, as a result of that leadership, she took an active part in establishing the H. Earl Clack Museum and has since served as its curator. A member of the Montana Museums Association since its inception, she is presently serving as vice president.

Ruegamer, a native of Whitehall, Mont., grew up on his grandfather's ranch at Sappington (named for his grandfather), graduated from high school at Manhattan, Mont., and went on to Moorhead State College in Minnesota for a degree in history and political science. After some years with the Minnesota State Highway Department, Ruegamer began an association with the Ford Motor Company leading to a dealership in Hardin, which he still operates. He says his interest in Montana history probably goes back to his Grandfather, Henry Sappington, pioneer cattle ranch and territorial legislator.

James H. Vanderbeck, as a native of Virginia City, Mont., comes from the cradle of Montana's past. He has, he says, "spent 42 years on Main Street, first in a general store, then the drug store, and lastly the post office." Although he retired from active business in 1969, he and his wife own Rank's Drug Store Museum, operating it since 1940 as the first private enterprise of its kind in that historic city. Their home is also historical, having been built in 1866 and once the home of Wilbur Fisk Sanders and his family. Vanderbeck was a member of Montana's House of Representatives in 1939 and served from 1942 to 1945 in the U. S. Navy. His ship was sunk by the Japanese on May 4, 1945 at Okinawa, for which he received a Presidential citation and the Purple Heart.

Bodmer Prints Come To Society Library

An exciting acquisition this month at the Society is a collection of 75 Karl Bodmer prints, many of them of early and rare issue. Librarian Harriett Meloy, who negotiated for the purchase with an Evanston, Illinois, collector, said there are 43 large black and white engravings and 32 vignette or smaller subjects, designed by Bodmer as chapter headings for Prince Maximilian's monumental "Travels in North America" published in Europe shortly after the nobleman and his artist returned from their 1832 explorations of the Upper Missouri.

Coincidentally, the Society Library recently received for display a rare London edition of the Bodmer-Maximilian volume containing many woodcuts and some eighty-one aquatints, all of them colored by hand. This imposing book is displayed through the courtesy of Thomas P. Koch, a Hamilton, Mont., attorney, whose grandfather, Peter Koch, was a pioneer Montana merchant and banker.

Even more coincidentally, both the prints and the volume of aquatints came just as the Society had published a special three-part feature on the explorations of the Maximilian party in the Summer issue of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY and produced a special monograph on the work of this nobleman-scientist and his superb artist, Karl Bodmer.

MacGILVRA MEMBER OF LEWIS & CLARK GROUP

E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, a member of our Board of Trustees, represented Montana at a meeting in St. Louis in June launching the Lewis and Clark Trail Heritage Foundation, designed to carry on the work of marking the trail of the explorers and setting up recreation areas along the route. The work was begun by the Lewis and Clark Trail Commission, established in 1964 by act of Congress, and now expired.

RHYMES OF A COWBOY

by J. K. RALSTON

For years, the hundreds of friends and admirers of Ken Ralston have urged him to set down in book form his memories, his verse, and his art. For he is Montana's most honored living artist, historian and raconteur. Now it has happened. In a large format (8½x11) hard-cover volume, Ken Ralston's verse illuminates his drawings of the cowboy life, the adventures of the trapper, the men of Custer's command and many other facets of life in the West as it was really lived. There are sections devoted to the artist's own memories, in prose, and some of his great oil paintings reproduced in full color. The introduction by Stan Lynde, creator of the comic strip, Rick O'Shay, says what anyone will say when he reads and enjoys this book: if Ken Ralston hasn't been my friend up to now, he is now.

Dialogue with the Director

A homely but lively reflection of life in a small Western town is delineated in a newly-made loan to the Montana Historical Society. It is an 1897 sketch by Charles Marion Russell. The title is "A Quiet Day in Cascade," but the scene is far from quiet.

Russell, who made his home in Cascade, on the banks of the Missouri between Great Falls and Helena (and was married there), crammed into the sketch many events over a period of years. Then he whimsically sketched himself into the scene.

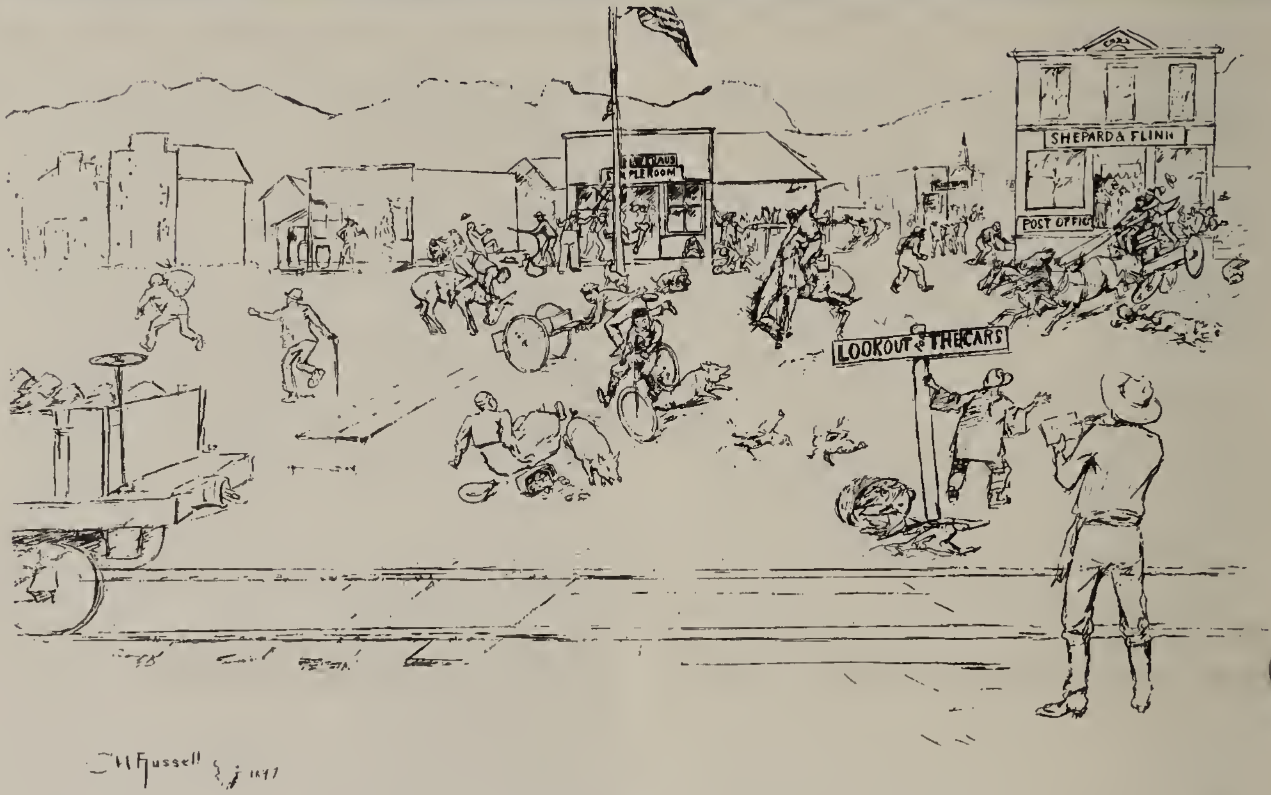
The piece passed through several hands, then was willed to the town of Cascade by the late Mrs. E. L. Dana. Few outside Cascade knew about the work of art, but one of them was Branson G. Stevenson, Great Falls artist and member of our Board of Trustees. Mr. Stevenson approached the city officials, the Cascade Courier polled town sentiment on its front page, and the upshot was that the town has made the loan to the Society. Both are gainers from it. The Society also has made a print of the sketch.

George W. Tintinger, now of Great Falls, and one-time owner of the sketch, supplied Trustee Stevenson with the background of some of the incidents depicted by CMR.

One shows Mary Fields (Nigger Mary) as she is upset by a hog and spills her groceries. One little chick is running from a broken egg. Mary, Mr. Tintinger recalls, always said that was "a damned lie, I don't serve that kind of eggs in my restaurant."

Another early traffic accident shows Gorham Roberts on a bicycle upset by another hog. In fact, the sketch is replete with livestock. A runaway team pulling a spring wagon represents the stage to St. Peter's Mission, not far from Cascade. Two friends are supporting a third, who evidently spent too long a time in Ed Krause's Sample Room saloon.

It is interesting to note that in the planning stage now is a film based on the life of Mary Fields, tentatively called "Stagecoach Mary." And it will be done in Montana.



Back to the sketch: Whatever Russell did — cowboys, Indians, or just small-town life in Montana — he managed to convey something of the old West. Readers who are interested will find "A Quiet Day in Cascade" now displayed in our new Russell room. —SAM GILLULY

RONALD GILLIE NEW BUSINESS MANAGER

Ronald H. Gillie became Business Manager of the Society, effective July 1, replacing Richard B. Duffy, a member of the staff since 1952, who announced his resignation earlier this summer.

A native of Chicago, Gillie has spent most of his life in Washington and Montana. A graduate of the Blaine, Wash., high school, he attended Western Washington State College in Bellingham, later taking extension courses at Montana State University in Bozeman, where he was employed for five years as an accountant in the business office.

Married to the former Jeanne Lee of Helena, he is also a graduate of the Ford Marketing Institute and served for a time as business manager for a Montana Ford agency. The Gillies, who enjoy skiing and mountain hiking, have four children.

Another Kudo for MONTANA

For the sixth consecutive year, MONTANA, the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, has won an award of merit from the National Association of Press Women, according to an announcement from the group's national conclave in New Orleans, La. Mrs. Vivian Paladin, who has edited the quarterly journal since May, 1966, began winning first place national citations in 1964, when she was Associate Editor.

The magazine, entered in the publications regularly edited by a woman category, has won first place state awards, sponsored by the Montana Press Women, since 1964, and has subsequently been entered in the national competitions. With a circulation of almost 15,000, it is the most widely read journal of history published by a state historical group.

TOM CLINCH AUTHORS IN-DEPTH STUDY OF POPULIST MOVEMENT

"Urban Populism and Free Silver in Montana," a splendid in-depth study by Dr. Thomas A. Clinch of Helena, has recently been published by the University of Montana Press. A native of Butte and now head of the department of history at Helena's Carroll College, Dr. Clinch knows his subject thoroughly, by personal heritage and long study. The Historical Society, which he serves as a member of the editorial board for MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, is pleased to be exclusive distributor of this and three others in the University Press series of historical publications.

The new volume is the first serious study of the Populist party and the fight for free silver in Montana. Among other facets of the total picture, the author shows that the typical Populist in Montana was not a farmer (as in other areas) but an urban trade unionist. Much of the story is centered in Butte, Anaconda, Helena and Great Falls, locales of mining and smelting.

BONNIE JEAN SEARS TAKES OVER SOCIETY ACCOUNTING CHORES

Bonnie Jean Sears of Great Falls became staff accountant at the Society in mid-May, replacing Mrs. Margaret Crutcher of Helena, who had held the post the past four years. A graduate of Great Falls High School in 1964, Bonnie Jean received her B.S. degree in accounting from the University of Montana in 1968. Since graduation, and until joining our staff, she had been employed by Junkermier and Campanella, Great Falls accountants.

Mike Sullivan of Helena, who graduated with a B.A. in history from Helena's Carroll College this month, will assist in the Library archives for the next several months. He plans to teach this fall at Turner, Oregon on the junior high school level.

Montana's Colorful "Galloping Swede" Tells His Story

J. Hugo Aronson, the Swedish tenant farm boy who rose to business and political eminence in Montana, tells his own story in a forthcoming hardcover book, published by Mountain Press Publishing Co., Missoula. It will be available about July 1 through the Historical Society.

Known as "The Galloping Swede" because of his penchant for running as he toiled in Montana's oilfields as a mover of heavy equipment, Aronson dictated his memories to L. O. Brockmann, former president of Northern Montana College, Havre. Together with more than 50 superb photographs, the text delineates a remarkable career.

Aronson was born in 1891 on a tenant farm in Gallstad County, Sweden, and began saving his money at the age of 14 to pay his way to the United States. With the help of an older sister, he reached his goal on October 13, 1911. With unabashed fervor and patriotism, Aronson describes his experiences: enrollment in night school in New York, purchase of a $15.00 suit, the many ham and eggs and hamburger meals before he could pronounce anything else, the thrill of citizenship in Duluth, Minn. in 1914, his enlistment in the U. S. Army in 1917 and service with the AEF.

By dint of hard work, for which he is famous, Aronson rose from a day laborer at 25c an hour to head a leading construction and heavy moving firm at Cut Bank, Montana. He served in both houses of the Montana Legislature from Glacier County and in 1953 became Governor, serving two terms and choosing retirement to his home at Bigfork, on Flathead Lake.

"Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might," was the Biblical admonition J. Hugo Aronson remembers from his mother. It would seem to sum up a philosophy energetically put into practice by Montana's "Galloping Swede."

Existing Society Facilities Merge With New Addition

Merging the old with the new is the story these days at The Montana Historical Society as workmen rush our building addition to completion for an opening early in August. Former galleries on the main floor have given way to administrative and editorial office space, a lattice slat ceiling has tied the present lobby to the new sales area once occupied by the formal C. M. Russell Gallery.

Meanwhile, finishing work, including lighting and wall paneling, is completed in the spacious new C. M. Russell Room in the addition. Besides this new space, for which Curator Robert Morgan plans a gallery-within-a-gallery technique, the main floor level will provide space for 40 vintage Ford cars in the collection of Ed Towe, and gallery space for contemporary art.

The addition will contain, in total, almost 24,000 square feet of new space. On the lower or ground floor level, large new stack facilities will be provided for the Historical Library, along with office and working areas for the magazine circulation and merchandising operations and storage facilities.

It has been a time of dislocation for The Society, and one of some disappointment for visitors, many of them students on spring break, for the entire Russell collection has been in vault storage, and there have been no showings of contemporary or other art in the main floor galleries. Territory Junction, the street museum of the 1880's on the ground floor level, along with the Formal Museum with newly designed entrance features, continue to absorb those who have come to see us during the construction period.

IN PORT TOWNSEND, WASH. LIBRARY:

JEFFERSON'S LETTER OF CREDIT TO HIS CAPTAIN

. . . and to give more entire satisfaction & confidence to those who may be disposed to aid you, I, Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America, have written this letter of general credit for you with my own hand, and signed it with my name.

With these words, the visionary third American President ended a general letter of credit to his former private secretary, Meriwether Lewis, who had accepted an epic assignment: exploring the vast Louisiana Territory and following the water courses to the Pacific.

This unique document, dated July 4, 1803, has been reproduced a number of times, including the 1904 edition of Olin D. Wheeler's Trail of Lewis and Clark, published by G. P. Putnam's Sons. The Library of Congress has the "press" copy, retained by President Jefferson. But what could be the actual letter he gave to Lewis, or at least another "press" copy, is in the Public Library of Port Townsend, seat of Jefferson County, Washington.

It was brought to our attention recently by V. J. Gregory of Port Townsend, a reader of our magazine and the author and editor of a number of historical works, including the recent With Pride in Heritage, a history of his county.

Dear Sir

Washington. U.S. of America. July 4. 1803.

In the journey which you are about to undertake for the discovery of the course and source of the Mississipi, and of the most convenient water communication from thence to the Pacific ocean, your party being small, it is to be expected that you will encounter considerable dangers from the Indian inhabitants. should you escape those dangers and reach the Pacific ocean, you may find it imprudent to hazard a return the same way, and be forced to seek a paſsage round by sea in such veſsels as you may find on the Western coast. but you will be without money, without clothes & other neceſsaries; as a sufficient supply cannot be carried with you from hence. your resource in that case can only be in the credit of the US for which purpose I hereby authorise you to draw on the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War & of the Navy of the US. according as you may find your draughts will be most negociable, for the purpose of obtaining money or neceſsaries for yourself & your men and I solemnly pledge the faith of the United States that these draughts shall be paid punctually at the date they are made payable. I also ask of the Consuls, agents, merchants & citizens of any nation with which we have intercourse or amity to furnish you with those supplies which your neceſsities may call for, assuring them of honorable and prompt retribution. and our own Consuls in foreign parts where you may happen to be, are hereby instructed & required to be aiding & assisting to you in whatsoever may be neceſsary for procuring your return back to the United States. And to give more entire satisfaction & confidence to those who may be disposed to aid you, I Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America, have written this letter of general credit for you with my own hand, and signed it with my name.

Th: Jefferson

To
Capt. Meriwether Lewis

The letter, glassed and framed, was presented to the Port Townsend Library in 1899 by the late Edmond Stephen Meany, distinguished historian and professor of history at the University of Washington in Seattle. Apparently the document, whether it is the original or a press copy, had not caught the attention of librarians for a number of years. Mrs. Madge Wallin, the present librarian, tells us it was found in an unused storage area and is now in vault storage. She delights in showing it to visitors, however, particularly students, for it reveals much about the searching mind and human qualities of the remarkable Mr. Jefferson.

The full script, signed by the President and directed to Capt. Meriwether Lewis, reads:

*In the journey which you are about to undertake for the discovery of the course and source of the Mississippi, and of the most convenient water communication from thence to the Pacific ocean, your party being small, it is to be expected that you will encounter considerable dangers from the Indian inhabitants. Should you escape those dangers and reach the Pacific ocean, you may find it imprudent to hazard a return the same way, and be forced to seek a passage round by sea in such vessels as you may find on the Western coast. But you will be without money, without clothes & other necessaries, as a sufficient supply cannot be carried with you from hence, your resource in that case can only be in the credit of the U. Dr. Irina V. Tarasevich, distinguished Russian scientist, was a visitor to our museums, galleries and library as the guest of Dr. William L. Jellison, retired parasitologist at the Public Health Service's famed Rocky Mountain Laboratory in Hamilton, Mont. Dr. Tarasevich, who works in Moscow in a laboratory devoted to endemic infections, epidemiology and microbiology, was in the United States on a scientific exchange, and planned to spend several weeks at the Hamilton institution, known for its work in parasitology and related fields. Expressing admiration for this country, particularly the American West, she said it was her second visit, the first being as a tourist two years ago.

Polson Woman Makes Montana History Live In Costumed Puppets

The colorful saga of the Treasure State has been strung up for a fast-moving show where all sixteen members of the cast are puppets. "Montana with Marionettes," by Blanche Harding of Polson, is an authentic drama of the history of Montana. It is now being presented to school children and conventions across the state.

Over the past two years Mrs. Harding, a teacher in Polson, has whittled, molded and dressed sixteen puppets to represent exciting eras in Montana history. The cast includes typical characters such as Hellroaring Buffalo Joe and the Virginia City Gals, and many real profiles from the past such as Sacajawea and William Clark, Jim Bridger, Chief Joseph, Marcus Daly, Jim Hill and Charles Russell.

Each character has been carefully molded into the closest possible likeness; clothing, stage props, sound effects and speech have all been cued to their place and time. Each puppet was hand-crafted and attired in the family workshop; the taped dialogues were made by a variety of voices, lending realism.

To authenticate her script, Mrs. Harding spent two years studying Montana history, topping it off with a week in Helena at the Montana Historical Society. The final script was approved by Vivian Paladin, editor of Montana the Magazine of Western History.

The one-woman show dramatizes the history of Montana, from the mountain men and fur trappers to the days of mining and railroading. Dashes of humor in the script bring response from audiences both young and old.

It is the verve and zest of the show's creator that truly brings it to life. Mrs. Harding is an enthusiastic and dynamic person who wholeheartedly believes in the words of her Marcus Daly puppet, "Dream and then go do it!"

LUMAN ALLEN, LAST OF STATE PIONEERS, LIVED FULL CIRCLE

The last living member of The Society of Montana Pioneers, restricted to those who were born in or migrated to Montana Territory before December 31, 1868, lived long enough, as he hoped he would, to see men walk on the moon. To him, man had come full circle in his quest for mobility: his lifetime had spanned the covered wagon, railroads, automobile, airplane, and spacecraft.

Luman Woodruf Allen, born December 31, 1867 at Jefferson City, died in a nursing home in Butte on February 19. He had been an animated participant at his 102nd birthday a few months before; it had been eight years since he, as its president, had formally dissolved the Montana Pioneers, organized in Helena in 1884 with some 400 members.

Mr. Allen's father, Z. M. Allen, had settled near present-day Newton, Iowa, and had married a widow with four children. In 1866, when the family already included three other children, they moved westward, arriving in Jefferson City after a brief stop in Colorado. The Allens lived in a number of places, most of them gold camps, before homesteading at Harrison, south of Butte, in 1872. The family continued to grow: seven more children were born after the move to Montana. The only survivor now is Mrs. G. E. (Loretta) Alkire, 93, who makes her home in Butte with a daughter, Mrs. M. J. Fleming.

Luman Allen's life was not one of physical pioneering like his father and grandfather before him; he was content to live and die very close to home. He was, however, forward-looking in operating the farm. His father had irrigated the Harrison place after being told it couldn't be done. Luman, who had planted seed by hand when he was a youth—10 acres a day was a good pace — bought new and faster equipment through the years, beginning with a mechanical binder in 1890. He continued improving the farm and its equipment until he sold out and moved into the town of Harrison. His wife, the former Martha Kramer of Ohio, whom he married in 1898, died in 1918. Their only child, Eugene, died in 1964.

More than 200 gathered at Harrison for Luman Allen's funeral. It was a day of reminiscence for the many old friends who attended, according to Mr. and Mrs. E. E. MacGilvra of Butte who represented The Montana Historical Society as the last of Montana's official pioneers was laid to rest.

JIM MASTERSON, CARTOONIST-ARTIST, DIES AT MILES CITY

James W. Masterson, well known Montana cartoonist, artist and legislator, who died in a Miles City hospital on May 3 at the age of 84, left a significant record of accomplishment, including a historical cartoon book, "It Happened in Montana," which has served to instruct and entertain readers for many years. Jim Masterson was at once an artist, historian and cartoonist.

A native of Holland, Wis., he attended the Chicago Art Institute and the Academy of Fine Arts and came to Montana in 1913, homesteading near Miles City. In 1929 he became a cartoonist on a Butte newspaper, and since 1950 had devoted all his time to art, including oils, watercolors and other media. He was an intensely loyal Montanan, interested in both her past and present.

An ace reporter has produced the first detailed biography of the man who achieved a Hollywood phenomenon: the total and genuine affection of everyone who knew him, and many of those who didn't. Author Carpozi's search for all the facts about "Coop," who in 1940 was the country's highest wage earner, brought him to Montana, where he searched out the ranch near Helena where the boy grew up, the Helena newspaper which employed him as a cartoonist. # EQUAL RIGHTS FOR WOMEN: ABIG

If particular care and attention are not paid to the ladies we are determined to foment a rebellion and will not hold ourselves bound to obey any laws in which we have no voice or representation.

The words of a flaming suffragette of the post-World War I period or a contemporary women's liberation fighter? Neither. They were written by Abigail Adams to her husband, John, while he sat with the Continental Congress in Philadelphia nearly two centuries ago. This fragile lady, whose particular passions were political freedom and letter-writing, would have had to live another century and a half if she were to see the full enfranchisement of her sex.

It was 50 years ago this year that Tennessee, the 36th state, ratified the 19th amendment giving the force of constitutional law to the right of women to vote. The impetus toward this goal, however, came from the newly-created states of the American West. For an over-all appraisal of the suffragette movement, including its comic overtones, we have gone to the files of The Montana Historical Society Library — its newspapers, national periodicals and other sources.

Today, half a century after the mighty victory was won, women are embarked on a new crusade for equality, and the overtones are not nearly as easy to laugh at. Indeed, the words of Abigail Adams to her husband today ring with even more prophetic fervor than when she penned them so long ago:

I long to hear that you have declared an independency, and, by the way, in the new code of laws, which I suppose it will be necessary for you to make, I desire you would remember the ladies and be more generous and favorable to them than were your ancestors. Do not put such unlimited power into the hands of husbands. Remember all men would be tyrants if they could. If particular care and attention are not paid . . .

In Abigail's lifetime, women of New Jersey enjoyed a brief period of enfranchisement. In 1790, some of them could qualify to vote under the category "inhabitants worth $250.00." To forestall prejudiced interpreters from reading that as "male inhabitants," the law was revised to a clear "he or she."

But even after the last doubt had been removed, New Jersey women who used the privilege apparently did not vote the right ticket. In 1807, the legislature changed the law to read "white male citizens." (This fact would seem to annul the claim on Teamster Charley Parkhurst's tombstone in Watsonville, California, that she was the first U. S. female to vote, in 1863. Her actual sex, at the time, was unknown.)

After the Civil War, a lot of talking was done in the East about giving the ballot to women. But the wave of action began in the West. When Wyoming Territory organized in 1869, its constitution included an equal suffrage provision. The following year, Utah Territory did likewise.

Colorado's male voters decided to let their women come to the polls in 1893. From then until 1917, a total of 12 states gave women the vote. All but two were Western states: Idaho in 1896, Washington in 1910, California in 1911, Kansas, Oregon and Arizona in 1912, Nevada and Montana in 1914, New York, Michigan, South Dakota and Oklahoma in 1917. Arkansas and Texas, in 1917 and 1918, awarded their female citizens the right to vote only in primary elections.

Suffragists during the classic vote-getting period thought in very different terms from modern-day "liberation" fighters.

Their tactics were a bit quiet for today's fighters. When women needed to be informed about how this proposed suffrage would affect them, Montana suffragists planned "chain teas." Each woman in the movement would pour and explain for ten acquaintances, who would, in turn, do the same for others. In no time, according to theory, all Montana women would know the truth.

Some used gentle, biting irony, as an event of the 1889 Montana Constitutional Convention testifies. Mrs. Perry McAdow, a former real estate agent and active campaigner for a universal suffrage clause in the constitution, immediately left the gallery after the proposed section was defeated.

The next morning the delegates arrived to find red rose bouquets on their desks, except on those of Major Martin Maginnis and Joseph K. Toole (later the first elected governor of the state). On the desks of those two, who the day before had violently ridiculed women as voters, were bouquets of thistles.

In 1897, in fighting a proposed constitutional amendment for woman suffrage, Representative G. L. Ramsey in the Montana state legislature enlisted

IL ADAMS, BLESS HER, POINTED THE WAY

God to aid his cause as he thundered: "The Creator, in the labyrinthical alchemy of his laboratory, has seen fit to endow some women with the spirit of masculinity. It is those women who want to force the ballot upon the other women of the world."

Indeed, some women did feel the duty to vote an unfair imposition on their already filled and fulfilled lives. When they got organized, the liquor interests were a helpful funding agent. Since the Women's Christian Temperance Union supported universal suffrage, the two causes were linked in many male minds. The liquor manufacturers used the "antis" as a protective cover in the counterfight. And the "antis" defended Motherhood and Apple Pie, after all.

The "suffs" (as they called themselves) considered the "antis" to be conducting a gossip campaign. A Montana suff newsletter said: "Some of the [anti] 'tracts' are so odoriferous that not a few of the recipients lift it with tongs."

Sympathetic males were welcome helpers. The suffragists did not consider chivalry an affront to female mentality. Said a 1914 bulletin from the State Central Committee of Montana's suffs:

> Open air meetings along all the railroads prove most interesting. Thousands of men and women have heard the suffragettes and given most chivalrous attention. Only at one meeting did a "biped" speak disrespectfully, but a real man standing nearby took him quietly to one side and cuffed his ears—not one word was said by either during the scrubbing.

bune © (Chicago, Ill.)

Female self-sufficiency wasn't the goal then, either. When they could vote they would be better wives, seems to be the argument behind this extract from a Butte-issued bulletin:

> So many lovely girls have come out of the Montana sage brush country to help in the equal rights campaign that the suffragists at headquarters are considering the advisability of opening a matrimonial bureau—after election day. The great number of young women located on "homesteads," all over the state, who are up and doing in the suffrage campaign is a revelation. A nifty girl and a quarter or even a half section of Montana land is something worth while as a start—if the aforesaid maids could be prevailed on to enlist as readily in matrimony as they do in votes for women.

A Helena paper reported that "in the East" suffs were asking that designations of marital status be used equally for men and women, enforcing the use of "Master" as frequently as "Miss." As they saw it, equality of the sexes was divinely ordained. The classic tenet was that God had made Eve of Adam's rib instead of his head or foot so that she would be neither above nor below, but absolutely equal alongside him.

Dr. L. M. Rheem, of Helena, addressed the Montana suffs as they gathered to lobby at the legislative session of 1913. In sympathy and encouragement, he told them: "Women want men to give them but one word. When it is considered how many words women have given to men, it seems a fair trade."

Some things considered desired norms today were among the "far out" demands of the suffragist movement. Some of their demands have not yet been, or may never be, accepted. Witness the following list of "Claims of Women" from an 1871 edition of Appletons' Journal on file in the Montana Historical Society Library:

1. We desire that there should be a great improvement in the education of girls, and a restoration to them of those endowments originally intended for both sexes; but which, in some instances, have been appropriated exclusively to boys.
2. As a natural consequence to the first requirement, that equal facilities should be granted to women for the attainment of the highest education and of university degrees . . .
3. That all professions should be open to them, and especially that no new act, mended [sic] or otherwise, should actually exclude them as they are excluded now.
4. That married women should no longer be debarred from the separate ownership of property, on the same terms as married men.
5. That a widow should be recognized by law as the only natural guardian of her children.
6. That the franchise should be extended to women as a means of power and protection in all matters affected by legislative action.
7. That political and social interest and work should be open equally to them, so that, if there be talent or aptitude in any of them, the state may not be the loser, alike by the exclusion of those qualities which they share with men, and of those which are characteristic of themselves.
8. That public opinion should sanction every occupation for women which in itself is good and suited to their strength.
9. That there should be no legal subordination in marriage.
10. That same wages should be given for the same work.

More than 90 years later as the "new feminism" movement brings the familiar cries of horror, Lucy Komisar, writing in a recent issue of Saturday Review, pointed out that as 1969 came to a close, even news commentators in giving year-end analyses either ignored the movement or "sloughed it off uncomfortably."

"Yet," Miss Komisar wrote, "the women's movement promises to affect radically the life of virtually everyone in America. Only a small part of the population suffers because it is black, and most people have little contact with minorities. Women are 51 per cent of the population, and chances are that every adult American either is one, is married to one, or has close social or business relations with many."

Abigail Adams, who worked hard to keep the family farm in Braintree, Mass., going while her husband traveled endlessly, may not have gone along with all of this. But her social consciousness would have applauded much that has been accomplished, certainly by her sisters in the American West who brought the first force of law to her earnest wish that husbands not have unlimited power while their wives had none at all.

Dialogue with the Director

"Cartwheels Coming" was the recent headline in Montana newspapers. The story, about possible return of silver dollars, not only stirred Montanans and residents of other intermountain states; it brought memories of a strong tradition in the Treasure State, coupled with historic overtones.

It was only a few years ago that silver dollars disappeared from everyday use in our shops and banks. Thousands mourned their passing, perhaps an incomprehensible feeling to those in the East or in sections sometimes known to Montanans as "scissorbill country." The silver dollar is a hallowed memory here. Until just a few years ago, our citizens would not be caught with a roll of dollar bills, which bore such opprobrious epithets as "Indiana bankroll" or "dirty paper." Not that we have a thing against Indiana. But our residents bore the weight of the silver tender and happily wore out pockets and purses. They liked it that way. That cartwheel had special meaning to us.

Deep in the history of Montana and the West, of course, is the story of silver strikes and the free silver political campaign. Coupled with it, at least in part, was the Populist movement, recently limned for Montana by Dr. Thomas Clinch of Carroll College, Helena, in his "Urban Populism and Free Silver in Montana," published by the University of Montana Press.

At the best, we read, the new "silver" dollar will contain 40 percent of the metal. Then will come an issue that contains none at all. So the news of a replacement for the near-money that we get in dollar bills must be greeted with some reservations from the gentry in our plains and mountains.

But we look forward to the time when again our residents will throw a dollar down at the Silver Dollar Bar, even if it lands with a clunk instead of a tinkle.

—SAM GILLULY

Artist's Adopted Son Participates in Charley Russell Birthday Activities

Jack Russell of San Bernardino, Calif., signed the 1909 guestbook of The Montana Club in Helena alongside the famous signature of his adoptive father, Charles M. Russell, as Society Director Sam Gilluly, left, and Montana Club President Jim Egan, right, look on. It was the last in a series of memorable events in March, designated in Montana as Charley Russell Month. The Cowboy Artist was born on March 19, 1864 in St. Louis, but after 1880, Montana was his home.

Mr. Russell and his wife, Lucille, were honored guests as well at the second annual Charles M. Russell auction of original western art, held at the Rainbow Hotel in Great Falls under auspices of the Advertising Club of that city. Robert Rockwell of Corning, New York, well known art collector, served as honorary chairman of the event, at which more than $22,655 was realized for the benefit of the C. M. Russell Gallery in Great Falls. Fred Renner of Washington, D. C., Russell art authority, was also honored at the luncheon and art auction.

Jack Russell has visited Montana only occasionally since his father's death in 1926. Named Jack Cooper Russell, he was adopted by Charley and Mamie Russell in 1916 to end 20 years of marriage without, as the artist often expressed it, a "slick ear" at home. Now employed in the engineering division of the California Highway Department, Mr. Russell said he and his wife enjoyed the warm home-coming hospitality during Charley Russell Month and vowed to return again soon.

MONTANA POST

VOLUME EIGHT, NUMBER ONE FEBRUARY, MARCH, 1970

SHELVED WITH PERIODICALS

IN THE MIDST OF CHAOS: A NEW INTRODUCTION

Things are happening so fast at The Montana Historical Society that it would require a daily bulletin to keep current. According to a report made to the February meeting of the Board of Trustees by Architect Bill Kuhr, however, the general construction work for the building addition was 62 per cent finished, with mechanical work an impressive 85 per cent completed. This means that finishing of the new areas, plus renovation and compatibility work on the existing structure is well ahead of schedule.

Meanwhile, Curator Bob Morgan and his staff have completed a new introductory section to the Formal Museum on the main floor, the highlights of which are pictured in this issue. Designed to orient the visitor to the here and now of Montana and to introduce him to our visual history in the museum displays he is about to see, the area was endowed by the Schoknecht Foundation. The Schoknecht family is closely connected with Western Montana's lumbering industry through the pioneer J. Neils Lumber Company of Libby, which, in 1957, was merged with the St. Regis Paper Company. The Neils firm, established in Michigan in 1895, began its operations in Western Montana in 1911.

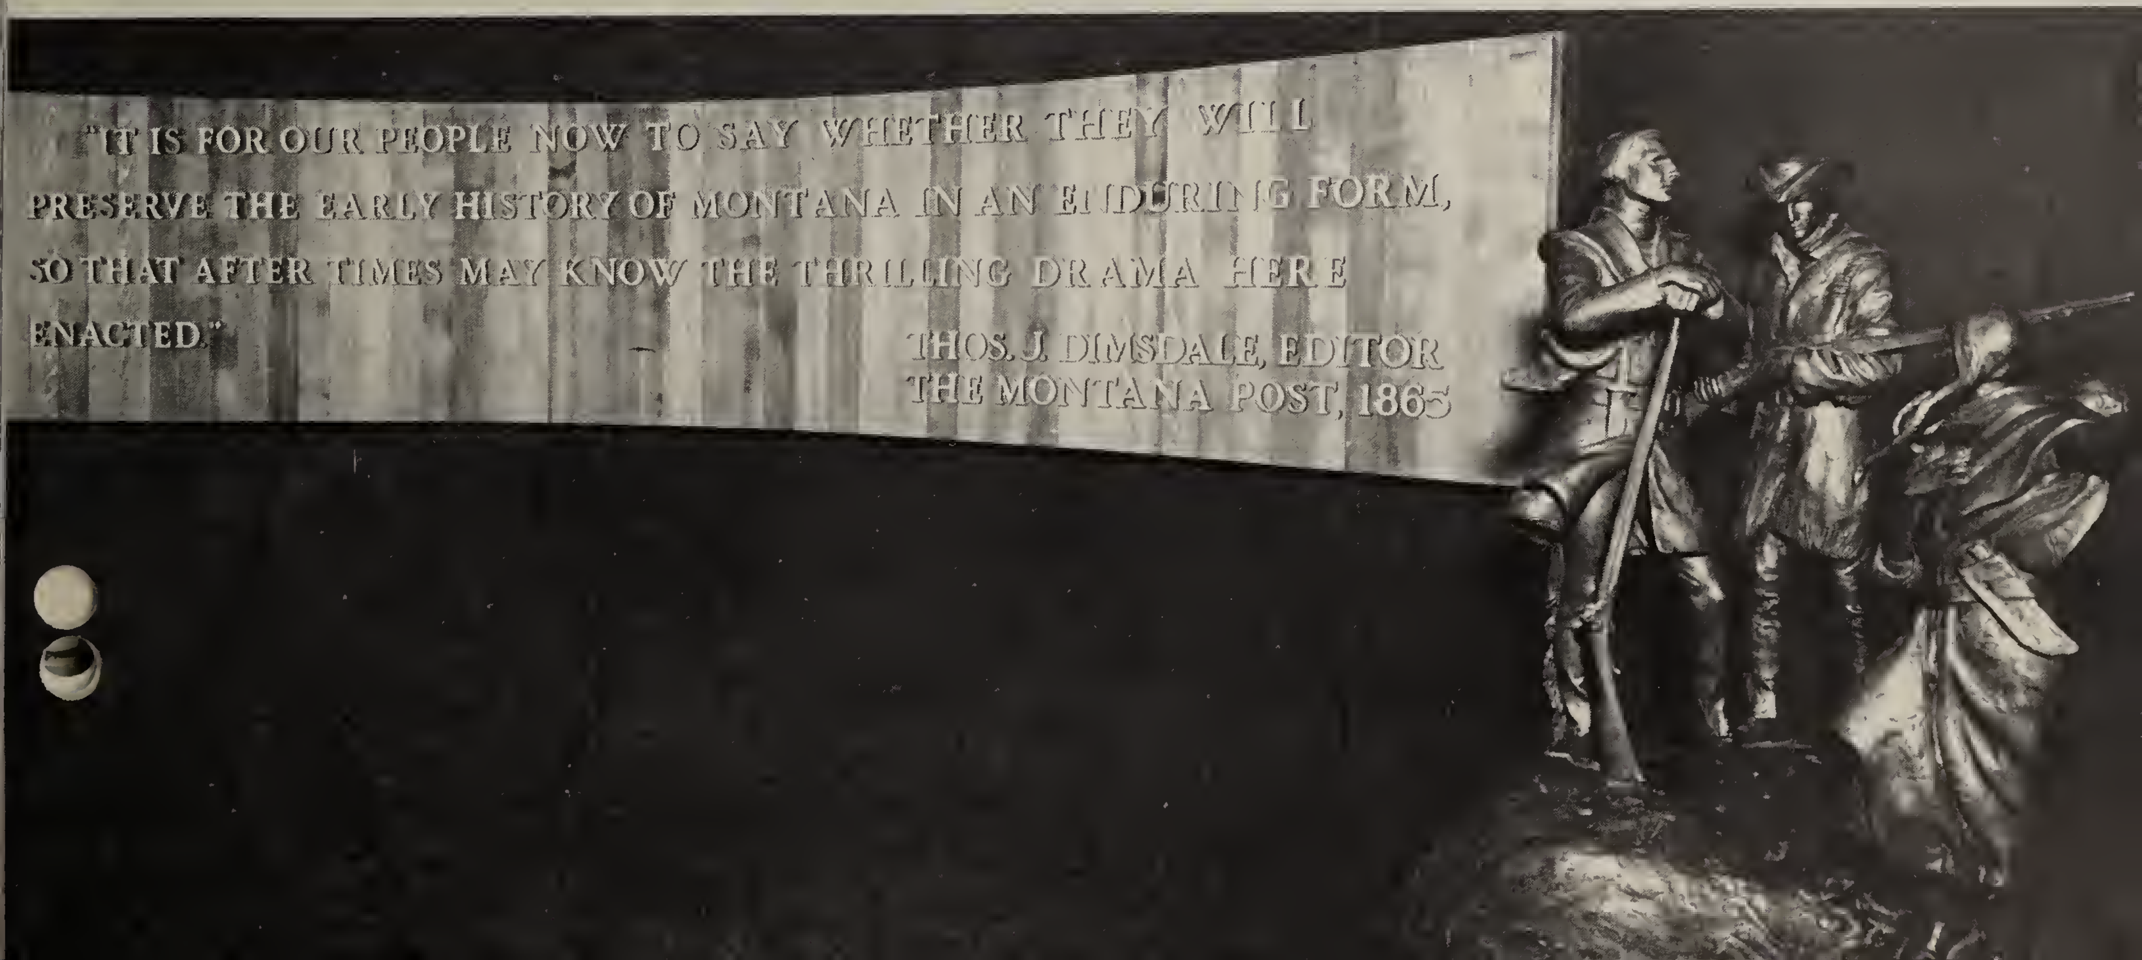
The words of Thomas Dimsdale, editor of Montana's first bona fide newspaper, THE MONTANA POST, are used in the opening panel, pictured below: "It is for our people now to say whether they will preserve the early history of Montana in an enduring form, so that after times may know the thrilling drama here enacted." In dramatic juxtaposition is the bronze depiction of Lewis and Clark and Sacajawea, sculpted by Henry Lion from an original sketch of Charles M. Russell.

Examples of Montana's marketable lumber, an illuminated map of the state, dioramic views of our state flower, bird and tree, and our geological past, all described and pictured on the next page, complete the new introductory section.

Visitors to the Society, especially youngsters, will be glad to know that the Natural Habitat exhibits will now include Big Medicine, the white buffalo which has been resting in storage during our building program. The subject of perhaps more inquiry than any other object during our period of dislocation, Big Medicine will be seen alongside his cousins of normal coloration as the viewer begins his trek through Montana history in the Formal Museum.

Speaking of inquiries, we also get a great many about our Russell collection. Until the new Russell gallery is completed, all paintings, drawings, bronzes and memorabilia of The Cowboy Artist are in vault storage. A number of the paintings are being cleaned and reframed for the grand opening, however, and Curator Morgan has planned exciting gallery-within-a-gallery displays, plus special textured pedestals on which to display the Russell bronzes in the round.

As we go to press, workmen were putting finishing touches to administrative, editorial and business offices on the main floor, using space formerly occupied by the Gary Cooper Gallery and the Informal Russell Room. Complete redesign of the lobby, a new sales area and the work of tying in the new addition was proceeding apace.



"IT IS FOR OUR PEOPLE NOW TO SAY WHETHER THEY WILL PRESERVE THE EARLY HISTORY OF MONTANA IN AN ENDURING FORM, SO THAT AFTER TIMES MAY KNOW THE THRILLING DRAMA HERE ENACTED."
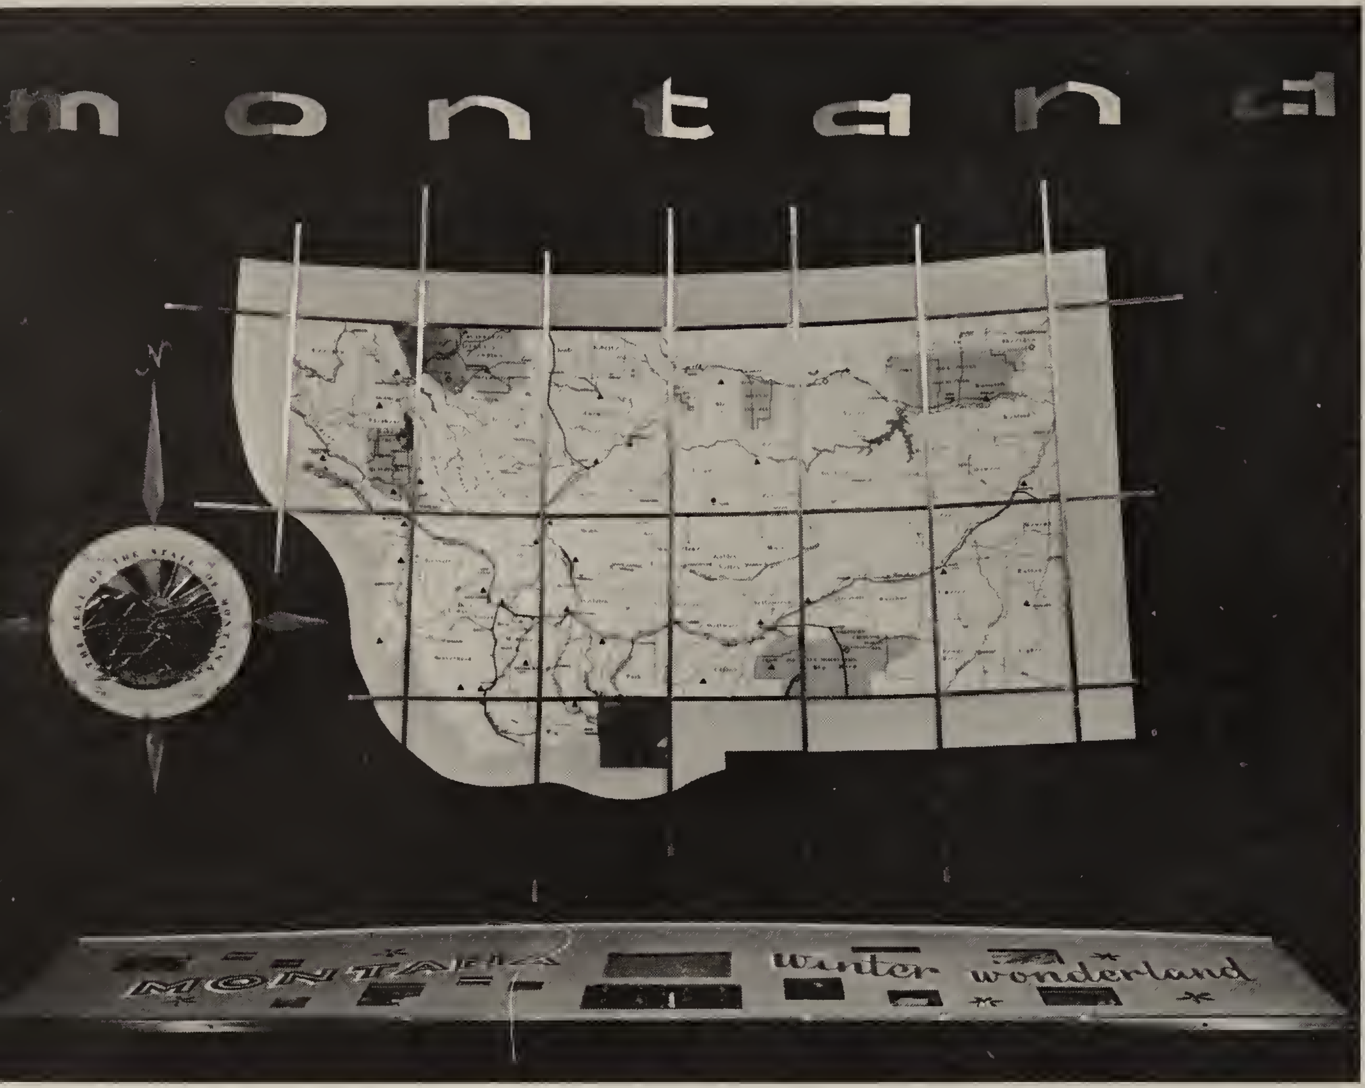
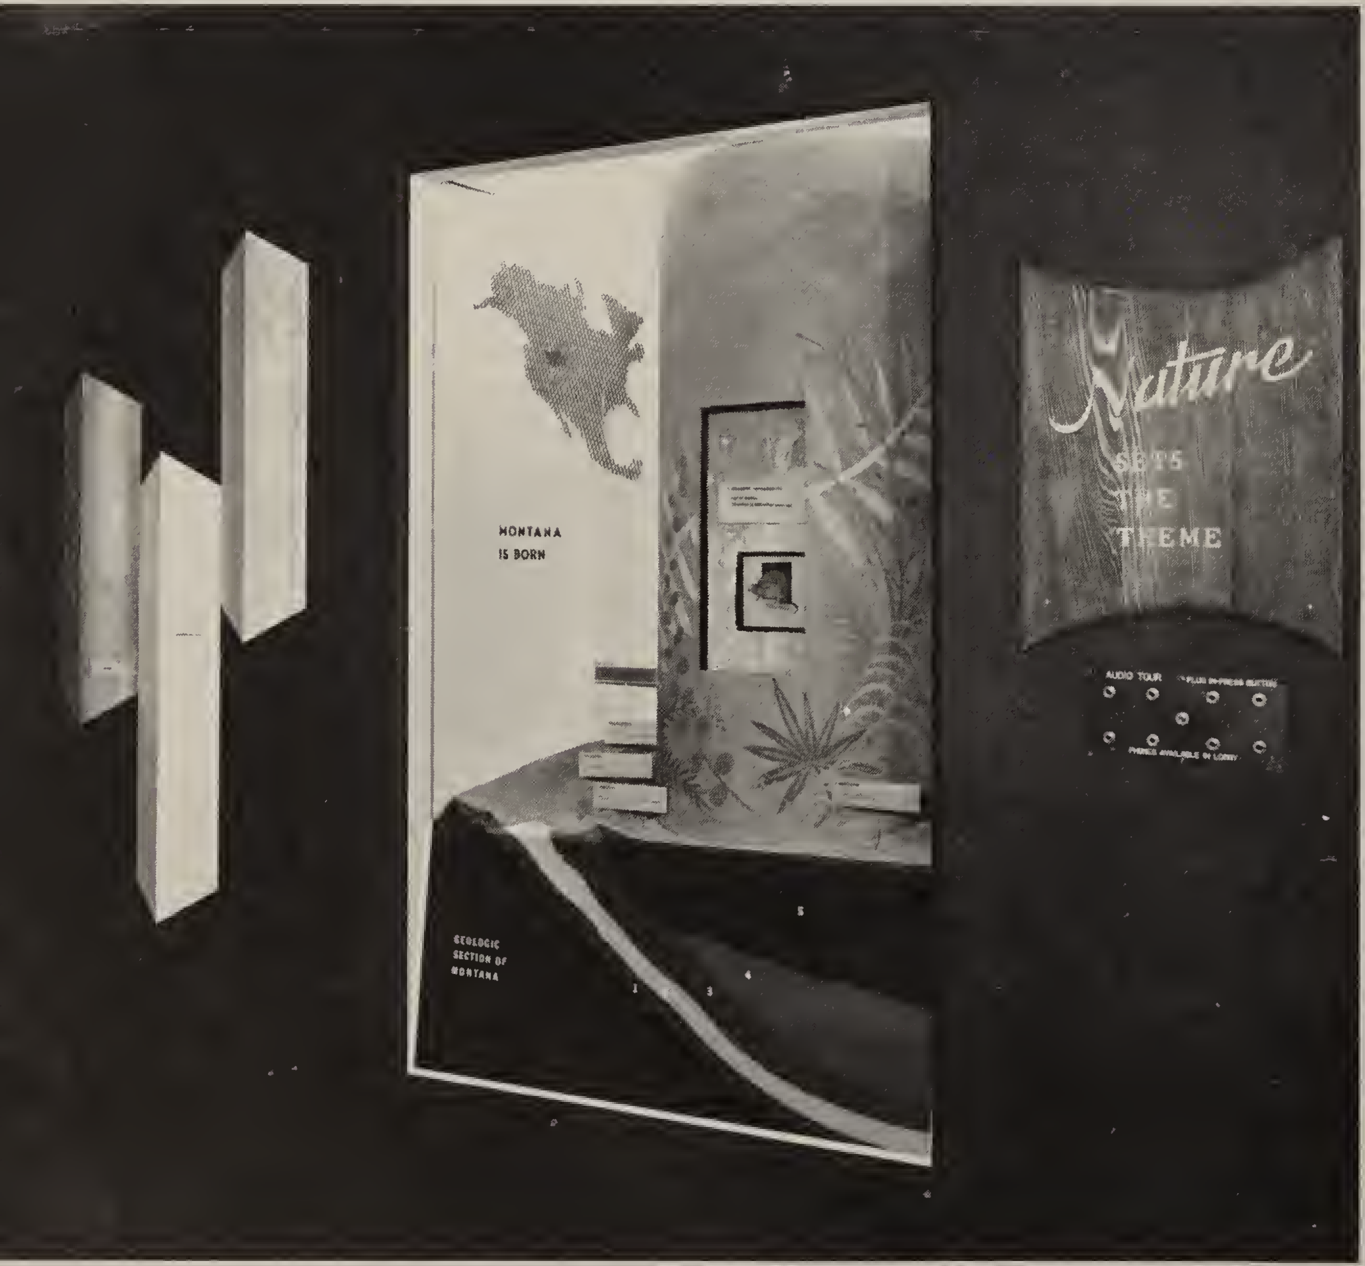
THOS. J. DIMSDALE, EDITOR
THE MONTANA POST, 1865

MONTANA'S PAST AND PRESENT ARE ILLUMINATED





An illuminated map, with national parks, Indian reservations and historical sites and landmarks keyed, will show visitors at the Society the present-day face of Montana. It will guide the tourist, by highway number, to spots he wants to visit. In the lighted panel beneath the map are a series of full color transparencies, pointing out, season by season, activities, sports and the incomparable scenery. A taped commentary will tell the facts: our ponderous size, temperature gradations, population and industries. Both pictures and part of the commentary will change with the seasons. Flanking the central map and lighted panel are decorative examples of Montana's marketable timber: ponderosa pine, cedar, white pine, larch, spruce and douglas fir. Dioramic displays show Montana's state flower (the bitterroot), her state bird (the meadowlark) and her state tree (the ponderosa pine). The new introductory area will, by illuminated display and taped commentary, inform the visitor of Montana's righ geological past. A relief topographical display, with cutaway section and keyed color scheme, shows the five geological periods and where evidence of them may be found today: the Archeozoic, Proterozoic, Paleozoic, Mesozoic, and Cenozoic. A central "tower of life" also color keyed and electrically driven, will point up the animal life typical of the five periods from Montana's dim past. The geological display and commentary, while accurately done, is aimed for the lay visitor who has heard much about the unusual upheavals and geological dislocations which characterized our evolvement.

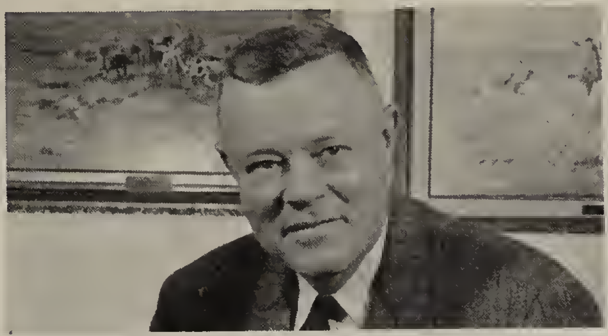
March Is C. M. Russell Month in Montana; Second Annual Art Auction a Birthday Event

Robert Rockwell of Corning, N. Y., well known collector of Western art and Steuben glass, will be honorary chairman of the second annual Charles M. Russell auction of original Western art slated for Thursday, March 19, at the Rainbow Hotel in Great Falls. Sponsored by the Advertising Club of Great Falls, the event will be for the benefit of the C. M. Russell Gallery in that city.

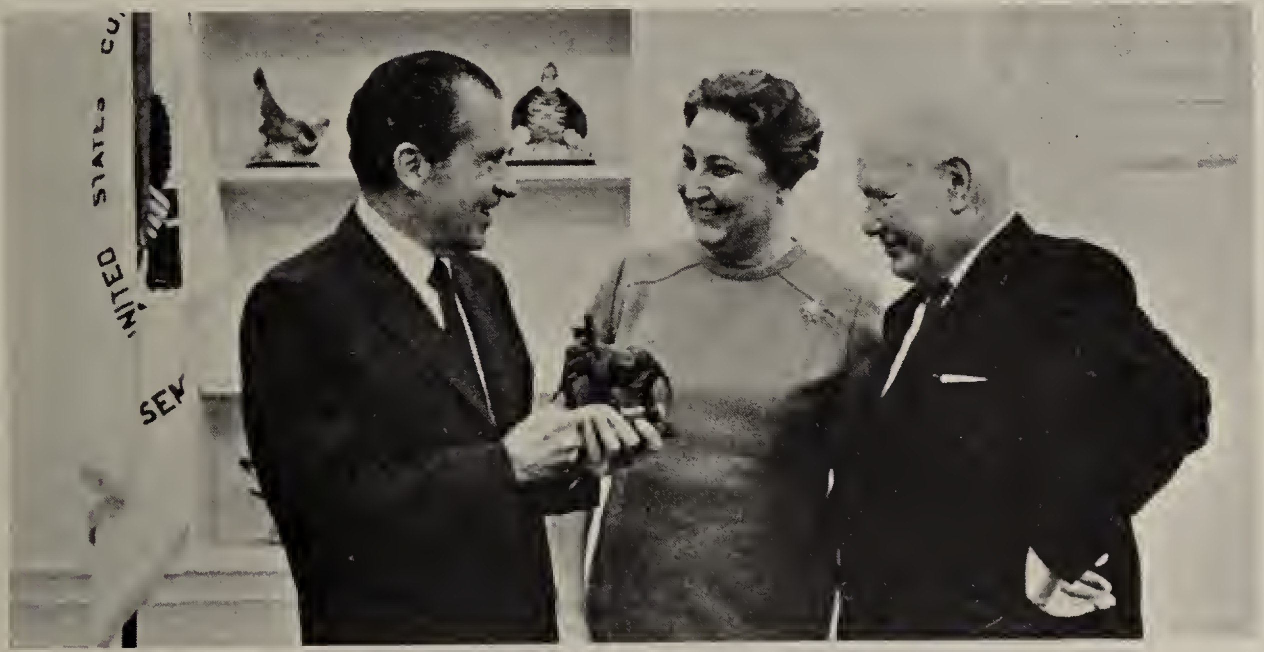
As we go to press, we are informed that other guests for the all-day affair will include Mr. and Mrs. Jack Russell of San Bernardino, Calif. Mr. Russell is the adopted son of The Cowboy Artist, whose 106th birthday falls on March 19. Fred Renner of Washington, D. C., foremost Russell art authority who served as last year's honorary chairman, will be among the special guests, as will Dean Krakel, director of the Cowboy Hall of Fame in Oklahoma City.



March has been proclaimed "Charles M. Russell month" by Great Falls Mayor John J. McLaughlin. Our sister gallery in Great Falls will display, throughout the month, a selection of original Russell oils, watercolors, drawings and illustrated letters from the private collection of Mr. Rockwell as well as a group of Russell bronzes from the Society's collection.

Some $13,000 worth of Russell bronzes will be offered during the auction, along with the work of at least a dozen living Montana artists, including Les Peters, Branson Stevenson, Jack Richardson, Jay Contway and Steve Seltzer of Great Falls, Merle Olson and Elmer Sprunger of Bigfork, Gill Gebhart of Conrad, Dr. Andrew Jordan and Elmer Schock of Choteau, Elizabeth Lochrie of Butte, and Dorothy Larson of Billings.

MR. AND MRS. RENNER PRESENT RUSSELL ELEPHANT BRONZE TO PRESIDENT NIXON



President Richard M. Nixon is shown receiving a bronze elephant, cast from a Charles M. Russell model in the collection of Mr. and Mrs. Frederic G. Renner of Washington, D.C. Mr. and Mrs. Renner made the presentation in the Oval Room of the White House on November 13, 1969, and the occasion had both personal and artistic overtones. President Nixon, who is an enthusiastic collector of elephant models, also welcomed the chance for reminiscence with Mrs. Renner, who was a classmate at Whittier College in California.

The bronze, number one of ten bronze casts made of Russell's model, is a unusual object, for while animals of the Far East held a fascination for Montana's Cowboy Artist, it is the only known example of such a model committed to bronze.

The day after the presentation, Mrs. Renner entered Georgetown Hospital for continued treatment of leukemia. Her death, at 53, occurred Wednesday, Jan. 7, ironically on the day NBC released its documentary film, "The West of Charles M. Russell," for which her husband acted as special consultant.

HARRIETT C. MELOY NAMED TO MONTANA BOARD OF EDUCATION

Governor Forrest Anderson has announced the appointment of Mrs. Harriett C. Meloy to an eight-year term on the Montana Board of Education, which brings with it ex-officio membership on the University Board of Regents.

A member of our Library staff since 1957 and now our Acting Librarian, Mrs. Meloy is, by this important appointment, recognized for many years of devoted work in the cause of Montana education on all levels. She and her husband, Attorney Peter Meloy, have seen four sons and one daughter through grade and high school, and all have or are now attending a unit of the Greater University of Montana.

A native of Inkster, N. D., Harriett moved to Helena with her family in 1929. Her father, C. H. Crittenden, was for many years connected with Intermountain College in Helena. It was here and at Jamestown College in North Dakota that Harriett received her academic training. Long active in the League of Women Voters and the American Association of University Women, she has combined a career at the Historical Society with a busy home life and a deep interest in education, from grade school P. T. A. work to the high school and college levels.

NOTICE TO OUR READERS

As we begin Volume Eight of THE MONTANA POST, we present an enlarged version in which we hope to more fully explore the activities of The Montana Historical Society and illuminate for you more of the rare and interesting material preserved here. THE POST will now come to you four times a year instead of eight, but the enlarged format will encompass two months of activity. It is our sincere belief that this publishing schedule and enlargement will bring a better and more meaningful product to your home. You may expect MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY to arrive, as usual, in the months of January, April, July and October; THE MONTANA POST in the months of February-March, May-June, August-September and November-December.

COLEMAN APPLIES ARCHIVAL METHODOLOGY TO LIB

John R. Coleman, raised on a Montana ranch, a one-time logger, truck driver and law student, with hobbies in gold mining and archeology, has mixed business administration with his history and political science major at the University of Montana. He puts all these diverse interests to good use in his present job as the Society's first staff archivist. It's that kind of job.

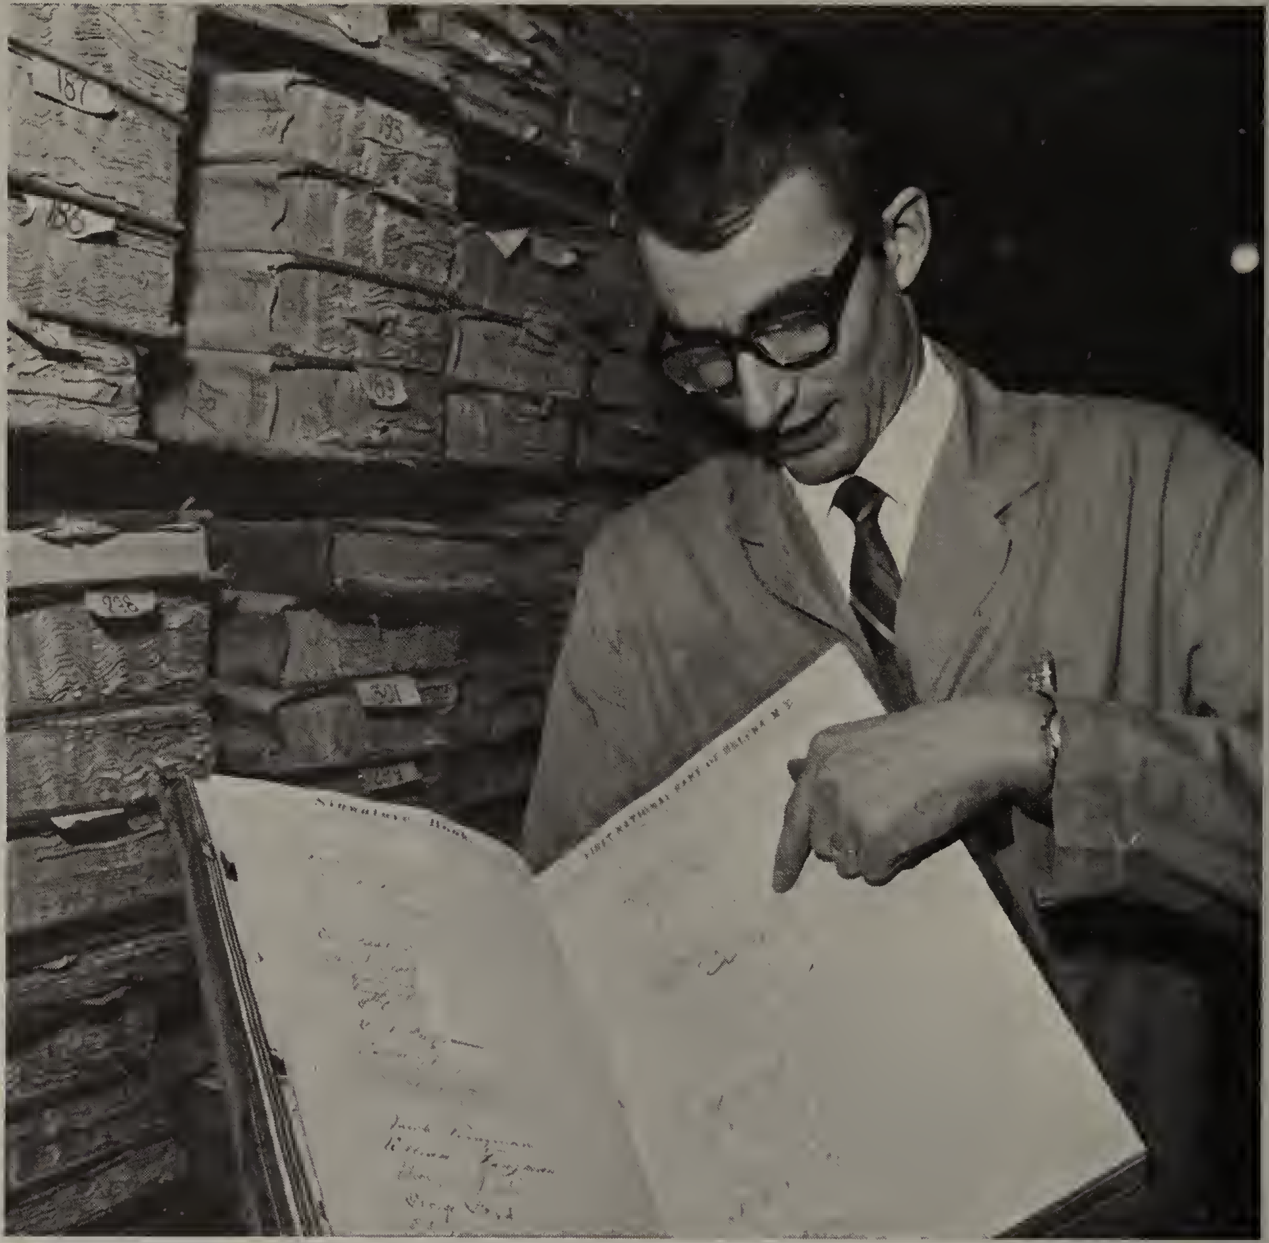
John began working for the Society three years ago, the first year and a half being spent catching up with an accumulation of papers, public and private, which had been stored in corridors between the Library's stack levels. As of now, all this material has received at least a preliminary inventory. Moreover, archival methods are being applied to the material as opposed to library cataloging methods.

"The result," Coleman explains, "is that emphasis has shifted to utilization rather than merely holding." The valuable function of preserving the materials has been surpassed by their availability for reference. Without archival help, the Library staff, through the years, simply did not have the time to devote themselves to the job.

Most of the archival materials which are now the day-to-day concern of Coleman have been donated by surviving family members who realize the potential value of letters and business records of early Montanans. Some have found their way back to the state from descendants living elsewhere. A small part of new materials, Coleman says, is the result of recent tracking down to places in the state where they were stored.

"Families often don't realize the value of old documents in their attics," he says "This is more often true than the commonly held belief that people don't care at all. It is very often a matter of informing people that there is a repository which will not only welcome such materials but will see that they are properly cared for, catalogued, and used."

Coleman continues to assist his father in the operation of the cattle ranch where he was raised. He began his logging activity at the age of 17, serving as a contract supplier for a local mill. At the University of Montana he emphasized Northwest history in his undergraduate work. In June of this year, he will receive his M.A. in Montana history and archival management. Currently he is "still typing" his thesis—a history of state agencies, past and present, and a bibliography of their various publications.



Archivist John Coleman shows a signature record book of one of Helena's early banks, pointing out miners who signed with an X, Chinese names in pictographs, and the ornate signatures of the fathers of the Territory—all interspersed with many names of pioneering average citizens of Montana.

Since few colleges in the country offer formal courses in archival processes, Coleman's master's degree advisors, Dr. K. Ross Toole of the department of history, and Dale Johnson, University archivist, arranged independent study courses in methodology.

Like the work of the archeologist, maintaining archives is slow and methodical work. Excitement over "finds" must be subordinated to orderly and careful notation, Coleman points out.

When a collection arrives at the Society, it must first be cleaned. As in the recent acquisition of records of the Montana Coal and Iron Company of Bearcreek, Montana, this is a dirty job, as Coleman's waiting coveralls in his office testify. At present, a vacuum cleaner and brushes are the tools, but in the new building addition, a vacuum chamber will be available.

As the preliminary inventory is made, a principle archivists call provenance is followed. This is maintaining the natural order the originator of the collection would have followed. At the same time, Coleman establishes general categories, such as personal correspondence, incoming or outgoing correspondence, persons involved, activities in different businesses or in politics.

While the preliminary inventory is a guide to general subjects, the final inventory later lists every item by author, and completes the cataloging process in in a form useful for guiding researchers through the collections.

Each collection is then stored in folders according to archival categories, the folders kept in numbered boxes specially treated and designed for preservation purposes.

Cataloger Harold Chambers makes reference cards for each collection; these are kept in the library's general card catalog available to public use.

ARY COLLECTIONS

When Coleman began work at the society, he spent several months sorting and arranging the "Helena Banking Group," records of six Helena banks from 1866 through 1913. Included in the group are records of around seventy small businesses which had somehow come to be stored with the bank records in a downtown Helena building. The material now occupies 745 linear feet of shelf space. In the signature record books for the banks are names of the well-known and obscure, many in Chinese characters, and quite a few written "X—his mark."

Among the books are incorporation papers and boards of directors meeting minutes from Helena's street railways. A graduate student using the library to trace their history had to refer to newspapers from the time as his best source—until the archival inventory showed their extent among the "Helena Banking Group."

Because he is aware of the importance of letting working methods be known, Coleman keeps a daily journal of his work. Future archivists will thus be able to check on the design followed. The practice is also symptomatic of the archivist's awareness of keeping track of the seemingly unimportant things in case they turn out otherwise.

The archives will soon be publishing listings of its holdings through the National Union Catalog of Manuscript Collections, of the Library of Congress. In this way, materials here will be made available to a vast range of researchers.

Also planned is a quarterly state-wide catalog of collections here and at other archival agencies such as universities and smaller local historical groups.

In the process of bringing in papers and records from families and businesses, Coleman sometimes receives other items.

He worked briefly for Curator Bob Morgan to learn museum artifact cataloging in order to handle these items. A cross reference system is used so that both departments know the source, location, and interrelationship of these acquisitions.

Among the few signs, maps, flags, and the many boxes and old trunks, often in coveralls and sometimes covered with coal dust, Staff Archivist John Coleman is working systematically, sorting, indexing, and discovering.

Dialogue with the Director

The big news of the winter around our institution has been the tremendous and nationwide reaction we have heard after presentation in January of the NBC Project 20 documentary, "The West of Charles M. Russell."

Russell and Montana "Russell country" were, for the most part, treated sympathetically, sensitively and authentically.

Reaction began the day after the hour-long production was screened. Letters, phone calls and personal reactions came to us from all over the country.

"I found myself catching my breath so many times," said one caller from the Midwest. Our surprised reply was, "We thought it would make only Montanans feel like that."

Part of the pleasant experience was a feeling of pride for having been a small part of a masterful production. Our library and museum staffs worked with both Bob Garthwaite, associate producer, and Dan Jones, researcher, last summer. More of the same work was done at the Russell Gallery in Great Falls. Other major Russell galleries in the West were involved too. The affection the NBC men feel for old Montana literally was reflected in the end product.

We are grateful, too, to the Montana Power Company, which presented a film copy to the State of Montana. We regard it as a valuable documentary and it becomes part of the permanent collection in our historical library. Then, too, Mountain Bell is providing us with an extra copy so that we may have one for occasional screening and can preserve the original gift as it should be kept. Montana Power sponsored the showing in Montana.

It was truly a gala affair in Great Falls when its progressive Advertising Club screened the documentary in a world premiere on the day of its release. Spearheading this occasion was Norma Ashby of Station KRTV, a person whose feeling for Montana contributed so much to the event.

We can only wonder what Charles would have thought of this, for that matter what he would have thought of television itself.

But we do know how "The West of Charles M. Russell" made millions of people feel.

It's a little like he wrote historian Charles F. Lummis in 1920: "Time onley changes the out side of things. It scars the rock and snarles the tree but the heart inside is the same . . . Your body is here in a highly civilized land but your heart lives on the back trails that are grass grown ore plowed under."

Chet Huntley, whose daily television appearances have been seen in millions of homes for many years, visited Montana in mid-February to announce his retirement sometime this year from the hectic world of news broadcasting to fulfill a lifetime goal: a return to his native Montana.

In an appearance in the capitol building in Helena February 16, Huntley gave specifications for an 11,000-acre year-round resort complex he and his associates in the Chrysler Realty Corporation will build in Gallatin and Madison counties south of Bozeman. Scheduled to open in the Spring of 1972, the complex will include a summer recreation village, an 18-hole golf course, a ski area large enough to accommodate 5,000 and many other features.

Huntley, born at Cardwell, Mont. in Western Montana in 1912, is the son of a railroad telegrapher and spent much of his youth at Saco, in Eastern Montana. His warmly nostalgic memories of this period of his life were recounted in THE GENEROUS YEARS, published in 1968 by Random House.

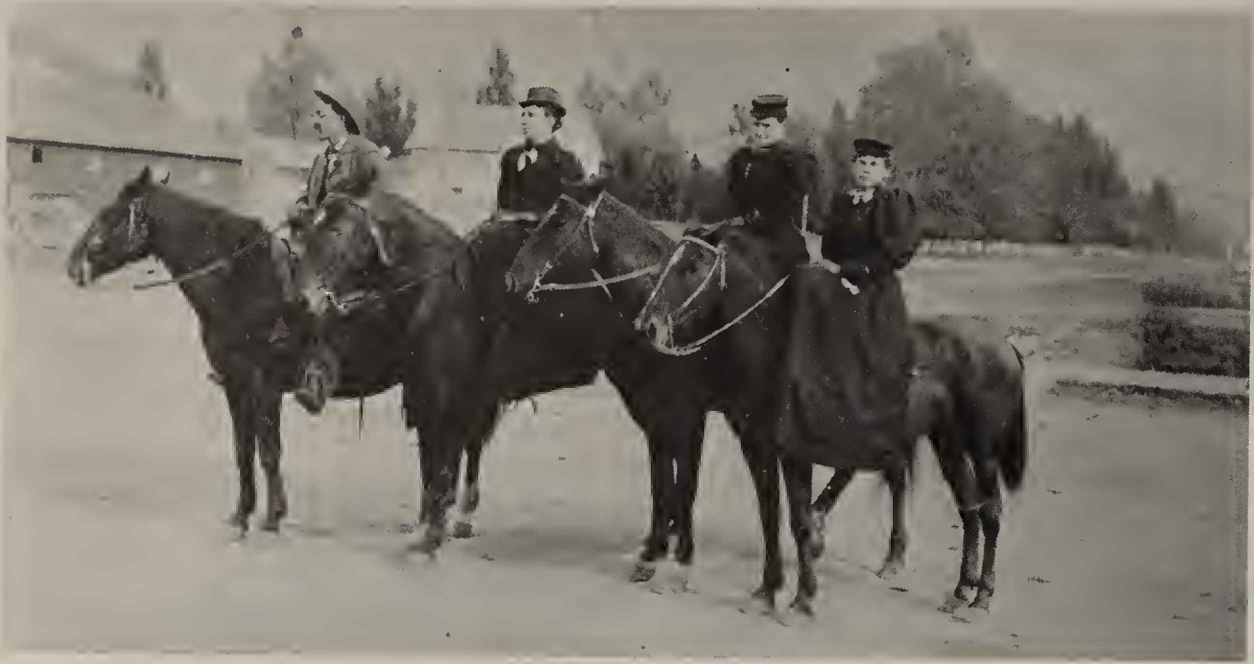
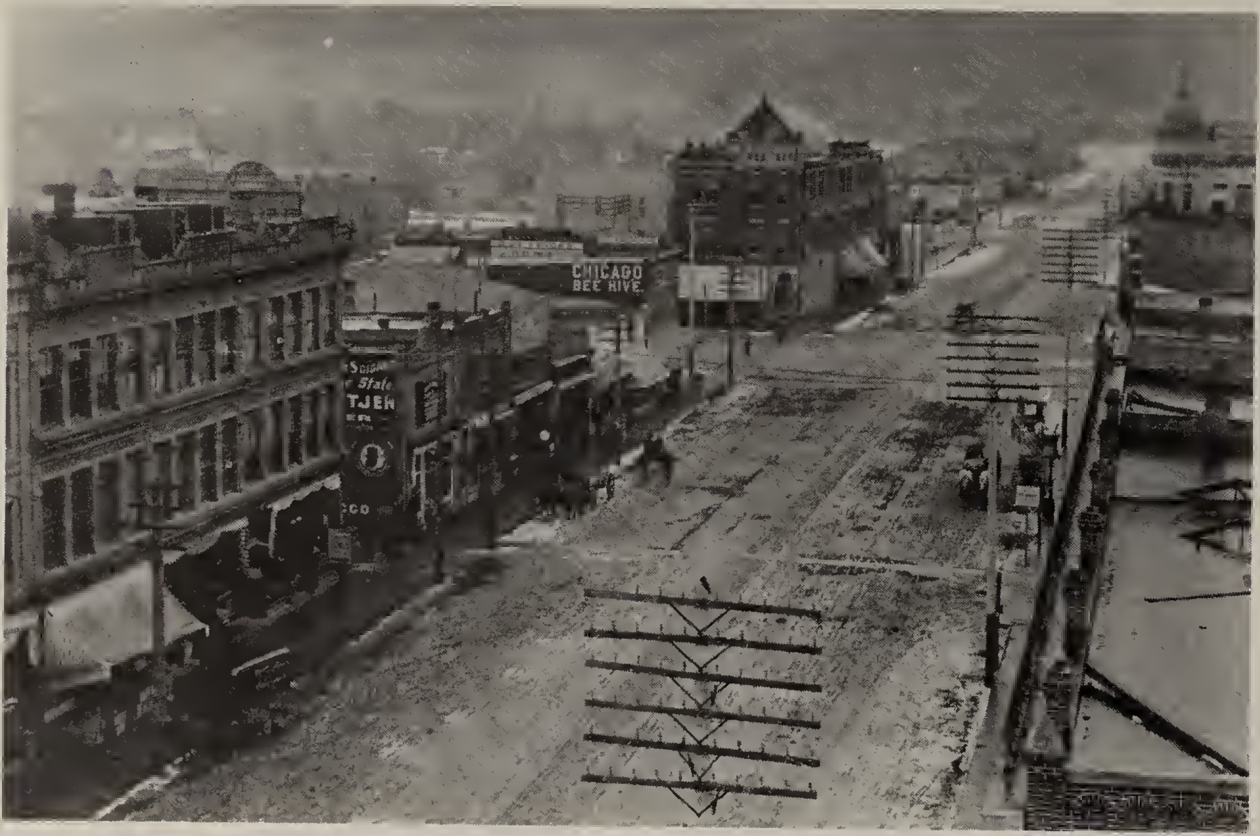
MALONEY COLLECTION RICH IN VISUAL HISTORY



Albert M. Stevens and his wife, Myrta, left, joined two Missoula friends for a horseback ride in the 1890's, the ladies dressed in the height of equestrian fashion and riding sidesaddle.



Missoula's Higgins Avenue was photographed looking northwest in this 1889 picture, one of many graphic pictures in the extensive Maloney collection.

A collection of more than 150 photographs and glass plate negatives, most of them depicting people and places in the Missoula region, has come to the Society through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. John L. Maloney of Helena. The pictures, all fully identified and dated, become a valuable pictorial record of the town of Missoula and such locales as the Bitter Root Valley, Fort Owen, Granite Hot Springs, and many others, with dates ranging from the 1890's to past the turn of the century.

Mr. and Mrs. Maloney are both avid collectors of historical pictures. Mrs. Maloney, from whose collection these come, is the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Albert M. Stevens. Her father, a former mayor of Missoula, was also a leading merchant, while her mother, Myrta, was an enthusiastic photographer and artist.

The Stevens family, which included another daughter, Lucile, came to Missoula in May, 1889, from their homestead farm near Rochester, Minn. Mrs. Maloney recalls that there were no houses on the south side of Hellgate River when they arrived in Missoula. The present University of Montana campus was the site of an Indian camp. Mrs. Maloney attended the University when venerable Main Hall, still standing, was the only building on campus.

Mr. Maloney, a retired Highway Department employee, grew up in the Miller Creek region near Missoula. His father, a native of Ireland, arrived in this country during the Civil War and worked as a blacksmith and wheelwright before homesteading on Miller Creek. After he had a new log house built, he returned to Ireland to claim his bride. "Twenty-five years and nine children later, she returned to Ireland for a visit," Mr. Maloney says of his mother.

The Maloneys are presently working at sorting and identifying the picture collection of Mr. Maloney, which includes many locales, events and participants not included in the collection of his wife.

A TALE OF WOE AND A SEASON'S GREETING

To anyone who commits himself (or herself) to getting out a continuing publication, the horror of horrors is failure to publish an issue. A stock story involving the old-time weekly editor, for instance, was that when some irresistible occasion called for celebrating too much, the datelines were changed and the same grist published last week was dished up to the reader again. Our tale of woe is a little different, but for us it was nonetheless sad and worthy of explanation. We got started on the November number of THE MONTANA POST a bit late, but what prevented its publication in plenty of time is still inexplicable. Most of the copy, some of the galley proofs and all illustration went off to our printer in Bozeman by bus; as we go to press, it has still not been found. Thus endeth the tale of woe. By cooperation with the U. S. Postoffice Department, our printer, and our artist, Bob Morgan, we present herewith an expanded November-December issue. With it comes our sincere greetings for a happy holiday season and one small request: when sending petitions above, you might ask that nothing like this happens to us again or to any other editor you might know. (Note from Director: Editor Paladin, as you can see above, is recovering from her recent surgery).

LETTER FROM A STRICKEN PRESIDENT DISCOVERED

Mrs. Lois Hiatt of Lincoln, Montana was amazed to find what appeared to be an original letter, written to his mother by President James A. Garfield a little more than a month after he was shot and a little less than a month before he died on September 19, 1881.

JAMES A. GARFIELD

Mrs. Hiatt was going through some family pictures and decided to remove one group photograph from its frame. Facing the back of the picture was a letter, brown with age, dated Washington, D. C., August 11, 1881. Addressed to Mrs. Eliza Garfield, Hiram, Ohio, the hand-written message, signed "Your loving son, James A. Garfield," was obviously meant to comfort a worried mother. The letter reads: "Don't be disturbed by conflicting reports about my condition. It is true I am still weak and on my back, but I am gaining every day, and need only time and patience to bring me through. Give my love to all the relatives and friends and especially to sisters Hetty and Mary."

Garfield was shot by Charles J. Giteau on July 2, 1881. He was cared for at the White House until by late August it was determined the seashore might improve his condition. He died on September 19 at Elberson, N. J.

Mrs. Hiatt, whose grandparents and father came from Hiram, Ohio, wrote the Library of Congress about the authenticity of the letter she had found. The original letter, she was informed, is at that institution. A number of facsimile copies were made and distributed throughout the country "as showing to the public, not only the President's tender consideration for his mother, but his unshaken courage." It was the only letter the 50-year-old Garfield is known to have written after he was shot.

The family of Seymour Perkins posed in front of their home in Hiram, Ohio, the hometown of President Garfield. Mr. Perkins was the grandfather of Mrs. Lois Hiatt of Lincoln; it was this picture she was removing from its frame when she found the Garfield letter described here.

DAGUE-R-R-R . . . PROBABLY AIN'T SO!

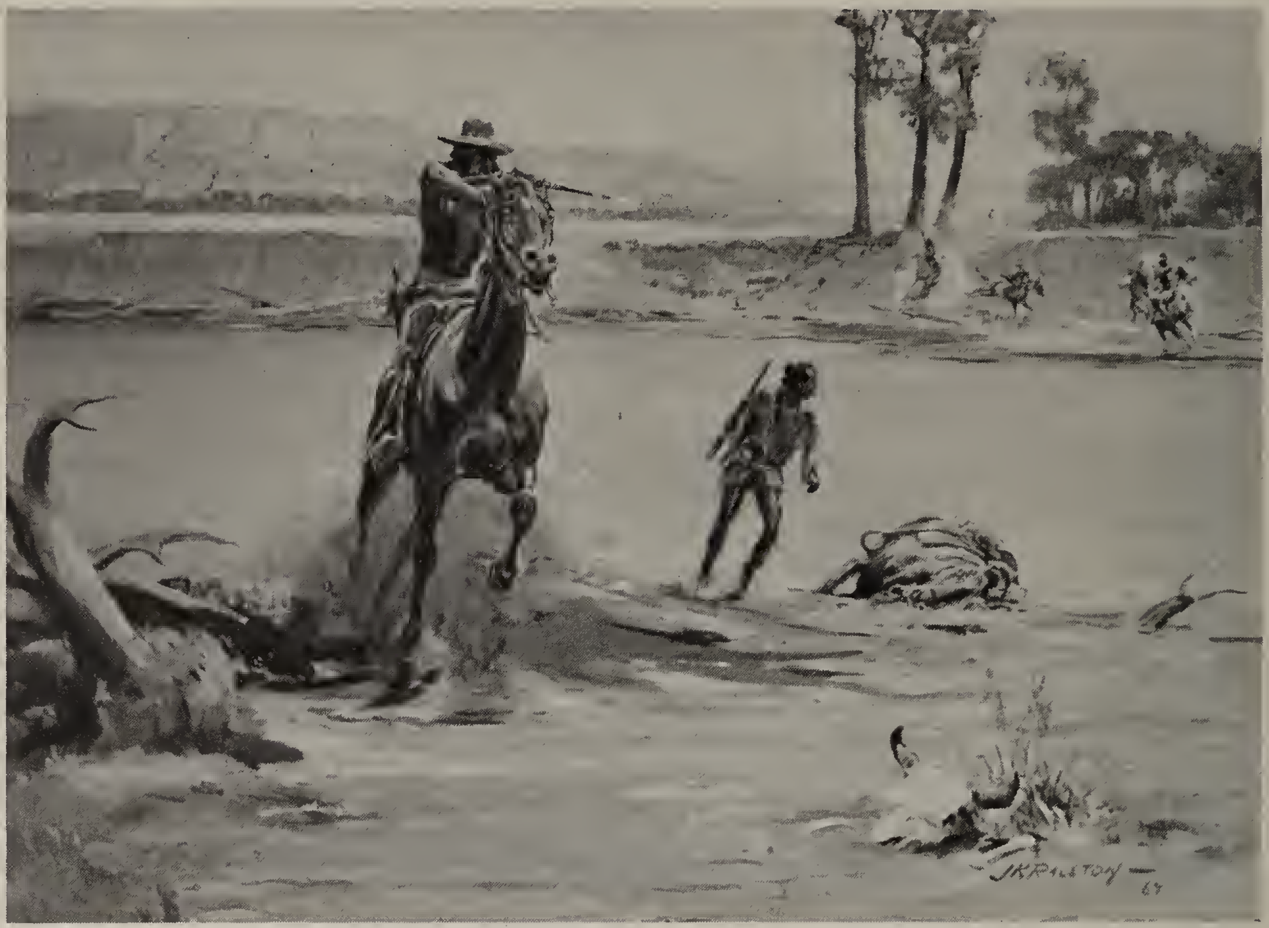
In our September number, we made the hopeful suggestion that Montana's oldest picture, a tintype taken of French Gulch near present-day Anaconda in 1863, had come to the Society. We had not reckoned with the French mode of depiction, the one with the pesky spelling and even peskier pronunciation, the daguerreotype. Nor had we reckoned with the sharp eyes of John C. Ewers, senior ethnologist for the Smithsonian Institution, who promptly wrote us, in part:

"I suppose all one has to do is to state that something is 'believed to be the earliest' of anything to have some kill-joy come along and tell you 't'ain't so—that some diabolical Killroy was there first.

"Certainly that must be the case with Montana's oldest picture. We know that John Mix Stanley was taking daguerreotypes of Blackfoot Indians as early as 1853, as mentioned in Isaac I. Stevens' report of the Pacific Railway Survey. However, much as people have searched in recent years, they have found none of Stanley's 'dags.' But we also know that a member of Reynolds' expedition to the Yellowstone in 1858 took pictures—of Crow Indians if not other subjects. As a matter of fact, F. V. Hayden published drawings made from some of the Crow portraits as early as 1862—the year before your 1863 tintype. And I think I have found prints of some of those 1858 portraits.

"I rather think Stanley was the first to take pictures in Montana, in 1853. But I would not bet the family fortune on it. A year ago I wrote a little paper on some 'dags' of Indians, taken farther down the Missouri, by a man named Easterly, in 1846 or 1847. And we know that John Fremont tried, without much success, to take daguerreotypes on his western explorations some years before that. About the only thing we can be sure of is that the daguerreotype was introduced into America from abroad in 1839. After that it was every man for himself."

RALSTON PAINTING DEPICTS HISTORICAL DRAMA



"Their Ride for Life," a painting of unusually poignant historic interest by Montana's superb historian-artist, J. K. (Ken) Ralston of Billings, was unveiled last month at a Sidney, Montana, bank. Representing the Society at the ceremonies as Mrs. A. C. MacDonald of Glendive, a member of our Board of Trustees.

The 4½ by 5½ foot canvas depicts a hair-raising event on the Yellowstone River in 1877 when a heroic deep-chested Morgan horse named Nig saved his master and a traveling companion from certain death at the hands of hostile Indians.

Bill Cheney, who had arrived in Montana Territory in 1864 as a wagonmaster for General Alfred Sully's campaign, was the main character in the drama. Then working as a woodcutter along the Yellowstone, Cheney had been visiting at Fort Buford, located at the junction of the Yellowstone and Missouri, and was preparing to return to his camp when an itinerant, known only as Smith, asked to join him.

Told to be on the look-out for two dispatch riders sent out from Fort Keogh near present-day Miles City, Cheney and Smith soon found the bodies, freshly scalped, mutilated and stripped. Almost at once, they heard wild whoops as the Indians spotted them.

The men plunged their horses into the Yellowstone, Smith's bay mount gasping in death as they reached the other side. Cheney's gallant Nig carried both men to safety at Fort Buford. For the rest of his life, the big black Morgan received the loving care of Bill Cheney.

Another participant at the unveiling last month was Andrew Hanto, who worked for Cheney in later years and was with him the day in 1912 when Nig died. He described how Cheney went to Sidney to buy two good blankets to cover his horse, how he, Hanto, was directed to build a three-sided coffin, close Nig's eyes against the dirt, and transport the coffin on a stoneboat to the place of burial. Eight years later, Cheney joined his horse in death. He was 81 years old, a quiet "loner" who lived a great deal of Montana history but devoted most of his own remaining years to caring for and remembering a gallant friend. He would have approved Ken Ralston's memorialization.

UNIQUE POST FOR VIVIAN PALADIN

Some interesting "firsts" accrued to the Society at the ninth annual meeting of the Western History Association held in Omaha, Nebraska in October. Editor Vivian Paladin was elected as the first woman, the first Montanan, and the first journalist to membership on the governing council of that organization. She was elected to a three-year term on the 10-member body.

The Western History Association, established at Santa Fe, N. M. in 1961, has a membership of more than 2,000 historians, writers, publishers, collectors, and others interested in the history of the American West. It publishes a quarterly journal, THE AMERICAN WEST, and early next year will launch a scholarly journal, THE WESTERN HISTORICAL QUARTERLY.

The association, which held its annual meeting in Helena in 1965, will meet next year in Reno, Nev., with its tenth anniversary session scheduled for Santa Fe in 1971.

Mrs. Paladin, who has edited the Montana quarterly since 1966, is a native of Glasgow, Mont. and is the former Vivian Hilden. She has worked on newspapers at Glasgow, Shelby, Cut Bank and Havre and attended the School of Journalism at the University of Montana. Married in 1946 to Immigration Officer Jack R. Paladin, she moved to Helena in 1956 and from 1958 to 1966 was associate editor of MONTANA. Since 1965, she has won first place national awards from the National Association of Press Women for her work on the magazine and THE MONTANA POST.

TERRITORY JUNCTION CARPENTER HONORED

John P. Stock, veteran Helena carpenter who translated the historically authentic plans of Curator Robert F. Morgan into the reality of our Territory Junction museum, was named Craftsman of the Year last month by the Helena Society of Architects. Mr. Stock, whose consuming hobby is the collection, polishing, faceting and setting of sapphires and other Montana gems, was at first somewhat taken aback by Curator Morgan's specifications for the village street scene, remarking more than once that he was being challenged at every turn by antique moldings and windows that had to fit and old-fashioned furbelows and sidings. Then he was caught up in the excitement of creating an authentic series of buildings which, complete with wooden sidewalks and lighted street lamps, now transport our visitors back to the 1880's. His kudo, we all agree, was well deserved.

SAM GILLULY ON STEVENS HALL OF FAME COMMITTEE

Director Sam Gilluly has been advised of his appointment to the John F. Stevens Hall of Fame Committee, a body of more than 100 prominent Americans who are seeking the election of Stevens to New York University's Hall of Fame of Great Americans in 1970. At its October meeting, the Society's Board of Trustees issued a formal resolution supporting the move.

John Frank Stevens, later chief design engineer for the Panama Canal, made monumental engineering contributions in Montana and the West, including the routing of the Great Northern Railway over Marias Pass which skirts the southern edge of Glacier Park.

Director Gilluly's appointment to the committee was announced by Gregory S. Prince, executive vice president of the Association of American Railroads, who serves as chairman of the John F. Stevens Hall of Fame Committee.

MUSEUMS ASSOCIATION HAS LIVELY MEETING IN OCTOBER STORM

An early October storm may have limited attendance, but it did not dim the enthusiasm of those present when the Museums Association of Montana held its second annual session on Northern Montana College campus in Havre. President Peter Yegen, Jr., of Billings presided.

Mrs. Toni Hagener, Curator, and members of Havre's and Hill County's board of the H. Earl Clack Museum proved to be friendly and thoughtful hosts for the session. A highlight was a tour of that museum, located on the Hill County fairgrounds immediately west of Havre. It is one of our finer local museums.

Another highlight was a report by President Yegen on what might be called a museum odyssey, a tour by him and Mrs. Yegen of more than a score of Montana institutions displaying the heritage of their areas.

Members chose three new directors and these were later elected to principal offices by the board. President is Dr. Leslie Drew of the Museum of the Rockies, Montana State University, Bozeman. Mrs. Hagener becomes vice president, while Rayworth Howe of the World Museum of Mining, Butte, is the new secretary. Holdover directors are Mr. Yegen and Dr. Wm. Jellison of Hamilton.

Participating in talks and demonstrations from the Montana Historical Society were Director Sam Gilluly, Curator Robert F. Morgan and Assistant Curators Robert D. Gant and Kenneth Gibson. The Society also was represented by Past President E. E. "Boo" MacGilvra of Butte.

An interesting outline of publications issued about Yellowstone National Park was given by William W. Dunmire of the Yellowstone Library and Museums Association. The speaker is also park chief naturalist.

E. B. "Ed" Craney of Butte, longtime museum enthusiast, made specific proposals for Association activities in the future, and these were later approved at a business session. They involve setting up possible scholarships or awards in history, a movement toward cataloging the holdings of all Montana museums and a committee to study means to collect and disseminate information about Montana museums.

NBC TO AIR SPECIAL TV DOCUMENTARY ON CHARLES M. RUSSELL

The National Broadcasting Company's "Project 20" documentary film division will take a fresh look at a great American experience in "The West of Charles Russell," a one-hour color special to be presented on the NBC Television Network on Wednesday, January 7. Show time will be from 10:00 to 11:00 P.M., Eastern time.

"The Montana Historical Society is pleased and proud to have cooperated in this documentary on Montana's great cowboy artist," Director Sam Gilluly comments.

During the past summer, NBC representatives, including Robert Garthwaite and Dan Jones, spent an aggregate of more than a week in the Society's library and galleries in research and photography. This will be reflected in the hour-long production, as will works in other major galleries of the West, including the Charles M. Russell Gallery of Great Falls.

Hundreds of action paintings by Russell will be brought to life by the still-pictures-in-action technique which "Project 20" introduced to television.

Locations in Russell country in Montana filmed include the Judith Basin area, where he was a working cowboy; Great Falls, where he lived and had his studio; Glacier National Park, where he had a lodge on Lake McDonald; Utica, old cowtown; Stanford, another ranching center, and the Square Butte country.

Donald B. Hyatt is producer-director. Electric Companies Advertising Program (ECAP), through N. W. Ayer & Son will have full sponsorship of the special.

LETTER FROM A STRICKEN PRESIDENT DISCOVERED

Mrs. Lois Hiatt of Lincoln, Montana was amazed to find what appeared to be an original letter, written to his mother by President James A. Garfield a little more than a month after he was shot and a little less than a month before he died on September 19, 1881.

JAMES A. GARFIELD

Mrs. Hiatt was going through some family pictures and decided to remove one group photograph from its frame. Facing the back of the picture was a letter, brown with age, dated Washington, D. C., August 11, 1881. Addressed to Mrs. Eliza Garfield, Hiram, Ohio, the hand-written message, signed "Your loving son, James A. Garfield," was obviously meant to comfort a worried mother. The letter reads: "Don't be disturbed by conflicting reports about my condition. It is true I am still weak and on my back, but I am gaining every day, and need only time and patience to bring me through. Give my love to all the relatives and friends and especially to sisters Hetty and Mary."

Garfield was shot by Charles J. Giteau on July 2, 1881. He was cared for at the White House until by late August it was determined the seashore might improve his condition. He died on September 19 at Elberson, N. J.

Mrs. Hiatt, whose grandparents and father came from Hiram, Ohio, wrote the Library of Congress about the authenticity of the letter she had found. The original letter, she was informed, is at that institution. A number of facsimile copies were made and distributed throughout the country "as showing to the public, not only the President's tender consideration for his mother, but his unshaken courage." It was the only letter the 50-year-old Garfield is known to have written after he was shot.

The family of Seymour Perkins posed in front of their home in Hiram, Ohio, the hometown of President Garfield. Mr. Perkins was the grandfather of Mrs. Lois Hiatt of Lincoln; it was this picture she was removing from its frame when she found the Garfield letter described here.

DAGUE-R-R-R . . . PROBABLY AIN'T SO!

In our September number, we made the hopeful suggestion that Montana's oldest picture, a tintype taken of French Gulch near present-day Anaconda in 1863, had come to the Society. We had not reckoned with the French mode of depiction, the one with the pesky spelling and even peskier pronunciation, the daguerreotype. Nor had we reckoned with the sharp eyes of John C. Ewers, senior ethnologist for the Smithsonian Institution, who promptly wrote us. in part:

"I suppose all one has to do is to state that something is 'believed to be the earliest' of anything to have some killjoy come along and tell you 't'ain't so—that some diabolical Killroy was there first.

"Certainly that must be the case with Montana's oldest picture. We know that John Mix Stanley was taking daguerreotypes of Blackfoot Indians as early as 1853, as mentioned in Isaac I. Stevens' report of the Pacific Railway Survey. However, much as people have searched in recent years, they have found none of Stanley's 'dags.' But we also know that a member of Reynolds' expedition to the Yellowstone in 1858 took pictures—of Crow Indians if not other subjects. As a matter of fact, F. V. Hayden published drawings made from some of the Crow portraits as early as 1862—the year before your 1863 tintype. And I think I have found prints of some of those 1858 portraits.

"I rather think Stanley was the first to take pictures in Montana, in 1853. But I would not bet the family fortune on it. A year ago I wrote a little paper on some 'dags' of Indians, taken farther down the Missouri, by a man named Easterly, in 1846 or 1847. And we know that John Fremont tried, without much success, to take daguerreotypes on his western explorations some years before that. About the only thing we can be sure of is that the daguerreotype was introduced into America from abroad in 1839. After that it was every man for himself."

Dialogue with the Director

"Another kind of treasure trove." That is the gratifying phrase used by John K. Hutchens in a recent issue of Saturday Review in devoting a large part of his "One Thing and Another" column to the Montana Historical Society's museum, library, magazine and other adjuncts.

Admittedly, as a former Montanan and one who has deep roots in the Big Sky Country, John Hutchens may be slightly prejudiced. But his comments nonetheless are often echoed by other out-of-staters who didn't begin their lives here. His accolade comes in an authoritative and national publication.

After sketching some of the history of the Treasure State, Mr. Hutchens adds: "Happily, the essence of it all is in the Society's superb museum and its remarkable library, to which writers and researchers by the score are deeply indebted. Hell-roaring, gold-crazy regions like the young Montana are not supposed to have had time to preserve historical materials, but this library got its start at the very first meeting of the Territorial Legislature in 1864 . . ."

The writer also tips his hat to our MONTANA magazine, "a finely written and illustrated quarterly now edited by Vivian A. Paladin. (It is) the most widely circulated state historical society journal in the nation . . ."

Another bow goes to Curator Robert F. Morgan for a museum that "is a wonder, perfectly complementing the library in historic interest." John Hutchens especially likes Bob's new concept in Territory Junction, "the life-size simulation of a frontier town in the 1880's, complete with saloon, jail, pharmacy, general store and newspaper office."

Mr. Hutchens pays his respects to two successive librarians, now retired—Mary K. Dempsey and Mrs. Anne McDonnell. We surmise his first contacts came with them when he was writing his own lively and readable "One Man's Montana," a book that Montanans and others enjoy.

We would like to phrase an invitation to visitors to come and see us and, in Mr. Hutchens' words, "to renew their pride of heritage in Montana as a Territory and a State, if they are Montanans, or if they are not, to marvel at the story they will find here, in the museum and the society's library, of a commonwealth like no other."

—SAM GILLULY.

NUMBER 100,000—On a Thursday afternoon in October, the Society reached 100,000 for its total of 1969 visitors. Shown here admiring a gift Russell print are Mr. and Mrs. William N. Hutchinson of Atherton, California. Mrs. Hutchinson was No. 100,000 through the doors of the galleries and museum this year. Sam Gilluly, Society Director, is shown presenting her with the print. They also received a complimentary subscription to the Society's MONTANA Magazine. The Hutchinsons had come to Helena after a vacation at the E-Bar-L Ranch near Greenough, Montana. "I knew I would enjoy the visit to the museum, but I had no idea it would be this enjoyable," Mrs. Hutchinson remarked. Gilluly said the visitor total this year will far exceed any previous record. The former high was about 103,000 for the entire twelve months of 1967.

Russells In Storage; So Are The Fords

The Historical Society's museum and galleries are going through some necessary changes that come as part of our present wing construction and existing building remodeling.

Now closed until, probably, late spring are two small galleries where Charles Marion Russell art and memorabilia have been displayed. Earlier, it was necessary to close the large Russell gallery when a wall was opened for the new addition. The small galleries are being converted to needed office space for the staff.

All the Society's Russell collection will, in time for the next summer season, be concentrated in one large gallery in the addition. Meanwhile, visitors must forego the pleasure of viewing most of our Russell art.

On the last day of November, residents in our part of town were startled to see more than 30 antique Ford automobiles wend their way up Roberts Street to go into winter storage in our unfinished new addition. This aggregation of Model T's and other vintage Ford cars in mint condition, all included in the Ed Towe Collection, has delighted visitors at 1325 Helena Avenue, some six blocks north of our building. With completion of the addition next summer, they will have prominent display. Meanwhile, the classic vehicles rest with us in somnolent array.

SHELVED WITH PERIODICALS

IT HAS BEEN A RECORD SUMMER at the Society, in terms of visitors and in terms of activity — the latter sometimes frenetic because of our building program and the opening of Territory Junction, street museum on the ground floor level which opened in July.

Between January 2, 1969 and Labor Day, 97,479 persons were counted in our building. During the same period last year, 76,525 persons visited and that was a record until now. This represents an increase of about 28 per cent.

Director Sam Gilluly expressed the view that the record-setting attendance was probably due to the legislative session in Helena this winter, during which members of both chambers and their families were guests at an open house, and the opening of Territory Junction, the newest and largest project in the Society's history. There is also, Director Sam points out, a general increase in interest in the history of the American West.

The opening of Territory Junction broke all attendance records: 2,368 persons toured the street scene of the 1880's the day of its dedication, July 11. On July 12, visitors totaled 1,386, and July 13 saw an additional 1,433, for a week-end total of 5,187. The previous record was set July 13, 1968, when 925 persons visited the museum.

By the end of 1968, a total of 92,820 persons were counted in our building. By mid-September, as we go to press, we predict that the 100,000th visitor of 1969 will have entered our front door.

CONSTRUCTION ON OUR BUILDING ADDITION, meanwhile, continues ahead of schedule and we look forward to its completion next summer. Two additional galleries in the present building will close late this month because of construction procedures. Our largest gallery, the Charles M. Russell Room, has already closed.

Howard Peterson, foreman, said the Gary Cooper Gallery, which previously housed contemporary art displays, and the Pioneer Room, which has displayed memorabilia of Charles M. Russell, will close by the end of September. These rooms will be remodeled to house offices of the director of the Society and the editor of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History.

Architect Bill Kuhr says the formal display areas of the main floor Museum and Territory Junction on the ground floor level will not be closed. He said the Formal Museum may possibly be closed for several day-long intervals when construction crews begin remodeling the main floor entrance area.

During the coming months, the only Russell paintings, sculpture and memorabilia on exhibit will be the few which can be effectively exhibited in the halls and lobby, according to Curator Bob Morgan.

None of the offices, displays or library rooms on the present second and third floors will be closed by the construction. Staff and visitors, meanwhile, have learned to live with the sound of occasional jackhammers as they look forward to very greatly enhanced facilities in less than a year from this late summer of 1969.

New Staff Welcomed: Farewell to College Aides

HAROLD CHAMBERS

ROBERT D. GANT

Reflecting the expanding activities and services at the Society is the recent addition of key people to our Library and Museum staffs. Joining Curator Bob Morgan as Assistant Curator and Registrar is Robert D. Gant, former Curator of the South Dakota State Museum at Pierre, while the Library now has its first full-time cataloguer in the person of Harold Chambers, who recently took his M.A. in library science from the University of Washington.

Gant, who holds a degree in anthropology from the University of South Dakota, comes to us after almost a decade of experience in field archeological and museum operations. He first worked as a laboratory assistant at the W. H. Over Dakota Museum at Vermillion, then spent more than two years with the Nebraska State Historical Society, first as a highway salvage archeologist, then as curator of anthropology. He had been at the Pierre museum for more than a year. Bob is married and the father of two small children.

A native of Bremerton, Wash., Harold Chambers received his B.S. in history from Portland State University. His interest in library science began when he worked part-time for the Oregon Historical Society during his undergraduate days. His interests range from stamp collecting to genealogy, a testimony to his diligence in the latter field being his successful tracing of part of his family tree back to the 1500's. Chambers is married and the father of a daughter, Barbara Jane, one and a half.

Miss Mary Dempsey, who retired in July as Librarian, has returned on a temporary consultative basis, working with the new cataloguer.

The Library staff, now headed by Mrs. Harriett Meloy as Acting Librarian, has also been expanded this summer by the secretarial services of Mrs. Betty Tarvin of Rimini. John Coleman, who completed graduate work in archival science at the University of Montana earlier this year, has rejoined the Library full-time. He and his wife, Paula, welcomed their first child this summer, a son, Jeff David.

Miss Bernice Boone remains in charge of our picture holdings, while Miss Marjorie Virostko, who plans a career in librarianship, is now a full-time library assistant. She graduated with honors from Helena High School in June. Finishing out his fourth year as part-time and summer stack and newspaper files assistant is Ron Drake of Helena who will enter his sophomore year in chemical engineering at Montana State in Bozeman.

Curator Morgan's staff, besides Bob Gant, includes Ken Gibson as Assistant Curator and Preparator. Leaving us this fall after a busy summer in the museum is John Ellingsen of Great Falls, who will begin graduate studies in history at Montana State University, Bozeman.

Effective summer services have also been rendered by a number of other young people: Jan Davis of Missoula, assistant to Editor Vivian Paladin, returns to the University of Montana's School of Journalism as a senior; Margaret (Marty) Munro of Helena, sales and merchandising assistant, will be a senior in the fine arts department of Montana State University, Bozeman; Mike Harrington of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, returns as a senior in chemistry and math at Helena's Carroll College. Brenda Lehfeldt of Helena, also a sales assistant this summer, plans to be married later this year and will enter Northern Montana College at Havre while her husband teaches at Rudyard, near Havre. A voluntary "gal Friday" in the director's office and in sales has been Kitty Smith, Helena High student.

The Society is pleased to welcome back to its halls Raleigh Sheriff of Helena, former building engineer, as a full-time security guard.

Get-Acquainted Theme Set for Museums Meeting

"Let's Get Better Acquainted" will be the appropriate theme, October 11, for the second annual meeting of the Museums Association of Montana to be held in Havre, according to President Peter Yegen, Jr. of Billings. This organization of people involved in some 70 Montana museums and historical groups was launched in Helena last year, with the Historical Society taking an interested and enthusiastic part.

Registration and opening sessions Saturday morning are scheduled for the Math-Science building on the Northern Montana College campus. Following opening remarks by President Yegen, MHS Director Sam Gilluly will give the keynote address in which he will emphasize the necessity of taking the museum out of "isolation" and making it a valid and useful part of the community or region it serves.

Yegen, who with his wife, Zellah, has recently visited some 15 of the museums represented in the organization, will describe his reactions to the progress he has seen and the enthusiasm engendered by all of them.

MHS Curator Bob Morgan will also be an active participant at the Havre sessions, joining Ed Craney of the Greater Montana Foundation, Rayworth F. Howe of the World Museum of Mining in Butte, Dr. Leslie Drew of Museum of the Rockies in Bozeman, Terry Melton of the C. M. Russell Gallery in Great Falls, and other state museum resource people in an informal discussion. He will be a member of an afternoon panel, to be held following lunch at the Elks Club, which will discuss such practical matters as financing, traffic flow, and display techniques. Three board members from the H. Earl Clack Museum in Havre and Mrs. Toni Hagener, curator of that host institution, will also appear on the panel.

Mrs. Hagener will conduct the group on a tour of the Clack Museum, located at the Hill County Fairgrounds, which has received increasing attention since it opened in July, 1964. Two dioramas are by nationally known Bob Scriver of Browning. One depicts an early ranch scene with the Bear's Paw mountains in the background, the other to be installed next spring dramatizes the Battle of the Bear's Paw. The museum, which has as its theme "The History and Development of Havre and the Hi-Line Area," began developing in 1961 with a substantial gift from the Clack family. Since then, private donations of both time and money have resulted in a growing collection, the creation of two more dioramas by James Pasma, Havre artist, and the development of an authenticated buffalo jump site adjacent to the museum building.

THE DRUGSTORE: IT'S NOW COMPLETE

The shelves of the drug store in Territory Junction are filled with the magical medicinal bottles of the 1880's which beckoned the patrons with promises to cure everything from dyspepsia to lost youthful vigor.

Not completed in time for the grand opening of Territory Junction on July 11, the drug store was stocked after Labor Day following the donation of antique bottles and pharmaceutical equipment from Parchen's Drug Store in Helena, one of the state's oldest drug stores, established in 1864.

A glance at the labels of some of the bottles is a wandering back to the time of patent medicines. One bottle sports a label which reads "Starz's Lump Jaw Cure," another proclaims that it is "Wright's Ham and Pickle Sugar Cure," obviously a remedy for an empty larder. Then there is "Pratt's Sore Head Chicken Pox Remedy" which, the label claims, was "the result of careful, scientific investigation by our poultry experts and is fully guaranteed."

The shelves contain numerous items no longer found in a drug store: sperm oil, the basis of many cosmetics today, gasoline (you couldn't buy it at a service station then), liquid glass for the preservation of eggs, imported bay rum hair oil and pure grain alcohol.

A partition separates the prescription department from the rest of the store. A table with mortar and pestle, measuring containers, a complete set of powders and liquids for mixing drugs and elixirs, and a book entitled "Griffith's Universal Formulary," all were tools the old-time druggist needed to compound his potions.

ARONSON PAPERS, RICH RECORD OF A COLORFUL LIFE, COME TO SOCIETY

J. HUGO ARONSON

J. Hugo Aronson, the colorful Swedish-born businessman and lawmaker who became Montana's 13th state governor, has given his extensive personal, business and political papers to the Historical Society Library. According to Archivist John Coleman, they constitute the most complete record in our archives of any Montana chief executive.

Spanning the years 1924 to 1960, the collection includes records of Aronson's heavy moving and construction work in the oilfields near Cut Bank, Mont., his political campaigns for city council, state representative, state senator and governor.

So rich is the collection, Coleman says, that it will furnish research material for the social and political scientists as well as anyone investigating Montana's economic growth, especially the petroleum industry. Moreover, the records reveal the full panoply of Aronson's personality, the colorful and often humorous aspects of a "Swedish boy who made good," who, after two terms as governor, retired in 1960 without ever losing an election.

Dialogue with the Director

Historical Society libraries are known in the profession as "specialized" institutions. How true this is is demonstrated in a memo of some of the recent highlights of services at the Montana library, which was prepared by Acting Librarian Harriett Meloy.

Without mentioning names, we can list some of the topics and purposes of research here in the last month. These compose only a sampling of a busy and purposeful arm of the Society, which many feel is its heart and which certainly was its beginning.

From a Vermont college a writer scanned Montana readings for an anthology. A Tennesseean came to Montana to research a book on Protestant and Catholic Missions among the Blackfeet.

Most distant visitor came from West Germany to study communal settlement among the Hutterites. A New York stater stopped as part of his work on a history of town development in the trans-Missouri west.

Subject of a doctoral dissertation by an Ohioan who visited was "Preservation of the Buffalo." A Montana college student spent part of a month on a thesis topic, "Rural Conservation."

A Californian searched our stacks for two days in preparation for writing a history of the Swan valley of Montana.

Another Montana student wanted to find out about the impact of the 1967 copper strike on the economy of Great Falls.

A scholar traveled from Illinois to get information about Governor Green Clay Smith.

Another Californian successfully sought original source material for his history of exploration of Grand Teton National Park.

These are only a few examples. Daily, the library staff helps many others, fills calls for copies of photographs from our collection (now nearing 25,000). And daily, it answers requests from just plain citizens in Montana and other states who seek family information or who may want to establish birthdates.

Truly, the library is specialized, but its field of service is a broad and expanding one.

SUE BOVEY HOLDS UNIQUE OFFICE

According to records kept by the American Association for State and Local History, we are probably the only historical society in the country which has a woman president. This special designation goes to Mrs. Charles A. (Sue) Bovey of Great Falls, who has headed our Board of Trustees since July 11.

The Association, headquartered in Nashville, Tenn., writes that there are three other statewide organizations which have women as presidents: the Association of Historical Societies of New Hampshire, Maine League of Historical Societies, and the California Genealogical Society. These are, of course, leagues of historical societies and an organization with a specialized interest.

Sue Bovey is unusually qualified by background and interest to fill her responsible post. Granddaughter of the pioneer rancher-banker, Bob Ford, and daughter of the late Lee Ford, she is married to Charles A. Bovey, with whom she has shared the work of restoring Virginia City and, more recently Nevada City, both located on Montana's fabled Alder Gulch.

MONTANA'S OLDEST PICTURE

What is believed to be the earliest picture ever taken in Montana has been donated to the Society by Glanville Smith of Cold Spring, Minn. The tintype, dated August 23, 1863, depicts French Gulch, located some 17 miles from Anaconda, before its rich placers were discovered slightly more than a year later. The gulch, some two and a half miles long, yielded up about a million dollars in gold, some claims running to as much as $300 in a 10-hour shift. By the early 1870's, it was all over. John G. Gill, an Englishman who spent his early years in Kansas and Michigan, came to Montana in the 1860's along with droves of other fortune-seekers. Apparently he did not stay long, for Mr. Smith writes that his Grandfather Gill's connection with Montana was "transitory" and that he later died in Oklahoma.

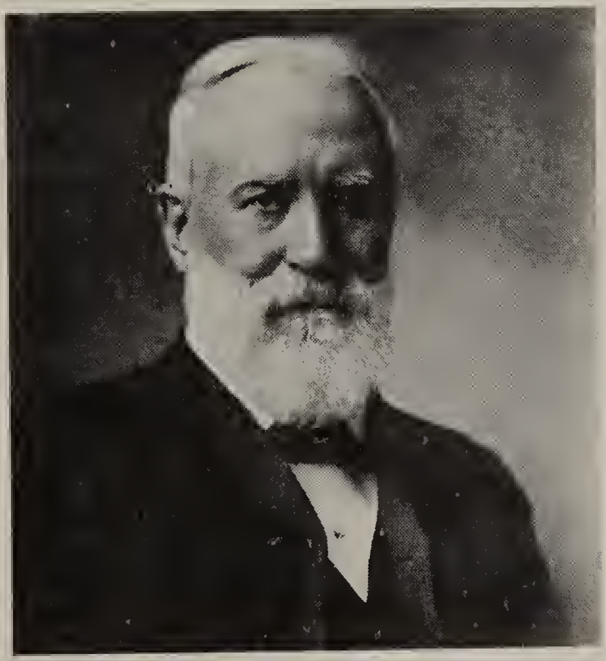
Discovery of Last Chance Gulch and An English Epitaph



REGINALD (BOB) STANLEY

One hundred and five years ago this summer, four discouraged prospectors, down to the last of their flour, returned for the second time to a narrow, winding gulch on Prickly Pear Creek, determined that if they found nothing more than superficial "colors" they would give up and return to Alder Gulch, where Virginia City had sprung up more than a year before and from which they had ventured forth to try other placer diggings.

As evening fell on July 14, 1864, the four men—John Crab, D. J. Miller, John Cowan and Reginald Stanley—put down two test holes to bedrock on either side of the Prickly Pear. The hole on the north side of the stream soon yielded, in the failing daylight, electrifying results: flat pieces of gold rang against the pan "with a music particularly its own, a sound grateful to the ears of the four wanderers."

Last Chance Gulch, soon to be dignified with the name Helena, was born that evening. Describing the scene years later was Reginald (Bob) Stanley, who stayed long enough to gather his stake and to become the first recorder of claims along this fabled gulch. In 1867, he returned to his native England where, in 1914, almost exactly a half century after the discovery, he died at Nuneaton at the age of 76 years.

Inspiring us to take a look again at the discovery of Last Chance Gulch and particularly at this erudite and thoroughly solid Englishman who never lost his interest in the town he helped establish was the recent donation to the Historical Society of a color picture of Reginald Stanley's grave at Nuneaton, the town he served as industrialist and philanthropist for more than 40 years. The picture, seen on the next page was taken by W. L. Greiner of Helena. This young man from Montana, after his tour, has contributed the photo as a gift to our Society.

Reginald Stanley was a somewhat improbable prospector in the western gulches. He had a way with words and a way with people, reflected in his later successes in his family's brick and tile business at Nuneaton, a business he built up to impressive proportions after his return from the Territorial West. He was deeply religious, and a generous benefactor. And, unlike many who "struck it rich," he managed to get his gold safely out of the Territory, to the mint in Philadelphia for coining, and back to Nuneaton for canny investment.

Stanley returned to Helena in 1883, and through the years kept in constant touch with leading Montana citizens, especially the Sanders family and others concerned with preserving the records of the past through the Montana Historical Society.

In September, 1909, members of the Montana Pioneers, intent on marking the 45th anniversary of the Last Chance Gulch discovery, invited Stanley to return once more and participate. Writing his regrets, the Englishman again described the events of July 14, 1864, and added his own feelings about the future of Helena.

He set down the details of how he and his three companions had been headed for the Kootenai country to the northwest when they met returning prospectors who discouraged them from going further, how they had found superficial colors in their pans along Prickly Pear Creek but decided to push northward, prospecting along the Dearborn River and as far as the Marias, always with disappointing results, and with ever-dwindling supplies. He described their decision to try the Prickly Pear again, how the "last chance" test holes brought them to bonanza bedrock.

"We set to and dug holes everywhere after that," Stanley wrote. "We took our time and did it well and chose what we thought was the best ground; then being out of flour, Cowan and Crab went to Alder Gulch to get a supply and bring a whip saw to cut our sluice boxes.

"Whether Cowan and Crab told their friends I don't know but after their return stampedes began in earnest and for a time I was kept busy recording claims, some of the richest being recorded several times. Men would come and men would go, but we kept on digging and sluicing out the gold. Occasionally roving bands of Indians would pay us a visit; besides stealing our horses they did not interfere with us. They would perch themselves on the high bank of the gulch opposite us, and watch us for an hour at a time, toiling in the hot sun, and no doubt thinking what fools we were . . ."

Reginald Stanley was hardly a fool. "Generous in prosperity, brave in adversity, patient in affliction," reads his epitaph in the Old Nuneaton Cemetery. His words about the future of Helena, as he set them down for the Montana Historical Society 60 years ago, indicated that his memory deserves a special epitaph in Montana's capital city:

"The importance attained by Helena has never been a surprise to me, considering the favourable geographical position it occupies . . . In the early days of Last Chance Gulch I had a presentiment that something of the sort might be in the future. I remember climbing the foothill at the back of the camp one Sunday evening, to enjoy the brilliant sunset and the glorious view across the Prickly Pear Valley, and as the shadows fell, I had a vision of the future and pictured to myself the time when the camp of a few log cabins would become a city . . ."

DR. TERRENCE McGLYNN WITH THE COLLE

A series of fortuitous circumstances may well lead to an important historical contribution to Montana history, one which the Historical Society will follow with great interest. Some two months ago, a treasure of correspondence, newspapers, documents and records relating to the Socialist party in Montana was uncovered in Butte by Terrence D. McGlynn, associate professor of humanities and social science at Montana College of Mineral Science and Technology. Six boxes containing more than 5,000 pieces of material had been gathered over the years by a practicing Socialist who lived and died near the Mining City.

Coming along at just the right time was the announcement by the American Association for State and Local History that Dr. Thomas A. Clinch, professor of history at Helena's Carroll College and a member of the editorial board of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, had been awarded a research grant to be used toward continuing his investigations and writings in the field of radical politics in Montana.

Professors McGlynn and Clinch have launched a project of research and writing collaboration, making use of Clinch's deep research into Montana

Historical Publishing To Be National Press Women Convention Highlight

Research, writing, editing and publication of Western History will come in for full treatment at the convention at Billings, the last week in June, of the National Association of Press Women. A feature of Thursday, June 26, will be a panel workshop on this subject, chaired by Hal Stearns of Harlowton, publisher of the Times-Clarion of that city and a member of our Board of Trustees.

Participants will be Editor Vivian Paladin, Librarian Jean Davis of Eastern Montana College in Billings, Mrs. Helen West of Cut Bank, a member of the editorial board of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, and Dr. K. Ross Toole of the department of history, University of Montana, and former director of the Montana Historical Society.

Women journalists representing all media from many parts of the country will be in Billings for this national conclave, held for the first time in Montana.

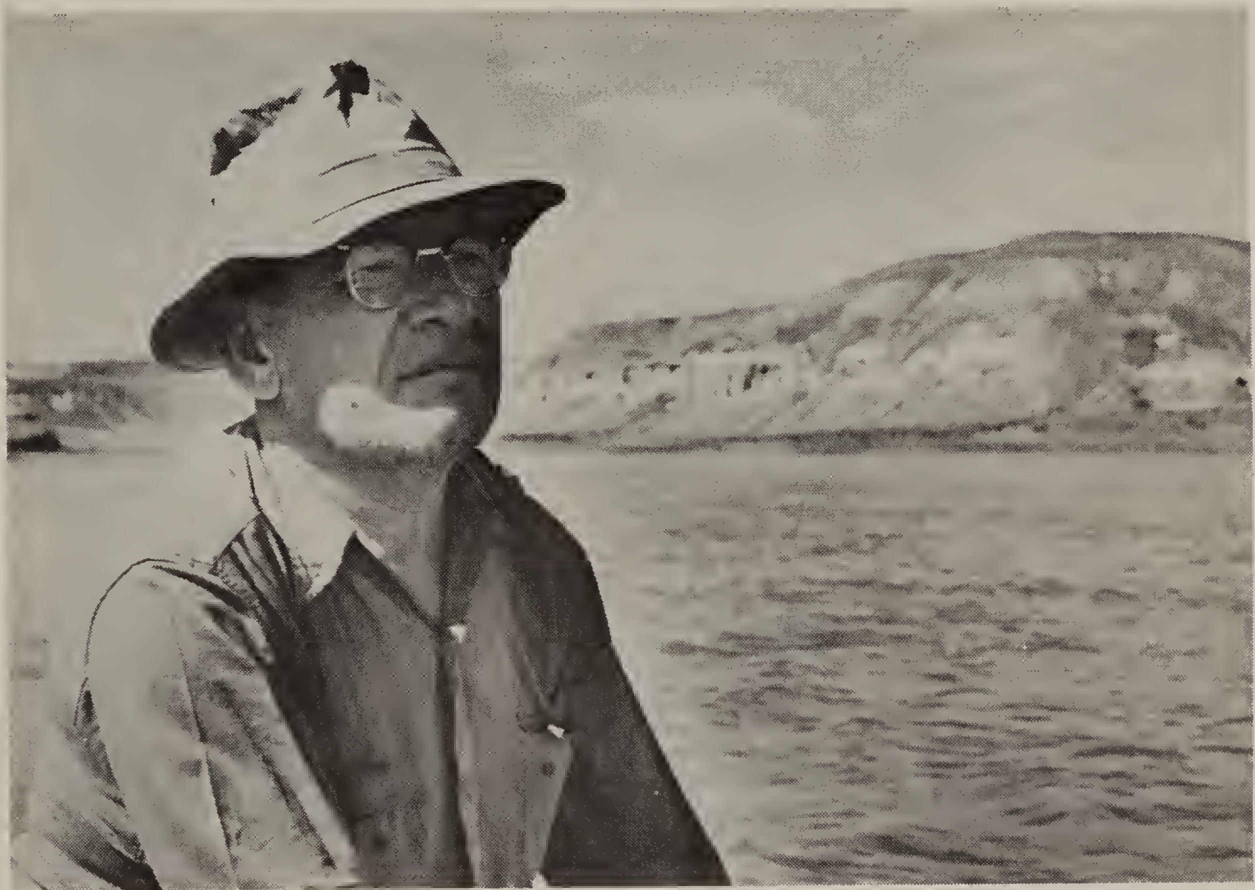
Enhanced Great Falls Gallery Dedicated; Comprehensive Seltzer Show Featured

Curator Bob Morgan represented us at the opening, early last month, of the newly expanded facilities at the C. M. Russell Gallery in Great Falls, an opening climaxed by an impressive art show featuring the work of not only Charles M. Russell but such greats as Paul Gauguin, Winslow Homer, Nicolai Fechin, Paul Klee, Henri Matisse, Frederic Remington and Georges Rouault.

Under the direction of Terry Melton, our sister gallery now boasts more than 10,000 square feet of gallery space. We are proud to have played a part in its opening, through personal participation and sharing original art from the Society's collection for the opening events, which coincided, incidentally, with the 105th anniversary of C. M. Russell's birth.

As we go to press, we are informed that an excellent cross-section showing of the work of Olaf C. Seltzer has been hung in the newly enlarged gallery facilities in Great Falls. Some 40 Seltzer pieces, including oils, water colors and pen sketches, will be on view through August 24. Twenty-one of these are from the personal collection of Mr. and Mrs. Carl Seltzer, son and daughter-in-law of the artist, and among this group is a fine oil, THE FALLEN MONARCH, painted for Amelia Earhart Putnam but never delivered because of the disappearance of the famed aviatrix over the Pacific in 1937. This depiction of an elk hunt in Wyoming will be reproduced in full color on the front cover of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY this fall.

Death Claims Big Muddy Authority; Society to House DonTigny Material



Montana lost one of her most knowledgable boosters with the recent death at Havre of Emil DonTigny, theatre owner whose over-riding interest for many years was the navigation and study of the Missouri River, particularly the historic portion between Virgelle Ferry and the Fred Robinson Bridge to the east. For many years, this engaging man conducted tours of leaders in wildlife conservation, wilderness enthusiasts, and members of such groups as the National Park Service and National Geographic Society along this wilderness waterway, giving them the benefit of his knowledge of its history and tricky meanderings.

Just as we go to press, we are informed by Board Member Hal Stearns of Harlowton that Mrs. DonTigny and her family have expressed a wish that some 800 color slides, leather-covered maps of the Missouri, along with voluminous notes, be placed in the Montana Historical Society archives. They will be a fitting memorial to a man who transplanted an interest in the swift currents of the Missouri, traversed and recorded by Lewis and Clark, into an important avocation.

The "Russell Trail" has been enhanced in the past month with opening of new wings in the C. M. Russell Gallery in Great Falls (see story elsewhere) and the Whitney Gallery in Cody.

But spring in Montana has seen a purely Montana outbreak of historical and museum activity that reflects the continued and healthy growth of interest in this field among Montanans. Clippings and personal experiences prompt us to record, although fragmentarily, some of these happenings.

Scheduled for opening Sunday, June 29, is the Sheridan County Historical Society's new museum in Plentywood. The same Society is at work on plans for a regional history . . . Miles City Star reports that it now has two top tourist attractions in its Range Riders and Fort Keogh Museums . . . the latter is in a house originally built at Fort Keogh in 1877 . . .

Lewistown's Central Montana Museum is "touching up" for the summer season . . . Toni Hagener, Curator, has announced daily opening hours for the H. Earl Clack Memorial Museum in Havre . . . At Fort Benton's fine community museum, work is planned in cataloging, indexing and preservation . . . New addition to the Beaverhead County Museum in Dillon was opened this month (it features period rooms) . . . Mondak Historical and Arts Society in Sidney is moving toward construction of its J. K. Ralston Museum, which takes the name of a great Montanan and artist . . .

Recent meeting of the O'Fallon Historical Society in Baker saw reports on collections of materials and preliminary plans discussed for a history . . . A dinner in Terry brought reports of the Prairie History Committee's plan for publication . . . Valley County Historical Society has appointed a building committee for its Glasgow museum . . . a site already has been obtained . . .

Bitterroot Valley historians are combining efforts there leading toward book publication . . . work is well along on a manuscript . . . Headline in the Big Timber Pioneer asks: "A Museum for Big Timber?" . . . The Lions Club there is researching possibilities . . . The story could go on for another column.

Here in Helena, the Montana Historical Society looks forward on Friday, July 11 to the official opening of its new Territory Junction, a street of the '80's, conceived and planned by Curator Bob Morgan. This is the largest single museum project in the Society's history. And our new building wing construction is well ahead of schedule.

Marjorie Virostko, who has been an able part-time assistant in the Historical Society Library the past three years, graduated this month from Helena High School after a memorable academic year which saw her voted to membership in the National Honor Society. Marjorie, who plans a career in librarianship, has now begun full-time duties with us, to continue throughout the coming year.

Ken Gibson, assistant to Curator Bob Morgan, puts finishing touches to the Territorial jail building as completion looms for the frontier street museum on our ground floor level. Gibson, who joined the curatorial staff several months ago, has been involved in a remarkable range of projects: log chinking, sod roofing, painting and staining and polishing.

Jackhammers stuttered and powersaws whined as two major projects at the Montana Historical Society were reaching high gear this Spring. Basic construction is virtually complete on the last two business establishments in the frontier street museum on the lower level of our present structure, while concrete footings and walls are being poured outside for the two-story addition to occupy space once used for loading and unloading and parking. It is, withal, a noisy and exciting business.

As we go to press, interior work is advancing on such Territorial business places as the jewelry store, jail, dentist's office, newspaper and job printing plant, gun and saddle shop, and the Wells Fargo stage station.

The Dental Parlor, sign carrying the names of pioneer dentists, Drs. Kenck and Cole, is finished with antique wall paper, historic woodwork and lamps and furnished with dental equipment, vintage 1870's and 1880's, from the collection of Dr. T. C. Betzner of Helena. There is a remarkable portable chair, covered with red plush and equipped with heavy spittoon, a foot-driven drill, a Gasometer which once dispensed nitrous oxide gas to drown out the pain inflicted by the forbidding array of pliers and other tools.

As Curator Morgan daily adds authentic signs, wooden sidewalks and street lamps, the area is taking on a nastalgic fascination that already transports the viewer back to earlier, more placid times.

Beehive activity on the Society's addition is seen in these two pictures, taken from the roof of our existing building by Marv Kalland and Garry Wunderwald of the Montana Highway Department. Contractors are stepping up progress on the two-level addition which will provide enlarged exhibit, archival and work areas and result in expansion of all existing facilities.

100 YEARS AGO: THE FATEFUL GOLDEN SPIKE

Dignitaries were slated to gather again on May 10, 1969, to mark the centennial of one of Western America's momentous events: the joining of two great transcontinental rail lines, the Union Pacific and Central Pacific, at Promontory Point, some 30 miles west of Brigham City, Utah. This site, developed and maintained by the National Park Service as a National Historic Site, will once more be the scene of commemoration and celebration. Because Montana had such a stake in this event, we publish the following historical sketch, which reveals that at least one Territorial newspaper, THE MONTANA POST, had some realization of just how important that stake was.

At high noon on May 10, 1869, steel touched steel at Promontory Point, far out on the sparse wastes of Northern Utah. It was an event that was to profoundly effect the economic future of Montana, although it was but mildly noted, officially or unofficially, by the Territory which had been in existence a scant five years and had depended solely on river and overland freight wagons for importing supplies and exporting the wealth of its mines.

Central Pacific rails lengthening eastward from Sacramento City and Union Pacific rails westward from Omaha had, in their competitive haste, overshot each other. But both lines agreed that the site for actual joining of the rails would be at Promontory, a raw settlement of tents which was to have but a brief, frenetic life after the terminus was moved to Ogden in November, 1869.

President Lincoln's signature on the Pacific Railroad Act had started this historic construction race, although work did not begin on both ends until 1863. Although the Civil War seriously delayed progress, postwar spurts saw 1,775 miles of railroad built through raw, rugged country in less than four years, with the most rudimentary tools and equipment, but with almost unlimited labor.

Previous railroad construction east of Omaha now meant a solid rail link between the coasts for the first time. But even more important to Montana was the intriguing possibility of receiving goods and passengers from eastern states and the California coast by rail to Northern Utah, thence by freight wagon and stagecoach to the fast-growing goldfields of Southwestern Montana, including Helena and Virginia City.

President Leland Stanford of Central Pacific and Vice President Thomas C. Durant of Union Pacific represented their respective roads at the Golden Spike ceremonies on May 10, 1869. To them Acting Governor James Tufts of Montana wired from his offices at Virginia City:

"Montana rejoices at the completion of the great Continental thoroughfare and bides her time for an early connection with it." Obviously, Tufts had his eye on a new commercial connection to replace—or at least supplement—the historic route by water to Fort Benton and overland to the mines.

THE MONTANA POST, Montana's influential territorial newspaper published at Helena, noted in its May 14, 1869, issue: ". . . at high noon, the last rail was laid and spiked, connecting the Union and Central Pacific railroads. It was the completing of an enterprise fraught with more interest than the tunnelling of Mount Cenis or connecting the Red and Mediterranean seas by the Suez Canal."

THE POST topped this flowery language with the following: "Down in the deserts of Utah we have rumors of gold spikes, and silver spikes, diamond eyes, ruby lips, alabaster necks, sparkling vintages, wit, sentiment and what not, that graced the occasion and fastened the rail. Success to the great enterprise and a volunteer toast from Montana. May the ties between East and West never be lessened, the Union be Pacific, the Central approach the East and this modern Colossus of Roads be but the pioneer of a no(r)ther." The last referred, of course, to a hoped-for connection with Montana.

The take-off point for Montana was hotly debated between Ogden, Corinne or Promontory Point itself, the THE POST commented: "All coincide that at some point near the head of the Lake, a large permanent and prosperous city will be built up, the diverging point for Montana and the metropolis of the Great Basin."

It turned out to be Corinne, just north of Brigham City, where wagons picked up bales and barrels of goods along the right-of-way and began their way north along the already well-established Stansbury Trail. The trail led through Idaho Falls, up the Snake River by Camas Creek to Beaver Canyon, over Monida Pass into Montana, down Red Rock Creek to Deer Lodge or Virginia City, then to Helena from either place.

It was a long, dusty, but profitable route; in 1877, a peak year, the trail brought 5,700 tons of freight into Idaho and Montana and hauled out 1,128 tons of ore.

By December 10, 1878, it was all over, for the Utah Northern rails, inching north from Ogden, reached Blackfoot, Idaho and bypassed little Corinne.

The flow of commerce to Montana and Idaho had changed, however — changed for all time away from the river route. In 1879, when Utah Northern rails crossed Monida Pass into Montana, the pattern of communication was well established. It was a far cry from the electronic computer operation of Union Pacific and Southern Pacific today, but it was life and blood and hope for Territorial Montana 100 years ago this month.

INSURANCE SALESMANSHIP, OVER 90 YEARS AGO, LED TO $40,000 PAY-OFF TO CUSTER BENEFICIARIES

Visual evidence that Lt.-Col. George A. Custer and five of his fellow cavalry officers took out insurance policies on their lives from two to three years before they met death at the Little Big Horn forms part of a fascinating documentary display presented to the Montana Historical Society last month by the New York Life Insurance Company, which this year celebrates its business centennial in Montana.

Dudley Dowell, general agent for the company at Butte from 1929 to 1936 and now its president with headquarters in New York City, made the presentation at a recent gathering in the Mining City at which he was guest of honor. Accepting for the Society were Director Sam Gilluly and E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra, a member of our Board of Trustees.

Dowell explained that the insurance policies, all sold by Agent I. F. A. Studdart, carried an Indian war clause: if the policy holder was killed fighting Indians an extra premium of $25 per $1,000 would be collected retroactively and deducted from the proceeds paid the beneficiary. This explains why Custer's widow, Elizabeth, was paid $4,750.00 five months after the disaster instead of the full $5,000 which her husband's Policy #106,707 carried.

The display contains copies of Custer's policy and the cancelled check cashed by his widow. Then there is a roster of New York Life policies issued during this period, in itself a dramatic record of history. Following a list of five policy-holders who died of such ailments as "dilation of the heart," "congestive chill," "cancer of the liver" and "consumption," there the six Cavalry officers whose names are secure in history. Cause of death: "killed at the Battle of the Big Horn, M.T., June 25, 1876."

Agent Studdart sold all the policies at Fort Abraham Lincoln, near present-day Bismarck, N. D., except for one, issued to Lt. John J. Crittenden at Fort Ripley, Minn. The 25-year-old Crittenden bought his policy on May 12, 1876, naming his mother as beneficiary and unaware that when he joined his command at Fort Abraham Lincoln he had a month and a half to live.

Other names on the roster, and the vital data: Lt. James Calhoun, aged 29, policy issued June 1, 1874, wife beneficiary; Capt. George W. Yates, aged 33, policy dated June 1, 1874, wife beneficiary; Lt. James E. Porter, aged 27, policy dated May 19, 1874, wife beneficiary. Finally, on the roster, is the name Myles W. Keogh, the courageous Irish trooper who bought his policy earlier than the others, on June 13, 1873. He gave his age as 31 and listed "self" in the beneficiary column.

Dowell explained to his Butte audience that the insurance company sent agents along the westward-pushing railroads to sell insurance to settlers and soldiers to protect them against the hazzards of Indians and desperadoes. The disaster at the Little Big Horn cost the company some $40,000 as a result of the assiduous salesmanship of Agent I. F. A. Studdart.

"Blackfoot" or "Blackfeet?" When the writer was a Montana newsman in the days when every sheet worthy of its salt had a "style book," these two spellings were debated. We were reminded that historians and ethnologists have discussed the same question when we came across, in our library, a 1955 letter written by Dr. John C. Ewers, now senior ethnologist at the Smithsonian Institution, to Dr. Merrill G. Burlingame of Bozeman. Dr. Burlingame is now President of the Montana Historical Society.

Dr. Ewers lived and worked on Montana's Blackfeet Reservation for some years and no doubt is the greatest authority on that tribe. His letter indicates that the whole problem may not be important as a practical one because "no one is really misled" whether "one uses FOOT or FEET . . ."

Dr. Ewers' letter does add an interesting footnote to the tribal history. In the 1940's, when he was preparing two popular booklets on those Indians for school use, the question came up of "FOOT" or "FEET."

Dr. Ewers made a date with the tribal council to discuss the matter. Several older men got up and testified that the proper translation of the Native name of Siksiksa is "BlackFOOT." The council was just about to vote on the matter and confirm this version, when a sharp young rancher got up and pointed out that the tribe operated under a constitution where the name was given as the BlackFEET tribe of Indians. The young man suggested that unless the council wanted to go to the trouble and expense of changing the constitution, maybe it ought to stay on record as favoring "BlackFEET." And so the council voted unanimously for FEET.

Dr. Ewers added that the Bureau of American Ethnology, in a study of the two forms, came up with the conclusion that both were used in about equal amounts. If the Black (foot) (feet) can't be sure, how can the whites?

The Society was represented in Boise last month at the 22nd annual Pacific Northwest History Conference with program participation by Editor Vivian Paladin and Dr. Merrill Burlingame.

Dr. Burlingame, emeritus professor of history at Montana State University, was chairman of a session devoted to "Conservation in the Progressive Era," held Friday morning, April 11, during which two papers on forestry and conservation were read and evaluated.

Vivian was a member of a panel which discussed publishing regional history Friday afternoon. This session, chaired by Dr. Herman J. Deutsch of Washington State University, was an informal dialogue about the techniques of historical research and writing and the practical aspects of publishing.

Society Publications Get First Place Awards

First place awards were won by both MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY and the MONTANA POST in the annual writing contest of the Montana Press Women, it was announced last month in Billings. Both publications have thus been entered in the national competition, with results to be announced at the convention of the National Association of Press Women to be held in Billings in June.

Compressed History of Montana Now Available

The Historical Society recently received copies of "MONTANA: An Illustrated History," by Mrs. Myrtle Mockel, Billings teacher and author, who wrote the book as part of a series envisioned by the late Allan Swallow of Sage Books, Chicago, on histories of the Northwestern states.

Illustrated with more than 40 pictures and eight maps and charts, Mrs. Mockel's text is succinct, yet covers the highlights of Montana's past from the prehistoric to the present. It is available from us at $2.50 for paperback and $5.00 for the clothbound edition.

CHANGING OF THE GUARD:

Mel Hallauer Succeeds Stacy Jerome at Society

There was a "changing of the guard" last month in the Society's main floor lobby as the time for retirement came for Stacy Jerome and his replacement by Melvin Hallauer, a native of Maple Creek, Sask. who has adopted this country and its history with equal enthusiasm.

Jerome, born in Glen Ullin, N. Dak., has been a Montanan since 1925, when he began a long career as cattle rancher and all-around cowboy near Great Falls. His interest in the work of C. M. Russell began around that time, when he heard the Cowboy Artist "spin tall tales" at the Mint Saloon, although Stacy is not one of those who claims he knew him well.

Married to the former Hattie Poore in 1929, Stacy operated a cattle ranch in the Little Belt mountains for a number of years, later on Smith River near White Sulphur Springs. The family (including two sons and three daughters) moved to Helena in July, 1955 and shortly thereafter, Jerome came to the Society as salesman and guard. He continued at his cowboy trade, however, and is known as one of Montana's expert horse breakers. He and his wife plan to make their home on acreage near Livingston.

Hallauer has lived in a number of western states since coming to this country from Canada in 1950. He graduated from high school in Colorado Springs, Colo. in 1960, and was married in 1963 to Mary McLaughlin of Dillon, a registered nurse. They are the parents of a son and daughter.

Mel Hallauer has developed a deep interest in western history, an outgrowth of an earlier enthusiasm for history of the American Revolution and Civil War. His career background, however, has been in sales. His flair for both salemanship and history should serve him well in his duties here.

The Grand Opening: Territory Junction

Governor Forrest H. Anderson cut the ribbon leading to our ground floor level on Friday, July 11, officially opening Territory Junction, the Society's largest creative project in recent years. Meg Duffy, left, daughter of Business Manager Richard Duffy, and Susan Morgan, daughter of Curator Robert Morgan, held the ribbon. After the street scene of the 1880's was opened, below, four members of the Society's Board of Trustees mingled with the crowds which eventually totaled more than 5,000 for the opening week-end. Dr. Ray O. Bjork, Helena, extreme left, chats with his wife as a woman visitor points out an attraction to Judge Ben Harwood, Billings, and Mrs. C. A. Bovey, extreme right, newly-elected president of the Board. W. B. (Junior) Spear, Kirby, veteran Board member, is in the left background and wearing a name tag. Since the formal opening, a record number of visitors have viewed the 13 business establishments which make up this typical frontier street scene, designed by Curator Morgan to depict life in Montana between Territorial days and Statehood in 1889.

Board Welcomes Two New Members; Mrs. Sue Bovey Elected President

MRS. MARIE MacDONALD

WILBUR P. WERNER

Mrs. A. C. (Marie) MacDonald, Glendive librarian and author, and Wilbur P. Werner, Cut Bank attorney, joined the Society's Board of Trustees this Summer, succeeding Mrs. Virginia Anderson of Missoula and O'Neil Jones of Bigfork.

At its business meeting July 11, the Board elected Mrs. C. A. Bovey of Great Falls to succeed Dr. M. G. Burlingame of Bozeman as president. Harold G. Stearns of Harlowton was elected vice president and Newell Gough, Jr. of Helena, secretary. The officers will be joined by Branson G. Stevenson of Great Falls and Werner on the Executive Committee.

Mrs. MacDonald, wife of a Glendive dentist and mother of two sons and four daughters, is a native of Great Falls. Her father, P. G. Peterson, pioneer builder and rancher, homesteaded in the Highwood area near Belt in 1903. His daughter received most of her education in country schools, graduating from Highwood High School, followed by a year at the University of Montana.

After a period of teaching in rural schools near Highwood, she attended the University of Minnesota from which she graduated magna cum laude and with a Phi Beta Kappa key, with a major in English and a minor in history. She taught English for a time at Carter County High School in Ekalaka, Mont., and in 1941 married Dr. A. C. MacDonald in Minneapolis. They lived in Minneapolis until 1947, when they came to Glendive.

Mrs. MacDonald, who has served as librarian at Glendive Public Library since 1964, is the author of two historical books: "After Barbed Wire," a comprehensive study of Montana homesteading, published in 1963, and "Glendive: The History of a Montana Town," published in 1968.

Wilbur P. Werner, who has practiced law in Cut Bank since May, 1937, is a native of Fall City, Nebraska. After graduation from Sacred Heart Academy in that city, he attended Creighton University and the University of Omaha, taking his law degree from the latter university in 1935.

During his college career, Werner worked for the Federal Land Bank in Omaha. He passed the Montana Bar in 1937, and he and his wife, whom he married in 1935, came at once to Cut Bank, where they have since made their home.

Werner, a civic leader in the Northern Montana oil city for many years, tells us he has long been interested in the history of his adopted state, especially so since he began working with Boy Scout troops in tracing some of the historic trails, including the famous Whoop-Up Trail, which runs north into Canada and which figured prominently in the earliest years of Montana-Alberta history.

ANOTHER FIRST FOR MONTANA MAGAZINE

MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY received its fourth first place award from the National Federation of Press Women, this time as the group held its first national convention in Montana—in Billings the last week of June. Editor Vivian Paladin, who has received similar awards for THE MONTANA POST and other Historical Society publications, was a finalist as well this year from a field of more than 300 women journalists for the title of National Woman of Achievement.

MRS. VIVIAN PALADIN

The Society was well represented at the Billings conclave. Board Member Hal Stearns of Harlowton chaired a panel on historical research, writing and publication, leading some exciting and informative conversation on the subject. Panelists included Mrs. Jean Davis, head librarian for Eastern Montana College in Billings, Dr. K. Ross Toole, professor of history at the University of Montana and former Director of the Society, and Editor Paladin.

From Across Montana: Museum News Tidbits

Museum of the Plains Indian at Browning opened a new exhibition facility for displaying arts and crafts last month, with an imposing introductory showing of more than 50 works of art by contemporary Indian painters. The sales-exhibit area was organized for the Museum and Craft Center by the Blackfeet Art Foundation of Browning, a nonprofit corporation organized to encourage arts and crafts among both Indians and non-Indians.

Grand openings this Summer include Sheridan County Museum in Plentywood and the Liberty County Museum in Chester, both to overflow attendances. Interest is increasing, too, in the Poplar Museum, which has exhibits depicting the colorful history of the home of the Assiniboine-Sioux, from the early fur-trade period, Indian wars, and finally its designation as the Indian Agency site.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

Elsewhere in this issue of The Post you will read about the gala opening of the Society's Territory Junction, street scene of the '80's, which is the largest single museum project in our history.

One of the happiest facets of this project, from our staff standpoint, came in the gifts and offers of gifts that poured in from all over Montana and the Northwest. Many of these were accepted and are now in place in the stores, offices and other establishments of our old-time street.

We would like to share with you the story of one gift, as it was told to us by an old time Montana resident, Mrs. Mollie Sedgwick of Kalispell. It is typical of those that came with many of the relics we received, and it brings with it a touch of nostalgia for old times and happenings. Mrs. Sedgwick's letter:

"I am sending you a relic—shall I say—from Fort Benton, which I am hoping you can use in your Territory Junction . . .

"It is a 'fly-net' used by Mr. Charlie Ayers on his old delivery horse—Barney—a big red roan, which he drove to his high-seated delivery wagon when I was a child . . . I believe he bought the 'fly-net' from Mr. Joe Sullivan, the harness (maker) and saddler. I knew them both very well, as I was born in Fort Benton June 8, 1885. My parents were Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Culberson, who owned and ran the Pacific Hotel.

"Father borrowed the horse and wagon Dec. 23, 1891, to get ground juniper which grew in the coulee across the (Missouri) river on the road to Highwood. That year we did not have a Christmas tree . . . So Helen, Mabel and Rob went with Father. Rob had to stay in the wagon while the evergreens were cut. Old Barney stood quietly, then started to back up. The wagon upset on the narrow road and the high seat protected Rob from being crushed, although he did break his arm. All this and more I do remember.

"Anyway, I hope you can use the 'fly-net.' Many were made of heavy cord—some were brightly covered, also had bright tassels on them. But this leather one was used for utility."

As you look at the net in our gun and saddle shop, think of Barney in horse heaven—or the other place. And we at MHS will think of the kindness of Mrs. Mollie Sedgwick and many more thoughtful persons like her who have helped to furnish Territory Junction.

BOARD AND STAFF SAY WELL DONE TO LIBRARIAN MARY K. DEMPSEY

There was nostalgia and a spirit of "a job well done" in the air Thursday evening, July 10, as more than 50 members of the staff and Board of Trustees honored retiring Librarian Mary K. Dempsey. Miss Dempsey's more than a decade of professional librarianship was noted by a number of planned and extemporaneous expressions at the dining room at Frontier Town, high on MacDonald Pass west of Helena.

Mistress of Ceremonies was Mrs. Harriet Meloy, Assistant Librarian who now assumes duties as Acting Librarian. Among those introduced for remarks were Mrs. A. C. MacDonald of Glendive, newly appointed member of the Board of Trustees, Dr. M. G. Burlingame of Bozeman, outgoing president of the Board, and Mrs. Vivian Paladin, editor of the magazine and THE POST, publications benefited by the research leadership of Miss Dempsey.

Director Sam Gilluly is pictured here as he presented the guest of honor with a Montana sapphire, a gift from the staff and Board.

A native of Manistee, Mich., Miss Dempsey received her B.A. from St. Mary-of-the-Wood College in Indiana and her B.S. and M.S. degrees from Columbia. She served for more than 13 years in the New York Public Library, followed by 10 years as Director of Libraries for Marquette University in Milwaukee. She came to Helena in October, 1959.

While her plans for the future are not yet definite, the Society is pleased to know that it may draw on the vast experience and professionalism of Mary Dempsey on a consultive basis for some months to come.

Two Helena Men Donate Results of Their Craft to Society

Just as we go to press, Montana is getting her first glimpse of spring after a winter so memorable that we have received some dubious nationwide publicity. At the Montana Historical Society, snows are melting from the area at the back of the building, where for the first time in many weeks, staff people are able to park their cars. But not for long: disappearance of the snowbanks saw the start of construction on the two-story addition to our building, a project long in the planning and bidding stages. The end of the 41st Legislative Assembly has also brought our hoped-for appropriations; thus a renewed spirit of "let's get it done" pervades our halls.

The Society, as reported in these columns, is constantly receiving materials in the form of records, artifacts, objects of art and pictures. In recent weeks, we have received items from two Helena men. While their intrinsic value cannot be compared with Russell originals, the stories of both men are in themselves vignettes of history. Moreover, both have brought a quality of craftsmanship to their fields, a quality which seems ever rarer in this day of mechanized haste.

The men are Leslie H. Jorud, Helena's long-time photographer who has creatively recorded the Montana capital scene for more than 60 years, and Adolph Deschenes, who retired last month after a 50-year career as a pressman—a trade to which he brought the patient touch of craftsmanship, beginning with his youthful work in reproducing the art of C. M. Russell.

From Photographer Jorud has come a collection of 84 photographs, most of them greatly enlarged views of Helena and its people from before World War I, while Pressman Deschenes presented a four-color print of C. M. Russell's last Christmas card, printed in 1926 at the Murphy-Cheely plant in Butte, where 22-year-old Deschenes was the pressman.

Les Jorud is a native of Helena; his first photography was with a pinhole camera and shutter he made himself when he was about eight years old. At the age of about 14, he saved $2.00 with which to buy a Brownie camera, graduating swiftly to more sophisticated equipment. Subjects ranged from neighbors and friends of his boyhood to such celebrities as Gary Cooper, Charles Lindbergh, Teddy Roosevelt, Amelia Earhart, Will Rogers and Myrna Loy.

Included in the Jorud collection are pictures of Helena's disastrous earthquakes of the 1930's, a magnificent eclipse of the sun, Montana's heroes of two World Wars, filmed on Helena's famous Last Chance Gulch.

Jorud went to work at a commercial photography shop in 1916, and after a stint with the Army Tank Corps in 1918, returned to work for 12 years as photographic processor. Just as the Depression was getting underway in 1930, he and his wife launched their own photo shop on Last Chance Gulch, which they sold in 1947. In that year, however, he moved his camera and equipment to historic Jackson Street, just behind the Gulch, and has since devoted himself to commercial work and, most importantly, to copying and cataloging historic pictures.

Les Jorud has been, literally, a lifesaver to us at the Historical Society on many occasions because of his careful skill at copying old pictures. When we find a faded old brown photograph, for instance, which we want to use in MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, Les usually succeeds in improving the quality of contrast and detail. His recent donation of fine pictures from his collection only enhances his contribution to us over a span of many years.

Adolph Deschenes, born in Butte in 1904, has been a pressman since he was 16 years old, when he went to work for the commercial department of W. A. Clark's Butte Miner.

He received his journeyman's union card in 1923, and two years later went to Great Falls as pressman for the Tribune. In 1926, he returned to Butte to work for the Murphy-Cheely plant on East Broadway. The late William L. Murphy, a close friend of Artist C. M. Russell, acquired reproduction rights to two subjects, AMERICA'S FIRST PRINTER, and Russell's last Christmas card, both of them done in 1926, the last year of Russell's life.

LES JORUD, photographed in his studio by Gordon Warren, Helena Independent-Record reporter who recently wrote a feature article for his paper on the veteran photographer. Jorud is standing beside a photostat machine, built many years ago but which Jorud has now converted to use as a copy camera.

ADOLPH DESCHENES, retired pressman who printed four-color prints of Russell subjects during the artist's lifetime, stands beside one of the magnificent clocks which he handcrafted and which he has turned into an enthralling avocation.

PRESSMAN DESCHENES "TOO FUSSY" FOR RUSSELL; JORU

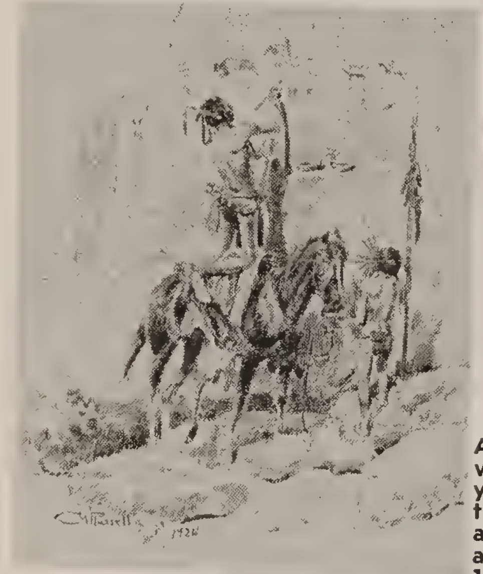
The Murphy-Cheely plant, with young Deschenes as pressman, reproduced both subjects with four-color letterpress plates. Adolph recalls that the artist, in the Summer of 1926 (he died in October of that year) came to Butte several times to observe work on the reproductions. As Adolph, in typical Deschenes fashion, worried about getting the register and colors (especially the yellow plate) exactly right, Russell said to him, "You are too damn fussy. I never wash out a brush, I just dirty it."

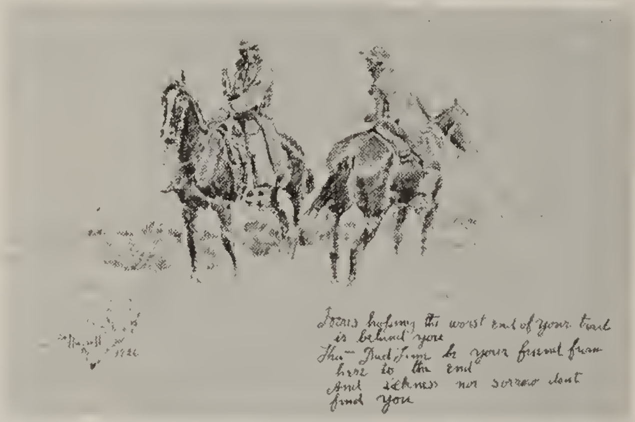
Adolph married the former Mary E. Higgins of Butte in 1928. They spent their first year of married life in Anaconda, where Deschenes worked in the job printing department of the Anaconda Standard. In 1929, they returned to Butte, where Adolph was pressman for the Montana Standard's commercial department. In 1944, the Duschenes moved to Helena, and there followed a stint of a dozen years as pressman for the State Publishing Company.

Adolph served as pressman for Thurber's, another historic Helena printing firm, from 1957 to 1961, when he joined the commercial department of the Helena Independent-Record, from which he retired early this year.

Just before the Depression descended, Deschenes began gathering wood-working tools and started what has become an absorbing avocation: making grandfather clocks. He has given these classic beauties to his three daughters, and keeps making others in such fine woods as maple and mahogany.

Adolph Deschenes has seen remarkable changes in printing techniques over the years, making the transition himself from letterpress to offset process—and, with his usual patient know how, his offset printing in full color had to be the best. There wasn't a Charlie Russell around to say "You're too damn fussy," but there didn't have to be.





Heres hoping the worst end of your trail

And sickness nor sorrow dont

As we were going through the collection of photographs from Les Jorud, we received a letter from our colleagues at the Kansas State Historical Society giving the text of an item they found in the Leavenworth Daily Commercial, printed exactly 100 years ago and describing Helena, M. T., in anything but 1969 Chamber of Commerce terms, as it was in 1869. We had just found the picture of Wall Street, one of Helena's main thoroughfares, seen at the left, when the Kansas clipping arrived.

Printed in the Leavenworth Daily Commercial on March 11, 1869, the article said:

"The city of Helena, M. T., is substantially described by an Omaha admirer, as a place exclusively given up to the sway of glittering vices, and to dealing liberally in liquid and other fine qualities of damnation. 14,000 people are habitually given up to life in this model city. It is no disgrace to visit a grog-shop, a lewd dance-house, or a gambling den, for there it is you find your most intimate friends—judges, lawyers, doctors—everybody, in fact.

"The chief gambling hell is a long, low, rough-appearing, frame structure, with portholed windows along the side, double doors in front, just outside of which a band of screeching horns is always stationed. It is illuminated, inside, night and day, by rows of candles. There are twenty-three tables in the room, upon which piles of gold dust are constantly stacked, and games such as faro, keno, and three card monte, unceasingly in progress. About 1,000 men visit this place in the course of twenty-four hours, every one having a fine looking pistol buckled to his side—never used only when it becomes actually necessary to shoot a friend."

Just 50 years later, in 1919, Helena had grown to dignity as Montana's capital city and in that year played host to William Howard Taft, the rotund former president who was traveling the country pleading for ratification of Woodrow Wilson's League of Nations.

Miss Hester Proctor of Palo Alto, Calif., sent us a clipping from the Los Angeles Times, harking back to its issue of February 17, 1919, when it reported on Taft's visit to Helena. "As lovers of your country and as lovers of mankind," the former president told his audience, "I ask you to use all your influence with our senators to have the treaties embodying the League of Nations idea ratified."

Be all you can be.

HIGHLY RECOMMENDED: THREE NOTABLE BOOKS

FIREWATER AND FORKED TONGUES

by M. I. McCreight

$6.95. First Edition

In 1947, Trail's End Publishing Co. of Pasadena, Calif. printed this classic account of Indian history, interpreted through the eyes and remembrances of the Sioux chief, Flying Hawk, a relative of both Sitting Bull and Kicking Bear, and a participant at the Custer Battle. He told his story to M. I. McCreight, a white man who through many years of patient understanding, finally gained the confidence of Flying Hawk and other tribesmen. We have a limited number of copies of this first edition.

COPPER KING AT WAR

by Sarah McNelis

$6.95

Beautifully printed by the U. of Montana Press, this book tells, for the first time, the full story of the fight for supremacy on Butte Hill, notably the role played by the flamboyant but skillful F. Augustus Heinze, who came close to destroying the great copper kingdoms of W. A. Clark and Marcus Daly. Carefully researched and documented account of an unforgettable chapter in Montana history.

PIONEER CATTLEMAN IN MONTANA: THE STORY OF THE CIRCLE C RANCH

by Walt Coburn

$6.95

The University of Nebraska Press has done its usual top publishing job on a subject close to our heart: the story of a famous Montana cattle ranch, told by the son of its founder. Walt Coburn, noted western writer, here turns his hand to telling a story of reminiscence and nostalgia about Bob Coburn's cattle ranch in the shadow of Eastern Montana's Little Rockies. He records the struggles against hard Montana winters, encroachment of homesteaders fences, gunplay of outlaws who infested the Missouri River breaks, the steady progress toward solid ranch operation.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

Now law by action of the 41st Montana Legislative Session is SB 123, which designates the Montana Historical Society as a state archives and whose principal sponsor was Sen. David L. James (D-Joplin). This bill was advanced in the house through the efforts of Rep. Kenneth Wolf (R-Shelby). This passage represented a joint effort by the Montana Historical Society and the Montana Legislative Council. Senator James has just completed a term as chairman of the Legislative Council.

While the bill carries no appropriation, it will eventually be of importance—in the preservation of official state records and documents in Montana—and thus will become of untold value, not only to scholars and researchers, but to legislators, state executive departments, attorneys and others.

Most of the states have such archives, recognizing the increasing role of government in the life of their citizens.

In an informal way, the Montana Historical Society's Library already has been collecting state records, and also has had the co-operation of other state agencies in preservation of significant material.

The current law is a brief one. It is the hope and plan, in the coming two years, to work out carefully a program of collection and records management, again working with the Legislative Council. The Historical Society, too, will ultimately have more room for records preservation in a building addition now under way.

Much of enduring value has already been lost to Montana. But a modest beginning is being made that will benefit many in future years.

As Richard Bartlett said in 1837: "To provide for the safe and perfect keeping of the Public Archives is so obviously one of the first and most imperative duties of a Legislature, that no argument could make it plainer to a reflecting mind."

The Society is gratified that Editor Vivian Paladin has been invited to participate in a panel on "Publishing Regional History" at the 22nd annual Pacific Northwest History Conference in Boise, Idaho, April 10-12. The permanent sponsor of the conference is the Washington State Historical Society.

WELCOME to CHARLIE RUSSELL COUNTRY!

Montana Historical Societty Director Sam Gilluly, Frederic G. Renner of Washington, D. C., Terry Melton, director of the C. M. Russell Gallery in Great Falls, and LeRoy Stahl of the Great Falls Advertising Club gathered at the head table at a Russell Week luncheon in Great Falls which launched a month-long observance of the Cowboy Artist's 105th anniversary.

Renner, recognized Russell art authority who has spent many years compiling information about the artist and his work, was a featured speaker during the program and presented for public viewing his own private collection of Russell's paintings and bronzes. He was accompanied to Great Falls by his son, Graham Renner.

Melton appeared on behalf of the Great Falls gallery, recently expanded and enhanced. Proceeds from a highly successful auction of western art went to that institution. Stahl acted as toastmaster at the luncheon, part of the all-day activities sponsored by the Great Falls Ad Club.

Director Gilluly, who was accompanied by Curator Bob Morgan, was also a luncheon speaker, emphasizing the growing cooperation between the "several shrines of Russell art" in this region, referring to the Great Falls gallery, the Historical Society in Helena, and the Whitney Gallery in Cody, Wyoming.

"These institutions along the Russell trail," he said, "have much to offer a growing contingent of visitors." He also voiced the thought that the Russell week festivities in Great Falls "should be observed not only in Great Falls but throughout this great state in the future."

Curator Morgan was among a dozen leading Montana artists who contributed works to an art auction, held in the evening of Thursday, March 6. The Society was also pleased to contribute a number of Russell prints and three subscriptions to MONTANA the Magazine of Western History for door prizes and auctioning. Both Morgan and Gilluly appeared with Renner and Melton on the TODAY IN MONTANA program on Station KRTV Thursday morning. The program is conducted by Mrs. Norma Beatty Ashby, who played a leading role in developing the special Russell observances.

After Open House, Society Braces for Building Addition

As anyone who has ever gone through extensive home or office remodeling knows, the process involves dislocations, inconveniences, housecleaning, and, usually, some sore, aching muscles. Such has been the case this month at the Montana Historical Society as the first vital steps were taken toward realization of our building addition.

First priority for the staff was to move the vast inventory of books, prints and mailing supplies and equipment from the ground floor room at the back of the building for this is part of the area of rebuilding and adding-to. It has been the responsibility of Business Manager Dick Duffy to move these hundreds of items into quarters formerly used by Curator Bob Morgan on the ground floor level. Bob, in turn, has moved into rooms formerly occupied by Editor Vivian Paladin and Circulation Manager Eleanor Dickey. These two offices have now been moved to the third floor.

Director Sam Gilluly and all the staff were glad, however, that the moving process could be delayed long enough to host more than 250 legislators, their wives and guests on January 13. Pictures in this issue show some of the animated conversation and interested inspections which took place that evening.

A highlight for everyone was a backstage look at the Frontier Street museum on the ground floor, the construction phase of which is now virtually completed. Without benefit of paint or furnishings, the various business establishments as they now stand are fascinating to see. Our visitors seemed to agree with us that when finished with the actual objects of the 1880's, these walk-in buildings will become one of the finest exhibits of its kind anywhere.

With the welcome moderation of Montana weather early this month, we have had increasing numbers of students from throughout Montana touring the building during their visits to the Legislative sessions. During the first four days of the month, our guest book noted students, arriving by the busload, from such places as Stevensville, Brady, Corvallis, Huntley Project, Columbia Falls, Granite, Sunburst, Chinook, Harlem, Great Falls, Boulder, Cut Bank, Roundup, and Philipsburg.

The students with whom we have talked have understood that changes are going on, that some exhibits they remember from past visits, notably the white buffalo and Montana silver service, are in storage during this period of renovation on the ground floor level. We trust they and all our other visitors will agree with us that the inconveniences and deprivations will be well worth it when the building addition is a reality.

OPEN HOUSE guests, above, left, inspect "The Ambush," a recent Russell acquisition. Curator Bob Morgan, above, explains features of the Frontier Village Museum on the ground floor. Above, right, Board Member E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra joins Dr. and Mrs. Larry Hammer at the African exhibit in the Gary Cooper Gallery. Resulting from the 1966 Safari in which the Butte residents participated, the exhibits are attracting wide attention. Burlingame inspect a warthog trophy head, while at right, below, John J. Jewell shows visitors some of the Society's extensive inventory of books and Russell prints.

NATURE SETS THE THEME

Pat Harrison Creates Historic Steamboat

A young man's interest in Montana's fabled steamboat era, and his skill as a craftsman, have resulted in this authentic scale model of sternwheeler, typical of those which came up the Missouri laden with freight and passengers for unloading at Fort Benton and returned again to St. Louis carrying the mineral wealth of Territorial Montana.

Shown with his model is Pat Harrison, a senior at Helena High School, who told us he spent some seven months in research and construction, consulting MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY and other materials at the Society to insure authenticity. Using a scale of one inch to three feet, Pat created a hardwood keel and a superstructure of plywood, adding the familiar "Block P" insignia of the T. C. Power company between the masts.

This replica, as well as a Lewis and Clark keelboat model which Pat made earlier, are both objects of interest in the Capitol office of his father, Supreme Court Associate Justice John Harrison.

Three Russell Origi

DR. ARMAND HAMMER

MISS

Three original Russell paintings have recently joined our permanent collection, thanks to the generosity of the four people pictured here. They are, left to right, Dr. Armand Hammer of Los Angeles, noted financier and art collector; Miss Esther Goodale of Reading, Mass.; her brother, Mr. Francis Goodale of Stroudsburg, Mass., and the late Mrs. Clinton J. (Gertrude Mayn) Backus of Long Beach, Calif.

Dr. Hammer's gift, an early Russell oil, NO KETCHUM, was presented on his behalf by Lanny Ross, noted singer whose album of original songs has been recorded under title SILVER DOLLAR COUNTRY. The Hammer collection of art, one the country's most famous, at one time included the jewel collection of Imperial Russia which Dr. Hammer acquired during his residence in Russia before the Revolution of 1917. NO KETCHUM, representative of Russell's earliest period, depicts a young cowboy attempting to catch a buffalo calf by the tail. Arrangements for the presentation were made by Julius Peters of Great Falls.

The Goodales are donors of a fine 1901 watercolor depiction of a mounted

GERTRUDE MAYN BACKUS

Indian, entitled THE OUTPOST. It was given in memory of their uncle, the late Charles Warren Goodale, will known mining engineer, for many years manager of the Boston and Montana mining properties in Butte and Great Falls, and later connected with the Anaconda Company. A native of Hawaii, he went to Massachusetts as a boy, and graduated from Massachusetts Institute of Technology. During his long residence in Montana, he was a close friend of C. M. Russell and had deep appreciation of his art. Goodale was especially active in the field of mine safety, and although he spent the last years of his life in Massachusetts, never lost his interest in Montana and its mining industry.

Mrs. Backus, a former Montanan, died at her Long Beach home late in 1967. She willed the oil painting, THE AMBUSH, to the Society. It was painted by Russell for Mrs. Backus' first father-in-law, John Smith, who then lived in Martinsdale, Montana, and was an old friend of the artist. Her first husband, J. Stanley Smith, died in 1918, and she and Mr. Backus, whom she married in 1924, had kept the painting in their California home until her death.

THE AMBUSH depicts five mounted Indians moving around a cliff as the leader holds up his right hand. In the mid-distance is a pack train of mules, with the snow-covered Belt Mountains as a backdrop.

As a special commemoration of the 105th anniversary of Russell's birth this Spring and in recognition of these important acquisitions, an especially designed cover of the Spring, 1969, issue of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY will feature all three paintings in full color.

Miss Indian America Visitor to the Society

The Historical Society and Montana's capitol complex were included in the late-1968 itinerary of Thomasine R. Hill of Crow Agency, Montana, who reigns as Miss Indian America XV, and whose official duties have taken her to the Tournament of Roses in Pasadena, speaking engagements at Holyoke, Harvard, Yale and other universities in the East, and the inauguration of President Nixon.

Chosen Miss Indian America at All American Indian Days at Sheridan, Wyo. last August, Miss Hill is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Hill. She was educated at Poplar, Montana, where she was an honor student, and is currently enrolled at Eastern Montana College in Billings. Her father, a full-blood Crow Indian, is engaged in real estate work at Crow Agency. Her mother, a native of Oklahoma, is of the Pawnee tribe.

Thomasine, whose Indian name Ah-sowa-de-lish means She Walks to Her Lodge, is dedicated to better inter-racial understandings, and before her present duties began, was active throughout this country and abroad with the Up With People program.

Lamps! Lamps!

Who Has Some Lamps?

These lighting fixtures from the nostalgic past are among items needed to complete furnishing two establishments in the Montana Historical Society's Frontier Village Museum. If you own any of these, or similar fixtures, or know where they can be procured, please write us at the address below. Those pictured here were found in an 1897 Sears Roebuck catalog, with price tags unbelievably low by our inflated standards. As with all objects used in the new museum, however, we hope to find donors from among our readers and patrons who may have such authentic items lurking in basement or garage.

THE LIBRARY LAMP. This one, advertised for a princely $5.65, boasted "a shade and fount fully tinted and decorated with flowers and heavily stippled with gold, trimmed with genuine cut glass prisms, automatic spring extension, and 65 candlepower." We need two lamps similar to this beauty for the Drug Store.

THE BRACKET LAMP. These familiar swinging wall bracket lamps, which sold for something like 75c before the turn of the century, were commonly used in home and office. We would like to have two identical models, complete with reflectors, for the Dentist's Office, which will be fully equipped with chair, tools and other equipment of the 1880's.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

As one newscaster phrases it, we have a potpourri of eventful happenings to report at the Montana Historical Society. Some of these get more detailed reporting elsewhere in this issue.

Most gratifying to our Board of Trustees and staff was the positive way in which the Montana legislature last month showed its desire to help us preserve the state's heritage properly and in attractive surroundings. This action came very early and very quickly in the present session when both houses by virtually unanimous action granted an additional $75,785 to complete the addition to the Society's museums, galleries and library. The bill was one of the first four to be signed by Governor Forrest H. Anderson. This amount supplements an appropriation of $499,250 made by the legislature in 1967.

Construction has begun on the addition, and the contract with the State Department of Administration prescribes 540 days for completion. Thus, we should be utilizing the 22,000-odd square feet of new space by late summer of 1970.

Also, we were pleased to show legislators, their wives and families what we are doing when we held a Legislative Open House that brought an attendance of more than 250. Board and staff members joined to make this a memorable occasion.

My column in the last issue of The Post, which mentioned "Take Me Back to Old Montana" and Tom Markle's poetic riposte, brought considerable reader reaction. Our library supplied several requests for copies of the lyrics.

One reader, John I. White of Westfield, New Jersey, sent us a copy of sheet music in his possession that attributed the music to an Al Paynter, with words by E. F. Waller. This music was copyrighted in 1914. This will come as a surprise to many Montanans, who remain positive that J. Campbell Cory, onetime Montana newspaperman, wrote it in 1912. There are Montanans still living who knew Cory when he was in Helena. However, he wrote the song later when he returned to his home state of New York. Also well known in Helena was Cory's sister, Fanny Cory Cooney, who drew a syndicated newspaper strip for many years. We are willing to bet a good old silver dollar that Cory is the author! —SAM GILLULY

Events To Mark Russell's 105th Anniversary

The Society is pleased to participate with the Advertising Club of Great Falls in marking the 105th anniversary of the birth of Charles M. Russell next month at a special series of events to be held in the city where the Cowboy Artist made his home for so many years. Russell was born on March 19, 1864, in St. Louis, and first came to Montana in March, 1880, just as he turned 16. Great Falls became the place where he occasionally "hung his hat" after his range-riding days were over. After his marriage to the former Nancy (Mamie) Cooper in 1897, he settled down in a solid home and studio for most of his remaining productive years as an artist.

A highlight of events will be a Western art auction, featuring original works by Montana's leading artists, including Russell, to be held Thursday evening, March 6, at the Rainbow Hotel. The auction will be open to the public, and proceeds will benefit the newly expanded C. M. Russell Gallery in Great Falls. Three Russell bronzes, "Piegan Girl," "Sitting Bear" and "Peace" will be auctioned.

Among Montana artists who have confirmed their participation in the sale are Les Peters, Leo Beaulaurier and Branson Stevenson of Great Falls, Lyndon Pomeroy and Stan Lynde of Billings, Ace Powell of Kalispell, Gary Schildt of Hungry Horse, Fred Fellows of Bigfork, Bob Scriver of Browning, Bob Morgan of Helena, John Segesman of Cascade, and Dr. Andrew Jordan of Choteau.

A champagne reception with the artists is scheduled for 6:30 P.M., with the auction to get underway by 8:00. Invitations are being sent to Western art fans and Russell enthusiasts throughout the country, including such notables as Bing Crosby, Senator Barry Goldwater, and Hugh Auchinloss, Jr., brother of Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis.

Earlier in the day, a Charles M. Russell chuckwagon luncheon will feature brief talks by Fred Renner of Washington, D.C., well known authority on the art of Russell; Director Sam Gilluly of our Society, and Terry Melton, director of the C. M. Russell Gallery. The men will discuss the special impact of Russell's art throughout the country and the world.

The March 6 activities will be enhanced by the showing of original Charles M. Russell works from the personal collection of Mr. and Mrs. Renner. Valued at some $200,000, the collection will be on display at the Montana Bank, Great Falls. Renner is honorary chairman of the events of March 6, as well as other activities during what will be a month-long observance of the artist's anniversary.

Director Gilluly and Curator Bob Morgan will be featured on the 8:00 A.M. TODAY IN MONTANA telecast from Station KRTV in Great Falls on March 6, during which they will discuss the art of Russell, particularly our collection in Helena. The program is moderated by Norma Beatty Ashby, who with Bill Samson, president of the Great Falls Advertising Club, has been a leading light in promoting the commemorative events.

The Society is also pleased to furnish a number of Russell prints and subscriptions to MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY as door prizes during the March 6 activities. Our readers are advised, by the way, that they are welcome at all events. Advance reservations can be made by writing to Box 619, Great Falls, no later than February 21.

PROGRESS REPORT:

Bids Opened for Our Building Addition

Bids for the Society's addition to its present Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building were opened on December 11, but circumstances have prevented a final award on the contract. A Helena firm, Waddell Construction Company, submitted the low bid for the general construction at $314,000 when proposals were opened by Philip H. Hauck, director of Architecture and Engineering for the Montana State Department of Administration. However, on the day following the bidding, the firm asked to withdraw its bid because of "honest error." The bid failed to include cost of millwork and other items, the company stated, an item of more than $17,000.

Controller Ralph C. Kenyon recommended to the State Board of Examiners that Waddell be permitted to withdraw its bid, and the board agreed. Next low bidder is Ingram-Clevenger, Inc. of Helena, at $339,580. "Further study is being made of the remaining bids and a recommendation for award will be forthcoming," Kenyon said in a letter to the Board of Examiners.

Low bidders for other contracts on the building were The Aladdin Corporation, Billings, $97,400 for mechanical work, and Allen Electric, Helena, $42,632 for electrical work.

Davidson & Kuhr of Great Falls is the architectural firm for the addition, which will provide about 24,000 square feet of additional space for the Society at two levels and will be utilized to augment present space for the library, museum, galleries and merchandising and magazine operations of the Society.

Frontier Street Takes Form and Substance

BLACKSMITHING
J.V. MURPHY

So rapidly are the thirteen buildings to comprise the Frontier Street Museum on our ground floor level being completed that it is difficult to get a strictly up-to-date photograph. This one shows, at extreme right, a portion of the watchmaker's shop, the blacksmith shop, and log jail. Since this was taken, the dentist's office is complete, and work is underway on the newspaper and printing shop.

Recommended: Three

We are pleased to note this month the appearance of three books devoted to the history and contemporary life of three Montana communities. We applaud, not only the selfless effort involved in all such projects, but their cumulative value through the years.

The volumes under review cover the history of North Central Montana, with Chinook as the hub, the Eastern Montana community centered by Glendive, and Pondera County in Northern Montana, of which Conrad is the seat.

Mrs. Janet S. Allison of Chinook has written what can only be described as an excellent running text for TRIAL AND TRIUMPH: 101 YEARS IN NORTH CENTRAL MONTANA, published by the North Central Montana CowBelles and printed, by offset process, by the Chinook Opinion. This printing shop, by the way, printed the first issue of The Opinion in May, 1890, and thus still issues the oldest newspaper in the Milk River country embraced by the towns of Harlem, Chinook, Havre and Big Sandy. It is this country, of course, that the book is all about, a country which one old timer once said was fit only for "steers and bachelors."

TRIAL AND TRIUMPH contains no actual photographs, a lack which will no doubt be noted by more than one old-timer. Pen and ink drawings by Beth Mundt illustrate the cover and chapter headings — chapters broken down into time periods: 1866-1867, 1890-1891, and up to to 1960-1967. The composition is typewritten, the printer reducing this to fit the rather small format. Footnotes, hand-written, might have been better handled chapter by chapter, since in toto they become unwieldy. Nevertheless, this is well written and well put together. It has continuity, humor and documentation—and, as an unusual and very helpful extra, there is an index.

The other individual effort—and it is her second—is Marie MacDonald's hardbound and heavily illustrated GLENDIVE: THE HISTORY OF A MONTANA TOWN. Professionally composed and printed, this one has a large 9x11 format, is excellently bound, and well correlated. In 1963, the Frontier Gateway Museum in Glendive published Mrs. MacDonald's pictorial history of Central and Eastern Montana, with emphasis on homesteaders who included her own family.

New Community Books

In the current volume, the emphasis is on Glendive, the "Gate City," located only 30 miles from the North Dakota line and the hub of a community which takes unusual pride in its past, all the way from its Ice Age geological past through the agricultural and petroleum treasures of contemporary times.

A community effort in the fullest sense is PONDERA, the illustrated (and nicely hardbound) history of this Northern Montana county, created in 1919 out of Chouteau County, one of the Territory's original counties. Because it is the work of many hands, the book covers a wide variety of subject matter carrying a large number of by-lines. The Pondera History Association, whose members correlated a vast amount of material and pictures, divided the book into chapters, covering the prehistoric period, the Blackfeet, the famous (or infamous) Whoop-Up Trail, the Conrad family, "the" irrigation project, and many others. The latter part of the book is made up of vignettes on Valier, Williams, Brady and other towns in the community, the devastating 1964 flood, schools, churches and other institutions.

PONDERA is heavily illustrated, well printed and sturdily bound. The preface recognizes the weight of material with which the committee had to deal, regrets the necessity for deletion, then dedicates the finished product "to those who gave of themselves that we might find this land a good place to hang our hats and to those who will strive to keep it so."

Since we have worked so often at the task of correlating material so it "hangs together," gathering pictures and trying (sometimes vainly) to identify and date them properly, then sitting down with printers in an effort to stay within a budget in the face of rising publishing costs, we say a sincere well done to all responsible for this newest trio of Montana community histories. We commend them to our readers and welcome inquiries about prices and where to get copies.

From the standpoint of the Montana Historical Society, we can honestly add that the authors have made a genuine contribution to the history of our state, and their work will have growing value for future generations.

John Coleman Looks Forward To Advanced Archive-History Degree

The two begrimed men pictured here are not coal miners or demolition experts, they are experts in the mining of history and the objects thereof. They are, left, John Coleman, Historical Society archivist interne and Curator Bob Morgan. The picture, taken recently by the Montana Standard of Butte, shows the men salvaging such "treasures" as embossed metal ceiling material, doors, fixtures, balustrades and mouldings for use in the Frontier Street museum now under construction on our ground floor level. As it turned out, they were just in time: a short time later Butte's Beaver Block at Granite and Main from which these items were taken, was destroyed by fire.

John Coleman, who has been on the Society's staff since June, 1967, has some exciting new things on his horizon, but again it has to do with history and its preservation. He will soon begin work toward a specialized M.A. degree in history and archives at the University of Montana, from which he already holds a B.A. in history and political science.

A native of White Sulphur Springs, John is a fourth generation Montanan. His father, Clifton W. Coleman, operates an Angus cattle ranch near historic Fort Logan, in which his son participates as time allows. John graduated from White Sulphur Springs High School in 1958, and after his first academic year at the University, entered the U.S. Army Security Agency, serving for two and a half years in Germany.

Married to the former Paula Simmons of Red Lodge, in June, 1963, he returned to the University that fall to complete his B.A. requirements, adding a year at Law School. Having had varied experience at both ranching and lumbering, he spent some time as a timber thinning contractor for the U.S. Forest Service at Missoula before coming to the Society Library in 1967. Under the special program worked out by the University's History Department, Coleman expects to complete work on his graduate degree by the Fall of 1969.

Don Rickey, Jr. Joins Military History Staff

Carlisle Barracks, Pennsylvania, for many years the home of the famous Carlisle Indian School and now home of the U.S. Army's Military History Research Collection, recently welcomed a new staff member, Don Rickey, Jr., whose specialty is the history of the U.S. Army and the Indian Wars and who is well known in Montana as a former historian at the Custer Battlefield Monument. He has authored two articles for MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, one on the attitudes of Army regulars who served in the Indian Wars, published in 1961, and a fine account of the Battle of Wolf Mountain, which appeared in 1963.

Dr. Rickey became historian at the Monument marking the Custer disaster near Hardin in 1955. Later, and before coming to Carlisle Barracks, he had served as head of the Park Service's research team on the history of Western United States.

While he was historian at Custer Battlefield, Rickey and his staff went over the whole battlefield with metal detectors, looking for the rifle cartridges which had sunk into the soil during the years since the battle. From the concentration and type of cartridges in various areas, they gained a good deal of information about the course of the battle.

As an example, Dr. Rickey produced a .50 caliber shell that had been reloaded and fired so many times that it burst. He explained that the Indians, who had trouble getting ammunition, would gather up cartridges after a battle, modify them to take the older style of percussion cap primer instead of the Berdan patent primer they were made for, and reload and use them several times.

By studying the number and variety of cartridges in the area, Dr. Rickey found that a detachment of Custer's soldiers had gotten as far as the river and attacked the Indian camp but had been driven back. Some tradition had always held that such a foray had occurred, but until Dr. Rickey's researches, there was no evidence of it.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

Montana's mining metropolis of Butte, long known for its colorful history, achieved more prominence this month when the world's newest ammunition ship, the USS BUTTE, was commissioned and sent on its way in ceremonies in Boston.

The BUTTE had more than a little of Montana with it. A delegation of mining city residents and other Montanans, headed by Butte Mayor Tom Powers, was in Boston for the commissioning.

The Montana Historical Society shared in the festivities by providing two of its C. M. Russell oil prints—"Lewis and Clark Meeting the Indians at Ross' Hole" and "Laugh Kills Lonesome," the originals of which are in our collection.

Another noted Montana artist, Evelyn Grinde of Butte, was represented in the presentations. She made her own gift of a fine oil in which she portrayed the beautiful Highlands near Butte. Various other gifts came from Montana and the City of Butte.

It was all reminiscent of the days when the people of Montana presented a fine silver service to the Navy. This service is now on loan to the Montana Historical Society, although temporarily stored during the construction of our new Frontier Street Scene.

In brief: As we go to press comes a loan from Mrs. A. T. Hibbard of Helena for display during the coming legislative session, including such items as Colonel Broadwater's cutter, a gift to his bride, Marcus Daly's trap and a lady's carriage. Several fine gifts have come to the Society, or are scheduled, and we'll tell you more about these later.

So much has happened during the past year—virtually all of it in the way of solid progress for the Society—that it was a difficult job for us to consolidate it in our Biennial Report which has just gone out to Governor Babcock and members of the Legislature.

I would just like to sum it all up to you in a personal note with this holiday issue of THE MONTANA POST: it has been an exciting and rewarding year for me, all of you have my thanks for your friendship, readership and support during 1968. We know that with your continued interest in our activities that 1969 will see even more meaningful progress. HAPPY HOLIDAYS!

Museum People Gather for "Nuts and Bolts" Sessions

SCENES AT THE MUSEUMS WORKSHOP included (top) an informal conference, during lunch, between three Historical Society officials, E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra, Butte, representing the World Museum of Mining; Dr. M. G. Burlingame, Bozeman, president of the Society's Board and a workshop participant, and Society Director Sam Gilluly. Above, four registrants, Mrs. Lee Sweeney, Helena, Delmar Jaquish, Missoula, and Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Zion, Choteau, admire C. M. Russell's great bronze, BRONC TWISTER. Below, Curator Bob Morgan explains open range cattle displays to Mr. and Mrs. John Karch, Jr., Baker, Delmar Jaquish, Missoula, Mrs. Connie DePew, Helena, and Mr. and Mrs. Zion, Choteau.

A museums workshop conducted November 7 and 8 by the Montana Historical Society in Helena in cooperation with the Museums Association of Montana was given pre-session publicity as a "nuts and bolts" training program. That is what it turned out to be for more than 40 "museum people" from throughout Montana.

It was a "what to do" and "how to do it" operation that brought an enthusiastic response from participants. It also demonstrated the considerable talent and guidance available in Montana for just such work, as well as the growing interest in this field throughout the Big Sky Country.

Typical of comments we heard were: "We have changed our ideas about our museum planning; we're going to start over." This, to the "faculty" at the workshop, was exactly its purpose.

On hand to welcome the group at opening were Peter Yegen, Jr., Billings, president of the Museums Association; Dr. Merrill Burlingame, Bozeman, president of the Montana Historical Society, and Historical Society Director Sam Gilluly.

An orientation film, displays of leaflets and museum books and discussion were among sidelights. Besides the society's staff, major contributions to the training were made by Robert Murray, Billings, museums consultant; Dr. Leslie C. Drew, Bozeman, director of the McGill Museum of the Rockies; David Mohrardt, preparator at the Museum of the Rockies; Terry Melton, director of the C. M. Russell Gallery at Great Falls; Wesley Woodgerd, chief of Parks and Recreation Division, Montana Fish and Game Commission, and William H. Kuhr of Davidson & Kuhr, Great Falls architectural firm which is planning the new wing to our building in Helena.

From the Montana Historical Society's staff came able help from Curator Robert F. Morgan, Business Manager Richard B. Duffy, Librarian Mary Dempsey, Assistant Curator Rex Rieke, Field Representative Frank Wiley and Assistant Librarian Harriet C. Meloy. The flu bug counted out Editor Vivian Paladin of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY and THE MONTANA POST, who was scheduled for an important part.

Director Gilluly, who had drawn on resources and suggestions from several national associations in drafting the program, emphasized that the Society feels it should have a growing function in assisting local museums and historical societies of Montana; the workshop was a manifestation of this. But, he added, the work is a "two-way street," for the local groups, through their research and upbuilding, also contribute to the strength of the Society.

Dr. Drew, who recently came to Montana from an east coast post, stressed that Montanans have an opportunity, because they are only beginning to take a new and refreshing approach to museums and historical groups. The raw materials are here, he said, and we have only to treat and show them properly.

PARTIALLY COMPLETED frontier jail, built of logs, commanded the attention of Mr. and Mrs. William Dekker of Circle and Mr. and Mrs. Jessee Labree of Ekalaka as they attended museum workshop sessions. Curator Morgan explained that the jail is the third building to be completed for the Frontier Street "walk through"' museum being created on the ground floor level. Already erected are a blacksmith shop and a watchmaker's shop. Ten more typical establishments of the 1880's are planned, all to contain authentic furniture and fixtures of the period.

Virtually all parts of Montana were represented — a great many, we are happy to say, from the eastern and central parts of the state. Registrants and the institutions represented:

Mrs. Carl Iverson and Mrs. Allen Peers, Marias Museum of History and Art, Shelby; Mrs. J. Maurice Dietrich and Mrs. Don Tavenner, Powell County Museum and Art Foundation, Deer Lodge; Mrs. Clyde Dygert and Mrs. Fred Weltner, Big Horn County Historical Society, Hardin; Francis H. Elmore, Glacier National Park, West Glacier; Mrs. Louis Hagener, H. Earl Clack Museum, Havre; Margaret L. Hawley, Valley of the Sun Museum, Fort Shaw; Mr. and Mrs. Earl R. Holje and Howard King, Sheridan County Historical Society, Plentywood.

Peter Yegen, Jr. and Dave Nelson, Yellowstone Art Center, Billings; Edna Partington and Mr. and Mrs. Art Watson, Castle Museum, White Sulphur Springs; E. Marion Patch, Poplar Museum, Poplar; Mr. and Mrs. Al Ploss, Liberty County Museum, Chester; E. Delmar Jaquish and W. E. Steuerwald, U. S. Forest Service, Missoula; Mr. and Mrs. John Karch, Jr., O'Fallon Historical Society, Baker; Mr. and Mrs. Jessee LaBree, Carter County Museum, Ekalaka, Mr. and Mrs. William Dekker, Circle.

Michael P. Malone and Richard B. Roeder, Dept. of History, Montana State University, Bozeman; E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra, World Museum of Mining, Butte; Terry R. Melton, C. M. Russell Gallery, Great Falls; Arlen Raikes, Hockaday Memorial Art Center, Kalispell; Horace Wagnild, Sheridan County Historical Society, Outlook; Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Zion, Teton Trail Museum, Choteau.

Attending from Helena, besides Society personnel, were Mrs. Connie DePew, Mrs. Lee Sweeney, Miss Jane Tobin and Mrs. Robert E. Towle, representing the Last Chance Restoration Association, working with the Model Cities program.

MAGAZINE FORMAT ENLARGED; CIRCULATION TAKES BIG LEAP UPWARD

Circulation Manager Eleanor (Jiggs) Dickey announces another unprecedented growth in magazine and MONTANA POST readership since the Summer, 1968, issue of the magazine, which featured the Lewis and Clark Expedition, was mailed in July. Direct subscribers now total very close to 10,000, an increase of nearly 2,000 in the last two volume years. By adding the sales of the magazine on news stands, total circulation approaches 15,000—which, we are told, is among the highest in the nation for a journal published by a historical society.

The new volume year of 1969, the first issue of which will appear in January, will also see a slightly enlarged format, according to Editor Vivian Paladin. Dimensions will now be 7¾ inches wide by 10¾ inches deep, an increase of nearly one-half inch in both directions.

"While the new size will not be a drastic change and will not effect bound volumes or slip cases used by those who collect the magazine, it will allow for greater freedom of lay-out and design," Vivian said. "We are confident our readers will find more pleasing effects, and greater readability as well."

DEATH CLAIMS THREE

The Historical Society is saddened to take note of the recent passing of three stalwarts in the field of western history and art. All of them made substantial contributions to preserving the heritage which belongs, in a special way, to Montana.

Closest to home: the untimely death, following surgery in Billings, of Don C. Foote, one of our best known collectors of Western Americana and owner of Pompeys Pillar, east of Billings, where Captain William Clark carved his name in 1806 on the return journey of the Lewis and Clark Expedition.

A resident of Billings since boyhood, Don Foote began a number of years ago to assemble the internationally known "Treasures of the West," an awesome aggregation of authentic artifacts relating to such fields as Buffalo Bill Cody, Calamity Jane, General Custer, antique vehicles, musical instruments, and myriad others. His wife, Stella, a member of our Board of Trustees, joined with her husband in making what is unquestionably the largest private effort in Montana at preserving our past.

From Sheridan, Wyoming, came word of the death of F. H. Sinclair, better known as "Neckyoke Jones," an articulate and learned man who was a genuine cowhand, stockgrower and publicist for the range cattle industry; he wrote in humorous and genuine vernacular about range life, Indians and cow critters.

Born in Glendive in 1889, Neckyoke wrote for "The Montana Stockgrower" and cattlemens' association papers in four other western states for more than 25 years. He authored an appealing article on Dale Wilder, well known

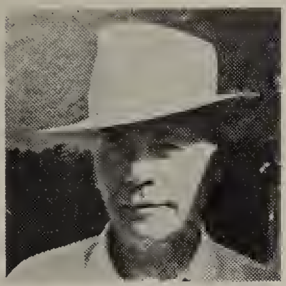
Montana and Wyoming cattleman, for the Summer, 1966, issue of our MONTANA MAGAZINE.

No words could better pay tribute to Sinclair than those of cowman Jack Brenner, printed in the October 15, 1968, issue of "The Montana Stockgrower": "Up here at the head of (Horse Prairie) Creek, we don't get the news very fast, but I have seen that our good and loyal old friend, Neckyoke, has made it to the barn. I speak for all cowmen when I say we shall miss him. He loved the business and contributed much to it . . . May he rest in peace with high grass and good water and no 'bureycrats'."

From Burbank, Calif., comes news of the death of F. Jack O'Neill, native of Kalispell, boyhood friend of C. M. Russell, a working cowboy, champion rodeo roper, author —and, for a great many years, one of the busiest artists in the West.



In the Fall of 1966, the Historical Society was pleased to exhibit a one-man showing of Jack O'Neill's oil paintings, depicting the range and cowboy life of Montana which he never could get "out of my system."

Death came suddenly to this colorful man, at a time when his book-length study of frontier cowboys and cattlemen was almost ready for the printer and when most of his paintings were again out on exhibit.

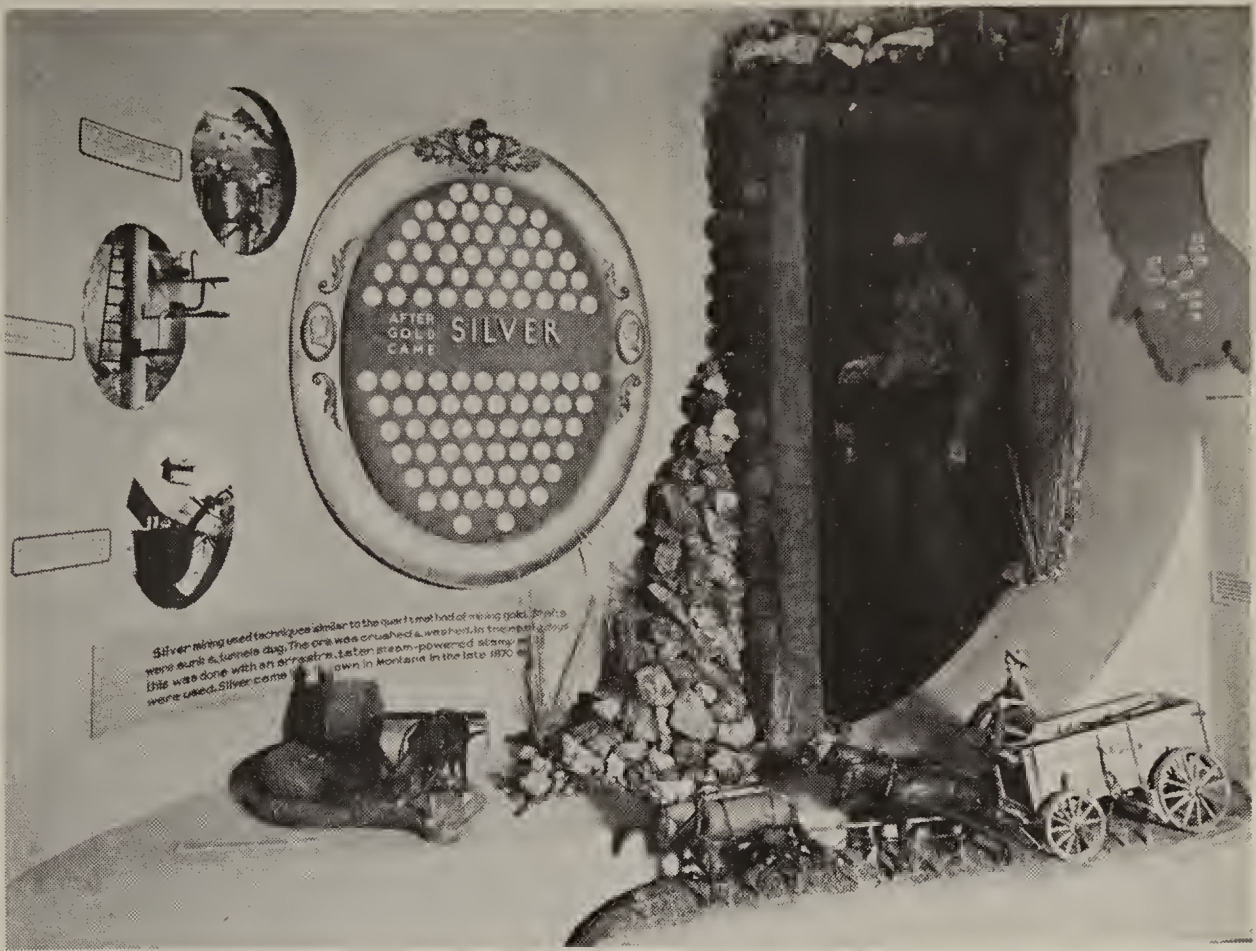
WE "GOOFED" LAST TIME: THIS IS VOLUME SIX

We are chagrined to say (although perhaps no one but librarians would notice) that on the last issue of THE POST, issued in September, we said it was Volume 7, Number 6. It should have read Volume 6, Number 6.

SEASONAL CLOSING SLATED FOR TOWE FORD EXHIBITS

The Towe Antique Ford Collection exhibits, located some six blocks north of the Historical Society Building, will be closed throughout the month of December, Director Gilluly announces. The exhibits, which include nearly 40 antique Fords from 1903 through the Model A of the 1930's, will reopen for public viewing on January 4, 1969, again in charge of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Rector. Hours will be 1 to 5 p.m., Wednesday through Sunday.



UNDERGROUND SILVER MINING is the theme of this newest display in the Mining Frontier area of our Formal Museum. An ore wagon, a miner emerging from underground and a complete silver dollar collection are featured. Curator Morgan and his assistant, Rex Rieke, are completing work on a case depicting Miner's Union Day, and slated for the near future is a display of mining methods of the past, present and future. Already completed is "Celestials in Pigtails," pointing up the contribution of Orientals to the placer gold mining era. The four displays will complete the Mining Frontier Room. Next target: complete re-design of the Indian-Fur Trade Room.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

The ancient and haunting history of the Southwest came alive last month in Tucson as the Western History Association held its eighth annual meeting. Representing the Historical Society were the writer, his wife, Esther, Editor Vivian Paladin and her husband, Jack.

Host institutions, which included the University of Arizona, Arizona Pioneers' Historical Society, Catholic Diocese of Tucson, and the Walter Chiles Cox Memorial Foundation, made use of the unique and historical facilities of Tucson to plan a series of memorable events.

The sessions themselves, while oriented to Southwest history, covered a broad scope, and even with imposing facilities at the Pioneer International Hotel, the meeting rooms were crowded beyond capacity. This reflects the growing interest in these annual sessions, and a growing membership in the Association, which will hold its meeting next year in Omaha.

As it normally is, the autumn season has been delightful in Montana — to many of us the best time of the year. We have watched the ever-changing panorama of color from windows of our office across from the State Capitol grounds.

Somehow, it reminded us of a sentimental and oft-repeated bit of poetry that Montanans, when in the proper mood, have quoted. It begins like this:

Take me back to old Montana,
Where there's plenty of room and air,
Where there's cottonwood and pine-tree,
Bitterroot and prickly pear.

and continues:

Where the green grass is a wavin'
And the young calves romp about,
And that funny springtime feelin'
Makes a fellow want to shout.

A few years ago, and likely one frigid day, a Glasgow friend of ours named Tom Markle, who has now seen some 60 Montana winters, wrote his poetic rebuttal. Tom, in part, put it this way:

Now I'm no pessimist or sissy
Or poet's friend I'll have you know,
But who in Hell can dream of romance
When it's forty-eight below?

I've a tip for that young fellow,
If he wouldn't mind it in the least.
That's to crawl in some steam heated
Hotel away back in the east—

And keep on writin' verses
With his ancient ballpoint pen,
But don't come back to old Montana
Until it's summertime again.

Tom's attitude reflects Montana weather, which has the same infinite variety as woman—challenging, mellow or sometimes downright scary—but interesting and unpredictable. Like Tom and other old timers, we're stickin' around just to see what will happen next.

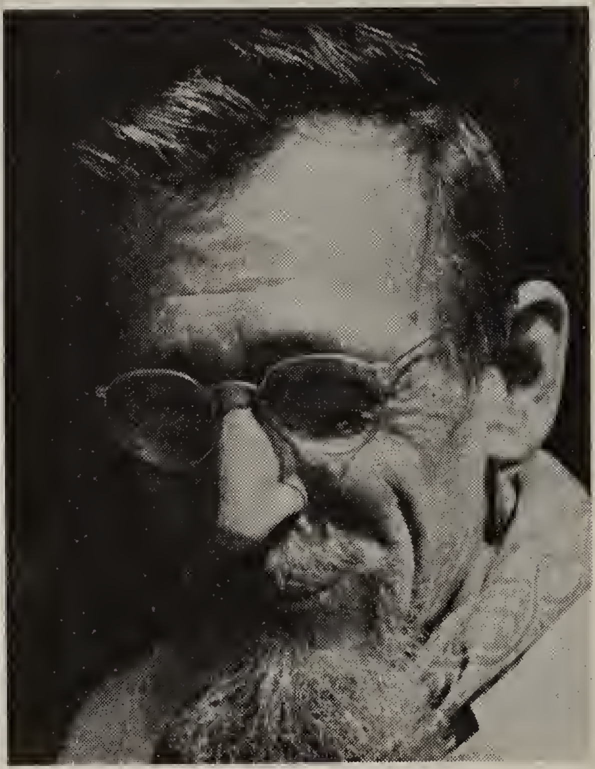
GARY COOPER GALLERY FEATURES WORKS BY MAYNARD DIXON, SCULPTOR BOB SCRIVER

A retrospective showing of 24 oils. watercolors, and pen and ink and pencil drawings by the late Maynard Dixon, one of the West's most honored artists and considered by many to be "an artist's artist," has drawn much comment throughout this month in the Gary Cooper Gallery. Some of Dixon's best known works are included in the show, gathered over the last several months by Rex Rieke, our assistant curator.

A native of Fresno, Calif., Dixon spent more than a half century depicting the Indian and cowboy in a variety of settings and in a most original way. He worked in New York as an illustrator, spending every spare dollar traveling to the Southwest and West, filling sketchbooks with his impressions of land and people. He died in 1946.



MAYNARD DIXON

The second week in December will see a showing in the same gallery of the superb Western sculpture of Bob Scriver of Browning, a native Montanan who left a career as a musician and band leader in Montana high schools to become a full-time artist and sculptor. Many honors have come to him, including a recent commission to do a heroic portrait of Montana's rodeo great, Bill Linderman, for the Cowboy Hall of Fame in Oklahoma City. A comprehensive showing of his work will be held at the newly enlarged Whitney Gallery of Western Art in Cody next Summer.

Scriver, who is also one of the West's most accomplished taxidermists, maintains his busy studio in his native Browning.

Rieke announced that a number of large wildlife oil paintings by the late Carl Rungius will be displayed in the Cooper Gallery at the same time we exhibit Bob Scriver's sculpture. It should be a remarkable show.

Antique Fords and a Craftsman Who Loves His Work

"Any man who can make a living doing what he likes is lucky," Artist Charles M. Russell once said. Almost the same words might well be attributed to Lewis Rector, the man responsible for the restoration — and, in many cases, complete rebuilding — of vehicles in the great Ed Towe Antique Ford Collection, now on display in Helena under auspices of the Historical Society.

Of the almost 40 vintage cars in the collection, dating from 1903 to 1934, eight have undergone total restoration since Rector joined forces with Collector Towe in 1963. Tearing the vehicle down to the frame, this patient and dedicated craftsman renovates the motor to mint running condition, replaces upholstery, tires, radiators, tops, fenders—any part which is not in prime condition in the original.

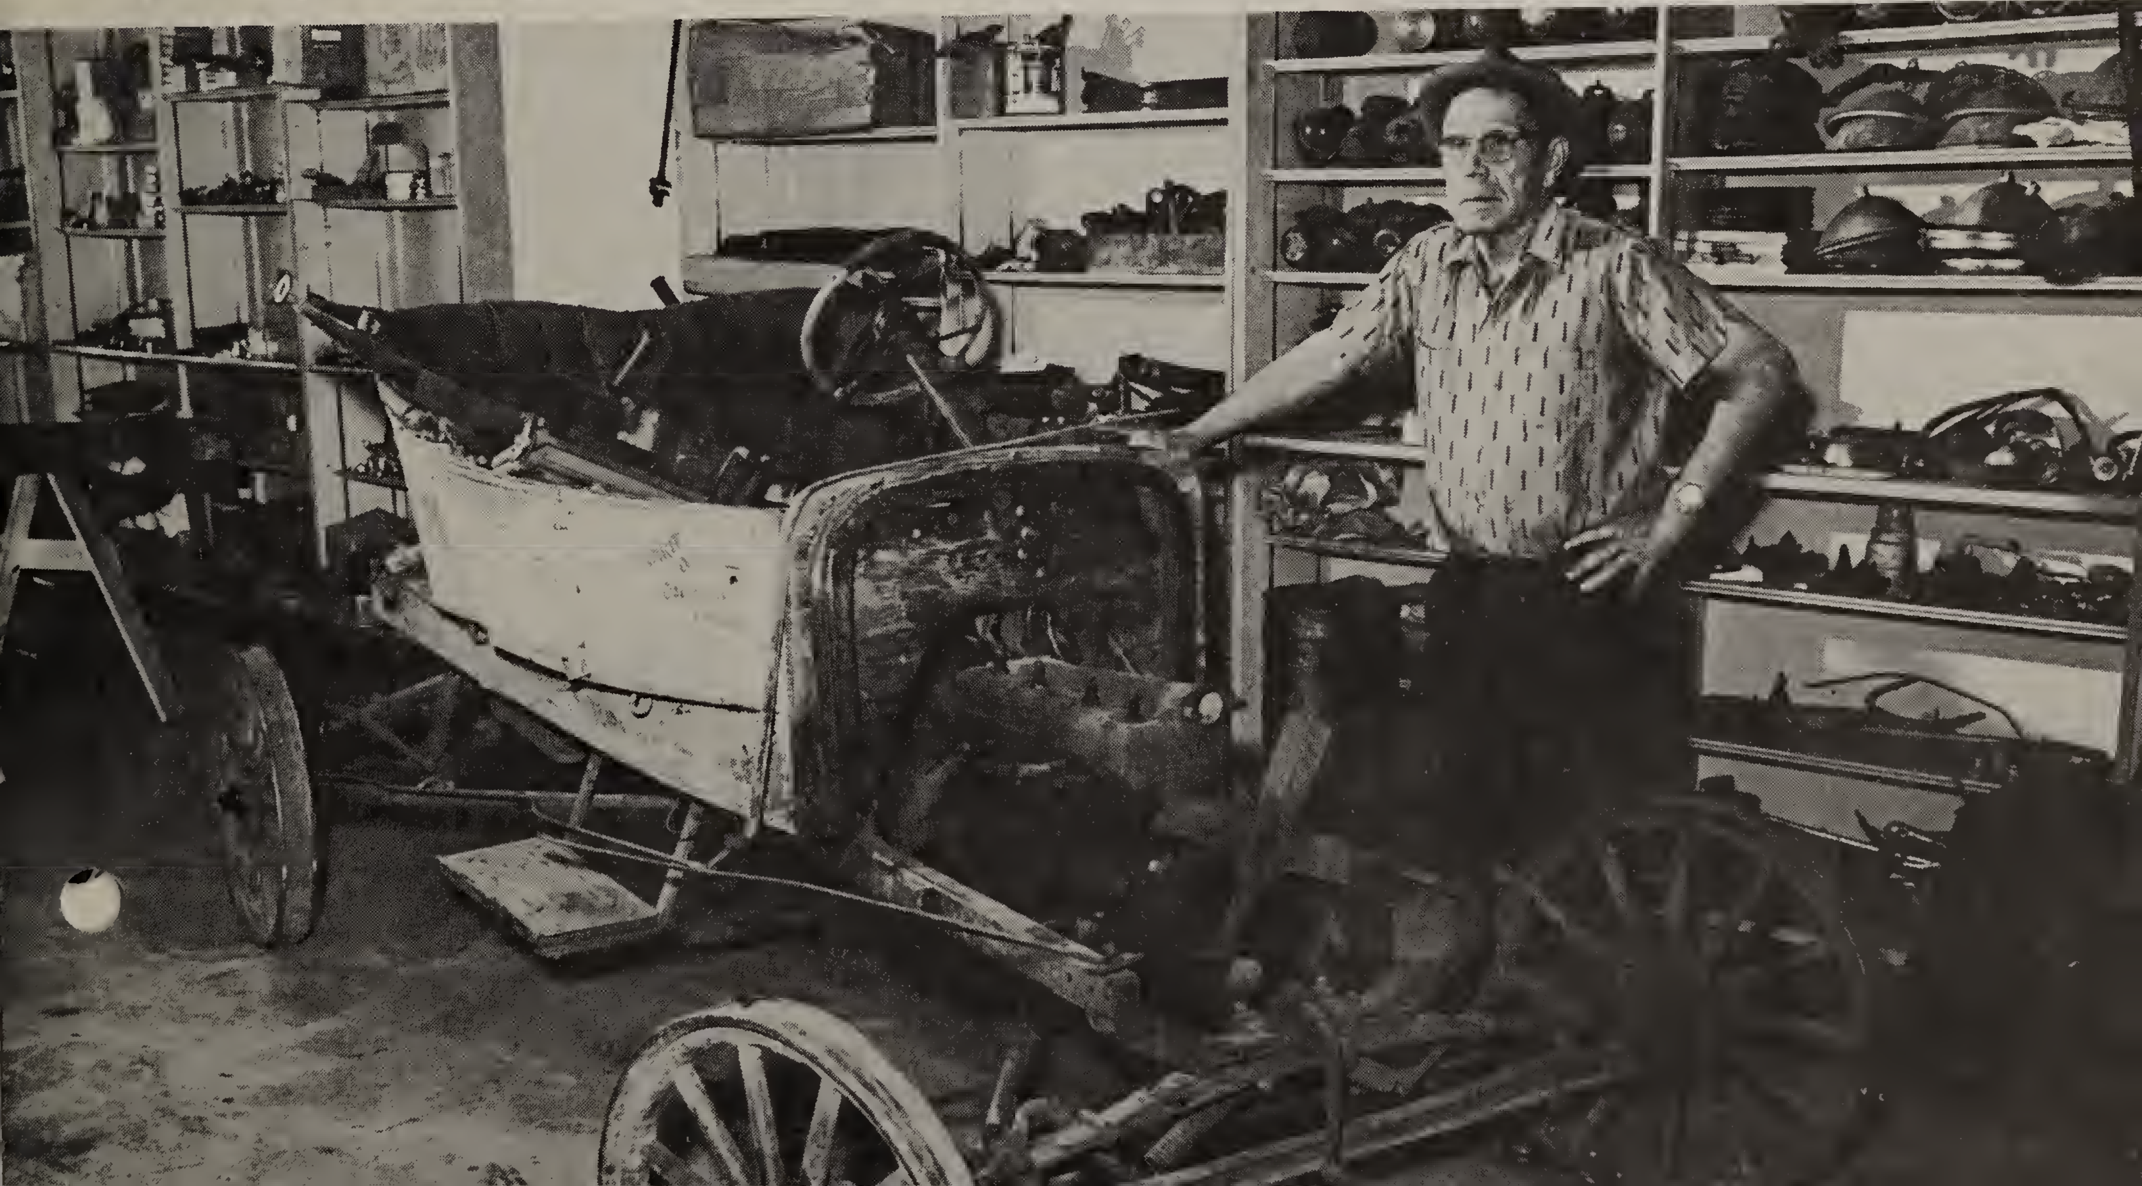
As soon as the vehicle is stripped down, Rector begins ascertaining which parts must be completely replaced and which can be salvaged. Then off goes an order to one of several firms which specialize in furnishing antique car parts. Eighty per cent of the time, Rector says, the items furnished are new but original and authentic for the model. In other cases, original dies or patterns are used to insure authenticity.

As restoration continues, other parts are usually necessary and these are ordered. Paint color of the original is ascertained during the tearing down process, for there is always a swatch of color under door coverings, under hoods or instruments panels, even in the burned-out specimens Rector calls "basket cases." Thanks to the storied stubbornness of Henry Ford, of course, most Model T models were black. But there are some classic exceptions in the Towe collection.

Since 1963, Rector has completely rebuilt the following cars: 1911 Touring, 1914 Touring, 1914 Roadster, 1926 Roadster, 1926 Touring, 1929 Model A Open Cab Pickup, 1929 Model A Phaeton, and a 1930 Model A DeLuxe Roadster. Although it varies, he strikes an average of one and a half restorations per year.

Mechanical work has come naturally to Lewis Rector since he was a boy on the family farm in Oklahoma, although he says that at the time it was a bothersome part of his "chores" to keep the machinery running. It is now a full half century since 15-year-old Lewis got his first paying job as a mechanic and worked on his first Ford, a 1915 model with a brass radiator. This was in a ga-

Restorer Lewis Rector stands beside a 1911 Model T Torpedo, his latest project of from-frame-up restoration at the Ed Towe Antique Ford Collection. This model, found by Collector Towe in San Leandro, Calif., was last driven in 1933 in a race of old cars from Oakland Airport to Reno, Nevada to commemorate the dedication of the airport. This car, stripped of fenders and other unnecessary equipment in the interests of speed, was the winner of that race, but then fell into decay. The words "Spirit of Oakland Airport" can still be seen on the side.



This sporty rumble-seated model, a 1930 Super Deluxe Roadster, is the only car in the Towe Collection which was bought new and worn out in Circle, the Eastern Montana town where Banker Towe began his hobby of collection. Two years in restoration, this was found in a junkyard, a prime example of what Rector calls a "basket case."

Lewis Rector stands (above) by one of the rarest cars in the collection, a 1934 Model C Phaeton with right-hand drive which Mr. and Mrs. Towe found in Uruguay early this year and literally drove home, over the Andes, through the deserts of Chile and Peru, the tropical jungles of Central America, and from Laredo, Texas to Circle, Montana a total of some 9,000 miles. Below is another new addition to the Towe Collection, a beautiful 1913 Express Wagon, acquired in Tulsa, Okla. in June. This black beauty with brass lamps and radiator is one of the few antique Fords which has not required at least some restoration. It was and is in mint condition.

rage in a tiny Oklahoma town, now no longer on the map, near Henrietta.

Rector says he had no vision that his future would be so bound up in Henry Ford's classically simple Model T. Rather, as a youngster searching for greener pastures, he worked variously at a lead smelter and in coal mines near Henrietta before returning to garage mechanics as a full time career.

For 11 years, Rector operated a Ford agency garage in Tulsa, Oklahoma, then in 1942 moved to San Leandro, Calif., where he operated a general repair garage. He continued to work at rebuilding antique cars (of a variety of makes), a hobby he began way back in the 1920's.

It was in 1961 that Mr. and Mrs. Rector drove to Montana in a 1915 Ford to participate in the cross-country race to dedicate the completion of Highway 20 between Missoula and Sidney. On this trip they met the late Governor Don Nutter and Mr. and Mrs. Ed Towe of Circle. The following year, when Collector Towe and his wife were in California on one of their many trips to find old Fords, they met the Rectors again, discussing the possibility of Rector joining them in the collection and restoration of antique Fords. When an opportunity came to sell the garage, the Rectors loaded up their belongings (which include a valued and indispensable set of tools) and came to Circle. The Towes then housed their growing collection in the basement of the First National Bank in Circle, one of 14 banking institutions with which Mr. Towe is associated. A new restoration shop and garage was built for Rector's use, and he began working on the several models in the collection requiring restoration.

In the Summer of 1967, thanks to favorable legislative action and the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Towe, the collection came to Helena for display under the aegis of the Historical Society. Quarters were secured at 1325 Helena Avenue, some six blocks north of our building, and the collection was dedicated on August 5. Since then it has been open to the public, with a full day viewing hours maintained during the summer months and from 1:00 to 5:00 P.M.

Lewis Rector adjusts the main bearing of a Model T Roadster, another of his current restorations. This vehicle, found in 1966 in Lincoln, Neb., is being "rebuilt from scratch," but is now ready for the refurbished body.

Wednesday through Sunday from Labor Day through Memorial Day. A marked increase in attendance was noted this Summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Rector, of course, "came with" the collection, and are now making their home in Helena, Mrs. Rector serving as admissions and guidance manager and her husband continuing his dedicated work of restoration, currently aimed at two vehicles: a 1913 Model T Roadster and a 1911 Torpedo, both pictured elsewhere in this issue.

Along with us, the Towes and the Rectors look forward to the time—not too distant— when the addition to our building will permit under-one-roof display of these beautiful old vehicles from the past. With an ever-growing inventory of antique Fords waiting for restoration at his hands, it is certain that Lewis Rector will not run out of the kind of work he loves.

GEOLOGY STUDENTS AT CARDWELL FIELD STATION VISIT US

A party of some 70 young men and women, dressed in field boots and outdoor garb and armed with cameras and notebooks, toured our building last month and paid particular attention to the display case showing some of the high spots of Montana's unusual geological development.

We discovered, upon talking with the group's director, Dr. Judson Mead of Indiana University, Bloomington, that this was one of four segments from the Indiana University Geological Field Station in the Tobacco Root Mountains near Cardwell, Montana which annually combine field trips with an intensive eight-week course of geological study in Montana.

The station near Cardwell, established in 1949, is a mecca for college students whose field of interest is geology and who make application each year for admittance.

Bob Morgan Slated for Grand Canyon Seminar On Museum Planning

Curator Bob Morgan has been informed of his selection to attend a seminar on museum exhibit techniques, scheduled for October 12-23 at Grand Canyon National Park, Arizona. Sponsored by the American Association for State and Local History and the National Endowment for the Humanities, the sessions will feature panel discussions, workshops and "how to do it" participation by some of the country's leading authorities in the field.

Members of Families Of Lewis and Clark Travel Historic Road

Lewis and Clark were exploring Montana again this summer, this time in the comfort of a modern car in which they followed well mapped routes and kept no journals for the benefit of Thomas Jefferson and a young nation.

Mr. and Mrs. Elba R. Lewis of Fairfield, Calif., stopped at a Helena service station on July 15 enroute from a trip to Alaska. During a brief conversation, they told the attendant they were both descended from the families of Lewis and Clark and had noted a particular interest in the explorations of their antecedents in this area. The station proprietor suggested they come to see us at the Historical Society.

Mrs. Lewis, the former Edna Faye Clark, grew up in Indiana. Her parents were George E. and Rella M. Clark. Her husband, also a midwest native, is a retired electrician. His parents were William F. and Drienzella Lewis. The couple has lived in California since 1941.

The Lewises have not delved into the geneology of their families to determine the line of descent, but both told us that grandparents and great grandparents had reminisced about the relationship when they were young children. It was not until after their marriage that they discovered their mutual backgrounds. Mr. Lewis is aware, of course, that his own descent could not have been through Meriwether, who died tragically in 1809 without issue. But he has decided that in the retirement years ahead, he and his wife will devote themselves to more fully tracing a remarkably coincidental heritage.

LORD OF THE ROCKIES . . . MAJESTIC BRONZE BY CHARLIE BEIL

The Montana Historical Society takes pride in offering, at a remarkably modest price, a superb sculpture of this "type specimen" Rocky Mountain goat, created and signed in 1926 by Charles A. (Charlie) Beil of Banff, Alberta. Only 20 bronzes, all of them numbered, have been produced from the original model, now owned by Mrs. Mary S. Willard. It is a fine example of the work of this modest man who was a working cowboy before he turned to serious art after he began a close, instructive friendship with C. M. Russell in Great Falls in the early 1920's. A resident of Banff for many years, Beil is one of the most successful sculptors in the Northwest, but remains a publicity-shy and down-to-earth person whose sense of humor, personality and artistic output are all reminiscent of the man he so admired in his youth. For more than 30 years, he has provided bronze trophies for champion cowboys performing at the Calgary Stampede. Many a cowboy cherishes a Beil bronze almost as much as he does his horse, for Charlie Beil is a consummate artist who captures the anatomy and "feel" of an animal with unerring fidelity. We urge you to write for further details and reserve your LORD OF THE ROCKIES, for this is a truly beautiful, limited piece of Western Americana.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

Since the Montana Historical Society operates on a fiscal year basis, it occurs to me that this might be a good time for a "report to the stockholders." The stockholders in this case would be represented by some 13,000 subscribers to our magazine and newsletter, who thus become members of MHS.

We refer to ourselves as roughly about a 50 percent enterprise operation. We generate "earned" funds through our active promotion and sales of our magazine, books, prints, bronzes and some miscellaneous merchandise. The balance sheet for the year just closed shows it to have been the best in our history in a material way.

There are other more intangible "balance" sheets. It has been a banner year in acquisitions for our historical library and in the field of art. Two major collections have come as gifts to the library, representing the papers of two early Montana leaders. Our galleries are enhanced by the addition of two fine Charles M. Russell paintings—an oil and a water color. These I mention merely to head the list of many score of gifts that have come to us from Montanans, former Montanans or other generous donors. And more is on the way.

MONTANA: The Magazine of Western History continues to show a healthy growth—both in its circulation and in quality and calibre of articles and art.

By the time The Post goes to press, our attendance for the year should have passed the 80,000 mark. Attendance drops sharply after Labor Day, but every day of the summer has seldom seen less than 600 visitors. Our top day was August 14, when 958 passed through our doors.

Very shortly, bids will be called by the State Department of Administration and Controller Ralph Kenyon for the MHS building addition. Our staff and board have been working closely for almost a year in planning with the architectural firm of Davidson & Kuhr.

Plans are in the making for changes and additions in our museum displays.

These are the highlights of our "balance sheet." We are grateful for the many expressions of support and goodwill we get. They are rewarding and they reflect the activities of a working Board of Trustees and an accomplished and professional staff.

MONTANA ELKS ASSN. CONFERS HONOR ON HISTORIAN JEWELL

John J. Jewell, lawyer, C. M. Russell aficionado, legislative authority, and veteran guide at the capitol and in the Society's building, received a well-deserved honor at the Montana State Elks Association meeting, held in Miles City late in July. He holds here an appreciation plaque given in commemoration of his work as state historian for the Elks, a post he has held since 1922 and which has resulted in his compilation of Elks history dating back to 1902. Named Honorary Lifetime Historian in 1964, Jewell has faithfully recorded the activities of this fraternal group over the years. Along with his contributions to Society activities through his effective work as guide and lecturer in our exhibits and galleries, he has made still another: his history of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks in Montana is now a permanent part of our archives.

Society Staff, Board Represented at Lemhi Pass Dedication

The Society was well represented Sunday, August 4, at the dedication of six new Lewis and Clark markers at the headwaters of the Missouri near Lemhi Pass, the awesomely beautiful pass traversed by the Explorers on the outward journey and the place where the Missouri rises as a small, clear spring.

Sponsored by the Beaverhead County Museum Association, the U. S. Forest Service and the Daughters of the American Revolution, the program was appropriately simple. A picnic was held at the wild flower refuge and memorial to Sacajawea, an area set aside 35 years ago by the Forest Service.

Guests were welcomed by Kenneth Keeney of Missoula, assistant Regional Forester, and invocation was by Father Taches of Dillon. Hal Stearns of Harlowton, member of the Lewis and Clark Trail Commission and the Society's Board of Trustees, gave the main address. As always, his remarks were nothing less than inspiring. Mrs. Walter Mondale, Montana regent for the D.A.R., gave the benediction, and there were informal remarks by Mrs. Fred Woodside of the Beaverhead County Museum, Dillon, who spearheaded plans for the day's program.

In the party from the Society were E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, also a Trail Commission member and on our Board; Mrs. Helen West of Cut Bank, secretary of the Commission and a member of our Editorial Board; and Editor Vivian Paladin. A special guest was Gus Budde of St. Louis, publicist for the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial.

A NOTEWORTHY BOOK: Just as we go to press, we have had a chance to look at a new pictorial history, this one covering the colorful past of Meagher County, from 1867 to 1967. Attractively bound and stitched, the book was published by the Meagher County Historical Society and the Meagher County News of White Sulphur Springs. Hundreds of historical pictures, gathered by the Centennial Pictorial History Committee, headed by Art Watson, tell the story of this county, named for Montana Territory's flamboyant Acting Governor. Inquiries may be directed to the publishers.

Fall Targets: Kick-Off on Addition, Frontier Street Museum

BUILDING ADDITION: FIRST FLOOR LEVEL

Architectural drawings of the Society's main and ground floor levels are seen here and on the next page, reflecting changes to be made in the present structure and what is planned for the addition. Above is the main floor level, the addition encompassed in heavy lines at the lower right. It will include a greatly enlarged Russell Gallery, two smaller galleries, one of which will house the Poindexter Collection of modern art, and a large gallery for the Ed Towe Antique Ford Collection. Our lobby and exhibition and sales area will be greatly enlarged to include the present Formal Russell Gallery. Offices, including those of the Director and Editor, will be located in the present Informal Russell Room and Gary Cooper Gallery. The ground floor level plans, printed on the next page, show library archival space and automobile restoration rooms in the new addition area, while the existing space will be used for the Frontier Street museum described in this issue, along with greatly enlarged exhibit laboratories, library stacks, publications circulation offices and shipping and receiving areas.

Plans for the addition to our building in Helena are now well launched, as the architectural drawings here demonstrate. Briefly, the addition will fill the L-shape of the present structure at its rear with two levels, each about 120 by 100 feet.

The 1967 Montana Legislature endorsed this and other projects in Gov. Tim Babcock's building program, ours to be administered by the State Department of Administration. An appropriation of $499,750 was ear-marked for our addition.

There is a story within a story here, for during the last few months, generous donors have offered an additional $40,000 for building purposes. This will help assure adequate space for the growing needs of the Society in its museum, library, merchandising, publications and administrative operations.

Mr. and Mrs. Ed Towe of Circle, who had previously provided the famed Ed Towe Antique Ford collection on a long-term loan, have pledged $20,000. Ford dealers of Montana (58 of them) have offered an additional $15,000. Mr. and Mrs. E. E. MacGilvra are providing $5,000. MacGilvra, recently reappointed to the Board of Trustees, has effectively served for many years, including two full terms as president. Instrumental in working for these generosities to insure full completion of the addition were Dr. Merrill Burlingame of Bozeman, recently reelected Board president, and MacGilvra.

Architects for the fine new addition, which in design and specifications will match the existing structure, are Davidson & Kuhr of Great Falls, with William Kuhr in direct charge. He is hopeful, along with us, that the first dirt may be turned on the building project by this fall.

Before the first excavation begins on the addition, however, Curator Bob Morgan and his assistant, Rex Rieke, should be well launched on the complete redesign of part of the ground floor level of the present structure, creating a frontier street scene, complete with thirteen separate establishments. The floor plan, seen above in a drawing by Morgan, shows them in sequence.

With the possible exception of the watchmaker's shop and the gun and saddlery shop (which will contain items so valuable that security may be a problem) all buildings will be open to the public to walk through. This is in contrast to many recreated frontier villages which allow the viewer to look only into the windows of "false fronts."

Authentic objects and decor of the 1880's will be used throughout these buildings. With the City of Helena soon to undergo urban renewal, it may even be possible to incorporate actual construction items from old buildings to be torn down—such things as moulding, wainscoating, metal embossed ceilings, light and heating fixtures, and many others.

Curator Morgan expects to begin actual construction this fall, with the first of the village establishments open for public viewing in June, 1969. There are a few items still needed, notably an authentic back bar and bar for the saloon, kerosene lamps and lanterns. Although it is expected that when the time comes, more than enough items will be available, any patron who has such things they would be willing to donate is invited to contact us. Authenticity, of course, is the key.

MONTANA FLYERS OF PAST AND PRESENT ATTEND DAEDALIAN CONVENTION

Seven Montanans who represent a great many years of aviation, from the barnstorming "seat of the pants" era to the air defense complexities of today, attended the annual meeting in June of the Order of Daedalians at Patterson Air Force Base near Dayton, Ohio. In the group was Frank W. Wiley, retired Air Force Colonel, former head of the Montana Aeronautics Commission and now an effective field representative for the Montana Historical Society.

Also attending were three pioneer pilots, who, like Wiley, were flying in the days when strut wires and glue were about all that held together their daring machines: Stanley Doyle of Polson and Howard Johnson of Butte, both retired Montana Supreme Court judges, Rancher Jack Milburn of Billings, and Retired Colonel R. F. Kitchingman of Great Falls. Representing Montana's modern role in aviation were Colonel William P. Comstock, commander of the 28th Air Division at Malmstrom Air Force Base in Great Falls, and Lt. Col. Jack Wilson of the Montana Aeronautics Commission, Helena.

The Daedalians, organized after World War I by pilots who sought to perpetuate the traditions of the Air Force and mix it with a sense of humor and fun, were named for the mythical Greek craftsman, architect and inventor, Daedalus, who invented wings for the escape of himself and his son, Icarus, when they were imprisoned by the King of Crete. The wings were attached with wax, which melted when Icarus soared too close to the sun, plunging him into the sea which bears his name.

Emphasis at the meeting, Wiley said, lived up to the tradition and humor of the Daedalians, but it was also an occasion for awards of many kinds, and doing honor to those who had made their "last flight" during the year. Among those so honored was K. W. "Knute" Bergan of Helena, who until his recent death was coordinator of Indian Affairs for Montana, and a pioneer aviator.

DARING FEATS OF SLIM YOUNG AVIATRIX THRILLED MONTANANS IN 1913

Fairs, rodeos, horseraces and parades have always been a part of Montana summer months, with only a little shifting of emphasis as the temper of the times dictate. A look at the late summer newspapers of Helena 50 or more years ago produces a nostalgia for such things as beautiful displays of grains, produce and flowers, sulky races, ladies in large hats and gentlemen in spats, fat cattle and large-hoofed work horses. Today, these things do not get the most newspaper space—even an air show must be the wing-touching jet formation variety to attract much attention.

At the Montana State Fair in Helena in 1913, the main attraction was the appearance in a Wright bi-plane, valued at $5,000, of a 21-year-old slip of a girl named Katherine Stinson. She was the youngest woman aviatrix in the world and the fourth woman in this country to earn a pilot's license.

Ten days before the Fair opened, Miss Stinson wired the secretary: "Shipped plane yesterday for your fair. Will see you on my arrival about fifteenth inst. You bet I'll fly!"

And fly she did, soaring into the skies twice each performance day to thrill the throngs which had come from all over Montana, many of them by special train from Butte and Great Falls. She winged over the grounds and dropped flowers on the monument built to the memory of Cromwell Dixon, a daring aviator who three years before had flown from the Helena Fairgrounds to the top of the Continental Divide, an unprecedented feat. A hero to everyone who witnessed him rising so high in his frail craft, Dixon was killed only a week later in a flight exhibition in Spokane.

Sworn in as a postoffice employe with the approval of Postmaster General Burleson in Washington, the 110-pound aviatrix flew Montana's first airmail, delivering 1,333 postcards and letters to the postoffice, where they received a special cancellation and were sent on their way by rail and stage.

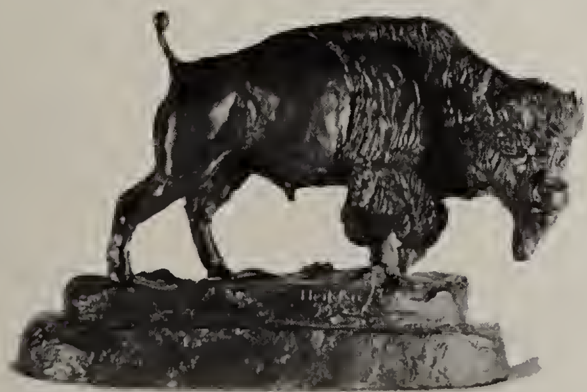
"Though a strong wind was blowing," the Helena Herald said, "Miss Stinson had perfect control of her machine."

Record crowds filled the grandstand 55 years ago, not only to see the aerial skills of Miss Stinson, but to bet on races, applaud daring aerial stunts by vaudeville performers, to be "drawn to its feet" by the recklessness of wild west riders. More than 300 babies were entered in the Better Baby Contest, there were contests for boys growing the best ear of corn and for girls showing off the best needlework.

At Deer Lodge, a long-time penitentiary inmate named Mike Foley was escorted to the fair there by Warden Frank Conley and enjoyed, among other things, the first automobile ride of his life. Sentenced March 20, 1879 for an "impulsive murder," Foley had been offered parole a number of times during his 34 years of confinement but always begged to be allowed to remain behind the walls. A Helena paper, in describing this event, said the prisoner kept the warden and all seated around them busy answering questions about things he had never seen or which were but dim memories.

President Woodrow Wilson, beset with Panama Canal and Mexican troubles and dark clouds gathering in Europe, struck a note still applicable when he sent this wire officially opening the festivities in Helena 55 years ago: "My message to those assembled is a very simple one. We are all one people, all love the same justice, all seek the same liberty and should all stand together for the same common purpose."

SCULPTURE BY HEIKKA . . . . . FOR THE DISCRIMINATING COLLECTOR



THE HEIKKA BUFFALO

Height: 8″
Width: 5½″

While they last:
$350.00 each

Earle Erik Heikka, who was reaching the height of his powers as a sculptor at the time of his tragic death at 31 in 1941, left an unforgettable mark on the world of Western Art. Now this deeply detailed study of a buffalo bull is available in a superb bronze, cast by Roman Bronze of New York, and at a price within the reach of many. The Historical Society has only a few left in stock, and must sell them on a first-come, first-serve basis.

The genius of Earle Heikka, born at Belt, Montana in 1910, was recognized in 1928 when William Andrews Clark III, scion of the famed mining family and a patron of the arts, saw some of his work on a Montana visit and arranged for a showing at the Stendahl Galleries, Los Angeles, the following year. From then on, Heikka sculpture was purchased by such men as Cornelius F. Kelley of the Anaconda Company, C. R. Smith of American Airlines, and many others. His work is notable for almost unbelievable detail, authenticity and beauty. We feel sure you will want this small but impressive example in your collection. Write for further details—we'll welcome your inquiry.

REAPPOINTED MEMBERS of the Society's Board of Trustees were photographed in front of our building as they attended the important July meeting. From left to right they are Dr. Ray O. Bjork of Helena, E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, and Newell Gough, Jr. of Helena. The reappointment of the three men to new five year terms was announced earlier in the month by Gov. Tim Babcock. Dr. Bjork, well known former educator and now on the medical staff of the Veterans Administration Hospital near Helena, was appointed to the board on August 3, 1967, to fill the unexpired term of Sam Gilluly, now our Director. MacGilvra, long-time legislator, rancher and utility company official, was first appointed on July 13, 1960, by Gov. J. Hugo Aronson. He has served as board president for two separate terms, and is now vice president. Gough, a Helena attorney, came to the board on January 7, 1957, also by appointment of Gov. Aronson. He has served terms as both president and secretary of the Society's governing body.

General Custer rode and fell in multiple actions on Montana's Little Big Horn this summer as Indians and Whites of the area again worked together to stage the re-enactment that has attracted national attention. It was the writer's first experience as a spectator, and we found it a moving and evocative performance, especially when a part of the Seventh Cavalry rode in silhouette along the ridge down to that last rendezvous.

The press duly noted various problems encountered, such as site, weather and manpower. All these were overcome. But there is a story of deeper significance in the work of the Big Horn County Special Events, Inc.

Dr. Merrill Burlingame of Bozeman, president of the Montana Historical Society, emphasized this not long ago when, at a gathering in Hardin with some 100 of the "Last Standers," he presented a commendation from the American Association for State and Local History.

Awards go to individuals or organizations who work to preserve their cultural heritage. Dr. Burlingame was impressed by the inter-racial co-operation and community effort, which were major factors in the award.

At the same gathering, Henry Old Coyote, who has the role of Sitting Bull in the annual show, pointed out how the Indian people, once looked upon as a sideshow, have become a part of the society in which they live.

Some 92 years later, the Custer battle is paying dividends that couldn't have been predicted in 1876. May the Boy General ride again—and again!

The Society joins in a hearty welcome to Dr. Leslie C. Drew, formerly assistant director of Yale University's Peabody Museum, who has arrived at Bozeman to serve as director of the McGill Museum of the Rockies on Montana State University campus. Dr. Drew has already visited us in Helena. Plans are well under way for construction of a new home for this important sister museum.

What can be done with the documentary film, even on a modest budget, was demonstrated to us at the Society late last month when John Wheeler, Jr., head of the Television and Film Division of the University of South Dakota in Brookings showed a full color, sound film entitled "Harvey Dunn, Painter of Pioneers." Narrated by John McIntire, television actor who lives part-time on a Montana ranch, the film was produced by Wheeler, native Montanan and graduate of Montana State University in Bozeman.

We were especially interested in this professional and moving treatment of the life and work of Harvey Dunn, the major collection of whose paintings are at Brookings. In the Winter, 1966 issue of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, we published an article, illustrated in full color, on this superb artist who was one of America's best known illustrators before serving in World War I where he produced what is still considered the finest combat art to come out of that conflict. His later works, many of which he donated himself to his native South Dakota, are devoted to picturing the pioneer men and women of this vast and sometimes inhospitable prairie land.

All of us had one more reason to be proud of Board Member Hal Stearns of Harlowton last month when it was announced this erudite publisher and raconteur was awarded a $100 prize and plaque for Montana's best travel feature of the year. He was one of 42 weekly newspaper editors and writers entered in the nationwide search for the best travel writing, conducted by Southern Illinois University and the American Oil Company. Hal, a knowledgeable enthusiast of the Lewis and Clark Expedition, had as his theme a boat trip in which he participated down the same water route taken by the explorers.

Politics in 1888: a Mosaic of Bitterness, Strategy, Humor

"The first day of June is the introduction of what we trust may prove a glorious summer," enthused the Helena Daily Herald in 1888. It proved to be the introduction as well to a bitter and strategic political year, nationally and in Montana. Grover Cleveland, unpopular in many quarters for his stand on tariff reduction, lost the electoral vote to Benjamin Harrison. In Montana, the coming War of the Copper Kings is generally dated from 1888, when an improbable coalition joined by Marcus Daly and other Democrats was credited with the defeat of William A. Clark for Delegate to Congress. The victor: an ambitious young Republican named Thomas H. Carter.

As both political parties prepared for nominating conventions 80 years ago this month, it is interesting to look through the editorial columns of Helena's two daily newspapers, both militantly partisan, from June, 1888, through the elections in November of that crucial year.

"We know already in a general way what will be done by these conventions," said the Republican editor of The Herald on June 1. "The Democrats have announced a policy which if adhered to and carried out into law will bring ruin to our leading interests and industries. As we wish the prosperity of Montana, we can but desire the discomfiture and defeat of Cleveland . . ."

The Democratic Independent, understandably, applauded the nomination of Cleveland which came by acclamation in St. Louis a week later: "There has never been any practical opposition to him . . . The masses have always been with him and they will continue to stand by him."

Later in June, on the 25th, the Republicans met in Chicago. In a compromise move, they nominated Benjamin Harrison, grandson of the tired old general who had lived only a month after he entered the White House 44 years before.

Harrison's nomination again drew sharp division in the Helena papers. Said The Herald: "The choice of Benjamin Harrison is one which will satisfy every Republican. He is the heir of an honored name which he has made still more honored. He may not sweep the country as his grandfather did in 1840, but in some respects the campaign this year will resemble that one."

Countered The Independent next day: "The Democrats have nothing to fear . . . So far as political sagacity in the way of nominating a strong ticket is concerned the Republicans have made a serious blunder. Harrison is really the weakest candidate they could have named . . . He has none of the elements of popularity. As a well known citizen of Helena aptly described him yesterday: 'There isn't a rattlesnake in the Rocky Mountains as cold as Harrison'."

That Benjamin Harrison was a cool customer was reflected in the columns of The Herald as election day dawned on November 6. A dispatch from Indianapolis, printed in the Helena paper, reported how General Harrison passed the afternoon at his home in that city:

"He is by odds the coolest person about the house . . . An Associated Press correspondent had a pleasant chat with him this evening. With his little grandson on his knees, he manifested no uneasiness, worriment or excitement. The same may be said of Mrs. Harrison, who goes about her household duties as usual . . ."

Out in Montana, the weather was cold but the candidates for Territorial Delegate were hardly cool. Neither were Helena's rival editors, when in their issues of November 7, they reported a sweeping Republican victory in Montana and in the nation.

Said the triumphant Herald: "Election day in Helena closed with the first snowstorm of the season and the feathery flakes proved but prophets of the political storm that raged yesterday from one end of Montana to the other and plowed under deep and effectually the Democratic for Delegate to Congress, Hon. W. A. Clark . . ."

The Independent hinted at dark doings: "The defeat of Mr. Clark . . . appears to be certain. If this probability is sustained by later returns it will show the existence of a peculiar state of affairs in the Democratic party of Montana. Mr. Clark was the unanimous choice of the territorial convention. He accepted the nomination very much against his own inclinations and with the assurance that he would have the hearty support of his party associates . . . It is evident, therefore, that other causes must have been at work to cause Mr. Clark's defeat. . ."

Two days later, on November 9, all returns were in. The Independent then had some reserved "lesser of two evils" praise for Mr. Harrison, commenting on his clean personal record and extending the hope that he would not be influenced by James G. Blaine who had not chosen to run. As for Mr. Cleveland, The Independent blamed his defeat on the fact that "his position on the tariff question was, apparently, in advance of the sentiment of the country."

The joy of the editor of The Herald was unrestrained: "We have lived to see Montana Republican and are happy. We shall see her a State and shall be happier still."

Casting a shadow ahead to the day of political exposure on radio and television was a dispatch from New York telling about a practical test with Mr. Edison's "wonderful talking machine" at a political rally in Orange, N.J.

"The funnel, seven feet long, looking like a huge cornucopia, was placed in front of the platform, with the large end pointing toward it. The small end was connected wtih the transmitter of the phonograph . . . After the meeting, an exhibition was given of the power of the instrument. Several persons put the tubes to their ears, and the pleased and wondering expressions of their countenances testified that they heard and understood what the machine said."

And right after the election, there were some noises about woman suffrage. But The Independent editor concluded: "The addition of women to the voting population would not improve matters in any way . . . Without reflecting in any way upon the intelligence of women, it may be said that they are not as a class qualified to exercise any rights of a political nature they do not now possess."

As it turned out, the American woman voter had another 30 years to wait. In 1888, she could but vicariously admire the fortitude of a defeated Grover Cleveland and the beauty of the young woman he had married four years before, and at the same time wonder what kind of First Lady the wife of the cool Benjamin Harrison might make. And in London, her English sisters were terrorized by a mad butcher who killed by night and was still at it. On November 10, 1888, Jack the Ripper claimed his eighth victim.

FIRST PLACE NATIONAL AWARD FOR MAGAZINE

Just as we go to press, Editor Vivian Paladin was informed that MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY has received another first place award from the National Federation of Press Women, meeting in convention in Wichita this month. The magazine was entered in the national contest by virtue of its first place Montana Press Women's award in April. It was entered in the publications edited by a woman division.

Four of the 15 members of the Montana delegation to the dedication May 25 of the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial in St. Louis are seen in this picture, taken on Friday, May 24, at Wood River, Illinois, at the confluence of the Missouri and Mississippi, where the Lewis and Clark Expedition actually began. The men attended a dedication of the memorial plaque seen in the background. Montanans pictured are: extreme left, E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte; third from left, Hal Stearns of Harlowton; back row, extreme right, Orvin B. Fjare, state advertising director, and J. K. (Ken) Ralston, Billings artist. Others in the picture are, second from right in front, G. Edward (Gus) Budde, public relations director for the Lewis and Clark Trail Commission of Missouri, while the man with pipe, fifth from right, is William Clark Adreon, great great grandson of the Expedition's Co-Captain, William Clark. Others in the Montana delegation, largest from any western state, were: Asst. Advertising Director Josephine Brooker, Dick Baldwin, Bob Blair and Tom Clavin, all of Helena, Mrs. J. K. Ralston and Mayor Willard Fraser, Billings; Don Henke, Stan Todd, Dick Sloan and Dennis Beer, Big Timber, and John C. Austin, Hamilton. The Big Timber delegation, dressed in buckskins, manned a dug-out pirogue as part of the colorful pre-dedication activities at Wood River.

Museums Meeting Keye

Montana is serious about preserving the records and objects of its past, and the theme is cooperation and mutual pride of heritage. These were the keynotes last month of the second annual meeting of the Museums Association of Montana held at the Society's building in Helena. Some 70 people, representing 25 separate institutions participated in what was nothing less than an inspiring meeting in which ideas were exchanged and the solid business of "how to do it" received the emphasis.

PETER YEGEN, JR.

After the call to order by President Peter Yegen, Jr. of Billings, the mood of the meeting was set by Dr. Merrill Burlingame of Bozeman, who not only plays a leading role in the burgeoning Museum of the Rockies at Montana State University but heads the Society's Board of Trustees.

Society Director Sam Gilluly welcomed delegates, then spoke of aims the Montana Historical Society has in common with other museums throughout the State, notably the fact that Montana must not merely deplore the energetic "carpetbaggers" who have made off with some of the raw material of Montana's past, but must now be prepared to work in concert to see that we seek out, preserve—and in many cases, share—that which remains.

Gilluly introduced members of the Society's staff, who spoke briefly about their activities, particularly as they re-

The role of business in assisting the local or regional museum was explored by Bob Henry of Metals Bank and Trust in Butte, followed by an illustrated talk by Robert L. Leinart of the Fort Benton Museum. Leinart, whose remarks were followed by a discussion by other delegates, explained how displays are developed at this outstanding museum at the historic head of Missouri River navigation.

Orvin B. Fjare, state advertising director, pointed out the vast importance to Montana's tourism industry of all Montana's museums and historic sites. Peter Meloy, Helena tax attorney, talked on tax and estate matters as they affect non-profit institutions, and explored the availability of foundation funds. E. B. "Ed" Craney of Butte, president of the Greater Montana Foundation and a leader in organizing the museums group, ended the full meeting with a talk on its aims and accomplishments in its first year.

At a business meeting, last year's officers were reelected: President Yegen, Vice President Leinart, and Mrs. Don Tavenner, Deer Lodge, Sec.-Treas.

Registrants and institutions represented: Edwin L. Phares, Little Log Cabin, Harlem; Dr. William L. Jellison and John L. CELESTIALS IN PIGTAILS, dramatically important in the development of the West, are featured in this important new segment of the Formal Museum's Mining Frontier Room. Recently completed by Curator Bob Morgan and his assistant, Rex Rieke, the case contains authentic Chinese artifacts and actual pictures of Chinese participation in placer mining, railroad construction, and truck gardening. Work is almost complete on another important display in the area, dramatizing silver mining in Montana.

THE COYOTE . . . A C. M. RUSSELL GIFT OF GRATITUDE CAST IN BRONZE

In 1913, the Cowboy Artist fashioned this once-familiar but now almost extinct prairie howler and gave it to Norma Linderman Waller, daughter of his friend, Frank Bird Linderman. The noted author and public official had been instrumental in procuring two crucial art commissions for Russell: the Montana Club painting, "When the Land Was God's," and the greatest of them all, "Lewis and Clark Meeting Indians at Ross' Hole," for the House of Representatives chamber in Helena.

The Montana Historical Society was privileged to arrange with Mrs. Waller for the casting of this cherished wax model. Thirty numbered bronzes were cast by Roman Bronze, Inc. of New York, and we have a limited number still in stock. Mounted on walnut base, the bronze measures 4 inches high, 3¼ inches long, and 2⅜ inches wide. For an authentic and beautiful Russell bronze, the price tag is modest: $700.00. We'll gladly send all particulars and a full color picture.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

The past month has been one of kaleidoscopic experiences for all of us at the Montana Historical Society. My own travels have convinced me of the growing interest of Montanans in their heritage and their determination to preserve the story of the past.

Two fine examples are explored more fully in this issue: the dedication of the third marker in Toole County along the route of historic old Whoop-Up Trail, and the second annual meeting in our building of the Montana Museums Association. Inspiring occasions, both.

Another pleasant journey for the Director was to his old home area around Glasgow, where the Valley County Historical Society is launching plans for a museum. Leaders in the movement are planning carefully and deliberately with a regional approach that will be successful in telling the colorful and varied story of this Hi-Line area.

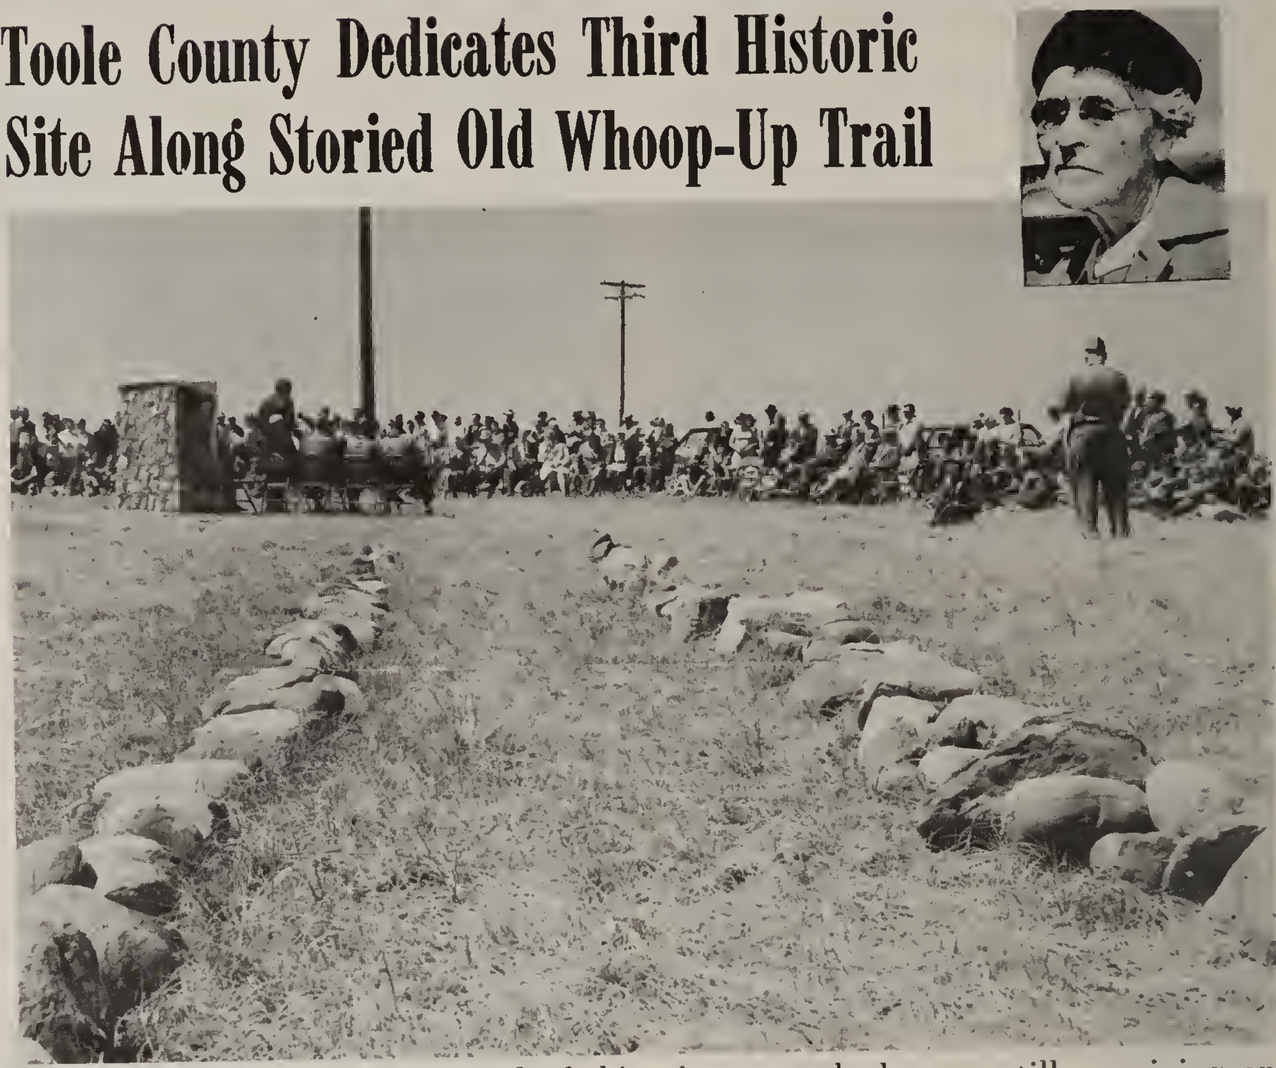
Here in the building, Editor Vivian Paladin is in the final stages of preparation for the summer issue of MONTANA, The Magazine of Western History. This issue will feature, in part, Lewis and Clark, and I believe it will be one of the finest in our publishing history.

Historical Library activities continue at a growing pace. In one afternoon recently, as an example, Librarian Mary Dempsey received a call from the White House Curator to get information about the Bitterroot, our state flower (resulting in the donation of a fine color photo by Ernst Peterson of Hamilton) and a little later was on the phone with CBS News in New York City, which was seeking TV information about the Negro in the early West. You may see some of this soon in a documentary.

Curator Bob Morgan's fine new display on Lewis and Clark, which will receive a great deal of exposure during the next year or two, was shipped off to St. Louis for showing at the dedication of the Memorial Arch late last month. We are proud of it and the fine delegation from Montana which attended the St. Louis ceremonies. It included two of our Board members who are also on the Lewis and Clark Trail Commission, E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte and Hal Stearns of Harlowton.

Withal, it was a busy and exciting month. —SAM GILLULY

Toole County Dedicates Third Historic Site Along Storied Old Whoop-Up Trail



PHOTOS BY JACK GILLULY, EDITOR, THE LBY PROMOTER

The rocks in the foreground of this picture mark the ruts still remaining on the old Whoop-Up Trail, near where it crosses Highway 2, some three miles east of Shelby. The scene here took place on Sunday, May 19, when this historic site was dedicated. Mrs. Jesse M. Pingel (inset) who deeded an acre of land from the original Pingel homestead for the marker and grounds development, was an honored guest at the ceremonies, during which Director Sam Gilluly was featured speaker.

Joining in the development and sponsorship of this third Whoop-Up Trail marker in Toole County are the Marias Museum of History and Art at Shelby, Boy Scouts and Scouts of the Nu Ooh Ska District, BSA, and the Shelby History Group of the Montana Institute of the Arts. The Montana Historical Society's Board of Trustees officially designated this an historic site after conferences with Mrs. Ruby Benjamin, Mrs. Eldora Coover and Don Harvey, all of Shelby.

These history-conscious people have already dedicated markers at the site of old Fort Conrad at the Marias River Crossing 16 miles southeast of Shelby and at the international border nine miles west of Coutts-Sweetgrass where the storied Whoop-Up Trail crossed from Montana Territory into Canada.

This historic wagon trail headed northwest from Fort Benton to Fort Whoop-Up, the trading post which was built before the border between the two countries was formally surveyed. It then extended to Fort Macleod when that outpost of Canadian authority was established in 1874. Trade goods went over the route by ox-drawn wagons which carried furs back to Fort Benton.

With the cooperation of the Boy Scouts of Canada, seventeen uniform signs have now been placed along the old ruts. These, with the three monuments, now give the traveler of today the exact route of the trail which was so important in the settlement of the Canadian-American West.

Momentous Acquisitions Include Power Papers, Major Russell Oil

Recent months have seen some of the finest acquisitions in years for the Montana Historical Society and, if some current activities come to fruition, even more are on the way.

"The theme of these gifts is one that has recurred frequently and one that has truly built our Society," commented Director Sam Gilluly. "Almost everything of value that we have has come to us because of the forethought, generosity and historic sense of Montanans or former Montanans."

Easily one of the greatest library acquisitions in Society history is the collection of T. C. Power and Charles B. Power papers and records. Librarian Mary Dempsey reports that so extensive is the collection that it will require several years to evaluate, sort and catalog the material.

The Society is indebted for this outright gift to Judith Margaret Tobin of San Francisco, Thomas Benton Tobin of Los Angeles and Jane Lynn Tobin, now in Atlanta, Ga., with VISTA. They are great-grandchildren of T. C. Power and grandchildren of Charles B. Power. The transfer came with the co-operation of their parents, and Mrs. Thomas D. Tobin of Helena. Mrs. Tobin is the daughter of the late Charles B. Power. Society Trustees who earlier had discussed the acquisition with the Tobin family are Mrs. Charles Bovey of Great Falls and Newell Gough, Jr. of Helena.

CHARLES BENTON POWER

The Power collection in many, many boxes and other containers—has been stored in the basement of the Power Block in Helena. It has long been a magnet drawing Montana history scholars. Power has accurately been called a merchant prince, and was one of Montana's first United States Senators.

Close on the heels of the Power collection announcement came word that the Society has acquired a new and important Charles M. Russell oil, a gift from the estate of Mrs. Clinton J. (Gertrude Mayn) Backus, a former Montanan who died in Long Beach, Calif., last December 22. Mr. Backus gave his full co-operation to the Society in making the transfer. Ambush of the Pack Train, an oil believed to have been done in 1896, is now hanging in the Society's formal Russell gallery.

Expressing special pleasure at the new acquisition was Curator Robert F. Morgan, who calls the early work a major addition to the Society's extensive Russell collection. The oil portrays five mounted Indians moving around a cliff as the leader holds up his right hand. In the mid-distance is a pack train, while the snow-covered Belt mountains compose the background.

The painting was a gift to Mrs. Backus in 1911 from her first mother-in-law, when Mrs. Backus married J. Stanley Smith. Mr. Smith died in 1918, and Mr. and Mrs. Backus were married in 1924. John Smith, original owner of the painting, was a Martinsdale area rancher.

Mrs. Backus' father, Charles Mayn, was an early-day merchant and rancher in the Helena-White Sulphur Springs areas. Her mother, whose maiden name was Amelia Lepley, came from a family prominent in early days in the Fort Benton area.

The Society's informal Russell room also has been enhanced by a gift from James T. Harrison, Chief Justice of the Montana Supreme Court. Justice Harrison, a versatile hobbyist, has long collected stamps. The collection he gave the Society represents first-day covers for the Charles M. Russell Centennial Stamp, on first mailing from Great Falls on March 19, 1964. The date was the Centennial of Charles M. Russell's birth.

The justice's covers, attractively framed by Curator Morgan, bear signatures of various elective officers of the state and other officials.

Another contribution to the Society's historical material came recently from O. A. Bergeson of Dillon, long a leader of reclamation and water conservation activities in Montana. Mr. Bergeson's papers will help throw light on many activities, Miss Mary Dempsey, Society Librarian, commented.

Life in a Montana river town three-quarters of a century ago is reflected in an 1881-83 register of the Centennial Hotel in Fort Benton, which came as a gift from James B. Casey of East Helena. Casey's grandfather, Robert Simpson Culbertson, operated the hotel in the last century.

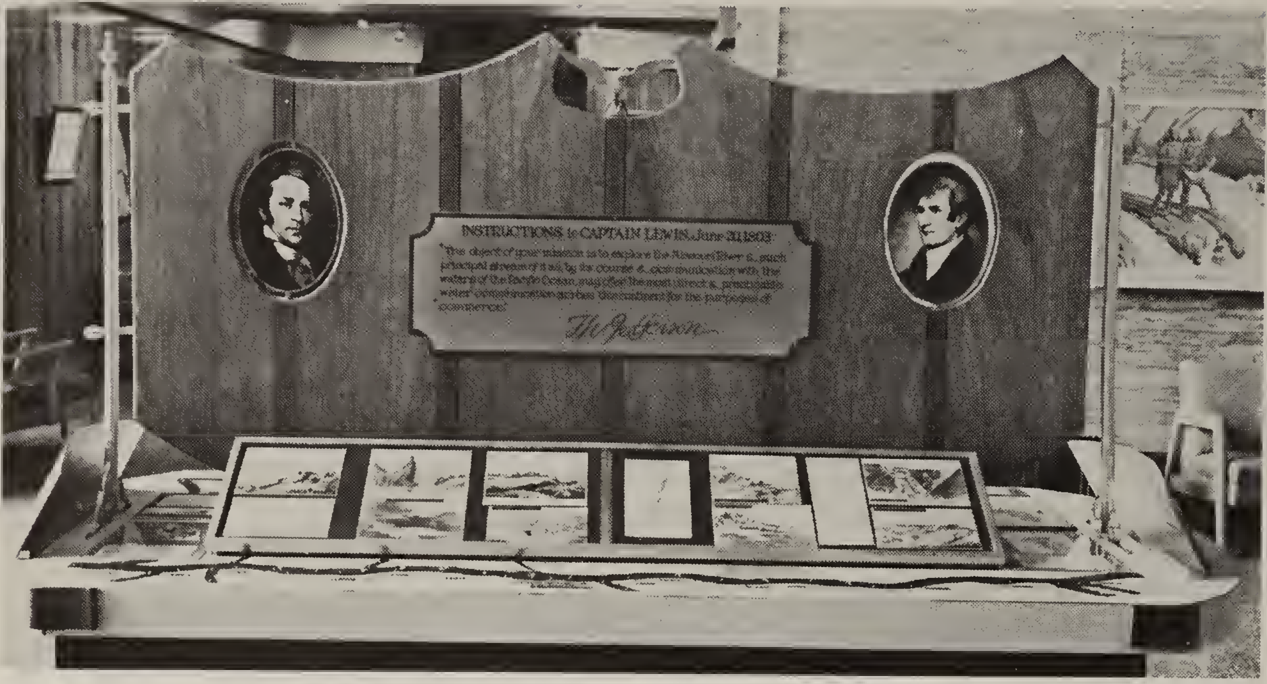
Display Depicts Lewis and Clark in Montana



The exciting highlights of Lewis and Clark's explorations along the Missouri and Yellowstone Rivers are given visual impact in this display, created by Curator Bob Morgan and dedicated late last month by Gov. Tim Babcock, the Lewis and Clark Trail Commission, and our Board of Trustees.

The two great rivers are outlined on either side of the display, with events labeled at exact points, complete with dates. Fuller labeling, based on the Lewis and Clark Journals, combine to give the viewer a capsulized concept of both the adventures and accomplishments of these intrepid men in what is now Montana. Research for the display was headed by Librarian Mary Dempsey, who spoke for the Society staff at dedicatory ceremonies.

Presiding was Dr. M. G. Burlingame, president of the Board, who introduced Governor Babcock. Speaking for the Lewis and Clark Trail Commission was E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, who is also a member of our Board.

The display was designed for disassembly and travel, and after a period of display at the Society building's lobby, it will be taken throughout Montana so other Montanans, particularly children, will receive the benefit of its visual educational potential. It will be utilized by the State Advertising Department for this purpose, since the Lewis and Clark Expedition is being featured as never before in highway maps and other tourism literature.

Facilities Enhanced at Plains Indian Museum

Visitors to the Museum of the Plains Indian and Crafts Center at Browning will be greeted this season with enhanced exhibit, gallery and crafts facilities, thanks to the first extensive remodeling project since this fine institution was founded in 1941.

Director Ramon Gonyea recently informed us that the remodeling work will make for broader display of the Museum's famous collection of Plains Indian art and ethnology, and for expansion of its research and archival holdings.

Located at the intersection of Highways 2 and 89 on the eastern approach to Glacier National Park, the Museum was funded in 1938 under a PWA grant to the U. S. Department of the Interior. Completed in 1941, the facility not only contains interpretive exhibits of Indian life and culture, but has become one of the best repositories in the Northwest for research materials. Moreover, its crafts department, founded in 1936, provides an outlet for the native arts and crafts of the Blackfeet and fellow tribesmen from a dozen reservations.

Kansas City Reader Recalls First License Plates in Colorado

Memories of old car license plates were called forth by the feature we published in the February number of THE POST. Arthur F. Lyster of Kansas City, Mo., wrote some reminiscences on the subject to his friend, Branson Stevenson of Great Falls, a member of our Board of Trustees.

Referring to the plate captioned "Deluxe Leather, circa 1911," Lyster recalled: "My father's first car, the one in which I learned to drive, was a 1911 Packard. In Colorado also there were no state licenses in those days, so you went to the nearest county seat town, in our case Greeley, and bought what then was regarded as a permanent license.

"Ours was 450, and as they were numbered consecutively, ours was only the 450th car which had ever been licensed in our rather populous county. The plate was deluxe leather, made specially to our order by one of the local harness shops. The heavy brass numbers, actually designed for house numerals, were bought at the hardware store and riveted to the leather plate. When, and very frequently, we shined the brass trim on the car, we shined the numerals too."

Referring to MONTANA the Magazine of Western History, Mr. Lyster went on to say that he had given a copy to a young couple living across the street, who in turn had shown it to another young woman in the neighborhood. The latter asked where it came from, for she said her father had been born and raised in Helena.

"A few days ago," Mr. Lyster continued, "a man in about my age group came to the door, and introduced himself as Carstensen, saying that he was the father in question, and that his father for years had run the Placer Hotel. He himself, after service in World War I, had gone to southern Missouri, attended school, and spent the remainder of his active days in Missouri and Arkansas."

"All in all," the letter concluded, "you can see that your magazine has been of considerable interest in local circles."

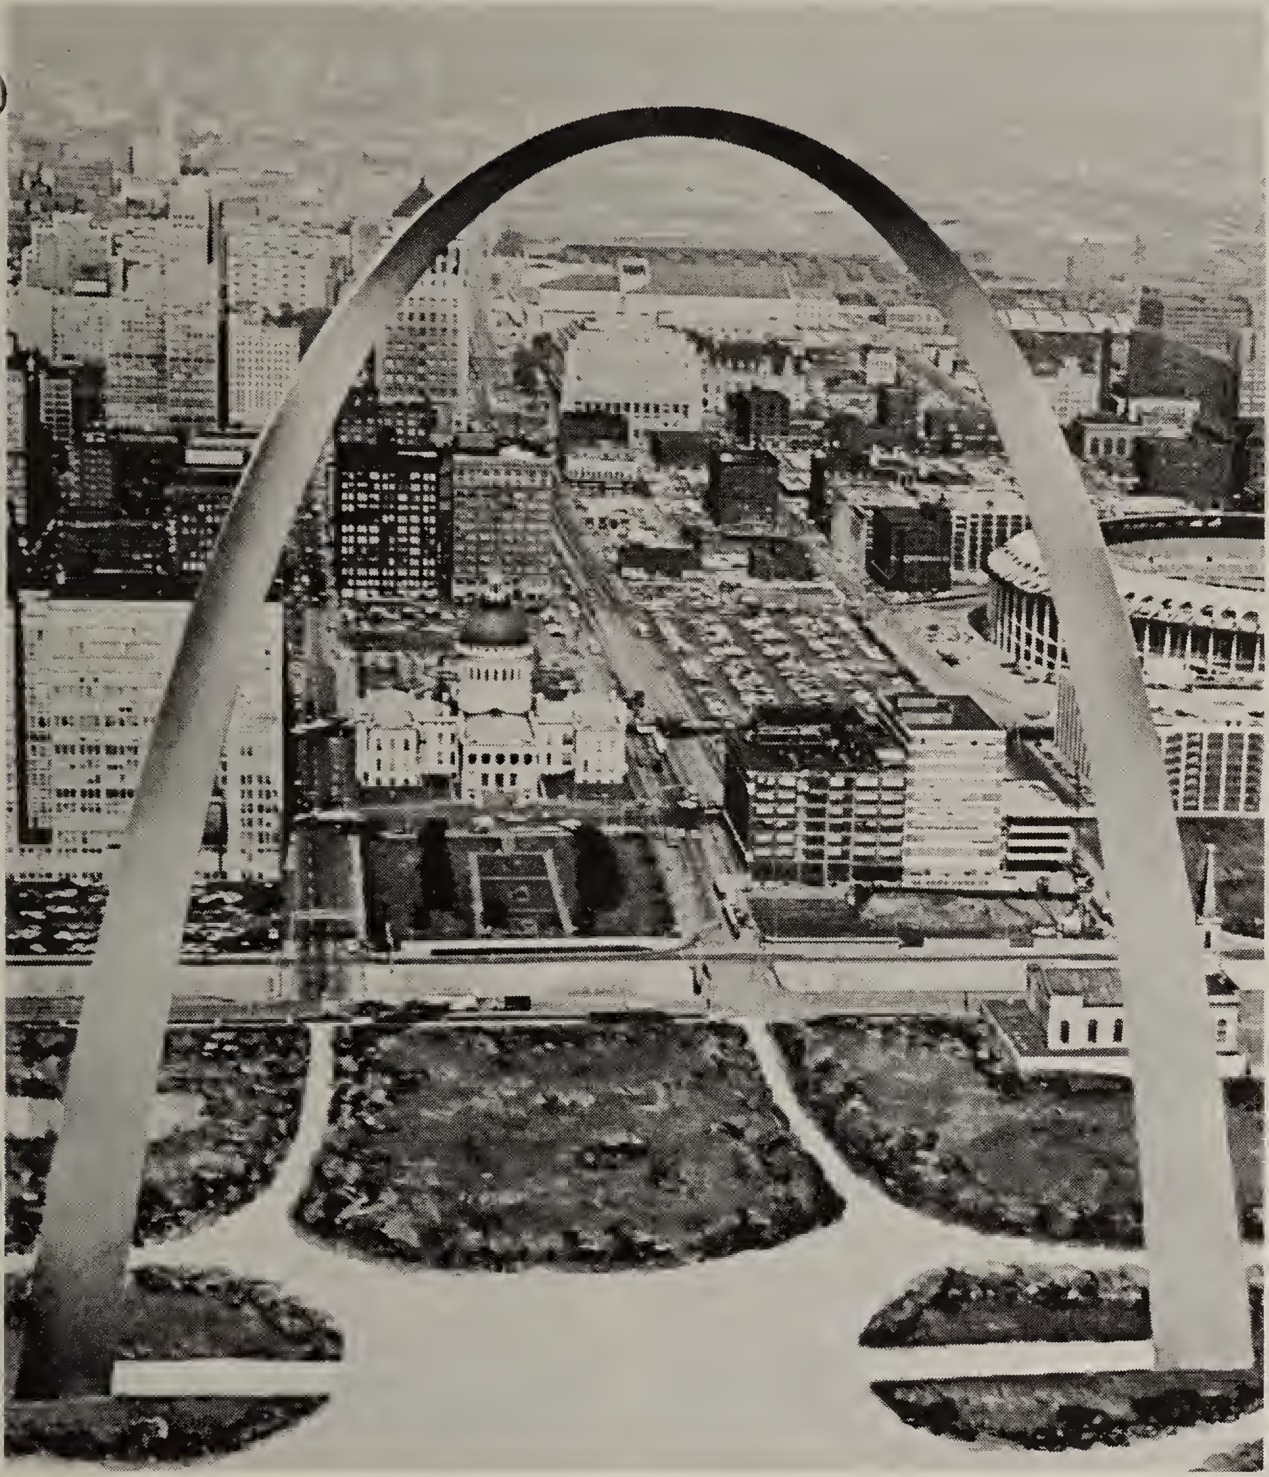
MEMORIAL ARCH, JEFFERSON EXPANSION MEMORIAL SET FOR DEDICATION



America's largest memorial to its progress will be dedicated in St. Louis on Saturday, May 25, with the official opening of the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial and the soaring Gateway Arch which straddles the point from which the nation began moving westward in 1803.

This is the culmination of a dream of more than 30 years ago, when Franklin D. Roosevelt signed an executive order creating the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial. Since then has come the matter of condemning old buildings along this historic waterfront, tearing them down, acquiring lands, rebuilding rail lines, holding a nationwide architectural competition, and actual construction of a truly unique facility.

The winning design, by Finnish architect Eero Saarinen, features the great arch, whose height (630 feet) is equal to the span between its massive legs. It is 75 feet taller than the Washington Monument. The only taller non-functional structure in the world is the Eiffel Tower in Paris.

Underground, beneath the arch, is one of the country's great museums, showing with first-person "experience" techniques the drama of America's westward expansion. Montanans, many of whom plan to attend this momentous dedication, are particularly proud that a painting by J. K. Ralston of Billings, showing Lewis and Clark meeting the Shoshones in Southwestern Montana in August, 1805, is a part of the Memorial displays, currently hanging in the old Courthouse, encompassed in the Memorial grounds.

Ron Drake, Library Aide, Recipient of Scholarship Awards

Ron Drake, who has served faithfully and efficiently in the Montana Historical Society library as stack boy during his high school years, is destined for progress in his chosen field in college.

A Helena high school honor student, Ron has been the recent recipient of three scholarships. He will receive the $250 annual (renewable) Dow Chemical Corporation scholarship and a $200 part tuition scholarship at Montana State University. Also presented to him has been a $30 slide rule, as winner of chapter competition of the National Society of Professional Engineers, Monsanto Division. Our Society staff confidently predicts a fine career for Ron. He is the son of Mrs. Jeanne L. Drake of Helena.

A MEMORABLE WINDFALL OF RARE BOOKS

Our Business Manager, Dick Duffy, was amazed and delighted to acquire a small stock of two books long hard to come by, one an autographed first edition. TRAILS I RODE by the venerable old cowboy, the late Con Price, and illustrated by his friend, C. M. Russell, is the 1957 first edition, and each of the few copies we have carry Con's signature on the flyleaf. The price: only $5.00. Then at $7.50, you can order the famed biographical study of the Cowboy Artist by Ramon Adams and Homer Britzman, with prologue by the artist's friend, Irvin S. Cobb, and containing more than 150 illustrations. In the circumstances, all we can do is urge haste on the part of all those who have long wanted these for their bookshelves.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

Of more than passing interest to the Montana Historical Society was the recent announcement that C. R. Smith, Chairman of the Board of American Airlines, has been appointed Secretary of Commerce by President Johnson. It is not Secretary Smith's first service to the nation. But to us in Montana he is known as a man who has been a constant and interested patron of the Society for more than 20 years. C. R. Smith has given us some of our finest C. M. Russell water colors and pen and ink sketches. He has made loans to us from his excellent collection for reproductions that appeared in a 1966 portfolio of western art. And he has helped direct to us other valuable art objects. Montanans should wish the new Secretary well.

Sometimes, our interests take on an international flavor. When Bengt Odevall, Swedish Consul General for this area, recently visited the Museum, Libraries and Galleries in Helena, with Mrs. Odevall, we asked him what he wanted to see. "Your fine Russell art and the White Buffalo," was his reply. "Where did you hear about them?" we asked. "Why, from the Countess Estelle Bernadotte," he said. The Countess Bernadotte herself is the owner of several fine Russells. The Odevalls spent about two hours in our building; they left reluctantly, and we were reluctant to see them go.

Of more than passing interest to us was the recent historical conference of the Rosebud Sioux Tribe at Rosebud, So. Dak. Some very hefty names in the field of western history were represented on the program, including James H. Howard, director of the W. H. Over Dakota Museum at the University of South Dakota, Harry H. Anderson, executive director of the Milwaukee County History Society in Wisconsin, Don Rickey, Jr. of the National Park Service, Father Peter J. Powell of St. Augustine's Indian Center in Chicago, and many others. We are proud also that a member of one panel discussing the past and hoped-for future of the Rosebud Sioux was Joe S. Dent of Miles City, president of the Eastern Montana Historical and Archaeological Society and one of the newest members of our own Board of Trustees.

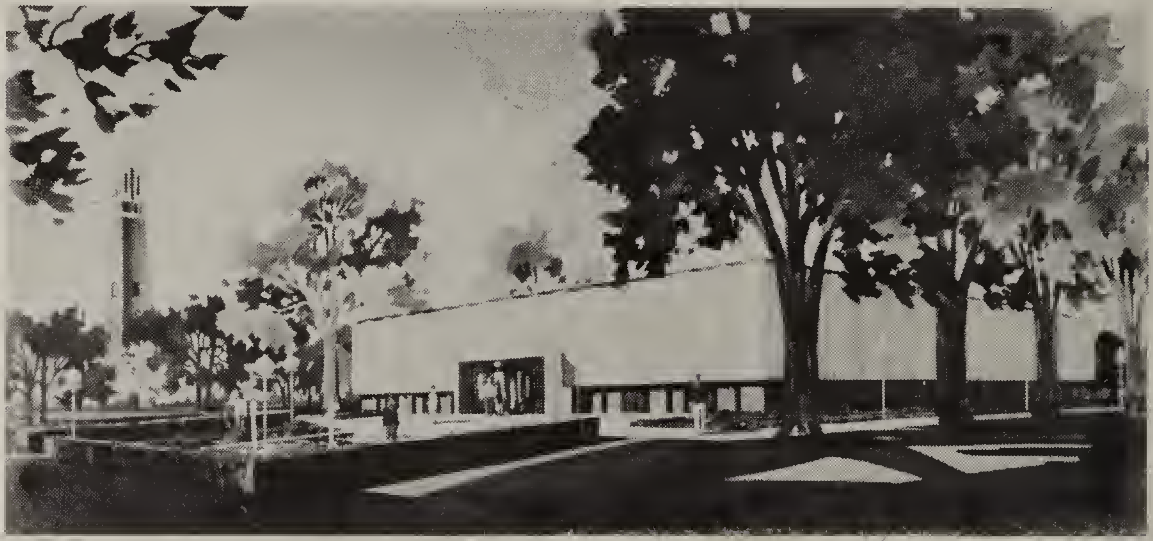
Harvey Dunn Art to Have New South Dakota Home

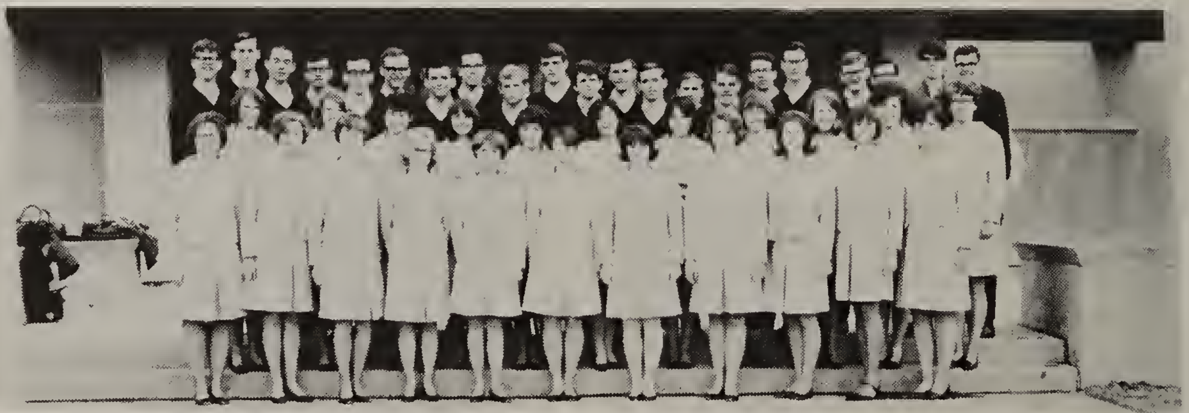


Construction is expected to begin shortly on this imposing building on the campus of South Dakota State University in Brookings which, among other things, will house the University's collection of more than 50 pioneer paintings by Harvey Dunn. To be called the South Dakota Pioneer Memorial Art Center, the building is being designed for continuing education and undergraduate classrooms, and as such will be eligible for a federal grant under the Higher Education Facilities Act.

The remaining $333,333, however, is being raised by gifts from citizens and businesses, with special appeals going to those firms and individuals who helped South Dakota and the region emerge from its pioneer stage and who grew and prospered with the state.

Harvey Dunn, whose strong and beautiful paintings were featured in the Winter, 1966, issue of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History, will now find a new home for the visual display of his moving artistry. At the same time, our sister state will add another dimension to its cultural life.

SEATTLE PACIFIC COLLEGE CHOIR MUSEUM VISITORS



Nearly half a hundred young men and women comprising the Seattle Pacific College Choir were photographed in front of our building in mid-March after touring the building with their director, Professor Philip J. Mack. The choir, on its annual spring tour, was heard in concert that evening in Helena's Alliance Church under sponsorship of the Association of Evangelical Churches of the capital city. The a cappella singers were on their furthest eastward tour which was to take them to Bozeman, Sheridan, Cheyenne and Denver before returning to classes in Seattle.

A Backward Glance at a Fateful Law: The Income Tax

So far as the average American is concerned—especially at this time of year—the most awesome action ever taken by the Congress was on October 3, 1913, when a reform-minded Woodrow Wilson signed the Underwood-Simmons law. It was this measure which, while lowering time-honored tariff barriers on many consumer items, instituted the graduated income tax.

A temporary income tax had been in force during the Civil War, and went unchallenged because of the stress of the time. But in 1894, when Congress passed an income tax law, the Supreme Court declared it unconstitutional. Then in February, 1913, came the fateful Sixteenth Amendment: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several states, and without regard to any census or enumeration."

As soon as the amendment was ratified, editorials, articles and cartoons began appearing in newspapers and magazines throughout the country, for it was obvious now that the income tax was to be a fact of national life.

"The predictions made by The Tribune that the income tax principle, once established, would not long remain at the modest figures first proposed is finding rapid confirmation," editorialized the Great Falls Tribune on September 13, 1913. "The income tax law is not yet in the statute books, but already it has been radically changed in its terms. In fact it has been made progressive, the rate of taxation rising rapidly with the larger incomes. Now the radicals are determined to make the rate still higher on the larger incomes—as much as ten per cent on incomes of a million a year . . . We are not casting any reflections on the income tax. It is all right under present circumstances. But it is a little amusing to note the enthusiasm of the man with one thousand a year and two thousand a year for this tax, feeling pretty sure, as we do, that his present grin will change to a frown when the limit reaches him. Just now he feels safe, but he is working splendidly with his little saw on the limb that holds him up, and he will be so surprised and grieved when it gives way and dumps him into the tax soup kettle."

The magazine, The American Review of Reviews, published two definitive articles on the new law early in 1914, as Americans began realizing their obligation to report income of the year before. Wrote Benjamin S. Orcutt in an article titled "Complexities of the Income Tax" in the January issue: "The wisdom of the law, except under extreme conditions of need for extra revenue, is still a mooted question, but the fact of its existence is a condition and not a theory, and discussion of its administration is one of the burning topics of the day. The ablest lawyers, the most experienced and astute businessmen, the most careful students and writers fail utterly to agree as to its interpretation and scope."

Within the welter of provisions of the law was the exemption of "up to $3,000 in the case of a single person, and up to $4,000 in the case of a married person—either husband or wife, but not both." The levy on taxable income: one per cent, plus a 1/6 per cent surcharge on incomes over $20,000 a year. There were not so many in the latter category, nor indeed were there so many government officials, whose compensation was exempt in the 1913 law. It was estimated, however, that between 400,000 and 450,000 Americans, plus thousands of resident aliens, would pay something like $115,000,000 the first year.

Said an article by James R. Merriam in the February, 1914, issue of the Review of Reviews: "All told, then, there are probably more than a half million people in the country who must begin this year to take heed at their peril of a new significance that will attach henceforth to the date March 1. For that is the date which fixes the limit of the time allowed for filing with Treasury Department officials the personal income accounts of all who are subject to the tax which the law imposes."

As editors began publishing biting cartoons about mounting costs of government and individuals began calculations to determine if they were exempt or liable to help pay them with an individual income tax, Pancho Villa was busy at revolution in Mexico, women were marching throughout America to gain universal suffrage, there was a fear of militarism in both Germany and Japan, and the Panama Canal was about to open.

It is more than 50 years since the first individual income taxes were paid in this country. It would seem that grumbling about taxes and the cost of government then were premature. But it takes only a brief look at Montana's first newspaper, The Montana Post, published nearly a half century before 1913, to realize that grumbling about taxation was nothing new. In an editorial in the April, 1865 issue, the Virginia City editor pointed out the need for municipal taxes to finance civic betterment. "It is the inalienable right of the Anglo Saxon race to grumble at everything, and when there is nothing to grumble about, they grumble at that," the paper said. But instead of grumbling about taxes, the editor suggested that the Alder Gulch citizens could "growl about the snow, the mud, the weather, and the Indians."

A month later, however, the Montana Post editor had some words about the complicated tax and license laws of "this portion of the vineyard." His editorial, in the issue of May 13, 1865 (which also printed a community letter of consolation to Mrs. Abraham Lincoln in her recent bereavement), went on to say: "The different points continually arising remind us of Bullum vs. Boatum, wherein a bull seeing hay in a boat walked in to help himself, and finished off by eating the hay rope which held the boat. Thereupon the boat floated off, upset, and the bull drowned. Four actions arose. One charged that the boat carried away the bull; another, that the bull ran away with the boat. And both parties brought an action against the water bailiff—the one for the loss of the bull, and the other for the loss of the boat. The tax laws are almost as mixed up. . ."

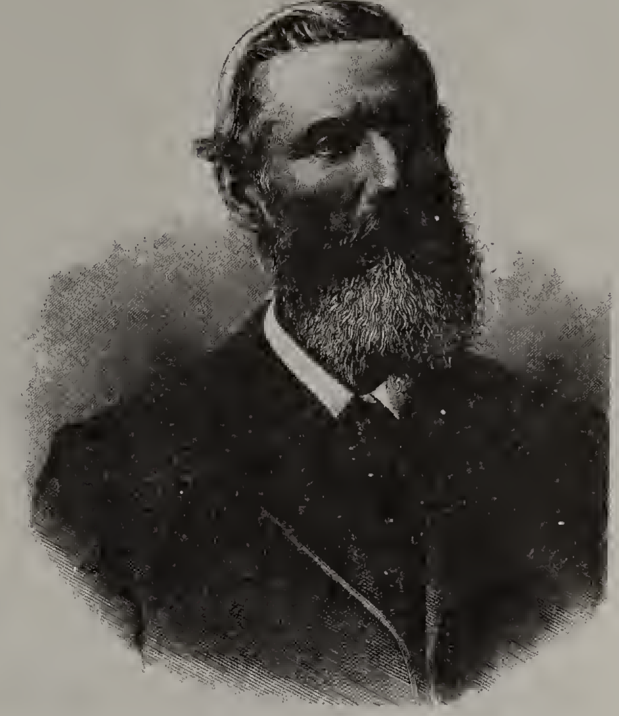
SOCIETY ACQUIRES IMPORTANT GRANVILLE STUART SKETCHES, MEMORABILIA

The Society this month completed a long-awaited acquisition: a series of drawings by Granville Stuart, one of Montana's earliest and most eloquent pioneers, along with a collection of letters, notebooks and other materials belonging to "Teddy Blue" Abbott, Stuart's son-in-law and an early-day rancher in the vicinity of old Giltedge, near Lewistown.

More than 40 of the Stuart sketches are in a personal notebook, while others, including some watercolors, are of larger size. The drawings, some of which were published in 1962 under title "Granville Stuart, Diary and Sketchbook of a Journey," were purchased by the Society from an eastern gallery, while the Abbott material was acquired and presented to us by a patron.



GRANVILLE STUART

Many of the sketches depict a Missouri river journey which Stuart undertook in 1866 aboard the steamboat W. B. Dance, and are accompanied by his own pungent descriptions of the journey which started on April 14 "up the longest, crookedest, muddiest, coldest and most monotonous river in the world."

Stuart, who figured in Montana's history for more than 60 years as gold discoverer, rancher, Historical Society founder and finally as ambassador to Uruguay, was an articulate man, apparently always aware of the need for recording Montana's beginnings which he was witnessing. His sketches are carefully detailed, almost architectural in nature, and because many of them depict very early trading posts such as Fort Union and old Fort Peck, now gone, they are unusually important to the researcher into Montana's past.

Indian Painter Ellsworth Is Subject of Beautiful New and Limited Edition

The life and work of Clarence Arthur Ellsworth (1885-1961) are subject matter for a beautifully printed, limited edition book entitled "Ellsworth—Artist of the Old West." Containing full color and black and white reproductions of Ellsworth's art, the book is actually a labor of love on the part of Otha Donner Wearin of Hastings, Iowa, a close friend for many years of this modest bachelor whose paintings reflect a deep and abiding affection for the American Indian, especially the Sioux. Because of its limited printing, this will undoubtedly become a collector's item. Inquiries will be welcomed by Historical Society. We were able to procure only a few copies from the publisher, for sale on a first-come first-serve basis.

Little Big Horn Associates Provide Outlet for "Buffs"

More than 200 people who have a particular interest in the Custer Battle are members of the Little Big Horn Associates, an organization which not only acts as a lively forum for opinions and contributions of "Custer buffs," but also publishes a hefty newsletter once a month which contains some amazingly good articles on the subject, along with book reviews, member addresses, and other information. Membership dues are still only $6.00 yearly, and we recommend it to all who want to participate as well as keep abreast of what is going on in the world of Custeriana. The address: Robert Bruce MacLaine, Sr., 3315 North 27th St., Tacoma, Wash. 98407. There are no professional qualifications for membership beyond a genuine interest in the subject.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

"Miss Alice," a Montana nurse, had a part of her heart in the Montana Historical Society. As a result, the Society has acquired ownership of its first piece of art by a noted painter of wildlife, Carl Rungius. Entitled Mule Deer, it is hung on the second floor of our building, near the entrance to the library and the director's office.

Alice H. Ralston, 83, died October 29 of last year at Hillcrest Home in Bozeman. A longtime friend of E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, a past president of the Society, Miss Ralston had worked out with him an agreement before her death which made it possible for the Society to acquire the fine oil, which she owned. The agreement has now been confirmed with Miss Ralston's heirs, and the oil has become a part of the Society's permanent collection.

Miss Ralston, a graduate of both Montana State University, Bozeman, and the department of nursing at the University of Pennsylvania, enlisted in the British Army at the outbreak of World War I. Upon entry of this country into the conflict, she joined the U.S. Army nurse corps.

For a number of years, after the war, Miss Ralston was a nurse in the family of Dr. Philip G. Cole, former Montanan who had an estate near Tarrytown, N.Y. and who had an extensive collection of western art, including major works by C. M. Russell and Olaf Seltzer of Great Falls. Miss Ralston, who traveled extensively with the Cole family, retired in 1942. For many years she made her home at Wise River, Montana.

Trustee MacGilvra has voiced the Society's deep gratitude for "Miss Alice's" forethought and consideration. As he says, she was always a true Montanan, although her work sometimes took her far afield.

It is interesting to note that the Society houses an outstanding collection of other major Rungius paintings, on loan from P. A. B. Widener, former Montana rancher now living in Florida. They are a fine cross-section of the work of this German-born artist who began painting in 1889 and died in 1959 at the age of 90 in New York City. Rungius, who maintained a studio for many years at Banff, Alberta, was considered by many to have been this century's outstanding painter of wildlife.

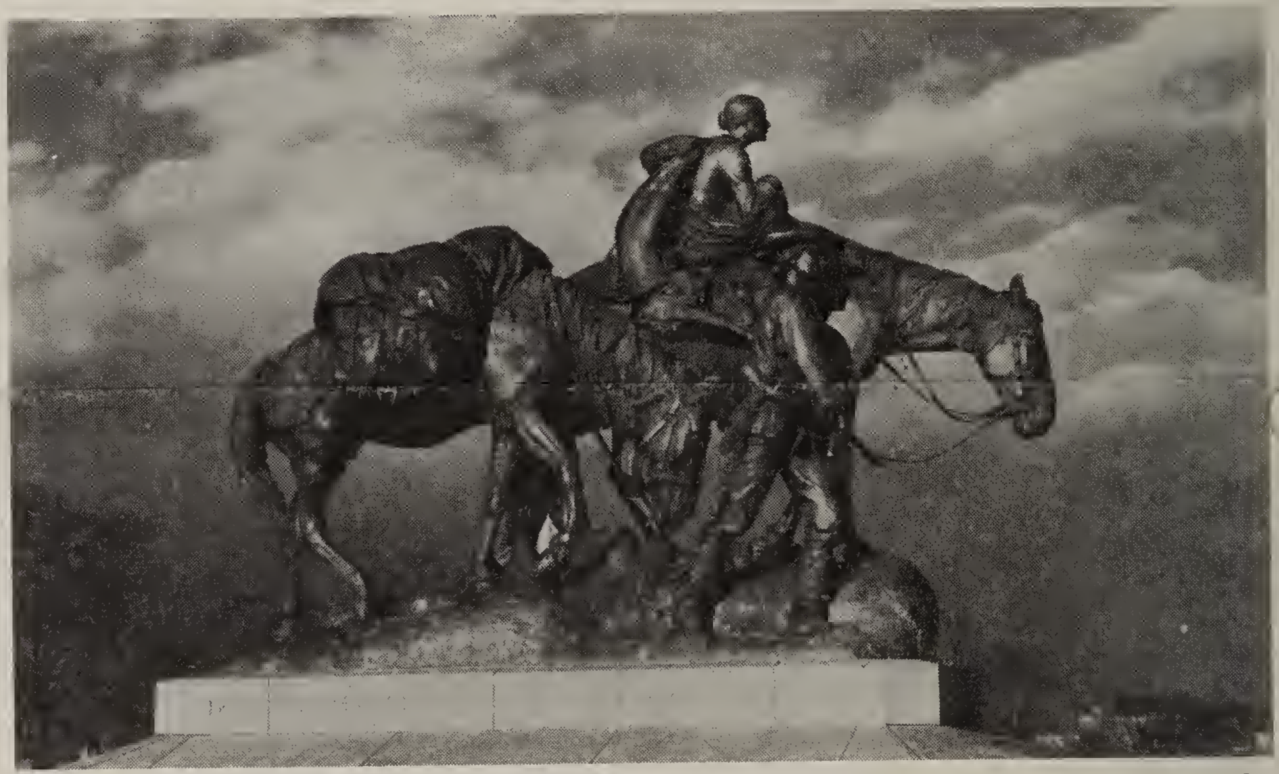
Story Behind Proctor's Massive Statuary Which Overlooks Downtown Kansas City



Two pieces of heroic statuary, both pictured and described in MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, stand in Penn Valley Park overlooking downtown Kansas City, Missouri. One is THE SCOUT, a beautiful equestrian Indian statue done in 1915 by Utah-born sculptor Cyrus Dallin, whose story was told in the Winter, 1968, issue of the magazine by Smithsonian Ethnologist John C. Ewers.

The other is a massive group statuary, THE PIONEER MOTHER, placed in 1927 on this historic eminence near the trail which once led from Westport Landing to Westport, Missouri. It was sculpted by the renowned A. Phimister Proctor, whose life and works were the subject of an article in our issue of Winter, 1964.

The story behind the Proctor statue was published in a recent issue of the Westport Historical Quarterly. It was written by Howard Monnett, co-editor of the publication and a descendant of the pioneer family depicted in the bronze masterpiece.

Working from pictures and family records, Proctor fashioned the figures of Major Daniel Vanderslice, his son, Thomas Jefferson Vanderslice, the young man's wife and infant son, Howard. It was the late Howard Vanderslice who commissioned the work and donated it to the city of Kansas City in memory of his parents and grandparents.

The small party set out from Kentucky and arrived in Westport—now the site of Kansas City—in the spring of 1853. From there they went on to Kansas, where Major Vanderslice, veteran Indian fighter, became agent at the Great Nemaha Indian Agency near present day Highland, Kansas.

One of the most-photographed pieces of statuary in the country, THE PIONEER MOTHER was cast in bronze in the Roman, Italy studios of Phimister Proctor.

Evolution of the Gas Buggy License Plate in Montana

Among the woes of winter—besides slippery roads, mounting fuel bills and income taxes—is the yearly necessity of having one's car assessed, paying both tax and license fees, and receiving either a new set of lightweight aluminum plates or a tag updating the old plate to the current year.

There was a time, however, when Montana motorists were simply assigned a number, which they were then expected to affix to "placards" of their own devising. The "distinctive number" was to appear on a white background in "black Arabic numerals not less than three inches long, nor each stroke less than one-half inch in width." The whole placard, to be not less than 12 inches long and four inches deep, was to be securely fastened to the vehicle "so as not to swing." This was in 1913, only a decade or so after the horseless carriage first began scaring horses and horsemen in America.

There was a time, too, when Montana license plates were made of pressed fibre . . . in some cases, soybean plant fibre. It was wartime 1944, and by legislative action, the Registrar of Motor Vehicles was empowered to use whatever material was at hand. There was sufficient metal to make traditional plates for trucks and official state cars; the ordinary motorist was provided with bright green tags made of fibre, lettered in white. Many a rural resident discovered, to his horror, that the family flivver had nothing but the bolts remaining at front and rear. Livestock had found the soybean variety to be tasty fodder.

The complete collection of Montana automobile license plates, donated to the Montana Historical Society by the George R. Pierce family of Billings and now displayed with the Ed Towe Antique Ford Collection in Helena, contains examples of all these "oddball" plates, including a deluxe all-leather plate (vintage 1911) with metal numbers attached, an intact soybean fibre plate, and an example of the first time (in Depression 1933) when the embossed outline of the state was used.

A look at newspapers and legislative journals of the past in the Historical Society Library, brings forth even more color and detail on the evolution of the automobile license plate in Montana. A remarkably varied picture emerges, reflecting national life, the growing need for better roads, times of emergency and changing mores.

Although there had been a few automobiles in Montana for at least five years, the first mention we found in deliberations of the Montana Legislature was in 1907, when one lawmaker—apparently lacking the gift of foresight—introduced a measure prohibiting the use of this new-fangled toy on any public highway or road in the state and prescribing penalties if one ventured out of the backyard. The house refused to consider the bill.

Two years later the House passed a measure "providing for the issuance of state licenses for autos used and operated in the State of Montana," and providing penalties for failure to comply. This bill was killed in the Senate.

Definitive legislation passed in both 1913 and 1915 to license and register cars in Montana. Portions of those laws were repealed in 1917, the year in which, at Governor Sam Stewart's urging, the responsibility for enforcement was strengthened. Of compelling importance now was to build better roads. As a result of the 1917 action,

HORSEMAN WAS STILL IN DRIVER'S SEAT WHEN FIRST CAR LICENSE BILL PASSED

every Montana motorist was required to buy license plates for his car, and there was no way to evade the necessity of displaying them.

The 1913 enactment, however, is interesting to dwell upon, for there were still overtones of horse and buggy days. The horseman, indeed, was still in the driver's seat as evidenced by one paragraph:

"Every person having control or charge of a motor vehicle shall, whenever upon any public street or highway and approaching any vehicle drawn by horse or horses, mule or mules, or any horse or mule upon which any person is riding, so operate, manage and control such motor vehicle as to exercise every reasonable precaution to prevent the frightening of any such animals and to insure the safety and protection of any person riding or driving the same . . ."

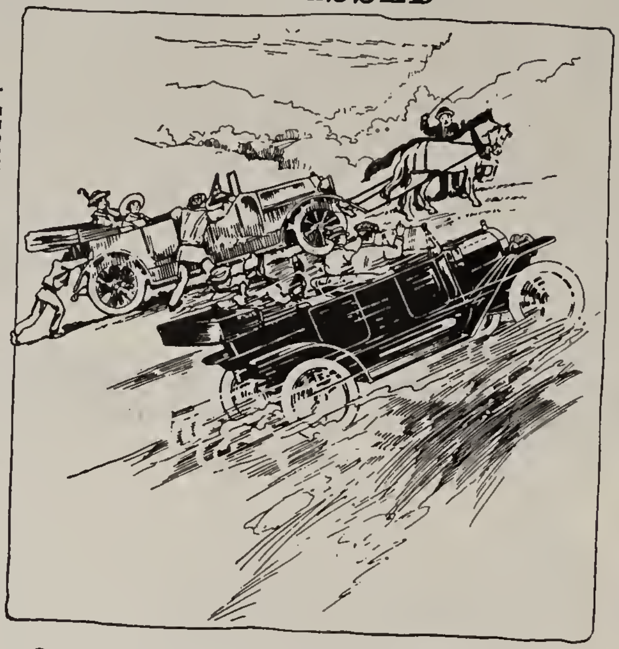
Speed limits for cars, according to the 1913 law, were 30 miles an hour outside the limits of a city, fire district or "any thickly settled or business part of town." Within these limits, the frightening machines were not to go faster than eight miles an hour.

In 1913 the Anaconda Standard noted that 130,000 cars were registered in New York State. California was a surprising second, with 80,000. "The delightful rides and the character of the roads in Southern California probably account for the high place occupied by that state in the use of automobiles," said the editor.

And as if the gas buggy were not transportation innovation enough for 1913, there was the airplane. Said a Great Falls Tribune editorial on February 26: "A French inventor claims to have solved the problem of balancing the aeroplane so as to make it much safer. He has changed the seat of the driver so that it hangs underneath . . . and acts as sort of a floating ballast, helping to maintain the equilibrium of the machine . . ."

In January, 1917, as Montana's legislature was passing the first really stringent automobile license law, the Helena Independent reported that 1,617,708 cars had been sold in the country the previous year. They were manufactured by 40 different companies and sold by 30,000 dealers. The average price for a passenger car: $605.

And as the country teetered on the edge of war, the automobile had so proliferated in Montana that the Independent was publishing a weekly column of advice on how to repair one's own machine, the columnist generally using a question and answer technique:



FROM CLYMER: "HENRY'S WONDERFUL MODEL T"

Query: What makes my car jump when starting? No matter how easily I let in the clutch, it always starts with a jerk. As this is very unpleasant, I should like to know the remedy . . .

Answer: As you do not say what clutch you have, we must assume it is a leather-covered cone . . . It is known as a "fierce" clutch. Use neatsfoot oil to soften the leather, but if the leather is worn out, it will have to be replaced.

On February 4, 1917, President Wilson broke off diplomatic relations with the German Kaiser. Henry Ford, the man who had, more than any other car manufacturer, put the country on motorized wheels, offered all his plants for the making of munitions, on a non-profit basis. Editorialized the Independent on February 7: "How many multimillionaires whose plants are fit will perform the same service, we wonder. Ford has more critics among the vested rich than Debs; let us see the crabs equal his patriotism."

Last Surviving Pioneer Society Member Is 100, Hopes to See Man on Moon

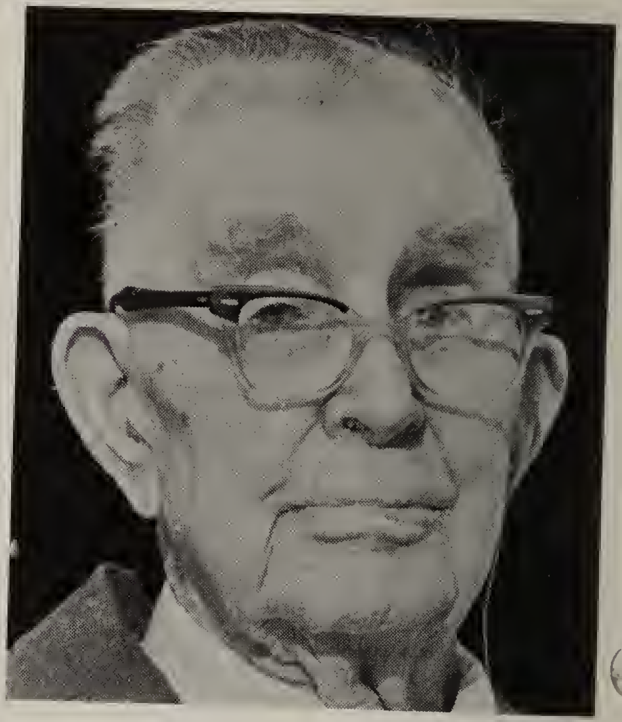
Just before midnight on Sunday, December 31, the only survivor of the Society of Montana Pioneers reached his 100th birthday. Lumen W. Allen, born at Jefferson City near Helena on New Year's Eve, 1867, qualified for membership in the organization by exactly one year. The Pioneers, once several hundred strong, limited membership to those born in, or who came to, Montana Territory on or before December 31, 1868.



This amazing pioneer, whose life has spanned all modes of transportation from covered wagons and stagecoaches to automobiles and airplanes, now has one overriding ambition: to live long enough to "see 'em put a man on the moon."

The Montana Historical Society, whose work through the years has been strongly supported by the Society of Montana Pioneers, was represented at Lumen Allen's birthday observances in Butte by E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra, immediate past president and member of our board, and Judge Howard A. Johnson, former chief justice of the Montana Supreme Court and also a past president of the Society's trustees.

JUDITH BASIN MUSEUM PRESERVING AN HISTORIC REGION'S PAST

One of the best examples of how one Montana community, through joint effort, can preserve its history in tangible form is the Judith Basin Museum, dedicated last Summer at Stanford, and looking forward to continued growth in 1968. The Historical Society has taken particular pride in seeing the realization of this historic area's dreams and plans. Director Sam Gilluly was delighted to be the dedicatory speaker at ceremonies last June.

Two of the prime movers in this community project, Mrs. Pearl A. Phillips and Mrs. Gladys Jenny, recently supplied us with some of the background, not only of the area, but of efforts through the years to preserve it.

They pointed out, first of all, that the history of the Judith Basin in Central Montana goes back almost 163 years to the Lewis and Clark Expedition. Captain Lewis recorded in his Journel on May 29, 1805 that they came to the mouth of a small river out of which rushed clear sparkling water such as they hadn't seen in other streams. Both Captains walked up the rough terrain through which it flowed and saw an abundance of wildlife in natural habitat. Captain Lewis noted that Captain Clark, wishing to honor his Virginia sweetheart, Miss Julia (Judy) Hancock, named it "Judieth's River." After his return in 1806, he and Miss Hancock were married.

The Judith Basin, comprised of all land drained by this river and its tributaries, is some 50 by 85 miles in size. It is surrounded by mountains—clockwise, the Little Belts, Highwoods, Square Butte, Moccasins, Judith, and Snowies.

The land was a favorite hunting ground of many Indian tribes. Here they found an abundance of wildlife, including vast buffalo herds which provided much of their livelihood.

Nothing was done about preserving the area's heritage until the Judith Basin Historical Society was formed in the fall of 1951.

The late N. B. Matthews. then President of the Basin State Bank, was the first chairman. He appointed a committee in each community to carry out research at "Old Timers' Meetings," gather personal letters and other materials from sons and daughters of early pioneers. Among those who brought in a wealth of material were Mrs. Celia Lacey of Geyser, Mrs. Gladys Jenny of Upper Judith, Charles Waite of Utica, Charles Zimmer of Benchland, and Myrtle Swanz and Cassandra Phelps of Hobson.

In May, 1958, after a lapse of four years, the Society began to feel the need of a permanent fireproof place to preserve what had been collected. At a reorganizational meeting, Mrs. Phillips was named president, Mrs. Gladys Jenny, vice president, Norman Husband, treasurer, Mrs. Betty Miller, secretary, and Mrs. Elva Wineman, historian. These people, dedicated to the idea that a museum in Central Montana was a definite possibility, interested many more. Other museums were visited and data gathered for future use.

At a meeting in Benchland December 9, 1962, a fund-raising campaign began. President Henry Evans appointed Jack Timmer, Roy Nelson, Charles Waite and Ed Cervenka to the finance committee; William Rauscher, Harry Dester and Bernie Schmitt to the planning committee. Twelve others were appointed to solicit residents of Judith Basin County for pledges and donations.

The County Commissioners donated a lot on the corner of the Courthouse lawn. Then came the memorable day on July 8, 1964, when ground was broken during Stanford's Centennial celebration. Bay Skelton, native of the area, turned the first sod as his father, William Skelton, had turned the "First Furrow" for C. M. Russell's great painting.

The first $5,000.00 was slow in coming, then rapidly a peak of $10,000.00 was reached by more cash donations, food and rummage sales and memorials. The total of $16,000.00 was in sight.

William Rauscher, an experienced carpenter, was now Society president, and guided the project to completion.

Mrs. Phillips and Mrs. Jenny write that among the museum's objectives for 1968 will be to reconstruct a pioneer kitchen in the basement, set up an office in honor of the self-made dentist, the late Dr. Virgil Stewart, and sponsor art and craft exhibits.

Since the museum is dedicated to the famed cowboy artist, Charles M. Russell, who made the area his "stompin' grounds" for many years, officers plan to use a portion of the old back bar from the Mint Saloon in Great Falls to reconstruct a "Charlie Russell Bar." For many years the Mint Bar was his favorite hangout and here hung many of his great paintings.

Not the least prideful aspect of the Judith Basin Museum is the fact that it has been turned over to the County for maintenance without a cent of public indebtedness. Surely the dedication of these people is something to be emulated as well as praised.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

"County Folklore Becomes History" read a banner headline in a recent issue of the Powder River County Examiner in Broadus. The headline was accurate and it reflected the dedication of a truly monumental publication of county source history, "Echoing Footsteps."

The Montana Historical Society is especially proud and pleased that the Society's president (also professor emeritus of history at Montana State University), Dr. Merrill Burlingame, gave the dedicatory address at Broadus. Among others present were Society Trustee W. B. Spear and former Trustee Casey Barthelmess.

Publisher Aubrey D. Larson of the Examiner accurately described the new book as " . . . an impressive and attractive volume of 736 pages with some 750 pictures" that "does tie together a lot of happenings and people from pre-homestead days to 1960. Some of the ties are loose, as the history was authored by most of the people in the county writing about their ranches, families, communities and experiences, with a minimum of editing."

The publisher explains that what editing was done was by members of the Powder River Historical Committee, a loose-knit group assembled after the county's Extension Homemaker's Council decided in 1964 that Eastern Montana lacked and needed some written history. So this history is the work of many hands.

The dedication comes as Broadus becomes a focus of news as the center of a burgeoning oil boom that has brought to this cowtown a few of the aspects of the old Wild West.

To the Montana Historical Society, the activity is another healthy manifestation of what we see as a growing trend: The increasing interest of Montanans in their heritage. We see it at many points in the state in the growth of museums, local or county historical societies and in publications. We rejoice in it and we offer our congratulations to the residents of a lively and bustling area.

Footnote on the Society: We have recently ended a busy and momentous year, as evidenced by an attendance of over 103,000 for 1967. This was the first year we have had an actual count of visitors to the museum, galleries and library, and it indicates the heightening interest in history—both from outside and inside the state.—SAM GILLULY.

OLDEST INDIAN ON WYOMING'S WIND RIVER RESERVATION NOW AN ECHO FROM THE PAST

Late in November, 1967, death came to Minnie White Horse Antelope, believed to be the oldest Indian living on Wyoming's Wind River Reservation. The other day, we received a warm letter from Mrs. Bonnie Hunter, who with her husband operates Hunter's Trading Post at Fort Washakie. In it, she tells about this Arapahoe Cheyenne who, in old age, allowed herself the luxury of displaying, through prayer and tears and lament, her love and concern for white people as well as Indian, even though she is said to have witnessed the Custer Battle from the shelter of a painted rock as a girl of thirteen.

Minnie's exact age was not known, since tribal records had been destroyed by fire many years ago. Minnie kept the shinbone of an elk, however, notched for each year of her life. At her death, it carried 104 notches.

The Hunters first met Minnie some 25 years ago when they operated a store in Riverton, Wyoming. "She was feeble with age then, we thought," Mrs. Hunter writes. The accompanying picture, in telling contrast to a gas pump, was taken at about that time. She looked much the same at her death, for she was "one of those wiry, timeless Indians whom time does not seem to touch."

It was also at about this time that Minnie first met the Hunter's son, Tinker, home on furlough from the Army. Until her death, she carried his picture, and prayed for his safe return from Korea, just as she prayed for the safety of her young tribesmen also serving overseas. Sometimes she cried for all of them.

"The older Indians sometimes talk to us about their past," Mrs. Hunter continued, "and how it was before their reservations were slashed with highways, their forests atremble with the crash of hunter's guns. Soon, for them, they know all tepees will be folded, their campfires turned to dust. Minnie Antelope is the last of the old ones to go, but she left the door a little ajar. There she goes, an old Indian with braids and moccasins and blanket, a retreating image from the past."

Attention is drawn to MONTANA the Magazine of Western History from the four corners of the globe, for we count readers in most of the countries of the world. We are seldom, however, offered a manuscript with subject matter far removed from our western states format.

The following letter was received from a hopeful contributor from Madras, South India, to whom we had to reply with regret: "I wish to know whether you would be interested in an essay on 'Nehru—Historian and Man of Letters' for possible publication in MONTANA. The length of the proposed essay would be about 3,500 words. And this essay will deal with a neglected aspect of Nehru's career."

Holidays a Century Ago Both Serious and Merry

By ELLEN CARUSO

MONTANA TERRITORY celebrated its third Christmas holiday season 100 years ago. Jolly celebrants were betting on a 62-round boxing match in the territorial capital of Virginia City; the loyal citizens of Gallatin County were taking time out from their Christmas dinner to go to the polls; residents of Helena were preparing for the biggest social event of the year and dreaming of gold still hidden in nearby gulches.

The business establishments of Virginia City put on a prosperous air the day before Christmas in 1867, despite predictions of a nationwide financial crash within a year. Anything and everything from barrels of pickles to children's dolls were advertised by one variety store promoting its "endless and elegant" supply of goods, while more than 44,000 pounds of meat were hung, along with elaborate holiday decor, in the town's butcher shops. Street auctions were lively and the stores were jammed with holiday shoppers, ranging from the rough miner of the gulches to the fashionable wife of a government official.

The weather in the little capital town was unusually mild on Christmas Day. Scores of rowdies filed into the streets as the rays of the spring-like sun streamed down upon the snow-capped mountains surrounding Alder Gulch. The leading saloon, The Pony, was packed from Christmas morning until dawn the following day.

That evening 100 festive people paid an outrageous $20 a ticket to attend a ball at the Planter's House, a hotel with the town's best accommodations. Lodging there cost $25 a week in gold or $125 in eastern paper money.

The second floor of the hotel was decorated with evergreens and flowers and the Stars and Stripes was gracefully draped above the musician's stand. All age groups were represented, 10- and 12-year-old misses graciously volunteering to fill up dance programs. A banquet at midnight featured an entree of oyster soup (the oysters had been shipped some 3,000 miles for the occasion), and included elegant salads, jellies, wild game of all kinds, fruits and sparkling wines.

Apparently everyone taking part in the Christmas celebrations at Virginia City had a wonderful time. According to Thomas Dimsdale, staid editor of the Montana Post, the unfailing reply to the morning-after question, "What is the matter?" was " 's Christ-hic-mus-hic 'nd negg-hic-nogg, 'ts all-hic."

The free and easy holiday atmosphere of the Western frontier prevailed in Virginia City beyond Christmas and into the New Year's festivities. On New Year's Day the town's gentlemen began with the traditional "making of the rounds." In eastern cities, it was the custom for two or three men at a time to pay their respects to lady acquaintances. But not in Virginia City! As many as 25 in a group were seen making New Year's calls.

Firewater, a Fateful Election, a Fancy Ball

ONE group included such dignitaries as Bishop Daniel Tuttle, redoubtable Episcopal missionary; Green Clay Smith, second Territorial Governor, and Chief Justice Hezekiah Hosmer. The Governor's mansion and a visit with the Territory's first lady came early on the list of stops. They were entertained with foaming eggnog which was mistakenly one-sided—namely three gallons of whiskey, one egg and a little cream.

After an hour with their generous hostess, the miscalculation was discovered. The distinguished celebrants managed to walk a short way down the street before they found it impossible to go any further. They were finally forced to hail a four-horse team and sled, all the while blaming their condition on the thinness of the mountain air and the slight skift of snow that had fallen the day before.

Meanwhile, the main attraction of the day for the area miners was a 62-round boxing match between the 134-pound "Michigan Chick" and a 124-pounder named Teddy. More than 100 men were crowded around the 15-foot ring which had been set up in the hall used by the Territorial House when the Legislature was in session. The fighters wore tight-fitting buckskin gloves, not the padded boxing gloves of today, but somewhat less punishing than the newly-outlawed bare knuckles. The hour and a half-long battle, which amounted to little more than a brutal mauling for both contenders, ended when the "Michigan Chick" reeled into his corner after a blow from the favored Teddy. With the parties which followed the fight, holiday festivities of the little capital city in the Rockies drew to a close for another year.

THE HOLIDAYS of 1867 carried a more serious note in another Montana town, 75 miles to the east of Virginia City. The very future of Bozeman as a city depended upon the vote of the people of Gallatin County in a special Christmas Day election. The Territorial Legislature of 1867 had passed a bill to remove the county seat from Gallatin City, a nearly deserted town inaccessible to many because of the long distances and slow transportation. Gallatin County residents were to choose from three candidate towns: Gallatin City, Bozeman, and Farmington, a proposed city located in the center of the county on the ranch owned by a speculative legislator.

Public opinion favored Farmington as election day drew near. Politicians went from door to door to convince the people of Gallatin City that unless the two towns voted together, Farmington would surely become the county seat. Bozemanites hinted that should Bozeman become county seat, they would move to bring about a new county division, making Gallatin City the seat of the new county.

As Christmas morning dawned, county residents trudged to the polls. Just as they had promised, the people of Gallatin City voted for Bozeman instead of their own town, and the final tally showed 475 votes for Bozeman and 263 votes for Farmington. With such a victory on hand, there were rumors that Bozeman would soon be making its bid for Territorial capital.

WHILE VIRGINIA CITY and Bozeman were rocking with celebrations and elections, Helena, which would be named Territorial capital seven years later, was spending an unusually quiet holiday season.

Last Chance Gulch was still prospering from recent gold strikes, and the bill for the incorporation of the city had been approved by the legislature and governor. The townspeople were also looking forward to an end of candles and coal oil as plans for a gas works costing $40,000 were in the beginning stages.

A Christmas Eve barroom shoot-out, resulting in one death and two severely wounded upset the tranquility of the holidays, but all the prospectors' dreams and whispers of tragedy were forgotten as the town prepared for the Masonic Ball. About 100 couples attended the dance at the new court house, where the lime from the freshly plastered walls kept falling on the dance floor and the women seemed to be "dusting" instead of dancing. Before the evening was over the men's black suits were turning a sombre brown.

In the century which has passed, the three-year-old frontier Territory of 1867 has become the fourth largest state in a union of fifty and has increased its population of some 18,000 to more than 700,000. It has filled volumes with its colorful and varied history. And every year about this time the spirit of Christmas returns to the Big Sky Country, by no means all of it inspired by dreams of gold or politics or even by a batch of eggnog with too-noble proportions.

Society Receives Loan of Original Manuscript on Dempsey-Gibbons Fight

New light on the still controversial "Shelby Fight" of July 4, 1923, comes with the loan to the Society of an original manuscript through the generosity of John Kavanagh, publisher of the Shelby Promoter. The manuscript is one written by Kavanagh's uncle, James W. "Body" Johnson, who was intimately associated with arrangements for the world heavyweight championship match between Jack Dempsey and Tom Gibbons. Johnson's manuscript was originally prepared for Sports Illustrated magazine, which published a part of it in July, 1966.

"The manuscript is especially valuable to our library because it also has attached some of the original agreements for the fight," Director Sam Gilluly comments. "Even today, in Shelby or Great Falls, or almost anywhere in Montana, one can hear various versions of what happened before, during or after this title battle in a timber arena adjoining what was then a little town on the Montana prairie."

A definitive article on this subject, published in the Summer, 1965, issue of MONTANA, the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, attracted unusual reader interest.

Mary Dempsey, Society librarian, has arranged to have the entire manuscript microfilmed. Thus it becomes part of what was an appealingly bizarre episode in Montana history.

GENUINE TERRITORIAL WARRANTS UNIQUE GIFT IDEA

We can think of no more typically Montana remembrance than one of these genuine, original warrants issued by Montana Territory between 1864 and 1889, most of them to pay bounties on such animals as wolf, coyote, bear, mountain lion, squirrel and prairie dog. These historic documents were found in the basement of the capitol building in Helena several years ago, and mounted in this form, suitable for framing.

Adding much to the visual effect as well as the significance of the warrants are depictions of the bounty animals by J. K. (Ken) Ralston of Billings, one of Montana's best known artists. Since these were one of the prime items sold during the Centennial Year of 1964, there are not many left. While they last, the complete mounted warrant and artwork, as seen here, are available at $5.00 each.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

We have commented previously about the acceleration of museum growth in Montana.

Now we can report another significant step with the incorporation of the Museums Association of Montana. The Society is not officially a member, but it stands in the position of offering its full support, cooperation and interest.

Directors of the newly-formed association, all of them deeply interested in various phases of Montana's historical background, are Peter Yegen, Jr. of Billings, William L. Jellison, M.D., of Hamilton, Mrs. Mary B. Tavenner of Deer Lodge, Vern Sexton of Belgrade and E. B. Craney of Butte.

Mr. Yegen is now serving as president, and Mrs. Tavenner as Secretary. The Association is planning a meeting in the spring of 1968.

A broad view of the purposes of the newly-formed association is given in one paragraph of the articles, which outlines some of its goals this way:

"To study the problems of museums in Montana, to suggest and implement coordination between such museums and to develop the full educational potentials of such museums, to implement communications between museums and the general public, and for all such other educational results as may stem from the benefits to the general public from museums."

Some day, this informational exchange may reach the stage where we will have a record of every item in every museum in Montana. This is but one of many long-range goals the organization has in mind.

A meeting held in the Society's building last spring, which was primarily for exchange of information and ideas, demonstrated how valuable such communication is for the many Montanans dedicated to collecting and preserving records and materials that reflect the heritage of this state and region.

Changing the subject for a conclusion: Looking back over 1967, this has been one of the busiest and most fruitful years in the 103-year-old annals of the Montana Historical Society. I am sure that I can speak for all our staff in appreciation of the interest and support of so many friends and supporters, not only in Montana, but throughout the United States. Happy Holiday!

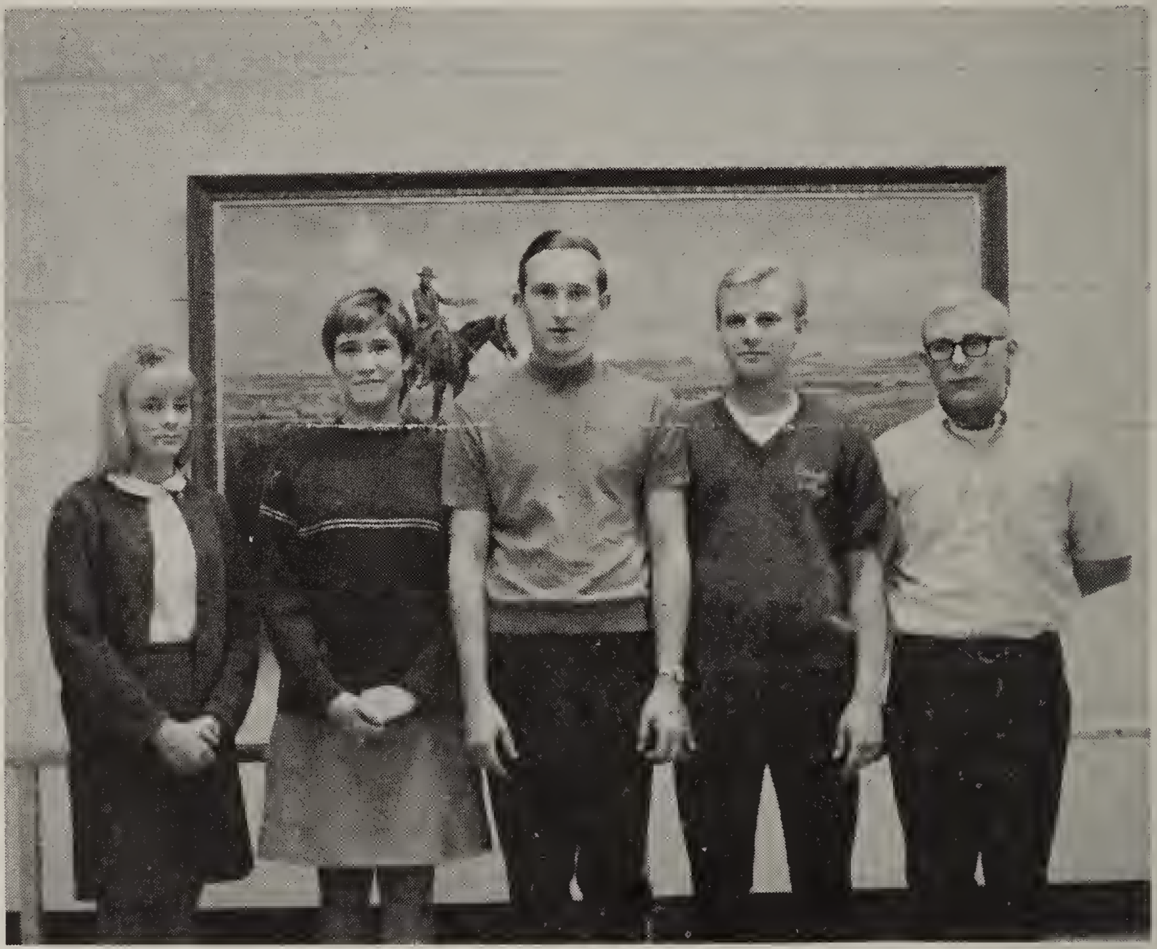
HARD-WORKING STUDENTS LEND A HAND DURING SOCIETY'S BUSIEST SEASON



The Society has been in the midst of the busiest pre-holiday season in its history, a fact substantiated by some rather prideful sales statistics. Lending us a very large assist in both sales and shipping room work and in the circulation department of the magazine and this publication have been the young people pictured here. They are, from left: Dana Thompson of Elliston, Mont., Jackie Kurtz of Helena, Jurgen Shawver of Monte Vista, Colo., Dave Bergman of Dickey, N. Dak., and Steve Kasperick of Helena.

Miss Thompson and Miss Kurtz, both freshmen at Helena's Carroll College, are assisting Circulation Manager Eleanor Dickey, whose department has handled the greatest subscription growth in the 17-year history of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, to say nothing of an unusually heavy Christmas gift subscription season.

The three young men are assisting at the sales counter, directed by Stacey Jerome, and in direct mail sales and shipping, for which Mrs. Mabel Gaskill has been responsible.

Rejoining the staff on time to get in on some of the fun is Business Manager Dick Duffy, recently returned from a six-month National Guard course of training at Aberdeen, Maryland.

Architects Appointed as Society Nears End of Busy Year

As watches were turned back to Mountain Standard Time this month, the Society looked back upon what has been a gratifying and busy year. At the same time, it looked forward to more growth in the next two years, at least some of it remarkably tangible: a much-needed addition to the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building which houses us.

In mid-October, the State Controller's office announced the appointment of the architectural firm of Davidson and Kuhr of Great Falls to draw up plans for the three-level addition, which will provide space for more effective museum displays, offices, archival materials, and galleries. As plans are firmed up and building proceeds, we will share progress reports with our readers.

As the 1967 volume year ended with the Autumn issue of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, our circulation department was able to report the greatest period of growth in the 16-year history of the magazine, in terms of direct mail subscribers. We gained more than 1,000 new reader-members, and retained more of our present subscribers than ever before.

On Monday, November 13, the 100,000th visitor of 1967 signed his name on our register (see cut). A quick check shows that throughout the summer, about 60 per cent were from states other than Montana and from foreign countries. As the school year began, hundreds of students from Montana schools began touring the building, upping the percentage of state visitors.

Some unusually fine showings of contemporary art have been featured in the Gary Cooper Gallery on the main floor of the building, including paintings by the well known watercolorist, Thomas D. Palmerton, in August, illustrations (with emphasis on frontier transportation) by Nick Eggenhofer of Cody, Wyoming, in September, and some notable oils by John W. Hampton of Phoenix, Ariz., in October.

Presented this month is a collection of oils, watercolors, felt-tip pen drawings, metal sculpture and pottery by Mr. and Mrs. Rudy Autio of Missoula. Autio, now on the art faculty at the University of Montana, is a recognized artist, especially in the field of sculpture, pottery and ceramic art. His wife, who teaches art at Missoula high schools, is competent in many media, including watercolors, collages and oils.

Slated for December showing is the work of Oliver Parson, head of the art department at Ricks College, Rexburg, Idaho.

The resources of the Historical Library have been used by many scholars, writers, students and laymen throughout the year. A large number of institutions and a wide field of scholarship have been represented. A few highlights:

William P. Bourne of New York City, accompanied by his wife, spent several days here researching the career of his pioneer grandfather, George B. Bourne, early-day cattleman, banker, legislator, and one-time mayor of Havre, Mont.

R. Wayne Chatterton, professor of English at the College of Idaho in Caldwell, was here investigating idioms of speech as reflected in early diaries, journals and letters written from 1860-65. Dr. Robert G. Athearn of the University of Colorado, who serves as book review editor for MONTANA the Magaine of WESTERN HISTORY, spent some time in the library expanding research for a forthcoming definitive study of the Union Pacific Railway.

Miss Mildred Goosman, curator of western collections for the Joslyn Art Museum, Omaha, inspected the collections of Karl Bodmer prints and Granville Stuart journals and drawings, while Cecil Kirk, retired Montana Power company official, was a frequent visitor studying early power plants in the state.

Curator Bob Morgan and his assistant, Rex Rieke, are putting the finishing touches on a series of transportation exhibit cases which, covered with giant plastic "bubbles," now tie together the main corridor of the formal museum. The series depicts transportation, from the travois of the Plains Indians through the first mail-carrying aircraft, thus constituting an orderly, capsulated history of Montana.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert Herter of Long Island, New York, join Director Sam Gilluly and Editor Vivian Paladin (right) in our lobby on Monday, Nov. 13, after Mr. Herter, former Helena resident and veteran newspaper stereotyper, had signed in as our 100,000th visitor of the year. Director Gilluly is displaying a bronze C. M. Russell medallion which he presented to the Herters. A native of Germany, Herter attended school in Helena and for many years worked for the Helena Independent as a stereotyper. He later joined the mechanical staff of the Wall Street Journal, and is now employed by the Staats-Herald, a German language newspaper in New York City. The Herters, who planned to go on to visit in San Diego and San Francisco, were guests in Helena of Mr. Herter's sister, Mrs. Elizabeth Rudeck.

Interview Opens By-Ways of History, From a Champion Tr

Anyone who has ever engaged in historical research, however casually, finds that one thing leads to another. One becomes immersed, and very often finds oneself carried into unrelated by-ways. It is this aspect of research, of course, which has led to the "disciplines" of scholarship.

Nonetheless, it is these by-ways which make searching after historical fact a fascinating pursuit. Such a thing happened recently to Frank Wiley, veteran Montana pilot, Aeronautics Commission official, researcher and auther (his book-length Montana and the Sky which appeared in 1965 tells the story of aviation in this region from the earliest barn-storming days through the 1930's).

Frank Wiley has an avid interest in Montana history and has a talent for person-to-person interview. Recently he has been in the field gathering both reminiscence and objects, such as pictures and records, on behalf of the Historical Society.

Because of the great interest generated by the Ed Towe Antique Ford Collection, now displayed in Helena under auspices of the Society, Frank pricked up his ears when he heard about an automobile called the "Montana Special," manufactured from 1903 to 1917 in Luverne, a small town in the extreme southwestern corner of Minnesota.

It all started when he was interviewing Charles "Chick" LaDue, who lives at Sheridan, Mont. LaDue's grandfather, Jay, was a farmer and horse breeder near Luverne before the turn of the century. A specialist in raising heavy draft horses for farm work, Jay LaDue had an interesting sideline: breeding trotting Hambletonians. The excellence of his trotting stock was most dramatically exemplified by a fine mare named Polly, sold by LaDue just after the turn of the century to Russia's ill-fated Czar. Polly set a world record in a race at Dublin, Ireland in 1903, a trotting record not yet broken.

Proprietor, Mr. McDONALD, of Dublin.

Meanwhile, LaDue's son, A. D. LaDue, became associated with a carriage firm in Luverne, operated by the Leicher family. It was this company which, in 1903, began building automobiles. They were rather special cars, judging from advertisements, and carried a respectable price tag in the $3,000 range. The first one to carry the name The Montana Special emerged in about 1910.

Two years before, A. D. LaDue, father of "Chick" LaDue, came out to Montana and bought a ranch on the Jefferson River near Bozeman. He bought the Diamond O brand in 1909 from James Paxon of Dillon and began ranching operations.

In 1912, President Leicher of the Luverne company drove out a Montana Special for his former business associate, making the trip in eight days without mishap. This interesting bit of information came to Wiley in a recent letter from Larry Leicher, son of the founder and now owner-manager of the Luverne Fire Apparatus company. Leicher stated the company stopped making cars in 1917 and since then has devoted itself to building fire engines.

Leicher said company records show, however, that two dealers, in Bozeman and Helena, distributed the imposing cars in Montana and that at least ten of them were operated on the state's famous gumbo and mountain roads for which they were especially well suited.

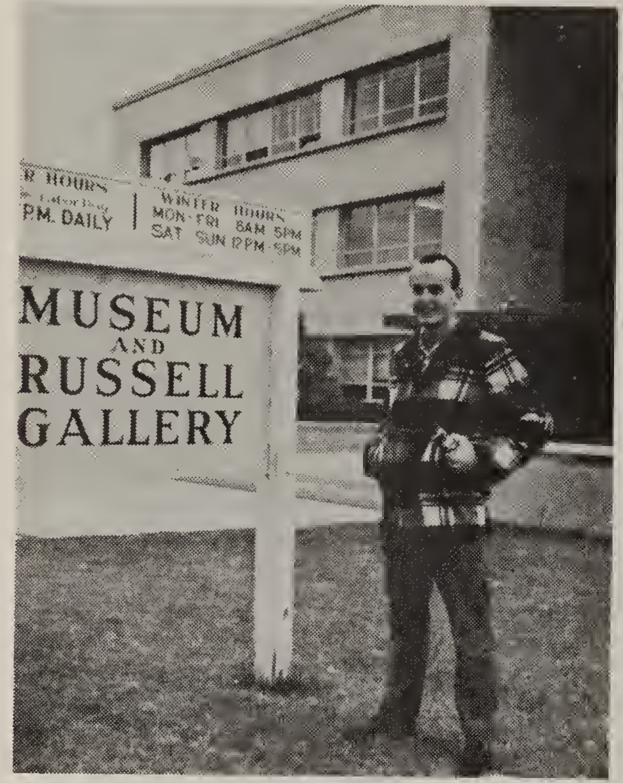
YOUNG AUSTRALIAN VISITS HERE ON WORLD TOUR

A young carpenter from "Down Under" included a trip to Helena and the Montana Historical Society late in September as part of a full year of worldwide touring. It started from his home in Victoria, Australia on January 5, 1967, and will end exactly a year later when he flies home from San Francisco.

Robert Charles Forrester, whose hometown is 10 miles east of Melbourne, went to England by steamer for the first leg of his trek, landing at Southampton on January 27. Then he and two companions bought a small car and toured Europe and the Middle East. They were in Damascus four weeks before the short by decisive Egyptian-Israeli war broke out, and were only 40 miles away from sporadic border fighting which preceded it.

The car was sold when the three returned to England, and then Forrester struck out on his own again. He hitchhiked from London to Glasgow, Scotland and toured the Highlands for three and a half weeks.

Late in July, the young Australian flew from Glasgow to Montreal, taking in Expo 67 and visiting in Toronto and Ottawa. There followed stops of varying lengths in United States cities, including Washington, D.C., New York City and Boston. He attended the cup races at Newport, R.I., where his country's entry made a gallant challenge. Considerable time was spent with friends in the St. Louis area, then came the trip westward, to Chicago and eventually to Helena. After he left here, Forrester planned visits to Yellowstone Park and again to Canada, this time to Banff, Lake Louise and Vancouver.



What does he think of America, and especially of Western America? Forrester was quick to say that he found all Americans "nicer" than the tourist image he had encountered abroad. All his life, he said, he has wanted to make the current trip, and feels that the fact that a young unmarried carpenter can make such a trek speaks well for the economic climate of his own country.

tter to a Durable, Imposing Automobile

Long after they were no longer manufactured, one Montana Special took sight-seeing parties through Yellowstone Park, living up to an advertising claim that they were "good for a lifetime—no wear possible on permanent parts."

"Chick" LaDue and his wife own a bowling alley in Sheridan, but are retired from ranching. Sheridan, once headquarters for fabulous mining operations in the Tobacco Root Mountains, is just north of Virginia City in Western Montana's Madison County. Nearby was Robber's Roost, where Henry Plummer's gang hid out.

Also close by Sheridan is the tiny town of Laurin, where Mrs. LaDue was born. She told Wiley that her father, an Irishman, was a stone mason and "the first white man to live there." The town, still referred to in the French "Lawray," was originally the ranch of J. B. Laurin. It was three miles from here, on January 4, 1864, that Red Yager and G. W. Brown, messenger and secretary, respectively, of the Plummer gang, met summary justice at the end of Vigilante ropes. Mrs. LaDue's father, in claiming to be the first white man to live in the town, may not have considered Frenchmen as white men. At any rate, at this juncture, Frank Wiley knew that he was on another historical by-way and that here was another story.

NICK EGGENHOFER, NOTED ARTIST-ILLUSTRATOR, VISITS

Nick Eggenhofer, of Cody Wyo., right, one of Western America's best known artists and illustrators, points to some of his superb depictions of wagon transportation, hung in the Society's Gary Cooper gallery throughout the month of September. Seen at the left are Curator Bob Morgan and Director Sam Gilluly. Many of the Eggenhofer works in the Helena show are originals of illustrations done for the artist's imposing book, "Wagons, Mules and Men," which he both wrote and illustrated. It was published in 1961 by Hastings House.

"Devil Man With a Gun" Tells Authentic Story of A Notable Montana Pioneer

For a good many years now, the interesting human interest and historical reminiscences of the Watson family have delighted neighbors and friends. They were, basically, stories told to Art H. Watson and his brothers and sisters by their father, Scottish-born Alexander Watson, who came to Virginia City in September of 1864 to seek his fortune.

Now Art Watson of White Sulphur Springs has set down these stories in a neat hard-cover book which he titles "Devil Man With a Gun," a name given to Alexander Watson by Piegan Indians, impressed with his ability to put together the parts of a rifle—while they threatened him with death—and make it "go boom."

This book contains a vast potpourri of Montana history, from gold mining, to Indian encounters, big game hunting, ranching, and frontier family fun. It is told in the vernacular of the west, without the "slicky" professional editing which sometimes spoils the unspoiled.

Copies can be obtained, at $5.00 each, by writing the Montana Historical Society, 225 N. Roberts, Helena, Mont. 59601.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

Montana was well represented at the recent Seventh Annual Conference of the Western History Association in San Francisco, a fruitful and enjoyable session. From the Montana Historical Society were O'Neil Jones of Bigfork, member of our board of trustees; Vivian Paladin, our magazine and Montana Post editor, and the Society Director.

Besides absorbing tours and scholarly papers—as well as just visiting—the Conference provides opportunity to scan forthcoming books shown by virtually all the prominent historical publishers in our nation. These displays brought home to me again the rich and diverse historical background of Montana — what a part the Big Sky Country plays in regional interests. I would like to share with you a look at some of these, for I know you will be interested.

From the University of Nebraska Press in January will come Montana Adventure, edited by Dr. Harold G. Merriam of Missoula. These are the recollections of a great Montana writer, newspaperman, legislator and businessman—Frank Bird Linderman. We look forward with interest to this contribution to the story of one who was one of our state's great story-tellers.

Winter issue of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History will bring to readers the reverent and evocative chronicle of the last days and death of John Stands in Timber, the historian of the Northern Cheyennes. It is written by Fr. Peter J. Powell of Chicago, "brother-friend" of the noted Cheyenne, who officiated at the funeral and burial. Very soon now we will have from the Yale University Press Cheyenne Memories, by John Stands in Timber and Margot Liberty, with the assistance of Robert M. Utley. Here, a historian presents the story of his own people with collaboration from eminent persons in the field.

Custer is a never-ending topic and a newly-issued publication from Hastings House is A Picture Report of the Custer Fight by William Reusswig, with 101 drawings and end papers. Pictorially, this brings new depth to an old topic.

Many others we saw or read about have Northwest and Montana connotations. Publisher representatives told us, too, of things to come—a history of more recent times in Montana, and the story of a "Hi-Line" ranch and family in Montana. Next year, we will have more to say.

Supplied with every luxury, including lots of champagne, the party traveled on a private railroad car, stopping over in Chicago, Cheyenne, Denver, Salt Lake City, Virginia City and San Francisco. # Russell Letters, Historic Objects Enliven Society Displays

Loans to the Montana Historical Society's museum in recent months have, among others, added interest and background to the Society's "informal" Charles M. Russell room. They also reveal more about the great Western artist's life and times. One is unique, and confirms a bit of Russell lore that he would create any place, any time and in any medium.

Curator Robert F. Morgan refers to a loan from Mrs. Alexander Leggat of Butte as the "Tobacco Keg" Russell because it is painted on the end of an old tobacco cask. The subject also is unusual, for it is of a Southwestern vaquero, rather than the Montana type.

This unusual oil came to Mr. and Mrs. Leggat as a wedding gift. Writing to Mr. Leggat in 1918, Russell said he had painted it about 1883 or 1884. He added: "There was no canvas at the time, so I painted on anything I could get. I think the one you have is the head of a fine cut chewing tobacco keg, as I remember doing several of that kind around Utica. . ."

A truly fine illustrated leter by CMR is one item in several given the Society on loan from Mr. and Mrs. Harry McDonough of Missoula. It is addressed to "Friend Bill," who was Harry McDonough's father and an early rancher on the Missouri river near Culbertson. Russell painted two cowboy figures in the letter. Of one he says "This is the kind I saw at the Stampeed (sic) at Winnipeg." Of the other figure he wrote, "This is the kind we knew."

Another illustrated Russell letter and a framed water color by the same artist are also on loan by the McDonoughs. Then there is a striking water color of a cowboy visiting his girl at a homestead shack, loaned by Walter Heyne, and a fascinating illustrated envelope, addressed to Jack Enright, California Club, Butte, Mont., loaned by Edward E. Cooney.

Not all articles loaned recently are in the Russell field, but others are significant for their historical value or their true beauty. One loan in this class came to us from Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Milburn, and they can only be described as the finest of Indian artifacts. Included are two painted buffalo robes, a magnificent Assinboine Indian headdress with flat shaved horns and a bow and quiver case. These last, with three and a half dozen arrows, are made of mountain lion skin.

The Milburn loans, just as soon as possible, will find their place in a new display case in the Indian Fur Trade Frontier section of our Formal Museum.

As a permanent gift from Montana Supreme Court Chief Justice James T. Harrison (who is something of a hobbyist) comes a collection of personally autographed first day covers of the Charles M. Russell stamp, which will soon go on display in the Russell room. When signed, the covers represented all the principal officials of Montana in its three branches of government.

A permanent gift from the Montana Stockgrowers Association and its Secretary Ralph Miracle, fills a void in our collection of early range history. In it are 14 early-day branding irons from some of the best known Montana outfits. Included are Stadler & Kaufman, Frank Hazelbaker, Two Dot Wilson, Conrad Kohrs, Poindexter & Orr, William Dingwall (iron made in 1868), McNamara & Marlow and W. P. Sullivan.

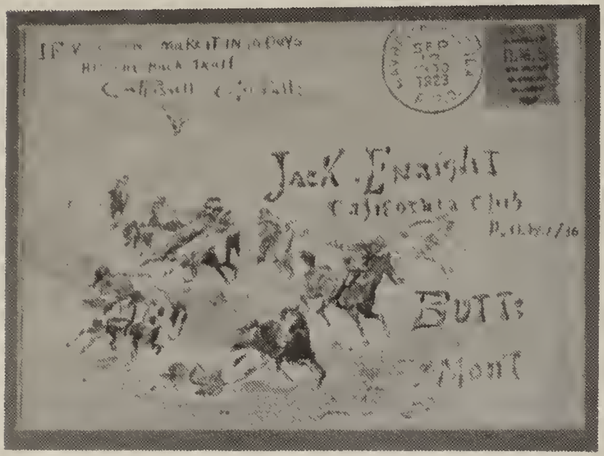
Our curiosity was whetted by an unusual apparatus, a gift from Mrs. Lillian Mares Sears of Seattle. We found it was a roller type hand press stamp used by the donor's father for labeling his own shoe boxes and signs when he was a bootmaker in the then thriving mining town of Marysville, near Helena.

Nineteenth Century wedding dresses and other items of clothing and household articles are part of a large collection recently given to the Society by Miss Helena G. More, Long Beach, Calif., whose father, E. V. More, was an early Montana resident and legislator. The More family lived in Bozeman for many years, although E. V. More served in the legislature from Meagher County.

The list could go on. Almost daily, our library receives valuable historic photographs and records—public and private.

It all leaves us with this feeling: Our Society, our museum and galleries, grow and prosper—primarily because of the help of concerned, helpful and interested citizens, not only of Montana, but of many other states.

C. M. RUSSELL HUMOR AND A TOUCH OF ROMANCE



Jack Enright of Butte was the recipient of the envelope, above, illustrated and sent in September, 1900, by the Cowboy Artist and on loan from Edward E. Cooney. At right is an interesting Russell illustration, depicting a cowboy visiting a shy young lady at her homestead shack. It is on loan from Walter Heyne.

The unusually busy summer months at the Historical Society have been eased by the eager assistance of the 12 young people pictured here, many of whom have been employed under the Work Study program. Most of them college students, the young men and women have been involved in virtually every phase of the Society's work.

Helping Librarian Mary K. Dempsey have been Kerry Meloy, a junior at the University of Arizona, Tuscon, and Marjorie Virostko, a junior at Helena High School. Mrs. Mabel Gaskill, in overall charge of sales and shipping, and Stacy Jerome, who heads up the counter sales staff in the building, have had the assistance of the following in both selling and shipping: Jurgen Shawver, a senior at Helena's Carroll College; Jerry Connelly, a sophomore at the University of Montana at Missoula; Dave Drynan, 1967 Carroll College graduate; Jack Gehring, Helena High senior; Noreen McLees and Joe Miller, both seniors at Carroll.

Maggie Boscarino, sophomore at Rocky Mountain College in Billings, and Linda Samson, junior at St. Mary's in Leavenworth, Kansas, have been clerical assistants in various departments, while Mary Pat Murphy, junior in the School of Journalism at Missoula, has been an editorial assistant to Editor Vivian Paladin. Mary Ann Mackay, graduate student at the University of Montana, has worked with Curators Bob Morgan and Rex Rieke and has played an especially helpful role in preparing the Ed Towe Antique Ford Collection for display.

NOTED SOUTHWEST ARTIST SLATED FOR SHOW; GREAT EGGENHOFER ART PLEASES

John Hampton, of Scottsdale, Ariz., a transplanted New Yorker, one of the founders of Cowboy Artists of America, and now one of the best known and honored delineators of the Western scene, will be featured in a one-man show next month in the Gary Cooper Gallery on our main floor.

Like most of his fellow artists who are notably successful in their field, Hampton is an actual participant: he ropes and rides the range. "I never knew a man who could depict range life correctly who couldn't do some of it himself," Hampton has said. "It's got to be. It's part of the recipe."

Attracting much attention throughout September has been a showing of black and white illustrations by the great Nick Eggenhofer of Cody, Wyoming, many of which were used in his own definitive book length study, "Wagons, Mules and Men," and in such books as "Trail to Santa Fe," and "Down the Colorado With Major Powell." One of the country's best known illustrators and artists, the Bavarian-born Eggenhofer was a visitor to Helena late this month.

Mrs. Hamaker Writes Warm Account of Indian Legend

A 73-page paperback book has been produced by a busy ranch wife who lives near Valier, Mont. and who has a special interest in preserving and telling about the Willow Rounds, ancient Blackfeet campgrounds near her home. Dorothy M. Hamaker, who calls her book "Napi's Lookout," has lived in the area for more than 30 years and has spent countless hours researching and searching out the legend and lore of these sites in the Marias River Valley. The book is well illustrated, warmly written and an item worth commending to our readers. Copies may be procured for $3 by writing directly to Mrs. Hamaker at Valier, or they may be ordered from the Montana Historical Society in Helena.

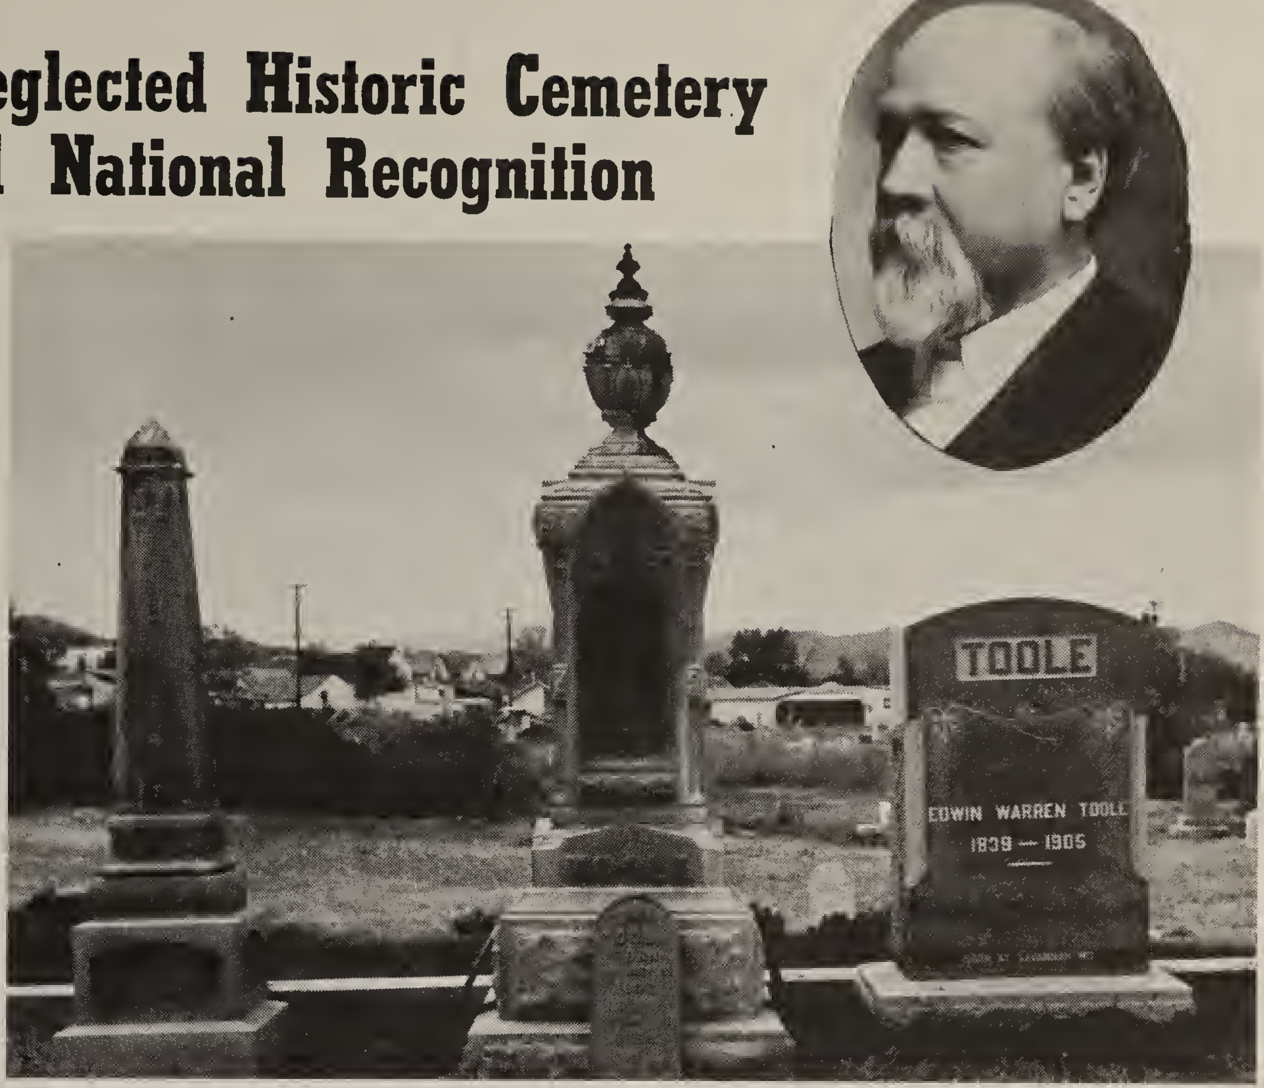
A Busy Lady, A Neglected Historic Cemetery And A Well-Deserved National Recognition

When a civic wrong needs righting, some of us send letters to the editor, others merely cluck with dismay and hope someone else will do the work. In the case of an historic but sadly neglected Helena cemetery, one energetic woman has spearheaded an astonishing restoration and finds now that she has a great deal of solid help, both physical and financial.

The Historical Society has been pleased to assist in a somewhat unique way: since this is a project of historical restoration, we were able to sponsor student help through the federal work study program. We are pleased to say that with the continuing leadership of Mrs. Lucille Baker, a member of Governor Babcock's secretarial staff, the project is nearing completion, and there is every hope that orderly maintenance will continue.

The Benton Avenue Cemetery, across the street from Helena's Carroll College, is one of the city's oldest burial grounds. Graves marked as early as 1867 have been found, but there may be some older. Helena's first mayor is buried there, and so is the brother of Gov. J. K. Toole. There are Vigilantes and pioneers and little children, the great and small from Montana's past.

The years, however, brought decay, especially to the older portions. There were weeds, and broken down fences and rubbish. There were sporadic attempts to clean up the grounds each spring, but a concerted effort did not come until two years ago when Mrs. Baker, one of the busiest women in the Governor's office, led the way.



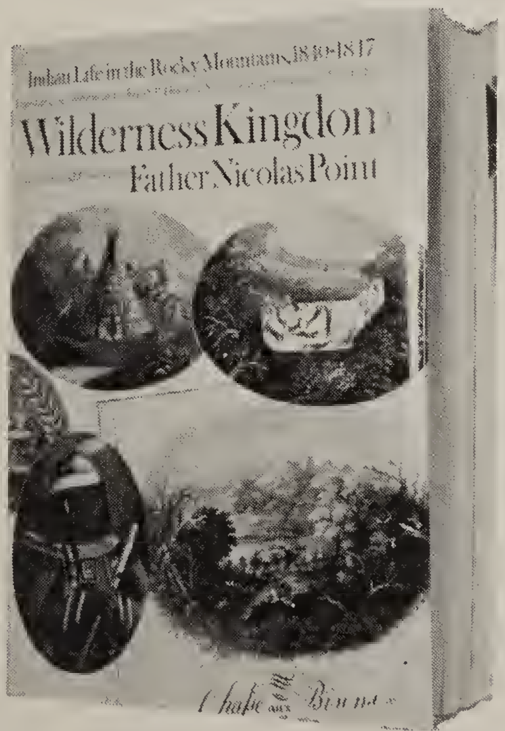
Edwin Warren Toole, well known Montana attorney and brother of our first governor, is among members of his family buried in Helena's old Benton Avenue cemetery which for many years remained in sad neglect until the restoration efforts spearheaded by Mrs. Baker.

Now pennies, dimes and dollars roll into Lucy Baker's office (her home address is 116 Fairway Drive) from all over the country from people whose ancestors or friends are interred in this historic spot behind a heavy iron fence, now restored along with the grounds it has enclosed for so many years.

Just as we go to press, we are informed that Mrs. Baker has been summoned to New York City in November to receive a special award from an organization called Keep America Beautiful, Inc. She was first nominated for the honor this summer by a couple from Ohio, whose grandparents are buried in the old cemetery. Hearing that the grounds were in danger of abandonment, they hastened to Helena and learned of the almost singlehanded restoration efforts of Lucy Baker. Since then her name has been called to the attention of the national organization by others, and the result is that she is one of the few individuals ever to receive such an honor.

MOMENTOUS PUBLISHING ACHIEVEMENT . . . GREAT GIFT IDEA

For more than two years, the devoted work of many people has gone into the production of this beautiful and important book which faithfully reproduces the journals and paintings of Father Nicolas Point, S. J., Jesuit missionary who worked among the Flathead, Coeur d'Alene, Blackfeet, Nez Perce, Crow, Spokane and Assiniboine Indians from 1841 to 1847. His beautiful old French manuscript pages are presented in facsimile, along with English translations by Joseph P. Donnelly, S. J., the devoted 20th Century Jesuit scholar who finally realized his dream of editing, annotating and publishing Father Point's treasure of word and picture which had rested almost totally undisturbed in the archives of a small Montreal college for many years.



This large volume, containing 231 full color and 50 black and white reproductions of Father Point's art, may be ordered now from the Montana Historical Society at $17.95. After March 31, 1968, the publishers, Holt, Rinehart and Winston, tell us the price will go up to $21.95. Already one of the most honored books published this year, WILDERNESS KINGDOM would make an incomparable Christmas gift. As John C. Ewers of the Smithsonian Institution says in his foreword, "Here is a great original record of American Indians, who are described here, in words and pictures, in an almost primeval state."

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

A day in Southwestern Montana at two locations not long ago brought to mind again the diversity and richness of Montana history.

Our first stop was at ground-breaking ceremonies for a new visitor center, apartment and siege area access road at the Big Hole National Battlefield. The site is administered by the National Park service and it has long-range plans for improvement and development. Wtihin a year, visitors to this significant ground near Wisdom will be able, through exhibits and audio-visual equipment, to learn the story of the haven-seeking Nez Perce—how they found they were in total war as they made their retreat from the Wallowa country only to lose finally in the tragic Battle of the Bear's Paw south of Chinook.

A sidelight was a renewal of debate on Chief Joseph's role, which has been revived in the light of recent historical research. On hand was Josiah Red Wolf, 94, last known survivor of the battle in 1877 who saw his mother die at his side as she protected him. The old man's heart was too full for words.

Going west to Lost Trail Pass and north to Hamilton, we encountered a memorial that was entirely different. Many years ago, we had read the story of the medical research pioneers at the Rocky Mountain Laboratory. One author, somewhat romantically and not quite accurately, called them "Microbe Fighters." But it is a great story, one of sacrifice and even death for some of these men, a story that has international significance—for the scientists fanned out over the world to fight disease—a movement which began with the battle against Rocky Mountain Spotted fever.

In an old brick structure on Hamilton's west side (the original site of the laboratory) Dr. William L. Jellison and his volunteer associates have begun assembling the story of this different kind of war. As Dr. Jellison said, "The ceiling was on the floor" when they began. Plaster covered it. Now they are making progress, and as one moves around the room with Dr. Jellison, himself a onetime member of the laboratory staff, the story springs to life.

This site has been appropriately named the H. T. Ricketts Museum, for one of the medical pioneers who lost his life in "medical combat."

So we encountered within a few hours and a few miles two chronicles of almost epic proportions.

James H. Sargent of Minneapolis, left, received a C. M. Russell Centennial medallion this month from Director Sam Gilluly when he registered as the season's 90,000th visitor. Still vigorous at 87, Sargent is a retired land and tax department official for a Minnesota power company. He was in Montana to visit his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. B. W. # Illinois Historian, Working on Career of Montana's Senator Thomas J. Walsh, Praises Library Holdings

J. Leonard Bates, professor of history at the University of Illinois at Champaign, has advised Librarian Mary K. Dempsey that he will be in Helena this Fall to use the Library's facilities in furthering his study-in-depth of the life and career of Montana's famed Senator Thomas J. Walsh. Dr. Bates edited a volume based on the early letters of Walsh and his future wife under title Tom Walsh in Dakota Territory, published last year by the University of Illinois.

In advising Miss Dempsey of his intentions to come to Helena, the Illinois historian had this to say: "At no other place than the Montana Historical Library could I find the extensive newspaper files that are indispensable to my study. The newspapers, along with Walsh's correspondence, the Congressional Record and other governmental publications are the basic primary sources available to me. The Library also contains a body of reference works, and special studies, that could not be found in any other place, at least to my knowledge. I have also benefitted from the photographic collection, in which there are many pictures of Senator Walsh and his contemporaries."

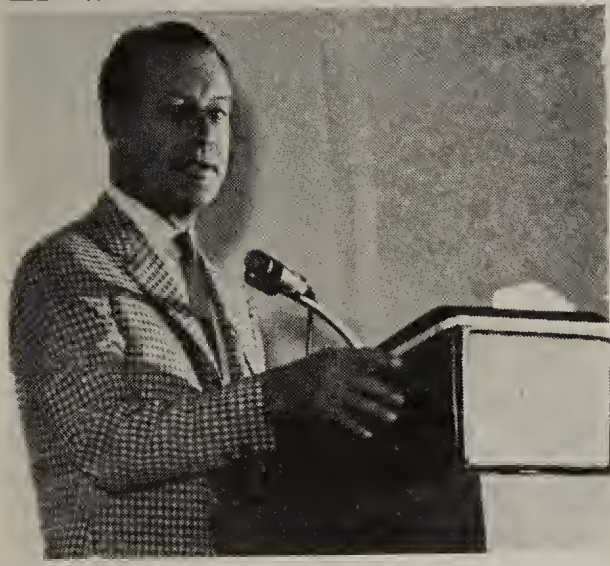
Historic Ford Cars Make Dedication Debut in Helena



GOV. TIM BABCOCK addresses crowds assembled for the dedication ceremonies, at which E. E. (BOO) MAC GILVRA (below) presided for the Historical Society.

Nostalgia and excitement hit 1325 Helena Avenue in our town on Saturday, Aug. 5, when more than 30 restored and gleaming Ford automobiles began their long term of display under the direction of the Montana Historical Society. More than 300 car enthusiasts and history buffs from throughout Montana and other states were on hand as the Ed Towe antique Ford Collection officially opened for public display.

E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, former president of the Society's Board of Trustees, presided at the program and introduced a number of dignitaries, including Gov. Tim Babcock, who is an inveterate antique car enthusiast and proved it by arriving at the site in an impressive 1918 White truck.

Greetings from the City of Helena were brought by Mayor Dave Lewis and Fr. Bernard Sullivan, president of the Helena Chamber of Commerce. John R. Pierce of Billings, a member of the Montana House of Representatives, dedicated a collection of Montana license plates, now on display with the cars, in memory of his father, the late George R. Pierce.

Ed Towe of Circle, who has collected the antique Fords over a period of about 15 years, officially dedicated the collection, including in his remarks some interesting experiences he has had as a collector. He pointed out that there are only four gaps of major Ford models in the collection, and most of them will be filled within a short time. He pointed out, however, that only four 1904 Model B Fords are still in existence, and one in unrestored condition carries a price tag of $40,000 to a collector willing to pay the price.

There were a number of unusual aspects to the opening day program, including the appearance of several members of the Montana Pioneer and Classic Automobile Club in motoring costumes of another day, a large bouquet of red roses from the famed Harrah's of Reno, Nevada, which houses one of the world's largest collections of antique cars of many makes, and renditions of historic old Model T music by Rex Rieke of the Society's curatorial staff.

There was little doubt in anyone's mind that the Ed Towe Collection, believed to be the largest in the country of antique cars of one manufacture, will attract thousands of persons who are not only interested in them as antiques but recognize the important role they played in the development of the West.

MR. AND MRS. ED TOWE of Circle, collectors of the classic Fords, discuss the day's events with SAM GILLULY, right, director of the Montana Historical Society.

MORE SCENES FROM CAR DISPLAYS OPENING

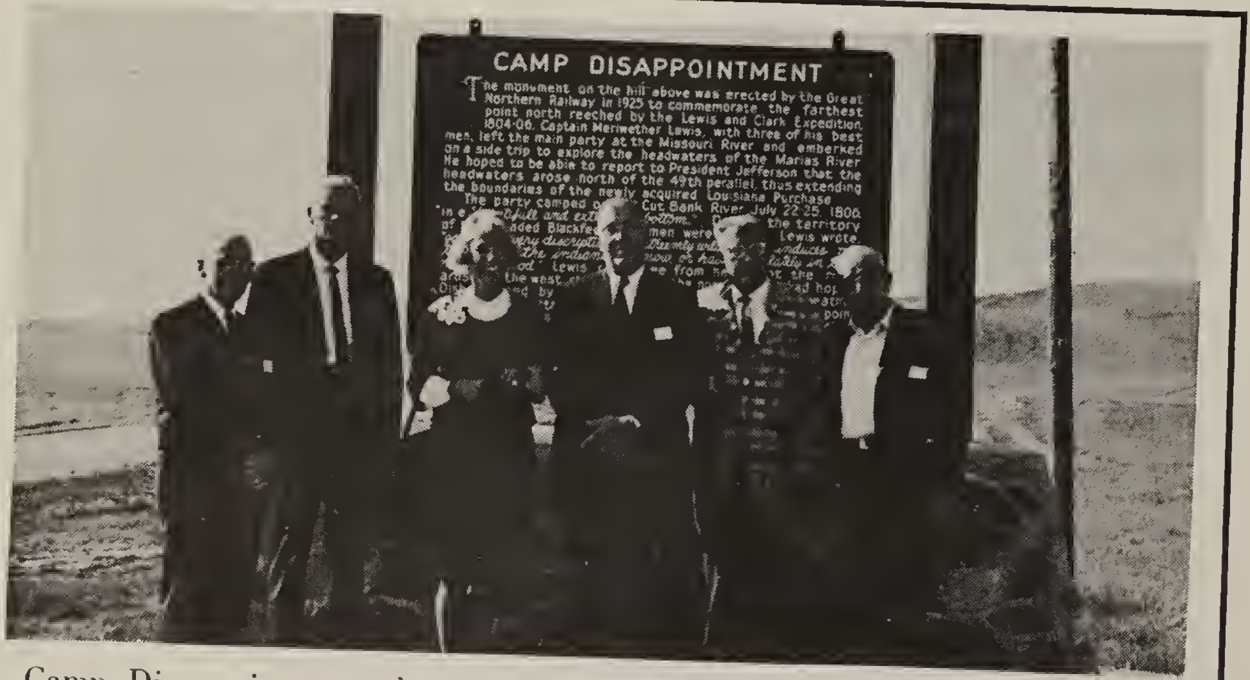
PART OF THE OPENING DAY CROWD is seen in this view, with E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra who presided at the program on the rostrum in the right background.

Pierce of Billings; at right, a 1909 Model T Touring car.



Camp Disappointment, the northernmost point reached by the Lewis and Clark Expedition, was dedicated as a National Historic Landmark on June 16, with a number of people directly involved in marking the trail of the explorers present for the occasion. Pictured, left to right: David Ainsworth of Salmon, Idaho, vice chairman of the National Lewis and Clark Trail Commission; Orvin B. West of Cut Bank, member of the Montana Commission and a member of the editorial board of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History; Don C. Foote of Billings, member of the Montana Commission and owner of Pompey's Pillar, dedicated last year as a National Historic Landmark; Hal Stearns of Harlowton, vice chairman of the Montana Commission, and E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, a member of both groups, who in July acted as host to Clark Adreon, great great grandson of Captain Clark during a personal trip to Montana to invite interested persons to the dedication of the great archway at the Jefferson Expansion Memorial in St. Louis. Both Stearns and MacGilvra are members of the Society's Board of Trustees.

Death Claims Two Noted Montanans, Contributors to Historical Society's Work

The Historical Society takes note of the recent passing of two men who have made substantial contributions to our work over the years.

Thomas D'Arcy Brophy, native of Butte who became an internationally known advertising executive and a founder of the American Heritage Foundation, was killed in Pawling, N. Y. when he attempted to stop his rolling car in a large parking lot. Brophy, 73, was the son of Patrick Jerome Brophy, who established Butte's first general mercantile business. A patron of the Historical Society, the deceased rose to vice presidency and director of the Anaconda company before joining Kenyon and Eckhardt, well known advertising firm of which he eventually became chairman of the board.

Alfred J. Watkins, 80, who lived in the Loring community in Northern Montana, died July 18 at a Malta, Mont. hospital. Also a patron of the Society, he made a notable contribution several years ago of an ivory-handled handgun which once belonged to the notorious Dutch Henry. Member of a pioneer Eastern Montana homestead family, Watkins was a well known stockman and breeder of Hereford cattle.

SUMMER ISSUE OF MAGAZINE SOLD OUT; REPRINTS COMING

For the first time in its 16-year history, MONTANA the Magazine of Western History finds that an issue must be put on the press for reprinting. The Summer, 1967 issue, despite an extra press run in the original printing in June, sold out completely long before current orders could be filled. The new press run magazines are due in mid-August; those whose orders have not been filled may expect delivery soon after that date.

Three New Appointments Bring Society's Board to Full Membership

STELLA A. FOOTE

DR. RAY O. BJORK

JOSEPH S. DENT

The Historical Society's Board of Trustees was brought up to its full 15-member strength this Summer when Gov. Tim Babcock announced the appointment of Mrs. Stella A. Foote of Billings, Dr. Ray O. Bjork of Helena, and Joseph S. Dent of Miles City to fill three vacancies.

Mrs. Foote, member of a pioneer Montana family, is the wife of Don C. Foote, noted collector of Western Americana. She is a working partner with her husband in collecting and managing the noted Treasures of the West exhibits featured with Montana's Centennial Train displays at the New York World's Fair in 1964 and 1965. The Foote exhibits subsequently traveled to Europe. Mrs. Foote is a talented writer on the Foote exhibits and on western history.

Dr. Bjork now chief of outpatient services at Fort Harrison Veterans Hospital near Helena, had a distinguished career as a Montana educator before returning to the study of medicine in 1944, a study which had been interrupted more than 20 years before. He began the practice of medicine in Helena in 1950, but six years later this was interrupted by the onset of multiple sclerosis. Dr. Bjork has remained active, however, in a remarkable number of fields, including lecturing, writing and research on multiple sclerosis, and involvement in publishing pamphlets and other guides on health in the public schools, among other subjects.

Mr. Dent, a native of Biddle, Montana, is a founder and now president of the Eastern Montana Historical Society which headquarters in Miles City. He is a member of the Certified Public Accounting firm of Stallard & Dent.

The Society will miss the counsels of three members whose places are filled by the new appointments. They are Howard A. Johnson of Butte, attorney, banker and former Chief Justice of the Montana Supreme Court; Casey Barthelmess of Miles City, pioneer stockman and collaborator in the recent book-length study, Photographer on an Army Mule, which told the story of his father, Christian, a U.S. Army musician who became an early-day Eastern Montana photographer; Mrs. Joyce Mackay of Roscoe, also a member of a well known pioneer family. She is the wife of William R. Mackay, Montana legislator, son of Malcolm Mackay, close friend of C. M. Russell whose great personal collection of original Russell art forms the nucleus of the Historical Society's collection.

CALIFORNIA MAN REGISTERS AS 60,000TH SOCIETY VISITOR IN MID-JULY

STACY JEROME, right, in charge of counter sales at the Society, presents a framed reproduction of C. M. Russell's great oil painting, JERKED DOWN, to Mr. and Mrs. Frank Agundez of Long Beach, Calif.

Frank Agundez, who works for a stevedoring company in Long Beach, Calif., registered in our main lobby on Monday, July 17, and was surprised to discover that he and his family were due for special recognition: he was the 60,000th visitor to sign his name on the official register.

In the Agundez party were Mrs. Agundez, their granddaughter, Tammy Fix of Great Falls, and Mrs. Agundez's mother, Mrs. W. T. McCracken of Salmon, Idaho. The family was on its second trip through Montana, although they had never been in Helena before. From here they continued on to Glacier Park, Cardston, Alberta, then to Missoula, Salmon and points in Utah before returning to Long Beach.

Mr. and Mrs. Agundez, in talking with the Society's staff, expressed the thoughts of nearly every visitor to Montana: they like it, they wish they could stay longer, they hope they can come again next year.

DIALOGUE with the DIRECTOR

By Sam Gilluly

To paraphrase the old song, museums are bustin' out all over Montana. Especially during the last year, we at the Society have observed what appears to be a spontaneous but widespread movement by Montanans at local and county levels to preserve their historical heritage.

Latest manifestation in which the Director was privileged to participate was the dedication in July of the Central Montana Historical Museum in Stanford, in the heart of Charlie Russell country.

---

What with Antique Fords, planning for a new addition and throngs of visitors, this has been a very busy summer in our museum and library. By the time this issue reaches our members, our attendance for the year will be nearing the 75,000 mark. They come not only from over the nation but from across the seas. We were honored especially to escort a group of governmental officials from Kenya, who were guests in Helena of Gov. Tim Babcock.

---

Another distinguished visitor late in July was Dr. John C. Ewers of the Smithsonian Institution in Washington. Many Montanans will remember Dr. Ewers as planner and first director of the Museum of the Plains Indian in Browning. He spent some months in Helena about 15 years ago, giving guidance in preparation of some of our outstanding museum exhibits. An authority on Indian art and history, he serves as consultant on Indian ethnology for MONTANA the magazine of Western History and is the author of such outstanding book-length studies as "Artists of the Old West" and "The Blackfeet: Raiders on the Northwestern Plains." Mrs. Ewers, who accompanied her husband to Helena, assists him in researching in his fields of interest. We are grateful that Dr. Ewers could contribute his time and talents to advise us both about our coming building addition and displays.

Recent publicity given the Society and its operation included a series of fine articles in the Kalispell Inter Lake by freelancer Dale A. Burk of Butte. The articles and photographs present a complete picture of the Society's operations and future plans. They have been consolidated in a reprint, and any interested member may request a copy.

Although every word he wrote and every piece of art he produced is eagerly accepted 20 years after his death, Will James himself has remained a shadowy figure. The real story of his brilliant yet tragic career has been difficult to piece together into a meaningful whole. Here for the first time, with sympathy and understanding, Anthony Amaral has set it all down: the remarkable success, the personal weaknesses and tragedies, the searchings and the untimely death in 1942 of an undoubted genius.

Montana Museums Form Statewide Organization for Mutual Help

First steps toward organizing a statewide museum association were taken June 17 at an all-day meeting at the Montana Historical Society's building in Helena. More than 40 representatives of local or county museums and historical groups met to hear pointers on museum and library operations as presented by staff specialists of the Society, then wound up making their own start of an association that should be mutually beneficial.

The visitors selected a five-member steering committee to study needs of an association of Montana museums and to draft by-laws. The committee selected Peter Yegen Jr. of Billings as chairman; Robert Leinart, Fort Benton, vice chairman, and Mrs. Don Tavenner, Deer Lodge, secretary. Other members of the guiding group are James Carter of Glendive and William R. Jellison, M.D., Hamilton.

One of the highlights of the day's program was a running commentary and tour of the Montana museum conducted by Curator Robert F. Morgan. He, in fact, working with Ed Craney, Butte, president of the Greater Montana Foundation, had done much of the planning work for the day's session.

Sam Gilluly, Society Director, welcomed the group and presided at the meeting. He stressed "service to Montanans" and to local Montana institutions in pointing out that the Montana Historical Society wishes to co-operate and advise any local group. This same thought was echoed by E. E. "Boo" MacGilvra, Butte, Society President.

Craney, in a brief talk, emphasized museums and their relationship to the growing tourist industry and also referred to a statewide museum directory, which he had prepared.

Among other programs speakers were Mabel Gaskill, Museum office manager, on "The Value and Purpose of Merchandising in the Small Museum," and Miss Mary K. Dempsey, chief librarian, on "Collecting and Cataloging Documents."

A panel on "Problems of Small Museums" brought lively discussion and new information. Speakers included Yegen, Leinart and Hugh Simmons, curator of the Fort Benton museum.

The Museum and Library specialists were available throughout the day for consultation and many of the visitors utilized this service.

Space does not permit listing the full registration, but it was geographically inclusive—from Ekalaka to Kalispell.

Casey Barthelmess Steps Down

The unobstrusive but solid counsels of Casey E. Barthelmess of Miles City will be missed by the Montana Historical Society's Board of Trustees. A member of the board since September, 1959, Barthelmess retired from active service at his own request, and as of this writing Governor Babcock has not announced his successor.

Casey Barthelmess is a genuine Montana pioneer, a participant in Eastern Montana's cattle industry since boyhood. His father, Christian Barthelmess, was a U.S. Army photographer-musician who recorded on film countless significant scenes around Fort Keogh near Miles City and other spots in the West where he was stationed. His story, along with more than 100 of his pictures, was published by the University of Oklahoma Press in 1965. The text, by Maurice Frink, was written in collaboration with Casey Barthelmess.

Along with the announcement of Barthelmess' retirement, Director Sam Gilluly was informed of Governor Babcock's reappointment of Mrs. Sue Ford Bovey of Great Falls and Whitney Smith of Whitefish to the board.

Westerners Honor Contributor

The Society is pleased to learn that Helena Huntington Smith of Arlington, Virginia, a frequent contributor to the columns of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History, has been awarded the annual Buffalo Award of the New York Westerners for her recent book-length study of the Johnson County War, The War on the Powder River.

Montana Reaps Rewards From Historical Publications Meet At Nashville's Vanderbilt U.

Editor Vivian A. Paladin returned to Helena just in time to report, however sketchily, the results of her participation in the Institute on Historical Agency and Historical Museum Publications held June 11-16 at Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn. Co-sponsored by the American Association for State and Local History and Vanderbilt and made possible by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, the sessions were rewarding from many points of view.

Formal discussions, invariably followed by liberal periods of questions and answers, were led by people knowledgeable in such fields as research, writing, publishing and the graphic arts. Much of what was said in these sessions was translated into smaller group workshops conducted by representatives of some of Nashville's famed printing and publishing firms and other graphic arts experts.

Seventy-two editors and others engaged in historical publishing from throughout the country were in attendance. As is usually the case, by no means the least of the rewards were found in person-to-person contact with people facing different but related problems in the burgeoning field of historical publishing.

The American Association for State and Local History, now implementing institutes and seminars for museum directors and others, is to be commended for its leadership in utilizing National Endowment funds for such projects—projects which have as their goal the dissemination and exchange of information among people who are in the business of preserving and publishing the history of our country.

John Jacob Jewell's Colorful, Informative Lectures Delight Museum Visitors

More than 50 eighth graders from Kalispell's Evergreen School were on an annual three-day trip this month when they joined ranks with some 30,000 of their precedessors in listening to an interesting and factual lecture by John Jacob Jewell. He has been a familiar figure on Montana's capital grounds for more than 30 years and an effective guide and lecturer at the Historical Society for a dozen years.

A sketch of this colorful man with a deep knowledge of Montana history and government seems an appropriate way to begin telling about our 1967 tourist season when thousands will come to visit and perhaps be treated to one of his unforgettable tours. For John, whose resounding voice belies his 81 years, gives visitors the "full treatment."

Although his tenure with us has been on a part-time basis, he has lectured to thousands in our building and in the capitol building. There his emphasis is on state government, which he knows from committee room to floor debate to final enactment. At the Society, John's theme is the history of our state and the art and personality of Charles M. Russell, whom he knew personally from 1908 until the artist's death in 1926. An unabashed admirer of the work of the Cowboy Artist, which he says flatly cannot be approached by any other artist, living or dead, Jewell gives his listeners a great deal of personal detail not found in books and articles written about Russell.

Born in Decorah, Iowa, on August 14, 1886, John Jewell took his law degree from the University of Iowa at Ames in 1908. That same September he came to Montana, and has lived in the state ever since, only occasionally going back to Iowa for a reunion with the dwindling ranks of his college and football contemporaries.

Jewell settled at Hobson, near Lewistown, and practiced law for 25 years. It was in 1908 that he first met Charlie Russell, who frequently came back to his old haunts around Lewistown to visit friends.

John Jewell first came to Helena in 1913 as a member of the House of Representatives from Fergus County. It was the beginning of his long association with Montana's state government. In 1933, he came to Helena as chief clerk of the Legislature in the administration of Governor John Erickson. He served in this post in 1935, 1937, 1939 and 1949, becoming thoroughly familiar with the intricacies of the legislative process.

In 1937, Governor Roy E. Ayers, a Lewistown resident, hired his fellow townsman as executive secretary. Filling this post throughout the Ayers administration, John became equally familiar with the workings of the executive branch of government.

During the next 12 years, until 1953, Jewell was manager and general counsel for the Montana Automobile Dealers Association. Now entering what he considered would be his retirement years, John soon found himself immersed in the history of the State Elks Association. Now state historian, he has spent a great deal of time researching and writing the history of the lodge.

During his years as chief clerk in the capitol building, Jewell's talents as a lecturer and tour guide were used with increasing frequency. Visiting children, especially, received the benefit of his knowledge of what went on in the legislative halls. It was in 1955 that the Historical Society learned of his personal acquaintance with C. M. Russell, and hired him on a part-time basis as guide and lecturer. We have continued ever since. John Jewell has never turned down an assignment for special weekend duty or to guide a particular group through our building.

As the tourist season of 1967 gets underway, careful tabulations of visitors are made at the main lobby counter. Stacy Jerome, in over-all charge, had counted just under 30,000 visitors as of June 1.

The building's sound system, which visitors use with plug-in earphones, has been retaped for better and somewhat shortened commentaries on the many displays. There are new transportation cases and other new things to see. This summer, too, the collection of antique Ford cars from the Edward Towe collection will arrive for display at a newly refurbished building across from the Northern Pacific depot in Helena, some seven blocks from our building. Under management and maintenance by the Society, the cars will remain there until completion of the addition to the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building which houses the Society.

Thus it looks like a great summer at the Historical Society. We are pleased that John Jewell, still vigorous and remarkably articulate in his "late summer" years, will be a part of our offerings to visiting students and grown-ups alike.

Montana Magazine Receives First Place National Award

Just as we go to press, we have been informed that MONTANA the Magazine of Western History has received a first place national award from the National Federation of Press Women which held its convention June 17-23 at Sun Valley, Idaho. It is the second such award which the magazine and Editor Vivian Paladin has received, the first coming for the 1964-65 nationwide contest. THE MONTANA POST, which Vivian also edits, received a first place award in 1965-66.

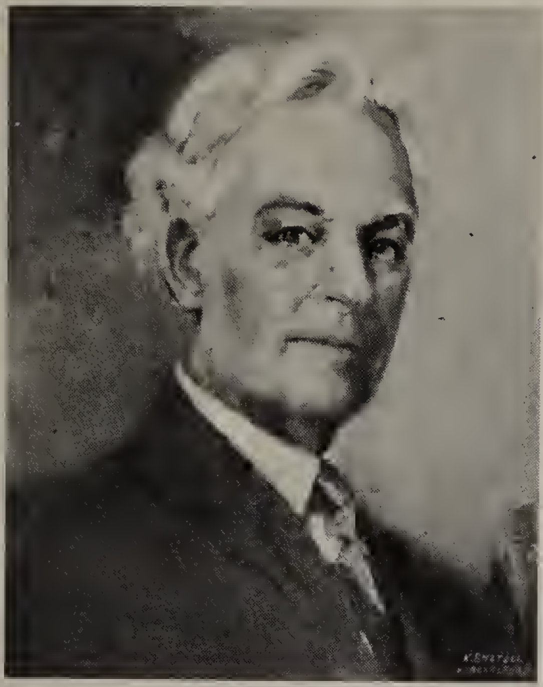
Society Acquires Portrait Of Gov. John E. Erickson



This oil portrait of John E. Erickson, the only man ever elected for three consecutive terms as Governor of Montana, was recently presented to custody of the Montana Historical Society as a gift from the late Mrs. Erickson to the State of Montana. It is the work of Katherine Buzzell Shackelford of La Canada, Calif., former Helena resident.

A native of Wisconsin, John Erickson was raised in Kansas. He took his law degree from Washburn College in Topeka and was admitted to the Kansas bar in 1891. The next year he came to Montana, settling first in Great Falls. He later moved to Choteau, where he practiced law and served as county attorney and as a district judge. Still later he moved to Kalispell. He was elected Governor in 1924, and was elected to two more terms. He resigned in 1933, however, to become U.S. Senator succeeding Thomas J. Walsh, who died in office.

Governor Erickson died in Helena on May 25, 1946, at the age of 83.

Mining Camp Pictures Form Major Acquisition

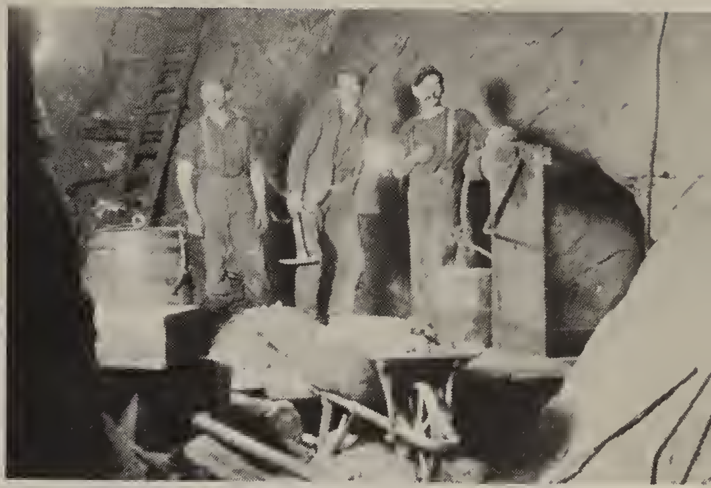
A collection of almost 400 photographic negatives, most of them taken shortly after the turn of the century at Western Montana mines, mills and mining towns and camps by the late Malcolm Bowden of Helena, has been donated to the Historical Society Library by Charles A. Horsky of Washington, D.C., a nephew of Mr. Bowden.

Horsky, son of Judge and Mrs. A. J. Horsky of Helena, pointed out that Mr. Bowden, long-time mining enigneer, had taken the pictures while working at many mining camps in the area.

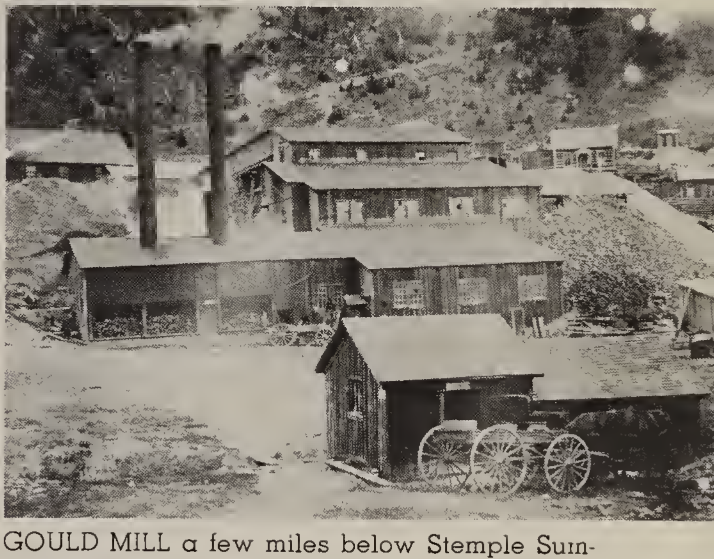
After having the negatives copied, the Library found the pictures of unusual quality and variety. A few of the locales included are such mines, towns and cities as Hecla, Quigley, Elkhorn, Renova, Pony, Butte, Anaconda, Gould, Southern Cross, East Pacific Mine, Winston, Electric, York, Rimini, and others. Dates range from around 1900 to about 1912. Many are of great importance historically, for they record camps which were lively then but have since fallen into ghostly ruin.

Born in London on August 1, 1885, Mr. Bowden came to Helena with his parents, Josiah and Mary Hart Bowden, when he was four years old. After attending Helena schools, he graduated from the School of Mines in Butte. After his years as a mining engineer, Bowden joined the Montana Highway Department as right-of-way engineer, serving until his retirement in 1956. He died on October 27, 1966, at the age of 81.

Charles Horsky, member of a pioneer Helena family, was appointed advisor to President Kennedy on national capital affairs in 1962, and remains in the same capacity in the Johnson administration. He is a graduate of Helena High School, University of Washington, and Harvard Law School.



ELKHORN MINE, southeast of Boulder and one of Montana's richest silver mines with a long period of activity, was photographed in 1912 at one of its lower levels. The mine was first developed by Helena pioneer Anton M. Holter in 1872, and its fortunes rose and fell as various owners, including a British syndicate, fought the familiar battle of water seepage. During World War II, tailings of the old stamp mill were worked for lead, silver and zinc. The remains of Elkhorn today are some of the region's most interesting to see.



GOULD MILL a few miles below Stemple Summit between Helena and Lincoln, as it looked in 1906 when it was enjoying a second period of activity. High grade surface ores from the Jay Gould mine were processed at this 10-stamp mill from the mid-1880's until well into the 1930's. Underground water forced sporadic closures, but over the years more than $2,500,000 in gold alone was produced.

Northern Cheyennes Mourn Death of John Stands-In-Timber

There was mourning this month in the country of the Northern Cheyennes in Southeastern Montana as John Stands-in-Timber, patriarch and historian of his people and one of the last living links with the past, was buried at the Lame Deer Cemetery.

Officiating at mass and prayers for the dead according to the Anglican rite was Father Peter Powell of Chicago, into whose hands Stands-in-Timber entrusted his voluminous records and archives. Fr. Powell is certain to carry out a trust which is undeniably sacred: to disseminate and preserve the remnants of the Cheyenne religion and culture of which this aged Indian had been custodian for so many years.

Although Stands-in-Timber's birthdate is not recorded with certainty, it is believed he was in his 85th year. Six years before his birth, his grandfather, Lame White Man, had been killed in the Custer fight, mistaken by the Sioux for one of the soldiers' Crow or Shoshone scouts. A thoughtful boy who liked to listen, John began taking note of the tales of his elders when such men as Little Wolf, White Bull, Brave Wolf and American Horse were still alive.

The lad was educated at Haskill Institute, graduating with honors. Then he returned to the Tongue River Reservation, married and raised a family. In 1928, a lawyer was sent to the Northern Cheyennes, charged with the duty of investigating certain tribal claims. John Stands-in-Timber became his interpreter and research historian. It was from this beginning that this able man became immersed in recording the past of his tribe, and he worked at it tirelessly through the years.

Father Powell, authority on Cheyenne history and deeply interested in preserving the sacred rites of the tribe, recently wrote us that after the mass and prayers for the dead at which he officiated, there followed the "old time Cheyenne give-away" and burial among many of the old Cheyenne scouts whom John Stands-in-Timber had talked to and listened to in his youth.

Navy League Publication Features Story of Gallant U.S.S. Helena Cruisers

An article of unusual interest to Montanans is printed in the May issue of Navy: the Magazine of Sea Power, published by the Navy League of the United States. It is a thumbnail sketch of the life and career of Vice Admiral John L. Chew, now stationed at Pearl Harbor on the staff of Admiral Roy L. Johnson, commander-in-chief of the Pacific Fleet.

Admiral Chew, now responsible for protecting free world shipping throughout 85 million square miles of ocean from the threat of enemy submarine attack, can look from his headquarters on Ford Island across the harbor at the dock where the cruiser USS HELENA stood when the Japanese attacked on December 7, 1941. Chew was then a member of her crew as air defense officer, and he watched her near-destruction along with the ARIZONA AND NEVADA.

The USS HELENA was able to limp to San Francisco on one engine for repairs, which restored her to action in the Pacific. Lt. Commander Chew was aboard her again when she was sunk at Kula Gulf in August, 1943. The article tells of the harrowing experiences of Chew and a small group of crew members who swam all night and most of the next day before they were spotted and rescued by the Air Force.

The story of Admiral Chew and the gallant USS HELENA is particularly interesting to us, for it is the superb 21-piece silver service set and trophies from this vessel and from its successor, now in the mothball fleet, which are on display in our ground floor museum.

The service, which was taken from the doomed cruiser before it went into action in World War II, is richly engraved with historic Montana scenes, flags, the Great Seal, and appropriate epigrams. It was originally commissioned by the State of Montana in 1907 at a cost of $6,000 and placed aboard a cruiser named USS MONTANA. Subsequently, it was placed aboard a light gunboat named USS HELENA which served in the Spanish-American War, then on the cruiser which survived Pearl Harbor but was lost at Kula Gulf, and finally on the third USS HELENA, a cruiser launched in April, 1945. After service in the Korean War, often as flagship of the fleet, this cruiser was committed to the mothball fleet in 1963.

The silver service and trophies which have been aboard these historic and gallant vessels named for Montana and Helena were brought to the Society for custody and display in 1963 through the efforts of Society President E. E. MacGilvra of Butte, a member of the Navy League, with the active cooperation of other League members and Rear Admiral Edgar H. Reeder, Navy Reserve, of Helena. These magnificent silver pieces remain one of the most talked-about displays in our ground floor museum.

Appointment of Sam Gilluly as Society Head Applauded

Meeting in Helena on Friday, April 14, the Board of Trustees of the Montana Historical Society unanimously named Sam Gilluly of Helena as permanent director of the Society. A native Montanan, veteran newsman and publicist, Gilluly is an able administrator, speaker and writer, and is deeply interested in the history of the state. He is aware as well of its present-day potential through several years of association with the Montana Chamber of Commerce.

Gilluly's appointment has been greeted with enthusiasm, not only by members of the Board but by the staff of the Society, which has worked closely with him during his 18-year tenure on the Board of Trustees and particularly during his term as president the past several months. His understanding of the long-term goals of the institution has been apparent as well to members of the 40th Legislative Assembly to whom he helped bring our needs resulting in a favorable appropriation to carry them through.

Born in Billings in 1908, Gilluly is the son of the late John A. Gilluly, long-time Montana newspaperman and publisher who was elected to the Montana Newspaper Hall of Fame in 1965. Sam graduated from Fergus County High School in Lewistown in 1925, after working part-time on his father's paper, the Fergus County Argus. Entering the University of Montana's school of journalism, he took his degree in 1930. That same year he married Miss Esther Hart of Missoula, a fellow journalism graduate.

Sam was on the staff of the Great Falls Tribune for two years, and in 1932 he went to Glasgow, where for the next 28 years he edited the Glasgow Courier. In 1960 he came to Helena to take charge of the publications division of the Montana Chamber of Commerce.

The Gillulys have three sons, all of whom are following journalism careers: Jack is news editor of the Shelby (Mont.) Promoter, Dick is associated with newspapers in California, and Bob is editor of the Ravalli (Mont.) Republican.

During its meeting, the Board commended Robert F. Morgan for his effective service for nearly a year as our acting director. Morgan now returns to his post as Society curator. Richard B. Duffy will remain our business manager, while Miss Mary K. Dempsey will continue to serve as Librarian and Mrs. Vivian A. Paladin as editor of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History and The Montana Post.

E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, former president of the Board, will again act in this capacity until elections are held again in July.

Press Women Honor Society Publications, Name Editor Press Woman of the Year

Just as we go to press, we are informed that Vivian A Paladin who does editorial chores for both MONTANA the magazine of Western History and the publication at hand, was voted Montana Press Woman of the Year at the Spring meeting of the Montana Press Women held April 29 and 30 in Lewistown. The trophy, furnished by Mrs. Helen Clark of Butte, well known Montana writer and journalist who received the same award in 1966, was presented to Vivian at the closing banquet Saturday evening.

The Society was pleased, too, that both publications received first place awards at the luncheon Saturday noon. Another first came for the monograph, Hawks and Doves in the Nez Perce War of 1877, published by the Society late in 1966. Vivian will serve as vice president of the state group for the next two years.

Another particular pride for the Society was the appearance as luncheon speaker of Hal Stearns of Harlowton, recently appointed a member of our Board of Trustees. As usual, his remarks were entertaining and perceptive as he pointed out some of the opportunities and challenges of journalism facing the distaff members of the profession.

A word should be said about the locale of the meeting. In spite of some unseasonable, blowing snow, the Lewistown hostesses created an atmosphere of warm hospitality in this Central Montana city which has seen so many of the great events of our past.

MAGAZINE EDITOR GETS SCHOLARSHIP GRANT TO VANDERBILT U. SESSIONS

The American Association for State and Local History has informed us that Mrs. Vivian Paladin is among 75 editors and others involved in western history publishing throughout the country who have been granted scholarships to attend a week-long institute on the subject to be held at Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., June 11 through 16. Experts in the graphic arts and publishing will conduct panel discussions during which participants will have a chance to discuss their own publications. Field trips will be taken to large printing firms in the area with emphasis on the newest techniques in color lithographic printing.

Readers Asked for Help In Gathering Marshall Papers

The attention of our readers is called to an ambitious project, underway for nearly a year, of publishing a multi-volume compilation of the papers of Chief Justice John Marshall (1755-1835). The editor, Stephen G. Kurtz, writes that the volumes will be published by the University of North Carolina Press in Chapel Hill and is being sponsored by the National Historical Publications Commission and the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Because many of the papers have been destroyed or scattered, the publishers and editors are searching out every document written by or addressed to John Marshall or other records bearing directly upon his life. Anyone possessing such materials are asked to address The Papers of John Marshall, Box 220, Williamsburg, Virginia 23185.

LIBRARIAN MARY DEMPSEY VISITS EASTERN MONTANA

Librarian Mary K. Dempsey got her first real chance to see the boundless prairies of Eastern Montana and to share fellowship and a common interest in librarianship with the people of Poplar and vicinity on Saturday, April 22, when she was the guest of the Poplar City Library in a special observance of National Library Week. Traveling by train, Miss Dempsey was struck with the orderly beauty of plowed furrows, etched with new snow, stretching to the horizon. In the lively and friendly town of Poplar, she was entertained by Mrs. Allen Zimmerman, Mrs. J. M. Nass and others who have promoted the Poplar City Library into a meaningful collection of library materials. A large crowd turned out for the observance, which featured the display of a fine collection of Indian artifacts relating to the Sioux-Assiniboine tribe which has its agency at Poplar.

SOCIETY WILL FURNISH AUTHENTICITY CERTIFICATES ON ALL ORIGINAL ARTWORK

All works of original art sold by the Montana Historical Society will be accompanied by a numbered certificate of authenticity which will then become a permanent adjunct to the object and would accompany it upon future transfer to another owner. At its March meeting, the Board of Trustees took favorable action upon this suggestion, made by Trustee Branson G. Stevenson of Great Falls.

Certificates will apply not only to C. M. Russell and contemporary bronzes as in the past, but on all pieces of original art handled by the Society. Extreme care will be taken to incorporate in each certificate full and accurate information about the art. At the suggestion of Trustee Al Partoll, the certificates will be numbered and recorded in a register maintained at the Society.

Stevenson Commissioned

Branson G. Stevenson of Great Falls, well known Montana artist and a member of our Board of Trustees, has been commissioned to do artwork for the new Great Falls Public Library. Although space and plans for the art have not yet been determined, Stevenson's versatility as an artist will insure a distinguished job.

Jim Whilt, Beloved "Poet of the Rockies," Gone From Glacier Campfires

For many years, visitors in Glacier Park were treated to the authentic and colorful Old West in the person of Jim Whilt, a big and friendly man who talked around the evening campfires, pointing out scenic wonders with his cane, narrating the history of the Park, and reading from his own original verse. His death on March 10 prompted the following tribute from his friend of more than 40 years, Otha D. Wearin of Hastings, Iowa. Although Jim Whilt was so much a part of Montana and we are among thousands who came under his spell around a Glacier campfire, no one could do him honor better than has Mr. Wearin in his letter:

Montana lost one of the last of her grand old pioneers when Jim Whilt, colorful "Poet of the Rockies," joined his many friends, pale-face and Indian, Charley Russell, Brother Van, Irving Cobb, Bob Becker, and a host of others at what he often referred to in his poems as "The round-up in the sky."

Jim Whilt knew Montana as few men living today have ever known it. He was there when the West was wild, as a Government hunter, trapping, cruising timber, and traveling old Indian trails that were still bright and clear.

JIM WHILT

As head guide in Glacier National Park for years, he knew the area like the palm of his hand. Around the campfires and the huge fire-place in the vaulted lobby of Glacier Park Hotel, he was the most popular entertainer of all with his stories of early Montana and his poems that touched the hearts of his army of friends and followers.

As a radio entertainer and poet at KMA station in Shenandoah, Iowa for several years, Jim Whilt earned a national reputation before returning to his original "stomping grounds" at Kalispell and in Glacier Park, where he directed a trailer camp in his later years. Jim's many volumes of "Poems of the Rockies" are treasured by his friends in every state in the union.

Jim Whilt was as free and wholesome as the wild birds and animals and the rugged Rockies he loved. His life was vigorous and purposeful and he lived it actively to the end of the trail. The passing of such a rare man has left deep sorrow for his beloved wife, Edith, and his many friends. It is tempered, however, with the pleasure of having known him and the contribution he made to better living.

We will miss Jim Whilt here, but we know there was great joy at the big round-up in the sky when this real westerner came riding in to join the circle.

"30" For Craftsman of the Printed Word and Collector of History

John K. Standish, master printer, writer and collector of Western Americana, died February 1 at Halsey, Oregon, according to word received from his daughter, Mrs. Margaret Carey. A devoted friend of Montana and of the Historical Society, Mr. Standish had retired two years ago from the composing room of The Times, published in Brownsville, Oregon and covering news of Central Linn County. John Standish planned to devote himself to tracing the history of Halsey, his hometown. His great grandparents had homesteaded there and donated the original town plot.

Although his death at 64 years halted this latest project, Standish packed a great deal of work in his lifetime in the printing trade and in collecting historical materials. Learning his trade in Halsey as a "printer's devil," he came to Montana with his parents in 1916 when they homesteaded near Choteau. He credits his interest in the printed work to a high school teacher, Gladys Smith, and to a notable classmate, A. B. (Bud) Guthrie, Jr., Pulitzer prize-winning Montana author.

After high school, Standish worked at his trade in Montana, California, Oregon, Washington, Wyoming, Hearst publications in Chicago, the Seattle P.-I., and many others. In 1950, he joined the Portland, Ore. branch of the International Association of Printing House Crafstmen, and participated in the production of some beautiful pamphlets on the craft of printing.

PRINTER STANDISH EXAMINING A RARE ITEM

Standish's vast collection of Montana historical materials will come to the Historical Society here, other portions to the University of Oregon, his daughter informs us. For next to printing, John Standish loved history best. "A love of history is a sign of patriotism," he once wrote. "Patriotism, like charity, begins at home. True patriotism doesn't stop there, but pride—intelligent and not insular—in the real excellencies and in the admirable past of one's town or county, is of the same fabric as national and international patriotism."

But for the man who all his life considered printing a craft to be followed with integrity and pride, the familiar "30" sign-off has been affixed to his headstone.

CIRCULATION AT HIGHEST PEAK

MONTANA the Magazine of Western History has reached the highest circulation in its 16-year history, according to Editor Vivian A. Paladin, who took particular note of the fact that there is an increase of more than 400 direct mail subscriptions since the appearance in January of the first issue of the 1967 volume year. The magazine now reaches slightly more than 12,000 readers through subscription and newsstand sales. A recent survey indicates that the only historical journal which rivals us in readership is that of Missouri.

Wyoming History People Ask Help to Prevent Demise Of Historic Sheridan Inn

The onslaught of "civilization" threatens to destroy historic Sheridan Inn at Sheridan, Wyo., the "House of 69 Gables" mentioned in Ripley's Believe it or Not and once owned by Buffalo Bill Cody. We in Montana are in accord with our friends of the Sheridan County Historical Society who are attempting to raise $137,000 with which to purchase the inn and preserve it as a National Historic Landmark. The designation as a Landmark has already been received from the National Park Service, but unless funds can be raised, the beautiful old hotel will be demolished sometime next month.

Charles Luxmoore, president of the Sheridan County Historical Society, writes that more information can be obtained by writing him at Box 1441, Sheridan, Wyo.

Dorothy Johnson Slated To Speak at Banff Confab On Northwestern History

As we go to press, historians and scholars from throughout Canada and the Northwestern United States are gathering at Banff, Alberta for the Centennial Conference on the History of the Canadian West. The whole fabric of Canada's western history and culture will be investigated during panel discussions, addresses and on film from Wednesday, May 17, through Saturday, May 20. Topics include regional archaeology, fur trade, steamboating, the Hutterites, New France, and the cultural collision between Indians and whites.

Montana's Dorothy M. Johnson is slated as a Saturday speaker on the subject "The Use of Historical Material in Writing for Mass Media."

The Banff conference is a segment of Canada's year-long Centennial observance.

State Museum People Invited to Helena

Museum directors, supervisors and others interested in museum techniques in Montana have been invited to attend a meeting at the Montana Historical Society on Saturday, June 17, during which a complete inventory of museum items from various collections will be assembled, along with information about merchandising, a survey of Montana historical sites, and the formation of an association of museums in Montana.

According to Curator Bob Morgan, the object is to assist other Montana museums to upgrade their displays and holdings and to give mutual help in coordinating materials to avoid duplications. The Society has assisted many regional museums in the state with setting up exhibits, and the June meeting is designed to further the work of determining the extent and nature of various museum collections throughout the state.

POWDER RIVER HISTORY GOING TO PRESS SOON

A long-awaited history of Powder River County is now in the hands of the printer, we have been advised by Gordon Decker of Otter, Mont., a member of the Powder River County History Committee. The hard-cover book will be 8½ x 11 in size and its some 700 pages will contain approximately 850 pictures, along with text tracing the history of this colorful region.

Mr. Decker writes that pre-publication price of the book will be $10 a copy, and prospective buyers are invited to send orders to the committee in advance. After publication, slated for August this year, the price will go up to $15.

COMMANDER WILSON PUBLISHING THOUGHT-PROVOKING TRILOGY

Another publishing venture which we commend to our readers is underway in Florida and involves the significant writings of Commander Eugene E. Wilson, son of Northwest pioneers who joined with us several months ago in publishing the monograph Hawks and Doves in the Nez Perce War containing the memoirs of his father who served in that conflict as a civilian volunteer.

The present project encompasses the republication of three book-length studies by Commander Wilson, who as a Naval officer was one of four principal architects of American air doctrine after World War I. Now published as a trilogy with overall title Doctrine or Oblivion, the three separate books which have been updated from previous publications to include the present struggle in Viet Nam, are entitled Slipstream (1950), Wings of the Dawn (1955) and Kitty Hawk to Sputnik to Polaris (1960).

The trilogy, in special slipcase, is available at $12.50, while the individual hardback books will sell for $5.00 each. Interested readers may address the Literary Investment Guild, Ltd., Box 2845, Palm Beach, Florida 33480 to place their orders.

EUGENE E. WILSON

Commander Wilson, whose background includes not only naval experience but the highest counsels of the aircraft industry (Sikorsky Aviation, Chance Vought Corporation and United Aircraft), has dedicated his time and talent since his retirement to defining what he believes must be America's doctrine. He contends that unless mankind unites to bring the uses of armed force under a role of just and equal law, it will destroy our native habitat and, with it, the human race.

Majesty in Miniature . . . BUFFALO BULL . . . Great Study in Bronze

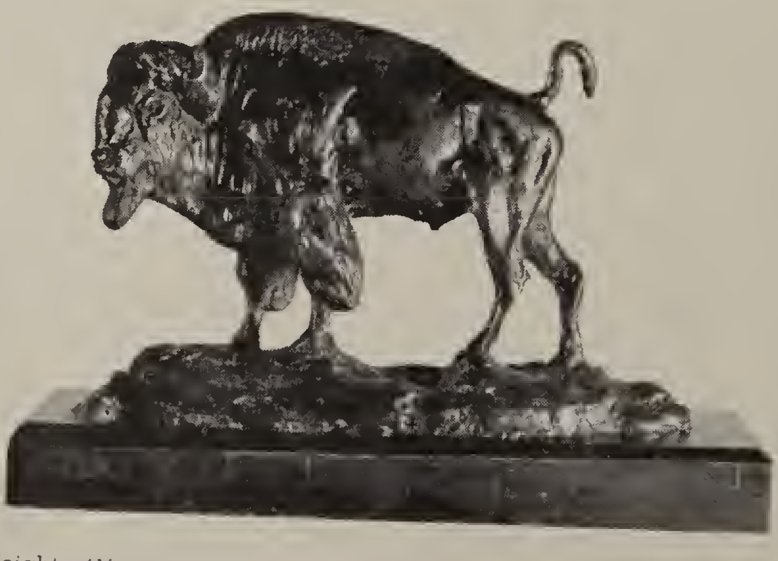
Most people on our staff consider this the most beautiful of all C. M. Russell bronzes still available to collectors. Until one sees it up close, it is impossible to believe a model only 4¼ inches high could hold such detail, anatomical perfection, and feeling of strength and easy grace. We have only a few left of the limited, numbered casting of 30 bronzes. The price: $1500.



Height: 4¼ inches
Signed: CMR near right hind hoof
Base. 5¾ x 2½

The original wax model was made in 1903 for Mrs. Katherine (Kit) Roberts Hubbard, a close friend of Charlie and Nancy Russell who became Mrs. Russell's personal secretary after the artist's death in 1926. "Nancy and Charlie gave me a variety of original models and pictures," Mrs. Roberts has said. ". . . I watched Mr. Russell make them all. He loved to model, and so often had a bit of wax in his hands."

Favorable Legislative Action Insures Exciting Growth at Society

The 40th Montana Legislative Assembly, which finished an extraordinary session just before we went to press, will long be remembered for many things, but for us at the Montana Historical Society and the thousands who are our members and supporters, it will be because in the midst of much important and critical work, the lawmakers took time to give a sympathetic hearing to our needs and increased our funds for the 1968-1970 biennium.

While the Historical Society budget is relatively modest when compared with other State agencies and while we will continue to raise much of the money needed to continue and enhance our services, the friendly and sympathetic treatment received by this institution at the session just closed will very greatly assist us.

It is not amiss here to give credit where credit is due: the needs of the Society were effectively conveyed to individual lawmakers by members of our Board of Trustees, notably by President Sam Gilluly and Vice President E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra. Their efforts in behalf of the Society cannot be overemphasized.

State support of the basic operations of the institution have been raised appreciably over the previous biennium. The increase will allow us to step up our vital microfilm program, add new personnel to the under-staffed library to relieve the long-standing problem of organizing and cataloguing historical materials which have come into the archives in recent years.

Moreover, the normal expenses and operations of the Society—including salaries, supplies, library and art acquisitions, postage, and many others—will be for the first time substantially provided for by appropriation. The limited staff of the Society will thus be freed from spending a disproportionate amount of time on strictly fund-raising projects.

Most exciting of all, perhaps, is the fact that a building appropriation of just under a half million dollars will allow for the much needed addition to the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building which houses the Society. As time goes on, we will set forth particulars, including architectural drawings, for the benefit of our readers.

A supplemental appropriation of $25,000 will allow the Society to accept custody of the splendid antique Ford car collection of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Towe of Circle, Mont. Temporary but suitable housing for the collection, providing for public display, has been arranged until the building addition is completed.

ED TOWE

The addition, which will preserve the architectural integrity of the building, will provide ample space and exhibit areas which will, for the first time, utilize hundreds of items long in museum storage.

All things taken together, prospects for real progress at the Montana Historical Society are brighter than they have been since this oldest of all Montana institutions moved into the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building in 1952.

WORK OF SYNDICATED MONTANA CARTOONISTS DELIGHTS GALLERY VISITORS

The cartoon as an art form has been featured with good effect this month in the Gary Cooper Gallery on the main floor of the Society's building. At the same time, two Montanans—representing two generations—who have attained nationwide syndication as cartoonists, have been given new and intimate exposure to our visitors.

Representative cartoon strips of Stan Lynde's famed Rick O'Shay and Fanny Cory Cooney's familiar Sonnysayings and Little Miss Muffit characters have been displayed against fabric panels. They have brought forth both smiles and memories.

Mrs. Cooney, native of Waukeegan, Ill., now lives in retirement in Stanwood, Wash. Were it not for failing eyesight, she would no doubt still be producing her comic strips featured for many years by King Features Syndicate.

One of this country's first successful woman illustrators and cartoonists, this remarkable lady came to Helena with her parents in about 1891, and began taking art courses from Miss Mary Wheeler, pioneer Montana teacher. At the age of 18, she went to New York to live with her brother, Jack Campbell Cory, well known political cartoonist. She attended classes at the Metropolitan School of Fine Arts, and began selling illustrations to such magazines as Century and Harpers Bazaar.

In the early 1900's, Fanny returned to Helena and in 1904 married Fred Cooney, member of a pioneer ranching family. They lived on a ranch now covered by the waters of Canyon Ferry Dam, Mrs. Cooney taking time out to raise three children. During the 1930's, King Features began syndicating Mrs. Cooney's cartoons, and readers delighted in their gentle humor well into the 1950's.

"Oh, if I only couldn't hear 'em hollerin', 'Sonny, time to get up'!"

Stan Lynde, born in Billings in 1931, has returned to Montana to make his home and produce his nationally syndicated Ricky O'Shay strips, against the advice of some of his editors. Stan grew up on Montana ranches and was educated at the University of Montana, where he majored in journalism. After a stint in the Navy, he went to New York City, where he worked by day as a typist and reporter for the Wall Street Journal and attended art school at night.

Rick O'Shay emerged in 1958 after a great deal of work and thought. He and such characters as "Hipshot" and "Quyat Burp" are all composites or prototypes of actual people Stan knew as a Montana ranch boy. Today the strip appears in more than 100 newspapers in this country and abroad, its authentic humor and pathos appealing to readers of all ages. Adding to the atmosphere of the gallery is a large welded sculptured figure of "Hipshot" by Billings sculptor Lyndon Pomeroy.

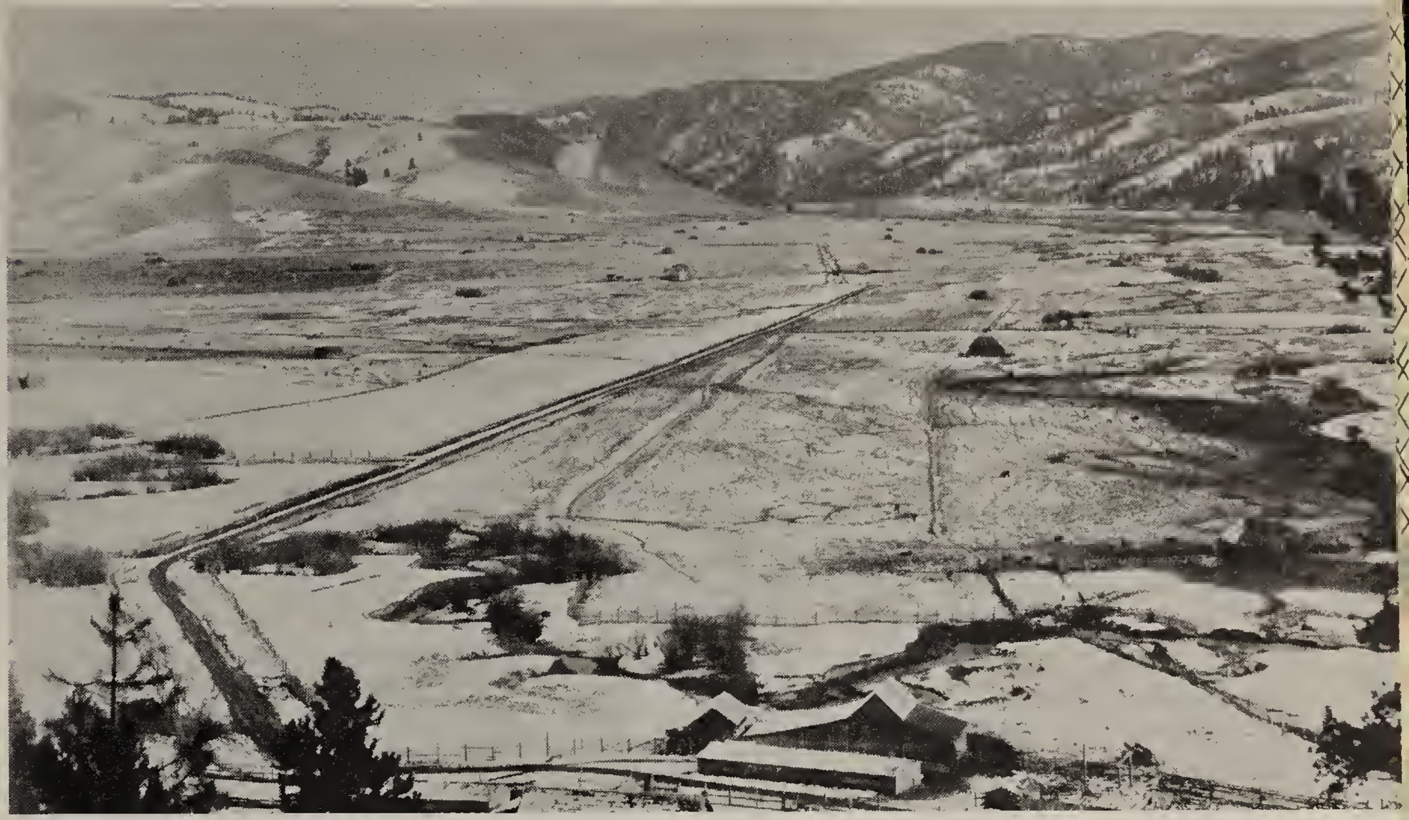
SCENE OF CMR's LARGEST CANVAS IN LORD PICTURE COLLECTION

This panoramic view of Sula Basin in the Bitter Root Valley, also called Ross' Hole, is one of hundreds of pictures taken by the late Herbert Watson "Bertie" Lord, who died in July, 1963 at the age of 93 years. His home was still the log house he had built in 1891 when he filed on his homestead. His collection of fine glass plate negatives has been preserved by his sons, Gilbert and Ray Lord, and represent a rich variety of historical pictures of life and people of the country around the East Fork of the Bitter Root River where Bertie Lord lived so long. He was never too busy to make use of his camera, purchased in 1889 from a mail order house.

It was our good fortune at the Society to receive a group of 38 prints taken from the glass plates, together with much memorabilia about the Lord family, prepared by Mrs. Bessie K. Monroe, veteran Western Montana newspaperwoman who has served since 1920 as a feature writer and correspondent for the Ravalli Republican in Hamilton, and for the Associated Press, Daily Missoulian and Spokesman-Review.

We plan, in these columns, to feature more of the Lord pictures as well as some of the family lore. To start the series, however, we thought our readers would be especially interested in the Sula Basin picture, seen in relation to C. M. Russell's great oil painting Lewis and Clark Meeting Indians at Ross' Hole which he created in 1912 on commission for the State of Montana and which hangs behind the Speaker's Stand in the House of Representatives chamber.

The Lord picture was taken in about 1900 and shows the Basin (or Ross' Hole) looking southeasterly toward the upper East Fork of the Bitter Root. The ranch in the foreground was operated by Jacob Wetzsteon, and it was from this spot that Russell sketched a nearly identical scene for his great oil. He and Mrs. Russell visited the ranch only a few years after this picture was taken, the artist returning to Great Falls with his sketch to complete the great canvas in time for installation in the capitol building early in July, 1912. The scene depicts the Lewis and Clark party on September 4, 1805, when they re-entered what is now Montana on their way westward. From this place, at which they parleyed with the Ootlashoot Indians, commonly referred to now as members of the Salish-Flathead Nation, they journeyed northward before crossing the mountains again into Idaho and onward to the Pacific.



THE SULA BASIN, OR ROSS' HOLE, LOOKING SOUTHEAST

Commendation goes to the Lord family, to Mrs. Monroe, and to Bob Gilluly, managing editor of the Ravalli Republican at Hamilton, for making a significant picture acquisition possible.

SOCIETY REPRESENTED AT NOTABLE PIONEER FUNERAL

Joseph Montgomery, 93-year-old Lewistown pioneer, represented the Society early last month at funeral and burial rites for Mrs. Mary Stuart Abbott, 97, the last surviving child of Granville Stuart, one of the founders and first secretary of the Montana Historical Society.

Mrs. Abbott was the youngest of nine children of Granville Stuart and his Shoshone wife whom he married in 1862. She was born in Deer Lodge City on February 2, 1870. Her father, one of Montana's most articulate pioneers and a man of so many attainments in so many fields that it would require book-length treatment to tell them all, died in Missoula in 1918, only two years after he had been commissioned by the Montana Legislature to write a history of the territory and state.

Mary Stuart married Teddy Blue Abbott, well known Montana cowboy and cattleman, on September 29, 1889. Abbott, who co-authored his own pungent memoirs under title We Pointed Them North, died in 1939. His wife, wearing the same red velvet dress she made herself for her wedding, was buried beside him last month in the family plot at historic old Fort Maginnis, northeast of Lewistown.

HAROLD G. (HAL) STEARNS

Harold G. Stearns, editor and publisher, raconteur and history enthusiast, was appointed to the Society's Board of Trustees last month by Governor Tim Babcock and confirmed by the Montana Senate. He joins us at a point where, thanks to favorable action by the 40th Legislative Assembly, the Society faces its greatest opportunity for growth in a decade and a half.

Born of pioneer parents on a Deer Lodge Valley ranch (which he still owns), Hal Stearns attended country school, Anaconda High School, and the University of Montana, where he earned his journalism degree in 1936. That year he joined the Havre Daily News, which he edited until 1940, when he purchased the weekly Harlowton Times. Since 1952, he has published both the Harlowton paper and the Ryegate Clarion, bringing to his columns often-quoted observations on the state and national scene.

Stearns is married to the former Jean Kountz, member of a pioneer Bozeman family. They have seven children, ranging in age from twenty-six to eight. The oldest son, Hal Jo, whose masters thesis on the Upper Musselshell is in its second printing, now teaches journalism at Missoula's Sentinel High School.

The new Board member says his interest in Montana history began during his years in Havre, close by the spot where Chief Joseph surrendered his Nez Perce in October, 1877, at the end of their search for a haven in Canada. Since then, Stearns has personally followed every mile of the trail. His deep interest in another trail—that of Meriwether Lewis and William Clark—led to his appointment to the Montana Lewis and Clark Trail Commission, which he serves as vice chairman.

Hal Stearns is deeply interested in education, serving on the University of Montana's Council of 50 and as vice chairman of Montana State's advisory council. He has worked on a number of state educational committees, is active in the Montana Press Association, the American Legion, Kiwanis Club and Chamber of Commerce in his hometown. What little spare time Hal has remaining is often devoted to guest speaker engagements. His talents as a speaker are almost legendary.

Hal Stearns is a man of great humor (he believes editors, for instance, are like football coaches: win 5, lose 4, keep the alumni sullen but not mutinous). He is also a man of deep thought. Both qualities, along with his knowledgeable interest in Montana's past, will lend strength to the Montana Historical Society at a particularly exicting point in our history. ## Going Grizzly . . . SUPERB RUSSELL BRONZE . . . Only a Few Left

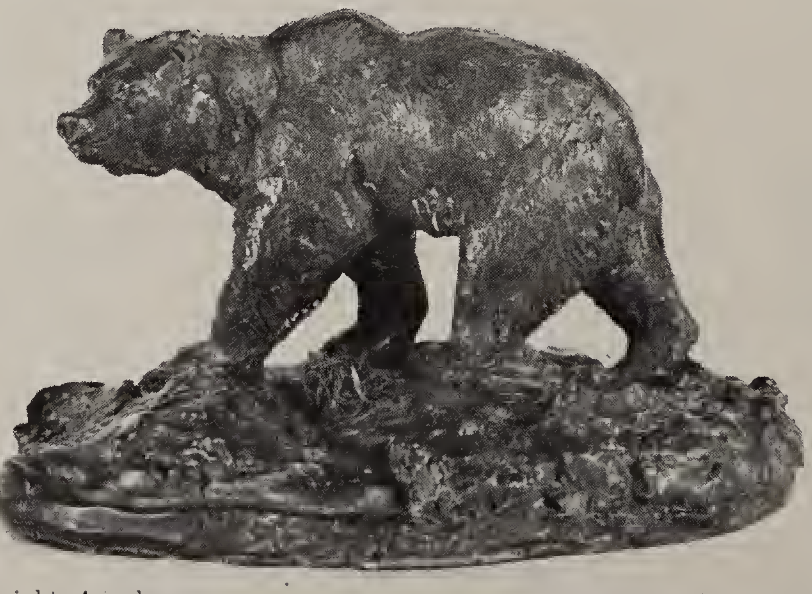
As we go to press, there are only eight GOING GRIZZLY bronzes of the limited, numbered casting of thirty remaining. Considered by many to be Russell's finest study of the great shaggy grizzly, this was modeled in 1922 for the artist's hunting partner, Ed Neitzling. Less impressive Russell bronzes are selling for much more than the $975.00 prepaid, price tag on this beautiful piece.



Height: 4 inches Base: 6¼ x 4½
Signed: C. M. Russell, skull, 1922

As all collectors are aware, not many authentic Russell bronzes are now available at any price, certainly few of the beauty and modest cost of this one. Committed to bronze by Sculpture House of New York, GOING GRIZZLY bears the artist's full signature, skull insignia, and the date of its creation. Each bronze is numbered, and the model will never again be cast. Purchasers receive a certificate of registration and authenticity from the Montana Historical Society.

OFFICIAL NEWSLETTER OF THE MONTANA HISTORICAL SOCIETY

MONTANA POST

VOLUME FIVE, NUMBER ONE

FEBRUARY, 1967

SHELVED WITH PERIODICALS

A New Publishing Routine, a Look at Montana's First Newspaper

With this issue, THE MONTANA POST, official newsletter of the Montana Historical Society, begins its fifth volume year with a new publishing schedule: THE POST will now be published eight times a year instead of twelve. Since MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY is published in January, April, July and October, the newsletter will appear during the other eight months: February, March, May, June, August, September and December. It is hoped that both our primary publishing objectives—producing a solid journal of Western history and a newsletter to act as the voice of the Society—will be served.

This is also an appropriate time to clarify our use of the name MONTANA POST, which graced the front page and masthead of Montana Territory's first genuine newspaper. This publication should in no way be construed as a continuation of that historic paper, a brief history of which follows.

At the same time, we give a nod of appreciation to Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Bovey, whose restoration of Virginia City has gained nationwide attention. When they first undertook the task of renovation and restoration, the Boveys found only two partial walls of the stone building which housed the Montana Post printing plant still standing. There was no roof, and a great deal of rubble. The frame building up front in which D. W. Tilton ran his City Book Store was entirely gone. Purchasing the printing equipment of the old Evening Chronicle of Virginia City, Nevada, the Boveys rebuilt the stonewalled printing plant and the book store front, using pictures in the files of the Montana Historical Society to guide them. The result is so nearly like the old that some care must be taken in choosing pictures of the old and the new.

The original Montana Post, almost complete files of which are in the Montana Historical Society Library, is probably our most extensively used and admired research tool. Its small type is not easy to read, but its text was always sparkling (albeit colored) and it had the good sense to maintain correspondents in other gulches and other camps and towns who reported the ups and downs of mining and other pursuits. It mirrored the national scene. too: the last gasps of the Civil War, the last Presidential campaign of Abraham Lincoln, his assassination and a nation in mourning. The Montana Post, in the best tradition of journalism, was a mirror of its day.

There had been a short-lived news sheet or two before Montana even became a seperate Territory, but it was two printers from Kalidah, Ohio, who set up a small press and "ten bundles of paper" in a log cabin basement in Virginia City late in the Summer of 1864 and began publishing the Territory's first bona fide newspaper.

The two men were aboard the steamer Yellowstone with press and equipment, fully intending to set up a paper in the Gallatin Valley. A fur-trader who passed them on the river paused to exchange news (a not uncommon practice) and assured them that there were more white-tail deer and antelope in the Gallatin than there were potential readers. Thus the partners decided to go to Virginia City, by then a roaring camp populated by thousands of news-hungry emigrants.

The first two issues of The Post's Volume 1, dated August 27 and September 3, 1864, carried the name of John Buchanan as editor and proprietor. His partner, M. M. Manner, was not mentioned, but he outlived Buchanan and left to researchers a manuscript describing some of the vicissitudes and trials of the publishers. The 960 copies of the first issue were eagerly bought up at 50 cents each, but with the third issue, dated September 10, 1864, D. W. Tilton and Ben R. Dittes were the new owners. Buchanan died on March 27, 1865, exactly seven months after the first issue hit the streets of Virginia City.

Under the ownership of Tilton and Dittes, the newspaper was decidedly successful for the next three and a half years. It was edited, from October 1, 1864 until September 22, 1866, by the English schoolmaster, Thomas Dimsdale, although his name never appeared on the masthead. Dimsdale published his own history of the Vigilantes in the paper, and wrote editorials which were passionately Republican and Unionist.

In the campaign of 1864, when Abraham Lincoln was opposing General George McClellan on the national scene, The Post began publishing tri-weekly, its pages ringing with Union fervor: "All Union men are requested, as they love their country, their homes, their liberties and their children, to wait no bidding, but come at the opening of the polls, and cast their ballots for God and their native land," said a lead editorial in the issue of October 22, 1864.

After Dimsdale's death late in 1866, the editorial chair was filled by Henry N. Blake, a Boston lawyer who was to occupy many Territorial offices, including Chief Justice of Montana's Supreme Court. He was succeeded by the competent James H. Mills, who later published the New Northwest at Deer Lodge.

In March, 1868, D. W. Tilton sold out his interest to his partner, Ben R. Dittes. In the issue of March 28, 1868, it was announced that the paper would move to Helena, with Mills continuing as editor. In his statement, Dittes explained that the move was made because Helena "has the larger population." Mails and express lines centering in Helena would also mean earlier delivery of the paper. And so the move was made.

The first issue appeared in Helena on April 25, 1868, with a notice explaining that subscribers would receive "three issues more than their receipts call for to indemnify them for the loss of the same number during the removal of the printing establishment."

In its first Helena issue, the paper reaffirmed its Republican sentiments "without equivocation or dilution," but ended the lead editorial with this statement: "We have good will toward all good willing men; are content if we be heard for our cause, judged according to our deserts, and patronized as we are worthy. . ."

But even with promises of becoming a daily paper and a proud tradition of being the Territory's only newspaper in the first critical year, The Post fell upon hard times almost immediately after the move. With its first issue produced in Helena, it had just a little over a year of life remaining.

The final issue appeared on June 11, 1869 with an announcement on the front page headed SUSPENSION. The notice said, in part: "We have a rather practical fact to mention this morning—the compulsory suspension of the Montana Post. An obligation heretofore unknown to either of us, and not for any indebtedness of the Post, given by the Manager, now absent, has matured, and the material of the office was attached last evening for the amount. Until released, a suspension of publication is a necessity that all will appreciate, and certainly, none with more regret than ourselves, who are utterly powerless to obviate the suspension . . ." Signed by James H. Mills and A. H. Beattie, the notice added that it was hoped the paper would begin publishing again in a few days and expressed confidence that "The Post will speedily again greet its friends, fairer, brighter and better, as the fairer and brighter skies succeed the storm we trust its friends will be as numerous and cordial then as now."

But the Montana Post of that day was dead. The rival Weekly Herald of Helena marked its passing: "While we may have said some bitter things of the Captain [Mills], we sincerely regret his departure. We here bear witness to . . . Captain Mills' ability, excellent talents and natural freedom as a writer."

Magazine Index for 1966

The index for the 1966 volume year of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY is now in preparation, and as in former years, it is our plan to mail it to all subscribers with the Spring issue of the magazine. As anyone who has done any indexing knows, this is quite a formidable job, and in our case must await the appearance of the last issue of the volume year. Patrick H. McLatchy, who teaches high school history at Great Falls, has indexed the magazine for the past six years.

Custer Battle Aficionados Organize, Publish Newsletter

For Custer Battle enthusiasts (and there seem to be more of them every year) there is not only a new organization but a noteworthy monthly newsletter under editorship of Rogert J. Ege of Great Falls. Ege, who has authored two articles on the subject for MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, says in Volume 1, Number 1 of the newsletter that the "purpose of this monthly letter is primarily to afford the members of the Little Big Horn Associates a media or outlet in which to 'air their views,' seek information, and volunteer information beneficial to other serious historians of General George A. Custer, the 7th United States Regiment of Cavalry and the Battle of the Little Big Horn."

Judging from the first two issues of the newsletter which we have seen, Little Big Horn Associates are to be commended for their efforts. The 12 men who are charter members are enthusiastic as well as knowledgeable. We are certain that others seriously interested in the Custer Battle and its many aspects and mysteries and overtones will get a cordial response if they address Editor Ege at 1904 Second Ave. N., Great Falls 59401.

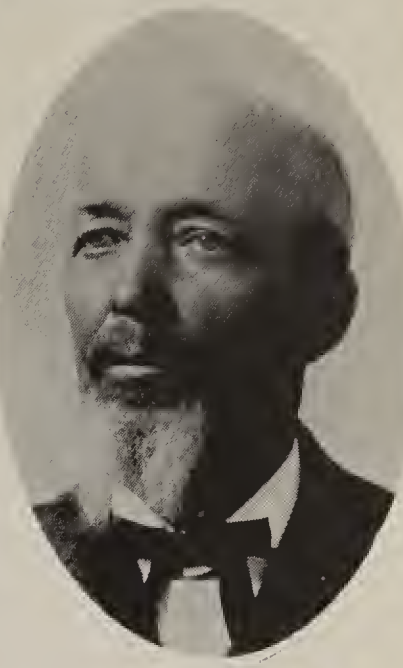
GREAT FALLS LEGISLATOR SHARES HAND-WRITTEN PIONEER DOCUMENTS

JAMES FERSTER

ALICE BARRETT



MARTIN BARRETT

William E. Spahr of Great Falls, representative from Cascade County in the current Legislative Assembly, took time out last month to share with us three hand-written manuscripts relating to Territorial history. One complete script and a partial one deal largely with civilian scares during the 1877 flight of the Nez Perce. Another tells the adventures of James S. Ferster, a restless man who arrived in booming Bannack early in 1863 and lived to become a solid pioneer resident of Montana's first capital.

All the materials have been placed in the Historical Society's archives and may well assist future researchers in digging out personal, contemporary glimpses of life in Montana Territory. Indeed, they augment material already in the library about some notable families who are listed as members of the Society of Montana Pioneers: the Fersters, the Martin Barretts, and the William G. Blairs.

The sketch on Mr. Ferster is in the handwriting of his daughter, Mrs. Emma Ferster Blair. Married in 1874 to William G. Blair, also an early gold-seeker at the Grasshopper Creek diggings at Bannack, Mrs. Blair and her husband ranched for many years in the Horse Prairie country near Dillon.

James S. Ferster was born in Canada in 1818 and came to Buffalo, N.Y. with his parents when he was a small boy. One of his schoolmates, the manuscript relates, was George Pullman of the Pullman railroad car family.

Mrs. Blair makes a number of references to her father's "restless nature," which lured him to the California gold-fields right after the strikes of 1849. He went by way of Panama, "neglecting business and work of all kinds, and enduring a great many hardships."

After several years of disappointment as a prospector, Ferster returned to "the states," married and began raising a family. Emma was born at Battle Creek, Mich. on May 3, 1858, and three years later the family struck out for Colorado. In May, 1863, they joined a few other families in a wagon train bound for Montana Territory.

"As we drew near to Montana we frequently met parties going back east who advised us by all means to go to Bannack as the Grasshopper diggings were said to be the richest that had been found," Mrs. Blair wrote.

There are some interesting details about the three-month trip to Bannack, including illnesses and Indian scares and just plain tedium: "A journey to the West in 1863 was not the comfortable sleeping car affair on fast through trains that it is today," Mrs. Blair wrote, "and travelers, or emigrants as they were called in those days, did not seem to be so anxious to make the quickest time. All they thought of was to get through in safety, make their fortunes and return home to spend the balance of their declining years with loved ones."

Emma related a chilling episode of the hanging of three outlaws in Bannack during the winter of 1864. (The celebrated Henry Plummer and his two chief deputies, Stinson and Ray, met summary Vigilante justice in Bannack on January 4, 1864). "The next morning after the hanging," Emma wrote, "Father insisted on taking my brother and myself up to Bannack to see them, as we had heard that their stiffened bodies were still dangling in the cold morning air. So on entering Hangmans Gulch we stood and looked on the three frozen men. . ."

The Ferster family did some moving about the Territory in the years which followed, but in 1870 they returned to Bannack to stay. James S. Ferster died there on December 11, 1891, his obituary—carried in the December 18 issue of the Dillon Tribune—stating that he "was about 78 years of age and single." The paper had a quick correction in its next issue, made at the request of the family: "James S. Ferster of Bannack, the pioneer who died on the 11th, was not a single man . . . He had been married nearly 40 years."

The other complete manuscript was also hand-written by a woman, in this case Mrs. Alice Cook Barrett, who crossed the plains by mule train in 1864 with a party which included her brother, Vining Cook. At Fort Kearney, Nebraska, they joined other wagons for safety against Indians who "were bad that year." Among those on the train was Alice's future husband, Martin Barrett. Another was the captain's wife, who "had been in Minnesota at the time of the Sioux War and said she would shoot herself before she would be taken prisoner by the Indians."

The party stopped at Red Rock, just across Montana's southern boundary line with Idaho, and it was there in Aug. 6, 1867, that Alice married Martin Barrett. Barrett, a native of County Mayo, Ireland, was a hard-working, skillful man who first came west in 1859 and by the next year was freighting from Atchison to Salt Lake City. At St. Joseph, Missouri he formed a partnership with Joseph Shineberger, and they arrived at Horse Prairie in July, 1863. Shineberger mined at the fabled Alder Gulch placers while his partner began building up a substantial sheep ranch. Barrett, who represented Beaverhead County in two Territorial legislatures, first in 1879, bought out his partner in 1871 and engaged in ranching, banking and other enterprises for many years in and around Dillon. The family was chief benefactor of Dillon's Barrett Hospital.

Of her ranch home, Mrs. Barrett wrote: "When I came to the [Horse] Prairie, there wasn't a woman nearer than Bannack, eleven miles; once I did not see a woman for two months, and when one camped near the house, I took a small pitcher of cream (as an excuse) and visited the lady. There were no fields so men who had teams cut the hay wherever they liked, and sold it, or hauled it away."

Mrs. Barrett described a number of fearful episodes during the movement of the Nez Perce through the area, telling them from the viewpoint of a woman concerned about her family and friends. She tells of worldwide travels in later and more affluent years, and ends with this philosophic sentence: "Still to ourselves in every place consigned, our own felicity we make or find."

Butte Artist Featured In Gary Cooper Gallery

Watercolor landscapes, portraits and wildlife by Bill Baltezar, native-born Butte artist, have found favor with visitors to the Gary Cooper Gallery on the main floor of our building. Baltezar's work reveals not only a deep love for his native state (which he travels tirelessly, especially the "high country") but a contagious dash and energy. Bill is past president of Butte's Hilltop Gallery and is currently fine arts chairman of the Butte branch of the Montana Institute of the Arts. He pursues a full-time career as a dental technician, and added to his artistic activities are stage appearances at Butte's Little Theater and membership on its board. He was an enthusiastic Jaycee in the 1950's, not unsurprisingly winning such citations as distinguished service award, "sparkplug" award, and the title of "outstanding Jaycee" in 1957.

An Exciting Prospect for Museum: Superb Collection of Antique Cars

This shiny black 1915 Ford Runabout has been attracting the attention of hundreds of capital visitors in the two months it has been on display in the main lobby of our building. It is one of 35 mint condition antique cars which have been offered for permanent display in Helena by Eastern Montana Banker Edward Towe. This exciting proposal also includes a full-time maintenance mechanic at no cost to Montana.

Our ability to accept the collection of Fords, the largest of its kind in the world, depends upon favorable action at this session of the Montana Legislature on a much-needed addition to the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building which houses the Society. Bob Morgan, our curator and acting driector, has already formulated plans for the display of the cars with mannequins dressed in appropriate costumes of the era, the actual objects of other modes of transportation—including stagecoaches and Conestoga wagons—and hundreds of other frontier items now in museum storage.

We urge all our Montana members to lend a hand in furthering this exciting proposal by writing to their representatives and senators.

Helena Named Montana's Capital City in Off-Year Election of 1894

As we emerge from an election of more than passing interest this month, it is interesting to hark back 72 years to what was undoubtedly Montana's most fateful off-year election, even though a congressman and a justice of the supreme court were the only state officials whose jobs were at issue. It was in November, 1894, after many years of political jockeying, questionable balloting and incredible machinations that Helena finally became Montana's permanent capital city.

If the voters today decry a preponderance of political matter in news media before election, a look at newspapers of 1894 on file in the Montana Historical Library would convince most that even a "Dear Abby" column in 1894 would have been preempted by politicians and editors so partisan as to be unbelievable.

Under provisions of Montana's constitution, balloting for the state capital was held during the election of 1892, the year Grover Cleveland ascended to the Presidency for his second term amid threatening currency and financial conditions. Seven Montana cities were in the running: Helena, Anaconda, Butte, Bozeman, Great Falls, Deer Lodge, and Boulder. While Helena received 14,032 votes over 10,172 for Anaconda—with lesser balloting for the other five—no city garnered a clear majority of the total. Thus in 1894, Helena was forced to vie with Anaconda on the off-year election ballot. It was a grand and glorious fight, pitting once more the wealth and influence of Montana's two antagonists, William A. Clark and Marcus Daly, in bitter conflict—a conflict during which both men probably could have realized their ambitions had they cooperated. Daly longed to have his town of Anaconda declared Montana's capital city, while Clark nursed an overriding ambition to become the state's U. S. Senator by legislative action. Neither won his primary objective.

As the campaign of 1894 gathered steam late in the summer, the Western News of Hamilton, Mont. published the drawing of a "kicking machine" reproduced on this page. Harking back to the election of 1892, the editor printed these words along with the picture:

Repentance comes late to some, but the reward for iniquity is sure to follow in a punishment equivalent to the sin committed. The picture on this page represents a working union mechanic of Montana who voted for Cleveland and also cast his vote two years ago for Helena for the state capital. As a workingman voting for the Tyrant of the White House, his remorse is great. But as a union working man voting for Helena, the very hot-bed of scab labor, the only place in Montana where room could be found for a conspiracy to reduce the wages of Idaho or Montana, and destroy the Miner's Union, it seemed to him, on realizing the enormity of his act, that no punishment could be severe enough. He kicked himself; he begged his friends to kick him, but still felt that the punishment was insufficient and hence invented a kicking machine armed with Anaconda brogans, and setting it up he had the satisfaction of testing it on himself to his heart's content. He proposes to travel with his machine this fall and believes he can find enough ex-Cleveland democrats and ex-Helena-for-capital men, who feel that nothing short of a Bogardus kicking machine would do them justice . . .

POLITICAL KICKING MACHINE, CIRCA 1894 . . .

He Longed for a Senate Seat

Apparently not enough voters felt like kicking themselves for what they had done in 1892, because when the votes were counted on Nov. 7, 1894, Helena had won by 1,500 votes. There was a gigantic parade in town, headed by a huge anaconda made of canvas with a bleeding wound in its side, slithering down the street to the strains of a funeral dirge.

Marcus Daly, nursing an ailing heart, had lost his fight for Anaconda, and with a Republican majority elected to the state legislature, W. A. Clark's hopes for a seat in the U. S. Senate were dashed for another four years.

He Wanted Anaconda as Capital

Illinois Historian Praises Li

The richness of the Montana Historical Society Library is known by many, but it is difficult for us to convey in print the full impact which these facilities sometimes have. Dr. Robert E. Johnson, professor of physiology at the University of Illinois at Urbana spent several days with us this Summer, and was kind enough to set forth some specifics in a letter to Librarian Mary K. Dempsey. His words are worth sharing with our readers:

In writing a biography of Frederick Schwatka (1849-1892), I have finally been able to spend a few days using your fine collection. Schwatka, who was a lieutenant in the Third U.S. Cavalry, participated in the Big Horn and Yellowstone Expedition of 1876 as a member of Troop M of Major Anson Mills' battalion. He was mentioned favorably at the battle of the Rosebud on June 17, 1876, and led the initial charge at Slim Buttes on September 9, 1876. In later years he became well known for geographical explorations in Canada, Alaska and the Sierra Madre Mountains of Mexico.

The occasion for this letter is to make a suggestion, which I hope is neither presumptuous nor redundant. I have been trying to find an accurate day-by-day account of Crook's route from March to October, 1876, as well as a list of accurate descriptions of various fields of battle and skirmishes. Neither is readily available in usable form. The books by Bourke (On the Border With Crook, 1892), Finerty (War-Path and Bivouac, 1890), and King (Campaigning With Crook, 1890) are major sources, but none is complete. In your manuscript case you have a map and a manuscript list that virtually cover the needs. I suggest that you publish them for general use, or at least acquaint more people of their existence in your holdings.

The map is a version of the War Department map of the Yellowstone and Missouri Rivers as prepared by Capt. W. F. Raynolds and Lieut. H. E. Maynadier in 1859-60 and revised in 1876 by Maj. G. I. Gillespie. The version I find so useful was made in 1925 by Brig. Gen. W. C. Brown and Gen. Charles King. It is entitled Map Showing Many Battlefields of the Indian Wars and Trail of the Big Horn and Yellowstone Expedition of 1876 (reproduced by the Clason Map Co., 1515 Fremont Place, Denver, Colo.) Gen. Brown's map shows the day-by-day route of the columns of Carr (June 22-July 1), Merritt (July 1-August 4), and Crook (August 4-Sept. 16). The site of certain Indian combats from 1854 to 1890 were marked from data given by Mr. Walter M. Camp. I do not believe that this map is easy to find now.

In your manuscript file there is a list entitled Partial List of Indian Engagements in Western States, 1854-1890, Tabulation of Brig. Gen. W. C. Brown, U.S.A. Retired, Prepared from Data from Walter M. Camp, 1924. In the handwriting of D. H. Bowman is the note: "I consider this the most interesting and instructive thing of its kind I know of. D. H. B."

Forty-one engagements are listed by date, name, location (by state, county and locality), commanding officer, organization participating, Indians involved and results (with comments). I do not believe that this very detailed and complete tabulation is easily available to the researcher.

Gen. Brown (1859-1939) was a keen student of the Indian wars, having been a participant as a cavalry officer. He was a prolific writer on military subjects, an inventor of military materiel, and a leading figure in the Order of Indian Wars of the United States.

Walter Mason Camp, who died in 1925, was editor of the Railroad Review (Chicago). His avocation was the exact siting of Indian War engagements. He spent 20 summers at this avocation, studying maps, travelling about, talking with witnesses—both Indian and white—and doing site research for artifacts. He started to write a book on the 7th Cavalry, but expanded this into a History of the Indian Wars. This book, I believe, was never published. According to Gen. Brown (Winners of the West, Vol. X, No. 11, p. 1): "The weight alone of a thousand or more pages of manuscript is nearly fifty pounds. The value of these records lies in the fact that the data were obtained largely from active participants and in nearly every case these are dead." Gen. Brown also stated in 1925 that he "acquired the collection in July last from Mr. R. E. Ellison, formerly chairman of the Historical Landmark Commission of Wyoming."

I do hope that you will see your way to publishing a picture of Gen. Brown's map and Mr. Camp's table. In addition, I hope that someone will know where Mr. Camp's manuscript is, and will get it published. I have much enjoyed your library.

Butte Mines Band Story Brings Back Memories

The story of Butte's famous Mines Band, published in our May, 1966 number, came to the recent attention of H. M. Tippett, associate book editor for the Review and Herald Publishing company of Washington, D. C. and inspired him to write the letter which follows.

The account of Sam H. Treloar, bandmaster, brought back a flood of personal memories of my youth in Butte, Montana, when Treloar was in his heyday. My father and older brothers knew him intimately, and in later years one of my brothers-in-law played alto horn in the Butte Mines Band. Treloar's daughter was a member of my church and helped me with its youth leadership.

My family and I were all born in Cornwall, England, Treloar's birthplace. We were also a mining family. Father and four sons worked in the Silver Bow, Leonard, East Colusa, Mountain View and other mines on the hill. My brother George sang the lyric, "All Through the Night," with Treloar's band on one gala occasion at Columbia Gardens. And that brings me to the observation that the picture in the Post must be an early one, for the medals on Treloar's coat on this occasion of which I speak covered the entire front of his coat, down to the waist. I was there, and as a boy marveled at the splendor of them.

Your well-written article should prove to be a conversation piece in many a Butte home when old cronies of the era of "Butte in boom" get together and talk about old times.

I could wish another of Butte's well-known musical organizations could have such a write-up as this—The Butte Male Chorus, under the leadership of George Stevens. This was also a group made up chiefly of Cornish miners, and they often sang at special occasions with Treloar's band. They were in great demand at Christmas time when they specialized in singing Cornish carols in churches and on radio programs.

Sam Gilluly Named President of Society's Board of Trustees

Sam Gilluly of Helena, well known Montana newsman, was named president of the Society's Board of Trustees at its meeting November 18. Gilluly, who has been a member of the board for more than a dozen years, succeeds E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte in the post. MacGilvra will now serve as vice president and Mrs. Charles Bovey of Great Falls as secretary. The officers will be joined on the executive committee by Dr. Merrill G. Burlingame of Bozeman and Branson G. Stevenson of Great Falls.

Dr. Burlingame also heads a committee to screen applicants for the Society's directorship. Plans for the new year and full reports of past activities will be reported more fully in these columns next month.

Attend Western History Meeting in El Paso

With overtones of U. S.-Mexican border history and a variety of spicy fare, historically and gastronomically, the Western History Association held its sixth annual conference last month in El Paso, Texas. Two of our staffers, Editor Vivian Paladin and Business Manager Dick Duffy, attended the sessions at El Paso's Hotel Cortez and both deemed the trip worthwhile.

The Association, which held its 1965 session in Helena, was hosted this year by the University of Texas at El Paso, more familiarly known as Texas Western College. Historians, writers, publishers and history buffs from throughout the country heard discussions on a variety of subjects, including a panel on Mexican-U. S. History held across the border in Juarez. Another highlight in Juarez was a reception at Hotel Camino Real, complete with Mexican food and music and hosted by the Amon Carter Museum of Fort Worth, the University of Texas Press, and Texas Western.

The ever-growing membership in the Association looks forward to its seventh meeting in San Francisco in 1967.

M. Hammerly, a well-known business man of Hillsboro, Va., sends this testimony to the merits of Ayer's Sarsaparilla: "Several years ago, I hurt my leg, the injury leaving a sore which led to erysipelas. My sufferings were extreme, my leg, from the knee to the ankle, being a solid sore, which began to extend to other parts of the body. After trying various remedies, I began taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and, before I had finished the first bottle, I experienced great relief; the second bottle effected a complete cure."

There has never been a time when man has not sought relief from his physical ills and beautification of his person. The progress in these fields is every bit as phenomenal as our march toward the moon. And while we are still in some danger of falling prey to the charlatan whose product or device is supposed to cure all manner of disease and reverse the process of aging, we have come a long way.

This truth is brought home with some drama and no little humor when one looks through newspapers from years past on file in the Montana Historical Society Library. The abundance of patent medicine advertisements, promising cures for every ailment from heart disease to blotchy complexion, persisted until amazingly recent times. Virtually all newspapers carried them, issue after issue, until the type or "boiler plate" broke down into unreadable blotches.

The end of these revenue-sustaining advertisements came, of course, with the passage of food and drug laws. While it is not the purpose here to delve deeply into the progression of such laws, the State Department of Health has supplied us with some interesting material. Actually, it was magazine articles which first alerted the public to dangerous drugs, medicines and foods—soothing sirups for babies laced with narcotics, foods dosed with dangerous chemical preservatives, children's candy colored with poisonous dyes, and the tragic consequences which followed when people slavishly believed all the promises made for patent medicines.

The result of these disclosures was the original "Pure Food and Drug Law" passed in 1906 and signed by President Theodore Roosevelt on June 30 of that year. Widely known as the Wiley Act for the famed Dr. Harvey W. Wiley who had led a nationwide crusade for its enactment, it contained, among other provisions, the statement that "drugs are regarded as misbranded if the packages or labels contain false or misleading statements regarding the contents . . . If the label does not indicate the quantity or proportion of alcohol, morphine, cocaine and other narcotics." Then by an amendment passed in 1912, drugs were regarded as mislabeled if the label "contains false statements regarding the curative or therapeutic effects of the contents."

Elixirs to Cure Everything From Blotches to Consumption, Device

The original law was amended a total of 14 times, and in 1938 came the present—and much more stringent—Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act. This, too, has been amended a number of times, and the Food and Drug Administration still fights the battle against the charlatan, who works most successfully among victims of cancer and other dread ills for which modern medicine has not yet found all the answers.

The country now has the machinery and the know-how for effective enforcement. Thus secure in the knowledge that laws now protect us from everything except a few glib door-to-door persuaders, it is possible to react with amusement to the classic patent medicine ad of another day.

The stomach and the blood seemed to come in for the most attention by the mixers of elixirs. "We would be pleased to know of a man or woman who has never had a headache or been subject to constipation," said an ad in the Helena Daily Herald in 1889. "As these seem to be universal troubles a little advice may be in order. Why should persons cram their stomachs with nauseating purgative pills which sicken and debilitate when such a pleasant and sterling remedy as Prickly Ash Bitters will act mildly and effectively on the liver, kidney, stomach and bowels, and at the same time tone up and strengthen the whole system, causing headache, constipation and all such distressing evils to quickly disappear."

The hallmark of most of the advertisements was the wide range of ills these products claimed to cure. The effects of "la grippe"—which is still with us, of course—was the subject of one notice which was running in the Great Falls Tribune in 1893. A "prominent physician" was quoted as saying that since 1890 the disease had "done more to weaken the hearts of the world than any other cause that has ever existed." The ad continued: "Those who have had this malady and subsequently found themselves subject to palpitation, short breath, irregular pulse, wind in the stomach, pain in side or shoulder, smothering spells, fainting, dropsy, etc. may feel assured they have heart disease, which unless checked at once, may result fatally. Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure is the only remedy that can be relied upon to effect a cure. . ."

The season of the year was often brought into the advertisements, blamed to some extent for the ills currently prevalent. Said an Evening Missoulian ad early in 1894: "In the spring nearly everybody needs a good medicine. The impurities which have accumulated in the blood during the cold months must be expelled or when the mild days come, and the effect of bracing air is lost, the body is liable to be overcome by debility or some serious disease. The remarkable success achieved by Hood's Sarsaparilla, and the many words of praise it has received, make it worthy of your confidence." Another brand of sarsaparilla was claimed to be best for another season of the year, according to a notice in the Great Falls Tribune late in 1894: "The fall of the year is a trying season for elderly people. The many cheerless, dark, dismal days act depressingly, not to say injuriously, on both old and young. Now is the time to re-enforce the vital energies with Ayer's Sarsaparilla—the best of all blood medicines."

The herbs and nostrums from China were extremely popular in the 1890's. Dr. Gee Loy, Chinese physician whose office and drug store were at 112 Clore Street (now State Street) in Helena, was running an ad in the Daily Herald in 1889 which said: "I desire to state to the public that I have just received direct from China a full stock of drugs and I am now prepared to treat all diseases of the Generative Organs for Lost Manhood, Seminal Weakness and Nervous Prostration; also Female Weakness and all Female Diseases. I am also prepared to cure Catarrh, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Sore Eyes, in fact all diseases of the human system. My medicines are all composed of roots and herbs brought from China. I have practiced in America for eight years and I have given satisfaction. Give me a call. I make the medicine fresh each day for each person."

There was not as much preoccupation with overweight in the 1890's as there is today, perhaps because the voluptuous form was still in vogue. But there was an ad running in the Missoulian in 1894. headed FAT PEOPLE, which claimed that Park Obesity Pills "will reduce your weight permanently from 12 to 15 pounds a month. No starving, sickness or injury, no publicity. They build up the health and beautify the complexion, leaving no wrinkles or flabbiness. Stout abdomens and difficult breathing surely relieved. . ."

There were beauty ads, too, although the most emphasis was on milady's complexion, and that old devil, constipation, was always pointed out as the cause of a bad complexion. Said a Missoulian notice in 1894: "The American Beauty owes her prestige more to a clear complexion than to any other attribute. A cup of Parks' Tea will enable anyone to possess this. It clears the skin and removes pimples and that sallow, muddy look . . . Without being a cathartic, it cures constipation."

Then there was the care of the hair, products to produce abundant growth being more commonly advertised than dyes and rinses. But there was an ad appearing daily in the Great Falls Tribune in 1893 which was aimed at hirsute men: "Buckingham's Dye for the whiskers does its work thoroughly, coloring a uniform brown or black which, when dry, will neither rub, wash off, nor soil linens."

The list of devices which have been put together and advertised to the public as curative is so long that it would not be possible to name them all. Indeed, health officials still wrestle with the problem of toning down the claims made for many being manufactured today. Near the turn of the century, electricity opened a rich new field to quacks and charlatans, who found that a harmless jolt of electricity gave the gullible sufferer a feeling of relief. There was a short-lived heyday for such devices; presumably people got over the novelty of being shocked, and advertisements for "electric belts" and other devices disappeared from the pages of newspapers and magazines.

In a recent booklet published by the Food and Drug Administration, entitled Read the Label, there is a chapter devoted to such devices. It points out that most machines—and there are still some made and promoted—are relatively harmless in themselves, but when used on seriously ill persons there is danger because they are not getting proper medical attention. "Be wary of the smooth talker who wants to sell or lease a machine to you for use in your own home," the booklet points out. "The hallmarks of the quack are testimonial letters, promises of miraculous cures of such diseases as arthritis and cancer, and quiet but persistent reference to your pocketbook."

And then there is reproduced a fictitious letter from "Joe Gullible" which pretty much sums up, in comic vein, the last vestige of American gullibility in the field of sure-cure nostrums and devices: "Dear Dr. Cogliostro: Your wonderful machine cured my mother-in-law's sister of cancer. Since she died last week, I would like to lease it from you now to treat my arthritis."

Artist O'Neill, Stuntman Bodkin Discuss Montana

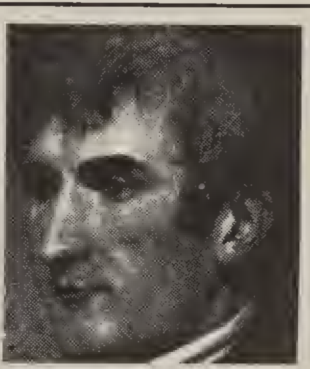
F. Jack O'Neill, left, Montana-born artist and writer who is featured in a two-month showing of his art in our Gary Cooper Gallery, is pictured here in the backyard of his home in Burbank, Calif., as he hosted a recent art show for friends and associates prior to coming to Montana this month. Seen at the right is another notable Montana native, Dick Bodkin, well known Montana cowboy friend of C. M. Russell, and until his retirement a motion picture stunt man. O'Neill and Bodkin have much to talk about, for both still have deep roots in Montana. Born at Kalispell in the early part of this century, O'Neill began living the cowboy life at an early age. He became so adept with the rope, in fact, that he was featured at the Pendleton, Ore. Roundup as "The World's Youngest Ropespinner." He still walks with a limp as the result of a spooked horse dragging him, while his hip still bears the marks of a rope burn when he "lassoed a bull that was too big." O'Neill has been a busy painter of western scenes for nearly 30 years, and has a great deal of writing to his credit as well, including a book-length study of the cowboy, now ready for publication.

STANFORD UNIVERSITY NEWSLETTER REPRINTS LEWIS & CLARK ESSAY



There was a special fillup in the September 27 number of the Stanford University Faculty-Staff Newsletter which called attention, not only to the Lewis and Clark Expedition but to Montana and our quarterly magazine, MONTANA the Magazine of Western History. The editor, Mrs. Jan Studebaker, printed a special brown-on-blue insert containing in full the fine essay on the Expedition written by Mrs. Helen B. West of Cut Bank and published in our Summer 1966 issue.

As a foreword to the essay Mrs. Studebaker wrote, in part: "The undertaking of the Lewis and Clark Expedition in the years 1804-06 to find a northwest passage to the Pacific may seem a far cry from the undertaking of Stanford University as it begin its 1966-67 academic year. But is it? Outwardly they differ, however both were begun and carried forward in the shared dream that exploration and knowledge of the unknown would bring to man those things that could help him shape a better future. . ."

It should be added, parenthetically, that Montana has struck up a mutually satisfying friendship with Mrs. Studebaker via the mails and the printed word. She wrote to us earlier this Summer after her first, though hurried, trip through Montana. Her words of praise for the peace and space and perspective which she discovered in this state were so moving that we asked for, and received, permission to print excerpts from them on the back cover of the Autumn 1966 issue of the magazine.

Minnesota Society's Need For Future Growth Shared By Others in the Field

In the September number of its newsletter, the Minnesota Historical Society set forth in graphic style some of its immediate needs for building and facility expansion. At the same time, it pointed out the needs and present facilities of other historical societies, including our own Montana Historical Society. A picture of our building was included, along with those of societies in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin and Oregon.

In an erudite lead article, Elmer L. Andersen, president of the Minnesota society, pointed out that history and its preservation are no longer the concern only of the academician. "History is adding meaning to family vacations, and is more than just an academic activity," Mr. Andersen wrote. "History is an enjoyable, popular pursuit of everyday life and recreation. In recent years, thousands of Minnesotans of all ages, and vistors to our state have discovered the pleasure and rewards that come from an acquaintance with our heritage."

With the opening in 1953 of the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building which houses the Montana Historical Society in Helena we can now offer two fine museums, an outstanding library and art galleries. But we still share many of the problems set forth by the Minnesota society. For we, too, are crowded to the walls with the prospect in the near future of curtailing our activities unless more space is provided. Like Minnesota, we are prepared to make orderly expansion of our building consistent with costs and feasibility, with the hope that our members and friends, both in and out of Montana, will agree that Mr. Andersen is right in his appraisal of the important job which we are called upon to perform.

STRANAHAN RIVER RANCH

FORT BENTON, MONTANA

October 4, 1966

Montana Historical Society
Helena, Montana

Gentlemen:

Some time ago I received a copy of the September issue of the Montana Post and discovered that I have the mate to the picture of the Boy's club winners which you show on the front page. I am the one in the middle of the top row. I do not remember the names of any of the boys except that the two boys on my left were from Lincoln County. Professor Holst of the State College was our chaperone. His picture is partially covered by that of the heavy set boy on the right. I say chaperone advisedly because the good professor needed to be a very alert keeper. I think we were always scattering like an alarmed covey of prairie chicken,

Like Mr. Frank Wiley, I remember the name of one of the girls in the picture on the next page. The second young lady from the right in the top row was Miss Beatrice Roberts; now Mrs. Earl H. Baxter of Garniel, Montana.

Unlike Mr. Wiley, I still raise corn and potatoes for a living on the above named ranch.

Very truly

State Fair of 1913 a Big Event for a Young Man From Custer Co.

Fall harvest time in Montana in the 1890*'s and the years shortly after the turn of the century was always highlighted by a great event in Helena: the Montana State Fair. The Historical Library files are filled with fascinating pictures of these great fairs, including exhibits of bountiful harvests, handicrafts, prize animals, and the youngsters who exhibited them. In a particularly fine album, containing photographs by R. H. McKay of Missoula of the* 1913 exposition, we found pictures of young county champions who came to the fair. Among them was Frank W. Wiley of Miles City, who grew up to be one of Montana's great early day pilots and who last year wrote MONTANA AND THE SKY, the story of pioneer aviation. Wiley, who now lives in Helena, agreed to tell his own reminiscences of that great week in September, 1913, when his folks put him on the train in Miles City, along with his prize-winning corn.

by FRANK W. WILEY

A vanished institution to which Montanans looked forward with much excitement was our Montana State Fair. This carnival and trade show was held annually at the fairgrounds in Helena. It is with pride and pleasure that I remember when I was informed by the judges of the Custer County Fair in 1913 that my entry of corn would entitle me to an all expense trip to the State Fair.

The county corn-raising contest was similar to the 4-H programs of today, and included competitions for both boys and girls. The winner of one of the projects for girls was an attractive little lady from Jordan named Marguerite Henderson, who had demonstrated that she was the best little seamstress in this vast Eastern Montana area.

Our parents got together and it was decided that I would accompany Mr. and Mrs. Henderson and their daughter to Helena on the North Coast Limited. We prize winners would be dropped off in Helena by the Hendersons, who would then proceed on to the West Coast for a visit.

This was my very first trip to a "big city" without being held firmly by the hand, and I struggled through ordering my first meal on the diner while still in a daze from the unreality of it all.

Marguerite's parents committed her to my care at the NP station in Helena. There we boarded a street car that ran into the city, where we were to sign in with some several dozen other youngsters at the Placer Hotel.

As we got off the street car at the hotel, I was quite perturbed to note that Miss Henderson had burst into tears. I was still more perturbed when she informed me, between sobs, that I had forgotten to take her suitcase off the street car. Leaving the shaken young lady with the other youngsters, I sprinted up Last Chance Gulch after the street car. By following the tracks like any good trapper, I found its den at the car barns at the head of the Gulch. Here a motorman wearing a blue cap as his badge of office retrieved the suitcase from the car. Returning to the Placer, I gave the young lady her baggage and was given to understand that she had permanently lost confidence in me. Thus ended what otherwise might have been a beautiful romance.

We prize-winning "farmers" were billeted at the House of the Good Shepherd in the west end of Helena—a unique

Work of County Champions

MARGUERITE HENDERSON, the young lady seamstress from Jordan, Mont., who became the special charge of Frank Wiley during the 1913 trip to the State Fair, is fourth from the left in the second row. situation for 50 boys—and after being briefed on the fair schedules and program, were turned loose to see the sights of historic Helena.

The local boys with whom we went swimming at famous old Broadwater Natatorium showed us how to congregate on the rear platform of the streetcar which made this run. By jumping up and down in unison, we could lift the front trucks off the track as the car topped the waves in the uneven roadbed. All this, of course, was great fun for us but added up to consternation for the combination motorman and conductor up front who could not leave his post to come back and give us what-for.

The 1913 program at the Fair, I recall, exceeded all my wildest expectations. There were balloon ascensions each day that the wind didn't blow. These were postponed to hold the crowd to the end of the afternoon program of horse racing. A lady aviatrix, Katherine Stinson, made airplane flights each day and my impression was that she raced each day with a man who ran alongside her plane. It wasn't until years later—when I got into aviation myself—that I learned he wasn't racing with her but was guiding the airplane as she taxied in from the flight. The early planes had no brakes and the pilot had very little control while taxiing.

The carnival, which featured an alligator lady and a petrified man, were something for a boy from Miles City to see, and the stock exhibits were simply fantastic—especially the big-footed Clydesdales and Percherons that could outpull a good sized tractor.

I remember the night show with big reflector lights and the ladies going round and round on a Maypole high up in the air, hanging on a strap by their teeth while they made like angels with wands in their hands attached to white silk streamers. The climax of the night show was the high diver, who plunged into a tub of water buried in the ground with kerosene burning on top of the water.

By the end of the week, my eyes and brain were numb with taking in so many things, and I don't remember at all the trip back to the old Cowtown. As for my prize-winning corn, it didn't stand a chance with the 14-inch specimens with even rows of kernels brought in from the Bitterroot and the Gallatin.

WARMTH OF RECEPTION BY BIG TIMBERITES IMPRESSES VISITOR

Cyril K. Richard, pastor of the Sauganash Community Church in Chicago, recently wrote us that he was among hundreds from out-of-state who attended the Lewis and Clark Trails Commission meeting in Billings in July, and witnessed as well in the float trip down the Yellowstone held in conjunction.

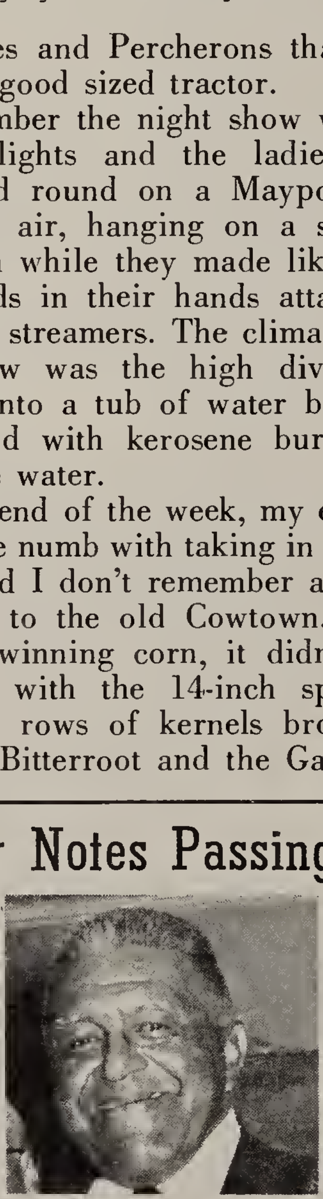
Noting our article in THE MONTANA POST about several of us from the Society attending the meeting and our impressions of this historically significant event, Rev. Richard pointed out at least one segment which we had overlooked. While it was overlooked largely because of lack of space and also because we were not able to participate in the float trip itself, we think our readers will be interested in Rev. Richard's remarks and agree that his point is well taken. He writes, in part:

"I was present at the Big Timber Fairgrounds when the 'floaters' landed in late afternoon—and I am sure the later reception they received at Billings did not surpass the all-out reception given them at Big Timber.

"The Lion's Club had a food booth with free coffee for everyone. Norman Starr of Starr Motors provided free transportation for the float participants to and from the Fairgrounds and Big Timber. Sheriff Kenneth Thompson and his chief deputy, Henry Walton, were on hand to extend a cordial welcome. And the local newspaper, the Big Timber Pioneer, for weeks ahead, carried picture stories which for the people of Big Timber was a gala event.

"The double cottonwood dugout, replica of the type used by Lewis and Clark, made by Big Timberites and used in the float, is now on public display at the town's main intersection. . ."

Reader Notes Passing of Remarkable Montanan



Harry H. Anderson, secretary of the Milwaukee (Wis.) County Historical Society has sent a quantity of material about a native Montana son and for nearly 40 years a distinguished Milwaukee lawyer and an inspired leader of his race. James W. Dorsey was born at Fort Missoula on March 27, 1897, the son of a Negro Army sergeant stationed at the Fort. He attended grade and high school in Missoula and entered the University of Montana in the fall of 1918. Majoring in psychology, he was awarded his B.A. in 1922, then went on to get his LL.B in 1927. This great and good man was awarded the University's Distinguished Service Award in 1963 during one of his frequent visits to Montana. He lost his life at his home in Milwaukee on May 11 this year when he attempted to put out a fire which also claimed the life of a daughter, Vivian Dorsey Rhinehart.

SOCIETY LOOKS TO FUTURE AFTER A NOTABLE SUMMER

The Montana Historical Society this month concluded a most successful summer in all categories of its activities. Moreover, acting Director Bob Morgan said that a number of museum projects which have been in the planning stage will now be completed, and cited a number of important acquistions to the Society's collections.

Among these are additional items from the estate of the late Cornelius F. Kelley, with arrangements made through his daughter, Mrs. John C. Wood of New York City and his son-in-law, George Hepburn of Beverly Hills, Calif. Four oil paintings by the late Paul Sample, originally published in the December, 1936, issue of Fortune Magazine, depict Butte mining scenes. One of the famed Butte Hill is especially important, for it depicts the scene before the gigantic Berkeley Pit changed its aspect forever. Also from the Kelley Estate came a major collection of Indian artifacts, and permission to make lithographic rubbings of unique Indian petroglyphs executed by C. M. Russell in a concrete patio area of the famed Kelley home on Swan Lake. These unusual subjects will be reproduced by the Society as quality lithographic prints.

Nick Eggenhofer of Cody, Wyoming, noted artist, donated a casein painting of a typical Fort Benton street scene of the 1860's, complete with bull team. Collections of antique furniture were received from Mrs. John Schroeder and Miss Marguerite Greenfield, both of Helena. These pieces will be used in a western village street scene, planned for the ground floor museum.

Transportation exhibits in the Formal Museum on the main floor will be completed, along with a complete mineral exhibit for the Mining Frontier room. Bob pointed out that through the cooperation of the Montana Mineral Society and its member clubs, prime specimens representative of all Montana's minerals will be displayed.

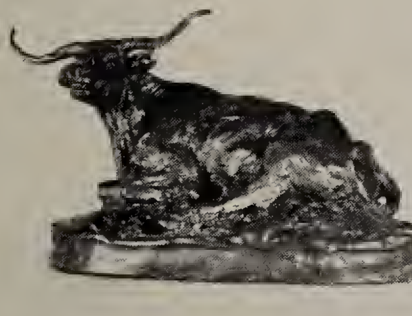
A number of outstanding art shows are now hung or are slated for the next three months in the Society's galleries. As we go to press, the highly sensitive work of Gary Schildt of Browning, young part-Blackfeet artist whose portrayals of contemporary reservation life are outstanding, is shown in the Gary Cooper Gallery on the main floor. In the large gallery on the ground floor level, viewers may see the interesting art in many mediums of Larry Hayes, art instructor in Helena's Junior High School. Later this Fall, a large showing of western art by Dan Muller of Port Washington, Wis. will be a major event. This part-Piegan Montana native, born near Choteau, Mont. in 1888, has achieved wide acclaim, particularly in the Southwest. His life and work are the subject of an article in the forthcoming Fall issue of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History.

DAN MULLER

A large number of researchers, writers and scholars have used the facilities of the Historical Society Library this summer, according ot our Librarian, Mary K. Dempsey. Among them: Dr. Leonard Bates and Dr. Robert E. Johnson, both of the University of Illinois in Urbana, David Lavender of Ojai, Calif., George Drew of Seattle, Prof. J. G. Nelson of the University of Calgary, Guy Halverson of the University of Washington, Richard B. Roeder of Montana State University at Bozeman, Harold E. Babcock of Redmond, Wash., and Robert Amick, Jr. of the University of Montana.

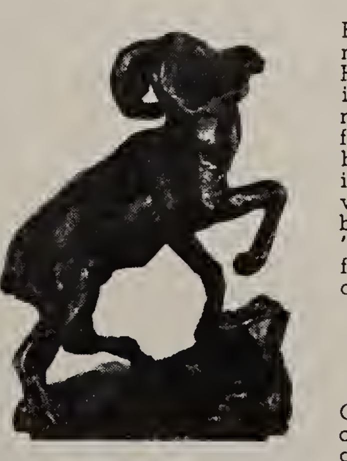
The Artistry of C. M. Russell in Enduring Bronze

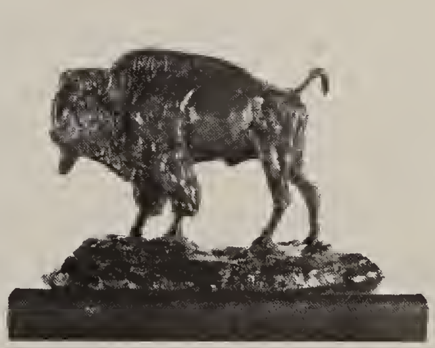
With each passing year, the individual art collector is presented with fewer opportunities to acquire an authentic bronze of sculpture by Charles M. Russell. The Montana Historical Society is still able to offer the five superb subjects pictured here. All are numbered, all have been authenticated. We welcome your inquiry about any or all. Simply address: Montana Historical Society, Attention The Director, Sixth & Roberts, Helena, Mont. 59601. We'll send all particulars.



XT BAR LONGHORN. Modeled in 1920 for a pioneer Montana Cattleman, this study of a reclining Longhorn contains Russell's signature, the date, and his buffalo skull trademark. 30 numbered casts were made of this fine sculptured figure, measuring 7 inches from tip of horn to tail. The base is 5 1/2 inches by 3 inches.

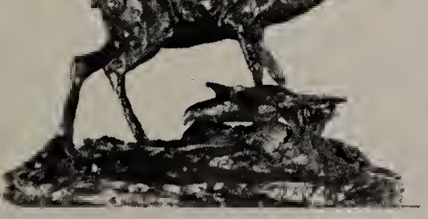
$1,750.00





BUFFALO BULL. Another model given to Mrs. Kit Hubbard, long-time family friend, this is a magnificent study of a buffalo. Unbelievably beautiful conformation, it is 4 1/4 inches high, while the base is 5 3/4 by 2 1/2 inches. Signed "CMR". 30 casts made from the original model, created in 1903.

$1,500.00



NATURE'S PEOPLE. Modeled in 1905 as a wedding gift for a close friend, Mrs. Katherine (Kit) Roberts Hubbard of Great Falls, this is an unusually sensitive study in nature, depicting an antelope flushing a sage hen. 30 numbered casts. It is 5 5/8 inches high and 7 3/4 inches long, mounted on an antique marble base.

$3,000.00

CLIMBING BIGHORN. This beautiful study was modeled in 1924 for Russell's friend and hunting companion, Ed Neitzling, who still owns the original model. Signed CMR with skull and date, the model is 3 7/8 inches high, while the base measures 2 by 1 1/2 inches.

$1,000.00

GOING GRIZZLY. The original model of this great subject is also owned by Ed Neitzling, for whom Russell sculpted it in 1922. Contains the artist's full signature, skull insignia, and the date. The piece is 4 inches high, while the base measures 6 1/4 by 4 1/2 inches. A fine example of Russell's skill at modeling a favored subject.

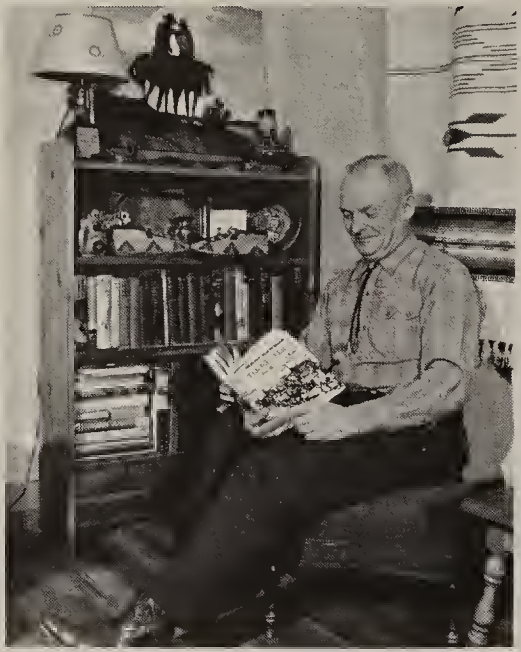
Works by Helena's Shorty Shope Seen at Cowboy Hall of Fame Art Show



Irvin "Shorty" Shope, accomplished artist, illustrator and muralist who lives in Helena but belongs to all Montana, has just returned from Oklahoma City, where his glowing and authentic paintings joined with those of other members of Cowboy Artists of America in the first annual showing of that organization at the National Cowboy Hall of Fame. Organized in 1965, Cowboy Artists of America counts among its membership some of the most distinguished contemporary painters and artists of the Western scene. Montana is proud that Shorty Shope, born at Boulder, Mont. and raised on a ranch, was invited to participate in this notable event. A graduate of the University of Montana, Shorty's fame has grown through the years and he works hard at filling commissions. He now has 20 murals and countless other works of his art to his credit, all of them revealing his deep knowledge of subject matter and a patience with research and detail which make them truly authentic and documentary.

Unique Autographed Hat Presented to Montana

James L. Fogarty of New York, who for many years was known in entertainment circles as "The Montana Minstrel," was in Helena recently and presented a unique 10-gallon hat to Governor Tim Babcock, who accepted it on behalf of the people of Montana. The hat, adorned with a painting of two horses, numerous cattle brands, and the seal of Montana by the famed Great Falls artist, Olaf C. Seltzer, was presented to Fogarty in 1932. To add to its significance, there are 230 names of prominent Montanans autographed on the brim. The hat, along with such memorabilia as a picture of Gov. John E. Erickson autographing the hat for Fogarty, and a picture of the singer at the time he acquired the hat 34 years ago, are now on display in a glass case in our main floor lobby.

Reader Provides Information About Two Medicine Bridge Picture

This picture of the great wooden span across the Two Medicine, built by the Great Northern in 1891 as its tracks stretched westward, was used in last month's MONTANA POST with caption indicating the picture was taken in that year. We recently received a letter from Thain White of the Flathead Lake Lookout Museum at Lakeside, Mont. informing us that a copy of the picture is in that museum, with the notation that it was taken in 1898 or 1899. The Lookout Museum copy is from the Fred Hawkins collection, and Mr. White states the photograph was taken either by Mr. Hawkins' father, Martin, or by Walter McClintock. The elder Hawkins and McClintock were close friends during this era when the Great Northern laid its tracks through the Bitterroot on towards the Coast.

GN Tracks Assaulted Cascades and Reached the Pacific in 1893

IN LAST MONTH'S MONTANA POST, we traced the progress 75 years ago of the Great Northern Railway's Pacific Coast extension from Havre westward across low and beautiful Marias Pass, skirting the southern perimeter of what was to become Glacier National Park, through the Flathead Valley to Columbia Falls.

Still in front of the track-layers as the year 1891 neared its end was Montana's remote Kootenai country, now the site of Libby Dam and the scene of one of the largest railroad-building projects of modern times. Because Libby Dam will impound the waters of the Kootenai to the point where nearly 50 miles of Great Northern mainline will be inundated, 59 miles of new track will be built.

We left the track crews and a contented Columbia Falls as plans were drawn for a fine depot in the town and as the work was about to cease for the winter. But the editor of The Columbian, brash young weekly at Columbia Falls, had not yet had a chance to report a disastrous construction accident which befell the builders.

Work was reaching a climax on the bridge across the North Fork of the Flathead River, some eight miles east of Columbia Falls. Porter Brothers, contractors, were building the span for the Great Northern. Toward the end of shift on Friday, November 28, 1891, disaster struck just before the bridge was made safe. In its issue of December 3, The Columbian used headlines six inches deep to lead off the story of the accident which took the lives of five men and injured four others:

All accounts agree as to the cause of the awful accident. The span timbers had been placed across to the west approach, and the entire span 150 feet long was resting on the false work. The men were engaged in putting in the braces, and by noon Saturday the span would have been safe.

John Pooley, one of the men killed, and a comrade, were wheeling four of the huge iron rods on to the span from the west approach. From the approach to the deck of the span was a slight incline, down which Pooley was trundling the dolly loaded with the iron. In some manner the dolly became unmanageable, and running down the span, it plunged off the south side. The rods weighed over 150 pounds each, and falling 80 feet, they crashed into the false work with awful force. The heavy timbers were knocked out and without a second's notice the mass of timbers creaked and fell with an awful crash. The distance from the water to the span is 90 feet, and the awful weight plunged into the stream below carrying nine men with it.

All 40 of the workmen on the structure hurried to the wreckage, struggling for nearly an hour to remove bodies from the twisted timbers. The injured were cared for by two Columbia Falls doctors and by the company physician who was summoned from end of track. The details of burial for the workmen who had died far from home are moving and poignant:

Early Monday morning the 75 men working on the various contracts for Porter Brothers, met at the North Fork bridge and preparations were made to inter the dead workmen. Undertaker McMahon had charge of the details and by 9:30 the bodies had been placed in coffins. Four wagons, containing the bodies, started for Columbia Falls, followed by about 70 bridgemen in double file. . . The procession moved down the railroad grade to the Columbia cemetery. The bodies were laid in the new made graves by men who had been their comrades in life. There were no ceremonies, but the scene was, nevertheless, very impressive. The graves were closed, and the bridgemen broke ranks, and in groups returned to camp. On Tuesday morning the work of repairing the bridge was resumed. The camp on the bank river has been gloomy indeed since . . .

The disaster and the work it entailed delayed track-laying for 12 days, but winter soon intervened in any case, and the transcontinental lines waited at Columbia Falls for the warmth of spring.

Brand-New Town of Libby in Montana's Kootenai, 1892 . . .

THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN of 1892 was much in the news in April as the Great Northern passed through the Kootenai country and plunged westward as far as Sand Point, Idaho. Jim Hill was a national figure, and by now a hero to many Montanans. The Flathead Club of brand-new Kalispell had apparently received the mistaken notion that The Empire Builder was a presidential candidate, confused by reports that a D. B. Hill of New York would be in the race.

In its issue of April 21, The Columbian, weekly paper published at Columbia Falls, printed a letter which Jim Hill wrote to the organization, making sure of this new address of Kalispell, Montana by adding the words, "near Smith's Valley":

I feel complimented by your hearty endorsement of myself for the high office of President of the United States. I must inform you of my belief that you have been misinformed. I am not a candidate for the office. There is a New Yorker whose initials are D. B. who is a candidate and I fear you have got us mixed.

Believe me, sincerely your friend, till the last lot payments are made and the track moves west.

As it turned out, even D. B. Hill was not a presidential candidate that year as Grover Cleveland defeated both Benjamin Harrison and one James Weaver.

Two months later Jim Hill visited another new town — Libby — springing up in the loop of the Kootenai River. The Columbia Falls paper, as pointed out last month, consistently downgraded the possibility of rapid growth in the rugged Kootenai country. But now there was a town named Libby, and the paper's correspondent, who signed himself Alexis, submitted the following dispatch telling about it and the visit of Mr. Hill:

Jim Hill's special west stopped yesterday at this place, and Mr. Hill looked the town over for about forty minutes and was very much pleased with what he saw. A specimen of ore from this district was shown him, and he thought it as fine ore as any he had ever seen. He said that the town had a bright future before it. Mr. Hill instructed Mr. Beckler where to locate the depot and also when to begin work on the round house, side tracks, etc. He told the townsite people he would need 100 feet more ground through the town or side next the river. By this action the Great Northern secures a 400 foot right of way.

It is reported here the committee that went from Kalispell to Havre to escort Mr. Hill back to the city had hard work to ride back on the same train with him. He not only refused to get out and take in the wine supper they had for him, but he would not even walk over town—just stepped on the platform of his car and said about ten words, then went back and shut the door. The train stopped long enough to change engines and fill the boiler with alkali soda. Mr. Hill did not stop at Bonner's Ferry.

We have quite a nice little town started and prospects look very good.

This is a great country for bear hunters. Mr. Van Wick and partner killed thirty-five in the last three weeks and several other parties are getting two and three a week.

THE LAST BIG mountain challenge—the Cascades—was overcome by the track-layers in the Summer and Fall of 1892, and work continued apace throughout the early winter months. On January 11, 1893, the Kalispell Graphic published a biggest story of all: completion of the road. Proclaimed in headlines A Great Transcontinental Line Constructed Without Government Aid or Subsidies, it was reprinted from the Spokane Spokesman:

The Great Northern railroad is completed. Amid the shouts of 1,000 workmen and the screams of all the engine whistles the last rail that connects St. Paul with Seattle was laid in place Friday night and the last spike driven by the superintendent of the road. Saturday the first engine will complete the journey from Spokane to Everett over the new road and before the middle of next week Spokane will be filled with the laborers who are now freed from their long task.

There was 8,000 feet of track to be covered when the parties quit work Thursday night, and in order to complete it yesterday the men were all on their way by 5 o'clock in the morning. Every laborer seemed to feel as much interest in the completion of the road as if it were his personal property, and the rails flew to place so rapidly that 5,000 feet had been completed by 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Then a message was sent to Spokane announcing that only 3,000 feet remained, "and we will finish the road before quitting work tonight." At 6 o'clock it was nearly dark, but by means of headlights and lanterns the work was continued. About this time a whistle was heard on the mountain and the special car bearing the official photographers of the road came down the switchback at a risky rate of speed. It was too dark for a photograph, but the artists noted the positions of the different parties and will probably group them again today.

At 8 o'clock the train moved up to lay the last rail. The distance to the ends of the rails on the Everett side were carefully measured and a few inches cut off from the end of the connecting rails to bring them to the right length.

By this time all the workmen had gathered along the track, clinging on the flat cars and peering over each other's shoulders. In the center were the tracklayers with General Superintendent Shields, Division Superintendent Farrell, Master Mechanic Kelly, Roadmaster Moriarity, and the photographers. The south rail was spiked to place and the east end of the north rail was fastened. A spike and hammer were then given to Superintendent Shields, who stepped to the west end of the rail and with three quick blows drove the last spike. As he dropped the hammer a cheer went up from all the men, and as they were joined by the engine bells and whistles, the train moved slowly forward and crossed the last rail. When the tumult had subsided a little some one called for three cheers for the Great Northern.

Talented Young Part-Blackfeet Artist To Appear in One-Man Show Next Month

Gary Schildt, who lives on a ranch near Browning and who is a part-Blackfeet Indian, will present a showing of his sensitive and compassionate oil paintings in our Gary Cooper art gallery beginning September 1. It will be an artistic event of no mean proportions, for this young man has developed a native talent into superb technique, and combines both with deep feeling for the Blackfeet. He portrays them as they are now, as well as how they once were.

Born in Helena in 1938, Gary knocked about a good deal before he settled down to serious art. He firmly believes that natural talent and feeling is not enough—thus he went to San Francisco and studied at City College, earning an associate of arts degree. He returned to Montana and for a year and half "did nothing." Then he entered two oil portraits and a watercolor in an art show in East Glacier and emerged a prize winner.

Schildt now produces some 600 paintings a year. He works mainly in oils, but is branching out into watercolor, pen and ink and pencil, and most recently in sculpture. With continuing success at art shows throughout Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota and the Southwest, this young man is well launched as one of Montana's most sensitive artists.

Morgan Helps Pick Miss Indian America

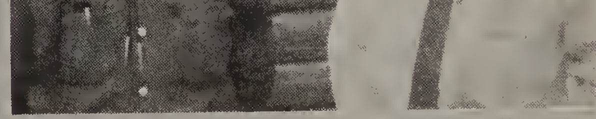
For the second year in a row, our Curator and now Acting Director, Bob Morgan, had a hand in choosing Miss Indian America at what has become one of America's most significant pageants. Bob was one of five judges faced with the difficult task of choosing from among fair and talented representatives from many tribes at the 13th annual contest at Sheridan, Wyoming.

MISS INDIAN AMERICA

This year's winner is 18-year-old Wahleah Lujan, full-blood Taos Pueblo, a student at St. Lewis College in Durango, Colorado, and a talented artist.



Grandfather Lujan (left) and Cheyenne Historian John Stands-in-Timber at Sheridan pageant.

Of particular interest to Montana at the four-day festival was the special honor accorded John Stands-in-Timber of Lamedeer, Montana, venerable historian of the Northern Cheyennes. He was introduced and eulogized by Father Peter John Powell of Chicago, one of the judges on the panel whose work among the Cheyennes has been long and dedicated and who has been a valued contributor to our magazine.

Father Powell pointed out that Stands-in-Timber, working with his own people and with historians, has contributed greatly to the preservation of Cheyenne customs and traditions. He has recorded many hours of conversation on tape, and has worked tirelessly as well for the present-day welfare of his tribe.

Picture Recalls Stirring History of Early Hotel, Store in Eastern Montana

Below is an early picture—not of its heyday, but at least when most of its buildings were still intact—of one of Eastern Montana's earliest general stores and hostelries. It has a long and colorful history, and touches upon the lives of many.

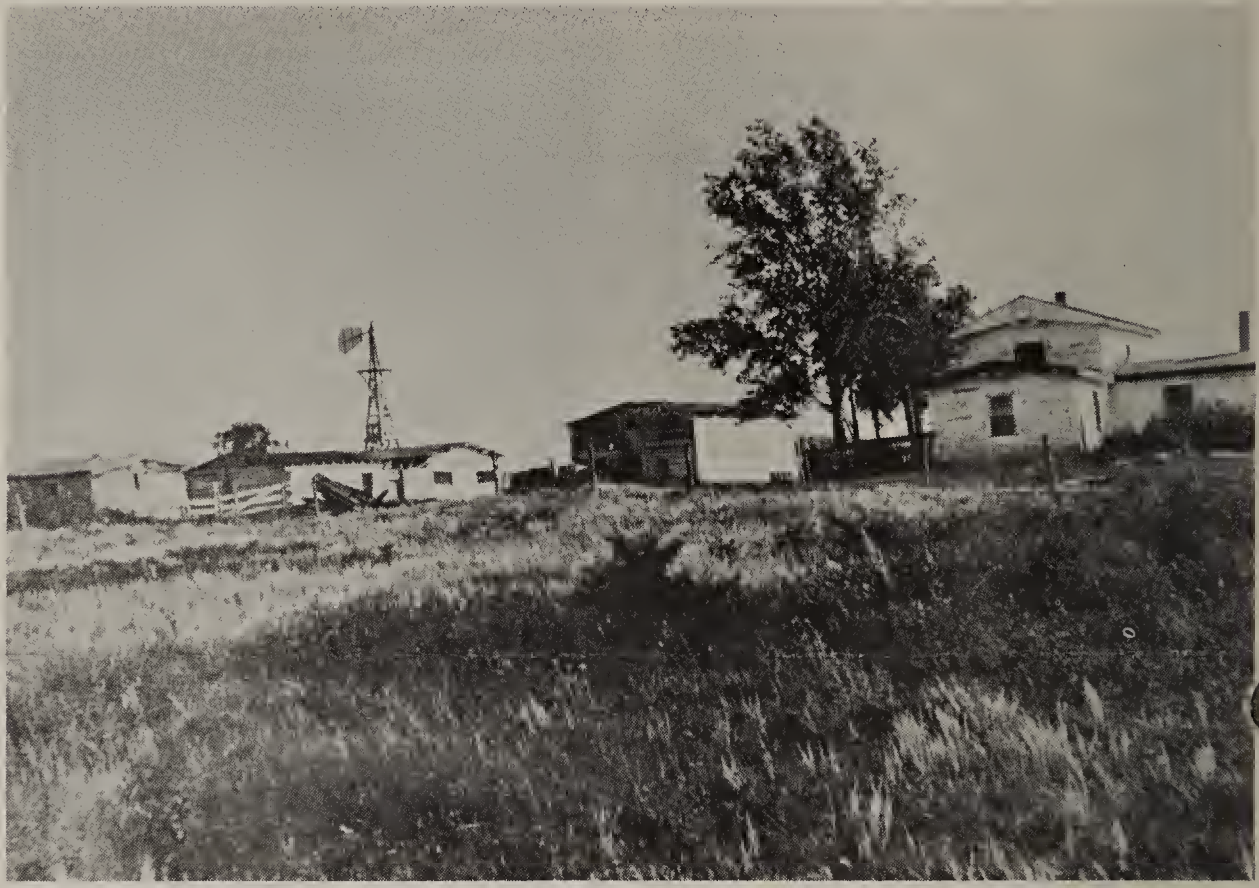
The picture came from the collection of George Costello, retired Department of Justice agent who now lives in a rest home near Miles City and whose recollections of early Eastern Montana are remarkably clear and varied. The picture and much of the story were given by Costello to Casey E. Barthelmess of Miles City, a member of our Board of Trustees who has himself lived and recalls much of the history of this part of Montana.

The site of this "stopping-off place" was purchased early in 1881 by John O'Brien, a native of Kentucky who came west as a teen-aged soldier and served first at Fort Laramie, Wyo., finishing out five years of duty at Fort Buford, D. T. O'Brien conducted woodyards along the Missouri for a number of years, notably at Cow Island, head of low water navigation, furnishing fuel for the hundreds of steamboats which plied the Missouri.

O'Brien joined the gold rush to the Black Hills in 1876, but when his health began failing, moved to the Yellowstone Valley. In partnership with George Morgan—who had served as a scout under General Terry in the campaign of 1876—O'Brien built a stockade store at the mouth of what is now Morgan Creek in Dawson County. It was the first trading post in this gigantic old county. The partners also supplied wood to Yellowstone River steamers of the time.

After the telegraph line was built from Bismarck to Tongue River, M. T., a telegraph office was maintained at the Morgan-O'Brien store, and the partners augmented their business by trade with the Indians. When business began falling off, O'Brien got the contract for hauling mail from Fort Buford to Fort Keogh.

It was in the spring of 1881 that the two bought the Fox Creek site, pictured here, from a man known as "French Joe," a Hudson Bay trapper and trader who was married to an Indian woman. According to O'Brien's obituary—reprinted by the Sidney Herald at the death of a son, Ted, in 1943—the partners built the place up to the point where it was the leading hostelry in the Yellowstone valley: "Here man and beast were always welcomed to the best that could be had, and no matter how many came there was always room for one more and one and all had full assurance of safety and fair-dealing."



Recently, Mr. Barthelmess had occasion to visit this historic site, located some five miles south of Sidney. The general area is known as the Newlon Community, and the site is only a mile or so east of the cemetery where a great many of the earliest settlers are buried. Most of the buildings burned down in 1911, but Barthelmess writes that the old log house in the right side of the picture still stands. Inspecting it carefully, he said that while deterioration has set in, he has "never seen a finer display of axmanship than was used by Morg Morman and Utlick Atkins, who built it for O'Brien in about 1882."

George Costello, born in 1890, is the only survivor from the family of Mr. and Mrs. James Costello. The elder Costello was a native of Ireland, and joined the U. S. Army after his arrival in this country. He was stationed at Fort Laramie and later operated a camp at old Fort Union, where he met and married his wife. Mrs. Costello, also a "child of the Army," was born at Fort Phil Kearney, and lived at such posts as Fort Custer and Fort Buford.

Jim Costello followed a varied career after leaving the Army, engaging in buffalo hunting, operation of the ferry at Glendive before the Great Northern Railway was built, and tours of duty as sheriff at Williston and deputy sheriff at Glendive. George Costello, who is now in failing health but whose memory is unusually lively, has had a lifelong interest in horses and livestock—and history. Before mechanization ruined the value of horses, he operated a horse camp southeast of present Fort Peck Dam. Then he worked as a cowboy, ranging from Malta to the Dakota line and north of the Yellowstone. But most of George Costello's active life was spent in the U. S. Department of Justice.

George Costello's memory, and Mr. Barthelmess' industry in drawing from it may well add much more to our knowledge of less well-known segments of Montana's past, especially that of Eastern Montana.

Pierced by Rails in 1892, Kootenai Echoes Again to Jackhammer

SEVENTY-FIVE years ago this Summer, the biggest news in the West was the steady push toward the Pacific Coast of transcontinental railroads. Center stage in Montana was the coast extension of James J. Hill's Great Northern. There was drama and tragedy and jubilation as mighty timber trestles strode across mountain streams, track layers griped about wages and bad mail service, and Jim Hill and his official family visited end of track and talked of prosperity and hope.

We were inspired to delve into the newspaper archives of the Montana Historical Society Library to bring forth some of these facets because of a feature story which appeared in the 1965 annual report of the Great Northern. As so often happens, much more material was forthcoming than one issue of THE MONTANA POST could hold. Thus we hope our readers will share enough of our enthusiasm to bear with us in presenting the story of the Pacific Coast extension of the Great Northern in two segments—the second in our August number.

The railroad's 1965 report points out that the Summer of 1966 begins one of the largest railroad construction projects of this decade: the rerouting of the GN rails in the Kootenai country in Montana's extreme northwest corner. The reason: construction of Libby Dam which will back up the waters of the Kootenai River into a reservoir 90 miles long, extending into Canada. A huge 48-mile loop of the Great Northern lines, laid down in this rugged country early in 1892, will be inundated.

Last month, air drills and jackhammers began shattering the awesome quiet of the Kootenai National Forest as work began on a seven-mile tunnel through Elk Mountain, looming 6,581 feet above sea level. With the exception of the 7.79-mile Cascade Tunnel, it will be the longest railroad tunnel in this hemisphere.

Opening of the relocated line is slated for November 1, 1970. It will shorten the rail distance between Whitefish and Libby by some 15 miles, although officials say this advantage will be offset by steeper grades in both directions.

Meanwhile, construction has begun on Libby Dam. Historic treaty agreements signed last year by Canadian Prime Minister Pearson and President Johnson removed the final obstacles. The barrier on the beautiful, meandering Kootenai will rise 420 feet above bedrock and will measure 3,035 feet across its crest. Withal, this gigantic project will alter forever life in one of Montana's most inaccessible areas.

Great Northern Tracks Ascended Lovely Marias Pass, Into Flathea

SEVENTY-FIVE years ago, Jim Hill's dream of a transcontinental road built without federal subsidy had taken on solid shape. Just a brief background of his activities which were to give him the sobriquet "Jay Gould of the Northwest" is appropriate: In 1872, Hill bought the bankrupt St. Paul & Pacific Railroad and reorganized it as the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba. He also controlled the Montana Central Railroad, which had already completed grades from Great Falls to Helena by the 1880's.

HERBERT M. PEET COLLECTION

JAMES J. HILL, CIRCA 1873

In 1886, Hill began building roadbed and bridges from Minot, D. T. westward, Missouri River steamboats transporting equipment as needed. As soon as the rails reached the Montana line, the matter of crossing Indian reservations stopped them. Bitterly opposed was not only the rival Northern Pacific but the Cleveland Administration as well. Here was a new instrusion on Indian lands, President Cleveland reasoned, as he vetoed legislation granting right-of-way.

But Jim Hill won this battle in February, 1887, when a 75-foot right-of-way was approved along the route with the stipulation that the railroad could utilize adjacent timber and stone for construction. Cost to the railroad: an average 50c per acre. With characteristic sagacity, Hill stored great quantities of material at Minot and was ready to proceed the moment right-of-way was granted. Then came one of the historic rail-laying races in history: the track entered Montana on June 13, 1887, dashed up the Missouri and Milk River Valleys at the rate of four miles a day, and reached Havre on September 6. Then the direction was turned toward Great Falls and Helena on grades already prepared by the Montana Central. In 1889, the Montana Central line was extended to Butte and merged with the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba to form the Great Northern. Thus it was that in 1891, the Great Northern tracks on the northern route which was to extend to the Pacific Coast ended at Fort Assiniboine station just outside Havre.

It is at this point that the story of the Pacific Coast extension begins. Chief Engineer John F. Stevens had two years earlier determined that the swing southward to Butte was not the most direct route to the coast. He discovered that the lowest pass over the Continental Divide was Marias Pass—only 5,213 feet high. It was also the most scenic, ascending the Divide along the south edge of what became Glacier National Park.

The Great Falls Tribune reported on August 15, 1891, that the immense trestle over Cut Bank Creek would soon be finished. "This is one of the greatest pieces of railroad engineering ever attempted," said the article. "It spans 1,208 feet and is 157 feet above the earth. It contains 1,007,000 feet of lumber and in its construction, 65 tons of bolts, nuts and washers were used."

The lively little town of Columbia Falls was reading a new weekly paper called The Columbian in 1891—and the editor proved to be a town booster. In his issue of September 3, he reported that the railroad grade was completed within a mile and an eighth of the center of town. "Still some parties are industriously circulating the report that the railroad is going three miles from this city," said the piece. "Strangers visiting this valley should refuse to be gulled by the stories of parties who are enthusiastic in manufacturing canards."

Workers along the line were having trouble with mail delivery, according to The Columbian of September 17: "The men all pay one cent per day for a letter carrier, which is a splendid sum, but it is almost impossible to get the mail through. Papers directed to the men become public property, and the uneducated carrier allows everybody to paw over the mails. As a result the men on the last end of the road get no mail and are justly indignant."

There was a walk-out of track layers about this time, too, the men demanding $2.25 per day instead of $2. The track was within seven miles of the summit, but worried officials reported that little progress could be made until the wage dispute was settled. The Columbian elaborated in its issue of September 10:

> Men arriving from the summit since Monday say that wages have been raised and that $2.25 will hereafter be the ruling price. During the past two weeks men have left the road at the rate of 30 per day, and in some camps work is at a standstill. The men seem to have an idea that the construction work in the Kootenai offers a better field, but there are now more men on the West end than can be used, and consequently a reduction of wages from $2 to $1.75 has been made. This will perhaps turn the tide to the summit again.

Right-of-way Agent Wilkinson was in the Kootenai country early in October, accompanied by a Columbia Falls notarian named S. H. Butler. There were Continuing references in The Columbian about this remote area, comparing it unfavorably with the Flathead Valley. Butler, on his return, however, told the editor that he thought "there will be a good town somewhere in that country, but as yet nothing has transpired to indicate where it will be . . ." Libby and Troy were soon to be born; but not yet.

Residents of Flathead Valley were eyeing each other with alternating suspicion and anger, too, as the rails moved toward them. On October 15, The Columbian reported that merchants of the town of Demersville were "in a quandary about shipping their winter stocks." The editor continued: "They are watching the progress of the railroad work anxiously. They realize that as soon as the line gets within 40 miles of Columbia Falls the merchants of this town will have an immense advantage in the way of freight rates over any other point in the valley." It was not long before both Demersville and the settlement of Ashley were moved piece by piece to become Kalispell.

As the winter of 1891 approached, it became obvious that Columbia Falls would be the stopping place during the cold months when construction could not proceed. It was a jubilant editor who reported on October 22 that this would make "this city the liveliest of Montana's live towns," Moreover, plans had already been drawn for "the finest passenger depot on the Great Northern extension" at Columbia Falls.

Thus the Flathead Valley settled down to a somewhat smug contentment during the Winter of 1891-1892, unaware that a bridge disaster was about to occur in their backyard and that spring would see the first real settlement of the remote Kootenai country which few of them had ever visited.

Magazine Wins National Kudo

We are pleased to announce that MONTANA the Magazine of Western History received national recognition again this year by the National Federation of Press Women, meeting in Houston, Texas. A first place national award for a publication regularly edited by a woman was won by Mrs. Vivian A. Paladin, associate editor of the magazine for the past eight years until her recent promotion to editor. The State of Montana garnered the second highest number of awards in the national contest, which had a total of 911 entries. There were 47 entries in the category in which our magazine received its first place award.

Society Receives Important Peet Collection

HERBERT M. PEET

A dedicated and meticulous newsman, writer and student of Montana history, has left a legacy of carefully catalogued material which his widow now makes available to researchers and scholars. Mrs. Marie Peet of Seattle, widow of Herbert M. Peet—for many years editor, editorial writer and contributor to the Great Falls Tribune—has sent her husband's vast file of information and pictures to the Montana Historical Society Library.

Miss Mary Dempsey, the Society's Librarian, deems the material not only deeply significant but especially valuable because the collector knew his material, utilized some of it for a series of notable articles published in the Tribune's supplement Montana Parade, and took the trouble to catalogue much of it. While certain parts of the materials are restricted for full use at this time, freedom to draw from it in researching Montana history has been largely granted.

Herbert Peet, who died at age 67 in December, 1960, came to Montana in 1916 to become editor of the Equity News in Great Falls. After serving in World War I, he purchased the Harlowton Press and operated it several years before joining the editorial staff of The Tribune. He served as state editor from 1924 to 1927, then became an editorial writer, a post he filled for four years. It was during this period that he became deeply interested in Montana history, with emphasis on the men who helped frame the state constitution. He personally interviewed many of them.

Mr. Peet became co-publisher of the Everett, Wash. Morning News in 1931, just as the depression years began. While in that city he was appointed director of rural relief in the State of Washington, and later became assistant regional director of the Farm Security Administration with headquarters in Portland.

Montana lured him back in 1944, when he rejoined The Tribune in charge of state news and features. Later he returned to the Department of Agriculture, serving as special representative in the Pacific Northwest until his retirement in 1953. His last newspaper work was on a Seattle newspaper, but he continued to submit articles to The Tribune. As a result his files contain information on such men as Colonel Charles A. Broadwater, William Andrews Clark, Marcus Daly, Wilbur Sanders, Paris Gibson, James J. Hill, T. C. Power, S. T. Hauser, and a great many others, as well as data on railroading, public lands, irrigation, constitutional government, mining, and politics.

Herbert Peet was well embarked on a book-length treatment of much of the material now in our archives. He is to be commended for his skill and industry and dedication, and it is only to be regretted that he did not live to complete the task. But certainly his widow is now to be commended for sharing it with the people of Montana and those who carry on the business of preserving our history.

Japanese Chorus Gives Impromptu Concert

The Fourth of July week-end at the Montana Historical Society was enlivened Sunday morning, July 3, by an unannounced visit of the Japanese Seventh-day Adventist choir of mixed voices. On tour of this country since April, the group was enroute to Missoula, where they appeared in a concert the evening of July 4 at Sentinel High School.

Our attendant, Al Ahmann, who is a student at Helena's Carroll College and a member of that institution's fine choral group, the Carrolleers, expressed interest as soon as he was informed that the young people from near Tokyo were a group of singers. Told of the concert in Missoula the following evening, Ahmann could only tell the singers that his work schedule would prevent him from attending.

The group's director then assembled his singers before the double doors leading into the C. M. Russell Room and conducted them in four selections, ending with a stirring rendition of "America the Beautiful." Ahmann said he has never heard it more beautifully sung. With the first sound of the impromptu concert, museum visitors gathered in the main lobby from all over the building, sharing with Al Ahmann a totally unexpected musical treat.

Society Staffers See History Relived at Lewis & Clark Meet

History came alive in Billings and environs the week-end of July 8, 9 and 10, and three members of the Montana Historical Society staff—Acting Director Bob Morgan, Business Manager Dick Duffy and Editor Vivian Paladin—were privileged to witness an exciting thing: people from many states now join with all Montanans in a new consciousness of our historic past, especially that rooted in the Lewis and Clark Expedition.

The National Lewis and Clark Trail Commission held its official sessions on Monday and Tuesday, July 11 and 12, furthering the solid work of marking the trail through ten states. The ultimate goal: advancing public awareness of its historic significance as well as encouraging long-overdue conservation and recreation.

Among many distinguished people we met were Sherry Fisher of Des Moines, Iowa, chairman of the National Lewis and Clark Trail Commission. He also heads up the Ding Darling Foundation, a living legacy of the late great cartoonist, whose passion for conservation had much to do with establishment of the Trail Commission. Then there was William Clark Adreon of St. Louis, a modest and genial man who is the great great grandson of Captain Clark.

Space would not permit listing the many others present, or all that happened. But we of the Society were especially proud of Montanans who participated. Notable among them: Hal Stearns of Harlowton, whose banquet remarks Saturday evening were so moving that he received a standing ovation; Billings Mayor Willard Fraser, whose enthusiasms bubble over into advancement for both his city and state; J. K. (Ken) Ralston of Billings, whose deeply researched paintings of Lewis and Clark and other great figures and scenes of our past were everywhere in evidence, and Don Foote of Billings, who has long used personal opportunities and resources to promote what is meaningful in Montana's past. It was his move which resulted in the designation of Pompey's Pillar, some 30 miles east of Billings, as a National Historic Landmark.

As we struggled halfway to the top of the pillar to see the only physical evidence of the Expedition etched on its face, then down to see the costumed enactment, the dedication and the dance of the Crows, the 100-degree heat was pretty much forgotten in the insistent presence of history.

Kids of Long Ago Outstripped the Jet Set on Circus Day

It is probably safe to say that modern youngsters have more fun—or at least they have more of the appurtenances for having fun—than did those of the 1880's and 1890's. This, of course, is challenged by many an oldster, most of whom maintain that Summer fun was much more so in the days of the natural swimming hole, the open air band concert, and contests and games which called for ingenuity unheard of now in the days of manufactured apparatus.

There is little doubt that kids today miss out on one great Summer pastime of days gone by: the circus. There are carnivals, and a rare "big top" show with wild animals, to be sure. But it is not like the "old days," when advance agents came to town ballyhooing and being treated royally, followed by the big day when the show arrived, the elephants helping to unload and pull the great tent poles as the town youngsters got to water and feed them and watch as the mammoth tent was erected. And then there was the town parade, with colorful Oriental costumes and beautiful horses and ponderous pachyderms.

A look at newspapers of the past on file in the Historical Society Library indicates that the John Robinson Show began delighting Montanans as early as 1883, and was still coming in the 1890's. In the Summer of 1883, the Dillon Tribune announced that the show would be in town on August 2, and "people will be here from the snowline at Lion City to Belmont Park in Southern Montana and from the western slope of the Tobacco Range in Madison county to the roaring canyons of Salmon River in Eastern Idaho."

John Robinson, "the monarch among showmen," was 72 years old in 1883, but was due to be present. He established his circus in 1824, said the editor, and was still in complete control of circus and menagerie. There was a special announcement about a children's circus:

John Robinson, for the delight of all the little boys and girls that come to see his big shows, has organized a juvenile circus and trained animal performances where can be seen two of the funniest little twin baby elephants, who dance and walk the tightrope, walk on stilts, stand on their heads, and a whole lot of comical dogs, that play clown and have a circus all by themselves, and laugh and shout like real little boys and girls, and then the droll and quizzical capers of the monkeys who talk and holler and make strange faces at everybody . . .

It is doubtful if very many Dillon residents—at least not the youngsters—were terribly interested in another item in the same issue which announced a temperance lecture by Miss Frances E. Willard, whose "eloquent pleadings in the cause of gospel temperance for the protection of homes from the ravages of strong drink have earned for the gifted lady a reputation that extends all over the country. . ."

When at last circus day arrived in Dillon, the Tribune observed that because of the long train ride made by the circus that day, only one performance was given, and that was packed. The editor praised the caliber of the menagerie, but did point out that "the tattooed woman was in good condition and well developed, but she's a fraud, and the only one of the show."

The pictures used with this article were taken in Helena on July 3, 1890. Again the John Robinson show had come to Montana, more glorious in costume, personnel and animals than ever before. Said the Herald on July 1:

The largest and most costly parade ever given by any show at any time or place will be the magnificent pageant of the John Robinson show at Helena, presenting to public view fully two miles of glorious and opulent splendors; more than 1,000 men, women and children, horses, elephants and camels; 60 gold encrusted, statue-ornamented cages and lairs of rare and savage beasts; 20 wide-open dens, with keepers calmly seated therein; every nation represented and appropriately and artistically grouped on magnificent tableau cars; mardigras froliques; gorgeous moving temple of Juno; the revolving temple of the muses; 31 sun-bright golden chariots; chariots representing Cinderella, Little Red Riding Hood, Jack the Giant Killer, Sinbad, the Sailor, the Old Woman who lived in a shoe; countless changes and transformations; grand cavalcade of cavaliers and dames; peerless oriental pageants; monster herd of ponderous marching elephants; droves of camels, dromedaries, and other . . . animals; 300 equine models; eight superb Military Bands; Independence Fife and drum corps; great steam calliope; colored jubilee shouters; an escort of a brilliant cavalcade of knights in glistening armor, gorgeously accoutered and with steeds sumptiously caparisoned. In addition to which are the famous fleet-footed coursers connected with the hippodrome.

The 1890 show was, of course, tied to Helena's July 4 celebration of the next day. Montana had attained statehood the year before, and this was the first time many residents had seen flags with Montana's star along with those of Washington, North and South Dakota, and Idaho, on the field of blue. In the parade on the morning of the Fourth, there were many signs and mottoes painted on strips of canvas, "more commendable for their patriotism and wisdom than for their spelling" said the Herald editor. Some of the signs had modern overtones: "Equal Rights for All," "Do Not Abuse Your Suffrage," and "Americans Recognize No Bigots."

Then the Herald editorialized: "For the first time in history the star of Montana appeared in due and legal form in the galaxy that flashes light from the blue field on our national banner. Five new stars in a single year added to our banner is of itself an event to make this a memorable celebration."

Connecticut Man Recal

The memoirs of Judge Henry N. Blake, who came to Virginia City, M.T. in 1866, edited two of the Territory's earliest newspapers, practiced law, and became Montana's first Chief Justice at statehood in 1889, were published by MONTANA the Magazine of Western History in the Fall of 1964. The grandson of the man who directly preceded Judge Blake on the high court bench recently had occasion to read the Blake memoirs, and the result has been a lively interlude of interesting and informative correspondence.

Newton Whitfield McConnell, a retired Stamford, Conn. attorney, is the grandson and namesake of Newton W. McConnell of Tennessee, who in the spring of 1887 was appointed Chief Justice of Montana by President Cleveland, succeeding Decius Wade. McConnell, who was a school teacher, lawyer and legislator and one of the pioneers in the movement to give equal educational opportunities to Negroes in his native state, served as Montana's chief justice until March, 1889. He asked to be relieved late in 1888, but his successor, Henry N. Blake, did not take office until March, 1889, the year Montana attained her statehood.

After leaving the bench, Judge McConnell entered the practice of law with Senator Thomas A. Carter and J. B. Clayberg. Later the firm was known as McConnell, Clayberg and Gunn, and still later as McConnell and McConnell when the Judge's son, Odell W. McConnell (uncle of our correspondent) joined his father.

The Stamford man (who has been best known by his friends as Whitfield McConnell) writes that he was born in Tennessee on August 29, 1887, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Winston McConnell. About two years after the appointment of his father, Frank moved his family to Helena. Young Whitfield's mother, Mary Corley McConnell, died in June "at the start of her first Montana summer." His father, who was also a lawyer, did not long remain in Helena after her death, but moved first to Missoula and later to Chihuahua, Mexico, where he was engaged in a gold-mining venture.

Young Newton Whitfield remained very close to his grandparents, and lived at their home after his mother's death. Graduating from Helena High School, he "managed two years of college, then sufficient to admit me to Georgetown University of Law at Washington, D.C."

Judge McConnell died soon after Whitfield's graduation from Georgetown in 1915. He recalls with pride that his grandfather, well versed in languages, could read the Latin-inscribed diploma. Whitfield then began a long legal career, first in Chicago and later in New York, where for 30 years he served the National Surety company.

McConnell's letters are full of nostalgia for Helena, and some of our Post issues devoted to the Broadwater Hotel and Natatorium, the Grandon Hotel when it was new and graced with a park across the street, and references to such people as Colonel Broadwater and Judge Blake and others brought forth youthful recollections.

"I feel sadness in reading these things," McConnell writes. "To me the past is always sad. We lived on Fifth Avenue, second house from the southeast corner of Fifth and Warren in Helena, so near the courthouse its clock seemed to be in our backyard. That clock kept me on schedule. I had no watch. When we had out of town visitors, we escorted them to the tower for a view of Helena." The courthouse clock tower, as many of our readers know, was a casualty of the 1935 earthquakes.

McConnell noted in one letter that the Winter 1962 issue of the magazine contained a picture of the W. F. Sanders family home in Helena. "William Glenn Sloan, later of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Plan, and I cut grass there when we were kids," he wrote. "It was a cinch, so small a plot!"

In the same letter, he mentioned Helena's once-elegant Grandon Hotel: "Across the street was or is a nursery where each late spring my grandmother (who died in Helena in August, 1900) took me to buy flowers to plant at my mother's grave."

In going through Historical Library materials relating to Montana's early judiciary, we found a great many references to the native Tennesseean who became a Montana chief justice and one of Helena's leading lawyers. This excerpt from Progressive Men of Montana certainly justifies the pride in his grandfather which Newton W. McConnell has felt for nearly 80 years: "The history of Montana presents no abler or more distinguished jurist than Judge McConnell. . . He was ever an alert, fearless and brilliant advocate, devoted to the cause of his client, and eloquent in his pleas . . . Aside from his profound legal erudition, Judge McConnell is possessed of a wide range of general knowledge . . . In civil as well as in professional life he is ever a broadminded, liberal and progressive gentleman, revered as much for his kindliness of disposition and admirable qualities of head and heart as for his superior legal and forensic ability."

Montana Sapphires on Display

This beautiful display of Montana sapphires, prepared by Curator and Acting Director Bob Morgan, has recently been placed for public viewing in the Gallery of Western Art on our ground floor level. Prime specimens of gem quality and natural state sapphires, rubies and garnets are seen against blue and white velvet backgrounds, along with examples of dyke rock matrices from which the semi-precious and precious stones are extracted by washing.

The stones were gathered by Marc Bielenburg of Avon, and all come from one of Montana's four sapphire sources: Yogo Gulch, near Lewistown, Rock Creek, Dry Cottonwood and Eldorado Bar, near Deer Lodge and Helena. Polished and faceted stones in blue, white and pink are seen, all of them ready for jewelry mountings, along with stones in their natural state just as they come from the washings.

Masters Thesis on Upper Musselshell Emerges as Noteworthy Bound Book

What was researched and written as a masters thesis in history for a course at the University of Montana has turned out to be a solid, readable and well printed and bound book on one segment of Montana history: the formative years of the Upper Musselshell Valley of Central Montana. It is still a masters thesis, but its uniqueness comes in the fact that it will be available, through a second printing, to the reading public.

Harold Joseph Stearns of Harlowton, who took his course under the direction of Dr. K. Ross Toole, is well on his way to becoming one of Montana's promising young historians, journalists and teachers. Son of Harold G. Stearns, publisher of the Harlowton Times-Clarion, he has already had experience in journalism with the Great Falls Tribune and this Spring instructed in history at Montana State in Bozeman. Latest word is that Stearns will head the journalism department of Missoula's Sentinel High School this fall.

Taking advantage of the offset printing equipment at his father's newspaper plant, young Stearns decided to commit his thesis, History of the Upper Musselshell Valley to book-length publication. A modest 250 copies were first produced, with heavy cover and special lay-flat ring binding. They were sold out almost immediately, and another supply is now in production. They will be available in August, and may be ordered now from the Times-Clarion at $6.50 per copy, including mailing.

Stearns spent a great deal of time at the Montana Historical Library researching and preparing his text and illustrating it. Thus we feel a special kinship. But aside from that, this is extremely well written and thorough, covering much of the story of Wheatland and the western half of Meagher County, and exploring such fascinating aspects as the camp called Castle, the "Jawbone" Railroad, open range, tragedy and triumph of the homesteader, and the maturation after county creation and the years after 1920. We commend this highly as an example of how an academic study, made available to the public, can become a source of instruction and erudition.

Available Again to Readers . . .

The Montana Historical Society is pleased to stock two books which sold thousands of copies in first printings and are available again in republications. Neither needs much introduction to our readers, but both are selling so rapidly again that we urge your immediate order to replace copies you may have loaned or given away in the past. And either will make the perfect gift for anyone interested in two colorful segments of life in Montana, past and present.

THE WAR OF THE COPPER KINGS
by C. B. Glasscock

First published in 1935, this new edition has just been published by Grossett & Dunlap. Here is the whole fantastic story of Montana mining, from the gold strike at Alder Gulch to the biggest bonanza of them all, copper. The wide-open character of the mining camps, the Vigilantes, the political machinations of the mighty copper magnates—all of it is told here in fast and readable prose. $3.95.

STAY AWAY, JOE
by Dan Cushman

Probably the most widely read book ever written about Montana Indians, this is full of humor and pathos and truth. The setting is north central Montana, where the daily life of an Indian family is traced—the nostalgia of the old patriarch for the days of buffalo and freedom, the struggle of the daughter to live in the white man's world, the improvident use of government cattle in feeding hordes of relatives and friends who descend upon the family, the battles with booze and women of a war-returning son. A classic. $4.90.

Cornish Bandmaster Made History With Butte Mines Musicians

Men who toiled by day in the copper and silver veins beneath "the richest hill on earth" did not spend all their evenings in the fabled fleshpots of Butte and Meaderville. Because of a gifted Cornishman named Sam H. Treloar, more and more of them went off shift, left lunch buckets on the table at home, picked up musical instruments, and hastened to a small log house in Meaderville. Here Sam Treloar, with inspired musicianship, gradually developed his first group of five miners into the country's most celebrated and enduring industrial band, known variously as the Boston and Montana Band, the A.C.M. Band, and longest and most familiarly as the Butte Mines Band.

Treloar's own reminiscences, which he prepared in 1945 and which are in the lock-up files of the Montana Historical Society, give a chronological account of the band's history, from the first rehearsal on the evening of December 22, 1887, through fifty-eight of the bandmaster's more than sixty years of directorship. There is not only warmth and unabashed pride in his memoirs, but a great deal of history, too. This exceptional band was heard with amazed delight by thousands of citizens not only in Montana but throughout the West, and by campaigning and visiting greats throughout the decades, from William Jennings Bryan in 1896 to Senator Harry Truman in 1944.

Born in Cornwall, England in 1867, Sam Treloar was a miner by trade. Like so many of his countrymen, he migrated to Butte to work in the burgeoning copper and silver mines as operations of the great mining companies were pyramiding. Treloar first went to work for the Boston and Montana Copper and Silver Mining company early in 1887 in the village of Meaderville, located on the east side of Butte.

There were no provisions for entertainment in Meaderville in 1887, Treloar points out in his reminiscences, and those in Butte were "saloons containing every known gambling device and concoction of mixed drinks." Besides, it was a long two-mile walk or buggy ride—if you had a buggy. The result was that following monthly paydays, miners often hiked to Butte and "forgot to return in time for work."

SAM H. TRELOAR

No one was more aware of these conditions than Captain Thomas Couch, general manager of Boston and Montana's Meaderville operations. Hearing of Sam Treloar's musical abilities, he conferred with him, and the idea of a miner's band was born. Couch arranged for workers who could play instruments to work the day shift so they could rehearse in the evening. Couch's deep interest in the band continued until his death in 1902, and through him, the rapport between band and company was initiated and grew. After the Boston and Montana company was absorbed by the mighty Anaconda company in 1913, officials continued prideful cooperation by allowing musicians time off to travel to competitions and appear at concerts.

Success and adulation came almost immediately. The original dream of providing wholesome entertainment was realized, not only for the band members themselves, but for virtually the entire populace of Meaderville, Butte, and eventually for all Montana.

The little log house was quickly abandoned, and rehearsals began at the Knights of Labor Hall, used as a school during the day. The hall was filled at every rehearsal with citizens of Meaderville and Butte, including city and county officials, the families of miners and mining tycoons alike.

By 1889, services of the band were in such demand that requests were difficult to fill. There were 28 band members the following year when a new hall was built across the creek from the great Leonard Mine in Meaderville.

Then emerged the incredible chronology of "triumphs" which Sam Treloar delineates with such regularity. At one point in his memoirs he summarizes with a tinge of apology: "To enumerate them all would be repetitious. It is not the intent to pass the events or places without mention, but to escape recording them and tiring the readers of this record, whoever they may be in the future."

The record is so impressive as to be virtually unbelievable. In October, 1895, the band entered its first important competition. It was the Welsh Eisteddfod concert in Salt Lake City's Mormon Tabernacle with its famed accoustics. The Butte band won second prize, Treloar wrote, and "received special mention from the adjudicators for their brilliancy, interpretation and purity of tone, but failed in perfect balance because of limited instrumentation." This was the last competition they entered that had a second place result.

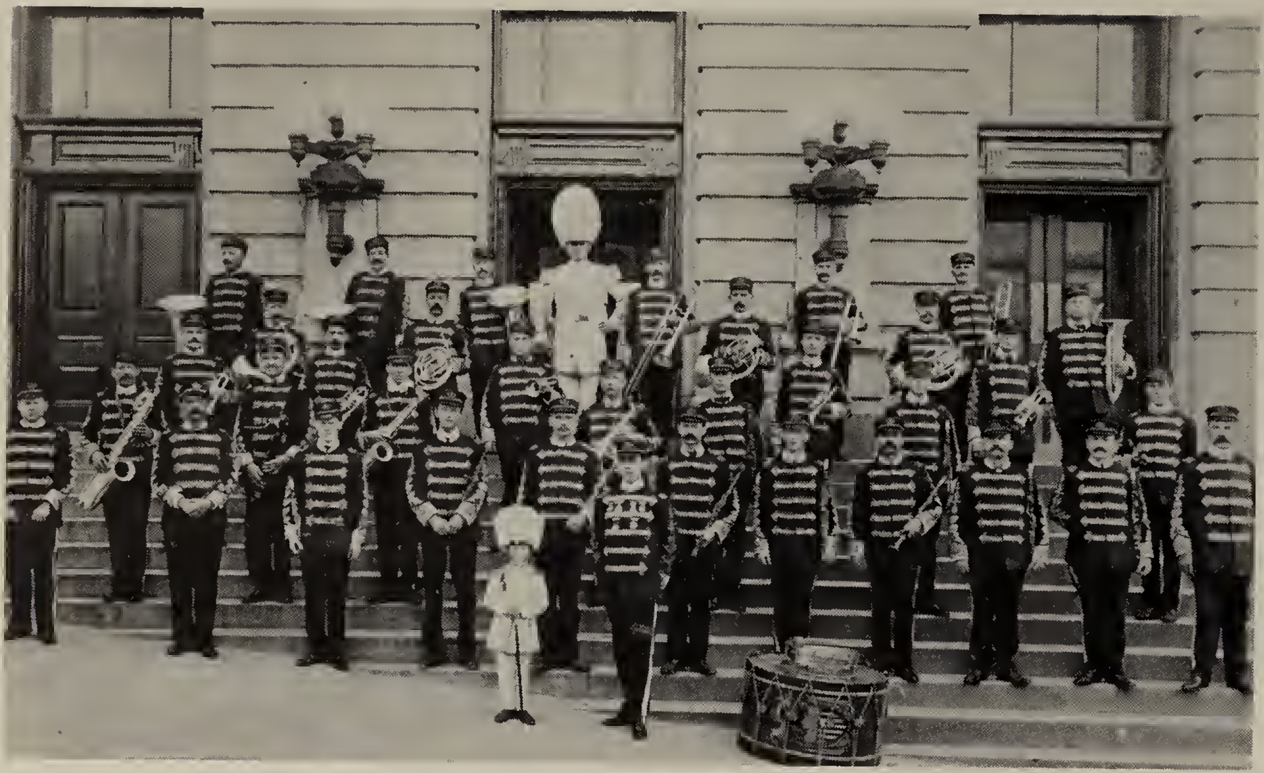
With Drum Majors in Triumphant 1906 . . .



The year 1906 was one of the band's most notable, beginning with the grand opening ball at Butte's Columbia Gardens. Then came the 27th anniversary parade of the Butte Miners Union in June, and the State Elks convention in Anaconda a few weeks later. In mid-July, the band accompanied the Montana Elks to Denver for the national convention of that order, and it was here that it won a notable award. Competing against some of the country's greatest concert bands, and judged by eminent critics, the Butte aggregation walked off with first place awards both for musicianship and appearance. They wore "white broadcloth tuxedo suits, with purple satin lapels and cuffs, white fedora hats with purple bands, white trousers with purple stripes," Treloar wrote. It was at this triumphant occasion that the band introduced its two drum majors, Brownie Burke, 30 inches tall, and James Shoemaker, who towered to 74 inches.

In 1909, the band won its third national recognition, this time in Salt Lake City at the national Elks reunion. The miners were assigned the difficult Rienzi Overture of Wagner and played it flawlessly before thousands gathered in Salt Lake's Ascot Park. The judges informed the musicians their decision would be made known the following morning, but the news was leaked to the press that evening: the Butte Miners Band had walked off again with first place honors. The welcome home was delirious.

Aside from such competitive honors, which brought countless medals to the uniformed chest of Bandmaster Treloar, the band's appearances also brought unique recognition to Montana. The chronology reads like a thumbnail history of state and nation:

On February 9, 1895, a benefit concert for survivors of the coal mine explosions in Pennsylvania; in July, 1896, appearance with the "Montana Silver Special" delegation to the Democratic convention in Chicago which nominated William Jennings Bryan for the first time; October, 1899, reception for soldiers returning from the Spanish-American War; June, 1900, appearance with the Montana delegation at the Democratic convention in Kansas City, with a special serenade for William Jennings Bryan at his home in Lincoln, Neb. after his second nomination for the presidency; January, 1901, music for the reception and inaugural ball for Gov. J. K. Toole, and later in the month, appearance at the celebration for Copper King W. A. Clark when he finally succeeded in securing his seat in the U.S. Senate; October, 1907, appearance at a gala coming out party for the only daughter of Marysville gold mining magnate, Thomas Cruse; October, 1916, reception for Senator Warren G. Harding of Ohio, who compared the music favorably with that of the U.S. Marine Band; throughout 1918, concerts for war volunteers, Red Cross and Liberty Loan drives; July, 1919, entertainment for President DeValera of Ireland; September, 1919, the visit of ailing President Woodrow Wilson in Helena on his national tour to plead for the League of Nations; August, 1920, entertainment at Deer Lodge at a farmer's meeting at which Franklin D. Roosevelt, candidate for the vice presidency, was special guest; November, 1920, reception for World War I hero Marshal Foch of France, followed in a few weeks by the band's appearance with John Phillip Sousa and his renowned band at Butte's Broadway Theatre; September, 1927, reception for Col. Charles A. Lindberg; September, 1932, visit in Butte of New York Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt, this time a presidential candidate; December, 1935, benefit for victims of Helena's earthquakes; July, 1937, the band's first broadcast by radio, over Station KGIR in Butte; September, 1940, visit of Republican presidential nominee Wendell L. Willkie; October, 1944, campaign visit of Harry S. Truman.

In 1922, at the Salvation Army district congress in Butte, Sam Treloar appeared with the band of which he was now the only survivor from the original 1887 aggregation. In 1937, when the band was 50 years old, an article written by Addison N. Clark, a mining engineer, entitled "Musical Mining Men," was quoted by Treloar: "Today the Butte Mines Band, with its membership six times six talented musicians, with a library valued at more than $20,000 and with fame that reaches across far continents, is still under Sam Treloar's baton."

In December, 1939, the members and their leader were honored at a banquet at the Finlen Hotel in Butte with the Elks Lodge as hosts. Cornelius F. Kelley of New York, president of the Anaconda company and one of the few living honorary members of the band, wrote regrets that he could not attend. His letter reveals his devotion for Treloar and the band. He said, in part: "I should like to live again those summer picnic days at the Gardens, where the band went into the stand, while contests waged and rocks were drilled, where muck was shoveled into cars, and many a race was run, and listen again to the medley of southern melodies you did so well . . . And now, Sam, it is still a busy afternoon. I must and you and all of us must turn from pleasant reveries to practical, pressing problems that face us with perhaps even more foreboding than the problems we then faced . . . To the Band my regards, my affectionate greeting and my good wishes for its continued success, and for the well-being of its leader, my old friend and comrade . . ."

At the end of 1945, Sam Treloar finished his memoirs with these words: "It is the cherished hope of the present B. & M. Band that their successors will continue to maintain the highest possible standards in band music, and be able to at all times represent the great State of Motnana, when called upon to do so. We conclude by saying Goodbye and Good Luck."

Bandsman Treloar, whose wife had died in 1941, went to Glendale, California to live with a daughter. He returned to Butte for the last time in 1949—to direct the band in a gala Fourth of July parade. Too feeble now to march, Sam Treloar stood on the rear step of a fire truck as it moved slowly ahead of the musicians. Two years later, death came to the inspired Cornishman who made Montana musical history, and who for nearly 60 years used the powers of music to elevate the spirit and stir the heart.

History Workshop

The author of the celebrated book Standing Up Country, Dr. C. Gregory Crampton, will direct a summer workshop, June 20 to 24, at the University of Utah at Salt Lake City under the theme "History of Utah and the West." The purpose of the sessions, which offer two hours of college credit, will be to study Utah in her broad regional and historical setting. Among those participating will be Dr. Walter Rundell of the American Historical Association, Washington, D. C.; Dr. Myra Ellen Jenkins, New Mexica's senior archivist, and Dr. Everett E. Cooley, director of the Utah State Historical Society. Among those representing the University of Utah will be Dr. Sterling M. McMurrin, provost; Dr. David E. Miller, chairman of the History Department, and Dr. A. R. Mortensen, editor of The American West. Anyone interested in this or some 35 other workshops planned at the Utah institution this summer is invited to write to the Department of History for particulars.

Society Board Explains Its Position in Removing Kennedy From Directorship

The Montana Historical Society's Board of Trustees, meeting in Helena on Tuesday, May 17, 1966, voted 12 to 1 to relieve Michael S. Kennedy of his duties as director. By action of the executive board a day later, our curator, Robert F. Morgan, was named acting director. Mrs. Vivian A. Paladin, who has been associate editor of Montana the Magazine of Western History and who has been your correspondent on these pages, was named editor of the magazine and of the MONTANA POST.

We feel the following statement—issued just as we go to press—by E. E. MacGilvra of Butte, president of our Board of Trustees, will be of interest to members of the Society and thus to the readers of The Post:

"Speaking for the vast majority of the trustees of the Montana Historical Society, we wish to express our deep appreciation of and high confidence in the members of the staff of the library and museum in Helena. Their integrity, loyalty and devotion to their work have done much in recent months to provide for continuance of a fine Montana institution under trying circumstances.

"We hope to bring to all members of the Society the realization that these people are the backbone of the museum and library. Their efforts and loyalty have been largely unsung, but to them goes a lion's share of the credit for progress in the fields of stimulating research and assisting historical scholars, in the development and improvement of our two publications, in business management and administration and, finally, in trying as best they could to follow the policies of the board.

"We board members realize that the situation in the last few months has been most unusual. We have devoted many days and hours in attempting to arrive at a workable solution of our problems. I firmly believe that, in action we have taken, we have expressed our conscientious convictions that we took the best course possible.

"Our actions have been dictated by our consideration for what is best for the Society, museum and library. We have no axes to grind. My fellow members on the board are loyal Montanans who have records of public service and citizenship in many fields. The board and the staff, working together in harmony, are facing the challenge ahead with a deep sense of responsibility."

Early Summer Tourists Treated to Fine Varied Showing of Western Art

Visitors to our museums and galleries early this Summer—and they are arriving in large numbers already—are being treated to a showing of paintings and sculpture by famed and contemporary artists—all of which are attuned to realism and the West. Most of it is from the Society's significant permanent collection.

Curator Bob Morgan has arranged the show for greatest visual impact in the large Gallery of Western Art on the ground floor level, with a central panel containing six wildlife paintings by the great Carl Rungius. Grizzly bears, moose and mountain sheep appear in awesome natural habitats.

Charles McBarron's 1962 tempera depiction of Custer's Last Stand, used on the front cover of the Spring issue of our magazine, is included in the show. Two paintings by Nick Eggenhofer, considered among the most able of contemporary Western artists, is represented by a large earlier oil, Village on the Move, and a more recent gouache, Bullwhacker.

BLACKFEET CAMP by Maynard Dixon, 1917

The Lewis and Clark Expedition is subject matter for two famous oils, one by Dean Cornwall, the other by Harold Von Schmidt. Dale Hawkins of Billings has loaned us his fine oil, Surrender of Chief Joseph, painted last year by Montana's historian-artist, J. K. (Ken) Ralston.

There are three unusual oils by Maynard Dixon, and two field sketches in oil on canvas board by Philip R. Goodwin. Byron R. Wolfe, another top-flight contemporary artist, is represented by two exceptional historical oils, The Charge at Beecher Island and Beaver Valley. One of E. S. Paxson's major works, The Latest Arrivals, painted in 1904, is seen, as well as Frank Tenney Johnson's moving Midnight Ride, and the late George Phippen's whimsical Captive Audience, in which a lone cowboy lulls the cattle with music on a harmonica. The latter painting, on loan from Dick Flood's Trailside Gallery at Jackson, Wyo., is a fine example of the work of Phippen, whose recent death cut short a remarkable career.

Perhaps the most historic art seen in the show are three early watercolors by the Danish artist, Peter Tofft, who was on the scene in the 1860's. One is a detailed depiction of historic St. Ignatius Mission, while two show mule-drawn wagon trains in Prickly Pear canyon near Helena.

Rounding out the show are four bronze castings of sculpture by three contemporary artists. Two, Bronc to Breakfast and The Vanquished, are by John Barney Weaver, former curator at the Society, who is perhaps best known for his heroic figure of C. M. Russell now in Statuary Hall in Washington, D.C. Until recently on the staff of the Smithsonian Institution, Jack Weaver is taking a post soon at an Edmonton, Alberta institution. A bust sculpture of a Navajo Indian by Joe Beeler and a cowboy figure Lone Hand by Harry Jackson are also seen. The latter are rising rapidly among contemporary western artists who can count sculpture, along with painting, among mediums which they handle with growing skill.

Former Montanan Finds Centennial Gold is Conversation Piece

A portion of Montana's Centennial gold, still being offered for sale at $45 a Troy ounce, has become a conversation piece in the San Diego, Calif. home of a native Montanan. Mrs. Willa Cowden Brown of the California city ordered some of the fine gold in March, remarking in her letter that she and her husband, C. N. Brown, had enjoyed looking at the "precious pile" at the New York World's Fair, "never realizing that we might have a portion."

Stating that the entire Montana exhibit at the fair was outstanding, Mrs. Brown went on to say: "Of course I am somewhat prejudiced as I am a native of Helena, having left there over 50 years ago. Yet whenever there is an opportunity, we stop by to see the old town."

Quantities of one to 100 Troy ounces of the placer gold are yet available to private individuals, with pre-paid orders to be addressed to the Montana Historical Society. Orders are promptly filled in plastic containers.

April in Helena, 1869-70, Marked by Fire and Death by Hanging

Surprisingly often, the promise of spring has brought disaster and tragedy to Helena, testing the permanence and stability of fabled Last Chance Gulch. Each time, the town emerged looking and acting less like a gold camp and more like a future capital city. A look at Helena newspapers published during the spring months of 1869 and 1870 reveal details about two such events, involving devastating fire and the last Vigilante-type hanging on Helena's famed Hanging Tree in Dry Gulch. There were a great many fires in early Helena, and a number of instances of summary citizen justice. But in 1869, in the early morning hours of April 28, there occurred the first of Helena's "great" fires, and exactly a year later, two thugs —26 and 23 years of age—became the last to die on the old pine tree which six years later was chopped down by an indignant Methodist minister.

The interesting aspect of both these April events was that Helena's physical appearance and her system of law and order took on sophistication and permanence as a result. Indeed, after the fire, which burned out nearly 20 acres of the business district, the value of lots actually rose on the real estate market. And the impassioned plea for orderly trial and justice, delivered by an ailing jurist, probably contributed to the fact that Joseph Wilson and Arthur L. Compton, who nearly murdered an elderly rancher for his gold, were the last to die in Helena at the hands of an aroused citizenry.

The files of the Montana Historical Society library are void of newspapers (either weekly or daily) dated the day or the week of the great fire. This is maybe because they were not published or because they were burned. At any rate, The Montana Post issued a FIRE EXTRA on the following Monday which told the whole story along with a drawing of the city showing the burned out areas in black.

"At twenty minutes past 2 o'clock on Wednesday morning," the lead article said, "Helenians were awakened from their slumbers by the horror-thrilling cry of "fire!"—wakened to see a rosy flush in the sky—wakened to see their proud city fall a prey to the long looked for and dreaded red demon, and naught be left of two-thirds of its business quarter save the gray ashes of desolation."

The blaze was first discovered in a Chinese "house of ill fame," said The Post, and within ten minutes was engulfing one frame building after another: "The fire fiend bounded along and across Bridge Street, roaring with fury, breathing his fire-flake breath far ahead, and devouring with ravenous haste the dainty tinder in his path . . . In three hours, the heart of the city was eaten out, about two hundred houses were consumed, and daylight dawned upon the blackest day ever Helena saw . . ."

There were many sidelights to tell: the bravery and industry of invalided Judge M. F. Truett, who shouldered a pick and hurried to Ten Mile Ditch, which he cut in five places to release 600 inches of badly needed water; the hospitality of Helena women who fed hundreds of exhausted and hungry firefighters when they could find no restaurant or bar still in business to refresh them.

FIRE AFTERMATH, 1872

The Fire Force of 1875

There were some touches of humor: "Nine husky porkers that were lying in back of Travis and Brother's stables when the fire overtook them," reported the Helena Weekly Herald on May 6, rushed frantically into . . . the Mammoth Concert Saloon, and there perished a few moments after, in the flames. One or two of them, very nice shoats, were roasted just enough for the table, and we learn that a squad of hungry boarders who had just been burned out, feasted heartily . . ."

Rival Virginia City, already fighting for its life as Montana's capital city, held a public meeting to extend "aid and sympathy" to the people of Helena. The Herald printed the resolution in full with the remark: "Let not the harmony that now exists between Virginia and Helena be disturbed during the ensuing campaign by heated discussions of the capital question, but rather let the subject be fairly and candidly stated, and then submitted to the people upon its merits for their decision . . ."

The Herald in this same issue, alluded to the belief, expressed also by The Post, that the fire was the work of an arsenist. The Herald, in fact, reported that an armful of shavings had been set fire in a temporary building put up by the owner of the burned-out International Hotel exactly a week after the big fire. This one was easily extinguished, but there was alarm in the editor's words: "All good citizens should at once unite in a determination to ferret out the villains in our midst who are so persistently working to burn down the city . . . Let measures be immediately set on foot to hunt the scoundrels who are committing these crimes, and when found give them a short rope and a shorter shrift."

It was on April 30, 1870, just before the dinner hour, that the "short rope and short shrift" philosophy overtook two young drifters on the Hanging Tree. Late in April, an industrious rancher named George Lenharth came to town from his home on the Missouri River, near the mouth of Beaver Creek. According to the Herald, he had enough cash with him to buy a new mowing machine and some incidentals. While he was in town, the friendly rancher took on some refreshment, ending up at Joe Reed's saloon on Rodney Street. Here he bought drinks all around and asked the proprietor to count his money for him. Done in the presence of a number of patrons—including young Wilson and Compton—the count revealed Lenharth had nearly $300 in his wallet.

The long account then told how the two young men rented a pair of horses at a livery stable, but had no money to pay the hire. The liveryman, named Kingsbury, took the name of a Helena businessman as surety but suspected the motives of the two when they said they were going to the Prickly Pear Valley.

Lenharth, it turned out, lived to tell the tale: the two caught up with him, ordered him to halt, and then fired three shots, only one of which took effect. The rancher was struck in the hip and fell from his horse. As they were robbing their victim, the two discovered he was still alive, whereupon they "beat him over the head with the butts of their revolvers until, as they believed, the vital spark had fled." When he was found, Lenharth's head was "like jelly," but he was still alive.

In a remarkably short time, Wilson and Compton were apprehended and lodged in jail. Said the Daily Herald on April 29:

> Search the records of Montana from its earliest history down to the present time, and a crime the like of this, so fiendish, so cold-blooded, will find no parallel. The deeds of Plummer and his "road agents" would, by the side of this, pale into insignificance. We have no desire to unduly excite the public, but when fiends in human shape, for the sake of a few paltry dollars, will murder or attempt to take the life of a poor, honest old man like George Lenharth, they justly deserve the severest punishment known to the laws . . .

Compton-Wilson Hanging

The Herald gave a full account of the impromptu trial, including physical descriptions of the two accused: Compton, about 26 years old, "has brown hair, blue eyes, and is about 5 feet 11 inches in height. His face is pock-marked, and his nose somewhat disfigured, bearing the appearance of having been cut off, or a portion of it, probably in a fight." Wilson, about 23 years of age, was a small man, not over 5 feet 6 inches tall and weighing 140 pounds. "Aside from one of his eyes, which has a film over it, he is tolerably good looking," said the editor.

The Herald described the appearance at the hearing of George G. Symes, judge of the Third Judicial District, and quoted in its entirety his speech against mob action. Judge Symes was "so ill he was scarcely able to sit up" but made an eloquent plea which "fell on deaf ears like water through a sieve." An aroused citizenry had its way. Said the Herald:

> At a quarter before five o'clock the prisoners, with Rev. Mr. Lathrop and Father Van Gorp, and several members of the committee, drove up in a wagon directly under the old Pine Tree and halted . . . An immense concourse of citizens had congregated, some in wagons and carriages, some on horseback, and hundreds standing around on the side-hills nearby and on the tops of houses. There must have been at least three thousand people to witness the last act of the great drama . . . At precisely five o'clock p. m. the souls of Compton and Wilson were launched into eternity. Compton lived six and a half minutes, and Wilson eight minutes and a half. The last words of Compton: "Be careful and not lead the life that I have led. . ."

In spite of his effort to restrain the citizens of Helena, Judge Symes was roundly critized by the Deer Lodge Independent in its issue of May 7. In failing to take a bolder stand, said that editor, Judge Symes had "polluted the judicial ermine." The Herald promptly retorted: "It is all very well to talk about a bold stand,' but we should like to know what kind of a stand, under similar circumstances, the editor of the Independent would have taken. We presume it is safe to say that a double-quick march to the rear would have been his course."

At any rate, this was the last extra-legal execution in Helena, and in May, 1876, the sturdy old Hanging Tree in Dry Gulch was cut down by an indignant minister, Rev. Shippen. History-conscious citizens could wish he had contained his indignation, and left intact this relic of the past. Nevertheless, it was the end of an era.

As for fires, Helena continued to be plagued with them for a number of years in spite of improved fire-fighting equipment, water pressure and alarm systems. Indeed, the fire of 1928, one of the city's worst, was fought with relatively modern equipment but ended in destroying an entire main street block of imposing stone and brick buildings so much advocated after the early fires which had destroyed flimsy log and frame buildings.

But the years have justified the editorial stance of The Montana Post when it said in its 1869 FIRE EXTRA: "Helena will come out of this fiery ordeal purified and improved, and there is no prosperity its people do not deserve for the better graces and manlier virtues they have evidenced when the smiting hand fell heavily upon them."

Native Montana Artist To Show in Early Summer

Ethel Zainhofsky, a native Montanan and daughter of Hill County homesteaders, will be featured in a two-month showing of her unusual and imaginative oil paintings in the Gary Cooper Gallery, beginning Monday, May 6, and continuing throughout June.

A total of 37 paintings, with such intriquing subjects as teenagers, land and seascapes, still lifes, winter scenes, and Mexican braceros, will be shown. We believe the work of this native Montanan deserves serious attention.

Mrs. Zainhofsky lives at her farm home near Inverness, Montana during the summer, returning to California with her family to spend the winter. In recent years, she has turned more and more attention to Mexican scenes and people. The artist has received all her considerable training in California, studying at Sacramento Junior College, Federal Art School, Sacramento Valley Academy of the Arts, and under private instructors in Los Angeles and Monterey.

Havre Church, Named for Brother Van, Compiles History of its Congregation

The Van Orsdel Methodist Church of Havre, the only church in Montana to honor by name the labors of the great missionary, W. W. (Brother Van) Van Orsdel, has done him and Methodism added honor with the recent publication of a handsomely bound volume entitled Under God. A labor of love by many parisioners, notably Mrs. L. E. Rhodes who compiled and edited the vast amount of material involved, the book covers the ministries of 23 men, beginning with the venerated Brother Van, who with Rev. R. A. Armstrong organized a "class" in Havre in 1891.

BROTHER VAN and Miss Jeanne M. Morris, the future Mrs. L. E. Rhodes, photographed at Glasgow, about 1915.

Included among the hundreds of historic pictures are the ones seen here of the three church edifices built and used by the congregation. The first building was erected in 1893, with the wing on the east side added a few years later. The first parsonage is seen at the right. The second church, dedicated in 1917, was a handsome Havre landmark for 40 years until it was destroyed by fire nine years ago. Van Orsdel Methodist parishioners now attend services in a handsome structure consecrated in September, 1959, and dedicated free of debt last June.

The book, published by the Hill County Publishing company of Havre, is rich in illustration as well as in the written chronology of a church which has withstood fire, depression and the vicissitudes of many eras to emerge as one of Montana's solid religious institutions.

We commend this community effort at recording the history of a pioneer church. It is available at $3.00 a copy from the Van Orsdel Methodist Church, 412 Fifth Ave., Havre, or from the publishing firm.

Richey to Mark 50th Anniversary in June

Richey, a friendly agricultural town in Eastern Montana's Dawson County, will celebrate its 50th anniversary on June 18 and 19, we have been informed by Mrs. A. V. Radcliffe. Situated on the Great Northern Railway some 50 miles from the North Dakota line, Richey was a typical homestead area town, founded in 1916.

An Editorial Lapse . . .

Before we receive any more reader chastisement, we hasten to say that in our last issue, we referred to Orville Grant as the son of President Grant. This man, whose name was usually spelled Orvil and who was deeply involved with Secretary of War Belknap in the Indian agency scandals during Grant's administration, was a brother of the President, not his son.

Fascinating History of States, Territories In New Survey Bulletin

A new 291-page publication describing how the United States acquired its national territory, how boundaries were drawn and settled, and containing interesting geographical facts about all 50 states, has just been published by the Department of the Interior's Geological Survey. Entitled Boundaries of the United States and the Several States, and written by Franklin K. Van Zandt, this is a new and enlarged revision of previous bulletins on this vital subject.

We are certain our readers will agree with us that this is much more than a dull, pedantic bulletin: it makes for exciting and informative reading. For instance, it takes note of the fact that for 60 years, between 1850 to 1912, the meridian which passed through the center of the dome of the old Naval Observatory in Washington, D. C. was used as the prime meridian in the United States. Boundaries for the western territories and states—including Montana—were referred to as being so many degrees "west of Washington."

A few more items:

The geographic center of conterminous United States (that is, 48 states) is near Lebanon, Kansas. The total area of the 50 states and the District of Columbia is 3,615,211 square miles, the Louisiana Purchase in 1803 accounting for 909,130 of them. The highest point in Florida is 345 feet above sea level; the lowest point for Colorado is 3,350 feet above sea level. Mt. McKinley, Alaska is the high point (20,320 feet), while Death Valley in California is the lowest (292 feet below sea level).

The publication contains a great many diagrams showing how various state boundaries were finally determined. And there is a fine fold-out map in color showing the routes of principal explorers from 1501 to 1844.

Bulletins on this subject have been published a number of times since 1900 by the Department of the Interior, but the current volume is the first since 1930. Therefore it contains a great deal of fresh material on the newest states, and enlarges as well on the older territories and states.

We commend this to our readers. It can be ordered from the Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402. You should give the title and specify Geological Survey Bulletin 1212. The price: $1.75 per copy.

Montana Editors Pondered "The Indian Question" 90 Years Ago

As EVERY WESTERN HISTORY buff knows, it will be 90 years ago this June that the most famous and talked-about battle of them all occurred between Indians and whites. We at the Historical Society have been particularly immersed in the subject these past few weeks, working on the Spring issue of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History, which will feature the Battle of the Little Big Horn in both contents and cover subjects.

This immersion led us to the files of newspapers in the Historical Library and a look at issues of the Spring of 1876 when such events as discovery of gold in the Black Hills, sporadic clashes with the Sioux and the determined marches of the military to catch the hostiles in a "pincer" movement were all leading inexorably to the showdown to come three months later.

The most fascinating aspect of all the editorial comment we found was the temper of the times: the savage must be crushed, the "Indian question" must be resolved. Historical retrospection now reveals that solemn treaties with the tribesmen were daily being violated by the gold- and land-hungry whites, that the Sioux were fighting for their homeland.

The Gallant Hero . . .

But for the man sitting in an editorial chair in March, 1876, the picture looked far different. Said the Helena Daily Herald in its issue of March 1:

> It seems that the Government has at last been awakened to the necessity of chastising the rebellious and bloodthirsty Sioux and thus put an effectual quietus upon the hostile raids and incursions on our frontier settlements . . . Rumors are current regarding movements of the Seventh Cavalry, under the gallant Custer, and the military of the Department of the North. From this it will be seen that troops will be concentrating from all points of the compass, and Sitting Bull, with his lawless band of desperadoes, will at last be made to feel that his days of murder and rapine are drawing to a close . . . It is very probable that the vicinity of the Big Horn River will be the scene of operations, and as some of the most skillful and experienced officers of the army will be in the field, we may look . . . for more decisive results than have ever been made since the "fighting days" of Sully and Harney.

But the "Black Hills fever" was much in the news, and the only objection most Montana editors had to the growing exodus was loss of population. "It is useless to ignore the matter any longer," said the Helena correspondent for the New North-West, published in Deer Lodge. "The most reliable accounts leave no doubt that gold in paying quantities exist to a large extent. But then, everyone must judge for himself whether it is reasonable to leave this for that —to go now with uncertainty from Indian hostilities and the thousand other drawbacks that accompany emigration to new fields of labor."

The New North-West, in its issue of March 3, gave some fatherly advice on its own: "Think it all over, boys, before you go, and remember the many humbug stampedes of the past fifteen years, and whether it is well to give the bird in the hand for the grasshopper in the bush."

Lt.-General Philip H. Sheridan was in Washington testifying before the military committee of the House about the need for two military posts along the Yellowstone. "The Indian question in the Black Hills must now be settled by the establishment of the Indians on the Missouri River," Gen. Sheridan wrote. "In the accomplishment of this purpose . . . two posts will have to be located, one at or near the mouth of the Big Horn River, and the other at or near the mouth of the Tongue River. These posts can be supplied by steamboat up the Yellowstone and can be constructed of material found in the vicinity . . .

. . . The Archvillain

Military operations have now been commenced against the hostile bands of Sioux by request of the Interior Department, and I consider this appropriation so necessary that I especially request immediate action on it."

Military operations had indeed begun. The Helena Herald, on March 10, announced that General John Gibbon and his command at Fort Shaw would leave in two days for the Yellowstone and Big Horn and would "have an opportunity of assisting Generals Crook and Custer in chastising that old murderous villain, Sitting Bull."

Editor R. E. Fisk of the Herald took an editorial swipe at Territorial Governor B. F. Potts for his failure to call up and head a volunteer militia for service in the campaign about to begin. "His Excellency, it appears, suspicions the motives of our citizens in suggesting such action on his part," said the editor. "The Governor in one sense construes it as a conspiracy to inveigle him still further away from the 'genial influences of civilization', and to place his person and life in jeopardy in the country of Sitting Bull. We hope His Excellency will reconsider his determination, and consent to take the field . . . The HERALD stands ready to write the history of his battles, and, if need be, his obituary . . . Governor, to the front!"

Late in March, as huge mule trains hauled supplies to the converging troops, the Sioux burned Fort Pease, and General Brisbin led a party out from Fort Ellis to rescue the beleaguered men. Fort Pease was abandoned. And in Washington, D.C., Secretary of War William W. Belknap was facing impeachment for malfeasance in office, accused of graft in handling affairs at Indian agencies. Involved with him was Orville Grant, son of the President. General George Custer, who testified against Belknap, had incurred the wrath of Ulysses S. Grant—a wrath which almost denied the colorful Cavalryman any command at all in the Indian campaign. Many historians attribute Custer's reckless—though courageous—behavior at the Little Big Horn to his thirst for new glory to ease the smart.

SITTING BULL IN CARTOON CARICATURE . . .

SCALPS OF THE CUSTER FAMILY
F. OPPER

HIS HOUR OF TRIUMPH:
BUT HOW LONG WILL IT LAST?

It has already been seen that in all the editorializing about the "unregenerate savages" who were to repay General Custer's bravado with annihilation, the one who came in for the most virulent treatment was Sitting Bull. The tabloid-sized Fort Benton Record, on March 4, published a truly memorable item under the heading "Fort Shaw Items," complete with blistering verse:

War, rumors of war, dreams of glory and gory scalp-locks, with an hour's skirmish drill thrown in each day by way of variety, is the prevalent excitement here just now. The whole command —Companies A, B, G, K, H, and I—is under marching orders and preparations are in progress to surprise Mr. Sitting Bull, ere the spring grasses strengthen his ponies for the usual summer's raid. Emboldened by last year's success, the aforesaid bovine chieftain has this winter signified his intention to wipe out the entire white race, but the paleface objects to being wiped out in the Indian fashion, and with General Gibbon to lead the way, he is going down to Mr. Bull's spring residence and invite the old blowhard out. Here is a little bit of a poetical sparring match indulged in of late by the old sinner and his favorite wife:

Old Sitting Bull sat by his tepee fire,
Sharpening his scalping knife;
His brow was dark with foul desire
As he said to his youngest wife:
"The edge of this will find its way,
Ere long, the top-knot 'round
Of the pale-faced dog who dares to stray
On this, my hunting ground."

His better half looked wise and said,
As she tended the poodle roast:
"Dear Bull, of late I'm half afraid
You reckon without your host.
For I see by the Benton Record
That the Seventh Infantry
Is coming down here to put a head on thee."

The Record editor, no more than his colleagues in Montana and throughout the country, could hardly know that this stubborn Hunkpapa Sioux still had his greatest day of glory coming, and that it would be nearly 15 years before he would die in one last moment of defiance before his cabin on Standing Rock Reservation.

EDGAR I. STEWART, professor of history at Eastern Washington College of Education at Cheney, Wash., joins us as historical consultant, thus formalizing an arrangement which has, for a decade and a half, been informal and voluntary.

Holder of A.B. and M.A. degrees from the University of Washington, Stewart took his doctorate in history from the University of California. His major interest, reflected in a large output of writing and editing, has been on the history of the American frontier, with emphasis on the Indian Wars of the Great Plains.

Edgar Stewart is a recognized authority on the Custer Battle, virtually inheriting his interest in that celebrated encounter. Both grandfathers were members of Custer's Civil War brigade. The colorful young officer's fearless leadership of that command brought him fame before he received the fateful assignment to Fort Abraham Lincoln, D.T., and the war against the Plains Indians. Dr. Stewart recalls that the Custer Battle was discussed since his earliest memories, that as a child his mother played with a girl whose father had died with Custer.

Any bibliography on Dr. Stewart must include his interpretive study of the Little Big Horn encounter, published by the University of Oklahoma Press in 1955 under title Custer's Luck. Much more than an account of the Battle itself, this volume sets the stage for tragedy by tracing events which led up to it and followed after. Our readers will be interested to know that Dr. Stewart has

FRED G. RENNER of Washington, D.C., who recently retired after many years of service with the U.S. Department of Agriculture, has pursued his deep interest in the life and works of Charles M. Russell to the point where he is considered the country's top authority on the subject.

Born in Great Falls just before the turn of the century and raised on a ranch situated on the Missouri near the town of Cascade, Fred Renner remembers seeing the famed artist strolling about the streets of Great Falls, and being impressed by his distinctive dress and manner.

The young man worked for the U.S. Forest Service during summer vacations while attending the University of Washington, from which he earned a B.S. degree in forestry. He did graduate work in range ecology and botany at Oregon State College, Corvallis, and in soils at Utah State College in Logan. His long career in range conservation and management began when he reported to the Forest Service at Albuquerque, N.M. in July, 1922, as a grazing assistant.

During the next 14 years, Fred Renner held important posts with the Forest Service in California, Washington, Oregon and Idaho. He transferred to the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture in Spring, 1936, and was stationed at Colorado Springs, Colo. until his transfer to Washington, D.C. in January, 1937. Until his recent retirement, he was a national leader in the field of range conservation, frequently serving in consul-

Some Pungent Reader Response . . .

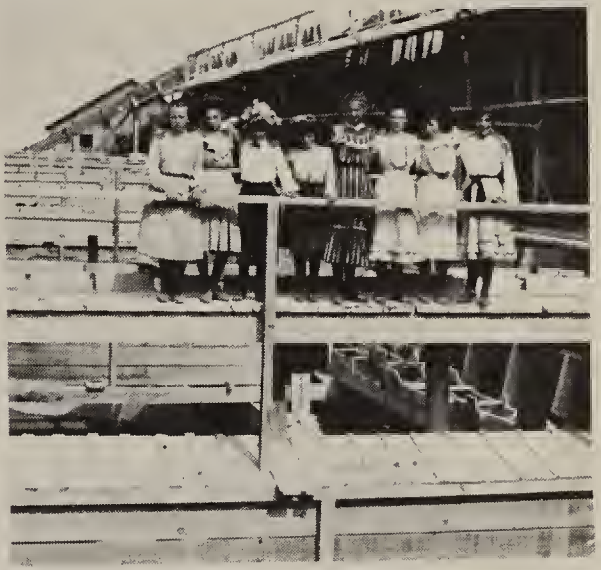
If your office has extra copies of the February issue of THE MONTANA POST, kindly send me a number of copies for distribution to relatives of "Uncle Joe" Butch, an oldtimer mentioned in the issue. A daughter still lives with her daughter in Poplar, Mont., the last of three daughters of Mr. Butch. The Genie Butch, pictured as one of the Fort Shaw basketball stars in your August, 1965, issue—now deceased—was also a daughter of this pioneer.

A small error in the February issue: you stated Mr. Butch "settled down near Oswego." This should have been near Frazer, where a grandson, Walter Clark, Jr. now owns the home ranch. Mr. Butch operated one of the large horse-cattle ranches on the Fort Peck Reservation for many years, after he moved from the Fort Peck community, now the Fort Peck damsite. His wife, a member of the Assiniboine tribe, was allotted a homestead near the Fort Peck site where the family lived for a number of years until the "move" was made by the tribe to the present Wolf Point sub-agency. The tribe occupied the west half of the present reservation, from Tule Creek to Nashua, with Porcupine Creek as the west boundary.

After his retirement, Mr. Butch spent his time raising strawberries, which he sold in Frazer and also gave away to neighbors and friends, which he delighted to do. The name he was known by among members of the Assiniboine tribe was "Jo-Jo," short for Joseph.

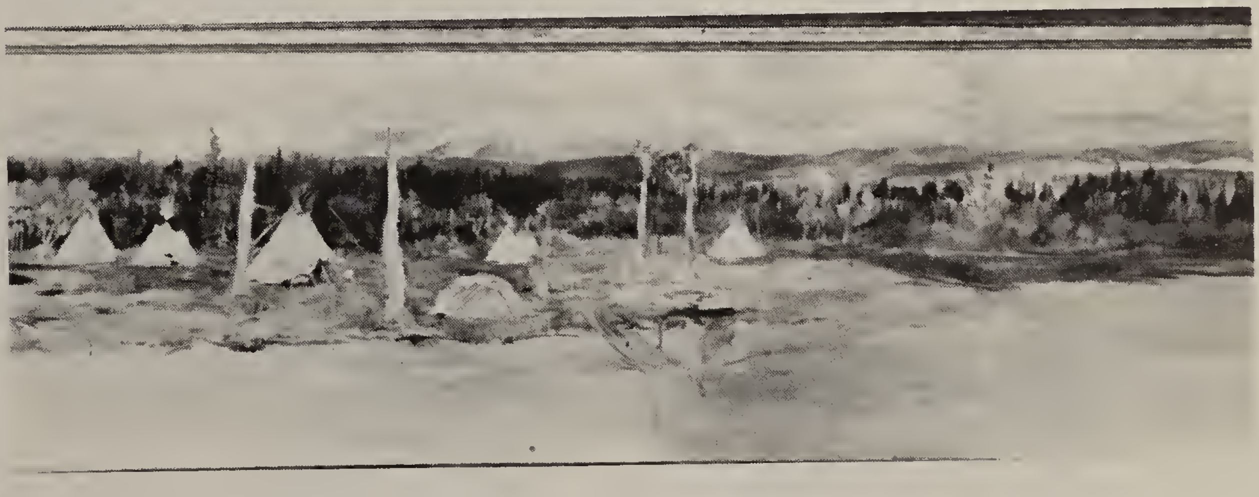
JAMES L. LONG
Hamilton, Mont.

In our September issue, we published a picture of the cyanide plant at Montana's colorful old mining town, Marysville, with eight young ladies as central subject matter. One response was the following letter from Mrs. George M. Smith of Grafton, Wis., the former Mary Weis, who spent her girlhood at this fabulous mountain town. We are happy to print portions of her letter, along with an enlarged version of the central part of the picture—which, incidentally, comes from the collection of L. H. Jorud, pioneer Helena photographer.



"Where in the world did you get the picture of us eight gals on a picnic? We would walk to the 'horseshoe curve', picnic all day, and then walk to the cyanide plant to take the train home. What a lark! Nowadays no one would walk that far. I think riding the train home was the biggest thrill. The gal on the extreme right is me . . ."

Russell's Kootenai Camp Painting Joins Collection



This important—though unfinished—C. M. Russell oil has now been formally donated to our collection of Western art as a memorial gift from the family of the late Cornelius Francis Kelley, former Butte waterboy who rose to chairman of the board of the Anaconda Company. The gift was arranged by Mr. Kelley's daughter, Mrs. John C. Wood of New York City, and his son-in-law, George Hepburn of Beverly Hills, Calif. The painting shows the primitive setting of an historic Kootenai campground on Swan Lake in Western Montana. This later became the site of the famed summer home of Mr. Kelley. "We are deeply grateful to the Montana Historical Society for accepting Charlie Russell's painting," Mrs. Wood recently wrote us. "I so frequently think of the many visits and talks my father and the artist had at this spot. This painting must remain in Montana—and I am happy you have it."

TO CONTRIBUTIONS COLLECTORS:

An unfortunate error was made in a brochure we recently sent out to our readers announcing the forthcoming reprints of the 10 volumes of CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE HISTORICAL SOCIETY. The coupon stated the set of all 10 would sell for $220 until after Dec. 31, 1966, when the price would go up to the norm of $245. It should have read Dec. 31, 1965. Therefore the price for the set now is $245. Single volumes will be available at $25.00 each.

But all through the years, Renner kept up his interest in the art of C. M. Russell, gathering one of the finest private collections in the world, and adding to his vast store of recorded and catalogued data on the works of the Cowboy Artist. He has located, measured and described more than 3,000 Russell originals and his files contain over 1,500 photographs of subjects he has indexed.

Fred Renner has freely given of his time in advising and assisting many public and private collectors, including our Society and the Trigg-Russell Gallery at Great Falls which he serves as trustee. In retirement, Fred Renner remains one of the busiest men we know, working steadily toward his goal of committing his lifelong study to book-length publication.

written the lead article for the Spring 1966 issue of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History, due next month and devoted entirely to this still-argued-about event which occurred 90 years ago this Summer.

The contributions of Dr. Stewart and his wife, Jane, in editing and researching significant items include Ross Cox's The Columbia River, originally published in 1831 as Adventures on the Columbia River. This appeared, with editing and introduction by the Stewarts, in 1951. In 1955, he edited E. Pickard's I Rode With Custer, and in 1961 the journals of James H. Bradley under title March of the Montana Column. George Custer's own story, My Life on the Plains was edited by the Stewarts and appeared in 1962.

Dr. Stewart took sabbatical leave last year to research his field at the Coe Collection at Yale and the National Archives in Washington, D.C. Now close to retirement from his teaching career, Edgar Stewart will utilize the fruits of this and his many other years of research in a renewed production of writing and editing.

Brief Montana Career of Judge Thompson Produced a Dual Legacy

FRANCIS McGEE THOMPSON, a Massachusetts-born jurist, banker, miner and legislator, lived in Montana Territory only a scant three years, but he left a lasting mark. The Territory and State, its history and destiny, deeply concerned him throughout the rest of his life. He was responsible for creation of the basic design for the Great Seal of the State of Montana.

Judge Thompson was also the man who, as one of two Councilmen from Beaverhead County, introduced House Bill 51 in the first session of the Territorial Legislature which met in December, 1864, in Bannack, the roaring gold camp on Grasshopper Creek, the Territory's first capital. The measure was signed by Governor Sidney Edgerton on February 2, 1865. It was this legislation which created the Montana Historical Society, making this institution 101 years old this month.

But we were inspired to explore a bit more deeply into the life of Judge Thompson and his brief but vital career in Territorial Montana by a copy of the October 22, 1965, issue of the Greenfield (Mass.) Recorder-Gazette, Thompson's hometown paper. It carried a feature story about him, along with the picture seen in the next column, in which Charles Campbell of Greenfield presented a gold-plated souvenir coin, numbered one, to Mrs. Russell Alexander, a granddaughter of Judge Thompson.

The coin, which features a rendition of the basic seal design on one side and the Territorial Administration building on the other, was issued in the Fall of 1965 by Virginia City to mark its 100th anniversary as Montana's Territorial capital.

FRANCIS McGEE THOMPSON

It should be added, parenthetically, that Charles Campbell got into the picture by a happy circumstance. He and his wife, Kitty, first visited Virginia City in 1961 and met Dick Pace, who each summer acts as publicist and information director for the fabulous Alder Gulch gold town. During subsequent visits in 1963 and 1965, the Massachusetts couple became deeply interested in Virginia City and well acquainted with Pace and his wife, Jackie. When plans for the commemorative coin were being made and research revealed that the designer of the seal had returned to live out his long life at his home in Greenfield, the Campbells offered to try and find a direct descendant of Judge Thompson. Campbell soon traced down his granddaughter, Mrs. Alexander, and presented Coin No. One to her as a gift from the town and Territory her grandfather had served briefly but so significantly.

Francis M. Thompson was born in Colrain, Mass. on Oct. 16, 1833. In 1862 he arrived in the gold regions of Montana (then in Idaho Territory) and with the organization of Montana Territory, became one of two councilmen representing Beaverhead County. In the first Territorial Legislative session, Thompson became a member of the ways and means committee, the judiciary, federal relations, education, agriculture and manufactures, elections, Indian affairs and engrossment and enrollment committees. As if he did not have enough to do, he was chosen, on Jan. 19, 1865, to head a special committee to select a design for the territorial seal.

Many years later, when he was serving as a probate judge in his hometown of Greenfield, Mass., Judge Thompson was queried by the Montana Historical Society about his ideas which evolved into Montana's official seal. He replied: ". . . the great falls of the Missouri River as a centerpiece with the sun shining over the Rocky Mountains, the buffalo and other wild animals then abounding, the plow, the shovel and the pick indicating our reliance upon agriculture and mining as the chief occupations of the people, with the timbered mountains showing their wealth of virgin forests."

Francis M. Thompson returned to his native Massachusetts in the Summer of 1865. But his interest in the infant Territory far to the west did not fade. Sidney Edgerton, first Territorial Governor, asked him to serve as a representative in "the states" to assist in attracting capital and settlers to Montana. He continued his membership in the Montana Historical Society, along with service in historical societies of Massachusetts and writing of his experiences.

Judge Thompson died suddenly at his home in Greenfield on Jan. 1, 1916, at the age of 83. It had been more than a half century since he had served in a meaningful way a young Territory born during the Civil War and by 1916 deeply involved as a State of the Union in the struggles of World War I.

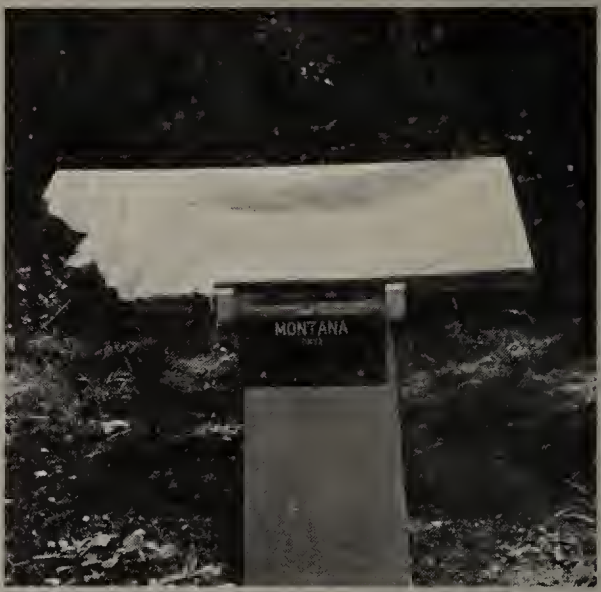
Unique Onyx Slab Represents Montana at F.D

FOR 15 YEARS NOW, Montana has been represented in a unique way at Franklin D. Roosevelt's beloved Little White House at Warm Springs, Georgia, now maintained as a public memorial. We think many of our readers will be interested, as we were, in knowing some of the details of how Montana joined other states of the Union with representative stones placed along the walk leading from the Memorial fountain to a museum which houses much of the memorabilia of the man who recovered sufficiently from polio in the relaxing waters of the warm springs to become one of the world's great leaders.

These details—along with pictures—recently came to us from Lt. Col. Louis C. Kalberg of Harlowton, Mont., who was a prime mover in tracking down the unusual onyx flagstone and placing it along what is called "Walk of the States."

Kalberg was taking special military training at Fort Benning, Ga. when he first visited the Little White House in 1950. Montana was then among 48 states represented by stones, but ours at the time was an unimpressive slab of sandstone.

Through the office of Governor John W. Bonner, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, of which Kalberg was then State Commander, began the move toward producing a more appropriate stone. Officials of the Anaconda Company were contacted, as well as J. P. Bouchard, president of the Montana Onyx company of Butte. These men began a search of mining properties for a suitable specimen. The search ended when Mrs. A. J. Wendel, a vice president of the onyx firm, found what turned out to be the perfect flagstone in her own personal collection. She donated it to the project, and Bouchard launched upon the exacting work of cutting and polishing.



MONTANA STONE, WARM SPRINGS, GA.

The stone was trimmed to the outline of the State, emerging to a size of 20 inches east and west, 10 inches north and south. A star designating the capital at Helena was sand-blasted on the surface. The onyx, which came from a deposit discovered in 1929 in Madison county south of Butte, is a silicified layer of volcanic ash, about one inch thick. Extremely hard and weather-resistant, its colors vary from deep maroon to very light gold.

MONTANA'S CUT AND POLISHED ONYX STONE was accepted by Gov. John W. Bonner on behalf of the state in January, 1951, when this picture was taken at the capital in Helena. Seen, left to right: Rae Wieneke, then quartermaster-adjutant of the V.F.W.; M. H. Gidel, geologist for the Anaconda Company; Mrs. A. J. Wendel of Butte, who donated the specimen from her personal collection; Louis C. Kalberg; Governor Bonner; J. P. Bouchard, who cut and polished the onyx slab, and R. H. Glover, then president of the Anaconda Company.

R.'s "Little White House"

To make the stone completely unique and significant, its colors in a remarkable way show Montana's major topographical features. The gold stripe in the upper portion is just about the location of the Missouri River, while the lower stripe comes close to the meanderings of the Yellowstone. Moreover, gold and beige stripes on the west (or left) side designate the chain of the Rocky Mountains. A scarring in the northeastern section is close to the site of Fort Peck Dam, and Lt. Col. Kalberg recently pointed out that another flaw in the southeastern section is close to Yellowtail Dam!

Thus long eons ago, nature contrived to produce a unique Montana symbol to join those of the 49 other States.

EVEN MONTANA'S GIGANTIC POKE OF GOLD DIMINISHES AS COLLECTORS FILL THEIRS

THE GLITTERING HILL of 2,100 Troy ounces in placer gold, a prime attraction at the Montana Pavilion, New York World's Fair, has substantially diminished as orders from collectors are being filled faster than most old prospectors were ever able to fill their pokes, even in the lush days of the 1860's. Orders have increased from collectors, perhaps due in part, at least, to a full description and picture of the hill of gold, published in the February issue of The California Mining Journal, published at Santa Cruz. And there has been much individual response.

A letter from Frank A. Kemp of Denver, president of the Great Western Sugar company, prompts us to give a brief description, at least, of the nature of the gold and its sources. He writes:

"I wonder if you would be kind enough, in the light of my subscription to various articles that the museum has offered to its patrons, to write giving me some history of the gold. What I have in mind is that in describing it to friends, what can I say about its source? Is it placer gold or is it derived from the clean-up of some milling operation or from some other source such as the breakdown of old gold purchases by jewelers?"

We replied to Mr. Kemp (and herewith to others who are interested) that the gold is fine, or grain size, and is actually placer gold, derived from the same small hydraulic and hand operations. All the "dust" came from such operations in the gulches of Montana, Nevada, Idaho, Oregon and Alaska. None of it is from large dredging operations or from the breakdown of old gold purchases by jewelers. It is also significant that this gigantic pile of fine gold—which weighed 175 pounds—was no doubt the largest pile of the metal in its fine state ever assembled.

Orders for the gold—at $45 a Troy ounce—are still being filled. The Montana Historical Scoiety will benefit from any profits from the sale. Orders may be sent in care of the Society, but checks should be made out to MONTANA CENTENNIAL GOLD. As any sourdough would tell you, his placer gold had a way of diminishing rather quickly when it got to the marketplace. The same is true of this giant poke. We advise you to send your order in at once—for an ounce or up to a hundred. Whatever the quantity, the gold will arrive safely in special plastic containers, and it will be, at the very least, a meaningful memento of Montana and her Centennial year.

We are especially proud to offer this superb volume, the story and pictorial record of Christian Barthelmess, who spent much of his adult life in the U. S. Army as a musician but who recorded so much of the last American West frontier with his camera—"catching shadows," as the Indians said, of places where he was stationed. Notable among these places was old Fort Keogh, near present-day Miles City. What makes us especially proud is the fact that Christian's son, Casey, an authentic Montana pioneer in his own right and a member of the Society's Board of Trustees, has made this book possible through collaboration with Maurice Frink, retired newspaperman and now one of our most readable and meticulous writers of Western History.

"I was so thrilled to read the article about the Fort Shaw Indian Girls Basketball team in the MONTANA POST of August, 1965. I saw them play in Fort Benton, the first basketball game I had ever seen. And they were so quick and agile and light on their feet that they seemed to bounce as easily as the basketball itself . . .

"I am enclosing a check to send the MONTANA magazine (and the MONTANA POST) to my son, George, of Kalispell, who was born in 1909 in Fort Benton at my parent's home, The Pacific Hotel, owned by my father, Robert S. Culberton . . ."

Former Montanan Shares Picture of Shadowy Man Who Saw Eras Come and Go

FOR MORE THAN 40 years, a former Montana newsman and one-time editor of newspaper inserts (or ready-print, in print shop parlance), has been collecting bits and pieces of Montana history. He is John K. Standish of Portland, Ore., who during the 1930's edited newspaper inserts published by the Montana Newspaper Association. Mr. Standish is arranging now to have his collection microfilmed, with a complete set of reels to come to the Montana Historical Library.

But in the meantime, he has sent along some odd items, some of them ephemeral, but all of them interesting. Among them is the picture, reproduced here, of a somewhat shadowy but colorful character whose long life in Eastern Montana spanned the fur trade, buffalo hunting, steamboating along the Missouri, and old Fort Peck—the last remnants of which were swept away by high water in 1918 and covered now with the mighty man-made lake at Fort Peck Dam.

UNCLE JOE BUTCH

This bearded man is Joseph Butch Chamberlain, born in England on April 18, 1846. Before his death on March 22, 1931, he claimed to be—and probably was—Valley County's oldest living resident. Standish writes that this picture was used in an article on Chamberlain—always known as "Uncle" Joe Butch—written for the newspaper inserts by F. B. Gillette of Hinsdale, Mont.

Some colorful bits about Uncle Joe were used in the book From Buffalo Bones to Sonic Boom, produced for the diamond jubilee celebration of Glasgow and Valley County in 1962. So far back into the dim past did this man's memories and activities go that his story was used as a transitional vehicle from that era to the open range which followed.

Joe Butch, employed along the Missouri as a wood cutter for steamboats, was an employee of Abe Farwell when the original log Fort Peck was built. When he was interviewed in 1925, he said:

"Well, I come durin' the rebellion. I got off the boat down at the mouth of the Musselshell . . . That was the winter of '64 and '65. . . Fort Peck was built in the winter of '66 and '67, and only two outfits of the Pony Express ever got in there that winter. Then I went to work on that there old telegraph line that used to go up thru here. I worked at that job for two years, and every time one of them blinkedy-blank outfits of hoss thieves went thru and shot down the wires I had to go out and fix 'em. Say now, I got so I could tell a black stump from an Indian in them days."

He never left the Missouri River, married an Indian woman, and settled down near Oswego, just east of where the old fort once stood. He went to town only occasionally—to Oswego or Nashua or Glasgow. He had to go to Glasgow once in 1902, for he had developed cancer of the lip. Dr. Mark D. Hoyt, pioneer physician, burned the cancer off with acid, the North Montana Review reporting that "Uncle Joe danced many a hornpipe before the final application was administered." Recovery was apparently complete.

It was said that until near the end of his days, Uncle Joe never revealed his true name, fearing punishment for deserting irksome duty with the U.S. Cavalry at Fort Yates, D. T. in 1866. Assured he would not be punished, Joe confided his story and received a pension to augment his wife's Indian allotment. At his funeral in 1931, he was given full military honors, and some of Valley County's leading pioneers and citizens served as pallbearers.

Hamilton Man Camped With Sioux, Cheyenne At Battle Anniversary

OUR RATHER LARGE collection of letters from readers this month included one from Charles O. Williamson of Hamilton, Mont., operator of a school of horsemanship, a veteran forest ranger, and author of Breaking and Training the Stock Horse, now in its fifth printing. Mr. Williamson's reminiscences of the 50th anniversary of the Custer Battle in 1926 should interest our readers, who are probably aware that this year of 1966 marks another anniversary of the famed encounter along the Little Big Horn, the 90th. Mr. Williamson wrote us, in part:

"I am in receipt of the current [January] copy of THE MONTANA POST and read with interest the item on the last page, Sitting Bull's Guns and an Anniversary. This item reminds me that I was present at [that] celebration in 1926 . . . and believe I was the only white man camped with the Indians; at least, I do not remember any other. I was at that time ranger in the Pryor Mountain District of the old Teartooth National Forest which bordered the Crow Reservation on the south, and I had many friends among the Crows.

"I had a special invitation from members of the tribe to attend and was assured of 'good time and heap good pasture for your horses.' What I cannot seem to remember is whether I rode in with pack and saddle horses or in my first automobile, a Baby Overland, purchased sometime that year. Anyway, I made camp with my friends, the Crows, listened to the never-ceasing tom-toms, and watched and took part in many of their games and dances. As I remember, there were 3,000 to 5,000 Indians—Crows, Sioux, Cheyenne. I never thought anything of it at the time, but am now proud to recall that I knew Chief Plenty Coups and Red Tomahawk (at least met them) and dozens of individuals of the three tribes."

Epic Winters Saw Hardship But Evinced Humor and Fresh Resolve

LOOKING BACK upon the mistakes of the past, resolving to do better in the future, and contending with blizzards, screaming winds, heavy snows, and alternate freezing blasts and warming chinooks of Montana's turbulent—but often exaggerated—winters have occupied the January columns of Montana newspapers from the time they first began appearing more than a century ago.

Although the Treasure State has had "hard winters" as well as many of the "open" variety, only two truly frightful seasons in terms of human suffering, cattle losses, shortages of food and mail, transportation delays and failures—those of 1871-72 and 1886-87—are considered epic by most historians.

Because of space limitations, we explore only these two winters, injecting some editorial comment in New Year editions of Territorial papers, and some glimpses of how early Montanans celebrated the holidays and viewed the future. As for "hard winters," we will welcome the personal reminiscences of any whose memories encompass the savagery or uniqueness of other Montana winters.

Winter came early and furiously in 1871, and by early November there was a shortage of staple groceries in Helena. Both the Herald and Gazette published biting editorials about alleged price-fixing by several wholesale groceries. One almost led to tragedy, as related by Editor R. E. Fisk of the Herald in his issue of November 6. One wholesaler named A. G. Lowry had taken particular offense, and proceeded to the International Hotel, where the editor always ate lunch at 1:00 o'clock. Accompanied by his "amiable pink of a geranium son," Lowry armed himself with a large revolver which he exhibited to the startled luncheon guests.

When the editor arrived, Lowry approached him "in a loud and boisterous manner and demanded to know if we were the author of certain articles which have appeared in the Herald, at the same time applying some low and obscene epithets."

Lowry began withdrawing his revolver, but lost his nerve, even though his son, standing behind him, cried out, "Shoot! shoot! Put a ball through his head!"

Editor Fisk ended his account by saying that the time had long past when disputes were settled with six-shooters, and that the freedom of the press in America was as much an established fact as the Constitution itself. Nor did he let up in his denunciations of "the ring" in ensuing issues of his paper.

On November 18, the Herald jubilantly announced the arrival of a Garrison & Wyatt bull train of 26 wagons—bearing, among other staples, 350 sacks of sugar and 124 of coffee. There were more trains on the way, although by late November they were still hopelessly floundering in the deep snows of the Continental Divide.

The bitter cold moderated somewhat during December, and in its first issue of 1872, the Montanian of Virginia City ran an editorial in which it said the "bountiful snowfall in the mountains promises abundant water next summer." Moreover, the railroads "whose iron links will shortly connect us with the Atlantic and Pacific oceans will be completed to our border, and the floodtide of immigration will have commenced to flow into our valleys and towns. Let us be of good cheer, then, for the star of the Territory is in the ascendant."

But the weather did not let up for long. On January 11, the Montanian said that for four weeks it had not stopped snowing for more than three hours at a time on the range between the Madison and Gallatin. In the same issue, the editor said: "Two things we have made no mention of or paid attention to of late: the weather and the price of groceries, for every change in the former causes a rise in the latter. . ."

In a lighter vein, on January 25, the Virginia City paper published a squib about "a disagreeable old bachelor who is of the opinion that the frightfully bad taste exhibited by women in doing up their backhair is sufficient argument against giving them the ballot."

Then the editor quoted from an article in the Ladies Home Journal about the lack of alcoholic beverages at most fashionable 1872 New Year receptions in New York—"a cheering sign of progress, true social culture and refinement." The Montanian editor appended his own observations of entertainments in his town. At only one of the many homes he visited on New Year's day, he said, did he "find or taste anything stronger than coffee."

The Territorial Legislature, which went into session in November, 1871, prematurely ended its weary deliberations early in January. The Helena Herald published the column of its Virginia City correspondent on January 5, which gave a synopsis of New Year celebrations in the capital city. "All appeared happy," wrote the correspondent, "some tipsy, and a few considerably more so, and when the Legislature convened this morning with full seats and only three or four full members, I put it down as a body temperate somewhat over the average of Democratic assemblages."

Late in January, Governor B. F. Potts decided to take his wife on a trip to "the states." According to the Herald, the couple "suffered intensely from the cold in crossing the main range from Junction Station to Pleasant Valley. At the latter place, Mrs. Potts was quite prostrated with her sufferings, but recovered sufficiently to proceed to Corrine." Back in Helena, the Governor's colleagues kept warm, but went without mail for several weeks.

Winter of 1886-87 Shrunk an Indian Domain and Brought a S

THE SAVAGE and storied winter of 1886-87 started in November, too, with a heavy snowfall. But cattlemen were worried more about the poor market for their beeves at that moment than they were about the poor quality and excessive numbers of the stock still facing a winter on the open range. Indeed, early in January a general thaw occurred and everyone was encouraged. "A mild balmy day ushered in the new year, with brightness overhead and almost a May atmosphere morning cheered the capital city," said the Helena Herald on Jan. 3, 1887. Crowds of people were out sleighing, "everything on runners in the city was brought into requisition."

In a New Year's editorial, the Herald had this to say:

We are fairly launched upon the new year of 1887. It opens full of promise to us as a nation, as a Territory, as a city. We are at peace at home and abroad, and plenty of everything, an overflowing treasury, and resources that ordinary figures can hardly estimate. . .

Though the winter opened with dreary foreboding for our vast stock interests, more poorly provided for a hard winter than ever before in our history, the season thus far has been propitious and a load of anxiety has already been lifted on that account. . .

Even our Indian wars seem about over and the Indian question nearing the final stage of settlement by the dissolution of tribal relations and the gradual merging of the several tribes into citizens as they become civilized and self-supporting.

The wounds of our great Civil War are pretty well healed and the rents closed up. A new generation, born since the war closed, is now entering into control of the destinies of this country, and forgetting the past, is addressing itself to the improvement of the grander opportunities of the present. . .

The Herald, on January 7, even took occasion to mark the fearful winter storms in usually warmer climes, and made a comment about badly mixed-up weather, often heard today and attributed to atomic blasts and space shots:

It is a novelty to read of fearful snow storms in Florence, Genoa and Venice and all over the north of Italy. The seasons and climates seem to be getting badly mixed up all over the world. Whether the bowels of the earth are out of order or the derangement is traceable to sun spots, has not been satisfactorily settled. So far this winter Montana has no just cause of complaint.

But on January 10, the Herald began the first in a series of increasingly dreary reports from the vast cattle ranges. There was little or no wind with the snow that fell during the holidays, the report said, and it buried the short growth of dry summer grass out of sight and out of reach of cattle. For the first time in years, the item said, sheep men were resorting to the use of snow plows.

In its issue of January 14, the Herald published another little item which strikes a modern-day note with stunning clarity: "The anti-tobacco advocates alway attributed General Grant's cancer in the mouth to smoking," said the editor, "but John Roach, who never smoked a cigar in his life, had the same disease."

There was no let-up on the flow of dire weather news. On January 24 came a dispatch from the Musselshell region that a gale had been blowing without an hour's intermission for many weeks, and that flocks of sheep had been scattered, buried and devoured by wolves. Cattle were very poor and were drifting before the winds beyond their accustomed ranges. The proportions of the disaster were reaching Western Montana editors.

One benefit of the savage winter, said the Herald in its issue of January 21, was that the Indian Commission had completed its work of reducing the Belknap Reservation sooner than may have been the case during mild weather. They had created a "small, compact reservation of about 700 square miles, lying south of Milk River, and between that and the Little Rockies, and this will be all that is left of that vast domain of savagery and solitude that has heretofore clouded the maps of Northern Montana. . ."

In this season and region of blizzards it was a pretty bold and risky undertaking for the commission to go through, but in some respects it is the most favorable season to treat with Indians. They are in camp, in a mood to appreciate creature comforts. The vast stretches of snow-covered, wind-swept prairies, destitute of game or shelter, is of less appreciable value than when waving with grass and kissed by the gentle breezes of spring.

SNOWBOUND ON "THE JAWBONE"

The most savage blizzard came two days after a Herald dispatch on January 29 described how alternate freezing and thawing had sealed up the short grass so tightly that "it would require hard chopping with an axe to get at it and cut it loose."

It was the night of January 31, 1887, that the worst storm in recorded Montana history struck. At Fort Assiniboine,

A TRAVOIS MOVE IN WINTER

BORN TOO EARLY IN THE SPRING

ried Era to a Close

oldtimers said it was "decidedly the roughest day ever known at this post." Trains were late and in some cases were abandoned entirely, towns were isolated and low on provisions and fuel, Indians were eating the meat of frozen cattle, and for the first time the herds of Western cattlemen were in serious trouble, for this storm howled across southwestern Montana as well.

Statistics on cattle losses during this tragic winter still vary from lows of 8 per cent in the west to virtually 100 percent in Central and Eastern Montana. One spread went from assets of over a million dollars to debts of more than a quarter million. Granville Stuart was fairly optimistic about his losses until the spring roundup showed 900 calves branded instead of 8,000 as in 1886.

But as usual, the following year's January newspapers spoke with optimism. Indeed, the cattle industry quickly readjusted from the old practices of running excessive herds on vast ranges with no provision for even counting except at round-up time. An era had come to an end!

The Montana Live-Stock Journal, in its issue of Jan. 7, 1888, remarked about the cold weather then prevailing, but added that promises of a chinook did not sound inviting. "The chinooks of last winter that would quit work after 12 hours and leave a hard crust on the snow do more harm than good." The editor pointed out that provisions for this new winter were very much better and "continuance of the winter as we have had it so far will induce the cowmen to forget all about 1886-87."

No one, whether cattleman or not, would ever forget that historic hard winter. But rise about it, Montana certainly did, for by the dawn of the 1890's there were more cattle on her ranges than ever before and this industry remains today one of our most vigorous and profitable.

John Young-Hunter: Artist of the West With British Accent

The Society is fortunate in receiving a limited stock of a remarkable book, Reviewing the Years, an illustrated autobiographical work by the late John Young-Hunter, Scottish-born artist who studied under and became the recognized successor of the renowned portraitist, John Singer Sargent, yet who came to this country in 1912 and did some of his most fascinating work among the Indians and scenes of the American West.

Young-Hunter was born in Glasgow, Scotland in 1874, the son of Colin Hunter, a celebrated marine painter. John grew up in the artistic and opulent atmosphere of the Royal Academy, and became an active participant. He cut all ties to come to America in 1912, settling in Taos, New Mexico where he built a Spanish-type studio with "a British accent."

Illustrations in the book include full-color reproductions of the broad spectrum of this man's art: portraits of famous persons and families, still-lifes, landscapes and moving depictions of Indians whom he came to admire deeply.

Reviewing the Years is available through the Society at $6 a copy, and we heartily recommend it for the general reader as well as to those especially interested in art. It's not only rare—but good!

Browning Artist Scriver Featured in Magazine Article

We are happy to learn of a new recognition which has come to a friend and contributor, Bob Scriver of Browning. This talented artist, sculptor and taxidermist is the subject of a four-page illustrated story in the December issue of True Magazine. Pictures used with the artcile are by Erwin Bauer, free-lance writer and photographer from Ohio, and Bill Browning of the Montana Chamber of Commerce, one of Montana's top publicists.

Scriver, a former teacher and coach at Browning High School, has for the past decade or more been devoting full time to his art, building up a very creditable wildlife museum in Browning, and casting his own sculptured works. Our own most often seen Scriver creation is the mounted remains of Big Medicine, the storied old white buffalo who roamed the National Bison Range at Moiese and was the most-photographed bison in the world. Big Medicine's aged hide and shrunken bulk represented a real challenge in taxidermy—a challenge which every visitor to our museum agrees was met with skill and dedication by Bob Scriver.

Sitting Bull's Guns and an Anniversary

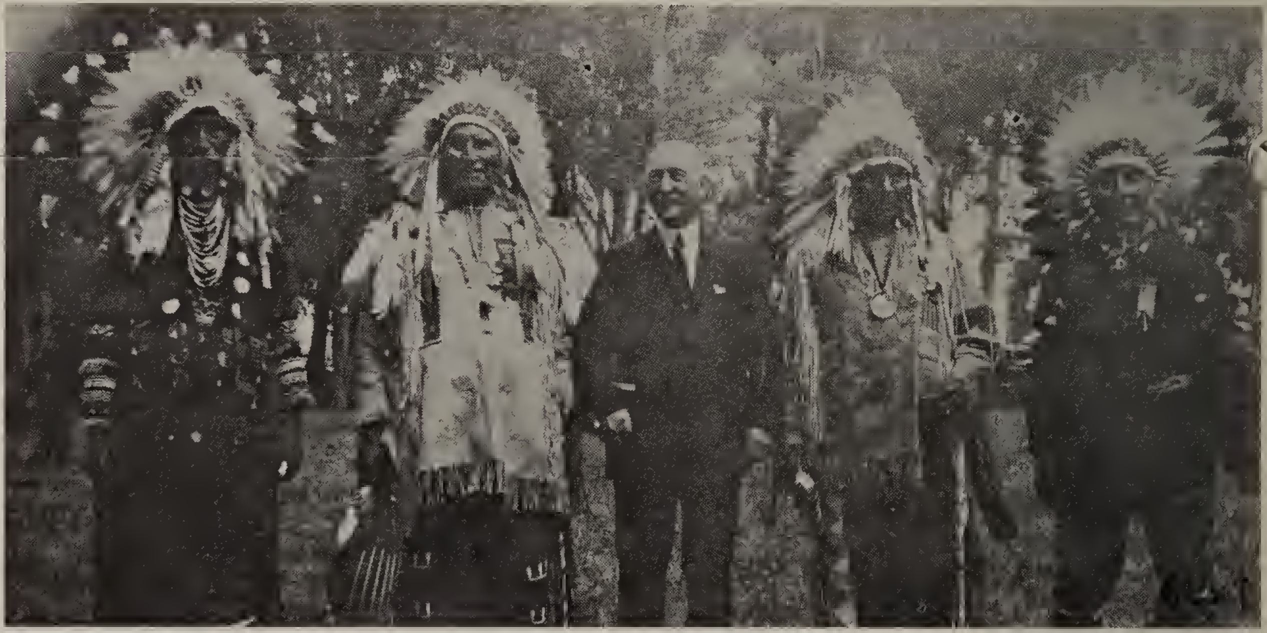
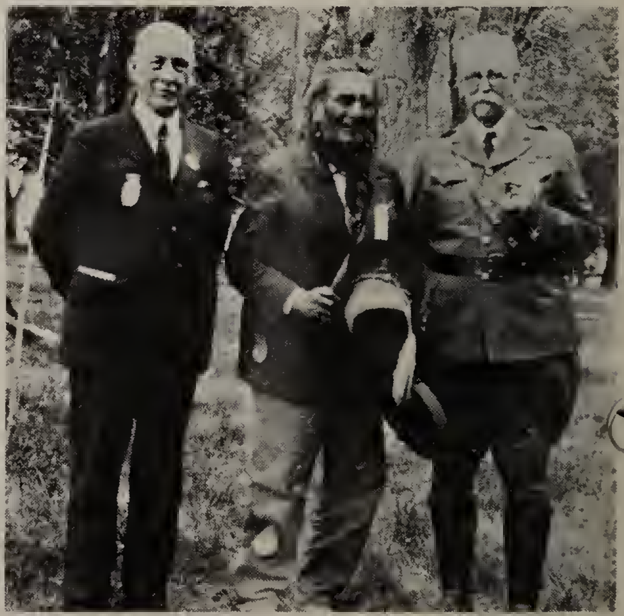
CONSIDERABLE READER response has resulted from an article we published in our September, 1965 number, regarding an 1873 model Springfield rifle which was seized from Sitting Bull at the time of his arrest (and death) December 15, 1890 and which recently came to the Society collection from the family of former Governor Joseph M. Dixon.

Of particular interest are the two pictures seen below, sent us by Mrs. Elsa Spear Byron of Sheridan, Wyo., member of a pioneer family whose roots go deep in the country of the Crows. Figuring prominently in both pictures is Capt. Isaac Baker, who first came into possession of Sitting Bull's weapons and who presented them to Dixon, then (in 1932) first assistant Secretary of the Interior.



SURVIVORS OF SITTING BULL'S BAND gathered in June, 1926, to mark the fiftieth anniversary of their historic victory at the Little Big Horn. Capt. Isaac Baker is seen in the center of the picture. At his right is RED TOMAHAWK, the Indian with the famed profile who killed Sitting Bull as the Hunkpapa leader struggled with Indian police on the morning of Dec. 15, 1890. Other Sioux in the picture are Little Hawk, extreme left, Shoots Walking, and Little Moon.



CAPT. ISAAC BAKER and the great Crow leader, PLENTY COUPS, posed on June 25, 1926, with Col. William H. C. Bowen, right, at Crow Agency. The occasion was the fiftieth anniversary of the Custer Battle. Bowen, who was a lieutenant in the Fifth Infantry from 1876 to 1880, made his first visit to the Battlefield in 1877, and was on hand in 1886 when survivors of the Seventh Cavalry gathered in reunion at the Little Big Horn. His article on the battle is included in the appendix of C. T. Brady's "Northwestern Fights and Fighters."

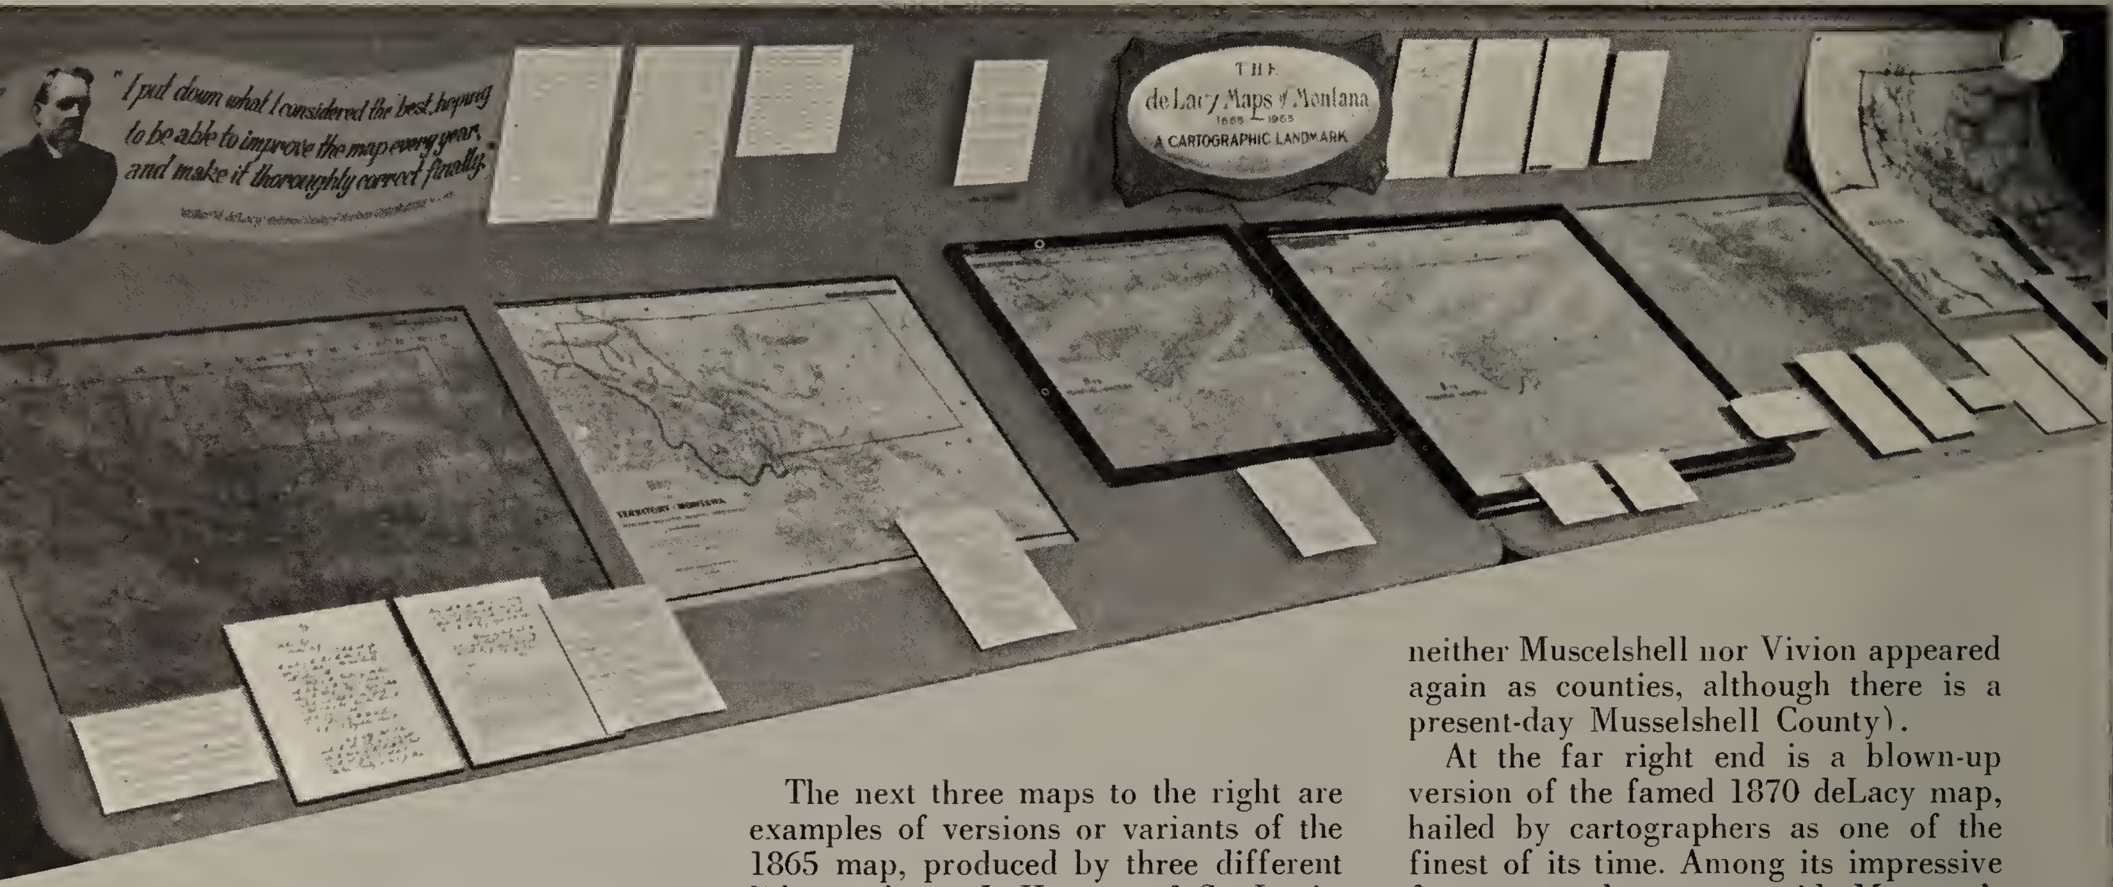
The Maps of Genial W. W. deLacy: Significant Guideposts to



"I put down what I considered the best hoping to be able to improve the map every year, and make it thoroughly correct finally."
THE deLacy Maps of Montana
1865 — 1965
A CARTOGRAPHIC LANDMARK

COMMEMORATING the hundredth anniversary of Montana's first official map and memorializing Walter Washington deLacy, the genial bachelor who was our first official cartographer, the display pictured here has been assembled for the main floor lobby of our building. It is attracting the thoughtful attention of countless visitors. Under the research direction of Librarian Mary K. Dempsey, the display was actually created by Curator Bob Morgan.

So much Territorial history, drama and even human conflict is embodied in the total exhibit that space does not permit full elaboration. But the maps, together with comprehensive labels, enlarged photocopying techniques and deLacy's own words I put down what I considered the best, hoping to be able to improve the map every year and make it thoroughly correct finally contain not only the excitement of a young Territory filling with gold-seekers, but the beginnings of orderly government.

The original manuscript map at the left, from the Historical Society collection, was drawn by the 46-year-old deLacy at the behest of the first Territorial Assembly when it became immediately necessary to outline and relate the nine original counties: Missoula, Madison, Deer Lodge, Edgerton (later Lewis and Clark), Jefferson, Gallatin, Choteau, Big Horn and Beaverhead. This map, although later refined—as its creator vowed it would be—was highly significant. It served not only as a legislative and judicial guide, but a trail marker for miners seeking Montana's gold-bearing gulches and explorers seeking boundaries beyond.

The next three maps to the right are examples of versions or variants of the 1865 map, produced by three different lithographers: J. Hutawa of St. Louis, Friedenwald Company of Baltimore, and Rae Smith of New York. These have been the subject of conjecture among cartographic experts. No clues have come to light, for instance, as to when Friedenwald and Hutawa received authorization to publish the deLacy map. And while the current display contains written evidence that Montana's famed pioneer, Samuel T. Hauser, arranged for copyrighting the Rae Smith version in 1865, another variant of this appeared without copyright. The Friedenwald version, incidentally, was loaned for the display by Burton B. Brewster, while the copyrighted Rae Smith variant is from the Parmly Billings Memorial Library.

Another cartographic puzzle regarding the 1865 variants is associated with Granville Stuart's rare Montana As It Is, published in 1865, and of which a Rae Smith map was an integral part. Examples of both versions of the map—copyrighted and uncopyrighted—have shown up in the Stuart book.

Next in line in the display is the manuscript deLacy map of 1866, from our collection, on which the cartographer signed himself "Surveyor of Madison County, M. T." Although it appears to be something of a rough draft, with many geographical points and features in pencil, it corrects some longitudinal errors—and enhances detail—of the original map of 1865. It adds the county of "Muscelshell" created in April of 1866 with "Kercheval City" as county seat. (In November of the same year, the name of the county was changed to "Vivion" with "Smithton" as the county seat. With the creation of Dawson County in January, 1869, however, neither Muscelshell nor Vivion appeared again as counties, although there is a present-day Musselshell County).

At the far right end is a blown-up version of the famed 1870 deLacy map, hailed by cartographers as one of the finest of its time. Among its impressive features are the areas outside Montana's boundaries, including the wonders of future Yellowstone Park and the Cook and Folsom exploration of Yellowstone Lake in 1869. The map of Montana itself reflects such strategic surveys as those of Isaac I. Stevens' party in the years 1853 through 1855, the work of John Mullan in 1859 through 1862, the Raynolds surveys on the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers, and many others.

Moreover, on the 1870 map is a point of painful controversy: the map-maker included a number of locations in the Yellowstone region, notably "DeLacy's Lake" (now known as Shoshone Lake), which were denounced by Geologist F. V. Hayden who stated bitterly in the U.S. Geological Survey Report of 1872 that ". . . The numerous and outrageous errors of the map show that neither as discoverer nor as mapper of this lake has Mr. DeLacey [sic] any claim to a perpetuation of his name; and, since the lake occupies a position entirely different from that assigned to DeLacey's Lake, we have decided to drop that title, and to call this, in our maps and reports, Shoshone Lake, as being the head of one of the principal forks of the Shoshone or Snake River."

Quite naturally, W. W. deLacy was shaken by this attack. Among the objects in the display is a copy of his May 9, 1874 letter to Major Martin Maginnis, then representing the Territory in Washington, in which he said, in part: "Profr. Hayden in his published report of 1872 speaks of me in connection with this Lake in very unhandsome & very undeserved terms. He seems on many occasions to have been actuated by unworthy feelings of jealousy . . ."

ontana's Beginnings

In defending his map, deLacy said he "never claimed that my map was correct in all particulars, or that I had been entirely over the region in question . . . I do claim, however, that I was the first to publish the fact that South Snake river took its rise in a large lake, north of Lake Jackson, and flowed into it—a fact confirmed by Dr. Hayden's own surveys . . ."

That W. W. deLacy had no occasion for even this much apology for his 1870 map is borne out by Carl L. Wheat, whose monumental Mapping the Transmississippi West six-volume work was completed in 1963 after long research in the Bancroft Library. Wrote Wheat in his chapter The Maps of 1865: ". . . He had wrought a memorable map of a new Territory, and had he never done anything else, he would have given us sufficient reason to honor his memory."

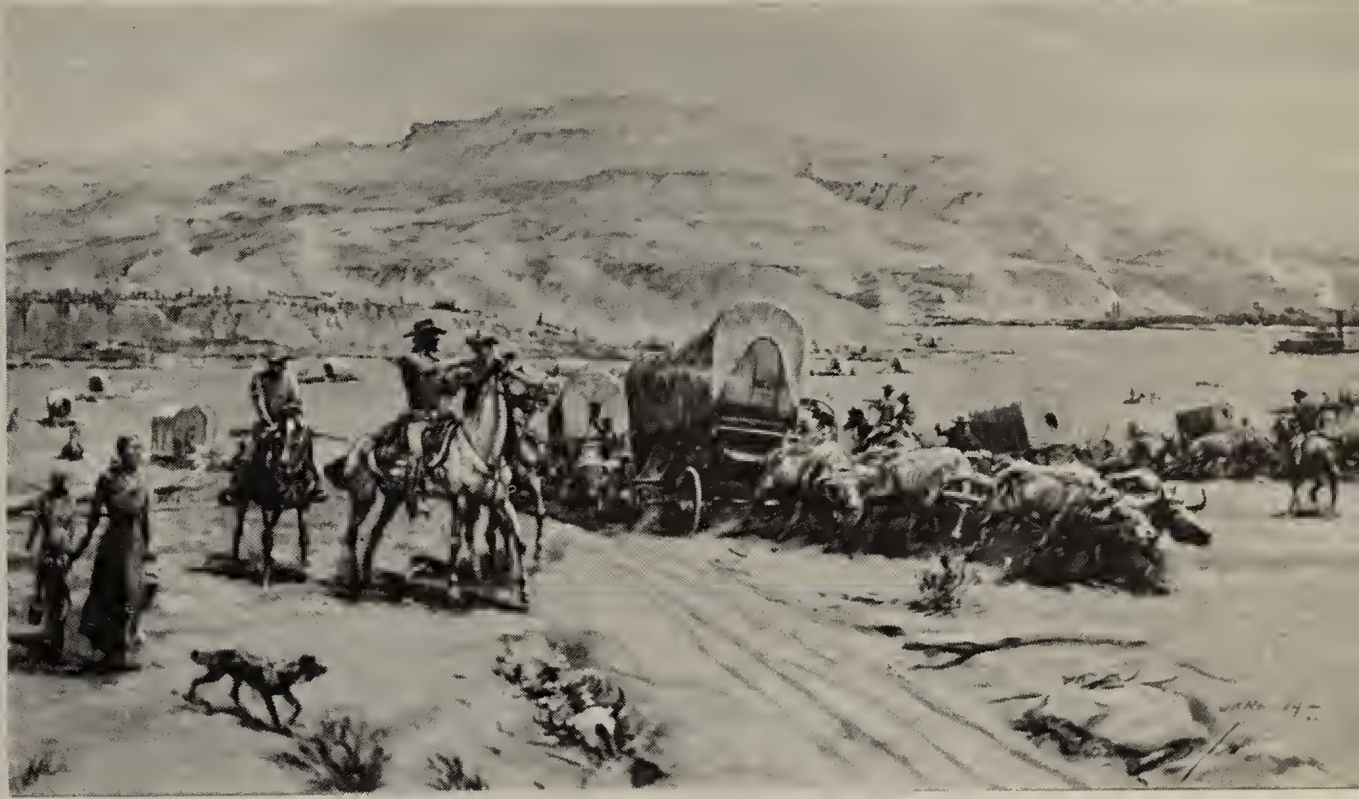
G. W. and C. B. Colton and company of New York, which produced the 1870 map, continued to issue deLacy maps with the use of the same plates with only a few revisions. A particularly fine 1875 version, on loan from Miss Gertrude McStravick, is in a separate case in the lobby (not visible in the photograph seen here).

W. W. deLacy, born at Petersburg, Va. in 1819, was trained in mathematics and engineering at West Point and began work as a construction engineer for the Illinois Central and Iron Mountain railways. There followed stints as a teacher of French at West Point and foreign languages to navy midshipmen, employment by a syndicate to search for abandoned mines in Texas, and service in the Mexican War.

In 1858, deLacy joined Lieut. John Mullan in his historic building of the Mullan Road from Fort Benton to Walla Walla. He tried his hand at gold prospecting in what is now Montana, and in 1863 led a gold-seeking party into the Snake River country, during which he made the observations in the future Yellowstone Park country which were to lead to the unfortunate bitterness already referred to.

Walter deLacy never left the field of cartography, civil engineering and surveying after he completed his 1865 map for the first Territorial Legislature. He did much work in locating the line of the Northern Pacific Railway, and spent the last years of his life in the surveyor general's office in Helena. Called "Colonel deLacy," he was a genial and companionable man, noted for his humorous stories and tales of adventure. He died on May 13, 1892, at the age of 73.

J. K. Ralston's Commissioned Painting of Sully Expedition Crossing of Yellowstone on Display



NOW ON PROMINENT DISPLAY is this provocative oil painting, THE CROSSING—1864, commissioned by the Historical Society from J. K. (Ken) Ralston of Billings, who ranks not only as one of Montana's foremost frontier artists, but an historian of very considerable attainments. His commissioned works have long found their way into the collections of great institutions and countless individuals.

THE CROSSING, which depicts the dangerous fording of the Yellowstone River by the Sully Expedition and the large party of civilians it was escorting in August, 1864, was described in detail by Ken Ralston during the Western History Association conference we hosted in Helena in October. His artistry as well as his knowledge of his subject received favorable comment during the panel discussion, "Painting the Frontier West."

The expedition, led by General Alfred E. Sully, had been sent into punitive action against the Sioux in the Dakotas. In 1864 the party was sent into Montana to build a road on the Yellowstone to serve as a direct route to the Montana mines, and to build a military post near the mouth of Powder River. Although neither the road nor the fort was ever built, the Sully Expedition was highly significant to our history, although it has been little publicized.

The scene depicted by Ralston's large canvas is between present-day Glendive and Sidney in Eastern Montana. Two supply steamers, Chippewa Falls and Alone are plying the Yellowstone, loaded with supplies for the expedition. The action shows the crossing of the treacherous Yellowstone by the large baggage train, civilian teamsters, scouts and a train of immigrants composed of several hundred men, women and children traveling in 123 ox-drawn wagons. The crossing, which cost the lives of one soldier, two civilians and several mules, took two days to accomplish. Previous loss of stock and the sinking of the steamer Island City previous to the event depicted forced Sully to change his plans and return to Fort Rice. He escorted the immigrants safely down the Yellowstone valley, however, and across the Missouri to Fort Union. Familiarly known as the Holmes Party, many of these immigrants became pioneer Montana residents—including Bill Cheney, the wagon master, and such families as the Hilgers and Benedicts.

On indefinite loan to the Society and also on display on the main floor, is another famous Ralston painting, THE SURRENDER, owned by Dale Hawkins of Billings. This one depicts the cold October day in 1877 when Chief Joseph surrendered his band of Nez Perce to General Miles at the Bear's Paw battlefield south of present day Chinook, Mont.

Another example of Ken Ralston's growing output of commissioned historical works is AFTER THE BATTLE, the dramatic aftermath of the Little Big Horn debacle. Owned by Don Foote of Billings, it was seen by thousands of visitors to the Montana Pavilion at the New York World's Fair, 1964 and 1965. The Jefferson National Expansion Memorial in St. Louis also commissioned Ralston's INTO THE UNKNOWN, depicting Lewis and Clark meeting the Shoshones on the Beaverhead River, one of the great paintings of the Old West.

Reviewer Hutchens Enthusiastic About "Montana and the Sky"

MONTANA AND THE SKY, the heavily illustrated, lively history of aviation from pioneer barn-storming days through the 1930's, due to appear early in 1966, received a pungent send-off this month from a distinguished journalist and reviewer and a man who has a deep personal interest in the Treasure State.

John K. Hutchens, who spent his early journalistic years in Montana and wrote knowingly about his experiences in the recent One Man's Montana, is now on the five-member editorial board of the Book-of-the-Month Club after a long career as staffer on metropolitan newspapers—including book review editor and columnist for the New York Herald Tribune for more than 15 years.

While MONTANA AND THE SKY, written by Frank W. Wiley under the aegis of both the Montana Aeronautics Commission and the Historical Society, was still in manuscript form, it was read by Mr. Hutchens. His reaction, which follows, is both educated and warm:

Those were the days, aeronautically speaking, when daring young men—and a few ladies, too—soared around Montana's Big Sky, sometimes in contraptions that weren't much more than flying trapezes. They were the pioneers, and what a chronicle Frank W. Wiley (considerable of a Montana aerial pioneer himself) has assembled about them! It is that fine kind of history that is also entertainment, and I'd be put to it to list all the items in it that fascinated me.

Meet Sam Cody, the Montana cowboy who revolutionized Great Britain's concept of military aviation and who was almost certainly the prototype of the cowboy flyer in the film Those Glorious Men in the Flying Machines. Journey across the Continental Divide with George Lowry, balloonist, who employed a stable of parachute-jumping monkeys. And those barnstormers—there was a wild outfit for you, including the parachutist who stood on the top wing while the plane looped, and one "Charlie" Lindberg, mechanic, who turned up in Billings and did some stunting himself . . . open cockpits, brave men flying "by the seat of the pants," adventurers and creative innovators.

Montana aviation must be forever grateful to them, and to Frank Wiley for telling their story so well.

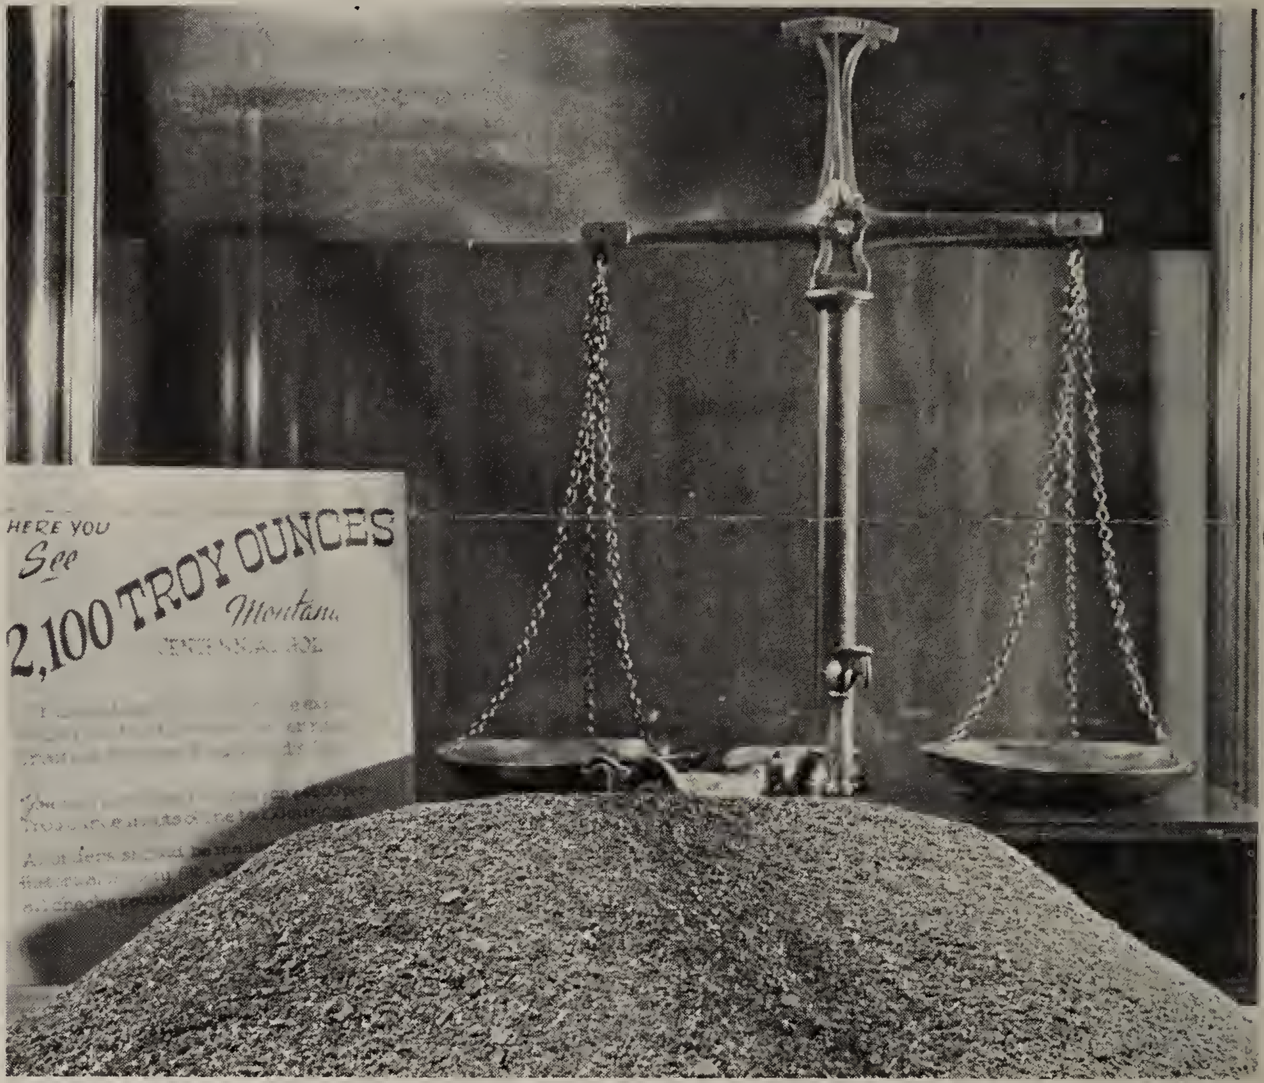
Here's Montana Centennial Gold for Your Poke!



THAR'S GOLD in this here hill—2,100 Troy ounces of it—and quantities, from one to a hundred ounces, are available to Montanans on a first-come, first-serve basis, at $45 an ounce. This heap of placer gold was part of the fabulous gold exhibit at the Montana Pavilion, New York World's Fair. It is, unquestionably, the largest pile of the yellow metal in its fine state ever assembled—in Montana, at least—and this is gold country, pardner!

The placer gold has been on display in Helena's First National Bank since it was taken from the Montana Centennial Train when that famous display train finished its exhibit duties last month. It was brought from Billings to Helena under shotgun guard in the best tradition of the West.

Montanans may order quantities now, by sending a check made out to MONTANA CENTENNIAL GOLD, in care of the Montana Historical Society. Orders will be filled—in special plastic containers. Profits from the sale will go to the Historical Society.

Thus the cause is worthy, the gold is genuine, and an ounce or a hundred of the fine stuff will be a worthy addition to anyone's collection. Or it would make a valued gift, one highly significant of Montana and her Centennial year. We might add that financial experts expect a substantial rise in the price of gold, $75 an ounce being the figure usually predicted.

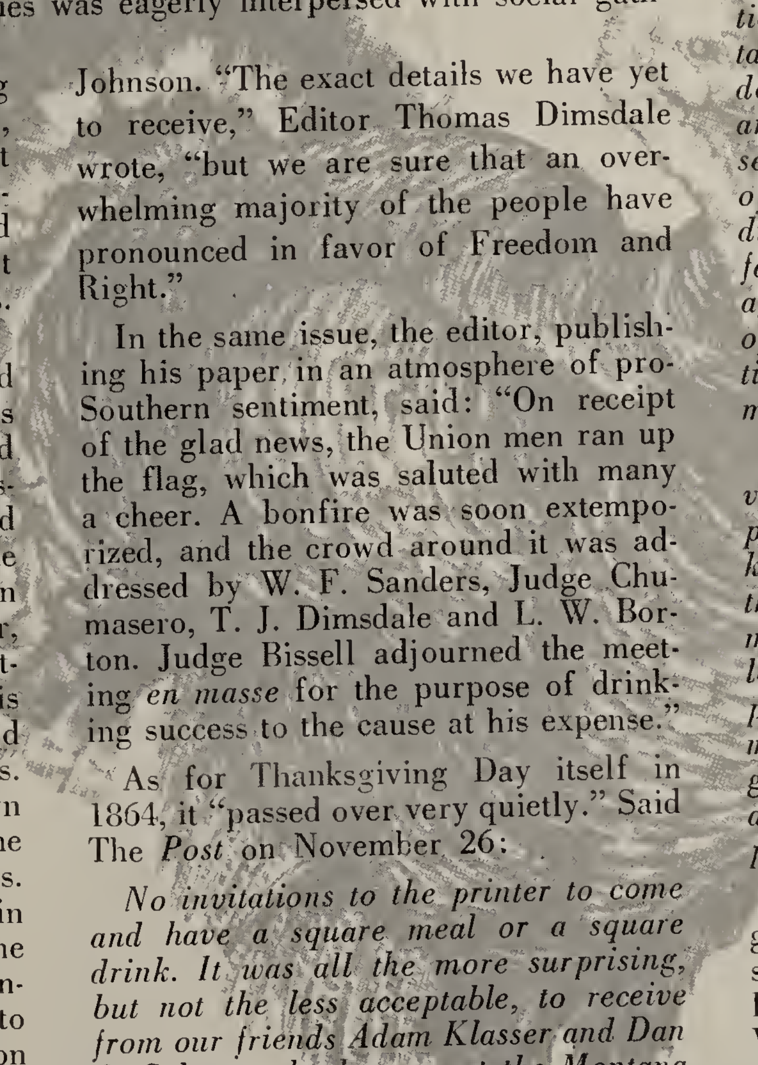
Festive Holiday Tables In Montana Reflect A Frenetic Past

DINNER TABLES, laden with as much food as the market or the hunt would permit, and lined with as many guests as seating and bounty would allow, have always been a part of the Thanksgiving season in Montana. A look at newspapers and other sources in the Historical Society Library shows that circumstances and the mood of the nation and territory or state were usually reflected in these celebrations. Quite honestly, there was not always too much for which to be thankful in the first frenetic days of Territoryhood and Statehood, despite proclamations issued by presidents and governors. But whenever there was cause or occasion, humdrum life in the mines or on the prairies was eagerly interpersed with social gatherings, most of them involving food.



One of the weirdest Thanksgiving tables ever set in Montana was in 1863, before Territoryhood was achieved. At Bannack on November 26, 1863, a dinner made sumptuous with turkey and wines freighted all the way from Salt Lake City, was hosted by Mr. and Mrs. Henry Plummer.

The smooth-talking and cold-blooded leader of the murderous road agents was playing his role to the hilt: he had been elected sheriff of the Bannack district on May 24 of that year and he had shortly thereafter married a respectable girl whom he had met at Sun River in 1862. At this Thanksgiving dinner, Plummer believed he was still respectable in the eyes of his bride and of his improbable guests: Chief Justice and Mrs. Sidney Edgerton and Col. and Mrs. W. F. Sanders. But suspicion had grown in the mind of Sanders, soon to become prosecutor for the Vigilantes, and Mrs. Plummer would leave her husband in disillusionment. Indeed, on the day he sat at the head of his festive board, Henry Plummer had only 45 more days to live: he died whimpering in terror on January 10, 1864 on gallows he had officially erected for the speedy dispatch of other men.

But there was cause for celebration in Virginia City as Thanksgiving, 1864, rolled around. In its issue of November 26, the strongly Unionist Montana Post announced that telegraphic confirmation had arrived of the election of Abraham Lincoln and his running mate, Andrew Johnson. "The exact details we have yet to receive," Editor Thomas Dimsdale wrote, "but we are sure that an overwhelming majority of the people have pronounced in favor of Freedom and Right."

In the same issue, the editor, publishing his paper in an atmosphere of pro-Southern sentiment, said: "On receipt of the glad news, the Union men ran up the flag, which was saluted with many a cheer. A bonfire was soon extemporized, and the crowd around it was addressed by W. F. Sanders, Judge Chumasero, T. J. Dimsdale and L. W. Borton. Judge Bissell adjourned the meeting en masse for the purpose of drinking success to the cause at his expense."

As for Thanksgiving Day itself in 1864, it "passed over very quietly." Said The Post on November 26:

> No invitations to the printer to come and have a square meal or a square drink. It was all the more surprising, but not the less acceptable, to receive from our friends Adam Klasser and Dan C. Coleman, barkeepers at the Montana Billiard Hall, a token in the shape of a gallon or so of Egg-nog and a huge pound cake. Adam and Dan, you are bricks, and will make your fortune, for you remember the printers. Long may you wave!

Editor Dimsdale, a former English school teacher whose benign appearance belied a courageous soul, used his editorial columns to plead many causes—among them the story of Vigilante action and what he believed to be its justification, and the cause of educating the young. Headed with the word EDUCATION, one editorial of November 26, 1864, said, in part:

> Scholarship . . . is but a small part of education. Principle and a determination to do right, at all costs, must be taught at home: and here is the breakdown. Foolishly fond of their children, and generally ignorant of the way to set about training them, the young hope of the household is petted, coaxed, candied, dressed, drugged, and obeyed by father and mother, until, at the mature age of eight or nine, he evinces his sense of importance due to his exalted position by deriding the authority of the mother who bore him.
> . . . In the premature and forced development of body . . . ignorant and impudent smartness [is substituted] for knowledge and self-reliance, and but for the direct interference of Providence, it must make, instead of a man, a two-legged, impudent pretender, with a superficial acquaintance perhaps with almost everything, evil especially and good accidentally, living for himself alone and dying without thought or practical knowledge of a future state. . .

One hundred years ago this Thanksgiving, in 1865, the nation was still staggered by the murder of its President. Lincoln's successor, struggling in the White House, issued a proclamation designating the first Thursday in December as Thanksgiving Day. Andrew Johnson, with chaos and rumors of impeachment surrounding him, urged "the whole people to make confession of our national sin against His infinite goodness, and with one heart and one mind implore Divine guidance in the way of national virtue and holiness." The Montana Post, in announcing the day, added that "No previous proclamation ever fixed a day when there were greater reasons for both giving thanks and asking forgiveness."

Then the editor appended a letter which a Virginia City citizen had handed him just as the issue of December 2, 1865, was going to press. It read:

Let us respond to the call with one accord. Suspend all business, and let Virginia City enjoy one day of quiet, peaceful jubilee. Let these mountain tops join in the glorious anthem of national praise, and echo back the majestic stanza as it rolls on from our distant homes in the East. We owe it to our Government, to our brave soldiers, to ourselves, and especially to Almighty God, for His deliverance from the horrors of a civil war, and for his innumerable blessings to us in our mountain home. He has given us vast treasures in silver and gold, and crowned, us with prosperity and plenty. There will be union services in the Church on Idaho Street at 11 o'clock A.M. The invitation is "come." Fill the house and "let all the people praise Him."

A week later the Montana Post reported that the day was indeed observed appropriately "if we may judge from the amount of culinary and festive preparations." The editor continued: Sleighs were gliding merrily through the streets all day. Acquaintances hob-nobbed merrily at the different bars, and at the Governor's office a singing party executed quite a variety of national and other pieces of music . . . while in many a lonely cabin and sequestered dell, the memories of other days were recalled, and prayers were offered for the happiness of the loved ones at home.

Formal Dinner at Thomas Cruse Home . . .

Montana's entry into Statehood in 1889 was cause for celebration, but its blessings were mixed. Politics were incredibly divisive and bitter: there were two Houses in the first state legislature —one Democratic and one Republican —and the seating of the first U.S. Senators was fraught with charges and countercharges of graft and collusion.

The staunchly Republican Helena Herald noted in its issue of November 8, 1890, that this day was the first anniversary of statehood:

. . . Owing to the unfortunate political divisions and animosities that attended and succeeded our acquistion of state sovereignty, the event has never been generally celebrated and our people are in no better humor to celebrate it today than when it was first announced. On many accounts it is to be regretted, for in reality it is the greatest event in our history. Future generations will never cease to wonder at the apparent apathy with which our people received the news of our political enfranchisement, that party strife could obscure even for a time the recognition of the grand patrimony assured us for a perpetual possession. . .

The Herald, in its issue of November 11, printed the proclamation of President Benjamin Harrison designating Thursday, November 27, as Thanksgiving Day in 1890. It then followed with the words of Governor Joseph K. Toole's proclamation, which read, in part:

Therefore I, Joseph K. Toole, Governor of the State of Montana, do hereby direct public attention to the proclamation of the chief magistrate of this republic and earnestly urge them to suspend all labor upon that day and at their homes and places of worship acknowledge their gratitude to Almighty God for the blessings of liberty, the advantages of a state government, the continuance of life, and generally for all the blessings vouchsafed unto us. On that day let the rich remember the poor, the strong help the weak, and the citizen entertain the stranger. . .

And Editor R. E. Fisk of The Herald, in his issue of November 26, although embittered with the sweeping Democratic victories in the elections of 1890, editorialized: "Nobody need eat crow on this day, unless they prefer it to turkey."

Montana Post Awarded National Recognition

The National Federation of Press Women, at its 1965 convention in San Diego, awarded a first place national honor award to this publication, compiled and edited by Vivian A. Paladin. The organization gave a similar award last year to MONTANA the Magazine of Western History, of which Mrs. Paladin is associate editor.

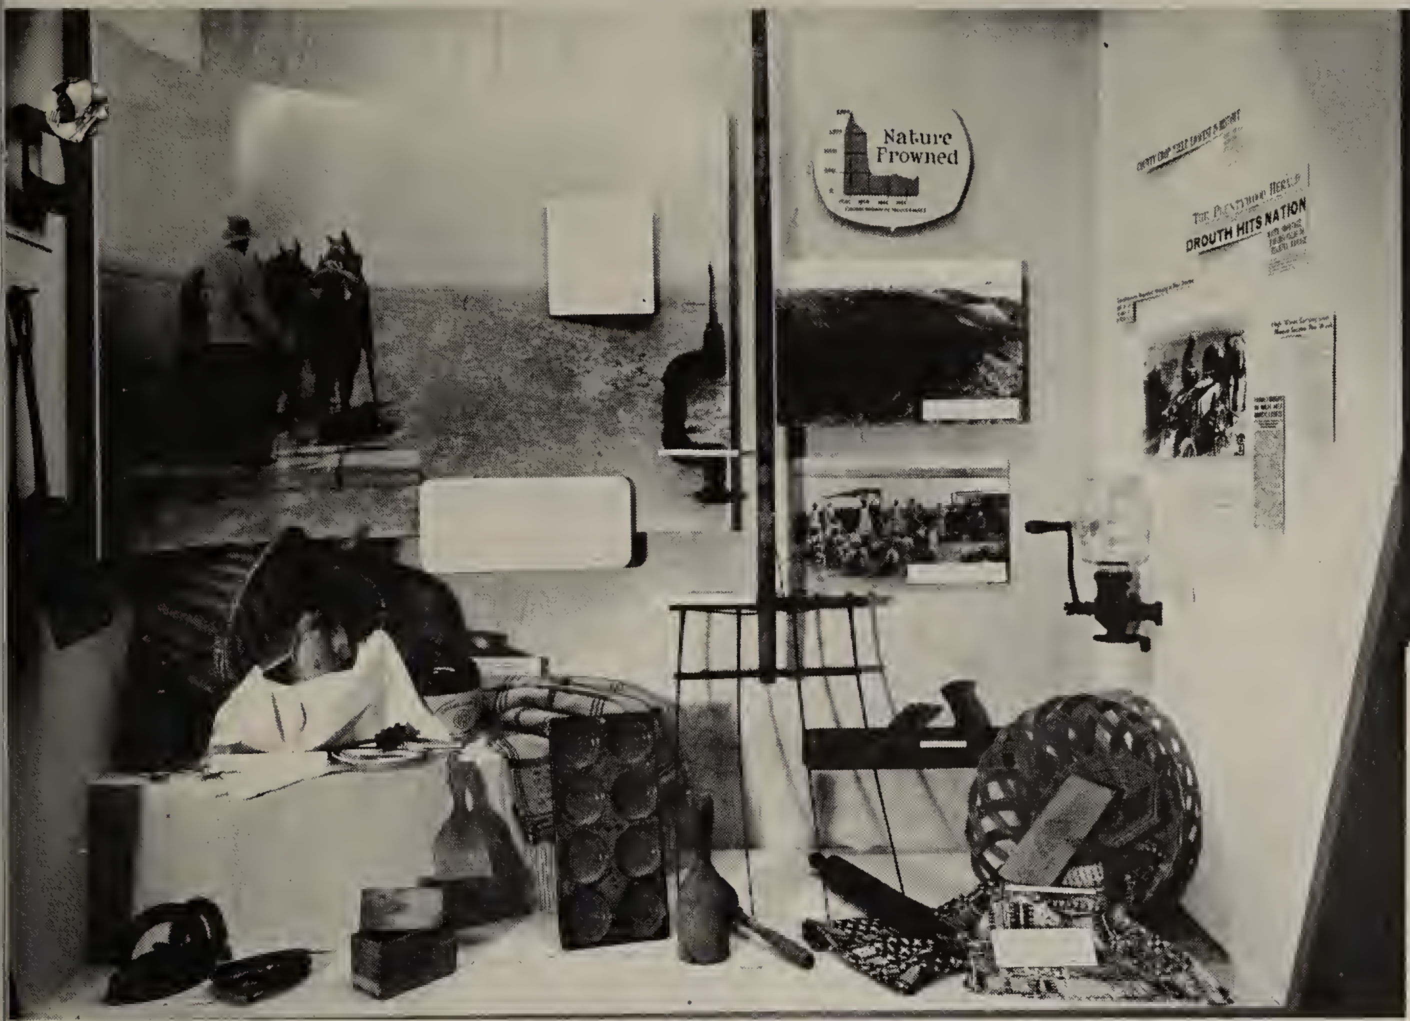
Three Significant Cases Completed For Our Frontier Museum



MODERN AGRICULTURE

THREE MAJOR CASES have been completed for the Frontier Museum, including the final two displays in the Homesteaders Frontier. There are now five separate units which tell the story of Montana agriculture, from the earliest cultivations at Fort Union and St. Mary's Mission to the story of modern agriculture.

Curator Bob Morgan uses the theme "Nature Frowned" in the case which depicts the day of disillusionment for the homesteader—when he found he had plowed up land better left to native grasses, when murderous winds blew away his top soil and left his acres looking like a sandy desert, when only an occasional picnic with a far-away neighbor broke the months of loneliness and worry. The case is completed with the use of many authentic homesteader items, all of them authentic and all reflecting the ingenuity and "make-do" qualities of those who stuck it out.

In the final case, "Modern Agriculture," an original painting by Saturday Evening Post artist John Clymer is used to depict the sheep industry in the Gallatin Valley. Other pictures and text explain how modern machinery, electrification, crop rotation, and strip farming have contributed to the present-day health of Montana agriculture.

At the right is Morgan's newly designed case for the Mining Frontier, depicting the days of placer gold mining, when the Territory gave up millions in the yellow metal as it ran free in the gulches. Such items as gold scales, a pick and shovel, and a gold pan which belonged to Henry Edgar, one of the discoverers of Alder Gulch (Virginia City), help tell the story.

With the use of 60 miniature gold pans, the gold collection of A. W. T. Anderson makes a striking display in the foreground. Specimens of gold from more than 50 Montana gulches are contained in the tiny pans, all of them labeled.

Some of the first gold nuggets ever taken from Helena's Last Chance Gulch are also in the new display case: two nuggets, found by Britisher Reginald Stanley, one of the mis-named Four Georgians who made the fabulous strike in the Summer of 1864. Stanley, who returned to his home in England, had the nuggets made into a brooch for his wife. It recently came to the Society through the generosity of his daughter.

Contributions, Index Will Be Reprinted; Montana Magazine Bound Volumes Guaranteed for Delivery November 30

As we go to press, we are advised that all 10 volumes of the Contributions to the Montana Historical Society will be available in reprint form by March, 1966 or sooner. These hardcover volumes, most of which have been out of print for many years, are one of the most sought-after items among historians and collectors. Published over a period of years from 1876 through 1940, these contain the choicest source material which came to the Society over the years from people who were conscious of the need for its preservation. In effect, these volumes are the raw material of Montana history—original journals, biographies of pioneers, diaries of earliest trading posts, and many others. We invite your inquiry immediately. And if there is someone on your Christmas list who is especially interested in Montana history, we are arranging a special gift certificate. If your order reaches us before December 31, there will be a saving of $25.00 for the set.

We should add, parenthetically, that plans are now being formulated to publish an index to the Contributions, a research tool for which we receive as many requests as we do for reprints of the volumes themselves. It is our hope that technical details can be worked out in order that we may publish the index along with the ten volumes. We will keep you posted.

Another important reprint matter at hand: some months ago, we announced the availability of reprints of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY in the form of bound volumes for the years 1951 through 1958. Regrettably, delay at the printer's has prevented us from filling orders, and the last announced mid-October deadline has passed. A phone call as we go to press now confirms delivery by November 30. Those of you who have ordered the set may soon expect delivery. And we wish to tell you who have not that the entire set of eight volumes is priced at $105.00. Individual volumes (one volume for each of the eight years) will sell for $15 each.

Incidentally the long delay at the reprint company (Johnson Reprint of New York) has been occasioned because high quality has been the aim. When the volumes reach you, they will be the finest reproduction now possible with modern duplication techniques.

Western History Conference Draws Hundreds to Historic Helena

Days at the Montana Historical Society are filled these autumn weeks with plans for a major event: the Fifth Annual Conference of the Western History Association to be held this month in our historic town. As host institution, we look forward to greeting more than 300 of the country's most knowledgeable people—historians, publishers, scholars, collectors and aficionados—in the field of Western History.

Registration will begin at the venerable old Placer Hotel on Wednesday, Oct. 13, and organizational business will be getting underway. Formal sessions will begin Thursday morning and continue through Saturday, Oct. 16. Fourteen major subjects will be discussed and explored. There will be special speakers at the planned luncheons, dinners and informal gatherings.

We think it is altogether fitting that this distinguished group meet on Last Chance Gulch. And we think the readers of THE MONTANA POST will be interested in some of the highlights. Needless to say, as many of you as possible are welcome to come and listen in—but please clear with us first on housing, because it's getting really tight.

The great journey of discovery of Lewis and Clark will constitute the first subject for discussion, at 9:15 Thursday morning at the Placer's ballroom. Abraham Nasatir of San Diego State College, noted authority on the subject, will be chairman, and commentary will be by John Loos of Louisiana State University and Richard H. Dillon of San Francisco's Sutro Library, both of whom have extensively researched and written about Lewis and Clark.

The route of the explorers after the passage of 160 years will be the subject of a paper read by Roy E. Appleman of the National Park Service. The vast changes wrought along the Missouri as well as the Columbia and Snake river systems by modern hydroelectric power plants, dams and the action of the rivers themselves will be described. Mr. Appleman will explore as well the overland parts of the route, with special attention to Lemhi Pass on the Continental Divide, the crossing of the mountains from the Salmon to the Bitterroot Valley, and the Lolo Trail across the Bitterroots.

The image of the two explorers in the public mind after more than a century and a half will be the subject of Donald Jackson, editor for the University of Illinois Press. The moment Lewis and Clark returned from their journey in 1806, their "public image" began to take shape. Mr. Jackson will analyze the growth and nature of the image as it has been reflected through the years in books and other mass media. One of his main concerns is the difference between the public image of the co-captains and other notable figures in the history of the American West.

Aviation on the frontier will be another topic up for discussion Thursday morning (at 10:45), and this one will be held in the Historical Society building. We have a particular interest in this one, too, because one of the papers, on "Montana and the Sky," will be read by Frank W. Wiley, veteran Montana pilot who has recently completed his able book-length study of the subject, researched and written here and due for publication soon under the auspices of the Montana Aeronautics Commission and our institution.

The aviation discussion will be chaired by Donald R. Whitnah of the State College of Iowa, and comment will be by Tom Croson of West Coast Airlines and author Ernest K. Gann of Sausalito, Calif. Lee Scamehorn of the University of Colorado will read a paper titled "Air Transportation in the Mountain West."

The third subject for Thursday morning will be chaired by Gloria G. Cline of Sacramento State College on the subject "Spanish Borderlands." Ted J. Warner of Brigham Young University will discuss the 1726 inspection visit to the Santa Fe Presidio by Don Pedro de Rivera in which he found evidences of graft and wrong-doing in New Spain which he promptly reported to Mexico City. Warner's paper points up the inability of the Spanish crown and its agencies in Mexico to impose effective control over dominions in the future Southwestern United States.

The discussion of Spanish domination of this area will also include a paper on Yuman-Mexican relations from 1821 to 1848, read by Jack D. Forbes of the University of Nevada, and "The Buffalo Soldiers in the Victorio Campaign, 1877 to 1880," by William H. Leckie of the University of Toledo. Harris G. Warren of Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, will provide the commentary.

The first conference luncheon is slated for Thursday noon, with Oscar O. Winther of Indiana University program chairman. Speaker will be Leslie A. Fiedler, formerly of the University of Montana and now on the faculty of the Buffalo branch, State University of New York. A provocative writer and speaker, Dr. Fiedler's subject will be "Back in Montana."

A museum roundtable is scheduled for Thursday afternoon at the Placer, with Mitchell A. Wilder, well-known Director of the Amon Carter Museum of Western Art in Fort Worth, Texas, as chairman. A panel discussion of the obligations and challenges which face the modern museum technician and administrator will be heard. The participants: Beaumont Newhall of George Eastman House, Rochester, N.Y.; Ruth Mahood of the Los Angeles County Museum of History and Science; Lawrence Fleischman of the Archives of American Art, Tombstone, Ariz., and James Taylor Forrest of the Bradford-Brinton

Memorial Ranch Museum, Big Horn, Wyoming.

Science and exploration in the West will be the final subject for Thursday afternoon, with Robert C. Cotner of the University of Texas as chairman. T. H. McDonald of Arlington (Texas) State College will discuss the exploration of the Canadian Northwest in 1789 by the remarkable and little-known Scotsman, Sir Alexander McKenzie. Scientific explorations by the Russians in America will be the subject of Morgan Sherwood of the University of California at Davis, while John Duffy of Tulane University will read a paper on medical practices among Western Indians. Comment will be by William T. Hagan of State University College, Fredonia, N.Y., and Richard A. Bartlett of Florida State University.

John Quigley's unique Frontier Town atop McDonald Pass west of Helena will be the scene of an informal Western fun-time Thursday evening, hosted by Yale University Press, American Heritage Publishing company, and the Montana Stockgrowers Association.

Formal sessions will resume at 9:15 Friday morning at the Placer, with "Oil: Western Titan" and "Reviewing Western Americana" as subjects. The discussion of oil will be chaired by John S. Spratt of Southern Methodist University, with Kenneth W. Porter of the University of Oregon as commentator. Papers will be read by Mody Boatright of the University of Texas on oil folklore, and George T. White of San Francisco State College on the famed Silliman controversy which rocked the scientific world for more than a decade and had a profound effect on the oil and geological exploration of the Southwest.

Arthur H. Clark, Jr. of the Glendale, Calif. publishing firm which bears his name will be chairman of the discussion devoted to reviewing and appraising books on Western Americana. Dwight L. Smith of Miami University (Ohio) will discuss the book review as "a sometime thing," and will point out its importance as a device whereby busy historians and laymen may digest the flood of books currently appearing.

Reviewing Western books will also be discussed by Donald E. Worcester of Texas Christian University, and commentary will be by Wilbur R. Jacobs of the University of California, Santa Barbara.

Minorities in the West will be another complex and worthy subject for discussion Friday morning. Andrew F. Rolle of Occidental College in Los Angeles will be chairman. Comment will be furnished by Theodore Saloutos of the University of California, Los Angeles. Papers will be read by Moses Rischin of San Francisco State College on "Beyond the Great Divide: Immigration and the Last Frontier;" Roger Daniels of the University of California, Los Angeles, on "Westerners from the East: Oriental Immigrants Reappraised," and Manuel Servin of the University of Southern California on "The Postwar Mexican-American: A Nonachieving Minority."

The role of the regular Army and the volunteers and rangers in the Indian Wars will be discussed Friday morning, with Robert M. Utley of the National Park Service as chairman. Don Rickey, Jr., also of the Park Service, will read a paper on the Indian fighting record of the Negro regiments from 1866 to 1891. William J. Hughes of Mankato State College will discuss the frontier defense role of the rangers. Commentary will be by Andrew Wallace of the Arizona Pioneer Historical Society.

"The Celluloid West: A Dude's View of the Phony Frontier of Filmland" will be the subject of an address by John Alexander Carroll of Texas Christian University at the Phi Alpha Theta luncheon scheduled for Friday noon. Joe B. Frantz head of the history department, University of Texas, will be chairman.

J. K. Ralston of Billings and Nick Eggenhofer of Cody, Wyo., two of the West's most successful Western and historical artists, will be featured in a Friday afternoon discussion of "Painting the Frontier West," to be held at the Society building at 2:45. Both artists will display the paintings which they will discuss: Ralston, his newest work, done for the Historical Society on the strategic crossing of the Yellowstone in 1864 by the punitive Sully Expedition, and Eggenhofer his carefully researched and detailed "Mule Team, 1860." Chairman for the discussion will be William G. Bell of the Office of the Chief of Military History, Department of the Army. Comment will be by Eugene Kingman of Omaha's Joslyn Art Museum.

Western politics in the 20th Century will be the topic for the second Friday afternoon discussion, with A. Ray Stephens of North Texas State University as chairman. Richard Lowitt of Connecticut College, New London, will read a paper on the 1918 Nebraska Senatorial campaign of famed rebel George W. Norris. Alf Landon, the Kansan who opposed the rising tide of Franklin D. Roosevelt, will be the subject of Donald R. McCoy of the University of Kansas. Wilbur S. Shepperson of the University of Nevada will discuss the unique career of Socialist Job Harriman whose cooperative colony attracted nationwide attention in 1916. Comment will be by Richard T. Ruetten of San Diego State College.

The conference will hold its annual business meeting late Thursday afternoon. Robert G. Athearn of the University of Colorado, who has served as 1965 president, will chair the meeting, during which new officers will be elected. The Historical Society will be hosts at an informal gathering immediately before the annual banquet, at which Dr. Athearn will also preside. The banquet speaker will be David Lavender of Ojai, Calif., whose subject will be the responsibilities of popularizing Western history. He will be introduced by Ray Allen Billington of the Huntington Library, San Marino, Calif.

Mining in the West will be the first topic for discussion Saturday morning, with Rodman W. Paul of California Institute of Technology as chairman. K. Ross Toole, our former director and now on the history faculty of the University of Montana, will read a paper on "Butte: A Study of Violence." Clark C. Spence of the University of Illinois will have as his subject "Geologists, Mining Engineers, and the Law." Commentary will be provided by Merle W. Wells of Idaho Historical Society and John W. Hakola of the University of Maine.

Labor troubles in the Northwest will be another subject for Saturday morning, with Norman Clark of Everett (Wash.) Junior College discussing the "Bloody Sunday" massacre in Everett in 1916 and its I.W.W. involvement. J. M. McClelland of the Longview, Wash., Daily News will delineate the 1919 labor strife in Centralia, Wash. Robert L. Tyler of Ball State University will give the commentary.

Final subject for conference attention will be religion in the West, with Edwin S. Gaustad of the University of California, Riverside, presiding. The trail of the pioneer Jesuit missionary, Peter DeSmet, will be the subject of W. L. Davis, S. J., of Gonzaga University, Spokane, while "Secularization of Mormon History and Culture" will be discussed by Leonard J. Arrington of Utah State University. John Tracy Ellis of the University of San Francisco and Robert V. Hine of the University of California, Riverside, will comment.

Official closing will be a luncheon Saturday noon, with John Francis Bannon, S. J., of St. Louis University as chairman. The speaker, introduced by Dr. Athearn, will be Douglas Gold, now of Hampton Institute, who spent many years teaching among Montana's Blackfeet Indians and elsewhere in Montana, and whose recent book on the subject has received wide acceptance.

The Western History Association, established in Denver in 1961, has enjoyed a phenomenal success in achieving its goal of promoting the study of the American West in all its aspects. The 1966 and 1967 conferences will be held in El Paso and San Francisco, respectively. As for 1965, we at the Society are doing everything we can to make historic Last Chance Gulch the scene of a challenging and meaningful gathering.

NBC Grappled With "Progress" in Making Lewis & Clark Film

JULY 3 - AUG. 12, 1806 ~ CLARK'S ROUTE TOOK HIM UP THE BITTERROOT VALLEY, ACROSS THE DIVIDE (GIBBON'S PASS), DOWN TO THE BIG HOLE VALLEY AND THEN TO THE THREE FORKS. AFTER DIVIDING HIS PARTY, CLARK HEADED FOR THE YELLOWSTONE, WHICH HE REACHED ON JULY 15. TWO DUGOUTS WERE CONSTRUCTED AND CLARK'S DETACHMENT BECAME THE FIRST WHITE MEN TO NAVIGATE THE YELLOWSTONE. AN UNEXPLAINABLE STATEMENT IN CLARK'S JOURNAL MENTIONS A GREAT FALL IN THE RIVER, BUT THEN IS CROSSED OUT. THERE HAD BEEN NO MENTION OF THE YELLOWSTONE FALLS IN ANY OF THE PREVIOUS NOTES AND CLARK HAD MET NO INDIANS TO TELL HIM OF THE EXISTENCE OF ANY.

LEWIS CAME DOWN THE MISSOURI AND JOINED CLARK AT THE MOUTH OF THE YELLOWSTONE ON AUG. 12.

An informative, sometimes caustic, commentary on the changes along the Lewis and Clark route during the more than century and a half since the journey of discovery is contained in an article by Ted Yates, director of the National Broadcasting company's one-hour documentary film produced last year. It was a project in which the Historical Society experienced a number of weeks of interested involvement.

Yates, whose full article will appear soon in The American West, published by the Western History Association (whose meeting this month in Helena is the subject of our lead article), deplores the devastation of "progress" along the route taken by the expedition.

"It was four in the afternoon and raining," Yates begins. "An old man on the shore shouted three cheers. One rifle was discharged. The Lewis and Clark Expedition was on its way westward. This was in 1804. One hundred sixty years, four months and eight days later, we made the same trip. It was raining, too, when we set out. But there the similarity ended. There was not a cheer or a rifle shot. There was only the glum voice from the rainswept airport announcing further flight delays."

The greatest challenge which the production crew faced, Yates points out, was civilization. "This was our problem," he wrote, "to find parts and pieces of the great and beautiful America they wrote of and explored. We followed the Missouri River west nearly 2,000 miles before we came upon remnants of the land they saw. . .

"Fort Benton, Montana, was to our expedition what Camp Woods was to the Lewis and Clark Expedition," Yates continues. "It was here that we assembled for our river trip, developed discipline and coordination. The previous winter we had filmed blizzards and ice floes in Wyoming and scenes at the winter-swept Mandan Villages of Bismarck, N. Dak. . .

"Fort Benton is in its own right a historic town. It was here that the adventurous steamboats that traveled the Missouri in the 1870's ended their trip. The levee, old stores, the great Grand Union Hotel, forerunner of the Hilton, still stand, carefully preserved and enjoyed by the citizens, as do the adobe walls of the old fort. Fort Benton has a conscience for history that is admirable. . ."

It was at this point that the Historical Society was able to lend a hand toward authenticity. Yates describes how Director Kennedy was able to arrange for the crew's use of the keelboat Mandan, an authentic 60-foot replica built for the filming of The Big Sky, a motion picture based on the book by A. B. Guthrie, Jr. It had been on display for a number of years in back of our building. The principal problem was that the keelboat didn't float!

"After some discussion with Mike Kennedy, we decided the only way to make it seaworthy was to pack the hull with styrofoam, a highly bouyant plastic," Yates writes. "This done, the Montana Highway Department winched and derricked the craft onto one of their enormous trucks and moved it across the mountains and around hairpin turns. The only hitch was that they also dropped the boat when they unloaded it at Fort Benton, cracking it in half."

Yates gives credit to Bob Leinert, who operates a Fort Benton garage, for repair of the Mandan as well as the construction of two pirrogues and six dugout canoes to complete the Lewis and Clark fleet. Used in the film as well was a vast inventory of authentic equipment, much of it from the Historical Society collection. Items included Harpers Ferry rifles, glauber salt, a sextant, air gun, instruments for bleeding the sick, trade goods, carrots of tobacco, swivel guns, knives, beads, fishing hooks, powder and shot, whiskey, buckskins, moccasins, military uniforms of the day, and many others.

At many places along the way, Yates explained, his crew was able to mask out the signs of civilization and capture the real raw beauty of the country with the judicious placing of sage and juniper bushes. In other cases, as with the beautiful Bitterroot Mountains, care had to be taken to avoid photographing logging operations and the scars of bulldozed roads.

Describing how the NBC crew reached the Pacific, just as had Lewis and Clark, Yates ends his article by saying: "It was clear to us all that Lewis and Clark had done the impossible. We also felt that we had to a degree, done the impossible. We had reconstructed America to look the way many of us dream it looks. But despite our success, we all felt a great sadness because in a sense we had added to the delusion and helped to sustain the myth that our country is, from sea to shining sea, a spectacle of beauty, of love and of care, instead of a debacle of neglect and abuse."

JUNE 21 - JULY 15, 1805 ~ THE EXPEDITION'S PORTAGE AROUND THE GREAT FALLS WAS A PERIOD OF HARD WORK. CRUDE TRUCK FRAMES WERE CONSTRUCTED TO HAUL THE DUGOUTS AND GEAR OVER A DISTANCE OF 18 MILES. THE MEN PUT ALL THEIR EFFORT INTO THIS LABORIOUS TASK OF HAULING TREMENDOUS LOADS OVER CACTUS COVERED TERRAIN. SUDDEN RAIN AND HAIL STORMS ADDED TO THEIR MISERY.

JUNE 13, 1805 ~ AFTER DISPERSING SEVERAL MEMBERS OF HIS PARTY TO HUNT FOR MEAT, CAPTAIN LEWIS PROCEEDED ALONE ALONG THE RIVER. GRADUALLY THE SOUND OF FALLING WATER AND THEN THE SIGHT OF SPRAY, RISING LIKE A GREAT COLUMN OF SMOKE, GREETED HIM. HE TOOK A POSITION ON ROCKS SOME 20 FEET HIGH OPPOSITE THE CENTER OF THE FALLS AND WROTE DOWN HIS IMPRESSIONS OF THE GRAND VIEW BEFORE HIS EYES. LEWIS WAS NOT SATISFIED WITH HIS WRITTEN DESCRIPTION OF THE GREAT FALLS OF THE MISSOURI. WORDS SEEMED INADEQUATE IN PICTURING THE SPECTACULAR SIGHT.

Exciting Addition to Our Indian Collection

An Indian dress made of ancient red trade cloth and decorated with more than 800 polished elk teeth, has been received by the Society on indefinite loan from Scott Leavitt of Newberg, Ore., veteran Forest Service official and a Congressman from Montana during the decade 1923-1933.

The unique dress, known to be at least a century old, was presented to Mrs. Leavitt in November, 1931, in an elaborate ceremony at Crow Agency. Presentation was made by Chief Plenty Coups, who was then 82 years old and the venerated head of his tribe. The chief adopted Mrs. Leavitt into the tribe on that day, naming her "Comes to the Buffalo."

A small handmade Indian doll, also included in the loan, was given to Mrs. Leavitt the same day by Mary One Goose, president of the Crow Indian Womens club. The dress, which has an actual monetary value of several thousand dollars because of the market price today of elk teeth, is even more valuable because of its age and the fact that every seam is hand-done in sinew.

Scott Leavitt, who now lives in retirment in Newberg, was born at Elk Rapids, Mich. in 1879. He served overseas during the Spanish-American War, and upon his return attended the University of Michigan. In 1901 he went to Oregon and homesteaded in the Coast Range Mountains near Falls City. For several years he served as a school principal in various Oregon towns, and in 1905 began a long career in the U. S. Forest Service. He became supervisor of the Superior National Forest in Minnesota in 1909, and held a similar position in the Lewis and Clark National Forest near Helena from 1910 to 1913. He spent the next four years in the Jefferson National Forest, and during World War I served as director of the U.S. Employment Service and the Public Service Reserve in Montana. Mr. Leavitt was elected to Congress from Montana's Second District in 1923, and served continuously until March 3, 1933. He was particularly interested in Indian and Interior Department affairs.

100 Years of Back-to-School Days in Montana's Golden Autumns

ALTHOUGH school bells ring in Montana nowadays in the warm and sunny final days of August, the new school term is seriously underway in September. It has been so for more than 100 years now. Montana Territory's Organic Act of 1864 provided that "when the lands in said territory shall be surveyed, under the direction of the government of the United States, preparatory to bringing the same into market, sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in each township . . . shall be reserved for the purpose of being applied to schools. . ."

The provision was supplemented by an act approved February 7, 1865, providing for the establishment and support of public schools in Montana Territory. The opening of the first common school organized under the new laws was announced in the February 3, 1866, issue of The Montana Post of Virginia City. "In the absence of a suitable building exclusively devoted to school purposes," the editor said, "we understand that the Baptist Church will be used for that purpose until a regular new house can be erected."

Only a month later, pupils of Professor Heard's class were ready to make a public demonstration of their accomplishments. Professor Thomas Dimsdale, the well-educated Englishman who had established a private school in Virginia City in 1863 and was the Post's first editor in 1864, made a short speech at the end of the program in which he stressed the "importance of education in a free Republic, the necessity for high-toned moral training, and the expediency of educating boys and girls together."

An editorial comment, so timely in 1965 that its contents are almost electrifying, was quoted in the March 17, 1866, issue of the Virginia City paper. It was taken from a publication called The Right Way, and was headed with the words THE FREEDMEN:

The true problem remains, not how to remove the colored man from his present field of labor, but how to make him, where he is, a true freeman and an intelligent and useful citizen. The means are simple: protection by the Government until his political and social status enables him to protect himself; offering to his legitimate ambition the stimulus of a perfectly fair chance in life, and granting to him the rights, which, in every just organization of society, are coupled with corresponding duties.

Montana Territory conducted its first school census during the school year of 1867 and 1868. It showed that 1,359 children were of school age and only half of them enrolled. The percentage of enrollment gradually rose until 1879, when records showed that 72 percent of the 5,885 children listed in the census were going to school. In 1885, some 10,000 Montana children were attending school regularly.

It was in September, 1883, that Helena opened a college of business. Said the Weekly Herald: "Two prominent instructors, H. T. Engelhorn and E. O. Railsback, have opened up in Helena a school for practical business instruction and promise to give a course of teaching equal to any of the Eastern Commercial Colleges."

According to Supt. of Public Instruction Cornelius Hedges, the Territory was paying "relatively high wages" to attract teachers from other states in 1883 and 1884. The average of teachers' wages for all grades, per month, was $60! The Helena Weekly Herald deplored the fact, however, that the new railroads refused to grant lower fares by which teachers could attend a meeting of the Teachers' Territorial Association in September, 1883, held in Deer Lodge. Said the editor:

Considering that these Teachers Associations do volunteer work for public good by a class that generally does the hardest work for the least pay, we think they deserve encouragement and some consideration from the great corporations whose success will depend in a great measure on the intelligence of the people.

By 1884, there was public concern for educating not only the white children of appropriate age, but Indians as well. In its issue of August 31, the Helena Daily Independent announced that Major Allen, Indian Agent for the Blackfeet, had received orders from Washington to "forward 50 Piegan Indian children (25 boys and 25 girls) to St. Ignatius Mission to be educated." A similar order was expected at Belknap Agency. These were the first Indian children of Montana ever sent away from their tribal reservations to attend school.

The Independent may have been in favor of educating Indian children, but the education of Sitting Bull in the white man's world evinced a stinging editorial in the issue of September 7, 1884:

Sitting Bull is carried about the country as a show, and the Government permits it because it would educate the old reprobate. The telegraph brought us word that an attempt was made to kill the grim old murderer. The would-be assassin doubtless obeyed an impulse that fills every honest patriotic heart with indignation at the mere mention of his name. Why should Sitting Bull more than other murderers and thieves be a pet of the Government, be educated, be lionized? Such treatment will only educate other Indians to become murderers and horse thieves.

Illinois Man Recalls And a Bearded Man

RECENTLY we received a letter and a photograph of "Grandfather Jones" from a former Helena resident, Donald Sidney Lorenz Bradford, who now lives in Glencoe, Ill. Mr. Bradford recalls life in Helena in the 1890's and a few years after the turn of the century. The picture and Mr. Bradford's letter so intrigued so that we did a bit of digging. With the help of Helena Lodge No. 3, A. F. & A. M., of which Mr. Jones and his son, Francis D., were members, we found that "Grandfather Jones" was quite a man, indeed!

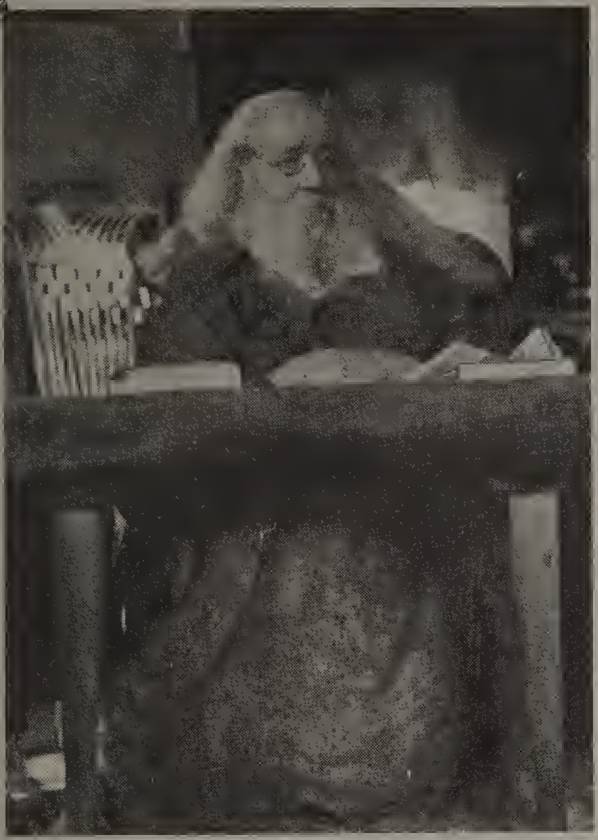
Samuel Jackson Jones was born in Dublin, Ireland on Jan. 29, 1822. He came to New York as a young man, then lived briefly in New Orleans and in Cuba. In 1850 he went to California via the Isthmus, and after a short time in the mercantile business in Marysville, became head of the financial department of Wells-Fargo company. He handled Wells-Fargo bullion shipments in the days of California's gold rush, and was a member of the Vigilantes of that turbulent state.

In 1857, S. J. Jones went to London to spend a decade in the wholesale importation of coffee, sugar and cigars. In 1858 he married Sarah Vredenburg Doremus of New York, and their only son, Francis Doremus Jones, was born in England on Aug. 20, 1860. About 1868 the family returned to this country, and Samuel spent two years as a southern planter near Richmond, Va.

Early in 1871, Jones received an unusual offer: the father of the future President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, and several other prominent New Yorkers became interested in Montana mining. They formed the National Mining and Exploration company and began operation of the Whitlatch Union mine at Unionville, two miles up the gulch from Helena. Samuel Jones assumed charge of operations, and although activity ceased in 1876, Jones remained an agent of the company until his death on Dec. 28, 1902.

Grandfather continued his active life, serving as chief of records during the terms of four U.S. Surveyors General, stationed in Helena. His son, Francis D., was a graduate engineer. Helena city directories list him through the years as chief draftsman in the Surveyor General's office. "Frank" Jones, who died at the age of 85 on July 20, 1946, was one of Montana's most prominent Masons. He and his father were both members of Helena Lodge No. 3, and the younger Jones' Masonic career also included service as Grand Master of Montana Masons, Grand High Priest of

Boyish Days in Helena With a Colorful Past



Royal Arch Masons, and Grand Commandant of Knights Templar.

The Jones home was at 406 N. Ewing in Helena. Mr. Bradford recalls having had dinner there, probably in about 1902, just before Samuel's death. He writes:

"I recall that Grandfather Jones advised Mother to have my ears tied back. They stuck out. But they seem to have corrected themselves. Mother said he was one of the wisest men she ever knew, but made comparatively little use of his wisdom. He had all kinds of prospecting equipment in the basement."

Mr. Bradford, who says he is always known as "Bill," was born in Prickly Pear Valley near Helena in 1893. The family lived on Helena's West Side "not far from Senator Walsh" for 10½ years. His letter continues:

"I recall the night the Montana Club burned. The chef there had been our cook. . . We used to slide down Lawrence Street on sleds which a blacksmith had helped us make. . . My father was Donald Bradford and my mother was Esther Pratt Fox Bradford. . ."

Bill Bradford graduated from the School of Business at the University of Chicago, and his career (he has had three, he writes) has included service with the U.S. Army in supply and ordnance, merchandising in Chicago, and now the life insurance business.

"I have never been back to Helena," his letter concludes. "I recall watering the elephant at the Ringling Circus. And I recall the five caves on the side of Mount Helena. Once I went in and saw two yellow eyes and I did not stop running until I was down the mountain!"

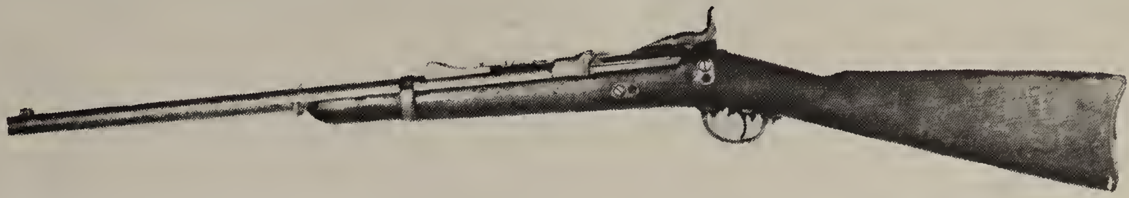
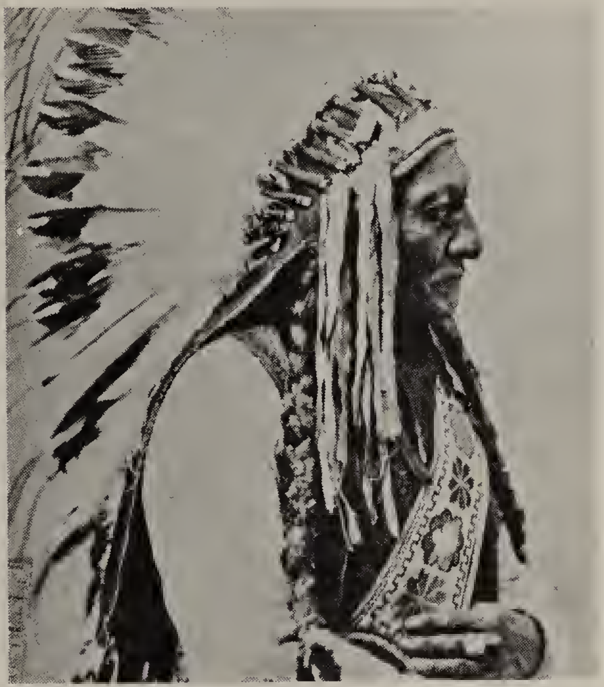
Sitting Bull's Rifle Joins Our Collection Via the Family of a Montana Political Great



A RECENT ACQUISITION of the Historical Society is filled with significance for us and all Americans. It is a 1873 model Springfield Army-issue rifle which belonged to Sitting Bull, one of two rifles seized from the bed of the stubborn old Hunkpapa Sioux when he was arrested at daybreak on a bleak December day in 1890.

Equally significant is the fact that the rifle was given as a permanent gift by the family of the late Joseph M. Dixon, one of Montana's most imposing political figures. The presentation was made by his daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph G. Hills, of Baltimore, Md.



SITTING BULL

Accompanying the Springfield are copies of two affidavits, which not only authenticate it, but contain rich detail of how it came first into the possession of Capt. Isaac P. Baker and later of Mr. Dixon. One instrument, prepared at Bismarck, N. Dak. on Sept. 2, 1924, bears the mark of Red Tomahawk, the Sioux who fired the fatal shot at Sitting Bull as he struggled with Indian police at his cabin at Grand River, S. Dak. in the early morning hours of Dec. 15, 1890. The Springfield was "used and taken in the Custer Massacre," according to the affidavit. A Winchester .44 calibre rifle was also seized from Sitting Bull at the time, and was presented to Capt. Baker in 1924.

"Sitting Bull and his wife were sleeping and had the guns inside their bed," the instrument continues. "Red Tomahawk slipped in and got them and also got a very large knife and a pistol belonging to Sitting Bull. . ."

The second affidavit, dated March 3, 1932, contains substantially the same information, but is headed by a statement from Capt. Baker in which he presented the two guns and the knife to Dixon, at that time first assistant Secretary of the Interior in the Hoover Administration.

One paragraph from the 1932 affidavit contains this information: "Sitting Bull agreed to go to the Agency with Red Tomahawk and Bull Head at daylight, but Sitting Bull's sixteen-year-old son, Crow Foot, rushed up to his father . . . and called him a coward saying that he said he would never surrender to the white man. At this instant instead of signalling to his men not to shoot, Sitting Bull signalled to them to shoot and at that moment Red Tomahawk shot Sitting Bull and during the fight stuck the knife into Sitting Bull. . ."

Joseph M. Dixon, who died only two years after this unique presentation, was born in North Carolina in 1867, and came to Missoula, Montana in 1891. He began studying law and obtained a license to practice in only one year. A brilliant and appealing man, he became a county attorney and state legislator, and in 1903 was elected as Montana's lone congressman in Washington, D. C. He moved to the Senate in 1907. His progressive persuasions cost him Republican party support in 1910, and in 1912 he joined Theodore Roosevelt's Bull Moose party. Beaten for his Senate seat, he became publisher of the Missoulian and engaged in ranching. In 1920, he ran for Governor, emerging after a bitter campaign as Montana's first Republican chief executive since 1896.

Summer Recreation Series Evinces Marysville Memo

IT HAS been a matter of gratification to us that the series on summer recreation published in these pages has brought forth a great deal of reader interest. Mrs. Mary M. Smith of Grafton, Wis. writes that she and her husband, George, particularly enjoyed the pictures of Marysville, used in the July number. Mrs. Smith states that she was born in the fabulous mining town in 1889 and spent "many happy hours skating on the old millpond and meeting the trains." Her letter reads, in part:

"My mother put a stop to us kids meeting the train when we came home one day and told her about the beautiful painted ladies who arrived. Will never forget those feathered hats—to our eyes beautiful! The ladies wended their way down to China town, and I say now it would have been better had Mother told us who they were—we would not have been so curious!"

Young Lady Visitors At Marysville Cyanide Plant

Mrs. Smith added that two of her childhood friends, now living, respectively, in Virginia and Tacoma, Wash., had received copies of the issue from her, and that they have kept in contact through the years. It has been our experience at the Society that people born and reared in colorful Marysville have an unusual nostalgia for the beautifully situated town near Helena. During the 1880's and 1890's, it throbbed with the activity of some 3,000 people. It was Montana's leading gold producer, sparked by Tommy Cruse's fabulous Drummon which gave up some $50 million in gold from its quartz lodes.

OOPSY!

I have just received my MONTANA POST which I enjoy and usually find quite reliable. But in the July issue you have the railroads doing "a thriving excursion business" to Glacier Park some 23 years before there was such a park.

"Shoot, Minnie, Shoot!" Lusty Cry of Unbeaten Indian Girls

A year ago, death came to Nettie Susan Wirth Mail, an Assiniboine Indian who played center on one of the most remarkable girls basketball aggregations ever assembled. The Fort Shaw Girls Basketball squad triumphed again and again between 1902 and 1906, never beaten when they played—as they were trained—by boys rules. Mrs. Mail, who lived in Seattle with a son in later life, was interviewed several years ago by John O. Bye of Seattle, himself a Montana pioneer and a prolific writer. Bye, struck by the keen memory and staunch character of this woman who had been torn from her girlhood home on the Fort Peck Reservation to attend school at Fort Shaw, continued his friendship with her until her death in September, 1964. It was then that he added a postscript to her story—which ended with her burial at Poplar. We feel this warmly written tribute to a woman and to an invincible basketball team of more than 60 years ago is an appropriate feature as another autumn and another season of school and sports competition approaches.

—The Editors

BY JOHN O. BYE

DURING World War I, the 91st Division—represented conspicuously by Montana and Wyoming men—launched a battle cry heard around the world: Powder River! The full cry Powder River, Let'er Buck! is still heard at stampedes and rodeos. But there was another battle cry with a Montana origin. It was Shoot, Minnie, Shoot! and it was sent up by members of the Fort Shaw Indian School girls basketball team which took on all comers and defeated them all just after the turn of this century.

Fort Shaw, some 25 miles north of Great Falls, had been established as a military post on June 30, 1867. It was strategically located to protect early travelers on the Mullan Road and pioneer settlers in the Sun River valley from Blackfeet raiders. It also guarded the vital Fort Benton-Helena overland freight and stage route and helped forestall intertribal warfare as Indians from the western slopes moved eastward to their primeval buffalo hunting grounds.

Fort Shaw was one of the largest and most pleasantly located of early Montana military posts. There were quarters for 400 men, a hospital, guard house, storehouses, workshops, sawmill, bakery, and a laundry. One building, 125 feet long, was the scene of many dances and sometimes acted as a theater. The movable benches had no backs and the floor was hard-trodden earth. When it was necessary to dim the footlights, members of the orchestra rose and turned down the wicks of kerosene lamps.

When Fort Shaw was abandoned by the military in 1890, it was turned over to the Interior Department for use as an Indian school. In 1892 the major Indian schoolhouse at Poplar, on the Fort Peck Reservation, burned down. All Indian children from age six years and older were gathered up and hustled off to Fort Shaw, a heart-breaking 300 miles away. Children from other Montana Reservations and a few from Idaho made up a total enrollment of some 400. Among them was Nettie Susan Wirth from Poplar.

Some of the girls began practicing basketball in the huge dance and theater hall soon after their arrival. They started to work seriously together in 1902 under coach F. C. Campbell, superintendent of the school. Although by no means the tallest girl on the squad, Nettie played center. With devastating regularity, playing boys rules, the Fort Shaw team began winning games. Home games with various colleges and other Montana teams were played in Great Falls, the girls making the trip by team and wagon, sled, horseback and buggy.

By 1904, Coach Campbell realized he had a championship team. That year he took them to the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in St. Louis. Here they challenged all U. S. girl's basketball teams and even traveled as far as Bellevue, Ill. to honor one challenge. Finding he was unable to remain in St. Louis, Campbell left his squad in charge of Nettie's older sister, Lizzie, a graduate of the U.S. Indian Training School at Carlisle, Pa.

No combination of players was equal to the Fort Shaw girls. Competition at World Fairs seemed to inspire the girls to even greater heights. In 1905 they appeared at the Lewis and Clark Exposition in Portland, Ore. They found no teams willing to accept their challenge, but a side trip to Salem, Ore. pitted them against the only Indian girls team they ever met, the Chemewa Indian School near Salem. The Fort Shaw girls triumphed again.

The next year they came to Montana State College in Bozeman and played the 1906 squad of "Farmerettes," of which my future wife was a member. Despite all the cheers we could send up, the battle cry of the Fort Shaw girls rose even higher. Whenever they felt the urge or the going got momentarily rough, their war whoop Shoot, Minnie, Shoot! (inspired by their star Shoshone forward, Minnie Burton) rose above our voices.

When I met Nettie Susan in Seattle, I learned that she had come to the Pacific Coast with her Assiniboine husband, John Winfield Mail, in 1920. He had died in 1941 and she went to live with a son, Nathan, in Seattle. Another son, Conrad, lived nearby. A broken hip sustained in a fall had slowed her pace during her last year of life, but she had a remarkably retentive memory. She died on September 10, 1964, only eight days short of her 78th birthday.

I would like to add some thoughts as to what, under happier circumstances, would have been a sentimental journey for Nettie Susan Wirth Mail as her son, Nathan, took her back to her birthplace and the land of her Assiniboine forebears at Poplar.

Nettie is riding "in the baggage car ahead" as the pathetic old song by Gussie L. Davis has it. The train has come through Missoula and Helena, scenes of many triumphs of the Fort Shaw team. They are nearing the setting of old Fort Shaw in beautiful Sun River valley, where Nettie first came as a child of six. As the train nears Great Falls, Nettie might have had nostalgic thoughts about the many times she journeyed here in a slow and frigid buggy with her teammates, but returned to Fort Shaw again in triumph.

At Poplar, 80-year-old Lizzie Wirth Smith is informed at her rest home about her sister's death and of the arrival of her body. "Nettie? Who is Nettie?" she asks. Then after a pause when no one speaks, Lizzie's faltering mind remembers—remembers her sister, the team, and the time she acted as its chaperone during the days of glory in St. Louis 60 years ago!

Helena Jurist Author Of Nation's Pioneer Pension Plan for Aged

JUDGE LESTER H. LOBLE of Helena, whose judicial work in the field of juvenile delinquency has achieved nationwide notice, has another unique accomplishment to his credit, and one which he recently shared with us: The old age pension act which he introduced as a member of the 18th Session of the Montana Legislature in 1923 was the first such bill ever passed in this country. Governor Joe Dixon signed it into law on March 6, 1923, and presented the signatory pen to Judge Loble.

Besides the House Bill itself, the Society has received a transcript of the proceedings of the House of Representatives of February 28, 1935, which included the passage of a resolution recognizing this pioneer legislation as "humanitarian" and "record in the records of this state this notable achievement so that generations to come may be duly apprised of this contribution to the welfare of mankind."

The first pension ever paid under any such measure was disbursed at the Lewis and Clark County Courthouse where Judge Loble now presides. Loble, who was called to Washington by President Roosevelt to consult in the matter of the national Social Security act early in his administration, is a particular favorite of the Historical Society, and rightly so. A member of our Board of Trustees during several vital years, he was more responsible for the construction of our present building than any other individual.

Thomas Hart Benton, Celebrated Artist, Is Helena Visitor

One of the country's most individualistic and distinguished artists, and scion of a prominent political family, was a recent visitor to the Historical Society, viewing our C. M. Russell collection and museums with great interest. He is Thomas Hart Benton, whose great-uncle was the renowned Senator Thomas (Bullion) Benton, U.S. Senator from Missouri, outspoken exponent of "manifest destiny" in the settlement of the West, and father-in-law of Pathfinder John C. Fremont. The 76-year-old artist is slight of build but still rugged and lionine in appearance. Born in Neosho, Missouri in 1889, Benton is famed for his hard-fisted and individualistic approach to his portrayals of rustic Americana.

Albert J. (Al) Partoll, Member of the Board

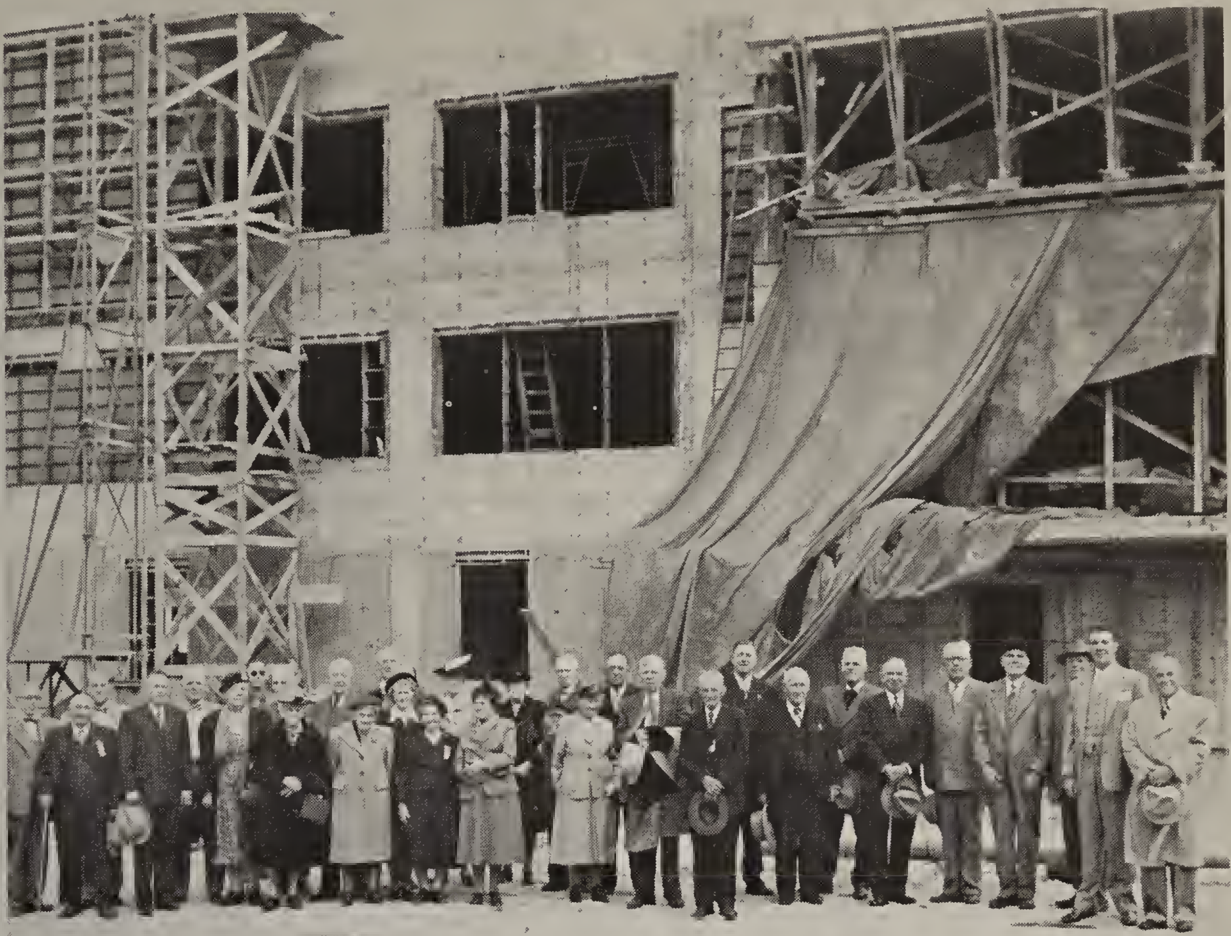
ALBERT J. (AL) PARTOLL of Missoula, a veteran member of our Board of Trustees, has served as secretary and vice-president and has a sincere interest in Montana History. He is a native Montanan, a graduate of the University of Montana with a B.A. degree in journalism in 1929, and an M.A. degree in history in 1930. His master's thesis was titled The Salish—Spartans of the West.

Mr. Partoll has carried on advanced study and research in Northwest history through the years, including two summers at the University of Washington in Seattle, and historical societies, libraries and collections in Portland, Olympia, Spokane, Seattle, Tacoma, Bismarck, N.D., St. Paul, Vancouver and Victoria, B.C., and Montana centers.

He has numerous writings and publications to his credit, and hopes to complete one on Chief Charlo of the Salish Indians, and another dealing with events and personalities of the Salish country. He intends to incorporate a treasure of unpublished manuscript notes and drawings obtained from interviews, research and field exploration.

Trustee Partoll was a strong advocate for, and first editor of the MONTANA the Magazine of Western History—a gratuitous venture, he says, to help justify requesting an adequate historical headquarters building, and legislative appropriation for the Society. He is often in demand as a speaker and lecturer on Montana and Northwest history, and has been tour leader to many Montana historic sites. He is chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Missoula City-County Public Library, and Public Administrator for Missoula County. He was for two sessions an attache of the Montana State Legislature.

As Our Building Reached Partial Reality . . .



MONTANA PIONEERS, Historical Society and State Officials lined up in front of the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building, our present home, on a wintry April 29, 1951, to inspect the structure at this stage of its completion. Many of these distinguished pioneers are now deceased, but with the help of Roy M. Crismas, secretary-treasurer and past president of the Sons and Daughters of Montana Pioneers and others, we have attempted to identify as many as possible. Norman Winestine and Judge Lester Loble, seen at the extreme left and right, respectively, were members of our Board of Trustees at the time and were prime movers in getting the project of a separate Society bulding to this tangible point. Bill Carson of Helena, whose construction firm carried the prime contract, is in the back row, second from the left. Governor John Bonner is seen in the back row, ninth from the right, while Arnold Olsen, then Attorney General and now Montana's Congressman from the western district, is standing at Judge Loble's right. Harry O. Morgan of Ovando, past president of the Pioneers and then the second oldest native of Montana, is the man with cane standing next to Mr. Winestine at the left. Next to him on his left, is Mr. Crismas. The man with bow tie in the back row is John L. Maloney of Helena, then vice president of the Helena chapter of the Sons and Daughters of Pioneers. The first lady, left, in the front row, is Lucinda Buck Scott, then State Historical Librarian. The man in the back row with dark glasses is believed to be Ed Commers of Helena, who represented the Military Order of the Purple Heart. The other ladies in the front row include: Jennie Ennis Chouning of Ennis, past president of the Pioneers; Ione R. Pierce of Cascade, granddaughter of Sidney Edgerton, Montana's first Territorial Governor; Mrs. Thexton of Ennis, member of the Sons and Daughters; Lottie Rumsey Willett of Helena, for 32 years secretary of the Sons and Daughters; Marie Kleinschmidt Southworth of Unionville, charter member of the Sons and Daughters; Julia R. Elledge of Virginia City, also a past president of Pioneers, and Agnes Hall of Helena. The eighth man from the left, in the back row, is the late Norman Holter, pioneer Montana businessman. To his left, men pictured include: Byron Kantner of Deer Lodge, then president of the Sons and Daughters; William K. Burns of Great Falls, past president of Pioneers; Byron O. Wickham of Waterloo, then president of the Pioneers; Architect A. V. McIver of Great Falls; Leon H. Bulen, honorary member of the Sons and Daughters; Arveig Nelson, Pioneer; Edgar M. Hall of Helena; W. L. Fitzsimmons of the state board of examiners; James Purvis of Missoula, veteran's commission member; Bill Ferguson of Helena, American Legion representative; Sam Mitchell, then secretary of state. Judge Jeremiah Lynch of Butte, member of the veterans' memorial commission, is the fourth man from the right in this historic picture. If any of our readers can furnish fuller or more accurate identification, we would receive it with gratitude, for many of these dedicated people who played such vital roles in the realization of the Society's biggest dream are now gone to the Sand Hills.

Gov. Babcock Featured In Russell Sequence of Firearms Documentary

GOVERNOR TIM BABCOCK participated recently in a filmed segment of a new documentary film sponsored by the National Rifle Association designed to orient the American public on the use of firearms. Sequences for the film will feature the art of C. M. Russell, photographed from the Society's collection. Gov. Babcock is seen talking to Willard Van Dyke, left, of Hollywood, producer of the film. At the Governor's left are Sound Engineer John Day and at the extreme right, Photographer Roger Barlow. The scene was the formal C. M. Russell Room on the main floor of our building.

Dear Mrs. Paladin:

I want to tell you how much I enjoy reading MONTANA and The Montana Post. For years, I have been an avid reader of the magazine of history but only recently have I come to realize what I had been missing by not getting the Post before.

Your article and the pictures on Broadwater were excellent, and last night I had the opportunity to read about the folly of the businessman who doesn't have time to look at the scenery because he's reading financial papers. Too bad. Almost like the tourists who drive through Glacier Park at night so they can get to Seattle before the next night.

I am sure you are doing much to reawaken interest in history. You put flesh and blood on those early-day Montanans. Keep 'em breathin'.

Broadwater Hotel and Natatorium Helena's Pride 76 Years Ago

WARM SUMMER months in Montana, perhaps to make up for her storied winters, have always been a time for recreation, sport and play—and tourism. A look through the newspaper files of the Montana Historical Society Library suggests that spirits were especially high during the Gay Nineties, when Montana was emerging as the "young giant of the Northwest" and her capital city, Helena, was at the peak of her wealth and elegance. In the three Summer issues of this monthly newsletter, we hope to expand a bit on the matter of sports, recreation and travel during the 1890's. Using the vast picture resources of the Library, and the newspaper volumes, we will touch upon bicycle clubs (whose participants journeyed as far as the Chicago World's Fair in 1893), tennis clubs, rod and gun activities, picnics and excursions, and baseball teams.

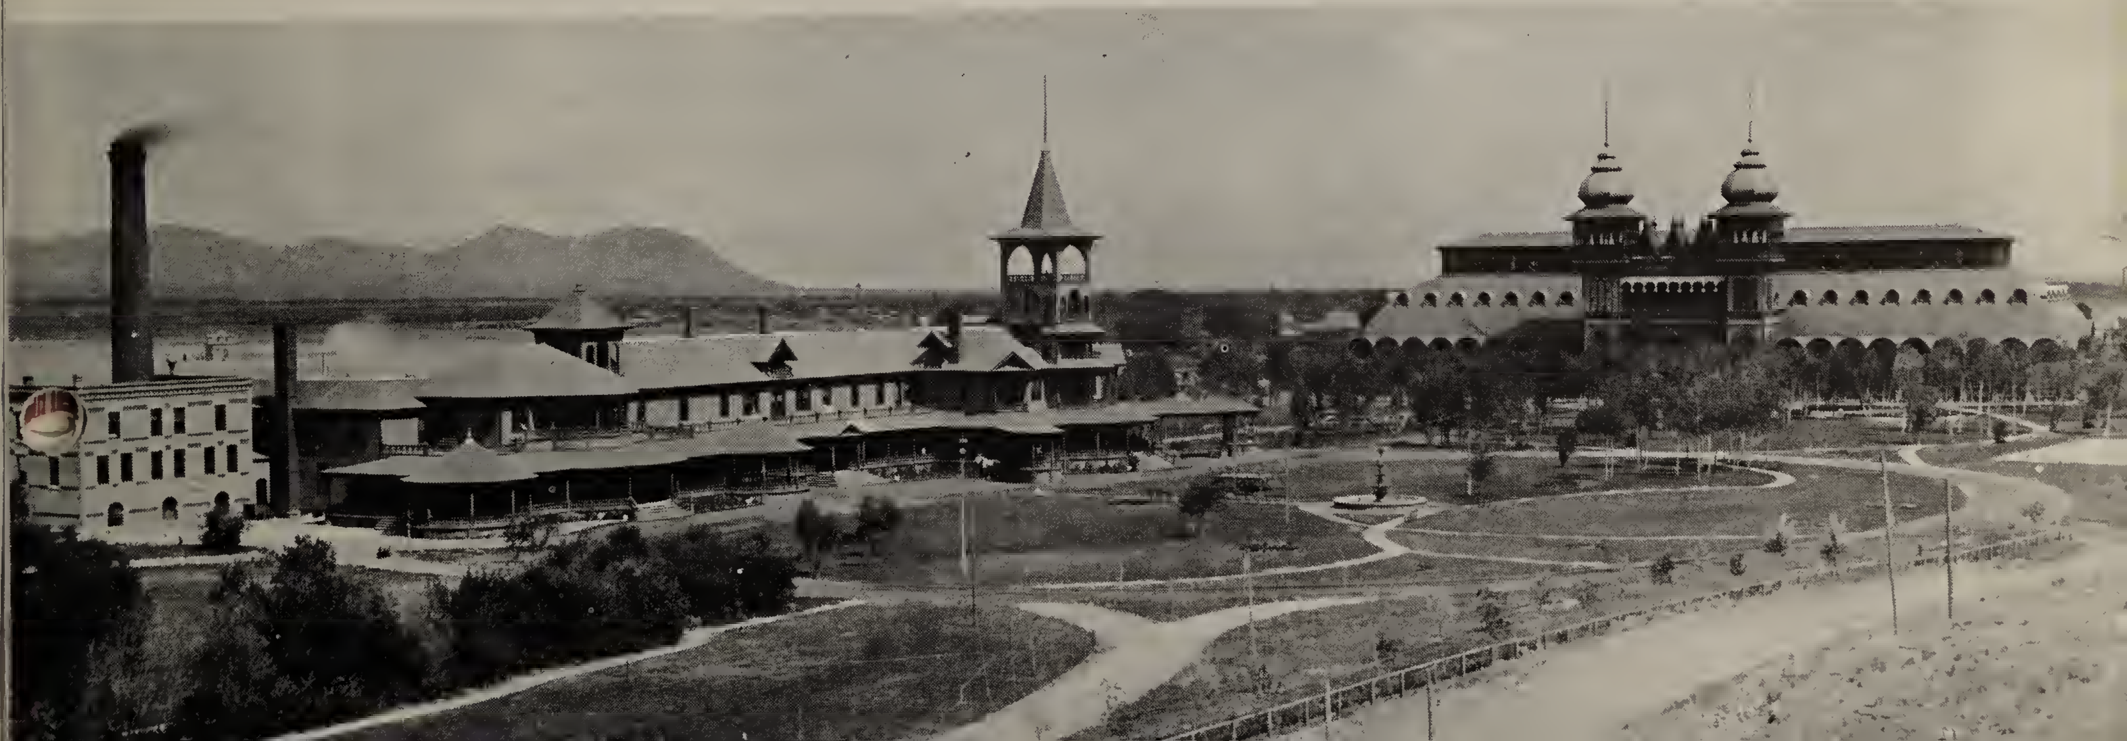
In this issue, we explore as space permits the fabulous Broadwater Hotel and Natatorium, built as the dream of Colonel C. A. Broadwater and opened in the Summer of 1889. It was the pride of Helena and all Montana, but it now rests in gentle decay on the western outskirts of the capital city, its swimming pool marked only by a pile of boulders and a scarred oblong depression, its special trolley lines unused and rusted, its sprawling frame hotel building faded and broken.

Colonel Broadwater, a native of St. Charles, Mo., came to the gold diggings at Bannack hard upon the discoveries of 1862. A canny businessman, he early sensed that the real bonanzas lay in merchandising and supply. He drove beef cattle into Bannack the first year, and later joined the famed Diamond R freighting company which supplied much of the Territory's early needs.

COL. BROADWATER AND HIS DREAM

Engaging in the contracting business, Broadwater was a supplier to Indian agencies and was the man who built the considerable physical lay-out at Fort Assiniboine near Havre. One of Jim Hill's associates in building the Great Northern, he was president of the Montana Central Railroad at the time he built the hotel and natatorium. He was also founder and president of the Montana National Bank in Helena.

Broadwater's connection with the railroad played a large part in his dream: if travelers could come to the hotel by direct railroad line, his personal outlay would be justified. Ground was broken for the hotel in August, 1888, and was completed exactly a year later. He spared no expense in building the hotel and about a year later the Moorish building which housed the gigantic pool, supplied by natural hot springs in this beautiful valley.



MAIN LOBBY OF THE BROADWATER

ONE OF THE DINING ROOMS (F. J. Haynes, Photos)

Grand opening of the hotel was set for Monday, August 26, 1889, and it meshed perfectly with the Montana State Fair which also opened on that day. The Helena Daily Herald editorialized next day:

Yesterday was a proud, gala day for Helena. It witnessed not only the opening of the fair, but what is more to the purpose of a live community, a hotel that would do credit to any city of a hundred thousand inhabitants . . . To say that this hotel supplies "a long felt want" is drawing it mild. That "want" has been painfully and almost fatally felt for some of our pet ambitions. So many of our citizens have elegant and spacious homes that perhaps they have not felt this want as they should . . . A spot that but a few months ago was an arid waste and a tangled wilderness has been transformed to a paradise through the munificent enterprise of one of our citizens, whose name and service have here a monument that will never fade away. . .

The paper then described the opening affair, complete with the menu which ran the gamut from fresh oysters to several courses of meats and wines, fruits and desserts:

Dinner was served from 6 o'clock until 10, and it took all that time for the hundreds of guests to partake of the sumptuous repast [at $1.25 per person]. The meal was set forth on countless tables arrayed in spotless damask and glittering with the display of silver and crystal. Guests were seated in the main ordinary and the two ladies' dining rooms on either side, so that fully one hundred and fifty people were served at one time. The dining room force is composed of colored waiters, who went expertly about their task, attired in full dress suits. . .

At many tables, wines were an accompaniment of the repast, and many a dainty hand raised a glass to the health of Colonel Broadwater and the success of his magnificent hotel. . .

In its issue of June, 1890, The Northwest Magazine described the newly opened Natatorium with these words:

The great swimming-bath, called the Natatorium, is a lofty and picturesque structure of Moorish architecture, covering with its huge vaulted roof a bathing pool 300 feet long and 100 feet wide, at one end of which is a twin waterfall, pouring over great granite rocks—one cascade being of natural hot mineral water and the other of pure cold water. The two falls mingle their waters to produce a temperature in the enormous bath of an agreeable warmth.

Less than three years after his dream hotel and natatorium had caught the imagination of Montanans as well as residents of far-off places, Colonel Broadwater was seized with a case of "la grippe." He died at his hotel in the early morning hours of May 24, 1892. His funeral on Sunday, May 29, was the largest ever held in Montana. The body lay in state in the main lobby of the Broadwater, with the cortege making the long trip to Forestvale Cemetery in the Helena Valley for burial.

Although it was never connected directly to the railroad's main line, the Broadwater continued to be the success its founder had envisioned during the 1890's and after the turn of the century. An ambitious program of renovation was completed early in 1907. In its issue of March 15, the Helena Independent said:

When the Broadwater is opened to the public two months hence it will be one of the most completely equipped amusement resorts of its kind in the country. It [the natatorium] will also be one of the most sanitary . . . Contracts have been let for laying 15,200 feet of reinforced concrete with a cement finish on the floor of the promenade around the big pool and on the floors of the dressing rooms . . . There will be a new toboggan and a toboggan slide installed. Boats made especially for service in such a pool will be added. . .

No single circumstance or event can be charged with the resort's final demise. Of no mean impact upon the hotel was the crack-down on gambling. And although the natural hot springs in the area still exist and are utilized by private homes, the earthquakes of 1935 weakened the boulder structures of the natatorium, damaged the intricate network of pipes, and rendered the installation hazardous. The hotel itself was the scene of gala gatherings well into the late 1930's, but the glory was gone.

Colonel Broadwater, to whom it was hoped this would be a lasting monument, would no doubt be more pained than other Montanans about the decay which has resulted. But judging from the eulogies which came to him in life and in death, this rich but beloved man apparently garnered monuments enough without it.

Much-Maligned, Industrious Chinese in Montana Subject of Display

CELESTIALS
PIGTAILS
恩鴻賴藉

THE IMPACT of Chinese on Territorial Montana—the attempts to boycott them, their dogged work along the placer streams after white prospectors had passed on to richer diggings, Helena's Chinatown blue with smoke from opium dens and from fires which swept down Last Chance Gulch, New Year celebrations and gambling—are all included in this visual display, prepared by Curator Bob Morgan for the reading room of the Library on our second floor.

Much of the story of the early "Celestials," who were alternately damned and praised, is told in photographic reproductions from the Helena press in the 1870's and 1880's. Actual items, such as China dishes and opium pipes, are displayed in a case in the foreground. The display is a preview and a dividend to a larger project: the completion of the mining room cases in the formal museum which will feature the role of the Chinese in the Territory's gold placers.

There is both tragedy and humor in the newspaper clippings displayed—for instance, this one from the Helena Independent of May 5, 1875:

A Can and a Queue.

An old sow was prospecting around yesterday morning, and poked her head into an empty kerosene can, and after nosing around the bottom of the can and discovering nothing palatable she endeavored to withdraw her head, but the can fitted like a glove. After endeavoring to rid herself from the tight embrace for a while, she finally tumbled into the creek. Her squeals brought a couple of Chinamen to the scene. They endeavored to free her, and in doing so the sow threw both of the Celestials. In the tussel the queue of one of the Chinamen got entangled around the pig's neck, and she thought another pig wanted to see her across the creek, so she started over, dragging the shrieking Heathen after her. Several Chinamen arrived, and released him, and also took the can from the sow's head. When freed, each started in different directions to follow their different avocations—the Chinaman to tear the bosoms and pound the buttons off his customers' shirts, and the pig to upset all the kegs and barrels that it could get its nose into.

Early in 1880, the Helena Weekly Herald determined to find out about opium dens in the city's Chinatown. A reporter was dispatched to the scene, and his adventures, complete with quoted dialogue, took up more than a column of space. He found that opium houses did exist "where the deadly drug was regularly sold to, and indulged in, by white men and women." The reporter, after much maneuvering, finally arranged to become a customer:

We enter a compartment; the bed resembles a wide shelf and runs the length of the room. In the centre are a couple of Chinese pillows, and a little glass lamp is burning between them. We lay down. John remarks:

"Me send you good cookee," and departs.

Soon the "cookee" appears. He lies down also, resting his head upon the second pillow. A couple of pipes are produced. The stem is hollow, perhaps half an inch in diameter and eight inches or a foot long. The bowl, rising from the stem, expands in width and at the top would probably measure two or three inches across. The opening in the bowl is not much larger than a knitting needle. The proprietor again appears and cautions us to make no noise.

"Lay down, sleep plenty," he says, and then departs.

The door is now closely shut, that the fumes may not escape. The "cookee" takes a needle and catching up a portion of the drug twirls it around in the flame. It puffs out and would drop off but for the dexterous needle which shapes it. It is pressed and rolled upon the bowl of the pipe, and finally a quantity about twice the size of a pea is placed on the bowl. The needle is run through it, that the draft may be good. It is then held over the lamp and our first experience as an opium smoker begins. A few whiffs exhausts the supply and another quantity is prepared as before. But we had had enough. . .

The Chinese, most of whom were affable as well as industrious, were less subjected to ridicule as the years passed. Writing about "Chinese Life in Helena" for The Northwest Magazine in June, 1888, A. H. Hersey said: "On the whole the Chinese residents of Montana are peaceful, law-abiding and useful, and the great ethical question which has assumed such purport in California and Nevada has, as yet, cast no shadows before in the young Territory of the Mountains."

Second New Homesteader Display Completed for Frontier Museum

RAILROADS BROUGHT THE HOMESTEADER is the title of the newest display case in the Frontier Museum on the main floor of our building. It is the third in a projected series of five cases which tell the visual story of Montana settlement. The central diorama, created by John B. Weaver, former curator, depicts a typical homestead scene in Eastern Montana. The surrounding four cases, being created by Curator Bob Morgan, amplify the story. The first, completed some months ago, delineates the trails and trials of the first white inhabitants. The newest case, pictured at the left, contains dramatic blow-ups of the enticing brochures and advertisements used by the railroad to lure settlers westward to free land. Objects brought by typical homesteaders, and an enlarged version of L. A. Huffman's great photograph, The Honyocker are also included.

Post Article Brings Forth Reminiscences

The following letter has been forwarded to us by Donald H. Bates of Oswego, Ore., a regular reader of THE MONTANA POST. He had sent a recent issue to Mr. Hallie Carl Heacock of St. Helens, Ore. which contained an article about the Kerr Ivory Collection now on display at the Museum. As a carver in wood and ivory of considerable stature, Mr. Heacock was quite naturally interested. But the exchange resulted also in this lively letter of reminiscence from the 83-year-old artist who spent some of his boyhood years in Montana.

I was indeed very pleased with the article you sent me about Montana, and on reading it over, I imagine I am entitled to be classified as a Centennial Pioneer . . . I was born in Parsons, Kansas, Dec. 11, 1881. Four months after my birth . . . my father moved to Missoula, Montana. He soon became acquainted with A. B. Hammond who helped him get established in the sawmill business—the object being cutting bridge timbers for the Northern Pacific Railroad. At that time the N. P. was completed with the exception of that part between Bozeman and Deer Lodge —a distance of about 90 miles. This distance was still covered by stagecoach. I have often heard my father state he held me on his lap on [one trip] durinb which President Hayes' party of several carriages passed us on their way back to Washington after their visit to Seattle. . .

After running his little mill a few years, Father returned to Kansas and took up a homestead near Larned. But within a short time he sold out and returned to Montana. This was in 1886, and I was then close to five years old. I can still remember several small details of that time. Father again got A. B. Hammond's support and went back in the sawmill business. After cutting off most of the timber above Missoula, he moved his mill to Florence, up the Bitter Root Valley. This place then did not have a name, so Father named it Florence after A. B. Hammond's wife.

In 1889, Father moved to Bellingham, Wash., where he also built a mill, this one on the waterfront. In 1891, he returned to Missoula and after a couple of years moved to a little siding called Smead's Spur [located on the N.P. in Lincoln county, only a few miles from the Idaho border]. He bought a shingle mill here, but left in 1895 to move to Spokane. I have only visited Montana once since then. That was in 1940 when my sister, Mrs. Harriet Crow, and I visited Yellowstone Park. . .

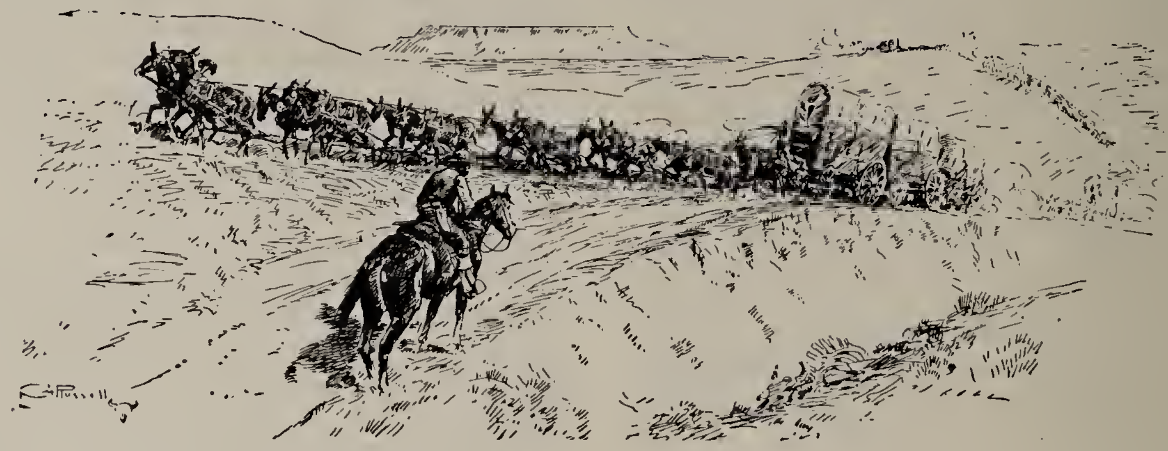
Diamond R Freight Outfit, a la Charlie Russell



Fred G. Renner of Washington, D.C., a valued friend of the Society and probably the most knowledgeable person living on the art of C. M. Russell, writes that he enjoyed reading our May MONTANA POST in which we delineated the move of Montana's Territorial records from Virginia City to Helena in May, 1875, via Diamond R mule team.

"It is too bad you didn't use Russell's drawing as an illustration," Renner states. "His title of the drawing was A DIAMOND R MULE TEAM OF THE 70's." We are happy to reproduce, above, the Cowboy Artist's pen and ink depiction of this historic land transportation firm in action.

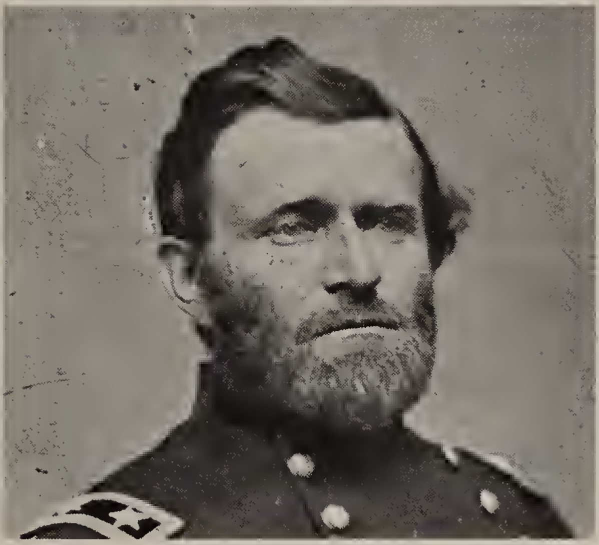
Red Cloud and Spotted Tail in White Man's World 90 Years Ago

A DELEGATION of Sioux, led by the stubborn Red Cloud and the more enlightened Spotted Tail, were in Washington, D.C. 90 years ago this month to hear a speech by President U. S. Grant. They were to be impressed, anew, with the power and sophistication of the white man, and to be urged to sell their homeland in the Black Hills, now coveted beyond all turning back by hordes of white gold-seekers.

As always, newspapers printed at the time, on file in the Montana Historical Society Library, illumine these historical events and lend a sense of immediacy and drama not found in the more recently published word, however accurate or interpretive.

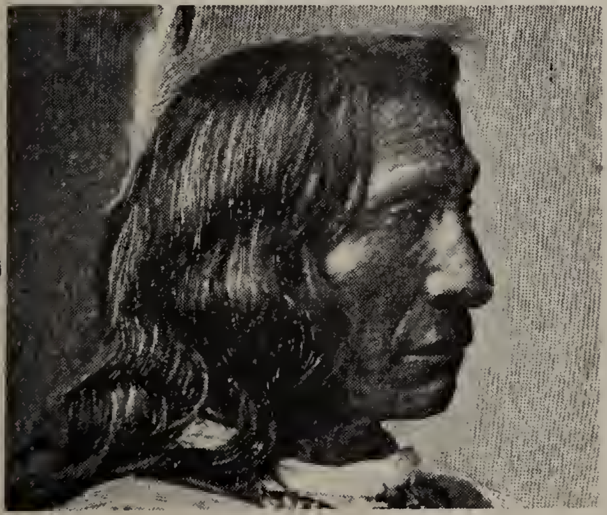
In its issue of May 31, 1875, the Helena Daily Herald carried a dispatch from Washington, dated May 26, quoting the remarks of President Grant whose visionary "peace policy" had failed to solve the vexing Indian problem and who still hoped for a third term in office.

Red Cloud and Spotted Tail were making their second trip to the East, and again they failed to be properly impressed with the epitome of white civilzation. But by now, Red Cloud was reduced to a petty old man, more interested in having his Indian Agent fired than in the Black Hills situation. The horizons of Spotted Tail were much broader: he was well aware of the significance of the gold discoveries in the Black Hills, and while the gaudy presents of his hosts failed to impress him, he knew that the military power they represented would prevail.



ULYSSES S. GRANT

CHIEF RED CLOUD



According to the dispatch quoted in the Herald, the delegation was ushered into the President's private office, accompanied by General Cowan, the acting Secretary of the Interior, and Commissioner of Indian Affairs Smith. As the Indians entered, each advanced to the Civil War hero and shook his hand. "The Indians then arranged themselves around the table," the dispatch said, "Spotted Tail and Red Cloud having prominent positions." President Grant then addressed the delegation, his words interpreted by William Fulder:

I want to say to the Indians today something about the object of bringing them here, and a few words for them to reply to. I have always been a friend to the Indians, and I am very anxious to do what I think best for their good. The country where they now live, as they must be well aware, is entirely incapable of supporting them should the government cease to give them aid. By the treaty of 1868, clothing was granted to them for thirty years, and provisions for only five years. The food and provisions, therefore, which have been given to them for the last two years, has been gratuitous on the part of Congress. These may be taken from them at any time without any violation of the treaty. My interest now is to make some arrangement by which they and their children can be secure from future trouble. [Several of the Indians expressed their approval of these sentiments, by exclaiming "Ugh!"]

As I said in the beginning, it must be evident to them that if the supplies of food be withdrawn by the government, it will be impossible for them to live where they are much longer. I would call their attention to this fact: They must see that the white people outnumber the Indians now about two hundred to one, taking all Indians within the territory owned by the United States. The number of whites are increasing so rapidly that before many years it will be impossible to fix any point within the limit of our territory where you can prevent them from going.

CHIEF SPOTTED TAIL

Sioux Delegation in Washington . . .

It will become necessary that the white people shall go from one place to another, whether occupied by Indians or not. For this reason it is very desirable that they have friends here to look after their interest. They should be situated where they would be able to get support beyond any contingency. I do not propose to ask them without their consent to leave their homes where they were born and raised, but to point out to them the advantage to themselves and their children if they will accept such arrangements as may be proposed to them.

There is territory south of where they now live where the climate is much better, where the grass is much better and somewhat more abundant, including large game, such as buffalo, and there is good pasturage for animals; and where teachers can be sent among the Indians to instruct them in art, civilization, self-preservation and support.

The Herald then printed a Washington dispatch, dated May 27, which said that Red Cloud and Spotted Tail would not hold any more councils with the Secretary of the Interior but would parley among themselves. "They are somewhat confused, and say that they do not understand what the Secretary means when he tells them that the government does not intend to force them to go, and then says that if they do not go the white people will be allowed to come into their country, and that Congress may probably withhold appropriations from them," the article said.

Then came these prophetic words: "In a conversation among themselves this afternoon, they all agreed never to go down into the Indian Territory, and that if the government attempts to force them it will require all the army." It was to be a little more than a year later that the allied Sioux and Cheyenne met George A. Custer and the Seventh Cavalry at the Little Big Horn.

On Sale: Calf-Bound Editions of Medical History

BY special arrangement with the Montana Medical Association, the Society can now offer, at a reduced price, a few remaining copies of the limited, numbered, leather-bound editions of Medicine in the Making of Montana, the monumental history of the medical profession in Montana from fur trade days through statehood.

This beautiful edition of only 300, is bound in soft tan buckskin and each is stamped in gold with the official medical symbol. Formerly priced at $25, the remaining copies will be sold at only $15, a rare value.

The text of this fascinating work, started during the lifetime of the distinguished historian, Dr. Paul Phillips, runs to 564 pages. It traces, with color and verve, the history of medicine in Montana from the earliest natural potions administered by the Indians, through the first rugged professional physicians in the Territory, to the organization of pioneer medical associations in the region. Biographical sketches on pioneer doctors and many illustrations enhance the book.

A word to collectors of really fine volumes on Montana history: order your copy of this special leather-bound edition at once, or you will be too late. Address: Book Department, Montana Historical Society, Helena.

New Documentary Film On Cowboy Artist Set For Premiere Showing

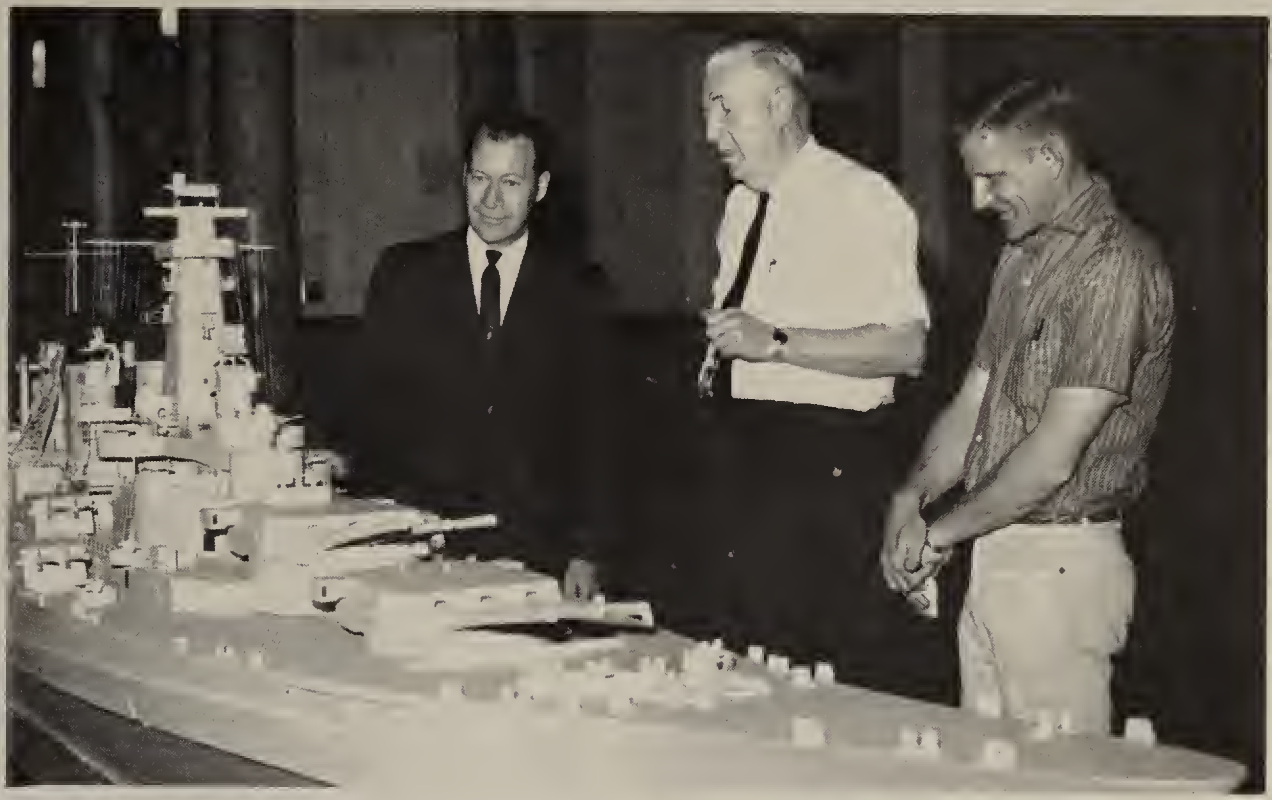
TWO men deeply involved in the production of a new documentary film, The Montanan, devoted to the philosophy and life of the uncommon Cowboy Artist, Charles M. Russell, are seen here in front of the late artist's log studio in the Electric City. The film will have its premiere showing at a noon luncheon planned for Thursday, June 3, at the Rainbow Hotel in Great Falls.

At left is George Armstrong, retired Air Force officer, who photographed and edited the new documentary, one of a series sponsored by the Glacier Division of Union Oil Company. At right is Chet Dreher of Helena, able photographer for the Montana Highway Department and an effective publicist for Montana, who in this case handled the scripting and direction as well.

The 18-minute documentary—which promises much for all Westerners—emphasizes the unique and warm personal philosophy of C. M. R. The script, movingly narrated by Actor-Artist Noah Beery, Jr., draws heavily upon the colorful humor, sympathy and conservationist philosophy of the artist as revealed in his written and spoken word. Also used with dramatic effect is the artistry of Russell, photographed from the collections of both the Historical Society and the Russell Gallery in Great Falls. After the premiere, copies of the film may be borrowed for organization and group showing from us or from Union Oil at Great Falls.

Tickets for the luncheon and premiere showing at the ballroom of the Rainbow Hotel, slated for 11:30 A.M. on June 3, may be ordered at $2.50 each from Stan Meyer, Wendt Advertising Agency, Box 1291, Great Falls, Mont.

A Mammoth Moving Job: Scale Model of Montana Battlewagon



MUSEUM PERSONNEL assist nationwide movers in carrying the 21-foot battleship model up the capitol steps and into its resting place in the rotunda. Above, Gov. Tim Babcock, an interested spectator throughout the project of unpacking and assembling, is seen with Edgar L. Hook, center, exhibit specialist for the U.S. Navy who supervised the operation, and Bob Morgan, right, curator of the Historical Society which has custody of the model, insured for $37,000.

STAFF of the Montana Historical Society participated last month in a heroic moving job: the installation of a full scale 21-foot model of the USS Montana, one of five battleships of its class proposed for construction during World War II but never built. Designated BB67, the huge battlewagon was to be 903 feet long with a 120 foot beam and a displacement of 58,000 tons. It got as far as the keel-laying stage in 1942 when development of new techniques made it obsolete.

Through arrangements with the Bureau of Ships, Department of the Navy, the model has been placed in the custody of the Historical Society, although pending our hoped-for building expansion program, it is on display indefinitely in the rotunda of the capitol building. Insured for $37,000, the model was created to a scale of one quarter inch to one foot.

Much of the complicated negotiation for Montana custody of the model was handled by Admiral Edgar H. Reeder, who is naval aide to Gov. Tim Babcock as well as chairman of the Unemployment Compensation Commission. He was ably assisted throughout by E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, president of the Society's Board of Trustees.

"The intent and hope is that this new evidence of Montana's association with the U.S. Navy will join the elaborate silver service from the decommissioned SS Helena now in our building," Director Mike Kennedy said. "However, that will not be possible unless and until our much-needed building expansion program is realized."

Manuscript of State Aviation Study in Final Stage

THE manuscript of Montana and The Sky, the story of pioneer aviation in Montana, is rapidly being completed by Frank W. Wiley, former director of the Montana Aeronautics Commission and a veteran pilot. Not only has the Society a large stake in the production of this long-needed study, but we have had the pleasure of close association with its author during the past two years. Mr. Wiley has completed his research and writing in our building, occupying a special office.

The extensive manuscript, supplemented by a collection of more than 200 rare aviation photographs and containing the activities of some 100 pioneer pilots, is being edited by Director Mike Kennedy. It will be published under the joint sponsorship of the Aeronautics Commission and the Historical Society, if possible late this year.

PILOT WILEY IN COCKPIT, 1924

All the color and personal drama of the air age in Montana, from the earliest barn-storming days (in which the author participated) to the sophisticated craft of later years will be found in this book. It will be further enhanced by a vital appendix, listing some 300 men who have contributed to pioneer aeronautics in the Treasure State.

"This unique and attractive book will have a limited publication," Director Kennedy says. "It will be a collector's item and a cherished possession of second and third generation aeronauts who have heretofore had no opportunity to know of the thrills and spills of their airborne ancestors."

Memorabilia of Spear And Koerner Families Welcomed By Society

RECENTLY the Society received an interesting collection of pictures, memorabilia and published works (including two rare pamphlets on Montana history) from the personal collection of Mrs. Elsa Spear Byron of Sheridan, Wyo., a member of the pioneer Spear family of Montana and Wyoming, and sister of Senator W. B. "Junior" Spear of our Board of Trustees.

THE SPEAR FAMILY at the Spear O Ranch in the Big Horn Mountains, in about 1940. Left to right, Jessamine Spear Johnson, Willis B. (Junior) Spear, the late Phil Spear, and Elsa Spear Byron.

Mrs. Byron, a past president of the Sheridan County Chapter of the Wyoming Historical Society, has to her credit a considerable output of historical writing for newspapers and in the form of two well-illustrated pamphlets, published in the 1930's. A numbered copy of each was included in her gift to the Society. Published in 1935, Trailing the Campfires was dedicated to the author's mother, Virginia Benton, and her father, Willis Moses Spear, pioneer cattleman and later a Wyoming State Senator. It covers historic spots and incidents in Southeastern Montana, many of them as related to her by her parents. The second booklet, published in 1939, is a superbly illustrated history of Fort Phil Kearny, the "hated fort on the Little Piney" which was subjected to continual Sioux harassment as it attempted to guard the Bozeman Road.

MR. AND MRS. W. H. D. KOERNER relax on a pack trip in Black Canyon of the Big Horn Mountains in 1927. The famed artist spent many summers at the Phil Spear ranch, sketching and painting.

In the collection are many pictures of the Spear family and of their close friends, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. D. Koerner. The famed artist spent many summers at a cabin on the Phil Spear ranch, painting and sketching scenes which became great oil depictions of the Western scene, widely used as illustrations by such magazines as Saturday Evening Post and including the strong oil New Horizons, published on the back cover of Montana magazine this Spring and currently on display in our museum.

From Virginia City to Helena by Mule Team

Territorial Records Moved On Muddy Spring Roads 90 Years Ago

NINETY years ago this month, a Diamond R mule train moved out of Virginia City, bearing the archives, official records and furniture belonging to Montana Territory. It took 12 wearisome days to make the trip to Helena over roads heavy with spring mud and ruts. The road leading to capital status for Helena over Virginia City was even longer—and heavy with controversy and judicial and political bitterness.

But in the Spring of 1875 it was an accomplished fact: Virginia City, whose population had drastically shrunk to around 1,000 when its placers stopped giving up gold in bonanza proportions, had to give way to Last Chance Gulch, by now teeming with nearly 4,000 citizens, many of them solid and civic-minded.

After two elections and a bitter Supreme Court fight in which Chief Justice Decius Wade finally wrote the majority opinion in favor of Helena in the capital fight, the move of official Territorial property began. Court records were moved first, and then on Saturday, April 10, 1875, the Madisonian of Virginia City bitterly printed this item:

Last Monday morning [April 5] a mongrel outfit of poor mules and lank kiyuses, said to belong to the Diamond R Company of Helena, cavorted, swaggered and switched their tails as they entered this city. The outfit came to freight the movable furniture of the capital up to Helena, the county town of Lewis and Clarke. . . After the wagon boss had loaded his teams, he left. When the train reaches Helena it is hoped that a mass meeting will be called when Squire Wade [the Chief Justice] can deliver an oration on "How he done it."

Helena editors, meanwhile, were publishing daily reports on the move. Said the Daily Herald in its April 6 issue:

The capital paraphernalia was taken aboard the Diamond R schooners at Virginia . . . and the fleet sailed out of that harbor and down Alder River with a favorable breeze. No salute was fired on their departure. . .

CHIEF JUSTICE DECIUS S. WADE

Six days later, on April 12, the Helena paper made this progress report:

The Diamond R train transporting the capital archives and effects, passed Gaffney enroute to Helena on Thursday last [April 8]. The teams travel by way of the Crow Creek divide and are probably today in the vicinity of Radersburg. They will likely roll into town on Wednesday, making all due allowance for delays occasioned by deep mud and hard pulling on portions of the road at this end of the trip.

In its issue of Thursday, April 15, the Herald announced the arrival of the train:

The archives of the Territory, together, with the office furniture of the Secretary and books and papers belonging to the Chief Justice, Auditor, Clerk of the Supreme Court, etc. were delivered here yesterday afternoon and stored in the Blake building, Broadway.

The Madisonian of Virginia City told the same news but in a different vein, in its issue of April 24:

No stump speech by Wade. No torchlight procession. No jollification. No fuss. No nothing. Take it, for a period.

The fight for Montana's Territorial capital had, indeed, been a bitter one. As Alder Gulch's storied placers began playing out, and its population decreased, moves were started as early as 1866 to move the capital to booming Helena. On December 14 of that year, the legislature provided for the inclusion of the capital question in the annual election of September, 1867. Virginia City won that one, but it was a temporary victory. The legislature, in January, 1869, again provided for a vote of the people. The enacted law read, in part:

. . . That the question of locating the seat of government in and for Montana Territory shall be submitted to the vote of the qualified voters of the Territory, at the annual election to be held on the first Monday of August, A.D. 1869. If the majority of all the votes cast shall designate the town of Helena as the seat of government, it shall be by proclamation of the governor so declared, or if a majority so voting shall designate the City of Virginia in Madison County as the seat of government, the governor shall issue his proclamation accordingly.

Then came one of many curious happenstances which marked Montana's infant days: returns of the 1869 election, sent to the Territorial Secretary at Virginia City, were destroyed by fire before an official canvas could be made!

They Argued the Case for Helena . . .

WILBUR F. SANDERS

E. WARREN TOOLE

Crying foul, Helena claimed unofficial tabulations had given it a clear majority. But there was no contest.

Again in February, 1874, the legislature acted to place the matter on the ballot. And again the contest was bitter, its outcome fraught with peculiar events. An abstract of the vote of each county was to be sent to Secretary James A. Callaway, who was to canvass the vote in the presence of U.S. Marshal W. F. Wheeler and Governor Benjamin F. Potts. The returns from Gallatin county, reputed to be 96 for Helena and 551 against, was thrown out because the board concluded it was not in conformity with the law. A tabulation of the other eight counties showed a majority of 152 votes against Helena. But there was still the result from Meagher county to be counted.

Unofficial word had it that the abstract from Meagher showed 561 for Helena and 29 against. When the canvassers opened the envelope they found the figures were exactly reversed! Although T. E. Collins, clerk of Meagher County, later appeared in Virginia City with a corrected abstract which gave his county's majority to Helena, there followed a bitter court fight with four of the Territory's ablest attorneys arguing: W. F. Sanders and Warren Toole for Helena, Sam Word and Henry N. Blake for Virginia City. The Supreme Court made the decision, with Chief Justice Wade incurring the undying hatred of Virginia City with his majority opinion. Justice Hiram Knowles voted with the Chief Justice, Justice Francis G. Servis dissenting. Prosperous and growing Last Chance Gulch, convenient to Fort Benton steamboat transport and served by the Mullan Road and stage lines to the Gallatin Valley, became the Territorial capital. The Helena Daily Herald, inclined to be magnanimous, could not resist these editorial words in its issue of January 25, 1875:

Fortunately for Montana, the seat of government had not so taken root in Alder Gulch but that the entire people, with the aid of the Supreme Court, could wrench it from that awkward and inconvenient location. . .

Our hearts are not set on the capital. There are other interests we desire to promote; other controversies which promise usefulness, and to these we incline to turn public attention . . . One by one or altogether the offices of the Territory will locate their offices in Helena. We presume they will remain here for three or four years at least, but perhaps not. Thus far the capital controversy has a lesson, and if from the standpoint of our Virginia contemporaries it assumes the aspect of tragedy, it is their fault, and if to them it seems terrible, it will nevertheless have its uses, and it will owe much to the integrity and intelligence of the Supreme Court.

Montana Territory was having a cold, wet spring in April, 1875. "Billy Goodyer is a sad lad because his early salad was nipped by frost the other night," said the Herald. "If there is any consolation in it, we can say to him that a Wisconsin man, deluded by the almanac in the notion that spring had come, last week had his ears frozen stiff while out in his garden planting cabbage seed."

And as canvassing boards and the Supreme Court were pondering whether Virginia City or Helena had garnered enough male votes to win the capital, there were some stirrings toward granting the vote to women. A young lady student in Deer Lodge, Katie Kelly, wrote a prize-winning theme taking the opposite view. The Helena Herald editor so agreed with her that he published her theme in full, adding that it was "conclusive to us that Miss Kelly has a well-balanced head." Katie's theme read, in part:

Women are said to be the helpmates of men; if this be so why will they neglect their domestic duties to dabble in politics? Just picture to yourself the ridiculous appearance of a lady on the streets election day surrounded by a host of men! . . . They will become accustomed to drunkenness and finally lose all the delicacy of feeling so essential to ladies. . .

We cannot believe that it was ever intended for women to vote. Woman's province is home. She should strive to make her home attractive, but she need not neglect the cultivation of her mind, and the pleasure derived from home life will soon gain the ascendance over those of her lady friends who find time to vote.

Unique Hair-On Edition of Cowboy Book Already Collector's Item

ONE of the more unique enterprises (and one of the most successful) of the Society in recent years is drawing to a close. This involves production and sale of a limited, custom-bound, original art edition of Cowboys and Cattlemen, pictured here. Only a few copies remain, at $50 each, of the original 199. The venture was a cooperative one between Hastings House, Publishers, N.Y.; George Seipp, custom binder; Sol Rusoff of American Bindery Co., Minneapolis; Director Michael Kennedy, and loyal artists of the West, who generously contributed 190 of the 199 frontispieces—different in every book.

Working in their preferred media—watercolors, oils, pencil sketches and pen and inks, the artists who helped the Society so mightily included: J. K. Ralston, Nick Eggenhofer, Joe Beeler, Fred Fellows, Les Peters, Cornelius Smith, Byron Wolfe, Bob Morban, Rich Roenisch, Hugh Hockaday, Bill Chapman, Bert Smith, Jim Masterson, John Segesman, Shorty Shope, Gus Shafer, Joe Grandee and George Phippen. The remainder of the autographed, numbered rarities were made up of three long out-of print lithographs by Jack Beauchamp (deceased) and Charles M. Russell (the latter watercolored by Curator Bob Morgan). As most patrons stated, "The frontispiece alone was worth more than the price of the book!" No. 1 copy, incidentally, has been received by President Johnson.

COWBOYS AND CATTLEMEN
Selected and Edited by Michael S. Kennedy

Much favorable publicity has been coming our way, including press, radio and television programs in Minneapolis, St. Louis, Kansas City and elsewhere. Typical were the comments of featured columnist Bob Murphy of the Minneapolis Star, who after a visit to the bindery wrote:

> Each copy is an individual unto itself. The Society stipulated that it be bound in pony hide, and that's where the problems come in. Actually it's calf hide but the leather-makers sell it as pony hide. The hair is still on it, and since you can't print on hair, the title is on a cardboard box slipcase in which the books is contained. The frontispiece of each book is different too, some reproductions of rare old C. M. Russell lithographs, others based on the work of current western artists. The copy I saw was bound in what I'd call roan and white, and each looks different. The hair on some is brindled, on some curly, and on this one it was straight. Ordinarily a binding material is folded over itself and fastened. That isn't possible with hair either, so each cover had to be exactly mitered. Rusoff was afraid they might have to shave the hair off, but the firm developed a method of binding with it intact.
> Each is inscribed with the name of the owner and Kennedy's signature. Books bound in leather are not uncommon, but in leather with the hair on? Rusoff said it's the first job of its kind he's handled in 25 years of business and the first he ever heard of. American Bindery, incidentally, has bound books and magazines for such eminents as Emperor Haile Selassie, the King of Norway, the King of Sweden, the King of Denmark, Pope Pius XII, former President Dwight D. Eisenhower and many prime ministers and other staetesmen, as well as governors, counties, historical societies and many other groups. You might doubt that any of these jobs was as distinctive as this pony-hide binding. Right away, it's a collector's item.

Collectors Snapping Up Limited Number of Huge Master Portfolios of Art

The Master Portfolio of Western Art, first announced in our February issue, is now going forth to a surprisingly large numbers of patrons. The Society regrets, however, that like so many creative efforts, this one ran into several unanticipated delays—and some of our earlier customers were kept waiting for several weeks. From now on orders will be filled immediately.

The limited-to-500-copies portfolio, which is beautifully illustrated on the cover, both front and back, (including biographical sketches of the artists) originally offered 15 rare full-color lithographs and colorgraphs of a selection of 17 by such artists as Remington, Russell, Ralston, Lea, Schreyvogel, Berninghaus, Frank Tenney Johnson and Farny. A number of collectors, however, wanted the complete set of 17. The original price of any 15 selected by the patron, at $75, still holds. However, for those who want all 17 (although three of the largest, two Russells and a Remington, are too large to fit in the specially designed cover-holder)—we will furnish them at $10 more, or $85. A five-page brochure describing this unusual collector's item is available upon request. Overall size of the portfolio, the front of which is pictured here, is 24" x 30".

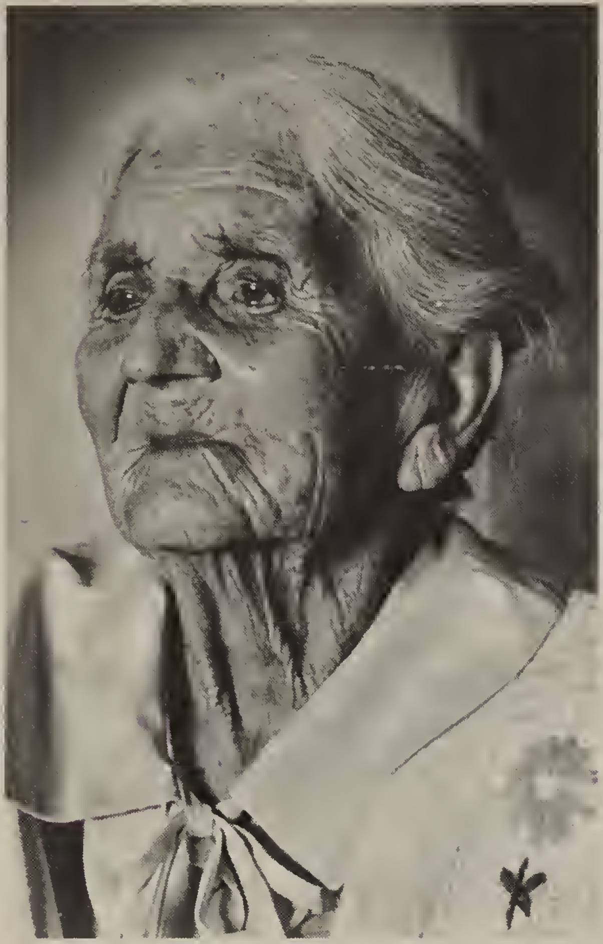
Aged Blackfeet Woman Who Witnessed a Grisly Crime As A Girl, Dies



MRS. Maggie Fox of Browning, a granddaughter of Hugh Monroe, (the first white man to live among the Blackfeet) whose girlhood witness of murder and arson was recounted in the Summer, 1962, issue of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, died early last month in a Cut Bank hospital.

This beautiful portrait, taken by Wallace Ruetten of Cut Bank, was published in the Cut Bank Pioneer Press along with a story of the death of this venerable mixed blood lady who was born in Fort Whoop-Up, Alberta, but who spent most of her life in Montana. We are grateful to both Mr. Ruetten and the Pioneer Press for allowing us to reproduce her picture.

Maggie Fox and her younger friend, Annie Keogh, were being cared for by Mrs. Mary Armstrong on her ranch 30 miles east of Choteau in 1881 when an itinerant cowboy, Brackett Stewart, murdered Mrs. Armstrong and her hired man and then set fire to the house. The two frightened little girls witnessed the grisly events and then hid out all night to avoid a similar fate. They were picked up the next day by a kindly sheepman. This remarkable story, and the subsequent lynching of Brackett Stewart, were recounted in an article entitled "Tragedy on the Teton," by Helen B. West of Cut Bank, who evinced much of the story in interviews with this lovely old lady, already in her 90's in 1952, but full of memories and graciousness.

Memorabilia and Art From Kelley Collection Displayed in Gallery

AN interesting display recently completed for the main floor north gallery in the Society's building contains personal memorabilia, honors and works of art gathered during the distinguished lifetime by Cornelius F. Kelley, the Butte Hill waterboy who rose to become chairman of the board of Montana's Anaconda Company.

The viewer is ushered into the gallery with a green patina bronze bust of Mr. Kelley, sculpted in 1934 by the noted Mario Korbel. Curator Bob Morgan has artistically arranged, in display cases, such mementoes as a handmade, illuminated book containing a tribute to the board chairman upon his retirement in May, 1955. Academic robes in which Mr. Kelley accepted honorary doctorates from such institutions as New York University, University of Montana, and Fordham are displayed, along with the degrees themselves and many other honors which came to this distinguished man.

Also from the Kelley collection, loaned for display in Helena through courtesy of his son-in-law, George Hepburn of Los Angeles, are four major, original models executed on commission by the late Earl Heikka of Great Falls. They are: The Prospector, Taking up the Slack (a packstring model), The Quartz Team, and Underground Miner.

Displayed on the walls of the gallery are four paintings by the famed Paul Semple, done especially for Fortune Magazine which in 1937 published a feature on Mr. Kelley's company entitled "The United States of Anaconda." This collection includes graphic depictions of the Anaconda smelter, Badger Mine in Butte, Butte Hill as seen from Butte City, and "Remnants of a Blast," a vivid scene of miners working after a blast 4,000 feet under Butte Hill.

Society Making Plans To Host Annual Western History Meet

Although it is still nearly six months away, plans are now firming up well for the fifth annual conference in Helena next October 14 through 16 of the Western History Association. It is for us at the Society, and for all Montana, a most significant event, for these conferences now attract the most knowledgeable people, both in the academic world and in publishing, in the country. This promises to be the best ever.

The Association was organized in October, 1961, when a small group of western history "buffs" and professionals met in Santa Fe, New Mexico. So enthusiastic were the 300 persons who attended that they called for an "organizing committee" to plan another meeting at which a slate of officers was elected to unify and continue the spirit engendered. There following three more annual meetings, with attendance and scope increased each time.

Director Mike Kennedy made a "pitch" for Centennial Helena to become the 1964 host city at the 1963 meeting in Salt Lake City—but this was not possible. But now it has come about: Last Chance Gulch and the Historical Society will entertain hundreds of the country's distinguished historians, writers, photographers and publishers this October. Needless to say, there is much homework to be done between now and then.

Sessions, which will be held at the venerable Placer Hotel, will be so arranged that major discussions on a variety of subjects can be attended without interruption or fear of missing any significant event. Although we will discuss details more fully as time goes on, some of the topics to be explored include "Oil in the West," "20th Century Western Politics," "Science in the West," "Lewis and Clark," "Minorities in the West," "Regulars vs. Rangers in the Indian Wars." "Painting the Frontier West," "Museum Roundtable," "Religion in the West," "Mining in the West," and many others.

SOCIETY AGAIN STRUGGLES WITH INADEQUATE BUDGET

MOST members of the Montana Historical Society—and you, incidentally, as a member are numbered among the largest membership groups of its kind in the Nation — are not aware of the intricacies of financing our ever-growing operations. Previous issues have made clear that we are a State government entity; we are proud of the fact that, except for elective offices, the Montana Historical Society was chartered by the first territorial legislature in 1864 (with the beginning of Montana Territoryhood) and was enacted into law early in 1865. Therefore your Society is one of the oldest branches of Montana Government—more than a century old!

But unfortunately, after 14 frenetic years spent in developing and building our present impressive museum, library, art and publishing facilities, we are just as certain that we have not convinced the people of Montana — and particularly the State Legislature – that we are a department of the State of Montana! The 39th Legislative session, just concluded, made this abundantly clear.

A bedrock budget hammered out last summer and fall by our fifteen-member Board of Trustees realized that a minimum of $105,000 per year of appropriated tax money (general fund) represented the least feasible — and sure-money — that we could get by on in continuing the multi-services which this institution renders. This is particularly true because we are the only state agency which operates seven days a week throughout the year, and because we are one of the show places of Montana and one of the most impressive of all Western museums. We emerged from the legislature, in early March, with only $85,000 of appropriated moneys — or $20,000 less than what was determined to be a bare minimum. This money is for salaries only — it includes no operating or acquisition monies at all.

The table at the right should be of interest to all members.

You will see that in the full span of years that we have operated in the attractive edifice formally named "Montana Pioneers' and Veterans' Memorial Building," the State of Montana has contributed only a little more than half a million dollars toward our total operation. On wages and salaries alone, with the most efficient and dedicated staff pared to a minimum, it has cost us $665,902.38, up to last July 1. This has been provided from our always hard to come by privately raised and earned money.

It means, simply, that since the Montana Historical Society has occupied our present fine quarters — which incidentally were paid for from the State Federal Land Grand Fund, and not from tax monies — for salaries alone, the seven state legislatures since 1953 have appropriated out of the general fund only 79% of our salary costs. Since other operations — even such mundane things as paper clips and ballpoint pens, plus shipping, printing, office equipment, binding, microfilming — and above all art, archival and artifact acquisition which are the life-blood of any museum — one can readily see how ill we have fared at the hands of all legislatures.

Actually, in gross earnings and contributions, the Society has provided in excess of three-to-one over appropriated moneys since 1951. In other words, we have earned, in gross, in excess of a million and one-half dollars. This, of course, is what has enabled us to acquire irreplaceable and priceless objects, and to build and utilize necessary facilities, making these available as exciting public exhibits and publications of great value to history, education and heritage.

In future issues we will discuss our abortive effort to add a vitally needed, $350,000 wing to our building, during the next two years. Like our appropriation it got good lip service but no satisfaction in the session just ended!

PIONEER BIOGRAPHIES: A WORTHY CENTENNIAL ACHIEVEMENT

AN ACQUISITION of importance is a collection of more than 350 biographical sketches of pioneers living in the general vicinity of Great Falls who have been residents of Montana for 75 years or more. Gathered as a special Centennial year (1964) project by the Pioneer Search Committee and the Great Falls Territorial Centennial Search Committee, the material was presented to the Historical library last week by Mrs. Wayne Whitehorn of Floweree, a granddaughter of Joseph K. Toole, Montana's first state governor. Mrs. Whitehorn, who acted as chairman of both committees, spent many months spearheading the gigantic project. She was accompanied to Helena by Tom Lease of Great Falls, who was a member of the committee, along with Harry Keith, E. A. Cogley, Scott Warden, Dorothy Dickinson Ball, Warren Toole, Laverne F. Kelley, Sigurd Hjermsted, Louis F. Rutherford, Lena Magnuson, Alex Warden, P. E. Logan, Kathleen Cogley, Mrs. Tekla Barker, Mrs. J. S. Campbell, Mrs. Sigurd Hjermsted, Mrs. Victor Maxwell, Mrs. Jack C. Toole, Miss Elsie Campbell, Charles Bersuch, Mrs. May Silvius, Mrs. A. B. Guthrie, and Mrs. Lawrence Nelson.

PATRICIA TOOLE WHITEHORN

Space does not permit listing all the pioneers whose life stories are included — many of them accompanied by pictures. To say that biographical material on these Montana pioneers is a vital adjunct of history is to understate the case. Residents (who include Mrs. Ionne Rolfe Pierre of Cascade, a granddaughter of Gov. Sidney Edgerton, famed cowboy "Paddy" Ryan of Great Falls, and 101-year-old Joseph Wiegand of Great Falls) live in both town and country. They get mail at such places as Great Falls, Lewistown, Browning, Shelby, Grass Range, Roy, Cascade, Townsend, Fairfield, White Sulphur Springs, Augusta, Dutton, Fort Benton, Monarch, Shelby, Collins, Stanford, Highwood, Choteau, Heath, Moore, Dupuyer, Simms, Lincoln, Fallon, Cut Bank, Big Sandy, Sun River, Fort Shaw, Martinsdale, Hays, Conrad, Chinook, Hilger, Reed Point, Valier, Harlowton, Eden, Belt, Manhattan, Utica, Havre and Libby.

"Centennial Pioneer is the title given to persons living in 1964 who were Montana residents and who resided in Montana in 1889 or earlier," Mrs. Whitehorn said in making the presentation. "The prime motivation of our committees in 1964 was to do honor to these stalwart people who are among the real reasons why Montana had occasion for celebration last year. It is our hope that these stories and pictures may aid in the recording of Montana history by future generations as well as to make public record of the accomplishments of such genuine pioneers who helped build the West."

IVORY COLLECTION IN BEAUTIFUL SETTING DRAWS CROWDS

RARELY HAS any new feature in the Society's museums caused more visitor comment than the recently completed display of carved ivory acquired through the generosity of Mrs. Harry Reif and Robert O. Kerr, in memory of their parents, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Kerr. Mr. Kerr was long-time president of Montana Power Company. Collecting the pieces of exquisitely carved ivory was a long-time hobby for both him and his wife. The mahogany cabinetry housing the collection is located on the lower floor level. Backgrounds of each segment are hung in velvet and satin in black and olive green, with the larger sections featuring central display pedestals which turn electrically. Curator Bob Morgan, in arranging the displays, has managed to bring orderly arrangement, with objects related as to mood or subject matter placed together. The result is an eye-catching panorama which gets long and careful study by viewers.

A STAKE IN WORLD MUSEUM OF MINING

CURATOR ROBERT F. MORGAN, left, of the Montana Historical Society staff was pictured in Butte recently along with John Guilbert, research geologist for the Anaconda Company. Guilbert is pointing out to Morgan a proposed site for what should be an exciting project: a World Museum of Mining, a project in which the Historical Society is deeply interested and to which it hopes to make a contribution by way of consultation and staff support. Guilbert is president of the non-profit organization which is already laying plans for a comprehensive museum and is in the midst of a promising fund-raising campaign which will eventually be world-wide in scope. The site pictured here is in the Orphan Girl Mine district, west of Butte. In the background is one example of the storied mine machinery in Butte which will provide part of the built-in features of the outdoor aspects of the museum.

NICK EGGENHOFER, NOTED ARTIST—WRITER, DISTINGUISHED VISITOR

A RECENT VISIT to Helena by Mr. and Mrs. Nick Eggenhofer of Cody, Wyo., resulted in a mutual-admiration experience for the distinguished artist and for us at the Society. The occasion was a recent showing in our Gary Cooper Gallery of a fine collection of Eggenhofer originals, all of which were typical of why this Bavarian-born man has emerged as one of America's most successful western artists. At the left, Mr. Eggenhofer is seen autographing a personal copy of his recent Wagons, Mules and Men which he wrote and illustrated. Governor Tim Babcock, who welcomed the Eggenhofers to his office in the capitol, is the grateful recipient.

Introducing . . .
HOWARD A. JOHNSON
Member of the Board

HOWARD A. JOHNSON of Butte, prominent Montana lawyer, former legislator and Supreme Court Chief Justice, has served ably on our Board of Trustees since August, 1951. He has thus witnessed a period of most notable growth, when the Society moved its library and museum collection from the old quarters in the capitol building to our present home.

A native of Beloit, Wis., Judge Johnson was educated at Illinois State Normal (now Illinois State University at Normal), and then went on to the University of Montana, where he took a B.A. in 1916 and an LL.B in 1917. He received an honorary LL.D. degree from the Montana School of Mines in 1942. A member of the U. S. Army Air Service in World War I, he capped a distinguished overseas career in the infant air arm when he was brevetted a military aviator in the French Army in 1918 and served as a pilot with the 638th Aero Squadron.

Judge Johnson served in Montana's House of Representatives from Silver Bow County in 1921 and 1922, and was then elected Jefferson County Attorney, serving from 1923 to 1928. In 1928 he was appointed Assistant U. S. Attorney for the District of Montana, functioning in that post until 1931. He became Chief Justice of the Montana Supreme Court in 1938, serving until 1946. He joined the Board of Trustees of the Society in August, 1951, holding the office of Board President from 1957 to 1959. Since 1958, Judge Johnson's other civic duties have included chairmanship of Montana's Rhodes Scholarship Selection Committee. He is a former member of the Board of Bar Examiners, State Board of Pardons, Montana School of Mines' executive board, and the Governor's Committee on Problems of the Aging. He is an ardent member of The Westerner's, and deeply interested in frontier history.

IMPOSING KODIAK IS SNARLING ATTRACTION

THERE HAVE been squeals of both delight and apprehension in our lower floor galleries recently when visitors happen suddenly upon the upraised and snarling figure of this Kodiak brown bear, donated to the Society by Herman R. Peterson of Dillon. Shot by Peterson on Unimak Island, Alaska, in 1963, the bear is not the largest specimen of Kodiak ever taken by man—but he is an imposing nine feet tall and a prime example of his kind.

HISTORY OF GALLANT 41st PRESENTED

A PLEASANT presentation of important military historical material took place in the Donald G. Nutter Memorial veteran's museum during the hectic final days of the 39th legislative session, just concluded. Here, at left, Senator Ward Beley (D. Harlowton) holds a bound volume of all files of JUNGLEER, official publication of the 41st Infantry Division Association, which included the Montana National Guard in World Wars I and II. Director Kennedy accepts, while Representative Robert Dye (R. Bozeman) looks on and holds the organization's record of outstanding achievement in the South Pacific campaigns against the Japanese in World War II: THE JUNGLEERS: A HISTORY OF THE 41st INFANTRY DIVISION published by the Infantry Journal Press, Washington, D.C., in 1948. Needless to say, we were honored and pleased to accept these important source documents on the men, living and dead, particularly of the 163rd Montana Infantry, who fought so valiantly in the "famed 41st."

YOUR LIBRARY:
KEY TO YOUR FUTURE

"FOR A BETTER-READ, BETTER-INFORMED AMERICA!" is the provocative theme for this year's eighth observance of National Library Week in Montana, April 25 through May 1, according to State Chairman George N. Lund of Reserve. Needless to say, the Historical Society has a deep interest in this observance and commends its objectives to every library, on every level, in our state.

Primary goal in 1965 will be the implementation and interpretation of the "Guide to the Development of Library Service in Montana," presently being prepared by Associate Professor Ruth Warncke of Western Reserve University at the request of the Montana Library Association. A distinguished library consultant, Professor Warncke is aiming her guide as an all inclusive development plan for every type of Montana library: public, school, college, university and special.

Director Kennedy and Librarian Mary Dempsey are both active in the State Library Week plans.

SINCE THE FIRE OF 1874: A REKINDLED SENSE OF HISTORY

"The officers [of the Montana Historical Society] do not believe that the citizens of Montana will always remain so indifferent to their own achivements, so forgetful of their own sacrifices, deprivations and toils, as to deny the utmost encouragement to the solitary incorporated institution within the limits of the Territory having for its exclusive object the perpetuation of this most wonderful and romantic story . . ."

These words were included in the official Historical Society report of Dec. 1, 1888, directed to Territorial Governor Preston H. Leslie. A little more than a year before, in July, 1887, the collection of library materials and artifacts had been moved into the new Lewis and Clark County courthouse. It was a vast improvement over temporary quarters which had been procured, in hit or miss fashion, since the fire of 1874 had destroyed a great portion of Helena, including the law offices of Col. Wilbur Fisk Sanders in which the Society's holdings were kept.

Col. Sanders, responsible more than any other individual for the work of the Society during its first 25 years, pointed out to Gov. Leslie in December, 1887: "While not all that could be desired for an institution of such consequence to the people of Montana, it is nevertheless true that its present quarters are much more commodious and appropriate than those heretofore occupied by it that complaint would . . . be unjustifiable, if not churlish."

But by 1888, Historical Librarian William F. Wheeler foresaw the need for larger quarters. In his report, he said: "The rooms which [we] occupy in the courthouse by the considerate spirit of the Commissioners of Lewis and Clarke County, answer [our] present needs, but it would seem to be desirable that [the Society] obtain a lot upon which it can in the future construct a fireproof building to hold such treasures as it is destined ultimately to come into possession of. Indeed, its present possessions could not be destroyed without inflicting a lasting injury upon the Territory of Montana and very materially limiting the story of the sacrifice and toils of its early trappers, fur traders, adventurers and pioneers."

Wheeler, a former U.S. Marshal and director of the 1870 census, was the Society's first paid librarian. He received $25 a month in 1887, asked for a raise in 1889: "My duties here keep me constantly and I ask that my salary be increased to $50 per month." Wheeler also pointed out that the collection contained some 2,000 bound books, 200 bound volumes of newspapers, and around 120 unbound newspaper volumes. It would cost $500 to bind them, he said, and other expenses would run about $350 per year.

The Librarian then made a truly prophetic statement: "In the near future it [the Society] should have offices, a hall, library room and private study and reading rooms in a fireproof building of its own." The "near future" turned out to be a good 60 years away.

In January, 1889, some new acquisitions were reported: a cane rocking chair "for lady visitors," donated by Gov. Leslie; a set of plaster of paris counterfeit dies, for making U.S. silver dollars, found on the prairie between Fort Benton and Fort Assiniboine and donated by Wagon Freighter Matthew

THE LIBRARY, 60 YEARS LATER . . .

Society's Work a Labor of Love to the Dedicated . . .

Carroll; a broken needle gun, found at the Bears Paw battlefield after the capture of Chief Joseph, donated by Vigilante John X. Beidler. Wheeler noted his own donation of "a railroad spike of the antediluvian period, exactly resembling in shape and size the iron spikes now in use, proving there is nothing new under the sun."

The report of 1889 asked for a modest appropriation of $1,060.00, and ended with these acute words: "In the great amount of our original manuscripts, diaries and Montana newspapers, this Society has laid the best foundation for the early history and the subsequent history since the organization of the Territory of any state or territory in the Union, I believe. And if the honorable Legislature could or would appreciate what it has done, they would be quick to appropriate the little sum we need per year!"

Early in 1890, the long active service of Wilbur Fisk Sanders to the Society came to an end when he resigned to become one of the new State's first U.S. Senators. Granville Stuart, the pioneer stalwart who was one of the original "corporators" and whose interest in Montana history never flagged, was named president to replace him. The minutes of the meeting of Feb. 1, 1890, contain these words: "On motion of William Cullen, a vote of thanks was returned to Col. Sanders for his 25 years of invaluable service to the Historical Society, and he was requested to furnish a picture of himself to hang upon the walls of the Society's rooms."

A little more than four years later, in July, 1894, Col. Sanders' moving eulogy to recently deceased William F. Wheeler was spread upon the record: "Serving for a long period of time without adequate compensation and for some time without any pecuniary reward," he said, "it was through all the period of his service with him a labor of love."

Under the leadership of such men as these, the Society had begun, in 1876, to publish the series of ten Contributions, bound volumes containing typescripts of many of the original journals and other materials being acquired, along with news of the Society itself, its meetings, business transactions, and memoirs of its distinguished members. They sold at modest prices then, but today collectors would gladly pay up to $200 per volume, if available.

Volume I contained a vast trove of information, including a touching and informative sketch of the life of James Stuart, who died at lonely old Fort Peck in 1873. His brother, Granville, who traveled the long miles to bring his brother's body home to Deer Lodge, wrote the history-laden sketch.

The preamble to Volume I said in part: "The contributions herewith published have been accumulated since our fire, and they will be followed by others of increasing interest . . . In the hope that this volume will intensify the interest which is felt in our local history and that it will be accepted as a personal appeal to each of the pioneers and others to place their experiences here in an enduring form among our archives, it is issued by the directors of the Society in fulfillment of a duty, and in partial discharge of a trust which they sincerely hope may be more adequately and worthily discharged in the future."

Volume II, published in 1896, contains a welter of sketches of the history of various sections of Montana and of the State's leading citizens. There was a good account of the national Centennial observances of 1876 and Montana's part in it. Fully quoted is a flowery eulogy of Montana, delivered at the famed Philadelphia Exposition of 1876 by William A. Clark. One of the most significant contributions in the archives was also published: the Journal of James H. Bradley, delineating Col. John Gibbons' part in the bloody 1876 campaign against the Sioux, which included the Custer Battle.

Through the years, whenever funds were available, the Society continued to publish its Contributions. Vol. III appeared in 1900, Volume IV in 1903, Volume V in 1904, Volume VI in 1907, Volume VII in 1910, Volume IX in 1923, and the final Volume X in 1940. All contain the grassroots history of the Territory and state — sometimes contemporary at the time of publication, but rare historical research material now.

In 1902, with the completion of the new state capitol building, the Society moved from the courthouse (by now incredibly cramped) into what most people believed would be quarters adequate for an indefinite time. But it was not long before the same condition prevailed: the collection, by now augmented by a growing aggregation of museum objects, was bursting at the seams.

There then began a series of legislative attempts to build an adequate building. The first legislative act leading toward this reality was introduced in 1923. It was followed by similar moves in 1929, 1939 and finally that of 1941, which really set in motion a well-conceived program for the erection of the Society's present building, known as the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building.

By 1928, the public need for better quarters for the Society was reflected in the press. In a long, illustrated article in mid-December of that year,

INDIAN DISPLAY, 1904 . . .

SIXTY YEARS LATER . . .

Prize Ring Played a Role in Furnishing New Edifice

the Helena Daily Independent pleaded for a new building, to be built with land grant funds, and to be named "Vigilante Hall."

The article said, in part: "Lining the corridor of the [east] wing of the capitol, on the ground floor, are dozens of cases, each containing priceless trophies and relics. These exhibits are jammed together, many of them piled one on top of the other in such a manner that they cannot be seen well by the people who look over the collection. The apparent jumbled condition of the cases is not a reflection on the librarian, but on the fact that the people of the state have not been awakened to the necessity for proper display of the relics."

The year 1941 saw the first solid move toward realization of a separate, suitable building. Judge Lester Loble, then president of the Society of Montana Pioneers and the Sons and Daughters of Montana Pioneers, has set forth some of the details:

"The problem was how to built it, and where to get the funds. It was finally determined that an effort would be made to earmark certain funds in the Capitol Building Land Grant Fund. However, none of this money could be used for any purpose except building, which left none for furnishings.

"During this period, meetings were held by representatives of the Society of Montana Pioneers, the Sons and Daughters of Montana Pioneers, and the Veterans' Welfare Commission to see if they could work together. It was just a chance meeting as the result of a telephone call that got a few of those interested together, probably five or six, at the Placer Hotel . . .

"At the meeting it was determined that the Pioneers, Sons and Daughters of Pioneers and the Veterans would combine forces to erect a building to be known as the Montana Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building."

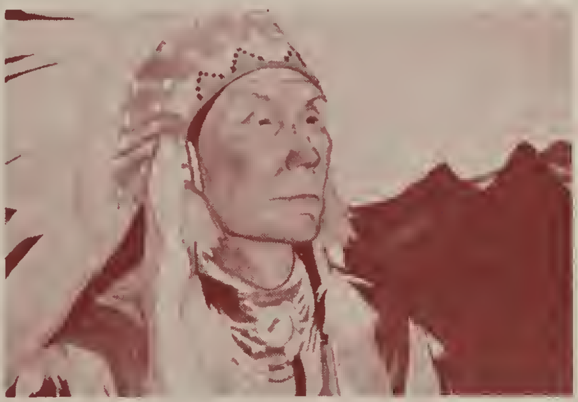
The lots on which the building rose, across Roberts Street from the capitol, were donated by the Pioneers. Furnishings were paid for out of a fund of $48,000 which the Veterans had on deposit in the state treasury. The source of these funds is another interesting story: Following the boxing match in Sydney, Australia in 1908 in which Jack Johnson wrested the championship from Tommy Burns, a great hue and cry arose to find a "white hope" who could defeat the great Negro fighter. Boxing was in disrepute at the time and many states, including Montana, banned it entirely. A 1914 referendum to legalize the sport in Montana was defeated by poplar vote. But in 1919 the Montana Legislature legalized boxing, provided that a certain portion of the net proceeds go for the benefit of soldiers, sailors and marines. It was the accumulation of money in this fund which evenutally furnished the impressive Veterans and Pioneer Memorial Building, present home of the Society.

Buildings plans submitted by Architect A. V. McIver of Great Falls were accepted by the State Board of Examiners and by all interested veterans and pioneers groups, in July, 1948. Contracts were awarded to Carson Construction Company of Helena in March, 1950. The fine, $750,000 building was completed for occupancy in the summer of 1952.

Much has been written about the Society's beautiful limestone building, its extensive C. M. Russell collection, its carefully planned and chronologically arranged Frontier Museum, its rotating art galleries, its informal and colorful Pioneer Museum, and its vigorous publishing program. And spanning more than 100 years in significance and importance is the library collection which grew in spite of fire and disappointment and is now kept safely and catalogued for easy reference on the second floor of the building and in five modern stack levels.

The sage words of Wilbur Fisk Sanders, as he reported the Society's condition in 1878, still apply: "As heretofore, the directors have avoided all matters which have been the subject of current heated controversy, preferring to deal with subjects in which they might hope to command a universal sympathy. And they have sought to excite an interest in the preservation of all matters which effect the Territory and have no permanent repository but exist only in the memory of living actors and observers." Montana's heritage and her incredible rich and exciting history, are well represented by the present $35,000,000 collection nurtured and displayed by the Montana Historical Society as the year 1965 begins its second century.

Historic Blackfeet Portraits Join Collection



YELLOW KIDNEY

Eleven portraits of Blackfeet Indians, painted from life during the summers of 1926 and 1927, have been received by the Society for its permanent collection of western art. They are a gift of the artist, Mrs. Elsa Jemne of St. Paul, Minn., who painted them at the invitation of the late Ralph Budd, then president of the Great Northern Railroad, and a personal friend of Mrs. Jemne.

"The Indians set up a large teepee as a studio for me, in the midst of their own lodges," Mrs. Jemne recently recalled. "At night they played muted drums and chanted old songs, sitting on low couches of skins around the fire in the center, the smoke going up through a smoke-hole at the top. I came to know them very well, as friends."

During the nearly 40 years since Mrs. Jemne painted the portraits, all her subjects have "passed to the happy hunting grounds," including the famed Yellow Kidney, who appears in his full regalia of feather head-dress and buckskin jacket fringed with ermine tails. The artist caught her subjects when they were still largely untouched by the white man, and recalls taking great pains to include every detail of ornamentation and dress in her paintings.

Besides Yellow Kidney, portraits include those of Mrs. Crow Feathers; Si-Mo-Set (Goes After Water,) painted with her child; Mrs. Star (Squaw from the West); Mrs. Barry Child, and Pu-Ka-Ki, an Indian woman. Portraits of four other Indian men and one woman, untitled, complete this remarkable and valued collection.

Scriver Models Gift of Actor Geo. Montgomery

Four plaster models of sculpture by Bob Scriver, noted taxidermist and sculptor of Browning, Mont., have been deeded to the Society's permanent collection by George Montgomery, Montana-born film actor. Montgomery, who acquired the models in 1961 when Scriver took a collection of his work to California, maintains a lively interest in his native state and the work of its artists.

Included in the group is the massive Return of the Blackfoot Raiders, inspired by the legend of four cowardly Blackfeet who became heroes when they attacked a tribe of Crows at night, killed the chief and several braves, and came home in triumph leading the horses and possessions of their enemies. Transition is an appealing piece containing three figures: the old man Indian still clinging to his tribal ways, his daughter who is sending her young son off to the white man's school. Pronghorns in Action and Bellowing Bull, the other pieces in the collection, are action sculptures which reveal Scriver's skill at modeling anatomy.

Bob Scriver, a former teacher, is perhaps best known as a taxidermist, although his work as a sculptor is gaining increasing favor. His work in mounting the remains of the great white buffalo Big Medicine for the Society's museum was one of his most challenging assignments in taxidermy.

Now in One Portfolio: The Greatest in Western Art

After some years of effort and frustrating delay, the Society is now privileged to offer to lovers of Western Art a portfolio of large full-color lithographic art reprints by some of the great masters. Space limitations preclude our giving all details here, but we urge every member to query as soon as possible, for this unique offer is limited to only 500 sets.

There are six superb C. M. Russell subjects, two of them from our own collection, three from the private collection of C. R. Smith, president of American Air Lines, and one, a unique collaboration of CMR and Olaf Seltzer, by special permission from the owner, E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra, president of our board of trustees.

Montana Artist J. K. Ralston is represented by his great Custer depiction, Prelude to Disaster, the original of which was loaned from England to be reproduced for the portfolio. There are two important Frederic Remington subjects, two rare ones by Charles Schreyvogel, two by Oscar Edmund Berninghaus, two by Henry F. Farny, and one each by Frank Tenney Johnson and Tom Lea.

Here, in one package, the lover of the best in Western art may augment his collection with rare large, prime prints of many subjects never before reproduced, and very likely never again available.

Of the 17 subjects offered, you will have your choice of 15. The choice includes two great Russells, Free Trappers and Indian Hunters Return, too large to be shipped in the portfolio cover but sent separately. We emphasize again: send your inquiry directly to Director Mike Kennedy as soon as possible and receive the details — including sizes, prices, titles and information about the artists — by return mail.

SOCIETY RECEIVED HISTORIC MANDATE 100 YEARS AGO

"IT IS FOR OUR PEOPLE now to say whether they will preserve the early history of Montana in an enduring form, so that after times may know the thrilling drama here enacted." These words were printed nearly a century ago by THE MONTANA POST of Virginia City, Montana Territory's first bona fide newspaper as it reported on the second meeting of the infant Historical Society, held March 25, 1865, at the hardware store office of Walter B. Dance and Granville Stuart in Virginia City.

This month, as Montana's State Legislature meets for the 39th time and Montanans have witnessed the burial of a time capsule containing evidence of our first 100 years as a Territory and State, it seems appropriate to reminisce on "the enduring form" which the Historical Society has assumed since it received its first official mandate on February 2, 1865.

Actually, we begin our second century. The Territory's first legislative assembly, meeting in Bannack in December, 1864, received notice on the 19th (the seventh day) that Francis M. Thompson (a native of Massachusetts) representing Beaverhead County, would "introduce a bill to incorporate the Historical Society of Montana" in the Territorial Council (comparable to the present-day Senate). The body received the measure, designated Council Bill 15, on Wednesday, December 21, 1864. It was read twice and, on motion, was referred to the Committee on Education. Two days later, that committee reported favorably, and it was referred to the Committee on Corporations, which acted on it favorably on Christmas Eve day. The Council passed the bill with six ayes and no dissenting votes.

When the bill went to the House, however, it was read twice and referred to a select committee of five, which gave an adverse report on December 30. Councilman Thompson, in a letter of reminiscence written in 1908, expressed the belief that tabling was the result of "some jealousy about the persons named in the act of incorporation." It was during the afternoon session of January 25, 1865, that the Incorporations Committee of the House "begged leave to report said bill back to the house and recommend its passage with an amendment to Section I." The amendment added the names of William Graham, Granville Stuart, W. W. DeLacy, C. E. Irvine and C. S. Bagg to the list of corporators. The original list had included H. L. Hosmer, C. P. Higgins, John Owen, James Stuart, W. F. Sanders, Malcolm Clark, and F. M. Thompson.

Thus, with minor revision, the bill was now acceptable. The first Territorial House passed it and sent it to Gov. Sidney Edgerton, who affixed his signature on February 2, 1865. The Historical Society of Montana now had legal force "to collect and arrange facts in regard to the early history of this Territory, the discovery of its Mines, incidents of the fur trade, etc." It was the first special department of Montana government.

A week later, on February 8, when the duties of Territorial Auditor John S. Lott (appointed by Gov. Edgerton in 1864) were outlined, they included this significant line: "He shall keep his office at the seat of government. in connection with the library of the Territory, which office shall be furnished, at the expense of the Territory with all needful maps, books, blanks, stationery, cases for books, etc." In a legal sense, then, Auditor Lott was also the Historical Society Librarian, although no evidence has ever been found that he functioned as such.

The Second and Third Assemblies made efforts to secure federal funds for the Territorial Library. But since their deliberations were declared null and void by Congress, the Historical Society received no funds either as a corporate group or as an official Library with the Auditor as librarian until July 15, 1870, when the Congress appropriated $2500 to each of the five Territories, including Montana, for the purchase of law books. It is assumed, although no record exists, that the books were delivered the next year and placed in the office of the Territorial Auditor. In a reorganization of Territorial laws during the 1871-72 session, it was again reiterated that the auditor was "ex-officio librarian."

Despite all this legal maneuvering, however, retrospect now demands that credit for fostering and nurturing the Historical Society Library and its collection of artifacts, manuscripts, newspapers and other materials belongs to the small coterie of corporators, most notable Wilbur Fisk Sanders. He never relinquished his private interest in collecting materials, acted as custodian and indeed served the Society as an officer for all its first quarter century.

At an Extraordinary Legislative Session in 1873, Sanders rose and made an impassioned and prophetic plea for continuing the work of gathering historical memorabilia. He said, in part: "In 1865 I requested Malcolm Clark . . . to prepare a history of events . . . he neglected the work . . . he has a sister who is competent to the task. I have also sought to gather together all books of a local character, pamphlets published by our citizens . . . files of our various newspapers published here . . . We are on the mailing list of the Secretary of the Interior and the Smithsonian Institute. We have about 200 volumes in our library . . . government reports of surveys for a Pacific R. R. and in a few days I expect possession of diaries of various trading posts and also of some of their attaches . . .

"The great embarrassment has heretofore been a lack of funds but in the face of it we trust something has been done which will be prized by the teeming thousands who shall succeed us and find homes and comfort and happiness within the limits of our great . . . and magnificent territory."

Undoubtedly because of Sanders' plea, the Library finally received its first appropriation from the Territorial Legislature when Council Bill 70 was signed by Gov. B. F. Potts on May 7, 1873. It granted "the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars . . . each year . . . to the Historical Society of Montana, to be expended for the purchase of manuscripts and books illustrating the early history of the region of our country now embraced by the territory . . ."

The first formal meeting of the Society in many years came the same year, the members no doubt encour- by this first evidence of sustain- egislative support. The meeting s held at the courthouse in Deer odge on October 24, 1873. The New Northwest, published in Deer Lodge, said, in part: "As there is a considerble amount of valuable manuscript history of the early days of Montana in possession of individuals whose death or removal at any day place it beyond the acquisition of the Society, it is hoped the Society will be able to gain possession of it . . . We hope all efforts of theirs to collect and preserve the record of the early day will meet with full success as they will assuredly be regarded with gratitude by the generations who shall live . . ."

New members, designated as corporate, corresponding and honorary, were taken in at the meeting, including Charlotte O. Van Cleve, the only known woman to join the Society in any capacity during its first decade. A constitution was adopted, its preamble setting forth the purposes of the Society: "to take charge of and preserve curiosities appropriate to such a collection and all specimens of valuable minerals and remains of extinct species of animals, fossils and petrifaction as shall be presented to the Society without charge to it—and to preserve the same for public examination to the end that Montana may have one cabinet to attest her resources and her fertility in producing curious and rare contributions to Natural History and that the board of directors be requested to carry this purpose into full effect."

This vitally important meeting also provided a complete set of officers, including a Librarian, William E. Cullen, who was also a member of the Society. All the materials thus far gathered were yet in Virginia City, and headquarters of the Society, although unofficial, was still presumably at the original meeting place in the Dance and Stuart store.

The exact date is not known, but sometime between November, 1873 and early in January, 1874, the collection was moved to Colonel Sanders' law office in the library building in Helena, a structure owned by Holter Brothers and Cornelius Hedges.

On January 9, 1874, a devastating fire started in the Chinatown section of South Last Chance Gulch. It destroyed most of the city's business places, including the Library building which housed the Society's collection. It was a staggering blow.

The fact that the Society, under the leadership of Colonel Sanders, began anew by publishing an appeal for material is one of the true highlights of the institution's history—one that ranks with the original act of incorporation itself in farsightedness.

The Legislature of 1874 recognized the great loss, and on February 10 approved a concurrent resolution appropriating $500 a year to the Society. In the Summer of 1887, the collection was moved into quarters in the new Lewis and Clark courthouse, and in September of the next year, W. F. Wheeler became the organization's first paid librarian, at $25 a month. The next year he asked for and got $50.

The vast collection now in the Historical Society Library, has all been gathered since the great fire of 1874. Indeed, judging from the increased Legislative support after that time and the fact that the Society was able to produce the first volume of the series of ten Contributions to the Historical Society, the fire acted as a catalyst to the apathetic who were forceably reminded of the need for preservation of the vital stuff of Montana history.

The many developments during the 91 years since the fire will be dealt with at some length in our next newsletter. It will attempt to show how the original organization of individual incorporators evolved from a simple collection of mineral samples and artifacts, to a Law Library, to a full-blown research library, to a many-sided Historical Society complete with museums, art galleries and a vigorous publishing program.

Introducing . . .
JOHN MICHAEL FLEMING
Library Assistant

THE Historical Society is fortunate in retaining the services, over a significant period of years, of two men who are young in years but long on experience and know-how. Some months ago we introduced the first, Richard B. Duffy, our business manager, who began his career in 1952 before we made the move from the capitol building into our present quarters.

The other young man whose long experience in the Historical Library dates back to high school days is John Michael Fleming. A native of Helena, Mike began working as a stack boy in 1955. Needless to say, his knowledge of the fascinating by-ways and shelving on the five stack levels and the treasure of Montana information they hold is broad indeed.

After graduation from Helena High School, Mike continued at the Library on a part-time basis during his career at Carroll College, which terminated with a degree in history in 1961. He left us for Army service and for one year of teaching at Las Vegas, Nev., but happily returned in 1963. He was married in September of 1964 to the former Glenda Gibson of Billings.

Mike, whose Library duties now run a broad gamut from microfilming to indexing, is an avid hunter and fisherman, which might partially explain his decision to return to and stay in Montana. Undoubtedly another part of the picture is his deep interest in the history of his State and the opportunity of participation which his career at the Society affords.

Acquisition of Stenzel Paxson Collection Now Official

THE largest single aggregation of original Edgar S. Paxson art in existence has officially become a part of the Society's rapidly growing permanent collection. The 107 paintings, drawings and sketches, which have a low appraised market value of just under $20,000, are a gift from Dr. and Mrs. Franz Stenzel of Portland, Ore., whose private collection of Western art continues to be one of the world's most complete.

Documents signed on December 18, 1964 by the donors and Director Mike Kennedy concluded the significant acquisition. The collection, which constitutes a complete cross-section of the output of the pioneer Montana artist, includes major oil and water color painting, pen and ink drawings and sketches.

Dr. Stenzel, a practicing Portland physician, joined with his wife, Kathy, some years ago in collecting and (most importantly) cataloging data on all Northwest artists, many of them virtually unknown or forgotten. A showing of segments carefully culled from the collection was a major event at our institution and the Eastern Washington State Historical Society in Spokane in 1963. These exhibitions resulted in the publication of a catalog with biographical sketches on the nearly 50 artists shown. Now this is being expanded to a book-length treatment on Northwestern and Pacific Northwest art and artists.

Edgar S. Paxson, who came to Montana in 1877 as a 25-year-old freighter, became a very prolific painter, illustrator and muralist. Interest in his work, which lagged to some extent after his death in 1919, has revived markedly. He is represented by eight fine murals in the Missoula County Courthouse and six in the House chambers of the capitol building in Helena. But perhaps he is best known for his epic 6 x 9-foot oil, "Custer's Last Battle on the Little Big Horn," completed in 1899 when he was living in Butte. In 1906 he moved his family to Missoula.

"Because E. S. Paxson was on the scene only a year after the Custer Battle, his work has a special historic as well as artistic significance," Director Kennedy said in accepting the collection. "We applaud the generosity of Dr. and Mrs. Stenzel in making such a representative collection of the work of this pioneer artist available for the enjoyment of Montanans and visitors, and to ensure their preservation and retention in the artist's adopted state for future generations."

Phone Call Confirms Gift of Ivory

Just as we go to press, we are informed by our Board President, E. E. MacGilvra, that a telephone conversation has confirmed the acquisition by the Society of the extensive and interesting Frank and Kitty Kerr collection of carved ivory. The call came from Mrs. Harry Reif of Bozeman, Montana, the former Etta Kerr. She informed MacGilvra that the collection is donated to the Society by herself and her brother, Robert O. Kerr of Long Beach, Calif. in memory of their parents. The late Frank Kerr, a pioneer in Montana's power and light industry, was a long-time president of Montana Power Company. In informing us of the acquisition, MacGilvra pointed out another interesting sidelight on the Kerr family and the current Legislative assembly: Mrs. Robert Dye of Bozeman, a daughter of Mrs. Reif, is in Helena with her husband, who is representing Gallatin County in the newly convened House of Representatives.

Meanwhile Curator Bob Morgan and his assistant, Perry Chisholm, are completing the work of cataloging the collection of nearly 150 exquisitely carved ivory pieces. A specially designed display area will be created on the museum's lower level to give full and effective display of the collection.

Complete Catalog of Poindexter Collection

A complete catalog of 82 paintings in the Poindexter Collection of Contemporary American Art, given to the people of Montana through the Historical Society by Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Poindexter of New York, is now available. It lists an impressive array of advanced art by 35 modern artists, their titles and mediums.

Fronted with a handsome full-color reproduction of Earl Kerkam's self-portrait, the catalog points out that this huge collection represents, generally, the work of abstract painters of the "New York School" or those who have been influenced by them.

E. G. Poindexter, a native of Dillon, Mont., and his wife donated the collection in memory of two distinguished Montana pioneers: Mr. Poindexter's maternal grandfather, Lt. Col. Everton Judson Conger (1836-1918) who topped off a Civil War career with commanding the party which captured John Wilkes Booth and later became a supreme court judge in Montana Territory; and Mr. Poindexter's father, Hon. Joseph Boyd Poindexter (1869-1951), widely known Montana lawyer, judge, Attorney General and Governor General of the Territory of Hawaii.

"It was during the Fifties that I studied modern painting, met many of the contemporary artists and came to understand and appreciate these new directions in art. I have given them as a major collection in the hope that some of the pleasure they have given me can be shared by the people of my beloved and beautiful native state," Mr. Poindexter said.

Artists represented in the collection—believed to be one of the largest and most representative of its kind west of Manhattan—include Willem DeKooning (four paintings). Robert DeNiro (19), Louis Elshemius (3), Michael Goldberg (2), Robert Goodnough (8), Arshile Gorky (2), Al Held (2), Earl Kerkam (9), Robert Natkin (3), Milton Resnick (3), Joe Stefanelli (2), Jack Tworkov (2), Emerson Woelffer (2), plus single canvases by Jacques Beckwith, Marcele Bonevardi, Georgio Cavallon, Herman Cherry, Richard Diebenkorn, Ernest Dieringer, Sonia Gechtoff, Adolph Gottlieb, Philip Guston, David Hare, Budd Hopkins, Franz Kline, George McNeil, Jules Olitski, Jackson Pollack, Richards Ruben, Felix Ruvolo, Aaron Siskin, Hyde Solomon, Teiji Takai, James Weeks, and Manoucher Yektai.

Introducing . . .
W.B.(JUNIOR) SPEAR
Member of the Board

ONE of the more recent members of our Board of Trustees is a man whose roots go so deeply into Montana's open range past that it has been a matter of discipline for us to introduce him in a few paragraphs.

He is Willis Benton Spear, the third member of his family to bear this first and last name, the third to range cattle carrying the Spear O brand, and the second to serve in the Senate of a Western state.

For 46 years, W. B. (Junior) Spear has operated his ranch in Big Horn County, 100 miles east of Billings, Mont. and 50 miles north of Sheridan, Wyo. His cattle still graze, under his active supervision, on historic grounds on the Crow Reservation, just east of where George Custer and his men fell nearly 90 years ago.

The first Willis Spear in Montana was the subject's grandfather, Willis Bradford Spear. He came to Gold Creek, near present Drummond, in the Spring of 1875 as a member of an overland wagon party bound for the Willamette Valley in Oregon. Hearing of rich gold strikes on Gold Creek, the party halted its journey at the now-ghost town of New Chicago. Spear was never caught up in the gold fever, but rather turned to stock-raising, settling in 1883 near Big Horn, Wyoming and establishing the famed Spear O brand. His son, Willis Moses Spear, carried on the ranching tradition, branching out into the Powder River country of Montana. He began a family tradition of his own: service as Senator from Sheridan County in Wyoming's legislature, from 1920 to 1932.

Born at Big Horn, Wyo., on Jan. 7, 1888, Willis Benton Spear was only 12 years old when he began breaking horses for his father. At 19, he was wagon boss when a herd of 7,000 cattle belonging to Thomas Cruse's famed N-Bar were trailed from Custer, Mont. to the Spear Brothers headquarters ranch on Bitter Creek near Moorehead, Mont. on the Powder River. Spear recalls that it took parts of the years 1907 and 1908 to move this vast herd. Four years later, when the land had been surveyed, Junior Spear filed a homestead on it.

With winter chores at a standstill, young Spear took time out for business college training in Lincoln, Neb. and a short course in agriculture at the University of Iowa. He purchased his present ranch on the Crow Reservation in Big Horn County in 1919. Entering politics for the first time in the mid-1930's, he served as sheriff of Big Horn County. In 1946 he came to Helena as his county's senator, serving until 1961.

It is hardly necessary to say that W. B. Spear's interest in Montana history is more than academic. His collection of memorabilia is bound up with first-hand experience and a consciousness that he has lived and participated in much of it. His sense of public service, too, is real and uncontrived. The Society is now in the happy circumstance of benefitting from both enthusiasms.

I, Benjamin F. By the Governor

Secretary of Montana

OUR COVER STORY on Montana's achievement of statehood in 1889 and the political upheavals which marked it has evinced considerable reader interest. Among the most provocative reactions came from Gilbert D. Harlan of Inglewood, Calif., whose grandfather was a member of the first hectic session:

I thoroughly enjoy reading The Montana Post and want to compliment you on your choice of material and the terrific job you are doing.

I especially appreciated the October issue with its story of the controversial first session of the Montana Legislature. My grandfather, W. B. Harlan, was a member of that session. Representing Missoula County, I don't believe that he was directly involved in the controversy; however, I found that his credentials consisted of two certificates of election (see cuts). One was signed on October 15, 1889, by D. D. Bogart, County Clerk of Missoula County and the other signed on November 4, 1889, by Benjamin F. White, Territorial Governor. I don't know whether this was regular procedure or whether the second one, signed by Governor White, was to assure him of his seat in case it was questioned.

Apparently some of the hot tempers later cooled and ill feelings soothed, because the members formed the Society of the First Legislative Assembly of Montana and held annual reunions for many years to rehash that stormy first session. Their meeting in 1917 was held at the Placer Hotel in Helena and, according to an account in the Helena Independent of that year, was attended by nine of the original members, although 28 members of the assembly and nine of the senate were still alive at that time. Of the attending members, six were Republicans and three were Democrats. That prompted W. C. Whaley to say: "If we had been outnumbered in the session of 1889 by the Republicans as we are tonight, there would not have been a deadlock or anything like it." Mr. Whaley was secretary-treasurer of the Society and had jointly represented Jefferson and Gallatin Counties in the first session. My grandfather presided over this meeting and Patrick Carney of Madison County was Vice President.

Although I have lived in California for many years, I was born in the Bitterroot, spent most of my boyhood in Helena, and still feel that Montana is my home.

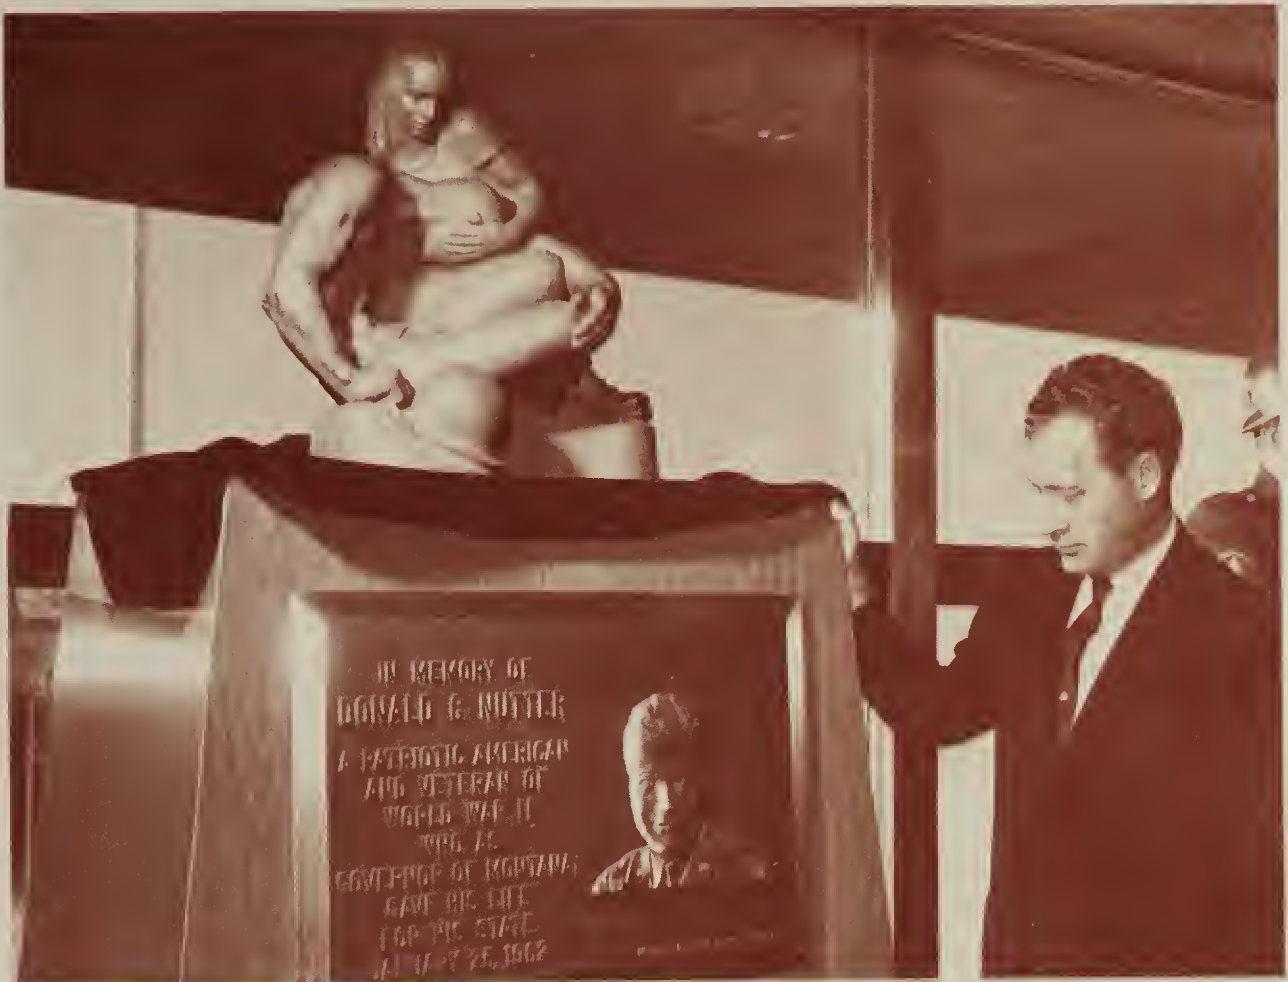
Very sincerely,
Gilbert D. Harlan
Inglewood, California

WINTER ISSUE OF MAGAZINE TO APPEAR IN JANUARY

For a number of years now, we have published the Winter (or first) issue of each new volume year of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History just before Christmas of the preceding year — that is to say, Winter 1964 was published in December, 1963, and so on. We have found, both from our standpoint and that of the average reader, that this has led to some confusion as well as to a rather long period between our Winter and Spring issues. We have therefore decided, beginning with the Winter, 1965, issue, to publish this first issue of the new year in the early part of January. All those who wish to give the magazine as a Christmas gift are advised, however, that appropriate cards in their name will be sent to recipients well in advance of the holidays announcing that MONTANA will arrive throughout the new year as a continuing gift of good reading.

BABCOCK DEDICATES MEMORIAL TO LATE GOVERNOR

GOV. TIM BABCOCK and other state officials and representatives of veterans and patriotic groups dedicated the Donald G. Nutter Memorial Trophy Hall on the third floor of the Historical Society building in Helena. Gov. Babcock is pictured here at the plaque which has been created to designate the room as a memorial to his late friend and predecessor in the Montana gubernatorial post.



The plaque is affixed to a wood-paneled pedestal which holds a beautiful statuary executed by John B. Weaver, former curator at the Historical Society and now on the staff of the Smithsonian Institution. It depicts a woman welcoming home a returning soldier.

The trophy room itself as well as the memorial plaque were prepared by Robert F. Morgan, our present curator. Uniforms, weapons, propaganda and other memorabilia from all wars in which Montanans participated are on display.

Associate Justice Stanley M. Doyle of the Montana Supreme Court directed the brief ceremony commemorating the late governor, who with five others was killed in a National Guard plane crash on Jan. 25, 1962. Gov. Nutter, who had been in office slightly more than a year, was a veteran of World War II.

"As a close friend of one so honored here," Gov. Babcock said during the ceremony, "I am happy to take part in the recognition of a man who gave the fullest measure of service to his country and to his state."

OMISSIONS ANENT

In our November number, in which we gave details about the significant loan items from the Cornelius F. Kelley family collection, we inadvertantly omitted the name of Mrs. John C. Wood of New York City, who has taken a deep interest in seeing that all Montanans share in the art treasures which her father had gathered at his famed summer home on Swan Lake. Mrs. Wood, who is the former Miss Frances Kelley, joined with her brother-in-law, George Hepburn of Los Angeles, in arranging the loan of the objects to our growing collection.

Incidentally, Mr. Hepburn has loaned us a fine early (1896) oil of a favorite Russell subject, Buffalo Hunt. Now in the formal C. M. Russell Room, this comes from Mr. Hepburn's personal collection.

WHITE HOUSE CMR LOANED BY AMON CARTER

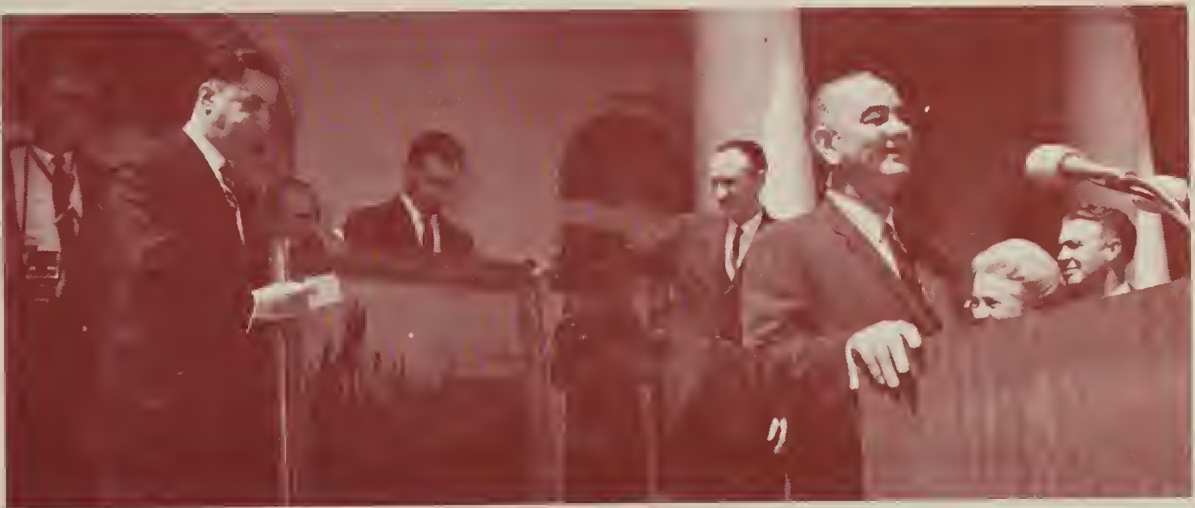
CONSIDERABLE CIRCULATION was given during the Centennial Year, (including our May, 1964, issue) to this picture of President Johnson greeting the Montana delegation in Washington, D.C. In the background, a C. M. Russell painting is being held up to view. The implication given was that the painting is personally owned by President Johnson.

Actually, the painting, an early C. M. Russell oil (believed to be about 1890) entitled Silk Robe, is from the famous collection of the Amon Carter Museum of Western Art in Fort Worth. The story of how it happened to be in Washington at the time is an interesting one, and we are grateful to Mitchell A. Wilder, Amon Carter's director, for setting us straight.



The painting, along with one other, was loaned to Lyndon Johnson, then vice president, in response to a request to Amon G. Carter, Jr. for some western pictures suitable for his personal office. At the time of President Kennedy's death, the pictures were in the Vice President's office and quite likely were moved to the White House executive offices.

"Shortly after the first of the year," Mr. Wilder writes, "Mrs. Johnson sent an inquiry to us asking if we might have other pictures available for the President's office, inasmuch as White House furnishings included a great many Indian subjects. We therefore forwarded other selections, including several black and white Russell drawings and one Frederic Remington oil, to the White House. The two paintings described above [including Silk Robe] were then returned to Fort Worth."

WHAT is quite probably the oldest rural school still existing in Montana and indeed the Northwest, was the subject of a feature story and picture which recently appeared in The Ravalli Republican and The Northwest Tribune of Stevensville, both published by George Danker of Hamilton. They are the work of Bob Gilluly, managing editor of The Republican, who delved into the background of this history-rich school in a history-rich region of Montana with the help of Luther Stanley, Stevensville historian. Bob, who is the son of Sam Gilluly, a member of our board of trustees, has granted us his permission and that of his publisher to reprint his story:

ALUMNI and PTA members of the Northwest's oldest rural school are seeking to have its namesake restored to the school yard at Lone Rock school some eight miles northeast of Stevensville.

The namesake is a large flat rock which was broken into two pieces several years ago. The rock has reposed in a farmer's field for many years, after the original Lone Rock school was moved up the road about three-quarters of a mile in 1894.

Background for the unusual name of Lone Rock school was compiled recently by Stevensville historian Luther Stanley.

Stanley and 93-year-old George Harris of Victor said they will ask the school trustees to have the rocks moved back to the school yard. They hope to install a plaque designating the school — which actually dates back to 1870 — as the oldest rural school in the Northwest.

According to Stanley's data, the history of Lone Rock school closely parallels the agricultural development of the lower Bitter Root valley, which was Montana territory's first real farming area.

It all started when Thomas W. Harris came to St. Mary's village—about eight miles away toward the Bitter Root river—in 1850. Harris served as foreman for John Owen at the fort named for "Major" Owen until 1858, when he married an Indian woman and moved to the Three Mile area.

Harris took up land and later homesteaded on the Poole or Poindexter place in the Three Mile area.

By 1870, Harris' children were old enough for school. He built a school on the banks of Three Mile Creek and hired a man named Robert Clark to tutor his children for three months in the winter.

Harris himself was somewhat of a legend in the early Bitter Root. He had a green thumb — and grew the first small fruits and berries in what is now Montana territory. He also made extensive trips to the populated areas to the east, particularly Virginia City and Deer Lodge.

Many of Harris' journals and diary notations have been published in state papers this year through Associated Press releases which featured a daily story on what happened in Montana territory each day exactly 100 years ago. [Harris' journal, preserved in the Historical Society Library, constitutes one of the few sources of information about the region in the dim decade of the 1850's.]

In 1876 Miss Julia Whaley was hired as the area teacher. She was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Peter Whaley, who had come to Fort Owen in 1863.

By 1878 several families of homesteaders had a greater number of children who needed schooling. So the parents held a meeting and voted to build a new school. It was dubbed the Lone Rock school, with the name coming from the big rock which projected in the school yard. It was the only large rock in the field which became a school yard, and the name is not so surprising in view of the circumstances.

The rock stuck up about three feet above the ground, and later investigation revealed it was buried to a depth of about five feet.

By 1894 the school was too small, so a larger building was constructed at the present site in the Three Mile country about three-fourths of a mile northeast of the original school. A newer building was constructed in 1899, and many changes have been made since then. The present school is a three-story brick structure.

George Harris, son of the school's founder, is still living in Victor at the age of 93. He was a first-grader when the 1878 Lone Rock school was built and opened.

Several other early-day students are still living in the Bitter Root. They include Selman Eldridge, who started there in 1891; Raynoi Dayton Mendall, who started in 1899; Stanley, who started in 1904, and Mrs. Earl Woolsey, who attended in 1905.

Miss Whaley, the early-day teacher, later married Newton Tillman of Florence. Two of their sons, Albert of Florence and Roy of Hamilton, still live in the valley.

COLLECTIONS AT SOCIETY DO HONOR TO THREE UNIQUE MONTANANS

BY VIRTUE of generous gifts and loans, the Historical Society is preparing this month to catalog and display three widely different but significant collections, all of them reflecting Montana's artistic and historical past and imbued with the characters and contributions of the three remarkable men pictured on this page: Cornelius F. Kelley, former Butte waterboy who rose to chairman of the board of the Anaconda Co.; Frank M. Kerr, canny electrician who came to Butte in 1890 and at his death 50 years later had just retired as president of Montana Power Company, and L. A. Huffman, young photographer from Iowa who arrived at Fort Keogh near present-day Miles City in 1878, just in time to photograph the last of the Indian chiefs, stagecoaches and cowboys working cattle on free, open ranges.

Objects of art from the Kelley collection and the unique display of nearly 100 pieces of carved ivory from the Kerr family come to us largely through the efforts of E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra, president of our board of trustees and an associate of both men during their long corporate careers.

Included in the Kelley group are four superb models fashioned by the late Earl Heikka of Great Falls. All reveal the sharp realism and attention to authentic detail for which Heikka was known. The subjects: The Pack String, Underground Miner, Ore Wagon, and The Prospector. A green patina bronze bust of Mr. Kelley by the celebrated sculptor, Mario Korbel, is also included, as well as an incredible—though unfinished— oil painting by C. M. Russell. Never before viewed by the public, the very large painting depicts the pre-white setting of the famed "Kelley Fishing Camp," located on Swan Lake near Bigfork. This was once a favored Kootenai stop on the route to the eastern buffalo ranges.

All the Kelley family objects were housed at the elaborate private summer residence which Mr. Kelley built at this historic spot. Their loan was arranged through his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. George Hepburn of Los Angeles.

Cornelius F. Kelley was born at Mineral Hill, Nevada, on Feb. 10, 1875. His father, Jeremiah C., had engaged in pioneer mining in Nevada, and in 1883 came to Butte as an associate of Marcus Daly. The boy attended public schools in Butte and during the summer worked as a waterboy on Butte Hill. He attended the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, taking a law degree in 1898.

Never losing his love for Butte, "Con" Kelley immediately opened a law office in the Mining City, and during his first year as a lawyer, was elected to the Sixth Legislature from Silver Bow County. He entered the legal department of the Anaconda Copper Mining Company in 1901 and rose through the ranks to vice president, president and chairman of the board. Indeed, at his death in 1957, Mr. Kelley had served the company for 55 of the 61 corporate years it had then existed. He headed the company during much of its expansion period, revealing a remarkable gift for long-range planning.

Soon after the turn of the century, Mr. Kelley built a primitive fishing camp on the shores of Swan Lake. He gradually built it up to the point where it became one of the most beautiful and perfectly appointed private recreational sites in the country. A great admirer of C. M. Russell and his art, Mr. Kelley enjoyed entertaining the artist at Swan Lake. Charlie Russell returned the compliment: a unique feature of one patio is a series of Indian pictographs imbedded in concrete; he was at work on the oil depiction of the lodge's primitive setting at the time of his death in 1926.

Now being catalogued and prepared for display is the splendid collection of some 100 carved ivory objects, collected from many lands for many years by Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Kerr. Their son and daughter, Robert O. Kerr of Long Beach, Calif. and Mrs. Harry Reif of Seal Beach, Calif. arranged for its display as a memorial to their parents.

Frank Kerr was a working man, but gifted with a special perception and knowledge of the new science of electricity, when he same to Butte in 1890. A man of friendly warmth, ill-concealed by a somewhat brusk manner, Kerr is credited more than any other man with developing and expanding the Montana Power Company. At the time of his death at Rochester, Minn. on May 17, 1940, tributes poured into Butte from industrial greats as well as from Western Montana Indians and Montana Power workmen. Only four months before, on Jan. 27, Frank Kerr "modestly protested, but could not prevent" a moving tribute at the Hotel Finlen in Butte marking his 50 years of active service with the company and its predecessors.

Mr. Kerr and his wife, the former Kate Otis, were married in Butte on January 12, 1892. In later years they traveled widely and began collecting exquisitely carved ivory pieces from such farflung places at Washington, New York, New Orleans, Europe, India, Alaska and the Orient.

There are items in the collection which defy description: animals, Oriental gods, classic figures and functional objects, such as cigarette cases and jars. Perhaps the most unique are several containing a series of balls, carved from the innermost ball outward. The largest example contains 25 perfectly formed balls. It represents a lifetime of work for one artist.

L. A. Huffman, who has been described as "a slightly built man with a sensitive soul and face," was born near Castalia, Iowa on Oct. 31, 1854. His father quit farming in 1865 and moved his family to Waukon, Iowa, where he bought out a photography shop. It was here that his son was first bitten by the "camera bug." In 1877 young Huffman heard a job as post photographer was open at Fort Keogh, Montana Territory.

Fortified with a letter of introduction to General Nelson Miles, he rode a train to the end of the line at Bismarck, D. T., then caught the "star route" buckboard stage for storied Fort Keogh. Huffman arrived early in December, 1878. General Miles had just driven a stake, some two miles downriver from the fort, and the pioneer photographer watched the town of Miles City spring up at that location.

No segment of the rapidly changing frontier scene failed, thereafter, to fascinate L. A. Huffman. Lugging his awkward tripod camera, he photographed everything: vanishing buffalo herds, veteran Cavalry campaigners, still-fierce Cheyenne and Sioux warriors, great herds of sheep, Texas longhorns, and working cowboys on the vast ranges.

At his death in Billings on December 28, 1931, L. A. Huffman had produced some 1200 photographic plates, dating from his first studio surrounded by cottonwood pickets at Fort Keogh in 1878. He had been at work for 53 years, recording authentic color and history.

The vast Huffman collection, which has been widely used as one of Montana's best historical picture sources in countless books and other publications, has been the responsibility for many years of his daughter, Mrs. Ruth Huffman Scott of Miles City.

A few weeks ago, our assistant museum curator, Perry Chisholm, spent a rewarding two days in Miles City, conferring with Mrs. Scott and inspecting this treasure trove of Montana history. He came back to Helena with a very worthwhile group of enlarged photographs of some of Huffman's best work, most of them hand-tinted by him. They have been placed on display in our lower floor gallery. While the final disposition of the original Huffman plates has not been made, we are gratified at the opportunity of displaying these and at acquiring for our archives a great many reproducable prints of fascinating subjects.

Montanans in general, and certainly all visitors to the museum, should be indebted to the Kelleys, Kerrs and Huffmans who have made these great private collections available for the edification and enjoyment of so many.

Two Significant Objects Presented

ROBERT A. GRIFFEN, dedicated westerner, writer, collector, ex-rancher and business man of Reno, Nevada, translates a long-time interest in Montana by way of very competent personal art. He is pictured (left) presenting two outstanding objects to the Society.

At the right, Director Mike Kennedy and Jack Toole hold Griffen's oil depiction of the historic setting in the Sweet Grass Hills north of Shelby, now a part of the Diamond Willow Ranch holdings which have been in the Toole family since 1888. Griffen painted the picture because of his friendship with the Tooles and his long-time interest in the Blackfeet Indians. The painting has now joined the Society's permanent collection of important historical art. A flash photo, unfortunately, bleaches the colorful, excellent painting.

Griffen also presented the rare oval photograph of Con Price, outstanding cowman and one of C. M. Russell's closest associates. Price was married to Claudia Toole, daughter of Montana's first Governor after Statehood. The scene is the Lazy KY Ranch which Price and Russell "ram-rodded" on Kicking Horse Creek in 1903. Griffen was also a friend of Artists Olaf Seltzer, Joe DeYong and of Sid Willis, who assembled the great Mint Saloon collection at Great Falls.

The men were photographed in our formal C. M. Russell Room. The painting in the background is the large unfinished Russell oil of an early day Kootenai Indian camp on Swan Lake which eventually became the fabulous Cornelius F. Kelley summer resort. This significant acquisition is further described in our lead story.

Introducing . . . NEWELL GOUGH, JR. Member of the Board of Trustees

THE legal profession has always found able representation on our Board of Trustees—indeed, the Society benefitted from the very beginning, in 1865, with the founding services of such men as Wilbur Fisk Sanders and H. L. Hosmer. Judge Lester H. Loble, whose service spanned the "growing pains" period before and after the Society moved into its new building in 1952, carried on the splendid tradition. His place on the board since 1957 has been vigorously filled by Newell Gough, Jr., a busy Helena attorney who has found room on his crowded agenda for more than one extra-hour civic activity. He served as president of the board from late in 1960 until August, 1963.

Born in Missoula in 1913, Gough is the son of a retired Missoula banker. His mother, the late Margaret Bennett Gough, was a daughter of the Rev. John W. Bennett, early-day Methodist circuit rider under whose pastorate the Missoula Methodist Church was built. Newell attributes at least some of his lifelong interest in Montana history to early contact with the Bennett library.

After completing elementary school in Missoula, Newell attended Shattuck School in Faribault, Minnesota, graduating in 1930. He entered Montana State University in 1931 and took his LL.B. degree in 1935.

The young attorney came immediately to Helena to be associated with Weir, Clift, Glover and Bennett. He has remained in the practice of law at the same location (First National Bank Building) ever since, except for military service from 1942 to 1946. Now Weir, Gough and Booth, the firm's practice grows increasingly far-flung and diversified.

Gough served with the Eighth Armored Division during most of his service in this country and in the European Theatre. He was discharged in 1946 with rank of major. He was married in 1938 to the former Willie Clary of Great Falls. They have three children: Willie McElroy Gough, employed in San Francisco by a commercial design firm; Newell III, stationed at Pensacola, Fla., with the U. S. Marine Corps, and Margaret Bennett Gough, a freshman at Washington State University in Pullman.

Circulation Manager

THE continually growing numbers of subscribers to MONTANA the Magazine of Western History in all 50 states and a great many foreign countries receive their issues four times a year (as well as this newsletter every month) with rarely a slip-up, thanks mainly to the cheerful efficiency of our Circulation Manager. Since joining the staff six years ago, she has simplified the system and has even taken in stride an automatically fed addressing machine. The result: the magazine comes (on schedule) in a heavy weight manila envelope which protects its full color cover and weighty contents. Foreign subscribers receive theirs in special heavy weight book bags. That our readers appreciate these extraordinary efforts is attested to by many a comment.

To her co-workers, the astonishing thing about Jiggs Dickey is that she goes about her tasks (which rise to staggering proportions, especially at this time of year) with patience and with rare Irish humor. She is, in short, a delight to work with.

Born in Butte, she is the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Rob Rowland. Her mother, Ella Crowley Rowland, was a teacher in the Butte schools for many years and served with distinction as Superintendent of the Silver Bow county school system. Graduated from Butte High School in 1934, Jiggs came to Helena the same year and relates that her only "career" before joining our staff in 1958 was a stenographic stint with Montana Life Insurance company, now Western Life. She was married in 1938 to Lloyd Dickey, member of a well known Townsend and Helena family. They have a daughter, Mrs. Toby Benson (there is now a 1-year-old grandson, Patrick), and a son, Rob, a sophomore at Cathedral High School.

PRIME GIFT IDEA: WESTERN BOOKS FOR ALL AGES

What could be more appropriate for Christmas giving than a book on a Western subject. We suggest the following titles, all of them written by top-flight writers, all of them authentic and colorful. There's still plenty of time to order. Simply address MONTANA HISTORICAL SOCIETY, BOOK ORDER DEPARTMENT.

Three Great Subjects for Juveniles

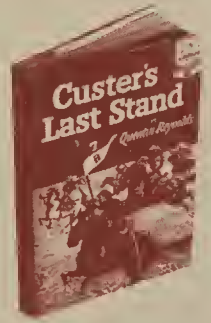
THE COPPER KINGS OF MONTANA
by Marian T. Place
One of the State's best known writer of juvenile westerns, Mrs. Place this time addresses herself to the story of Butte and the three men who played the leading roles in the saga of the Richest Hill on Earth: Marcus Daly, Irish lad who became a mining tycoon; William Andrews Clark, wealthy mine owner who determined to be a U. S. Senator, and F. Augustus Heinze, clever opportunist who almost ruined a mighty copper company. 192 pages, illustrated by Ernest Kurt Barth (in two colors). $1.95.



CUSTER'S LAST STAND
by Quentin Reynolds
The well known biographer and war correspondent here tells, especially for children, the episode in Western history which probably interests more people of all ages than any other: the complete annihilation of George Custer and his command at the Little Big Horn. But Reynolds does much more than recount the tragedy: he describes Custer himself—his boyhood, his career at West Point, his brilliant, dashing performance during the Civil War which resulted in his commission as the youngest general in the U. S. Army. Illustrated by Frederick T. Chapman, is suitable for any child of grade school age. Illustrated in two colors. $1.95.

THE LEWIS & CLARK EXPEDITION
by Richard L. Neuberger
The late Sen. Neuberger of Oregon was deeply interested in the history of his region and wrote about it clearly and accurately. Especially for children of grades 4 to 9, this story of the greatest journey of exploration in history is illustrated by the renowned Winold Reiss. Richard Neuberger tells it all: the characters of the two leaders and those of the diverse men who followed them to the uncharted wilderness, the indispensible help of Sacajawea, the adventures along the way, from St. Louis to the Oregon coast and back. 192 pages, illustrations in two colors. $1.95.

Two New Classics for Adults

FOLLOWING THE FRONTIER WITH F. JAY HAYNES
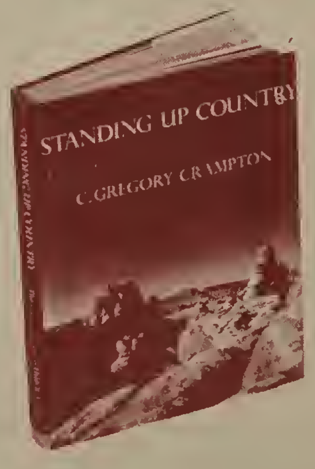
by Freeman Tilden

F. Jay Haynes moved west from Minnesota with the rolling frontier of the 1870's and 1880's, carrying with him his awkward camera equipment. Traveling by muleback, horseback, buckboard and stagecoach, he caught on film the great panorama of westward expansion. Finally, he operated from his own "Palace Studio Car" which ran on the Northern Pacific's mainlines and spurs. He became the first concessionaire of Yellowstone Park. Now from the great photographic file of the Haynes family comes this large 432-page clothbound volume, illustrated with 230 Haynes photographs, with pungent text to make them meaningful. $12.95.



STANDING UP COUNTRY
The Canyon Lands of Utah and Arizona
by C. Gregory Crampton

Bryce Canyon and Zion National Parks, glorious though they are, constitute only a part of a vast canyon-land wilderness in the states of Utah and Arizona. C. Gregory Crampton has told the geological and historical story of this rugged region. His dramatic text—telling of conquistadores, explorers, cattle barons, Mormons, and gold-rush days—is illuminated with 132 breathtaking photographs of a sculptured wilderness seldom visited by tourists. 8½x11 inches, cloth, 224 pages. $15.00.

Montana State Born During Heated Political Year..1889

FOR 25 long years, the people of Montana have been suffering under all the privations and difficulties incident to an embryonic and defective system of government. They are now in the presence of the day of deliverance. Before the snows of next winter fly and clothe in the mantle of whiteness the mineral hills of Montana, the magic proclamation of Benjamin Harrison will have made Montana a State.

Thus orated Thomas H. Carter, Territorial Delegate to Congress, on the last day of September, 1889, at a crowded outdoor gathering in downtown Helena. It was Carter's final speech of the torrid political campaign of 75 years ago—a campaign which was to see his narrow victory (over Democrat Martin Maginnis) as the first Congressional representative from the new state, the election of Joseph K. Toole (also close, over Republican Thomas C. Power) as first state governor, the meeting of two rival Houses of Representatives and a devisive State Senate which sent four men instead of two to the United States Senate and shifted the embarrassing burden of choice to the national body.

Statehood, and the vicissitudes of the first few months of that new status, comes to mind particularly in the autumn of this commemorative year. It was after the final draft of the state constitution was adopted in mid-August, 1889, that Montana moved with positive assurance toward the goal.

In the midst of another political campaign in 1964, it is also interesting to look backward at the 1889 campaign as reflected in the press of the time, and in the official documents preserved from the administration of Governor Toole. All are on file in the Montana Historical Library.

GOV. JOSEPH K. TOOLE

To get back to Delegate Carter's thundering oration on August 31, 1889. The full text was printed in The Helena Journal, started only a few months before under the guidance of Russell Harrison, whose father had just been elected President of the United States. The new daily was, quite naturally, pledged to support the new Republican administration.

In the election of October, 1889, the Australian system of balloting was used for the first time in Montana. It required not only strict voter registration (considered a monumental handicap for isolated persons) but the printing of every candidate's name on the ballot (making it extremely long and unwieldy and difficult for many to understand).

The Journal's Democratic antagonist in Helena, The Daily Independent, editorialized in September, 1889, about the new system:

> Opposition to the cruel and oppressive registration law is spreading like wildfire in all the communities outside the big towns. Stockmen who are obliged to travel scores of miles, in some instances a two days' ride from home, prospectors and miners who are compelled to make weary journeys over mountain ranges, new settlers in remote valleys with work that they cannot leave, are all denied their rights by the iron law passed by the last Republican Legislature.

Gov. Toole, however, in his first message to the Legislature, expressed general approval of the new system, while pointing out the need for some refinements. Under the heading Purity of the Ballot, he said:

> While the Australian system of voting, as a whole, does not come up to public expectation, it is, nevertheless, a departure in the right direction, and its general acceptance by the people, with some modifications, is in my opinion, assured . . . The present law would be just as effective as it was designed to be if, instead of printing the names of all the candidates on one continuous ticket, their names were placed in parallel columns representing the party whose political principles they avowed . . . The present system is tantamount to an educational qualification on the one hand, or a complete surrender upon the other to judges of election, who, in many cases, are incompetent and in some cases venal . . . If this system can be simplified and at the same time preserve its essential qualities . . . it will popularize politics and in the end ensure the most perfect reflection of the popular will of any system ever inaugurated.

Despite the vaunted safeguards of the new system of balloting, however, the election of 1889 resulted in one of the bitterest political imbroglios in Montana history. The heart of the matter was Precinct 34 in Silver Bow County (popularly known as the Homestake Tunnel Precinct) wherein it was found that of 134 votes cast, 131 were Democratic. The Republicans at once sent up cries of fraud, and in an ensuing investigation they produced affidavits from eight persons who swore they had voted Republican. The Democrats later alleged that four of the eight confessed they never signed such affidavits and others swore they had been hired to do so by a man from Idaho who had been a convicted murderer and who had, in turn, been hired by the Republicans.

The important aspect of the controversy was that all 134 votes were thrown out by a state canvassing board, and that without the plurality in Precinct 34, the Democrats lost control of the House of Representatives. With five Democratic seats not disputed, the party would have had complete control, not only of Silver Bow's delegation, but of the Assembly itself in joint ballot.

President Harrison's proclamation of Statehood, relayed to Gov. Toole by telegram on Nov. 11, 1889, was considerably dimmed by the results of the October elections. Newspapers supporting both sides filled their columns with little else, although all joined in special front-page treatments when the Presidential proclamation finally came. The Journal printed the entire issue in red ink, captioning it a RED LETTER DAY.

Governor Toole, the only Democrat who had been elected to high office, was faced with getting the new State off and running. The five Democrats who were elected in the disputed precinct appeared with election certificates issued by the Silver Bow clerk and recorder. The five Republicans elected when the votes were thrown out appeared in Helena with certificates from the state board of canvassers. The result: there were two Houses of Representatives as Democrats joined Democrats and Republicans joined Republicans. The new State Senate was split evenly between the two parties, and although they met together physically, they could not agree and it was up to Lt. Gov. John Rickards, a Republican, to break the tie vote. This so infuriated the Democratic senators that they absented themselves from the sessions. The final result, and one which gained infant Montana nationwide publicity, was the election of four U. S. Senators, two Democrats and two Republicans.

Even the New York Times devoted a column to the situation. It said, in part:

> Montana has come into the Union with a cry from one party that the other has tried to "steal the state" and with a deadlock in the Legislature that threatens to prevent the election of U. S. Senators for some time to come.

Dr. C. K. Cole, who had been in Chicago soon after Statehood was declared, was interviewed by the Independent on Dec. 10. Asked if the Montana muddle was discussed there, he replied:

> They talk of nothing else; you hear it in hotel lobbies, restaurants, etc. . . Those people really believe that the people of Helena are going about the streets armed and that it is not safe for the men most prominent in the affair to make their appearance. The World's Fair was an after consideration in local topics of conversation.

Well aware that the situation would not only impede state government but that it contained the seeds of violence, Gov. Toole acted quickly. He convened the First Legislative Assembly by proclamation on Nov. 22, 1889, designating the rooms for both houses at the new Lewis and Clark courthouse (completed four years before), and authorizing all persons holding election certificates to be admitted. He was using the constitutional grounds that the House itself was the final judge of the qualifications of its own members.

Meanwhile, acting on the basis of the state canvassing board's decision to throw out the disputed ballots, State Auditor E. A. Kenney (a Republican), issued a call for the House of Representatives to meet at the Iron Front Block in Helena. Presiding until temporary organization could be effected, Kenney thus convened what the Democrats were to call the "rump session." The issue was joined. There was no violence but there was plenty of invective. The Independent said, on Nov. 5:

> No evidence that the vote (in Precinct 34) was not fair and honest was ever adduced and no charge of fraudulent voting was ever made . . . To cut the whole matter short, the state canvassing board trampled over statutes and precedents and hurried to place certificates in the hands of the Republican legislative candidates whom they had counted in without warrant of law . . . Every honest vote cast in Silver Bow County will be counted and stay counted; every candidate for the legislature or any other office, who is shown by the returns to have a majority of the votes cast, will present himself at the required time, with a lawful certificate from the county clerk as the law directs, and will take his seat.

On the same day, the Journal, reporting the decision to throw out the disputed votes, editorialized:

> JUSTICE REIGNS. Montana will go into the Union with a crown of honor upon her brow, and the spotless emblems of virginity upon her fair form.

One of the coolest heads in the entire controversy turned out to be Montana's first state governor. Even the Journal could not refrain from expressing some admiration for Joseph K. Toole:

> While the Journal would have decreed it otherwise, the Democratic party's ablest and best representative will occupy the gubernatorial chair as the first man chosen by the popular vote to preside over the destinies of this Commonwealth.

Facing the fact of legislative controversy with candor, Gov. Toole began his first message with these words:

> It is in our power to make this the great State of the Union, or to hamper and dwarf it for all time. In view of the difficulties which have attended the convening of the first legislative assembly under a constitution, I yield the opportunity which precedent has established to indulge in patriotic sentiment which such an occasion, under different circumstances, might inspire. I am content to congratulate you and the country upon the acquisition of another commonwealth of such magnificent proportions and great possibilities. . .

After he had duly pointed out the state's financial condition (it was sound) and such pressing matters as the almost total absence of state buildings and institutions, Gov. Toole addressed himself to the DUAL HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

> Two bodies are now sitting, each claiming to be the legal House of Representatives; one assembled and is sitting in the place designated by the Executive for that purpose, the other assembled in a place designated by the State Auditor, and is now sitting in another place of its own choosing. This condition of affairs has prevailed for more than three weeks. It is born of impulse. Passion has had time to cool and returning reason ought to assert itself. It is high time that personal ambitions should be subordinated to patriotism and the wheels of government be permitted to roll

The first session ground on, each day compounding the controversy. It was on Dec. 31, 1889, the 39th day, that both houses met for the election of two United States Senators. The eight Republican senators unanimously named Wilbur F. Sanders and then repaired to the downtown House for balloting in joint assembly. Sanders received the votes of all present: a total of 38. On Jan. 2, 1890, T. C. Power, who had unsuccessfully opposed Toole for the governorship, was elected the second U. S. Senator.

Meanwhile, W. A. Clark, whose surprising defeat by Thomas H. Carter for Territorial Delegate in 1888 had triggered the storied Clark-Daly feud, was named United States Senator by the eight recalcitrant Democrats of the Senate. These men named Martin Maginnis as the second Senator from Montana.

Thus the infant 41st state had four men contending for two seats in the U. S. Senate. All of them reported for the opening of Congress in March. The Committee on Privileges and Election ruled that Sanders and Power were the legal Senators from Montana. And back home, the first session finally limped to adjournment by limitation. As for the legislative deadlock, it remained to haunt the Second Assembly as the members and their governor struggled to get on with the legitimate business of the 41st State.

Introducing BRANSON G. STEVENSON Member of the Board

ONE OF THE newest members of our Board of Trustees is a distinguished Montana artist and a longtime advertising and oil company executive. Branson G. Stevenson has lived in Great Falls since 1920. A native of Georgia, he spent a number of years in Central and South America, studying art at the Instituto National, Escuela de Pintura in Panama.

After coming to Great Falls, he worked for a time as an artist for the Swanzey Advertising Agency, studying ceramic art on the side. Later he served as advertising manager for the Sunburst Oil & Refining Co., and in 1931 became Montana manager for Socony Mobil Oil Co. He retired from that post in 1960.

Branson Stevenson is a founding member of the Montana Institute of the Arts, and besides serving the Historical Society, he is a member of the board and chairman of exhibits for the C. M. Russell Gallery in Great Falls. He is a founder, trustee and secretary of the Archie Bray Foundation in Helena, widely acclaimed for its work in the field of ceramics.

This knowledgeable man is an extremely versatile artist. At least two mediums—emulsion wax watercolor and a clay-in-clay inlays—are his own inventions. His oils, water colors, lithographs, etchings, engravings, serigraphs and ceramics have been widely exhibited at such places as the National Academy in New York, Society of American Etchers in New York, Library of Congress, Carnegie Institute in Pittsburgh, Seattle Art Museum, Los Angeles Museum, Denver Art Museum, and many others.

We at the Society feel privileged to share these wide-ranging talents with our sister gallery in Great Falls.

A Kudo for The Post

I HAVE BEEN on the mailing list for The Montana Post and have read and enjoyed every issue. I have obtained some very good reading material that was advertised, too, such as Raw Edge.

When the June issue arrived, I enjoyed the story on Harry Jackson, the artist, and his painting about the range burial. I then passed the copy on to a local artist . . .

I am a native Minnesotan, but my interest is in Montana because of the history that she holds, especially the early day history of the American cowboy. That's my first love. Keep up the outstanding work.

GOV. BABCOCK ACCEPTS WILDLIFE PAINTING FOR MONTANA

GOV. TIM BABCOCK, left, accepts a wildlife painting for the State of Montana, a gift from Artist Roger Preuss, center, whose depictions of birds and animals are nationally recognized. Director Mike Kennedy, right, points out the authentic detail of animals and habitat. Both are typical of Montana, one of Preuss' favored locales to paint as well as to hunt and fish. Designer of the U. S. Federal Duck Stamp of 1949, Preuss is equally well known as a conservationist, sportsman, designer, and author. A large showing of original oils and watercolors (two of which may be seen in the background above) have been held over in the Gallery of Western Art for another month.

Introducing

HARRIETT MELOY

Assistant Librarian

THERE IS A rather somber chore connected with most Legislative Assemblies: research in the field of necrology—records of the dead. In January, 1957, the assignment fell to Harriett Meloy, a busy housewife and mother who had been lending her talents to many civic activities and to a few state agencies on a strictly limited part-time basis. The place of research was, of course, the Historical Society Library.

Fascinated with research and library techniques, Harriett stayed on after the session was over, and happily for us, has since developed a full-time vocation.

Harriett Meloy is a native of Inkster, N. D., where her father, C. H. Cruttenden, was a banker. In 1929 the family moved to Helena and Mr. Cruttenden began his long career as business manager of Intermountain College. Graduated from Helena High School, Harriett began her college work at Intermountain, transferring to Jamestown College in North Dakota from which she took her B.A. in English. She says today that she remembers best a course called History of the West—undoubtedly a significant remembrance.

In 1941, she married Peter Meloy, member of a pioneer Broadwater County family. A well known Helena attorney, he is deeply interested in the fine arts and is a very competent ceramist. The Meloys are a busy family: two sons, Tim and Mike, are students at the University of California; twins, Kerry and Steve, are seniors at Helena High School; and son, Mark, is in Junior High.

The fact that Harriett has so successfully combined home, civic and office duties has caused more than one sincere "wonder how she does it" comment. She is currently president of the Helena branch of University Women, and makes significant contributions to such organizations as Toastmistress Club and the League of Women Voters. Most importantly, for us at the Society and to hundreds of researchers and others who use our vast facilities, she functions graciously and competently in preserving and making available the stuff of Montana history.

MONTANA'S AVIATION HISTORY ON DISPLAY AND UNDER STUDY

MONTANA AND THE SKY, 1885-1930, is the title of both a notable new visual display on the third floor of our building and a deeply researched study of the subject now being carried on and projected for book-length publication within the next two years. Sponsored jointly by the Montana Aeronautics Commission and the Montana Historical Society, these efforts will add up to a long-term contribution. A plus dividend will be a sizable new collection of valued research material available in the future at the Society's Library.

The man who has the largest stake in the project is Frank W. Wiley of Helena, former director of the Montana Aeronautics Commission and one of Montana's best known pilots and flight instructors. Indeed, this genial and knowledgeable man participated in virtually every phase of flying, from the early romantic and dangerous days of barnstorming, to airline pilot, to instructor in aerial acrobatics and flight basics, to airport management, to active service with the U. S. Air Force during World War II (he retired from the Air Force Reserve with rank of colonel in March, 1963), and finally to directorship of the Commission from March, 1946, until his retirement two years ago.

Thus the man behind the project has not only the vital experience background, but the feeling for the subject. The result is enthusiasm coupled with know-how. When completed, his book-length study of Montana flying during its first exciting 45 years will include biographical sketches of most early-day pilots, many of whom Frank Wiley knew personally. They include Montanans who made their marks in the state or elsewhere, as well as aviators, both men and women, who came from other states but whose exploits in Montana were especially significant. Examples: W. H. "Turk" Minnerly, who was born in Helena but whose claim to everlasting fame was his flying boat, the first aircraft to land at Cape Canaveral, Florida, now the site of the nation's rocket development and re-named Cape Kennedy. Katherine Stinson of the famed flying family, who did exhibition flying at the State Fair in Helena in 1913 and functioned here as the first woman pilot to carry air mail. Charles Lindbergh, whose later date with destiny needs no amplification, was an airplane mechanic at Billings, Mont. in 1922 and was associated with Bob Westover, a garage and airplane owner. A J1 Standard model airplane built by Lindbergh and Westover in that year is included in the exhibit.

The sum total of the exhibit and the published study is a broad, factual history of pioneer aviation in Montana. The exhibits, some of which are pictured here, were prepared by Curator Bob Morgan. They include blown-up photographs of highlights in the story, along with fascinating objects associated with this great air era. All are carefully labled to give the viewer a dramatic insight into early aeronautics.

The Historical Society is gratified at this opportunity to display the actual objects of early day history, to play a part in the publication of the story itself, and also to become custodian of a significant accumulation of rare research material which will accrue for future generations.

BALLOON RING AND TRAPEZE, seen at the left, were contributed by George W. Lowery of Butte and were part of the equipment he used in making balloon ascensions at Northwest fairs for many years. Lowery purchased his first balloon in 1908. A large blown-up version of an advertisement proclaiming the first balloon ascension in Montana in 1885 is seen at the extreme left. The enlarged picture in the background is of Dr. Frank Bell of Billings, noted dentist and exhibition pilot. He made exhibition flights in many Montana communities in 1912 and 1913. The control wheel from his plane is seen at the right. Other photographs and objects in the picture are the first hubcap cast for a Ryan plane (San Diego, 1926), the dirigible balloon, paddle wheels used in propelling it and a picture of the inventer, T. C. "Chalk" Benbow of Columbus and Red Lodge, Mont. Built in 1903, it is probably the first dirigible balloon built in this country. Sponsor was a Montana corporation, organized for the purpose in 1901. The Federation Aeronautique Internationale license seen at the bottom center was issued in 1926 to Frank Wiley and signed by Orville Wright.

WALNUT PROPELLER, seen at the right, above, is from a Hispano Suiza 150 h.p. motor, used on an airplane owned by Bob Westover of Billings, with whom Charles Lindbergh worked as a mechanic in 1922. The enlarged photo in the background is a group of Army and Navy officers who took flight training in San Diego with Glenn Curtiss. The man without cap in the right background is Lt. G. E. M. Kelly of Great Falls, the second Army aviator to be killed (1911) in service. Kelly Field, Texas, was named for him. The metal propeller, seen in the foreground, powered an OX5 American Eag. plane, purchased in 1927 by Miles City businessmen for the use of C. B. "Cowboy" McMahan in the New York-Spokane races. McMahan placed in the race and later did commercial flying out of Billings. Other pictures include Charles Lindbergh; Mrs. Earl Vance, the first woman pilot in Montana to receive a commercial license; her husband, Earl, perhaps Montana's best-known barnstormer in the twenties, pictured with E. E. MacGilvra and a Shetland pony, the first horse to ride an airplane in Montana; a barnstorming team composed of Frank Wiley, Dean Turner, Cecil Shupe and Earl Vance.

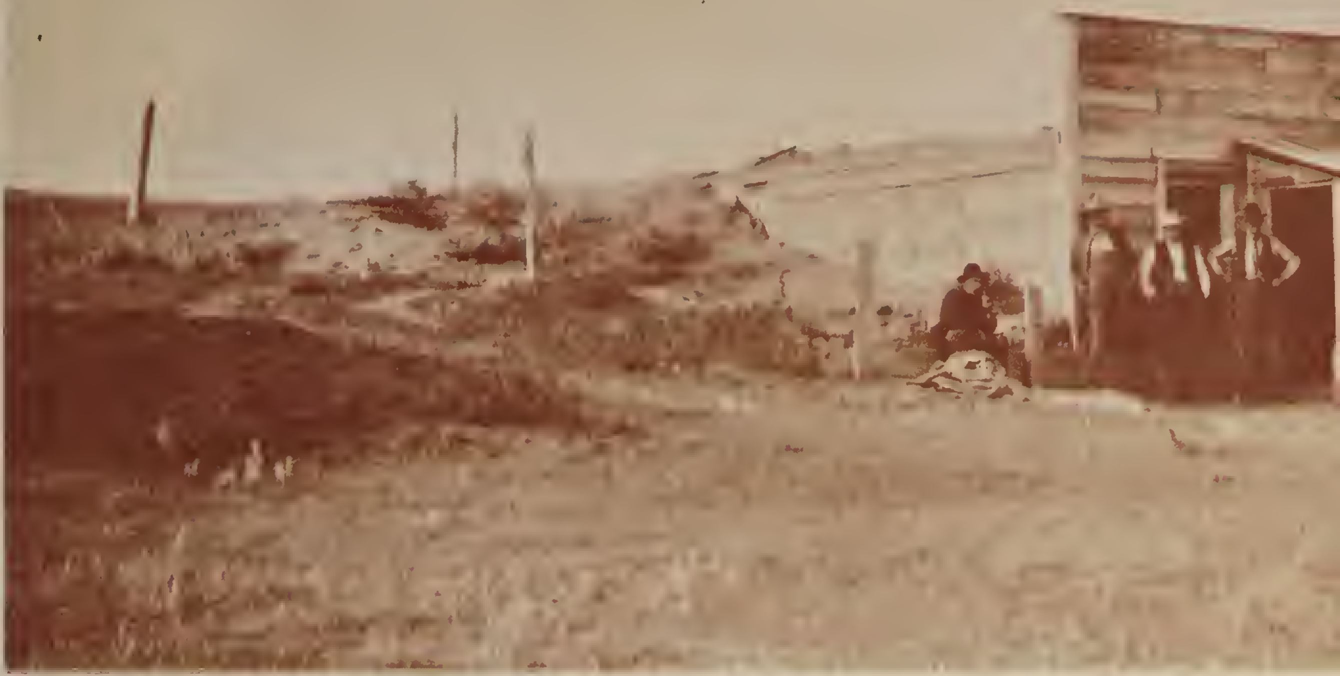
CORRELATOR OF MONTANA'S EARLY FLIGHT HISTORY

FRANK W. WILEY, veteran Montana pilot, barnstormer, instructor, Army Air Force Officer and Montana Aeronautics Commission chairman, is the man behind the current project to display and record the first 45 years of Montana's flight history. His personal acquaintance with many of the early pilots, plus many months of research and personal interview are paying off in a full-blown study of a fascinating subject.



THIS DUG-OUT and shanty, photographed in 1907 by Ernest White, was used by the notorious gang led by Dutch Henry, whose mysterious career and death were traced in our April newsletter. The picture came to us from White's son, Thain White, of Lookout Museum, Lakeside, Mont. The hideout was located just off the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, west of Poplar Creek and very near the town of Scobey. Thain White believes the man in the center is Dan Knapp, well known resident of Oswego, Mont. Others are unidentified. Our thanks to Mr. White for furnishing one more bit of mortar in the story of Dutch Henry, the mysterious Montana outlaw who was admired even more than he was hated and feared.

Introducing . . . O'NEIL JONES Member of the Board of Trustees

A TENUOUS RELATIONSHIP to Alexander Culbertson (his great great grandfather and Culbertson's father were brothers) is only one reason why O'Neil Jones of Sidney is devoting almost full-time energies to delving into and collecting Montana history. Since July, 1963, when he became a member of our Board of Trustees, he has shared his enthusiasms with the Montana Historical Society.

Born in 1917 on his father's irrigated homestead two miles north of Savage, Mont., O'Neil attended elementary and high school in Sidney, and later completed three years at Montana State University. "Money was scarce in those days," O'Neil says, "so I had to quit school to work between quarters on several occasions. I was working towards a law degree but didn't make it. My grades were OK, but I fell in love and couldn't support her and go to school at the same time."

The lady was the daughter of Albert Lalonde, well known Sidney contractor. Jones was associated with the company until its liquidation in June, 1963. Mr. and Mrs. Jones are the parents of five children, ranging in age from 24 years to three and a half.

History was always a favored Jones interest—indeed, O'Neil had a major in the subject by the time he ended his college career. When World War II started, he was already a five-year veteran in the construction business with his father-in-law. His service with the Seabees during the war was a natural result.

"During the time spent in the construction business, we traveled and built roads in practically every corner of Montana," Jones writes. "My Montana history 'bug' got quite a boost when I visited ghost towns, followed old trails, and spent time on Indian reservations."

Several years ago he became an avid collector of books on Western Americana. His collection now totals close to 900 volumes, including "as many first editions as my budget and wife will allow." Since his retirement from business life, Jones has redoubled his pursuit of Montana history and art, with emphasis on the life of Major Culbertson. He hopes to correlate all his material on this subject. Judging from the energy and intelligence which he applies to all his activities, the Society is confident of his success.

NEW AGRICULTURAL FRONTIER DISPLAY CASE COMPLETED

A FINAL STEP toward completion of the Homesteaders Frontier Room in the formal museum came with the opening, last month, of a display depicting the region's first practical agriculture. Created by Curator Bob Morgan, this first of four cases features a scroll map, drawn to scale, showing the locations of such historic outposts as Fort Laramie, Fort Union, Fort Owen and St. Mary's Mission.

The legend explains the earliest beginnings of agriculture, tied in with the economy of the nomadic Indians, the first cultivations of the white fur traders who sought to augment their meat diets, and the first dairy cattle trailed from Laramie to Fort Union to provide milk, cheese and butter. Also described are the first saw and grist mill operations of the Jesuit fathers (who established St. Mary's Mission at present-day Stevensville in 1841) and advanced by Major John Owen when he bought out the mission and converted it to Fort Owen in 1850.

The case includes drawings of the early forts, plus such authentic items as an oxen yoke, camphor bottle, a candlestick used by Father Ravalli, and a broadaxe head found at Fort Owen.

Other cases in the room will relate the evolution of Montana agriculture through (1) the railroads which brought the homesteaders to central and eastern Montana in large numbers; (2) the dry years, bank failures and the exodus of many, and (3) the modern-day picture of scientific methods and soil conservation. The new cases surround the central diorama, previously completed by John Weaver, former curator, depicting a typical Montana homestead with its sod shanty and dryland acres stretching into a limitless horizon.

Introducing . . .
VELVA W. TUOHY
Secretary to the Director

FOR MORE than eight years, the dizzying details of life in the Historical Society Director's office have been the concern of Velva Wedeman Tuohy. Her long experience in office procedure, and a particular talent for handling such details as transportation tickets, hotel reservations, keeping track of numbers on C. M. Russell bronzes, maintaining liaison with the Board of Trustees, meeting the public, arranging appointments, paying the bills, and generally easing the burdens of the Director, have added up to a notable contribution.

Velva is a native of the beautiful Gallatin Valley and is a graduate of Manhattan High School. She received advanced business training in both Billings and Helena, and for a dozen years was employed in the Capitol City by the U. S. Internal Revenue Service. In 1941 she married Michael Tuohy, member of a pioneer Marysville and Helena family. There are two daughters: Jane, now a junior at Washington State University in Pullman, and Shirley, who is Mrs. John W. Mahan, Jr. of Helena.

The crisp efficiency with which Velva Tuohy goes about her many duties at the Society is tempered with a lively sense of humor and an overriding interest in sports, which runs the gamut from baseball (she is often in the minority as a faithful rooter for the New York Yankees), to basketball (she rarely misses a home team game), to a very respectable personal participation in golf.

Velva assumed her duties as secretary to former Director Dr. K. Ross Toole on March 19, 1956, and for the past six years has served in a similar capacity under Director Mike Kennedy. Both men would agree that her unstinting efforts on behalf of that office and the Society as a whole would be difficult to over-assess.

LIBRARY IS TREASURE TROVE OF HISTORY'S RAW MATERIAL

FEW STATES can boast of a more complete public collection of the raw material of its history than can Montana, which this year is celebrating its Centennial year. The almost unbelievable foresight of its early Territorial leaders 100 years ago makes it possible today to read virtually every newspaper ever published in the Territory and State of Montana, beginning with Virginia City's MONTANA POST, which first saw the light of day in the Summer of 1864.

The Montana Historical Library collection, begun with the first year of Territoryhood and carried through disastrous fire and cramped quarters, is today housed on the second floor of the Society's four-story modern building and in five humidity-controlled stack levels. The research facilities available have resulted in the writing of many significant (and prize-winning) books on Western history, and have assisted in the preparation of endless numbers of history theses, magazine and newspaper articles, and documentary radio and TV shows.

On a purely human level, they have aided countless persons to obtain delayed birth certificates and have afforded hours of fascination to persons who delight merely in reading the words which announced the death of Abraham Lincoln, the flowery details of a Gay Nineties party, or the editorial bite of rival editors during the county-splitting era of Eastern and Central Montana.

The earliest newspapers, manuscripts, ledgers and journals were collected by a small coterie of dedicated men, charged with the responsibility in an Act creating the Historical Society and signed by Governor Sidney Edgerton on February 2, 1865. Before Helena superseded Virginia City as Territorial capital, the collection was moved to the law offices of Wilbur F. Sanders in Helena. It was completely destroyed in the great fire of January 9, 1874, and the collectors had to begin all over again. Here's what the Helena Daily Herald, in its issue of January 10, 1874, had to say:

Among the losses sustained by the fire not mentioned in our list last evening was the valuable law library of Col. W. F. Sanders, whose office was in Holter's brick building opposite the post office. Not only the law books, but a fine miscellaneous library, including a rare collection for the Montana Historical Society, were entirely consumed. The furniture and fixtures of the office met a like fate . . . Col. Sanders is absent at Virginia City. Mrs. Sanders, we learn, succeeded in saving the private papers of the office, but had no time to remove any of the books . . .

Officers of the Historical Society lost no time in publishing an appeal for replacement materials. Signed by Sanders, president of the Society, and other officers who included Charles S. Bagg and Granville Stuart of Deer Lodge City, Cornelius Hedges, Samuel T. Hauser and W. E. Cullen of Helena, the appeal was later published in Volume I of the Contributions to the Historical Society. It is an appealing document. Beginning with the history of the organization, the officers confided that their mandate to collect historical materials "seemed, at first, a barren and thankless one." Their statement continued:

There is not, probably, in the United States a region of equal area about which so little information can be gleaned as that parallelogram along their northern border which contains the springs of the Columbia and the Missouri . . .

In pursuit of the purposes herein indicated, the Society had accumulated a respectable library of books, some of which had been procured after much trouble, and were of great value It had manuscripts, too, pertaining to the matters which interested it, of great merit . . . The library building in Helena had been once tried by fire, and had survived a threatening and dangerous conflagration; and here the Society had deposited for safe-keeping its valuable collection, in rooms secured to it for that purpose. But, on the morning of the 9th of January, the larger portion of the town was burned so unexpectedly and so suddenly that only a small part of the possessions of the Society was preserved . . .

Relying largely on the devotion of our own citizens, and of its members, it has nevertheless received encouragement and aid from sister societies; from officers of the Federal, State and Territorial Governments; from many gentlemen interested in historical inquiry, and from authors and publishers, which it would not ask, and for which it had not dared to hope.

LIBRARIAN'S OFFICE, CAPITOL BUILDING QUARTERS

The booklet then went on to list the many things in which the Society would be interested: newspaper files, manuscripts, diaries, maps, Government and private expedition reports, biographies, histories, and many others. Donations could be sent to such prominent former Montanans as Frank M. Thompson in Greenfield, Mass., Hon. Sidney Edgerton in Akron, Ohio, and Hezekiah L. Hosmer in San Francisco, as well as to the Smithsonian in Washington and even to a London stationer.

Most of the material, happily, was eventually replaced, and in fact greatly augmented. Seventy-seven years ago this month, the collection was moved to the new Lewis and Clark courthouse, and the next year, in 1888, the Society hired its first full-time librarian—at $25 a month. He was William F. Wheeler, former U. S. Marshal and director of the 1870 census. He was to serve "as long as his services should be satisfactory and the funds would justify." The next year, Wheeler asked for—and got—$50 a month.

The new librarian reported that the Society had gathered 2,000 volumes of bound books, 1,000 pamphlets, and 200 bound newspaper volumes. He had another 120 volumes which needed binding, and pleaded for $500 with which to complete the job. (If comparative statistics are your dish, it is interesting to note that the library now contains 48,000 published works, 8,000 bound newspaper volumes, 1,447 reels of microfilm, some 10,000 photographs relevant to Montana, hundreds of maps dating from 1864 to the present, and 22 file drawers of manuscript materials.)

But back to 1888: Librarian Wheeler pointed out the need for a fireproof, separate building for the Society—a need which was not to be filled for more than 60 years.

In 1902, more spacious quarters were found on the ground floor of the new capitol building, and here the growing library collection was increasingly augmented with myriad museum objects. As related in last month's newsletter, the present home of the Society and of the Library was dedicated in 1953.

Today, a great deal of the newspaper collection has been placed on microfilm, but of course the old originals are still there, with dramatic immediacy of another day. The emergence of Helena over Virginia City, for instance, was implied in the March 18, 1865, issue of the MONTANA POST when the correspondent from Last Chance Gulch wrote these words:

Building, which had been going on so briskly for two or three weeks, has been brought almost to a standstill in this town by the extreme cold . . . Less than four weeks ago when I first came here, Helena could boast of not over a dozen houses, and now it is more than half the size of Virginia, and is growing as rapidly as ever . . . In a month or six weeks from this we can probably show you as much gold taken out as ever was taken out of the same number of feet in any country. It will take several months, perhaps a year, to equal Alder Creek in its balmiest days . . ."

The aging pages occasionally flare with national life, too. Abraham Lincoln's noble Second Inaugural Address was quoted in full in the April 1, 1865, issue. A reprint from the New York Post is revealing of the time:

Introducing . . .

MARY K. DEMPSEY

Historical Librarian

RESPONSIBLE for the Historical Society Library's extensive and priceless collection since October, 1959, has been Mary K. Dempsey, whose academic background and experience in the library field are unusually broad and varied.

A native of Manistee, Mich., Miss Dempsey graduated from St. Mary-of-the-Wood College in Indiana with a B.A. degree, later taking her B.S. and M.S. degrees in Library Science from Columbia University in New York.

In the Summer of 1932, Miss Dempsey began a 13-year career with the New York Public Library's circulation department, filling a variety of administrative assignments at the main library and at its branches throughout the city. These assignments included work in Harlem as well as service to New York's theatrical community—playwrights, producers and actors served by the Fifty-eighth Street Branch. She was in charge of the Bronx Reference Center for three years, and of the Columbia University sub-branch for a similar period.

IN LATE 1941, as global war threatened, Miss Dempsey received an unusually dramatic and timely assignment: she assumed charge of the New York institution's Library for the Blind. Top priority was given to a survey of its resources in order that they could be put to instant use by military personnel and civilians blinded by action in World War II.

Her career with the New York Public Library included as well special work in a number of New York hospitals — setting up library services, first at St. Joseph's Hospital for Chest Diseases, and later, under the auspices of the New York Junior League, arranging similar services at three of the city's leading general hospitals.

In 1945, Miss Dempsey went to Milwaukee, Wis., where for the next decade she served the Marquette University Library, first in charge of the General Library, and later as Director of Libraries. Her career at Marquette included full administrative duties, acquisitions, and responsibility for the growth of the library resources at the research level.

The many years of experience and conscientious service which Miss Dempsey rendered in New York and Milwaukee accrues now to Montana. Unquestionably, she has brought to us a level of professional excellence which has enhanced our standing as one of the major repositories of historic documents vital to research and writing on Montana and regional history.

stantly making application for permission to take the oath of allegiance, and a considerable proportion of them desire to perform this act privately . . . Their object is freely explained. Nearly all of them have relatives in the South, and are the owners of property there, and they urge that although they are in favor of the Government, the safety of their families in the rebel states depends . . . on the understanding of the rebel authorities that the heads of those families are not loyal to the Union.

While keeping its readers posted on the scarcity of flour in the Territory, the development of new mining areas and other local matters, the POST on April 15, 1865, jubilantly announced the fall of Richmond:

There is a prospect—a certainty—that the end of this contest is fast approaching. The resources of the South are exhausted: the people are dispirited, and the soldiers deserting by hundreds daily . . . Soon will war—cruel, unrelenting war—be over, and the starlit emblem of the free wave over the States which God joined and man vainly sought to cut asunder . . .

Fourteen days later, on April 29, 1865, the paper put out a special edition with bold column rules. The sad reason: the assassination of President Lincoln, and the apparent murder of Secretary Seward. The editors lead off with these impassioned words:

Intelligence the most painful has flashed along the telegraph wires to us this morning—news that is so fraught with horror that we can scarcely persuade ourselves but that we are the victims of some hideous dream.

The old issues of this historic newspaper are, of course, only a part of the Historical Society's priceless library collection. To list them all would be impossible and unnecessary. Suffice to say that the collection continues to grow, and contains not only almost all books on Montana and Western history written over the years, but the oldest ever published, the complete record of Montana's legislative sessions, its codes and laws, its newspapers, manuscripts, pictures, and journals.

It goes without saying that because it is a research library, its materials are not sent out except in copied form. But its spacious and well-equipped reading room affords a perfect setting for the research and study of history. The dream of 1864 has been realized. Latter-day Montanans, no less than their predecessors, have shown an energy and taste for historical preservation unmatched by any other state in the Union.

Introducing . . .
SAM GILLULY
Member of the Board

SAM GILLULY, whose background in Montana journalism is solid and far-reaching, has been a member of our Board of Trustees for more than a decade. For the last four years, since he came to Helena to make his home, he has been able (with our enthusiastic approval) to attend all board meetings and thus participate more completely in the work of the Society.

This affable journalist comes by his calling by birthright. His father, an early-day Montana newspaperman, published weekly papers in Glendive, Forsyth, Columbus and Lewistown. Born in Billings, Sam graduated from Fergus County High School and went on to take his journalism degree from Montana State University.

From 1930 to 1932, he served as Glacier Park correspondent and night police reporter for the Great Falls Tribune. In 1932, he began a distinguished career of nearly 30 years as editor of the Glasgow Courier, for many years one of Montana's largest weekly papers and now published as a bi-weekly in that lively Eastern Montana city.

THE EDITOR'S TOUR of duty with the Courier included the depression years, broken by the building of storied Fort Peck Dam. Along with his duties at the Glasgow paper, Sam edited the Fort Peck Courier, and found time to do "The Story of Fort Peck Dam" in two segments, now out of print.

Montana's capital city has been home to the Gilluly family (which includes his wife, the former M. Esther Hart and three sons, two of whom work in the field of journalism) since 1960. Now publications chief of the Montana Chamber of Commerce, Sam Gilluly has been active as secretary-treasurer of the Montana District of Kiwanis International and now as a member of the Montana Centennial Commission. Thus this cool-headed and engaging Montanan continues to make contributions which are solid and significant to the State as a whole, not the least of which redound to us at the Society.

FAR-SIGHTED MEN OF 1864 MADE SOCIETY POSSIBLE

"IT IS FOR OUR PEOPLE now to say whether they will preserve the early history of Montana in an enduring form, so that after times may know the thrilling drama here enacted." These words have a latter-day sound, but actually they were printed almost a century ago by the editor of THE MONTANA POST, Montana Territory's first bona fide newspaper, announcing the permanent organization of the Montana Historical Society early in 1865.

During this Centennial Summer of 1964, thousands of visitors are seeing that enduring form in almost unprecedented numbers despite alluring attractions elsewhere (including the New York World's Fair) and nationwide reports of Montana's June floods (which now, happily, are over and much of the damage repaired).

At the height of the Summer tourist season, during this historic year, it seems appropriate to take a brief retrospective look at how the Historical Society had its beginnings as well as a visual and word round-up of what the Society offers today in its attractive 4-story, million-dollar building on Montana's capital campus. It is our intention to emphasize the museums, art galleries and publications in this issue and the library—past and present—in the August number. The entire institution, however, is deeply related to the visionary action taken by Montana's first Territorial legislature in creating the Society.

Meeting in booming Bannack in 1864 and charged with bringing order out of chaos, the Territorial Legislature took heed when Francis M. Thompson, formerly of Massachusetts, introduced a bill which was enacted on Feb. 2, 1865, and signed by Sidney Edgerton, first Territorial Governor. Section I provided: "That in order to collect and arrange facts in regard to the early history of this Territory, the discovery of its mines, incidents of the Fur Trade, etc., etc., H. L. Hosmer, C. P. Higgins, John Owens, James Stewart, W. F. Sanders, Malcolm Clark, F. M. Thompson, William Graham, Granville Stewart, W. W. DeLacy, C. E. Erwin and Chas. J. Bagg—their associates and successors, are hereby made and constituted a body politic under the name and style of the Historical Society of Montana."

Thus it was started: the coterie of dedicated men named in the act began gathering the stuff of Montana history, including newspapers, journals, photographs and manuscripts. Regular meetings were held and the growing collection was moved to the Helena law offices of Wilbur Sanders for safe-keeping. This building had already survived one disastrous fire. No one could foresee that on Jan. 9, 1874, Helena would suffer its third and most devastating blaze, resulting in the destruction of most of the city's business houses, 15 residences, and the precious Historical Society collection.

Then began another laborious effort to collect replacement materials. The story of how new appeals brought in what has become an almost complete collection of Montana news-

INTERNAL REVENUE LAW CHANGES EFFECT DONORS

OF PARTICULAR interest to institutions such as ours, and to patrons who wish to bestow gifts (paintings, artifacts, even a million dollars!) upon us as not only a charitable gesture but as a very practical matter of business, is the change in Section 170 of the Internal Revenue Code which took effect early this year. Some important new provisions:

1. A deduction up to 30 percent of the donor's adjusted gross income for the taxable year may now be taken for gifts made to public- or government-supported museums instead of only 20 percent as before.

2. If the value of a donor's charitable contributions in a single year exceed the 30 percent limit, the excess may now be carried over for the next five years.

3. The carry-over for corporate donations in excess of 5 percent of taxable income has been extended from two to five years.

4. If a taxpayer's charitable contributions and Federal income taxes exceed 90 percent of his taxable income in the taxable year and in 8 of the preceding 10 years, there is no limit placed on his allowable deduction. The new law provides specific qualifications in this case, and the unlimited deduction is elective.

RICH DIGGINGS AT SOCIETY FOR HISTORIAN, CASUAL VISITOR

papers and other library materials, the move to the Lewis and Clark courthouse, followed by quarters in the new capitol building in 1902 and finally to the present Veterans and Pioneers Memorial building in 1953 will be dealt with more fully next month.

But very early in the Society's existence, items other than library materials began coming in: Indian artifacts, objects which accompanied the pioneers on their way westward; ore samples; portraits and other art objects, and many more irreplaceable mementoes. Even after the move to more spacious quarters on the ground floor of the capitol building, the collection was soon bulging at the seams. The mass of materials, despite heroic efforts on the part of librarians and others, became a helter-skelter array of Montana's heritage and history without adequate chronological order.

As early as the 1920's, Librarian David Hilger came up with the idea which eventually evolved into the present building: a cooperative plan to use funds gathered by Veterans groups from legalized boxing and land owned by the Sons and Daughters of Pioneers, plus Capital Land Grant funds. The dream was not to be realized for another 30 years.

OIL EXPLORATION

Early in 1950, architectural plans for the new building were accepted and finally, in 1953, the Society's new home was dedicated. For the first time, visitors could see the objects of Montana history in visual sequence, thanks to professional layout and planning done with the help of John C. Ewers, now of Washington's Smithsonian Institution.

When viewed in sequence, the Frontier Museum tells the State's history in segments, beginning with the natural setting of buffalo, antelope and beaver, and continuing with the Indian-Fur Trappers' Frontier, Cattleman's Frontier, Homesteader's, Transportation, Communications, Mining and Industry.

LEWIS AND CLARK DIORAMA

A second museum was created on the ground floor level, now known as the Pioneer Museum. It was designed for more flexibility of display, and since 1959 has included hundreds of items from the vast Johns Gun Collection. A later addition was Big Medicine, the sacred white buffalo who lived to old age on the National Bison Range at Moiese, Mont., and the heavily engraved 19-piece silver service given by the people of Montana to ships bearing the names USS Montana and USS Helena. The Pioneer Museum also contains some of the best examples of Indian artifacts and of pioneer articles.

Perhaps the most popular of all attractions at the building is the fine collection of original C. M. Russell art, housed in two rooms on the main floor. The formal Russell room contains some of the artist's important oils and water colors as well as his sculpture. A second, more informal, gallery displays much personal memorabilia about the artist, his friends and family. The Society, particularly in recent years, has actively participated in the bronze casting of many Russell sculpture pieces and has become a major source of such valued collector's items.

The readers of this newsletter and of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY are aware of at least a portion of our considerable publishing program. We have, in addition, participated in the publication of a great number of books, the culmination of which is the appearance this Summer of the first in a projected series of anthologies based on material from past issues of the magazine. This one, Cowboys and Cattlemen, contains articles on virtually every phase of the cattle industry in the West.

The Society has become a major outlet for the sale of C. M. Russell prints and bronzes, objects associated with Montana's Centennial, and hundreds of books on Western history.

Thus the thrilling drama has found enduring form: through museums and galleries (now augmented with a plug-in sound system), through the written word, and through the actual objects of history. The casual visitor, no less than the scholarly researcher, will find the diggings rich and rewarding at the Montana Historical Society.

THE HOMESTEADERS

VIRGINIA CITY DIORAMA

Introducing . . .
CASEY E. BARTHELMESS, MEMBER OF THE BOARD

CASEY BARTHELMESS, photographed in May, 1959, at the Miles City Fairgrounds, when he was taken into the Cheyenne tribe as an adopted son. Welcoming their new brother, whose tribal name is Howling Wolf, are (left to right) Fred Last Bull, Frank Waters, and Frank Yellowhair. All three of these venerable Cheyenne have "passed to the Sandhills."

IT IS with particular pride that we introduce an authentic cowboy whose roots go deep into the grasses of Eastern Montana and whose first-hand knowledge of Montana Indians and history is both broad and articulate. He has served on our Board of Trustees with quiet distinction since September, 1959.

Casey Barthelmess was born at historic Fort Keogh, near present-day Miles City, on July 18, 1890. He was the son of Christian Barthelmess, a native of Bavaria, who enlisted in the Sixth Cavalry in 1876, two years after coming to this country. At first stationed at Fort Apache, Ariz., Christian was a trained musician who served in the Army Band. Shortly after enlistment, he also became interested in photography, an interest he followed throughout his Army career, which eventually brought him to old Fort Keogh. The photographic record which he left of the post, its personnel and the many Indians who frequented the area is particularly significant. Many of his pictures have unfortunately been credited to other photographers.

Casey, one of seven children in the family, was named for Lt. Edward W. Casey, a Keogh officer much admired by the elder Barthelmess. Lt. Casey was shot from his horse while on a reconnoitering mission on White Clay Creek immediately after the Battle of Wounded Knee in January, 1890.

After the accidental death of Christian Barthelmess in April, 1906, Casey joined his older brothers and sisters in helping support the family. His first job, and the one which led to his lifelong career in the cattle business, was with John M. Holt's LO Land and Cattle Co., established in 1881 in the Mizpah.

His much-wanted education interrupted by the death of his father, young Casey began studying during the long winter months from school books loaned him by Mrs. Holt. Doing chores "for my keep," he began breaking broncs at the WL, a Holt ranch near Powderville. He became a very adept bronc rider, a skill which was to carry him into a career of breaking horses for participants in World War I and later as a top rodeo performer.

Casey was busy, from 1914 until his enlistment in 1917, breaking horses for overseas cavalry use. He enlisted in the 6th Cavalry, his father's old outfit, and served overseas for 13 months. After the war, he broke more horses for the LO, in addition to taking up residence on the homestead on which he had filed six years before. In January, 1921, Casey married and "thus began a life in the ranch business of growing Hereford cattle of good quality and raising six youngsters comparable in quality to the cattle."

As for his interest in history, Casey Barthelmess' own words tell the story the best: "It began as soon as I was old enough to realize that Fort Keogh, and Miles City close by, were locations replete with history. Many of the soldiers were veterans of the Indian campaigns, as were some of the personnel at the post . . . The Indians were camped about Fort Keogh along the Tongue and Yellowstone in large numbers, and I got to know many of them well . . . I often saw the cowpunchers unload large herds of cattle at the N.P. stockyards and trail them to the great open ranges still occupied by the big cow outfits . . . I am grateful and deem it a privilege to have lived among the oldtime Indians and to have known many of the oldtime cowpunchers who came to this country by the trail herd route . . ."

For our part, we deem it a privilege to count Casey Barthelmess a dedicated member of the Historical Society family. We are grateful for his many contributions, graciously and accurately bestowed.

MAXIMILIAN-BODMER COLLECTION DELIGHTS CENTENNIAL VISITORS

A TREAT for lovers of both art and history is the showing, through the remainder of July and the first week in August, of the famous Maximilian-Bodmer Collection - which came to Omaha's Joslyn Art Museum two years ago after a thrilling discovery of the treasured pieces in an old castle on the Rhine.

Beautifully catalogued and arranged in panel form, this show constitutes one of the earliest delineations of the Western scene. It was executed only three decades after the Lewis and Clark Expedition, by the able Karl Bodmer, who accompanied Alexander Philip Maximilian on his 1833 tour of the Upper Missouri region of North America.

But the story of its finding is almost as interesting as the collection itself: A representative of Knoedler Art Galleries was touring Neuwied Castle on the Rhine in 1958 when he found, buried in closets and other nooks and crannies, these original, beautifully preserved water colors and sketches which are the most complete record known of how the American West looked before more than a handful of white men had seen it.

In 1833, Maximilian (naturalist, explorer and Prince of Wied) decided to take Bodmer, a young Swiss artist, along on his journey of exploration in the wilds of Western America. Their year-long trip was filled with encounters with strange Indians, fur trappers and awesome scenery. Bodmer recorded it all, along with copious notes to accompany Maximilian's two-volume record of his adventures, published in 1839.

This great discovery was acquired in 1962 by the Northern Natural Gas company of Omaha for a reputed $750,000, and custody was granted to the Joslyn Museum of which the company's board chairman, John Merriam, is a trustee. It was an acquisition of the first magnitude, acclaimed throughout the world.

Director Mike Kennedy said, in announcing the show: "The significance of this collection can hardly be overdrawn. It is priceless and exciting. The Society is gratified to have been selected as one of the few galleries, other than Joslyn, in which these remarkable and early works may be seen. We worked long and hard to secure them for Montana in her Centennial year."

First In Series Of Authentic Cowboy Reminiscences Appears

THE FIRST in a series of three paper-back monograph reminiscences of J. B. Armstrong, an authentic old cowman who writes in the same terse, humorous vernacular with which he speaks, has been published by the Montana State University Press. Entitled The Raw Edge, this is recommended as "prime fodder" by Director Mike Kennedy who wrote the introuction. The price: a modest $1.75.

In this first in the series, Armstrong delineates the "beginnings of a cowboy," recalling his earliest experiences with such fabled cow-outfits as the Mill Iron. The second to be published will be entitled "The Big North," and will cover the middle years on the open range. The third, entitled "Bedding the Drags," will be Armstrong's nostalgic account of "what happens to a cowboy when the old way of life has passed him by." The Raw Edge may now be ordered from the Society.

BROOCH FROM HELENA'S FIRST GOLD

A CENTENNIAL item of great significance and interest is the gold nugget brooch, pictured here, sent to the Historical Society by Mrs. Annette Broadbent of Sussex, England, who is the adopted daughter of Reginald Stanley, one of the mis-named "Four Georgians" who panned the first colors in Last Chance Gulch one hundred years ago this Summer.

Mrs. Broadbent, through whom the Stanley family has exhibited a deep interest in Montana's Centennial Year, explained that the brooch was fashioned for Stanley's wife as a memento. It is said to contain some of the first gold placered in the historic gulch.

This is the second object of particular interest this year which Mrs. Broadbent has shared with Montanans. In our Summer issue of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, mailed this month, we have reproduced a segmented panorama view of Helena, photographed in 1865, and captioned by Reginald Stanley. The Society is grateful indeed to the Broadbent family for these evidences of their continuing interset in the history of our State.

Introducing . . . VIVIAN A. PALADIN, ASSOCIATE EDITOR

EDITORIAL CHORES of often bewildering variety cross the desk of Vivian Hilden Paladin, whose official title since 1958 has been Associate Editor of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. Included on her agenda, since early last year, has been THE MONTANA POST, our monthly newsletter at hand.

To insure against any dull days at all, there are museum and art gallery brochures, newspaper publicity, assisting with a number of books and publications produced by the Society, and such completely extra-curricular affairs as the annual Last Chance Stampede program (again in the works this month) and, in 1962, the most monumental of all: the production of a highly illustrated and researched history of Glasgow and Northeastern Montana, marking that community's 75th anniversary.

Glasgow is Vivian's hometown. A graduate of Glasgow High School, she began working on a weekly paper (now defunct) while still a senior. "Molded as to career by the Depression rather than by calling," she worked at most phases of country newspaper work, including operation of a type-setting machine at which she served a full-time apprenticeship. That accomplished, she attended Montana State University, functioning on the side as the first woman student in history to operate a Linotype for The Kaimin, the University's newspaper.

THERE FOLLOWED stints on such Montana papers as The Glasgow Courier, Shelby Promoter, and the Cut Bank Pioneer Press, with more and more gravitation to the editorial side. Married in 1946 to Jack R. Paladin, an officer in the U. S. Immigration and Naturalization Service, Vivian spent four years as society editor of the Havre Daily News. Transferred to New York City in 1950, the Paladins lived in New Jersey and she took her first and only job on a very large daily paper. Happily sent back to Billings, Montana, in 1953, the family (which by then included a daughter, Liz) came to Helena in 1956.

The transition from newspaper to magazine journalism has been a stimulating challenge for Vivian Paladin and has been a thorough-going course as well in Montana and Western history. Her work on the magazine received national recognition this Summer with a first-place award from the National Association of Press Women. On the Society side of the ledger, her solid experience in the down-to-earth realities of the graphic arts has been a notable contribution to our publishing program, a phase of Society activities of no mean proportion.

RANGE CATTLE INDUSTRY SUBJECT OF MAGAZINE ANTHOLOGY

WESTERN MINING SUBJECT OF SPECIAL CENTENNIAL EDITION OF MAGAZINE

ANOTHER king-sized, special edition of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY has been prepared especially for the Centennial Year. Due for appearance next month, the Summer issue is the first in our history to be produced by offset printing, and is devoted entirely to Mining in the West.

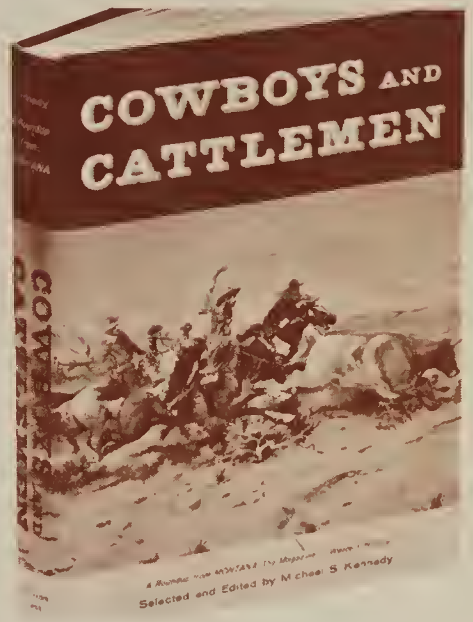
The cover subject, appropriately, is C. M. Russell's great oil depiction, DISCOVERY OF GOLD AT LAST CHANCE GULCH (Helena, 1864). It will appear on the front cover in full color through courtesy of the Gilcrease Institute of American History and Art in Tulsa, Okla. The back cover will feature a full-cover reproduction of THE MOUNTAIN MAN by the distinguished contemporary artist, Gerald Curtis Delano of Denver.

Setting the stage for the issue is an interpretive article on Western mining by Duane Smith, graduate student in history at the University of Colorado. Broad in scope, it delineates the effects on the entire West of the discoveries as they progressed from California to the Klondike.

The story of John Augustus Sutter, the Swiss emigrant who carved out a baronial empire in California, only to be utterly ruined when one of his foremen discovered gold at his sawmill in 1848, is told in an article by Caroline Higley of Portland.

Dan Cushman, one of Montana's favorite authors, contributes a robust and definitive account of Garnet, last of Montana's booming gold camps. Two pictorial features, prepared by the editors, cover the gold and copper bonanzas of Montana. The fabulous silver camp of Granite as seen through the eyes of a young minister in 1889, is another appealing and widely illustrated article.

THE FIRST in a projected series of anthologies of the best articles which have appeared during the 14-year history of MONTANA the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY is due to appear this month. Entitled Cowboys and Cattlemen, it is a gigantic roundup of the best articles on the subject of open-range ranching in the West, selected and edited by Director Michael S. Kennedy.



Published by Hastings House, New York, it is a big book (7-1/2x10) of 384 pages, and more than 150 black and white illustrations which include dozens of historic photographs and masterful paintings and drawings by C. M. Russell, Ed Borein and others. To add to its significance as a compendium on this colorful subject, the book is indexed and cloth-bound. The full-color jacket features Russell's famous early action oil, "The Herd Quitter."

The contents, which include an introduction by Editor Kennedy, are arranged under general sub-headings: From Beaver to Beef, Rangeland Royalty, Trail Drivin' and Texans, Bad Medicine, Mavericks, Rustlers and Stranglers, Rawhide and Sagebrush, and End of the Open Range. The result, according to advance comment, is "a feast of vital information and colorful interpretation of one of the greatest periods of our history: the age of open-range ranching, highlighting the parts played by the strong and daring men who made it great."

There are articles on all aspects of the era—from the cattle kings to trail driving cowboys, rustlers to vigilante-type enforcement, from wolving to roundup reminiscences, and finally the famed "hard winter," the last of the great cattle companies, and the coming of the "honyocker" and barbed wire.

Orders for the book, at $10 each, should be addressed directly to the Historical Society, Helena.

Plans are also underway for a deluxe limited edition of only 199 numbered copies. This rare volume, specially bound in distinctive pony or calf-skin (with the hair on), will incorporate special endsheets, an original work of art (as frontispiece) by leading U.S. contemporary western artists, and each will be autographed by the editor. This unique volume, at $35 each, may be ordered now, with delivery probably in August.

WINOLD REISS PORTRAITS

A SPECIAL SHOWING of 12 life-size pastel Indian pictures by the celebrated portraitist, Winold Reiss, has been hung in the ground floor hall gallery of the Historical Society.

Just arrived in this country after an overseas tour sponsored by the United States Information Agency, the portraits are from the private collection of W. Tjark Reiss of Hudson, N. Y., son of the late painter whose depictions of Blackfeet Indians have for years been considered the finest of their kind.

MOVING RANGE BURIAL DEPICTION BRINGS FORTH FULL

THE INDESCRIBABLE loneliness and lament of a rangeland burial, as well as the stampede which brought sudden death to many cowboys—two major sculptures by Harry Jackson, one of America's topflight young artists, form the nucleus of a unique and moving art show in our Gallery of Western Art.

Forming the background for this segment of Jackson's show is his scale model study in oils of his major painting Range Burial which he completed after six years of work under commission of the Hon. H. H. R. Coe. The completed 10x21-foot canvas is now in the Gertrude Vanderbilt Whitney Gallery of Western Art in Cody, Wyo. Apart from the study from which the epic canvas emerged, the viewer may see sculpted figures from it, a technique which Jackson used to achieve general composition and the three-dimensional effects of light and shade.

The artist and his wife, Sarah.

The sculptured pieces which have resulted from this monumental work are art forms in their own right. They include two large bronze studies: the dramatic stampede of Longhorns and the burial itself. Of the latter Frank Getlein, art critic of the Washington, D.C. Star wrote: "The group around the open grave are a figure composition rarely seen in bronzes in our time, free standing, with air among them, fully realized as individual pieces and as a group."

Individual figures from the burial are seen in three other sculptures, all of them revealing the private and restrained grief of the cowhands who are laying to rest a comrade killed in the stampede. Two are executed in polychrome cast stone, another, Flytime, in bronze.

To round out the exciting Jackson show, a number of other bronzes have been assembled, several from private collections. They include Long Ballad, Salty Dog, Bronc Stomper, Bustin' One, First Saddle, Hazin' in the Leaders, Settin' Perty, Ropin' and Lone Hand.

Harry Jackson, born in Chicago in 1924, has drawn and painted since childhood. He ran away from home at 14 and managed to get all the way out to Wyoming, where he became a cowboy. In 1942 he enlisted in the Marines and served as an official combat artist. While still in service, exhibitions and recognition by national magazines heralded him as an artist of promise.

Immediately after the war, Harry studied with Tamayo and Hofmann, lived in Mexico for a year, and participated in many New York group shows. He obtained considerable attention as an abstractionist of the New York School, where one of his close friends and mentors was the late Jackson Pollock. In 1954 he went to Europe and was so overwhelmed with the artistic feast there that he spent nearly seven years studying realistic and classic art. Back in the States, Jackson studied Homer, Eakins, Hopper, and the great western art of Frederic Remington and Charles M. Russell.

Today Harry Jackson's fame is established internationally, with recent one-man shows at such distinguished galleries as Tiber DeNagy, Martha Jackson, M. Knoedler & Co., Amon Carter in Texas, Kennedy Galleries in New York, and most recently at the Cody gallery.

Everyone who meets Harry Jackson, including all of us at the Society, are struck by his integrity, friendliness and genuineness of purpose as well as his undeniable talent and polished technique as an artist. In such an opinion, we're in distinguished company. John Canaday, art critic for the New York Times wrote:

> Mr. Jackson's reaction to success seems to have been that if abstract expression was that easy, it wasn't worth fooling with. He put it behind him and left it exactly where it belongs now that it has spent its force and taught its lesson—back in the schoolroom as a valuable way of studying the principles of color, composition and texture, not as ends in themselves, but as bases for whatever direction the student wants to follow thereafter.

All my best, your friend, Harry Jackson.
My 1964

TALENTS OF ARTIST HARRY JACKSON

Mr. Jackson chose to re-educate himself by study in the museums of Europe, determined to master the realist tradition. This he has done. He has not confused realism with imitation. His experience with abstraction was valuable to him, and remains in the expressive dash of his compositions. His preoccupation with Western themes is a limitation, by my way of thinking, and it is going to take Mr. Jackson longer to turn himself into a great realist than it did to become a nine-day abstract expressionist wonder. But I cannot think of a young artist whose work I will follow with more hopeful curiosity.

We can certainly agree with Mr. Canaday in everything except Harry Jackson's "preoccupation with Western themes!" Indeed, because of the consummate skill with which he is so preoccupied, the Society will be honored by having his work on exhibit all through the peak of the summer tourist season—June, July, and August. Several of the bronzes may be purchased through us. Simply write for description and prices.

Introducing . . .

DR. M. G. BURLINGAME,

MEMBER OF THE BOARD

The Society has enjoyed the counsels of Merrill G. Burlingame, one of Montana's outstanding historians, since the present Board of Trustees structure was created nearly 15 years ago. His has been a sympathetic and concrete contribution, for as a teaching and writing historian, his awareness of our major job—preserving the stuff of Montana history—is particularly acute.

A native of Iowa, Dr. Burlingame received his public school education in the rural and consolidated schools near Boone. After completing a course in a Des Moines commercial college, he worked for four years for the Chicago and North Western Railway. He continued his education at the Universities of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Iowa, in 1936 receiving his Ph.D. degree from the latter. That was also the year of his marriage to the former Virginia Struble, who is an enthusiastic historian and writer in her own right. They have one son, Ray, now an instructor at the Great Lakes Naval Station.

Dr. Burlingame came to Montana State College in 1929 as an instructor in history. He has been Professor and Head of the Department of History for many years, and is now director of the McGill Museum as well. He has made significant contributions to written history, notably his The Montana Frontier. published in 1942 and now virtually a collector's item. This crisply written and accurate history of Montana, presented in a sensible "frontier" chronological order, is much sought-after by researchers and historians. It has been an invaluable aid to us at the Society.

Many articles on Montana by Dr. Burlingame have appeared in the Brittanica and Americana Encyclopedias, and in historical journals. He edited. with K. Ross Toole, the three-volume History of Montana, and served as editor of James M. Hamilton's From Wilderness to Statehood. Both were published in 1957.

In addition to his work on behalf of our Society (which, incidentally, includes membership on the Editorial Board of MONTANA, the magazine of WESTERN HISTORY), Dr. Burlingame is active on the regional and national level: the American Historical Association and the Mississippi Valley Historical Association. He is a founding member and fellow of the Montana Institute of the Arts, and a director of the Montana Archaeological Society.

DUTCH HENRY STORY ELICITS INTERESTING AND INFORMATIVE READER REACTIONS

WE HAD A NUMBER of reactions to our own private detective story about Dutch Henry, which appeared in our April Montana Post and which was inspired by our acquisition (from A. J. Watkins of Loring, Mont.) of this lovable Montana outlaw's handgun.

The most notable reaction was from Watkins himself, who feels "most certain your story is accurate as to the end of Dutch Henry who owned this old gun." But we did make a "bone-head" mistake, it seems, in referring to the gun as "bone-handled." It is, points out Mr. Watkins, ivory-handled.

Another letter on the subject which should especially interest those who have run into more than one Dutch Henry, as have most readers of Western History. It is from George Topping of the Chicago Corral of The Westerners:

> Is this the same Dutch Henry who fought with Billy Dixon, Bat Masterson and others at Adobe Walls in 1874? Is this the same Dutch Henry notorious as an accomplished horse-thief in and around Dodge City in the 70's and 80's? Is this the same Dutch Henry who was a friend of the famous law officer, William Tilghman?
>
> Finally, is this the Dutch Henry who rides into a William Hartwell's ranch at Six Mile in frontier Kansas on a beat-up horse that had carried him 700 miles in nine consecutive days away from the clutches of the law? William Hartwell's story appears in Corral Dust, the publication of the Potomac Corral of the Westerners for Spring, 1964. Hartwell mentions Dutch Henry by name and this would be in the late 60's.
> If these Dutch Henrys are one and the same man — WOW!

Needless to say, the Dutch Henry whose fate we were concerned with was none of these. Ours was a Northern Montana cowhand who was active just before and after the turn of the century. Indeed, from all we can gather, the Dutch Henrys of greater fame named in Mr. Topping's letter would have been too fast company and much too early for him.

APPEALING ART OF DE GRAZIA CAUSING STIR AT SOCIETY

PAINTINGS AND SCULPTURE which reflect the simplicity of mood and deep feeling of the Southwest desert and its people are currently a highlight in the Historical Society's Gary Cooper Gallery. They are the work of Ettore (Ted) De Grazia, a colorful 55-year-old Arizonan who is considered by many to be this area's most exciting artist.

The extraordinarily simple yet powerful oils and sculpture depict such subjects as Indian dances and ceremonials, angelic little children, Indian camp life, and desert animals and birds. Increasingly, the work of De Grazia as an artist, builder, designer, and even as a guide to tourists in his beloved Arizona, has found favor. In 1942, the celebrated Mexican artist, Diego Rivera, predicted De Grazia would become one of the country's truly great artists and arranged a first-hand study of frescoes in Mexico. One of De Grazia's appealing paintings, "Los Ninos," (the Little Ones) was reproduced for Christmas cards in a special art series, and in 1960 he was the only U. S. artist whose work was chosen to help raise funds for the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF).

De Grazia, who would no doubt be one of Arizona's most colorful characters if he were not a famous artist, says of himself: "I feel about my work like an old workman does about building with adobe. You handle it and work in it until it's touched so many times there is love in it."

MISS ROCKY MOUNTAIN 70 YEARS AGO

LITTLE MISS ANNIE LEHNER, born in Helena October 25, 1888, was chosen Miss Rocky Mountain Princess to take part in the big celebration in Helena 70 years ago this year when Last Chance Gulch was finally selected as the state capital after a bitter campaign in which Senator W. A. Clark supported Helena against Anaconda, supported by his arch-rival, Marcus Daly.

Miss Lehner, whose father operated a meat market in Helena before moving his family to old Jefferson City, is now Mrs. Brooks Parsons and lives at Silverton, Ore., still active and in good health.

The picture of the little princess, complete with a victory shield bearing the likeness of Senator Clark, came to us through the courtesy of Jim Annin, who is making significant contributions to the history of Columbus and Stillwater County, Montana.

Introducing . . . RICHARD B. DUFFY, BUSINESS MANAGER

The Montana Historical Society has benefitted from the energetic and versatile know-how of Dick Duffy since 1951, and since 1956 he has managed and guided our financial and merchandise operations under increasingly complex conditions. Currently his days are filled with such varied activities as photography, operating a duplicating machine, managing a very extensive inventory of C. M. Russell prints, books on Western history, and hundreds of other items whereby our machinery is oiled and fueled. Everything from the intricacies of budget matters to the maddening complexities of an automatic Addressograph feeder come within the busy horizons of Dick Duffy.

Born in East Helena in 1928, Dick spent considerable time as a youth in Idaho's Coeur d'Alenes, where his father worked as a miner. When the family returned to Montana, he entered Helena High School, graduating in 1946. After graduation he enlisted in the U. S. Army, serving until his discharge as a sergeant in 1949. His hitch included a tour of duty in Korea immediately before the Communist invasion.

Back in Helena, Duffy enrolled at Carroll College, receiving his degree in business administration in 1954. Meanwhile, he began working part-time for the Society in 1951, becoming supervisor of microfilming in 1953. His career with the Society, in fact, encompasses the historic move from the old quarters in the capital building to our new building early in 1953.

A word must be added here regarding another aspect of Dick Duffy's career. In 1954 he joined the Montana National Guard as a second lieutenant and in 1961 became the commander of the 143rd Ordnance Company with rank of captain. Needless to say, this unit of Montana's National Guard benefits from the same energy and initiative which he has brought to the Historical Society for more than a decade.

WESTERN OILS BY W. H. D. KOERNER IN CENTENNIAL SHOWING

ESPECIALLY FOR THE CENTENNIAL YEAR, the Historical Society has hung the largest showing ever assembled of the art of the late W. H. D. Koerner, who, although he was one of the country's most successful illustrators and always lived in the East, is now placed in the first rank of documentary artists of the Western scene.

Part of the massive collection now hanging in the full gallery facilities of our lower floor level is fresh from successful showings at New York's Kennedy and Hammer Galleries. But many of the paintings, assembled by the artist's daughter, Mrs. Ruth Koerner Oliver of Santa Barbara, Calif., have never been viewed by the American public.

W. H. D. Koerner was born at Clinton, Iowa, in 1878, and at an early age went to Chicago, where he served a hectic but valuable apprenticeship as a quick-sketch artist for the Chicago Tribune. His retentive memory for faces and his speed and accuracy stood him in good stead, for his was the business of drawing likenesses of people who figured in the news when no photographs were available.

Koerner worked from 1:00 in the afternoon until 10:00 at night on the paper, then spent the rest of the night studying. He attended the Chicago Art Institute and later taught illustration at the Art Academy. There he met his future wife, Lillian M. Lusk, herself a talented artist. When Willis J. Abbott, later editor-in-chief of the Christian Science Monitor, launched his new magazine The Pilgrim, he remembered Koerner's accurate illustrative work and hired him as art editor.

Koerner and his bride saved enough money to enable him to attend the Art Students League in New York City and study under the renowned George Bridgman. Koerner's first important assignment was with Harper's, which had used many illustrations by Frederic Remington. Then came Century and Red Book, and some advertising work for a cereal company.

Koerner was accepted as a pupil by Howard Pyle, then directing a

Long-hidden CMR Art Comes Home

ALL TEN ILLUSTRATIONS which C. M. Russell executed in 1904 for a best-selling western novel and which have been long hidden away in a Chicago art gallery, are on display in the Society's informal Russell Room in Helena. The hope is that they may be acquired for our permanent collection.

DR. VAN KIRKE NELSON, Kalispell physician who was traveling on Montana's Centennial Train, took time out in Chicago to sleuth out the illustrations. He found them, in the Findlay Art Galleries, and returned to Montana to place them on display here. The price tag, which Director Mike Kennedy believes is a fair one, is $40,000, which the Society hopes may be found in order to keep them in Montana.

RUSSELL EXECUTED THE DRAWINGS for Francis Parker's novel, Hope Hathaway, Story of Western Ranch Life. Although they feature the heroine of the story (and are thus somewhat unique as subject matter), they represent some of Russell's finest work as an illustrator. Done in black and white guache with some color, they are filled with action and Russell's unerring touch of realism and excitement, Director Kennedy said.

vigorous school for artists at Wilmington, Delaware, soon after the turn of the century. Among students were such greats as Frank E. Schoonover, N. C. Wyeth, Harvey Dunn, and Stanley Arthur. The Koerners remained in Wilmington until 1917, when they moved to Interlaken, on the Jersey shore. Here he established a permanent home and studio.

From then on, however, most of his family summers were spent in the west. During the summer of 1924, the family was at Shaw's camp near Cooke City, Mont., the artist filling a sketchbook with quick drawings in pencil. Later he, his wife, son and daughter, sp[illegible] many summers at the famed Pl[illegible] pear ranch near Lodge Grass, in [illegible]se contact with both the Northern Cheyenne and Crow Indians.

Some of Koerner's tremendous canvasses were originally done as illustrations for serialized stories. They include Emerson Hough's Covered Wagon and North of 36 and Stewart White's popular stories of early fur traders and mountain men. Because Koerner was meticulous about researching every detail, his works were soon appearing on the front cover and in the contents of the Saturday Evening Post and as illustrations for well known books by Rose Wilder Lane, Zane Grey, Ben Ames Williams, Oliver LaFarge and Mary Roberts Rhinehart. Before his death at 59 in August, 1938, W. H. D. Koerner was a completely successful and dedicated western artist.

His realistic, dramatic oil paintings at the Society's showing are works of tremendous vitality, color and graphic detail, depicting virtually every facet of Western life from mountain men to covered wagons, cowboys and cattle, to the contemporary scene. The Society is proud that its galleries, for the next two months, will contain the largest showing of Koerner works ever assembled anywhere.

E. E. "BOO" MAC GILVRA, BOARD PRESIDENT

A SENSE OF HERITAGE, combined with a wide-ranging western enthusiasm and a warm, salty sense of humor, has made E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra a vital force in preserving Montana history for 35 years, for nearly a decade as a member of our Board of Trustees, and now as its president.

Boo MacGilvra got his nickname from Baraboo, the Wisconsin circus town (Ringling Brothers) where he was born, December 23, 1893. Virtually everything else about him is strictly Montana. Attending grade and high school in Wisconsin, he received his higher education at the University of Minnesota.

In a raging snowstorm in April, 1916, he landed at Zortman, a mining camp in Eastern Montana's Phillips County. The car in which he was riding with a group of young friends was driven by the son of the Ruby Gulch Mining company's superintendent. Young Boo agreed to take the ride from Minneapolis and go as far as his money would last. He went broke at Glasgow, but finished the trip on a borrowed $10 bill.

HE WENT TO WORK for the mining company, at first underground and later in the mill running the cyanidation recovery process. When asked if he knew anything about chemistry, Boo always replied, "Sure. I flunked it three times!" Just before entering the Infantry in World War I, MacGilvra filed squatter's rights on a homestead between wild and wicked Landusky and the Missouri river, five miles from the ranch of fabled outlaw Kid Curry.

Returning from the war, he operated mercantile stores in colorful Zortman and Dodson, cattle and homestead center. In 1930 he moved to beautiful Polson on Flathead Lake in Western Montana. He ran a theater, and on acreage near town helped promote the new Flathead sweet cherry industry. He also began to raise Shetland ponies, a hobby which eventually led to his founding of the Appaloosa pony breed (Pony of the Americas) on his ranch near Butte.

Boo was elected to the State Senate from Lake County in 1932, serving two regular terms and the long special session of 1933-34. During the "depression years" he served as Assistant Emergency Relief Administrator and functioned in such agencies as CWA and PWA. In 1934, he entered the Public Relations department of the Montana Power company which he served for a quarter century, retiring in June, 1959.

BOO MACGILVRA is a thoroughly dedicated Montanan who has been active in so many groups in his home city of Butte and other communities that the list is longer than can be given here. But his "consuming passion" is to preserve Montana's historical heritage. He has given much of his historical material to the Society's museum and library collections. More than that, he is ever on the alert for fresh facets of Montana's past. He shares them with a contagious enthusiasm, now reflected in the launching of the World Mining Museum at Butte.

ROBERT F. MORGAN, MUSEUM CURATOR

WE FEEL THAT the early part of Montana's Centennial Year is a good time to introduce a talented young man who has made and is making a truly significant contribution to this memorable year and our particular role in it. The six display cars of the Centennial Train, which have now become the heart of Montana's unique frontier display at the World's Fair, all carry the unmistakable marks of the artistry, drive, historical awareness and good taste of Bob Morgan.

Specifically, the Historical Society's complete contribution is contained in the car bearing original C. M. Russell art and a series of display cases created entirely by Morgan. Using as background themes ten of Russell's original "frontier character" pen and inks, he built significant related displays. Visitors to the train and at the Fair have been unanimous in praising them—not only for the authentic artifacts they contain, but for the unerring touch of good display technique. Those of us who watched Bob at work were struck even more with the speed (there was an almost incredibly short time-table involved) and with the ingenious way the objects were placed for visual effect, combined with sufficient strength to ensure their safety on the nationwide tour.

ACTUALLY, BOB MORGAN'S ART has been amazing people in his hometown of Helena since boyhood. Born in the capital city in 1929, he recalls that he secured a copy of C. M. Russell's Good Medicine when he was about six years old. Soon Bob was drawing so well, as the result of its inspiration, that most of his spare time was taken up by teachers who needed a display poster or later when a school annual needed a sure artistic touch. Bob Morgan was the art editor, in fact, throughout his school career of the Helena High School paper and annual yearbook.

As a freshman in high school, Bob began working at Fligelman's, a leading department store, trimming windows. His remarkable skill at hand-lettering also led to employment in a Last Chance Gulch sign shop. When the new Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building (which houses the Historical Society) was completed in 1952, Bob had already put in considerable time as a volunteer worker, creating museum labels and signs. Soon he was assistant curator. But the big assignment came with the creation of the heroic Lewis and Clark diorama which dominates our formal museum. By now curator, Bob worked with Sculptor Rudy Autio and Artist Les Peters in completing this largest museum diorama ever devoted to the famed expedition.

Following a stint with the National Guard (he still serves as a warrant officer), Bob Morgan returned to our staff five years ago, to again become curator when John B. Weaver left to accept a post with the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D. C.

A NATURALLY GIFTED, self-taught artist, Robert F. Morgan works at his art at his home (he is currently doing some unusually fine Indian portraits in oils), and delights his fellow workers with a continual output of pencil sketches which, if the great tradition of Russell and others holds, surely will someday be collector's items.

"Besides all this," Director Kennedy recently said, "Bob is a wonderful fishing companion—and the most malleable, pleasant and non-temperamental artist any museum will ever find."

MONTANA MEDICAL HISTORY GETS DISTINGUISHED AWARD

THE AMERINDIAN, bi-monthly American Indian Review published in Chicago, has given an "eagle feather" designation to Paul C. Phillips' distinguished book, Medicine in the Making of Montana, published in 1962 by the Montana Medical Association and the University of Montana Press.

"The eagle feather," the editors point out in their issue of March-April, 1964, "in Indian lore, was a mark of honor and distinction. It was earned only with great difficulty and was never lightly regarded."

Containing 564 pages and heavily illustrated and documented, Medicine in the Making of Montana is available in the regular edition at $10, illustrated here, and in a limited, deerskin edition at $25. Supplies are running low at this writing, but are still available at the Historical Society by addressing our business office.

Arbuckle Coffee Noted Our Statehood

THIS MAP OF MONTANA, and a drawing entitled "Gold Mining" was one of a series of cards issued in the 1880's by the Arbuckle Brothers Coffee company of New York. It was issued in 1889, the year of Montana statehood. The area of 146,080 square miles was almost correct, although the Montana Almanac gives the total land area as 146,316 square miles instead of 146,080 as shown on the Arbuckle map. The compilers apparently took the 1880 population figure of 39,159, whereas in reality it was much greater in 1889, thanks to the building of the railroads in the decade 1880-1890. As of June 1, 1890, the new state had 132,159 people—it had just chalked up its greatest rate of population growth in history.

Many people still living remember Arbuckle Coffee with affection, for it was the first widely-used brand in the West. The company produced a total of 50 such cards during the 1880's, devoting each to a particular state or segment of the country.

We are indebted to Jennie M. Cornell of Middleton, Idaho, for sending us the Montana card. In her letter of presentation, Miss Cornell pointed out that as historian of Middleton, Idaho, she was particularly involved in Idaho's Centennial in 1963. Middleton is the oldest town in Canyon County, Idaho.

C. M. Russell at White House Visit

PRESIDENT LYNDON JOHNSON not only made an impromptu personal appearance in the White House Rose Garden when the Montana Centennial delegation visited there April 17, but as an added treat he brought out a C. M. Russell original which he owns. As the President speaks, his painting is held by his assistant, Mike Manatos (left) and by Senator Mike Mansfield (right). Also seen in the extreme right of the picture are Mrs. Mansfield and Congressman Arnold Olsen.

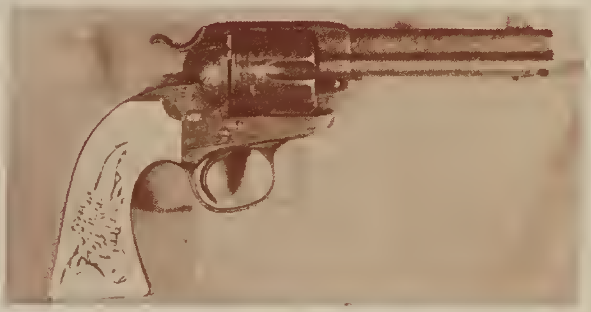
ACQUISITION OF DUTCH HENRY'S GUN INSPIRES INVESTIGATION

A TRAIL now more than a half century old, left by a man who was a good-natured, generous cowboy to some and a drunken, thieving outlaw to others, has been the subject of some fascinating detective work at the Montana Historical Society since the acquisition, late in 1962, of a bone-handled handgun which once belonged to Dutch Henry — also known as Henry Stewart, Henry Stuart, Henry Euach (pronounced Yaw), and Henry Ieuch (pronounced Youch).

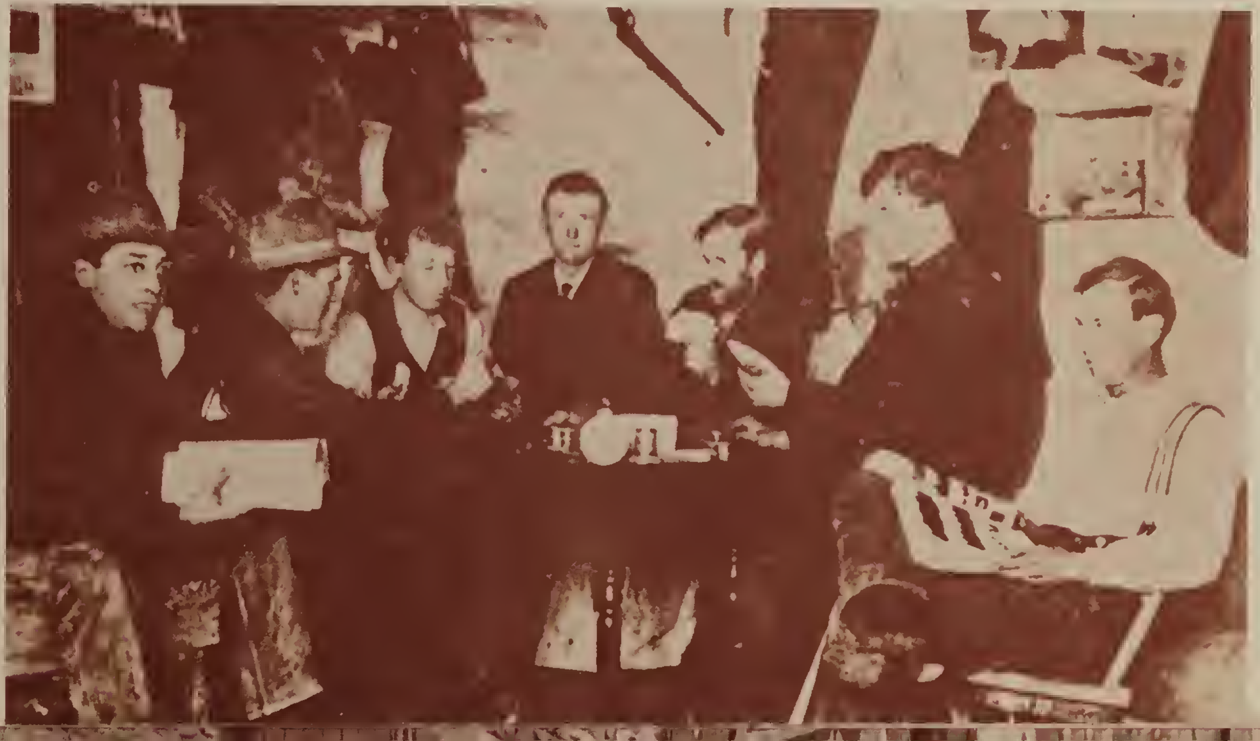


The trail has led to a shallow grave near Roseau, in northwestern Minnesota where, in April, 1906, the body of a man identified as Dutch Henry was found with a gunnysack covering a shotgun-riddled head; to a courtroom at Ardoch, in northeastern North Dakota, where 24-year-old Alexander McKenzie, a native of Prince Edward Island, was found guilty of murder in the first degree; to the Minnesota State Penitentiary at Stillwater, where McKenzie began serving a life term on August 10, 1906, and where his aged parents began a four-year fight for his release; to Royal Canadian Mounted Police headquarters at Ottawa, where a report arrived early in 1910 that the real Dutch Henry had been killed by an officer trying to arrest him on the Big Muddy River near Moose Jaw, Sask.; back to Stillwater in October, 1913, where Alex McKenzie was finally pardoned to fight the tuberculosis which threatened his life.

Although there are still a few gaps and question marks in the story, it has been established that all trails lead to the same man, known by all sobriquets listed above, including the oft-heard nickname, Dutch Henry. His main characteristic was humor, according to veteran deputy sheriff Hugh Calderwood, who still lives in Glasgow: "It was so universal he could not control it." He was a surpassingly expert cowboy, according to W. S. Reid of Ottawa, former rancher near Culbertson, Mont.: "He was a walking encyclopedia as regards position of cattle on the range at certain times, approximate effect of winds in causing them to drift . . . he was a much sought after man at roundup time or for ranch work of any kind." He was a generous friend, according to Alf J. Watkins of Loring, Mont., to whom Dutch gave the handgun now in our collection: "Dutch was always very well liked and helped out my folks and others many times. The biscuits hung damn high at times and a long way apart. Whose beef it was or where it came from was never asked when one of those grubline riders came along and stopped a few days."

Dutch Henry's handgun came to us through the efforts of E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte, president of our Board of Trustees. It was entrusted to him by his old friend, Alf Watkins, who remembers Dutch Henry with warm affection. Dutch gave him the gun in 1905, when he left Montana, presumably to his death a few months later. "If I never come back, kid, it's yours," were his parting words.

As nearly as can be reconstructed, Dutch Henry was a native of that part of Switzerland where a German dialect is spoken; hence the nickname Dutch Henry. He came to Montana with the old Dave (Dad) Kennedy outfit which headquartered near Saco in about 1888. When he was once a witness in court, he was asked his true name. His reply, recalls Hugh Calderwood, went something like this: "Henry I-e-u-c-h; name it and take it."



GAME OF POKER IN THE DIAMOND BUNKHOUSE EAST OF CULBERTSON, 1903

DID A SHALLOW GRAVE CONTAIN THE REAL DUTCH HENRY? WAS HE

THERE is no doubt that Dutch Henry was considered a key figure in a gang of horse thieves which profitably operated (beginning just before the turn of the century) to fill the need for horses by the army at Fort Buford and by the settlers rapidly settling North Dakota and Eastern Montana. A price of $12,000 was placed on the heads of Dutch Henry, and some cohorts named Carlisle, Jones, Sam Hall and Tom Reed. "Dad" Williams, for whom Dutch worked, is said to have been wiped out by the steady thievery of the gang.

But again comes the storied humor of Dutch Henry: A rancher in the Culbertson area named Jake Bauer had purchased 100 head of yearling calves from Oregon and turned them loose on the open range. By fall many had drifted west, including a number located near Nashua. Bauer planned to depart by sleigh and team, butcher the yearlings, and bring the meat home. A day or two later Dutch Henry was trailing in Bauer's cattle. When Jake tried to pay him, Henry's frank and indignant words were: "If I'd aknowed you would want to pay me, I'd never have brought 'em down."

His sense of humor is credited with having named the town of Plentywood and the creek on which it is located: A group of weary cowboys was camped along the creek in present-day Sheridan county, in Montana's extreme northeastern corner. It was a cold, rainy day, and the camp cook was trying vainly to coax some buffalo chips to life. Dutch Henry jumped up and shouted, "If you'll go two miles up this creek you'll find plenty wood." The wagon went as directed, but not a stick of wood was in sight. "Plenty of wood! Plenty of wood!" cried the hungry cowboys derisively. The name stuck to the creek and to the town which, in 1913, became seat of Sheridan County.

Alf Watkins probably remembers Dutch Henry better than any living person, and research reveals that even though he was a young boy at the time, his recollections are surprisingly accurate:

"I remember folks speaking of Dutch as having been arrested; he many times figured he was on the dodge himself and wouldn't go into town at all if possible. I suppose one of the worst things he done was haul grub out from Culbertson to some fellow shacked up one winter on the head of the Big Muddy where Plentywood now stands. His last trip around Harlem he was working for old Dad Williams who owned the Diamond C horses. I helped him gather the last bunch of them from around Wild Horse Buttes south of old Snake Butte near Harlem. There was some 30 head in that bunch. We met old Ike Neibaur as we went out to get them and he said we have run them several times but never able to get them where we could handle them. Ike was working for Ben Stevens at the time, and this would have been about 1904. It was the same year as the Boer War . . . I know my folks were living on the homestead a mile west of Harlem and got the Great Falls paper and Dutch was always reading the war news and was in sympathy with the Boers in South Africa. (The Boer War raged between 1899 and 1902).

"We got them horses into Chub Reed's place on Milk River. There was several unbranded slicks in the outfit from 3-year-old on down. Dutch gave me a couple of colts for my helping him. We broke some to ride and two to pack and when he started for Culbertson, both pack horses were loaded with bed and grub. He left $100 with my Dad, saying he would send for it when he needed it and did—that winter—from a town in North Dakota. Dad sent him a money order for the amount. Dutch was shacked up in Dakota at the time, and it seems was shot in the back right after he cashed this P.O. order. An old fellow (I wish I could say his name) was called from Culbertson to identify the body, which he done by looking at Dutch's gold teeth."

It was on April 24, 1906, that the body of a man was found in a shallow grave near Roseau, Minn., parts of the face shot off by a shotgun and a gunnysack covering the head. Alexander McKenzie was arrested at Mekinock, in eastern North Dakota, and taken to Roseau to answer charges that he had attempted to sell items belonging to Dutch Henry. McKenzie steadfastly maintained his innocence. In his initial statement he said:

"I first knew the man who called himself John Stuart, in Montana. His name is Henry Ieuchs and he was widely known as Dutch Henry. He was a cattle rustler. I met him again last fall (1905) in Ardoch, N. D., and he told me I would have to know him as John Stuart as there was a reward of $300 offered for his arrest. At Ardoch we fell in with William Stephens who had run a blind pig at that place and Dutch Henry and I went with him to his claim in Roseau. Henry and Stephens went to Wannaska Dec. 30 and got a registered letter. That night Henry gave me $25 and told me to meet him at Ardoch. The next day Dutch Henry and Stephens went away together, Stephens taking his rifle. After a while I took the shotgun and went over to Feeney's. Both guns shot cartridges loaded with shot. Feeney was not at home and after hunting awhile I returned and found Stephens at home. I left next day, taking the stage to Roseau and from there went to Dakota."

As the trial wore on, the jurors heard from Barney Burkholtz, who testified that in the latter part of April, 1906, he was burning brush on his claim and accidently stumbled over the body of a man with a sack over his head. County Coroner Lawrence Parker was called, and held an inquest. It was found that death resulted from two gunshot wounds, one of which tore away the deceased's chin, and the other penetrated his neck. The dead man was described as having light brown hair and a dark beard, mixed with gray. His inside coat pocket was turned inside out, and there was $6.02 in silver in his pockets.

The state's principal witness was William Stevenson (who had been called Stevens by McKenzie). Stevenson, a bartender, said he had met the deceased, John Stewart, and the defendant at Ardoch in November of 1905. He said Stewart had been drinking heavily and asked him if he knew a place where he could sober up. Stevenson told him to come over to his claim in Roseau County, Minn. Stewart asked if McKenzie could come along, and it was agreed.

Stevenson testified that Stewart had some money in his possession which he had obtained a day or two before, and announced he was going to Dakota. He departed from Stevenson and McKenzie, Stevenson going to a neighbor's and McKenzie stating he was going to the home of John Feeney, another neighbor. Stevenson said he later returned to his shanty and a few hours later, McKenzie came in covered with snow and carrying a shotgun which was "filled full of snow." McKenzie claimed he had been to Wannaska, Minn., but Stevenson testified that the young man, usually a heavy sleeper, was very restless that night. The next day, the men parted company, and Stevenson said he did not see McKenzie again until June, 1906, after he had been arrested for murder.

Circumstantial evidence apparently piled rapidly upon young McKenzie.

OUTLAW OR FRIENDLY COWBOY? WAS HIS YOUNG FRIEND A KILLER?

A dispatch from Roseau, Minn., dated Aug. 10, 1906, stated:

"Surprise was depicted upon every face in the courtroom when the jury which tried Alexander McKenzie . . . returned a verdict of guilty. When sentence . . . was passed, McKenzie personally thanked the court for not imposing the extreme penalty . . . The defendant and his friends had been jubilant and an early acquittal was expected . . . Surprise almost approaching consternation was apparent on every side. Up to the moment the word guilty was pronounced the smile which has been so characteristic of the defendant hovered about his mouth, but as that word was spoken he was seen to grip the arms of his chair as in the clasp of a vise. But when he left the courtroom he had the same springy walk and pleasant smile which had distinguished him from the beginning of the trial."

Daniel McKenzie, the defendant's aging father, began an unceasing battle for his son's release. The older man, then living near Boston, had once been a member of the Prince Edward Island legislature. It was early in January, 1910, that the McKenzies got their first real hope that they could convince others of their son's innocence.

In its issue of Jan. 21, 1910, the Culbertson Searchlight prefaced a St. Paul dispatch with these words:

"All the old settlers of Valley County, and many in Culbertson, remember Dutch Henry, or Henry Ieuch, who in 1902, 1903 and 1904 made periodical visits to Culbertson to spend the money obtained by rustling horses near the Canadian line in both Montana and Canada. Dutch Henry was reported murdered about four years ago, and Alex McKenzie, also known in Culbertson, was tried and convicted of the murder. Many Culbertson people have ever since declared that Dutch Henry was still alive, and it now appears that they were right. If report is true, the noted outlaw was killed by the Canadian police on Monday, Jan. 9."

The Searchlight then reprinted, in full, the St. Paul dispatch, dated Jan. 17, 1910.

"Alexander McKenzie, convicted in Roseau County in August, 1906, of murder in the first degree, and now serving the fourth year of a life sentence in the State penitentiary at Stillwater, may be an innocent man. The complete vindication of young McKenzie rests upon the identification of Dutch Henry, one of the most notorious cattle rustlers and horse thieves that ever terrorized the border country, who was shot and killed by the royal northwest mounted police 60 miles south of Moose Jaw, Sask., last Monday . . .

"The work of unraveling the long skein of legal complications which resulted in landing McKenzie behind prison bars for life has commenced, and it is expected that in a few days at the latest McKenzie will walk out of the penitentiary a free man, to join his old father and mother, who have worked untiringly for four long years to prove his innocence . . ."

As soon as news stories like this appeared in Canadian papers, the RCMP, of course, swung into action. Ottawa headquarters wired J. H. McIllree of Regina headquarters, on Jan. 12, 1910: "Is there any foundation for reports that Dutch Henry shot by Mounted Policeman south of Moose Jaw?" The same day, McIllree wired back from Regina: "NO FOUNDATION WHATEVER FOR REPORT ABOUT DUTCH HENRY."

To this day, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, noted for meticulous investigation, can find no information on which the 1910 news stories were based. The final piece in the puzzle, which came on October 20, 1913 with the pardon of Alexander McKenzie, does not allude directly to the alleged 1910 killing of Dutch Henry as a reason for his release. A Minneapolis dispatch, printed in the Culbertson Searchlight, carried the headline ALEX McKENZIE, MAN WHO SHOT "DUTCH HENRY," IS NOW A FREE MAN. The article said:

"Alexander McKenzie, who was committed as a lifer to Stillwater in 1906, for the alleged murder of Henry Ieuch, better known as Dutch Henry, a Montana border character, will be a free man tomorrow.

"Three reasons have been brought to bear upon McKenzie's release. First, a strong belief in his innocence, aided by the reports that Dutch Henry is still alive; second, the fact that McKenzie's pardon will avail little as he has tuberculosis; and third, the strongest, the unceasing pleas of his aged mother, who has never faltered in her assertions that 'her boy' was falsely imprisoned."

Finally comes the official word from Warden R. H. Tahash of Minnesota State Prison in Stillwater, regarding the admission and pardon of Alexander McKenzie. He was imprisoned on August 10, 1906 on a life sentence for first degree murder; released by the Board of Pardons on October 12, 1913.

No doubt the whole truth resides somewhere in a form which may be documented. Certainly we invite bits of information from our readers, regardless of how their recollections may now assess the character of Dutch Henry. We can only hope, along with Alf Watkins, that with his gift of Dutch Henry's handgun, some useful facts about this enigmatic cowboy and the wild, free open range era he represented, will emerge.

TO MRS. HEPNER: A TRIBUTE

WE AT THE SOCIETY have lost our oldest friend, Mrs. Josephine I. Hepner of Helena. We join Montanans in general and countless children in particular in paying tribute to this gracious lady, daughter of an early Helena merchant, who devoted her life to altruistic efforts on behalf of others. Mr. Hepner, appointed to our Board of Trustees in 1921 by Governor Joseph M. Dixon, served the Society longer than any other person.

But Mrs. Hepner's service to unfortunate children was even longer: she became a member of the board of trustees of the Montana Children's Home and Hospital on July 21, 1903, and was directly instrumental in building the present Shodair Hospital for Crippled Children in Helena. It was she who first told Louis W. Shodair, retired Philipsburg merchant, of the plight of Montana's crippled children and their need for a new hospital.

BORN IN NEWARK N.J., Mrs. Hepner came to Helena as a young child with her parents, Israel L. and Anna Auerbach Israel. She attended Helena Schools and later taught elocution and drama at Montana Wesleyan in the Helena Valley. She was married to Sol H. Hepner, a prominent Helena attorney, on June 6, 1899. They became the parents of Harold S. Hepner and Claire A., now Mrs. C. Harker Rhodes of Chicago. Mr. Hepner, who was also a Montana leader in Masonic circles, died on Feb. 28, 1938. Harold Hepner, a beloved teacher of journalism on the high school level, died at Libby Mont. in 1950.

To say that we will miss the councils of this wise, gentle and tolerant woman, to say nothing of her loyal support and friendship, would be understating the case. For until her recent decline in health, she attended and contributed to every meeting. First serving during the administration of her old friend, Librarian David Hilger, Mrs. Hepner had a thorough understanding of the highest aims of the Society and a flexibility regarding changing times and needs which was remarkable and valued.

GIGANTIC FORT PECK DAM SEEN IN LIGHTED PANORAMA

A LARGE RELIEF MAP and scale model of Fort Peck Dam, complete with push button lights to point up the myriad features of this largest earthfill dam in the world, has been received at the Historical Society for display. For the first time, many of our visitors now see, in full-sweep panorama, the gigantic proportions of this engineering achievement which since 1937 has diverted, harnessed and utilized the mighty Missouri.

Prior to the building of railroads in the Missouri Basin, the river was navigated as far upstream as Fort Benton, 2300 miles above St. Louis. When the railroad systems were completed, the significance of the river for trading and shipping abruptly declined. As the vast plains area became settled, floods were an increasing menace.

Congress authorized field reconnaissance in 1928, and on October 14, 1933, President Roosevelt approved construction of the dam under the Public Works Administration. Construction began late in October, 1933, with workers converging on this Eastern Montana area from throughout the country. It was a vast relief project at the height of the Great Depression, and it has turned out to be one of the West's most significant conservational and recreational projects.

ART COLLECTION HONORS MONTANA AND TWO COLORFUL PIONEERS

WHAT IS BELIEVED to be the largest public collection of contemporary abstract expressionist art of the New York School west of the Mississippi River has finally been unveiled in two of the Society's largest galleries. This significant collection is a gift to Montana from one of her native sons—a man who himself passed through the usual non-believer period during which the beauty, power and meaning of modern art eluded him.

The donor is Everton George Poindexter (affectionately known as "George"), a retired but still busy New York City broker, a native of Dillon, Montana, and descendant of a remarkable pioneer Montana family.

The custodian of this vast and important collection is, happily, the Montana Historical Society. In accordance with Mr. Poindexter's wishes, portions have frequently been seen at Montana's two university campuses, in Canada, and in several private showings during the past two years. Now for the first time, twenty-three of the larger canvasses have been hung in the full ground floor gallery facilities of the Society. Although our hope was to exhibit the full collection of more than sixty paintings at the time of this important unveiling, the collection in total is, unfortunately, too large for a single showing for even our full gallery facilities.

George Poindexter was introduced to modern art by his gifted wife, Ellie, a distinguished collector and operator of the New York art gallery which bears her name. He quite frankly confesses his first reaction: "it left me cold." Indeed, he found he had to "live with" his first acquisition (a Robert Goodnough) for four years before he came to appreciate it for something more than "nine square feet of black and white chicken feathers with a little blood dripped on them."

Once the travail of acceptance led to a degree of appreciation, understanding and love, Poindexter became an avid collector, adding works by deKooning, Kline, Gorky, Pollock, DeNiro, Held, Kerkam, Resnick and many others to his store. At the same time, he endeavored to know many of the artists personally. The collector found that instead of offbeat nonconformists, most of them were sincere, patient and gifted artists who could create the realistic world with skill and intellect. He learned that these people were searching into the depths of new dimensions to give unique expression to life and all its meanings—a departure from past conceptions of art which have confused and even dismayed the public and some critics in recent years, just as departures from "tradition" have always done.

Everton George Poindexter was born in Dillon, in one of Montana's most historic counties, in 1899. He went to school in the east (Columbia University), and after becoming immersed in the business world, he found himself too busy and preoccupied to visit his native state for many years. After retirement, when he came out on a hunting trip a few years ago, it was a case of love at second sight. The same enthusiasms which led George Poindexter to success in business and rewards as a patron of the arts now carried over to Montana. His love for the Treasure State and its heritage is deep and abiding. He will take full advantage of our Centennial Year to express more of it—as official greeter when the Centennial Train reaches New York next month and as a passenger on its return to Montana. He plans to spend most of this summer fishing and tramping the hills and valleys he knew as a youth.

It was during one visit to Montana, in 1959, that Mr. Poindexter and Director Mike Kennedy began the exploratory talks which led to his great gift of art to his native state. Reasoning that other Montanans, no less than himself, have become or will become aficionados of really good contemporary art, he decided to place his vast collection in the state for their permanent enjoyment.

The gift is in memory of his father, Joseph Boyd Poindexter, a noted Montana lawyer and jurist before his appointment as U. S. District Judge of the Territory of Hawaii in 1917, and his subsequent appointment as Governor of Hawaii (1934-1942), and his maternal grandfather, Everton Judson Conger, who became a distinguished Montana jurist in later life but who as a Union officer led the military detail which captured John Wilkes Booth after the assassination of President Lincoln.

"The most difficult journey I ever undertook was the tortuous trail I blazed through unexplored areas of my none-too-erudite mind," George Poindexter says. "It took me six years to go the whole distance and much of the time I was completely lost. But when I finally reached the summit, the view was incomparably rewarding. This was my journey into abstract art.

"Based on my experience, I was fully aware that when my collection would first be seen by many westerners, they would be as perplexed and even aghast as I once was. Yet I am confident that they, too, will find the journey worth the trouble. I dedicate the collection to two of my individualistic and thoroughly down-to-earth forebears with the same faith that I dedicate it to the people of Montana."

Artists represented in the initial showing include three pastels by Willem deKooning, a water color by Wyoming-born Jackson Pollock, two heads in ink by Arshile Gorky, and oils by Milton Resnick, Robert De-Niro, Frank Kline, Richard Diebenkorn, James Weeks, Jacques Beckwith, Earl Kerkam, Mark Hopkins, Teiji Takai, Robert Goodnough, Ernest Dieringer, Al Held, Herman Cherry, George McNeil, Michael Goldberg, and Joe Steffanelli.

CONGER AND POINDEXTER PLAYED PERSONAL ROLES IN GREAT EVEN

THE ASSASSINATION of Abraham Lincoln and the bombing of Pearl Harbor were catastrophic events in which vital roles were played by the two men honored by Everton George Poindexter in his gift of great contemporary art to Montana. They are his maternal grandfather, Everton Judson Conger, and his father, Joseph Boyd Poindexter. Both were men of the law and judiciary, both made more than ordinarily large contributions to their times, and both called Montana their home.

Everton J. Conger, whose only daughter, Margaret, became George Poindexter's mother, was born in Ohio April 25, 1836, to a family tracing its ancestry to Revolutionary times. His father, a Presbyterian minister, went to Illinois with his family in 1870 to become a frontier missionary.

Educated at Western Reserve college, Conger joined the Ohio Volunteers Infantry in April, 1861, when President Lincoln made his first appeal for troops. In the fall of that year, he became a staff officer under General Rosencrans, and soon received the first of two battle wounds. After his recovery, he went to Washington, D.C. and upon commission of Secretary of War Stanton, took command of the First Regiment cavalry. He received a severe hip wound while on a scouting expedition under General Butler, and was sent home to recover. Again he rejoined the army and was on detached duty for some time in the personal service of Secretary Stanton. He was serving there at the time of the grand review of victory in Washington, D.C.

On the fateful night of April 25, 1865, Colonel Conger was in Richmond, Virginia. As soon as he heard the news of the President's murder, he hastened to Washington, joining a U. S. Marshal enroute. Eleven days after the terrible event, he left with a detail of 25 men to search for John Wilkes Booth. They found him, hiding in a tobacco barn on the Garrett farm in northern Virginia. Conger recalled vividly all his life the events which followed:

> We called upon Booth to surrender, but he defied us . . . Every word he spoke was uttered in a theatrical voice; all his actions were those of a man conscious of every gesture. In a heroic tone, he offered to fight me a duel if I would let him come out, but I explained that my orders were to make an arrest only.
> "Once more, and for the last time, will you come out?" I shouted. "No!" replied Booth. "Boys, prepare a stretcher for me!" I went behind the barn, twisted up some straw, lighted it and threw it inside . . .
>
> Then came the most intensely dramatic incident in the whole affair. Cobwebs at the top of the barn caught fire and flashed like calcium powder. Booth was standing within four feet of me, but by the expression of his face I knew he could not have seen me. He walked toward the rear of the barn to discover what was making the fire. With that flash, so like a spectacular stage effect, he dropped his carbine, his face set in determined lines, and he wheeled about and started for the door.
>
> Boston Corbett, a private in my detail, had been stationed just outside. As Booth passed through the door, Corbett fired and shot him through the neck. Booth fell and we ran to him. Apparently he was dead, although the usual muscular reaction was taking place. I called to some of the men and turned my attention to saving what I could of the Garretts' property . . . It was perhaps a quarter of an hour before I came back to Booth . . . I elbowed my way through and stooped over the wounded man. He had regained consciousness and was struggling to say something. As nearly as I could make out, it was: "Tell my mother I died for my country."

Everton Judson Conger (1836-1918)

S: CAPTURE OF LINCOLN'S ASSASSIN, JAPANESE ATTACK ON HAWAII

From the assassin's pocket, Conger took the diary which delineated many of the plans for the assassination and a record of Booth's wonderings in the succeeding eleven days. A map, torn from a geography, was also found on him, routes to and from Washington marked in pencil. Conger recalled the diary entry which referred to the martyred President: "We have tried capturing him alive and that has failed: we have tried the cup and that has failed; now we must try the sword."

Judge Conger and Granddaughter, Helen Poindexter

Quite naturally, Colonel Conger was one of the key witnesses at the trials of Booth's accomplices which followed. As soon as he was free, he returned to Ohio and studied law. He was admitted to the bar in 1869.

On March 9, 1880, President Rutherford B. Hayes appointed him associate justice of Montana Territory. Judge Conger moved his family to Virginia City, and presided over a judicial district which included Madison, Gallatin, Jefferson and Custer counties.

When Grover Cleveland became President in 1887, the Congers moved to Dillon, where he began a law practice. He became Beaverhead County attorney, serving for several terms through statehood. When World War I broke out, the aging jurist was as deeply interested in developments as he had been during the Civil War, although no longer a participant. When his son, Joseph Boyd, was appointed judge of the Territory of Hawaii in 1917, Judge Conger was 81 years old. But he eagerly made the trip with the family and outlived his daughter by nearly a year. He died in Honolulu on July 13, 1918.

JOSEPH BOYD POINDEXTER was born in Canyon City, Oregon, on April 14, 1869, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas W. Poindexter. His father established a mercantile business in Dillon in 1881, and became one of that historic town's first aldermen. He was mayor for several terms, as well as postmaster. His brother, Philip H. Poindexter, was one of Montana's most distinguished cattlemen. Thomas W. Poindexter died in Dillon in April, 1903.

Joseph Boyd was one of five sons in the family. He attended Dillon schools, then went on to Ohio Wesleyan and eventually to Washington Union college in St. Louis, where he took a law degree in 1892. He began to practice law in Dillon in 1895 and after serving a time as city attorney, became Beaverhead County attorney for three terms. The young attorney married Margaret (Daisy) Conger in Dillon on April 22, 1897.

On April 1, 1909, Mr. Poindexter became judge of the Fifth Montana Judicial district, comprised of Beaverhead, Madison and Jefferson counties. He was appointed Montana's Attorney General in 1915 to fill the term of Dan M. Kelly of Butte, who resigned to join the Anaconda Copper Mining company.

Joseph Boyd Poindexter (1869-1951)

Judge Poindexter was appointed federal judge of Hawaii by President Woodrow Wilson in 1917, and except for quite frequent visits to Montana, Honolulu became his permanent home. It was in 1934 that President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed him territorial governor of Hawaii. In a eulogy to him at his death in 1951, a Honolulu paper said:

> On Dec. 7, 1941, Governor Poindexter made a decision that was distasteful to him, but for which legal machinery had been established. He proclaimed martial law in the Territory . . . Hawaii, in a state of terror and disorganization, applauded his action that day . . . The late Governor, jurist and friend of Hawaii, will be laid to rest in his native State of Montana. A little of the earth of Hawaii should be sprinkled there.

SOLID HISTORY TOLD IN PAMPHLET ON GEN. MILES' BATTLE OF THE BUTTE, 1877

GENERAL NELSON MILES' winter campaign on the Tongue River in the bitter January of 1877 is the subject of a particularly solid new pamphlet by Charles B. Erlanson, pioneer Montana rancher who has lived and worked in the Rosebud homeland of the Cheyennes for many years and knows the terrain intimately. His text is easy to read and accurate, and is made the more significant by fine documentary photographs and maps of the action, familiarly known as the "Battle of the Butte." The Society is proud to stock this historical contribution. It may be ordered, at $1.50, from our Business Office.

A NOTE OF THANKS

Grateful acknowledgement is made to the Beaverhead County Museum in Dillon for historic pictures and information used in this issue, with particular thanks to Mrs. Elfreda Woodside, chairman of the museum board. Along with this material, Mrs. Woodside has pointed out a particularly interesting point: Dillon and Beaverhead County can claim kinship with five governors. Sidney Edgerton came to Bannack (Beaverhead County) in 1864 and became the first Territorial Governor; Benjamin F. White, a Dillon banker, was the last man to hold this office prior to Statehood; Robert B. Smith, a Beaverhead County resident, was Montana's third state governor (1897-1901), and was responsible for bringing Gov. Edwin L. Norris to Montana from Kentucky to become his Dillon law partner. Norris, fifth governor, served from 1908 to 1913. Then, of course, Governor of Hawaii Poindexter is justly claimed by Dillon and Beaverhead county, which has also produced two lieutenant governors, Frank A. Hazelbaker and George M. Gosman.

SENATOR MIKE MANSFIELD, left, and Postmaster General John A. Gronouski admire the design for the C. M. Russell commemorative stamp (a part of the fine arts series) first day cancellation of which was held at Great Falls March 19, birthday of the Cowboy Artist. A number of first day covers, prepared by the Historical Society, the Centennial Commission and the Great Falls Tribune, now available, will be eagerly sought by collectors throughout the country. Russell's great oil painting, "Jerked Down," the original of which is at the Gilcrease Institute of History and Art, Tulsa, Okla., is the subject of the stamp, which commemorates the 100th birthday of the artist.

SILVER RUSSELL MEDALLIONS, NUMBERED AND CASED, STILL AVAILABLE

A LIMITED number of large (2-1/2" in diameter) C. M. Russell sterling silver medallions, produced by the Society, are still available, although they are going fast at $100 each. These are part of a limited casting, and all are numbered. Also available in sterling silver is the smaller (1-5/8" in diameter) medallion which has been struck with the same compelling design: portrait of the artist on one side and his moving and dramatic "Stampeded by Geese" on the reverse. These are individually numbered, and sell for $15 without case, $20 with case.

PREVIEW CENTENNIAL DISPLAY TRAIN TOURING MONTANA

TOP PRIORITY activity at the Montana Historical Society for the past several months, including the first three months of 1964, continues to be Montana's fabulous 25-car Centennial Train. The work of completing historical and contemporary displays for three of the cars now gathers momentum with the announcement that a five-car, self-contained preview train would make a 30-day tour of the state, beginning with its formal dedication by Gov Tim Babcock and the Centennial Commission in Helena on Friday, Feb. 21.

The five-car train — representing only a fifth of the main tour later — will make a full circle of the state, with one- and two-day stops at 20 towns and cities. Residents of every part of the Treasure State will thus have a chance to preview exhibits which should delight and inform millions of Americans as the full train makes its cross-country trip to the New York World's Fair in April and May.

Howard Kelsey, chairman of the venture, has just announced the itinerary as beginning at Helena Feb. 22 and then including: Missoula, Butte, Bozeman, Livingston, Columbus, Billings, Miles City, Glendive, Sidney, Glasgow, Malta, Chinook, Havre, Shelby, Cut Bank, Kalispell, Great Falls, Lewistown, and Billings, as well as smaller towns in between where stops are possible.

The train will reach Billings about March 25. It is from there that the full compliment of some 25 brilliantly decorated cars will be assembled for the trip to New York, beginning April 5. The train will return to Billings May 4, and there three cars used for conveying the horse and Indian contingent will be converted to additional displays. This reassembled train will return to New York for the full stay in Montana's designated space at the Fair throughout 1964 and 1965.

That, briefly, is where the train will go and stay. But the work of fitting out the three exhibit cars has been a monumental task of selection and hard work to assemble the best possible depictions of Montana's past, present, and future.

Since the Society is primarily concerned with Montana's past, it has been our particular job to bring frontier history to life with truly authentic items. Under the supervision of Director Mike Kennedy, the curatorial staff has designed the historical cars, with special wood wall paneling, lighting and Victorian wallpaper to enhance the 14 cases assembled by Mr. and Mrs. Don Foote of Billings. These contain an incredibly rich collection of historical artifacts. In this car, designated number 8, will also appear three very early (1866) water colors by Peter Toft depicting St. Ignatius Mission and Bannack, and a portrait of Col. R. E. A. Crofton by Frederic Remington.

But of even deeper concern to us has been Curator Bob Morgan's creation of ten displays, using objects which come almost entirely from the Society's permanent collection. Using ten of C. M. Russell's famed "frontier character" pen and ink drawings in the backgrounds, Morgan and his assistant, Perry Chisholm, have assembled items of authentic apparel, weapons and objects which relate to or compliment the Russell characters.

To cite some examples: The Prospector display contains tools of the gold panner as well as a fabulous Montana natural gold collection valued at a million dollars. The Road Agent is seen with such items as a strongbox, authentic bandit mask, sawed-off shotgun, and a hangman's rope. A buffalo coat, blacksnake whip and beaded gauntlets are displayed with The Stage Driver, while some of the Society's rich collection of Indian artifacts are seen with The Cree Indian, The Squaw and Halfbreed.

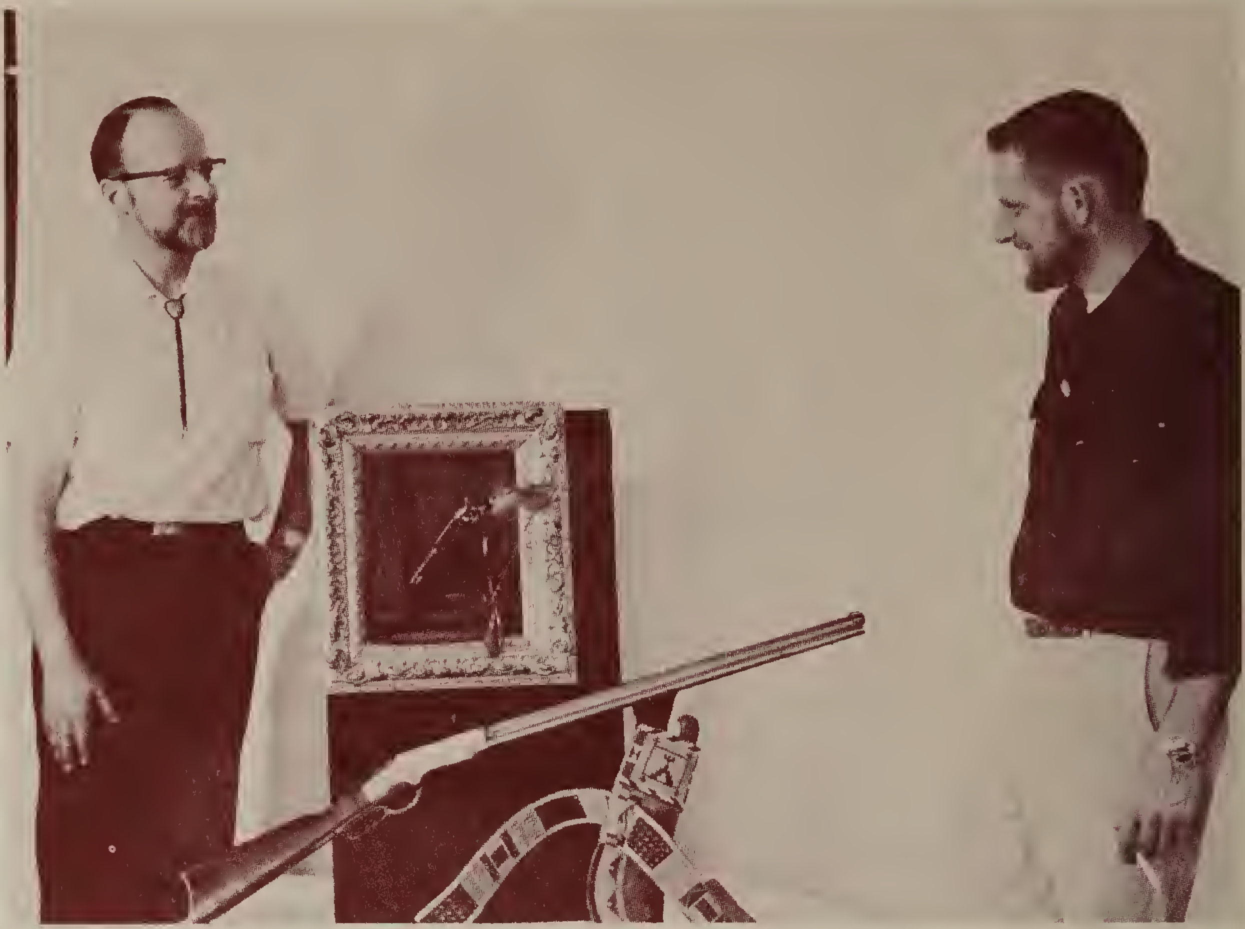
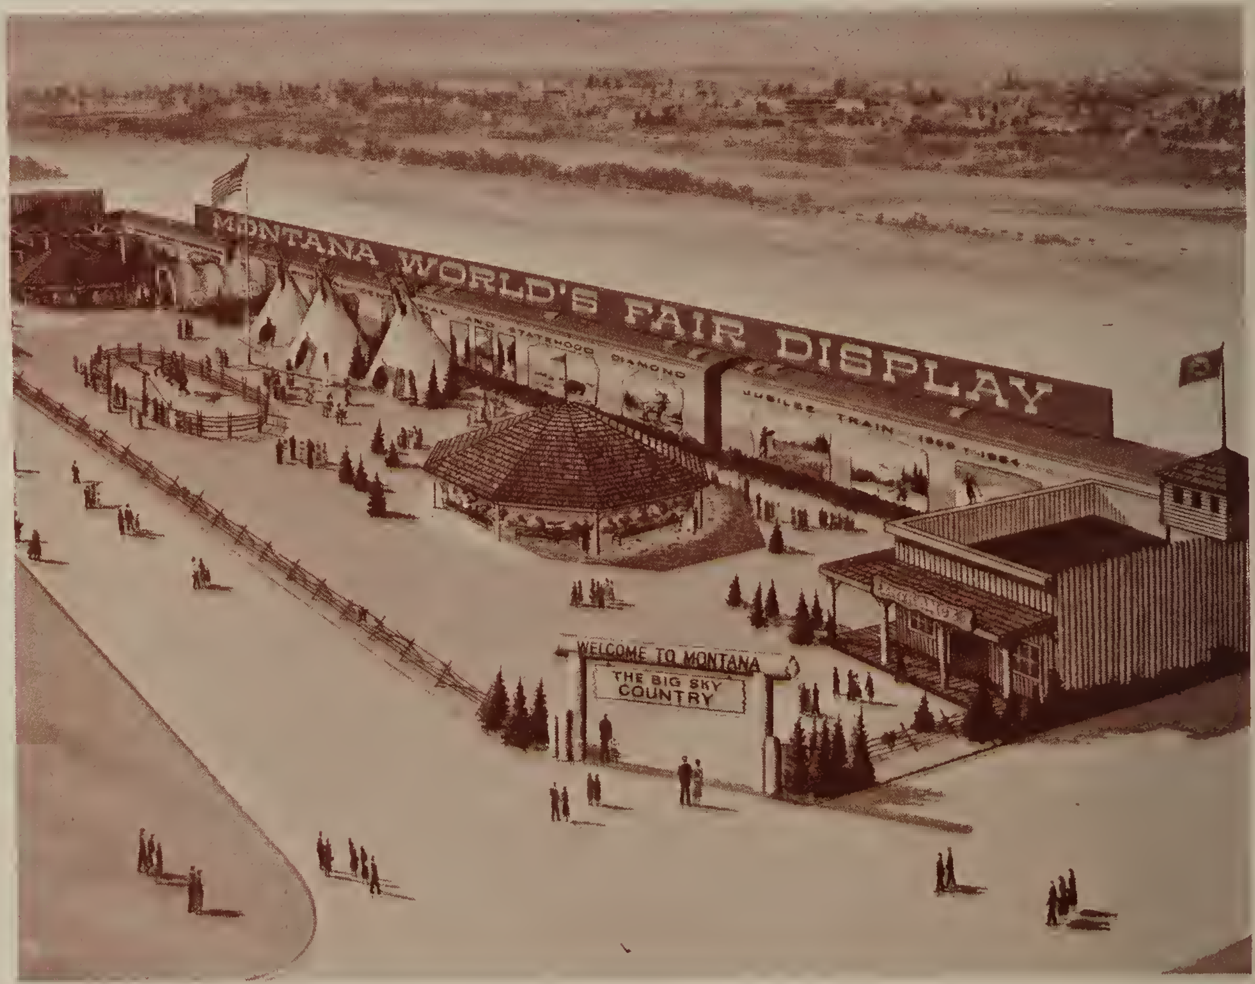
The semi-circular panels, accompanied by colorful and informative scroll labels, will be explained, along with other displays in the cars, in a synchronized sound commentary on never-ending tape.

In this historical car, designated number six, will be nine C. M. Russell original oils and water colors and three of his great bronze subjects. Frederic Remington's Buckeroo bronze from the Society's collection will also be included. Two Russell water colors related to the outdoors, along with a William Standing oil and two O. C. Seltzer water colors will be used in car number seven, prepared by the Fish and Game Commission to dramatically depict Montana's wildlife and recreational facilities.

THE WORLD'S Columbian Exposition opened in Chicago on May 1, 1893, marking the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America. Then, as now, the states were planning exhibits for the Fair. In its issue of Feb. 11, 1892, the Missoula Gazette had a suggestion for Montana's entry: The editors thought it should be a "grotto filled with Montana's mineral products, gems and other products of the mines." But a warning went with it: "An objection to the plan is that all the minerals would be so rich as to tempt the cupidity of the unprincipled and avaricious."



TRAPPINGS OF A FRONTIER SCOUT are included in this display, one of ten created by Curator Bob Morgan, right, and his assistant, Perry Chisholm, for the Centennial Train. In the velvet-lined gilt frame is an authentic frontier Colt revolver, gold- and silver-inlaid and engraved with C. M. Russell subjects by Elwood Averill. This prize-winning model is a highly prized collector's item, as are the engraved Henry rifle and the beaded belt and knife scabbard. All are typical possessions of a Frontier Scout.



ARTIST'S CONCEPTION of Montana's World Fair Display, designated space S-5, and strategically located close to the World's Fair Railway Station and such major attractions as the official United States exhibit, gives a graphic idea of its physical appearance. But it actually will be considerably longer that seen here. A 584-foot frontage will accommodate a total of seven cars, plus the unique stockade and blockhouse structures at either end.

FEBRUARY: LONG LEAP YEAR WINTERS, ROMANTIC HOLIDAYS

LONG AND TIRESOME Montana winters are always broken up a little in February, not only because March is next to come and with it a promise of Spring, but because the month is sparked by one or two romantic and patriotic holidays. And, of course, every four years it's Leap Year, as it is in 1964, Montana's Centennial Year.

Montana's early press made much more detailed comment about Washington's Birthday dances and Valentine's Day affairs (usually accompanied by very romantic poetry) than they do now. As for Lincoln's Birthday, Montana's earliest newspapers were printed before the President's death. And quite naturally, observance of his birthday as a national holiday was not declared for some years later.

Herewith a brief potpourri of some of the interesting things which happened in February in Montana's past, including, first of all, the declaration of Virginia City as Territorial Capital on Feb. 7, 1965. Said the Montana Post on Feb. 4:

> We are glad to inform our readers that Virginia City is now the capital of the Territory — de lege as well as de facto. This will of course tend to make property more valuable, and the future seat of Government will naturally be the favorite place of residence for the families of all connected with the various departments of the executive. Any other course would have been absurd and would have fastened a stigma on the Legislature which they have wisely avoided, by locating the capital in the centre of wealth, population and intelligence . . .

Two weeks later, the Post ran a long editorial about Virginia City's undoubted future as Montana's capital city. It said, in part:

> Only 18 months since, some log shanties of the most primitive kind were all that distinguished the locality of our present metropolis, with its 3,000 resident citizens and its large floating population . . . Notwithstanding, as yet, the somewhat hypothetical wonders of Last Chance Gulch, the sparkling lodes of Silver Bow, the riches of Prickly Pear, and the inexhaustible wealth of Deer Lodge, the "Golden Arrow" points steadily to Virginia City as the future "Queen of the Mountains."

But 1865 was a terrible winter. Snow blocked the freight wagons and it was not long before Virginia City experienced severe food shortages. It is unlikely that any citizen, transient or permanent, was thinking much about golden arrows or queen cities. They were thinking of flour. The price jumped to $100 a sack, and citizens organized and seized the meager supplies in town. It was orderly riot—remarkably so considering the stakes. The flour was apportioned out and sold at around $30 a sack, until it, too, was exhausted. Relief and $15 flour, did not come until four wagonloads managed to get through 40-foot snowdrifts in May.

An entire column in the Feb. 29, 1872, issue of the Montanian of Virginia City was devoted to a fancy Washington's Birthday ball. "Owing to the fact that another pleasant party occurred at the same time at Adobe Town and one at Sheridan, the attendance was not so large as expected," said the editor. But he went on to describe — complete with bold subheads — the decor, music, and what the ladies wore. There were portraits of many notables on the walls, "including one of the revolutionary hero whose birth the evening celebrated, while upon every side and from every chandelier the benignant folds of Old Glory cast its refulgent beauty upon the happy throng . . .

"The gentlemen were dressed with care and were never better armored to gallantly meet the lustre of Beauty's eye," the article said, proceeding later to tell every detail of dress of many of the ladies present. Using their initials and the correct number of spaces to fill out the last name, the editors listed each in turn, including the obvious listing of the former publisher's wife: "Mrs. D. W. T. - - - - - - (Tilton): an attractive demi-blonde — a very correct and graceful dancer — was tastefully attired in blue silk skirt, white alpaca overskirt and basque, trimmed with blue satin folds and blonde lace; blue satin bow, white kid boots, hair very neatly arranged. Becoming and much admired."

It was Leap Year in 1872, and the Montanian in its issue of Feb. 29, quoted a "cautious old bachelor" on the subject of its pitfalls for unwary males: "If you meet a young lady who is not very shy, you had better be a little shy yourself."

Through the years, a good many things happened in Montana in February, including the appointment, in 1915, of the state's first female justice of the peace in Chinook. She was Mrs. Watie S. Duff, and she had quite a time getting seated, for there were two rival Boards of Commissioners of Blaine County at the time. R. E. O'Keefe and Thomas Dowen both claimed to be chairman of their respective boards and it was finally necessary to bring the matter before Judge Tatton, who ruled in favor of Dowen.

Another of Montana's fabled winters came in 1936, when the temperature dipped to 60 below zero along the "High Line." On Feb. 16, 1936, it was reported that Marcus Howell, 101, was shoveling snow to keep warm in his shack on Snake Creek, southeast of Zurich. He had homesteaded there in 1912, when he was 77 years old, and had won his bet with Uncle Sam that he could stick it out for three years and gain title to his land. He had stuck it out for nearly a quarter century.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY was celebrated by costumed guests in this early Montana photograph, believed to have been taken before the turn of the century in a typical Territorial mansion. This picture, along with early views of Yellowstone Park, Cinnabar, Granite, Butte and the Crow Reservation, came to us recently from Michael Faklis of Campbell, Ohio, a Society member since 1955 and an avid collector of Western Americana.

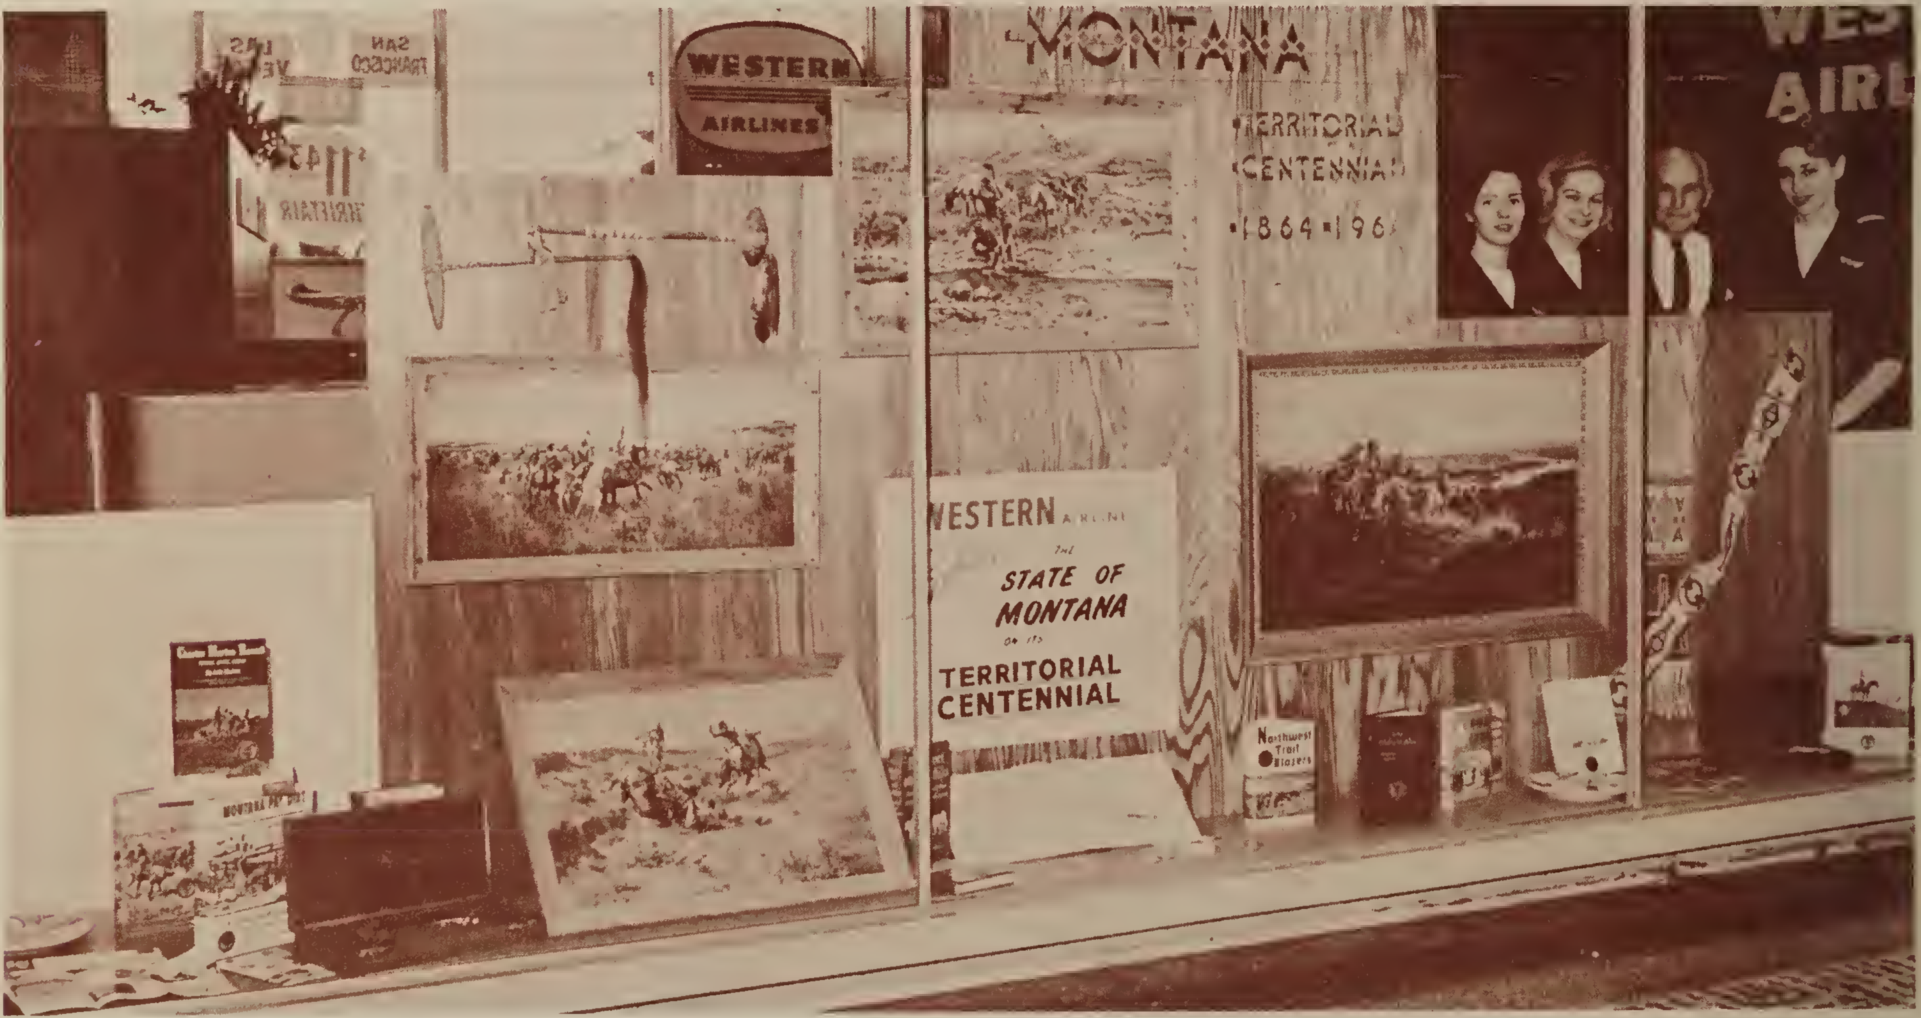
MONTANA ON THE MAP IN CALIFORNIA AND ABROAD



THE TREASURE STATE is receiving unprecedented attention and publicity during its Centennial Year throughout this country and abroad. Helping to carry the message is this extensive window display at Western Airlines headquarters at the Statler-Hilton Hotel in Los Angeles, and a similar one at the new American-style shopping center in Paris, just off the celebrated Champs Elysees. Both were prepared and assembled by the Historical Society, and contain C. M. Russell reproductions, Indian artifacts, books on Montana subjects, and such commemorative Centennial items as Colt revolvers, plates, coins and medallions, and the cookbook sponsored by Montana's First Lady, Mrs. Tim Babcock. The Los Angeles display, prepared especially for the Pasadena Rose Bowl parade in which Montana's float evinced unusual interest, will remain in California for an indefinite time, according to Commission Chairman L. W. Upshaw, who is photographed here with three employees of Western Airlines.

EXCITING PREVIEW: HISTORICAL DISPLAY CASES FOR CENTENNIAL TRAIN

FOURTEEN DRAMATIC display cases containing such items of Montana history as George Custer's gold watch, the weapons of the ill-fated 7th Cavalry and one of its tattered guidons, the objects carried westward by a pioneer family, the paraphernalia of storied Buffalo Bill, Wild Bill Hickock, Calamity Jane and many others, will unquestionably guarantee the success of Montana's Centennial Train on its way eastward in April and during its stay at New York's World's Fair

A side dividend throughout this month and until they are put aboard the historical car on the train is the presence of the cases in the lower floor gallery of the Historical Society. A special trip to Helena by anyone who may not be able to visit the train is highly recommended. For these are most unusual and interesting.

The fourteen handsome mahogany and brass-fitted cases are the "portable" portion of the vast collection of Mr. and Mrs. Don C. Foote of Billings. This dedicated couple has executed the displays themselves, achieving three-dimensional effects against appropriate backgrounds of velvet, wallpaper, cowhide, and textured woods.

Four cases are devoted to the Custer Battle, and contain hundred of objects found at the battlefield and used by Custer's command and the Cheyenne and Sioux who overwhelmed them. J. K. Ralston's great painting After the Battle will complete the Custer display, one of the cases containing a detailed key to the 39 episodes of the battle depicted in the painting.

The personal possessions and Wild West show objects of Buffalo Bill Cody occupy four cases, constituting perhaps the most complete record of this colorful man's career. Calamity Jane and Wild Bill Hickock are featured in another case, containing many personal possessions, her diary, and documented evidence of her marriage to the famed frontier marshal.

Trail drives and cowboys are depicted in a case containing authentic trappings of their trade, along with a diagram of the major cattle drive trails. Gold is the subject of a beautifully executed display containing gold scales, nuggets, picks, shovels, pans, and historic mining certificates and placer claims.

A miniature mahogany bar, complete with spittoons, roulette wheels, cards, bottles, and guns is a dramatic depiction of a frontier saloon, while lawmen and outlaws are subjects of another display containing such items as weapons, a hangman's rope, knives, badges, handcuffs, and a fine example of the "Oregon boot" with which early lawmen kept prisoners in check.

The pioneers case has a particularly personal interest, for it contains items carried and worn by Mr. and Mrs. Reuben V. Stumbo, who were the grandparents of Mrs. Foote. Included are an oxen yoke, cooking utensils, lantern, powder horn, the family Bible, a broadaxe, papier mache doll, and a bonnet worn by Mrs. Stumbo. The family came west by covered wagon and established a restaurant at Buffalo, Wyo., burned during the famed Johnson County Cattle War. The Stumbos eventually homesteaded near Livingston, Mont.

Altogether, the Foote display cases afford the best chance we know whereby we may vicariously share, in 1964, the life and times of the leading pioneers of the West.

ALFRED JACOB MILLER ORIGINALS ON VIEW

ANOTHER SPECIAL treat in the lower floor Gallery of Western Art in January and February is a group of 47 watercolors and field sketches by Alfred Jacob Miller, the earliest documentary artist to visit the West and record what he saw much like a news photographer might approach an assignment today. Loaned by the Joslyn Art Museum of Omaha, Neb., the Miller works constitute one of the most important art shows we have ever had at the Society.

ALFRED JACOB MILLER was born in Baltimore in 1810, and studied under the famed Thomas Sully. He worked successfully as a portraitist and landscape artist in Europe for a number of years, but upon his return to this country, success eluded him until 1837, when he met the renowned Scottish adventurer, Sir William Drummond Stewart. Miller was hired as illustrator for Stewart's 1837 western tour of exploration. The artist made more than 300 on-the-spot illustrations of scenes along the way, as well as Indians, trappers, and anything else of interest. He was, in effect, a newsreel cameraman with sketchbook. From his field sketches, he created hundreds of watercolors and oils.

IN SPITE of their great number, antiquity and artistic excellence, Miller's art lay in shameful eclipse for many years. But thanks to the diligence, in the past two decades, of Mae Reed Porter of Kansas City and others, his true greatness as the very earliest artist on the Western scene is now recognized.

NOSTALGIA AND DRAMA OF EACH NEW YEAR REFLECTED

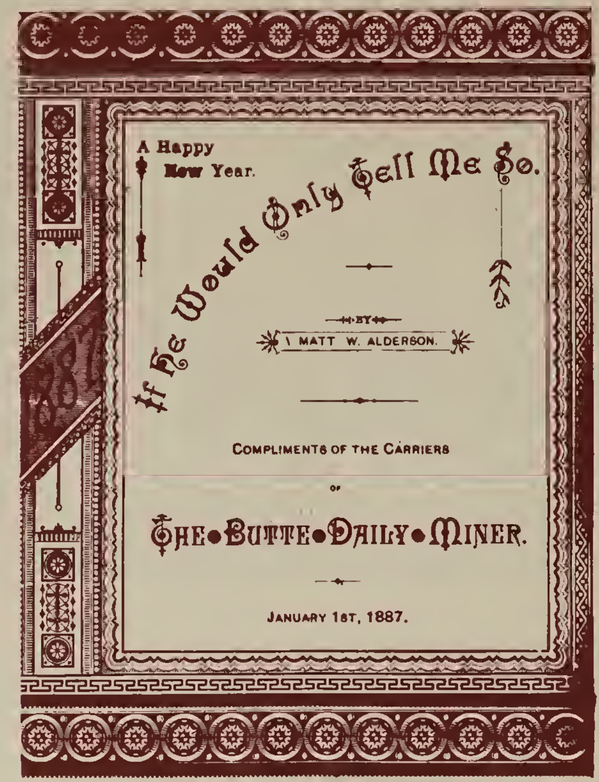
THE ARRIVAL of every New Year in Montana's past was greeted with a mixture of nostalgia, hope, reflection, carousing for the convivial, "watch and pray" observances for the devout — all of it reflected in newspaper columns of the day. A fascinating aspect of reviewing the first issues of each year is that they reveal the state of the nation and territory at the time. And with the years, the growing sophistication of Montana shows through, along with the growing seriousness and decorum of the editorial page.

The great Civil War was advancing toward its final stages late in 1864 when the new Montana Post of Virginia City published the full text of President Lincoln's address to a joint session of the Senate and House. "In presenting the abandonment of armed resistance to the national authority on the part of the insurgents as the only indispensable condition to ending the war on the part of the government," the President said, "I retract nothing heretofore said as to slavery. . .

"I shall not attempt to retract or modify the Emancipation Proclamation, nor shall I return to slavery any person who is free by the terms of that Proclamation or by any acts of Congress. If the people should, by any mode or means, make it my executive duty to enslave such persons, another must be their instrument to perform it. In stating a single condition of peace, I mean simply to say that the war will cease, on the part of the Government, whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it."

It was in its issue of April 29, 1865, that the Post carried the awesome news of the President's assassination as he sat in Ford's Theater in Washington the night of April 14. On file at the Montana Historical Society Library, this particular issue carried bold black lines between the columns to emphasize its tragic news.

But before the Post was called upon to inform its readers of the death of their President, they had some New Year's news to tell, and it was a lot closer to home: On January 2, 1865, John C. Orem, whose 138 pounds were spread over a five foot six and a half inch frame, fought brawny Hugh O'Neil to a draw in 185 rounds of savage boxing. It was one of the longest fights in ring history. A year later, the diminutive Orem, who claimed to be the middleweight champion of the country, defeated the 190-pound O'Neil on a foul.



A Happy
New Year.

If He Would Only Tell Me So.

BY MATT W. ALDERSON.

COMPLIMENTS OF THE CARRIERS
OF THE • BUTTE • DAILY • MINER.

JANUARY 1ST, 1887.

In the same issue in which it published the President's address, the Post stated that "according to a time-honored custom, our carrier will wait on his subscribers with a New Year's address. He has met, during the last month, with several reverses, and we hope his patrons will give him a substantial acknowledgment of his services." The "addresses" which thereafter appeared with regularity in the Post's first issue of the New Year, usually occupied an entire column on the front page. Written in flowery verse, they lauded Montana and at the end, made a "pitch" for a tangible reward to the newspaper carrier for his services.

A good example are the first and last verses of the "Address" published January 6, 1866:

Of all that holds us to this varied life,
Our Country's welfare is the strongest tie:
Strike palms, brave men, so late in bloody strife!
Your tears commingle o'er the graves where lie
Your comrades, slain on either side, when surged
The waves of battle's fury-driven sea:
Strike palms! Once more our hearts and hopes are merged
In Equal Rights and Laws again we're Free.

Adieu, my patrons; and when we print
And sing of new-born year another time,
I hope, with glowing coin, from our own mint,
You'll pay me for my harsh and jumbled rhyme.
Ere that, the Daily Post its place will take
With columns charged by the electric wire—
In Montana's interests wide awake,
Advancing them its aim and first desire.

The verse-maker failed to come forth with the annual column in 1868, the Post editor apologizing on Jan. 4 that "instead of mounting Pegasus, he mounted a cayuse and has gone courting a girl on the Stinking Water instead of the Muses." So instead of the usual column-long verse, the editors printed Tennyson's Ring Out, Wild Bells, adding that "its true poetry is more highly appreciated than the addresses which somehow are considered essential on New Year's day to coax quarters from the pockets of subscribers."

In the same issue, the Post described the large number of New Year's Day calls made in Virginia City, "the gentlemen being universally inspired by courtesy and kindly regard to pay their respects to their lady acquaintances, while they very generally had spread the hospitable board and dispensed smiles and refreshments with equal generosity." A reflection of his recent arrival in Montana Territory was the editor's observation that "the only difference noticeable between the manner of making calls here and in the farther Eastern cities, is the fact while there, two or three is sufficient to constitute a calling party, here, as many as 25 went together. It merely shows we are more fraternal and companionable."

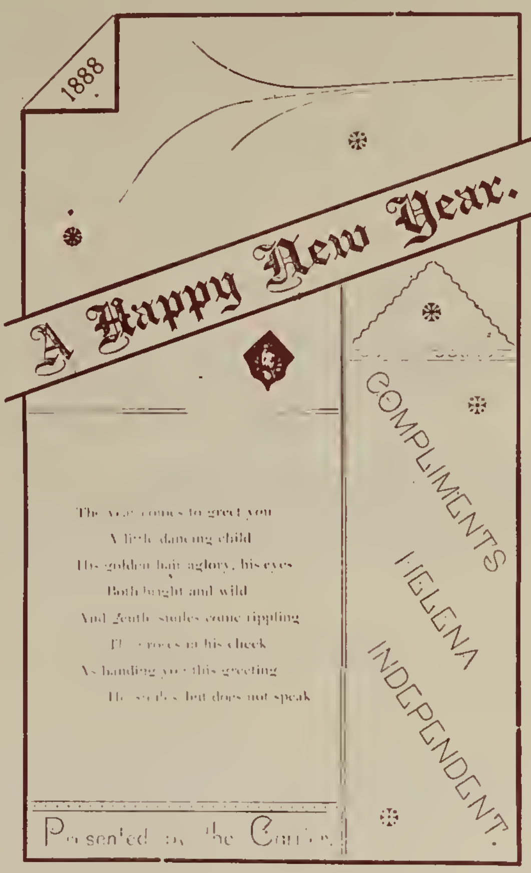
With tongue in cheek, the Post of Jan. 5, 1867, recounted a New Year's Eve ball held at the junction of Oro Fino and Grizzly to which "invitations were personally given to all those of the elite" to attend a free dance. "But," the editor said, "immediately after supper a flank movement was executed that would have done credit to Sherman . . . The hats, cloaks, shawls, overcoats, etc. of the party were piled up behind the scales, and a delicate hint given to 'weigh out' the moderate sum of $6.50 per couple. The Bull Run stampede was nowhere to the consternation which seized the party. Who thought of taking money to a free blow-out? No one. There they were: bank clerks, lawyer's clerks, store clerks and the typos, without dust enough to swear by, and the clothing of themselves and partners confiscated. Matters, however, were at last settled satisfactorily by exchanging the autographs of the majority of the party for the needed articles of apparel . . ."

This was the only affair of the New Year of 1867 which the editors recounted in detail. They summed up the others by saying: "Well, we cannot enumerate all, for they come so thick and fast to our pleased memory, that we fear of doing injustice to some, and so we desist, only remarking that the adoption of this good old usage is but another mark of the rapid advancement of civilization in this comparatively young land."

Two years later, the paper was reporting on more social affairs of the New Year, all of them growing in sophistication and lavishness. But the editorial humor was still there: an open house conducted by Jacob Smith of the Montana Hide and Fur Company was reported. "His well known and lavish hospitality will be literally swung around, as seen from a section of the bill of fare," the editor said. The menu included such delicacies as "Neats foot oil, a la Montana; roast wool, sinew sauce, chicken feathers, crow wing sauce, boiled mink skins, wool hide, and catskin sauce."

WITH THE passing years, editorial columns in Montana's newspapers early in January reflected more serious thought to the state of the world and Montana, particularly in years following catastrophic or very important events. At the turn of the year 1878, editors had had time to digest the full implications of the defeat of George Custer's command and the surrender of Chief Joseph and his Nez Perce two months before. In its issue of Jan. 4, 1878, the New Northwest, published at Deer Lodge, said in part:

"The year just ended has been in some respects an eventful one to the world at large as well as to the people of Montana. Twelve months ago the public mind was disturbed through fear of trouble pending the peaceful settlement of the electoral count which followed in the regular order of events. Another gigantic war has begun in Europe which may not end until all the great powers north of the Mediterranean sea and east of the Ural Mountains shall have been drawn into the contest. Our own country has had a speck of war on the crest of the Rockies, and the name of Joseph will no longer be exclusively remembered in connection with the clothing raid of Mrs. Potipher, but as the title of one of the most valiant and successful Indian warriors of the continent . . .



"Our Territory, notwithstanding the losses sustained by the Indian war, is in a more prosperous condition than at any time for years; our mining interests have been developed more rapidly than anyone anticipated, and two of the towns in this county—Butte and Philipsburg—have doubled in wealth and population, while the little old town on the "trail to Helena" (Deer Lodge) has held her own . . ."

In the same issue, the New Northwest published its views on how the "Indian problem" should be handled:

"A great deal has been said and written as to what shall be considered the best policy to be pursued with our American Indians. There are two policies and only two entitled to any consideration. One is that policy which may in the shortest time and in the most effectual manner exterminate every Indian on our part of the continent. The other policy—a policy dictated by a desire to civilize, enlighten, and perpetuate our Indian population—can only be carried to successful results by placing every adult Indian where he can do no harm until dead, and by taking all children and minors and compelling them to acquire habits of industry and frugality, giving them at the same time moral and intellectual instruction . . . The fate of the Indian who fails to accept the conditions of civilization is extinction of family and tribe . . ."

THE DIGNITY and identity which come with statehood were conferred upon Montana in 1889, and this fact, with some reservations, was touched upon in a broadly scoped editorial in the January 1, 1890, issue of the Great Falls Tribune, then published as a semi-weekly. It is another example of the depth and seriousness of New Year editorial comment in Montana's press. There were New Year's parties, and these were reported. And presumably, newsboys still left New Year's greetings with their customers with the hope that an increment might result. But no longer were column-long "addresses" used to plead for them. As for the social gatherings, society reporters handled the events in specially written and decorous columns. This was the Tribune's editorial at the beginning of Montana's first year as a state:

"In the year which ends today the civilized world has enjoyed profound peace. Rumors of war were current, but better counsels prevailed in the European cabinets, for which all mankind should rejoice, for in the end all people suffer by carnage and devastation. The centenary of the French revolution found the old world better off than it was at the taking of the Bastille, but much remains to be done in the way of reform. Let us hope that Europe at large will profit by the awful warning which France gave when she overthrew privilege and proclaimed liberty and equality amid fire and slaughter. Much better is it for monarchs, like the emperor of Brazil to bow to settled facts and not resist the march of freedom.

"In our own country the admission of four territories to the rank and dignity of statehood will render this year, memorable in our political annals. In Montana, the people do not yet enjoy the full fruition of statehood. Fraud has blocked legislation and deprived the state of proper representation in the United States senate, but there are fair prospects that right will speedily prevail and that Montana will soon be in the enjoyment of all the benefits which statehood confers.

"Political strife has not happily retarded the material growth of our state. Montana enters on the new year, endowed with youthful vigor and confident that she is entering on a bright future. In mining, railroad building, tillage and stock raising, Montana has made notable progress during the closing year . . ."

First Magazine Of Centennial Year Due Next Month

THE FIRST EDITION OF MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY for the Centennial volume year, 1964, will be off the press by mid-December, traditionally in time for the holidays when many subscribers include it on their Christmas gift lists. To carry out the spirit of the season, two full color C. M. Russell paintings will be used on the covers: his famous Christmas Meat from the Trigg Russell Gallery in Great Falls on the front, and the humorous Best Wishes for Your Christmas from our collection, on the back.

While the remaining issues of the Centennial year are being planned as special editions on such broad subjects as the Indian in the West, Fur Trade and Mining, the Winter 1964 issue is one of varied subject matter with elements to please every reader. Some samples:

Dr. Stanley W. Davison of Western Montana College of Education in Dillon has gathered a potpourri of recorded holiday celebrations in Montana Territory, taken from the Fort Benton, Fort Owen and Fort Sarpy Journals, the erudite observations of Granville Stuart, and the early Montana press. It is a commentary on the efforts of lonely men on the frontier to observe Christmas and New Year's and the growing sophistication of observances with the years.

Also in the spirit of Christmas and family living is a widely illustrated article on A. Phimister Proctor, considered America's greatest sculptor of horses. Written by Vivian A. Paladin, associate editor of the magazine, it emphasizes the attachment he had for his large family as well as the story of his rise to membership in the National Academy and his completion of heroic statuary for many of the country's cities, including his last and greatest work, the Seven Mustang group at the University of Texas.

A fresh and appealing look at C. M. Russell is contained in an article by Elizabeth Greenfield of Helena, who remembers the cowboy artist when she was a child living at her father's ranch near Cascade. "The Cowboy Artist as Seen in Childhood Memory" tells the mystical, sympathetic feeling Russell had for children and the small animals of nature. Illustrations include some of Russell's rare works in this area, never before reproduced, as well as the actual pages of an 1898 magazine for which he illustrated an article written by Mrs. Greenfield's mother.

Another article based on a woman's diary, which have found much favor among MONTANA readers, is the story of an 1871 wagon trip undertaken by a Chicago family for reasons of health, not wealth. Fighting off lung disease, the mother, Mrs. Mary Eliza Young, was ordered by her doctor to go to the Rockies overland rather than by rail. She kept a journal of the trip which ended at the present site of the Air Force Academy near Colorado Springs. Entitled "Quest of Health, Not Wealth," the article was written by Mrs. Young's granddaughter, Marian McIntyre McDonough.

"Stampede: Rangeland Terror" is the title of a low-key but exciting, true life experience of Floyd Hardin, authentic old-time Montana cowboy who still lives in Malta, Montana. It is taken from his unpublished book-length memoirs, and is illustrated with original drawings by Curator Bob Morgan and actual pictures.

There will be the usual generous helping of book reviews and a special feature on efforts to mark the Lewis and Clark Trail from St. Louis to Fort Clatsop, Ore.

IT HAPPENED IN NOVEMBER

MONTANA TERRITORY celebrated its first Thanksgiving under official proclamation on Thursday, November 24, 1864. The editors of the Montana Post in Virginia City observed in their issue of Saturday, Nov. 26, that the day passed "very quietly." They went on to say, wistfully, "No big dinner nor dance to mark this day set apart for thanksgiving and prayer. No invitations to the printers to come and have a square meal or a square drink. It was all the more surprising, but not the less acceptable, to receive from our friends Adam Klasser and Dan C. Coleman, barkeepers at the Montana Billiard Hall, a token of remembrance in the form of a gallon or so of egg-nogg and a huge pound cake. Adam and Dan, you are bricks, and will make your fortune for you remember the printers. Long may you wave!"

IT WAS THE THANKSGIVING of 1863 (and before the Montana Post editors were on the scene to report it) that the ingratiating Henry Plummer sent to Salt Lake City for a 40-pound turkey (which cost him around $60 in gold dust) and some fancy wines and other trimmings. He invited Sidney Edgerton, Wilbur F. Sanders and other Vigilantes and their families to his home for a sumptuous meal. The guests enjoyed the hospitality of their genial host even though some of them no doubt knew the gentlemanly road agent was slated to be hanged. He was — on Sunday, Jan. 10, 1864, at Bannack.

Letters Of Mining Engineer Mirror Life In Montana Territory

IT WAS MONDAY, March 13, 1882, and Frank Leonard Sizer had just arrived in Helena to become chief clerk in the Surveyor General's office. He had graduated four years earlier from the University of Michigan, and armed with a degree in engineering, had spent three and a half years in Leadville, Colorado, where he "acquired more mining experience than wealth."

A unique record of Mr. Sizer's years as a young Helena bachelor in the early 1880's is a bound volume of hand-written copies of his personal correspondence, preserved in the Historical Society Library. Frank Sizer was a thoroughly civilized young man, interested in the civic and social aspects of Montana Territory no less than in its mining and agricultural prospects.

Recent inquiries to the University of Michigan and correspondence with his son, Attorney Randolph S. Sizer of Berkeley, Calif., reveal that this articulate correspondent became one of the country's distinguished mining engineers. At his death at 85 on July 11, 1942, he was eulogized in the mining journal Mining and Metallurgy, which traced his mining career in Colorado, Montana, Arizona and California, as well as in Mexico and Honduras. He was a charter member of the Mining and Metallurgical Society of America, and for six years served as a director of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers. In 1940, at the age of 83, Sizer examined a placer property in Honduras, making the journey by train, boat, plane and mule-back.

Helena was a town of a little more than 3600 people when Sizer arrived in 1882. The Daily Independent took note of it with some editorial freedom, misspelling his last name and giving him an incorrect middle initial: "Frank N. Seizer arrived from Colorado Monday night to accept the position of Chief Clerk in the Surveyor General's office, in place of Mr. Wilkie, resigned."

Sizer wrote about his own arrival in one letter preserved in the volume, addressed to the University of Michigan's campus newspaper: "I was agreeably surprised upon receiving the appointment unsolicited. It is a responsible and lucrative one and as my attention has been turned to surveying ever since graduation, it is directly in my line. I am pleased with Montana and shall always be delighted to welcome a classmate or an old college friend when one should come this way."

AS A COLLEGE STUDENT. 1878

But by July, 1882, the lucrative part of the job had not materialized, for Sizer wrote to his tailor in Illinois that he was unable to pay for his last suit of clothes because his salary had not been paid: "Congress has yet made no appropriation for our office, and as they will probably not adjourn until August 1, we may not get any money before Sept. 1st. That leaves me with three month's salary due and it would be quite inconvenient for me to remit at present . . ."

Sizer also confided to a friend that "my salary is only $1800, but that will keep the wolf from the door I reckon." In the same letter he said he had made the acquaintance of many nice people. "This is a very aristocratic little place and very pleasant society all by itself," he wrote. "I have attended one party, a German, which was given in the greatest style. I have a fine boarding place, and a nice room at the house of a prominent lawyer who has a splendid library to which I have access . . ."

But the chief clerk realized the shortcomings of his new town. A letter of June, 1882 to a friend in Leadville listed some glaring gaps in the business world:

> . . . I have been thinking for several days of writing you, principally to tell you what a splendid opportunity there is to start a daily paper in this town. There is one morning and one evening so called dailies, but it beats the devil that any one will subscribe for their damned insignificant sheets. Perhaps once in three days some telegrams appear and they are all the way from two to four days old and are copied from the Butte and Salt Lake papers. They even haven't any enterprise to obtain local news and struggle to give the least satisfaction for the most money. One is 10c, the other 15c a copy. I am sure it is a fine opening for a paper, as all our merchants advertise liberally.
>
> Another thing much needed here is a first class hotel and in that enterprise a man of capital could do well and reap a quick return. Still another business poorly represented is a book and stationery establishment and a man with $5000 capital could sweep the field here. I really believe that the inhabitants are already beginning to feel the effect of the Colorado blood infused into their business, and will wake up when some of the best things have been snatched away from them.
> There are certainly opportunities here which do not exist in Colorado and I believe I hit the bull's eye when I made my last move . . .

But Sizer wrote carefully detailed letters to his friends about Montana and the opportunities it offered. Possibilities in law and farming are given in excerpts from two letters, dated in April and May, 1883:

> The law business in Helena as yet is very light. Scarcely any mining litigation is going on but with the development of the mines and the completion of rail roads there would be a better outlook. However, I do not look for any immediate boom. The stock interests are the most promising of any of the industries of our Territory and there is a great deal of first class agricultural land in the Eastern portion, so I believe it is destined ultimately to make a great state. I have asked several lawyers if they needed a clerk but the answer has been that they can do all they have to do, themselves . . .
> . . . I think this section of country offers special inducements for cattle and sheep raising over any other portion of the west which I have seen . . . When I came to Montana a little over a year ago it was with a strong prejudice in favor of Colo. but I must confess that I believe now that Montana has a greater variety of resources than any other territory and is destined as soon as we are provided with better rail communications to take a front rank . . .

Early in 1883, Frank Sizer revealed that he had fallen deeply in love with a young lady from Denver, whom he visited early in April, 1883. After his return to Helena, he wrote a letter

HOW TO ORDER A DRESS SUIT SO THE COATTAILS DON'T CROSS

AS A YOUNG HELENA BACHELOR.1884

to a friend in Leadville, telling him of his side visit to Salt Lake City, his impressions of a Morman conference, and some observations about Montana roads:

> Shall you be surprised to learn that I was able to get away from Denver? She arrived Sunday morning from the south and I had four days of absolute bliss, and it was very hard to tear myself away. I left there Thursday morning the 5th and expected to come straight through but meeting some pleasant people who were going down to Salt Lake City and as I had never been there, I went along and had a very nice time for two days in the city of the saints. Mormon conference was in session and I attended at the Tabernacle Sunday morning. It was a wonderful sight. I had never seen so many people — 13,000 under one roof together — and I had the pleasure (?) of listening to Geo. Q. Cannon and Jos. F. Smith.
> The subjection of the common people by the priests and dignitaries of the church is a pitiable sight and I believe that polygamy must be suppressed before Utah can ever take her place as a state and come to the front as her resources would warrant her in doing.
> Well I am rather glad to be at home again and this is a pretty good place to rest in. I found a hearty welcome from my friends here. My particular pard, Will Sharpe, drove out about ten miles to meet me and I was glad to exchange from the Coach to a nice easy carriage. The roads were in terrible condition and coming over the range there was great danger of an upset. It took us all day long to cover 46 miles. I hope I am done with staging in this country . . .

FRANK SIZER had a healthy interest in the social life of Helena, in his own wardrobe, and those of his friends. It is the latter topic which provides some of the most amusing and illuminating letters in the collection. The following message, dated April 19, 1882, was addressed to his tailor, C. L. Stamate & Co. of Ottawa, Ill., and gives minute instructions for a dress suit. Ottawa, incidentally, was Sizer's home town; he was born there in September, 1856.

> . . . I have another order for you which you may fill if it will be satisfactory to you to wait for your pay until July 1st as my salary for the quarter does not become available until then. I want a full dress suit if you can furnish it from what measurements you have. I want it made of the best materials throughout, linings, etc., and would make the following suggestions for your guidance: First in regard to the pants the left leg should be ¼ inch shorter than the right. I had an injury to my left knee a number of years ago and there now seems to be a slight difference in the two legs. Neither pair of pants which you have just sent me hang exactly right—the pair like the suit are not so bad but I have to draw suspenders higher up on that side. The other pair I took to a tailor and had him shorten the left leg ¼ of an inch. Please notice this suggestion in making this new pair. Put in two side and two hip pockets. Let the rest be made so that it will bulge as little as possible — I dislike to see a vest cut so low that when a man sits down it opens outward so that you can see clear to his suspenders. Line the left hand vest pocket (lower one) with chamois skin for a watch pocket, and put in a buttonhole for the guard of watch chain to pass through.
> With regard to the coat, the most important of all, for heavens sake make it to fit me or you will see it coming back. I have seen so many miserable fits in dress coats that I am almost afraid to venture on one.
>
> One fault that is common is a fullness at the armholes on the back, you see that on many coats. I stand pretty straight and you will have to be careful not to get in too much cloth across the back. That bulge under the armholes is a fault which I saw in a dress coat you made for Dave Miller of Leadville and in this same coat the tails hung crossed — I think he had that fixed by having a little taken out at the waist seam. The sackcoat you sent me is a good fit. If you do as well in the dress coat, particularly about the neck, I think I shall have no fault to find. Be careful about the pants. You may expect me to be very critical, so do your best . . .

AS A LEADING MINING ENGINEER

FRANK SIZER lived in Helena for 27 years. He married Miss Linda Pyle, and their growing family is reflected in listings in the Helena City Directories until their departure for California in 1909, where Sizer became superintendent of the Balakalala Mine. The family home was at 731 Stuart, and Sizer was variously listed as a partner with James S. Keerl in a civil and mining engineering firm; consulting engineer for Canoll and Martin, mining brokers; manager of the Whitlatch Mining Co., and secretary-general manager of the Spring Hill Mining Co. He spent part of the year 1901 in Butte as chief engineer for the fabled Colusa-Parrott mine.

The family has lived in the San Francisco area since 1914, Frank Sizer practicing as a mining engineer until his death. He was survived, in 1942, by his widow (since deceased); three children who were born in Helena; Randolph, Margaret and Miriam, another daughter and son, Patricia and Milton, as well as a number of grandchildren.

First Anthology of Magazine Material Slated

THE MONTANA BOOK OF COWBOYS, first in a series of projected anthologies based on outstanding material which has appeared during the life of Montana Magazine of History and MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY, is due to appear early in 1964 under the publishing aegis of Hastings House, New York. Long the subject of planning by Director Michael Kennedy and Publisher Walter Frese, the series will eventually include volumes on Indians, Mining, Fur Trade, Freighting, and other key Western topics.

The Book of Cowboys should be a meaty, authentic, entertaining, and broadly inclusive volume. Such well known writers, historians and pioneers as J. Frank Dobie, Wallis Huidekoper, Robert H. Fletcher, Lewis Atherton, Ray H. Mattison, Oscar O. Mueller, L. A. Huffman, Helena Huntington Smith, Rufus A. Coleman, Charles M. Russell, Mark H. Brown and Joe B. Frantz will be among many represented, their writings covering the broadest scope of the Northern Great Plains cattle industry: cowboys, cowtowns, trail drives, stampedes, wolves, rustlers, branding, hard winters, gentleman cowmen from Europe and the East, and possibly even sheep and sheepmen. Some of the articles are scholarly and interpretive; others are humorous, intimate and nostalgic. All are true, authentic and flavorful.

The material will be tied together with a broad introductory essay by Director Kennedy, plus the use of carefully selected, seldom-seen subject vignettes, most of them quotable and pungent briefs written by men "who were there"—trail drivers, cowboys who broke broncs and branded calves, rustled and used running irons, whooped it up in the cowtowns, worked loyally for their bosses, but all of whom took time to record their feelings and the varied details of work on the range, often in the classic vernacular of their breed and time. In the tradition of the magazine, the anthology will be heavily illustrated.

"We at the Society are gratified that Hastings House will publish, in book form, carefully arranged, annotated and in correlated order, more than 20 of the best articles which have ever appeared in the magazine on this general subject," Kennedy said. "It will be a publishing achievement of the first rank, and we agree with Publisher Frese that through the years, Montana has contained material which deserves this favored treatment. We are confident that this distinguished publishing house will produce a series which will find a broad readership throughout the country. We in the West who are more familiar with the livestock industry, for instance, must not forget that those who live elsewhere hunger for the authentic truth about this colorful period. They'll surely find it in this anthology."

Although the exact date of publication is not known at this time, Hastings House has placed the volume on its Spring schedule, and readers of the Newsletter will be informed of its progress. If sufficient advance interest is generated, a limited, specially-bound deluxe presentation may be done.

It Happened in October

IT WAS 60 years ago, on October 22, 1903, that Montana's economy staggered and came to a grinding halt under the complete shutdown of all business enterprises of the Amalgamated Copper Company. It was the climax of the fabled "War of the Copper Kings," when brash F. Augustus Heinze, by virtue of his control of the judiciary in Butte, had succeeded in stalling the mighty company. Like a giant harassed by gnats, Amalgamated was first annoyed, then overwhelmed, with lawsuits involving the complex "Apex Law." Fritz Heinze was winning them with tiresome regularity, at the same time undercutting the company mines and stealing its ore. The giant had finally had enough: it closed its activities in Montana—its Butte mines, lumber interests, smelters, and all related industries. Ten thousand men were laid off the first day, and within a week nearly four-fifths of Montana's wage earners were affected; indeed, no segment of the state's economy escaped. Amalgamated terms were simple: Gov. J. K. Toole must call an extraordinary session of the Legislature and enact a "Fair Trials Bill" under which changes of venue were possible in civil suits being heard by "prejudiced" judges. Although the legislation seemed eminently fair and remains in the statute books today, Gov. Toole was reluctant to call the session in the face of manifest and ruthless pressure wielded by a business complex. But on Nov. 10, 1903, the Governor bowed to increasing public pressure. The session was called, and even before the enactment of the legislation, the industrial giant came to life and Montana went back to work.

Johns Gun Collection Reflects Rich History of the West

ARRIVAL OF another hunting season in Montana brings to mind the days when a man's guns were not just prized objects for a display case and occasional use in the field, but were the means of feeding and protecting his family. Indeed, firearms are the stuff of history, their development and refinements reflecting those in other fields.

One of the major attractions at the Montana Historical Society since 1959 has been the Johns Gun Collection, unquestionably one of the Northwest's most extensive. The late Sam E. Johns of Kalispell collected firearms assiduously during most of his adult life, and along with the collection, he developed a deepening sense of their historical significance.

At his death in March, 1945, the collection became the concern of his son, S. Douglas Johns, who with his mother continued to operate the family hardware firm in Kalispell which housed the firearms and related objects. The elder Johns' will stipulated that the collection be ultimately turned over to the Historical Society for display and safeguarding. This need not have happened, however, during the lifetime of his son. The people of Montana, therefore, are deeply indebted to Doug Johns for fulfilling his father's wish at this early date. Correspondence regarding transfer of the firearms to Helena began in 1953, with the expeditious help of E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra of Butte (now president of the Society's Board of Trustees). When the hardware business was sold in 1959, the more than 700 firearms and corollary items came to the Society, and the gigantic job of sorting and cataloging (a continuing project) began.

The Pioneer Museum on the lower floor of the building was completely redesigned with the gun collection a major consideration. It has been on display ever since, although on a rotating basis, since the objects are too numerous for simultaneous showing.

Visitors to the Society's building now exclaim over the antique firearms (including some French, English, Chinese and Italian flintlocks and blunderbuses of the 1770's), but along with Mr. Johns, most of them gravitate to the firearms closely related to the development of the West. There is a Springfield Model 1873 used in the Custer Battle, and the familiar long Springfield flintlock carried on the Lewis and Clark Expedition is represented by a number of fine examples. Remington, Springfield and Spencer rifles used during the Civil War and carried westward by the hundreds who left the war-ravaged East and South are displayed in separate cases. There is a .50 caliber Springfield used by Joseph Herman, barricaded in the Bitterroot when the Nez Perce made their famous sweep across Montana in 1877.

Of particular interest are several authentic weapons carried by celebrated outlaws of the west: The Weberly .38 double-action revolver knocked from the hand of Cole Younger as he was mounting his horse for a getaway from the famed Younger-James COLE YOUNGER dropped this .38 double-action revolver as he was attempting a getaway from the hold-up of the Northfield, Minn. bank in 1876.

WINCHESTER DISPLAY CASE of cartridges and such items as powder horns, bullet molds and cartridge-making devices may be seen at the left in this picture, along with rifles and small arms. (Chet Dreher photo)

Collector Johns Was Enthusiastic Pioneer of Montana's Flathead

FRANK JAMES owned this .44 six-shooter and unique leg-irons, the authenticity of both backed with a statement signed by the son of the man to whom Frank presented them in 1910.

Brothers holdup of the Northfield, Minn. bank in 1876, and a .44 Colt six-shooter owned by Frank James. The latter, given in 1910 to a Mr. Butler of University City, Mo., along with an unusual pair of leg-irons, is authenticated by a signed statement.

A double-barrel shotgun in the collection is said to be the weapon with which Bob Ford, "the dirty little coward," shot Jesse James in the head. This was in the Spring of 1882, and Jesse was going by the name of Thomas Howard. The infamous Henry Plummer, Virginia City's sheriff-outlaw, is represented by two firearms, a double-barrel shotgun and a pocket Derringer.

There are the weapons, too, of legitimate lawmen of the West: a .44 Winchester and a .44 S. A. Colt (its barrel shortened to two inches), both used by X. Beidler, Montana Vigilante and deputy U. S. Marshal, and a Colt single-action percussion which had been given to Bat Masterson by one of his Dodge City deputies.

Unusual and offbeat firearms include a walking cane with concealed mechanism, a homemade shotgun, and a gas automatic rifle, built in 1910. This .30 caliber gun, with an unusual brass bulge, was said to be rapid firing but easily jammed. Other rarities include the first Sharp's rifle to fire cartridges (paper), which saw service in the Mexican War; a 30-30 Winchester fired by Theodore Roosevelt during his storied big game hunts in the West; a Colt cylinder rifle used by a frontier peace officer in Nevada, and an 1835 Millbury army flintlock converted to percussion.

SAM JOHNS adopted Montana's lovely Flathead area as his home nearly 75 years ago, and along with his hobby of collecting firearms, became increasingly interested in the history of all Montana with emphasis on that of his own area.

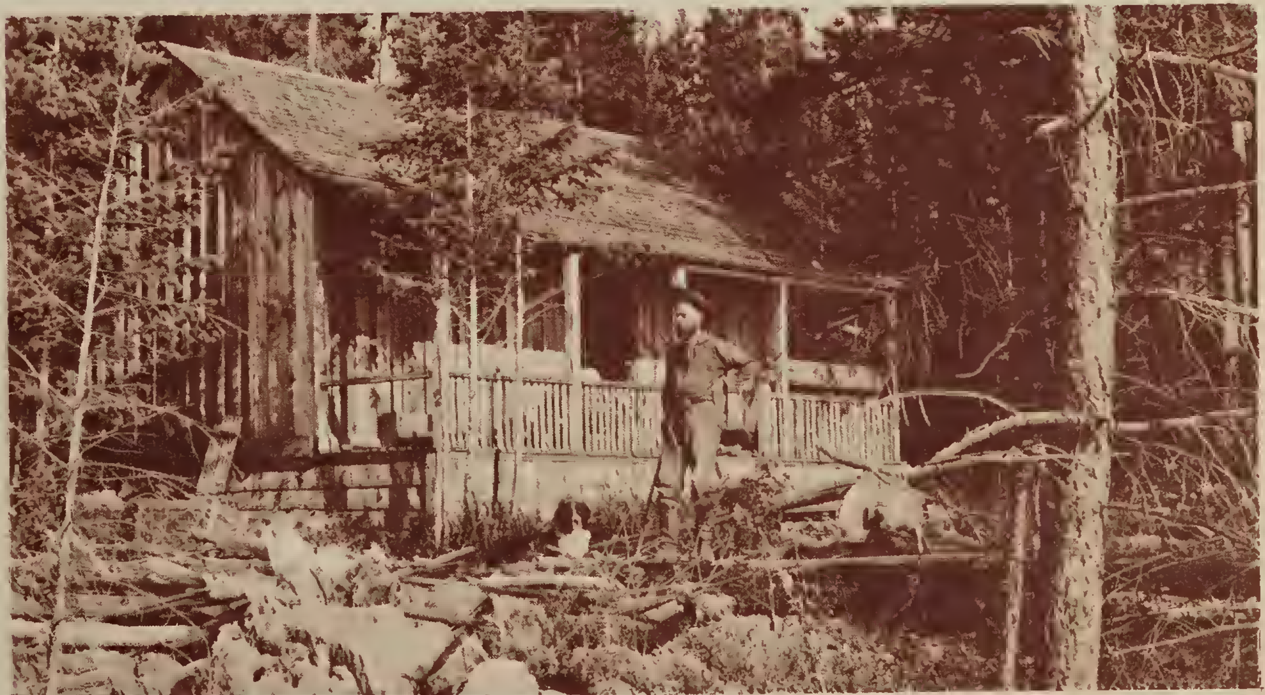
Samuel Enoch Johns was born in Bloxwich, Staffordshire, England, in March, 1866, and came to this country as a young man, settling first at New Richmond, Wis. He worked for a time in a bank in St. Paul, Minn. and after spending a short time in Texas he came to Butte and worked on a rail crew. He was 23 years old when he landed in the Flathead country in 1889.

He filed on a homestead 10 miles south of Somers, on the west shore of Flathead Lake, proving up on his claim in 1901. He cleared enough land to develop one of the finest orchards on the lake, naming it first Grandview Orchards. Now called the Medicine Rock Ranch, the land has been sold except for a few acres retained by the family surrounding the site of the original buildings.

Meanwhile, Johns worked at various jobs in the town of Demersville, including one in a store owned by G. H. Adams. In 1903 he married Mary A. J. Pauline, sister of Flathead County's longtime senator, Robert Pauline. Shortly after the turn of the century, Johns began working for the Flathead Commercial company at Somers. In 1914, when that firm started a store in Kalispell, Johns became its manager. It was in 1931 that he established the Johns Hardware company, turning over its management to his son, S. Douglas Johns.

The elder Mr. Johns spent much of his time in later years studying, writing, and collecting the objects of Montana history, particularly of the Flathead. These were fruitful years. Recently S. Douglas Johns offered for permanent inclusion in the Historical Society library and the libraries of Montana State College and University of Montana microfilm copies of ten volumes of materials gathered by his father. The documents, newspaper clippings, photographs and other material constitute a major contribution to Montana history.

The man who came to love Montana and its history with increasing devotion retired from business life in 1944, and his death occurred a year later. He was 79.



SAM JOHNS (with his dog, Mike, for company) stands at the front of his homestead cabin which he had just completed in 1893. The cabin, still standing on the shores of Flathead Lake, was built from lumber Johns cut at his own sawmill.

Society Procures Remainder of Rare 2-Vol. Owen Journals

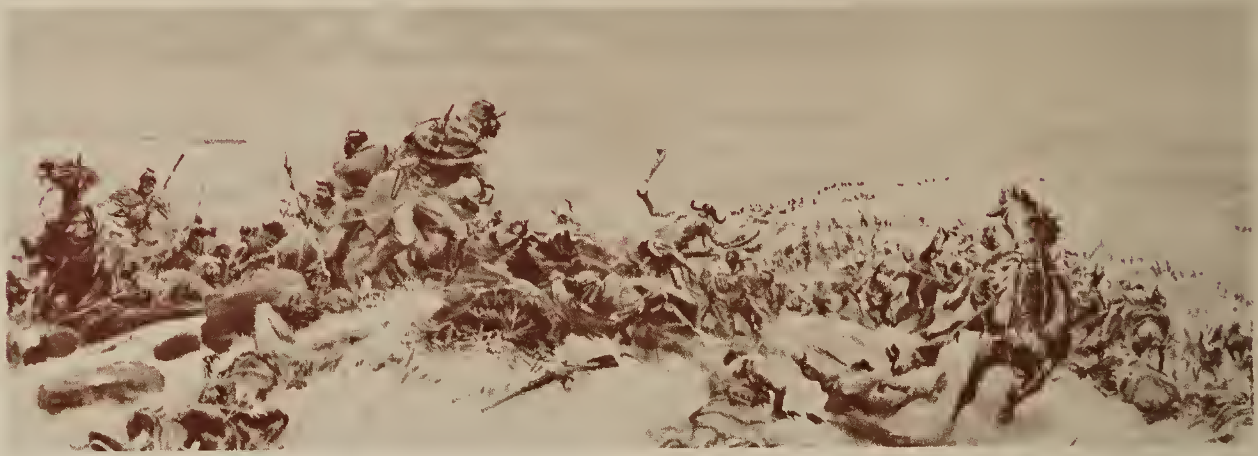
THE LAST few remaining copies of the monumental two-volume edition of the journals and letters of Major John Owen have been procured by the Historical Society from Edward Eberstadt & Son of New York, and these will be sold on a first-come, first-serve basis at $25.00 a set, boxed in a sturdy slip-case.

Anyone who has engaged in researched study of the early Northwest is probably aware that the Owen journals constitute the longest and most minute record kept by any single early Western pioneer. They cover the years 1850 through 1871, and include Owen's purchase of old St. Mary's Mission in the Bitterroot Valley, the building of Fort Owen, the extensive travels of the baronic Major Owen, his relations with the Indians (kindly), his work for the government (invaluable) and daily life at the outpost which was the only civilized spot in the wilderness of Western Montana for two dark decades.

The original manuscripts, preserved in the Historical Society Library, together with the collection of the late William R. Coe, were transcribed and edited by Seymour Dunbar of New York, with the late Dr. Paul C. Phillips, Montana State University historian, providing voluminous and meticulous notes to the Owen texts.

The two-volume set was published as a limited edition of 500 in 1927, and until now has been generally unavailable. Its historical impact is enhanced by the fact of its publication more than 35 years ago, for such men as Father Lawrence Palladino, Duncan McDonald, and W. A. Clark were still living and were consulted in its compilation. The volumes contain two maps and 30 photographic plates, including reproductions of Major Owen's own handwriting.

Montana Artist J. K. Ralston Depicts Wyoming's Historic Fetterman Battle



THE FETTERMAN FIGHT, during which Bvt. Lt. Col. William J. Fetterman and his entire command of 82 men were killed by Sioux and Cheyenne Indians on December 21, 1866, is the subject of this fine oil painting by J. K. (Ken) Ralston of Billings, one of Montana's distinguished artists. It was commissioned by Don C. Foote of Billings, now director of the Bradford Brinton Memorial at Big Horn, Wyoming. It is being used by the Sheridan, Wyo., Chamber of Commerce in promoting development of the Fetterman-Fort Phil Kearney-Wagon Box Fight sites as a State Park.

Like so many episodes in Indian Wars history, this has overtones of orders disobeyed, confusion, underestimation of Indian strength, and "last man" heroism.

Director Foote could hardly have chosen a more able or dedicated artist to depict this dramatic scene, climax of the battle in which Lt. Col. Fetterman is the central figure standing on the exact site of the present-day monument 24 miles south of Sheridan.

Recording of Governor Donald Nutter's Last Address Available From Society

THE HISTORICAL SOCIETY still has a supply of the memorial recording of the late Gov. Donald G. Nutter's last important public utterance, and they may be ordered at $5.00 per copy. The second side of the record, which features music by the Montana State University Jubileers, is devoted to the story of Gov. Nutter's career, from poor beginnings to a law degree, and eventually to Montana's legislative halls and governorship. Gov. Nutter, two of his aides, and the crew of their plane were killed in a tragic crash near Helena on Jan. 25, 1962. The record is an inspiring and living memorial to a courageous Montanan.

Fall Issue of Magazine a Lively Potpourri

AN EDITORIAL MENU of unusual variety and interest has been chosen for the Autumn, 1963, issue of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History, due to reach subscribers the first week in October.

A thoroughly documented study of the martyred Narcissa Whitman, written by Erwin N. Thompson, former National Park historian at the Whitman National Monument near Walla Walla, Wash., presents a portrait of a woman's courage, piety and despair. It takes the reader back to New England, where young, sheltered Miss Prentiss married the Physician-missionary Marcus Whitman and became one of the two first white women to cross the Rocky Mountains. Details of how the Whitmans took in homeless children after the death of their only child, how Dr. Whitman's medical ministrations only fanned the Cayuse Indians' belief that he was bringing disease and disaster to them, up to the brutal massacre of the Whitman household, add up to a dramatic and authentic article, well illustrated with old and modern pictures of the participants and locale.

Mabel Lux, a Shelby grade school teacher, contributes an account of homesteading in Eastern Montana, based on her own childhood memories. Written as a term paper for an extension history course at Montana State College, the material is not just a set of sentimental memories, however, for Mrs. Lux brings to it an insight into the homestead era—its ill-starred promotion by the Great Northern, the boom and bust qualities of life in a tarpaper shack on the open prairie where the vagaries of weather, grasshoppers and falling prices took their toll of the courageous people who tried to "stick it out" on their claims.

The article is widely illustrated with striking and authentic pictures from the Historical Society files.

The controversial "confession" of George Dunning, a mysterious cowboy allegedly a hired gunman in the infamous Johnson County Invasion of 1892, forms the backbone of an article by Helena Huntington Smith, who is preparing a book-length treatment of this many-sided and still-smouldering series of events in Wyoming. The statement by Dunning was published in the Northwestern Livestock Journal by Asa Shinn Mercer, who was promptly arrested for criminal libel and his printing office seized. Mercer's bitter indictment of the big cattlemen of Wyoming, with the "confession" as an appendix, was reprinted in 1954 under title Banditti of the Plains by the University of Oklahoma Press. As a corollary to Mrs. Smith's article, we have included a summation of the career of the remarkable Mercer, founder of the University of Washington and importer of young womanhood to the northwest before his involvement in Wyoming's cattle wars.

The noble Crow chief, Plenty Coups, whose skilled co-operation with the whites assured his people a better future than most Montana Indians, is the subject of an article by Norman B. Wiltsey, who used the great first-person biography by Frank B. Linderman as much of the firm foundation for his appraisal. The article is illustrated by original portrait and scenic drawings by our curator, Robert F. Morgan.

Rounding out the subject matter is a comprehensive (probably the most complete ever written) study of Edgar S. Paxson and his art by Dr. Franz Stenzel of Portland, whose personal collection of Paxson art is one of the largest in existence. Such memorabilia as Paxson's calling cards and studio pictures of him at work are combined with Paxson art to illustrate the piece.

Western history enthusiasts will be treated to the usual generous helping of appraisals of new offerings in the book review section.

Society Welcomes New Board Members

Bd members

FOUR NEW MEMBERS of the Historical Society's Board of Trustees were welcomed at a business and reorganizational meeting Friday, Aug. 23, at which President Newell Gough, Jr. presided. At the same time, Director Mike Kennedy paid tribute to four members who have left the board and who represent many years of valued service to the institution.

New members are O'Neill Jones of Sidney, Mrs. William R. Mackay of Roscoe, W. B. Spear of Kirby, and Branson G. Stephenson of Great Falls. Retiring members are Lena Bissonette of Anaconda, Sumner Gerard of Ennis, William R. Mackay of Roscoe, and Mrs. A. J. White of Helena.

Holdover trustees include, besides President Gough: Casey E. Barthelmess of Miles City, Mrs. Charles A. Bovey of Great Falls, Merrill G. Burlingame of Bozeman, Sam Gilluly of Helena, Judge Ben Harwood of Billings, Howard A. Johnson and E. E. (Boo) MacGilvra, both of Butte, Albert J. Partoll of Missoula, Whitney Smith of Whitefish, and Mrs. Josephine I. Hepner of Helena.

Director Kennedy took special note of the long service of Mrs. Hepner as an officer and member of the board.

DR. AND MRS. FRANZ STENZEL INSPECT HISTORIC ART DISPLAY

DR. AND MRS. FRANZ STENZEL of Portland, Ore. were recently escorted by Director Mike Kennedy through the Gallery of Western Art which housed (during August) 83 pieces of art from the couple's extensive collection. The unique show left this week for a month-long exhibition at Eastern Washington State Historical Society in Spokane.

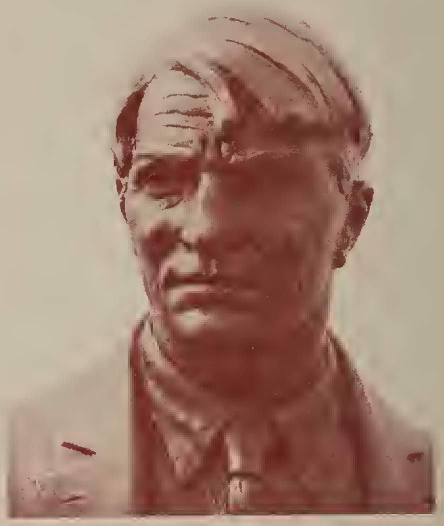
The show, which includes some rare and very early documentary art by such men as Alfred T. Agate, Albert Bierstadt, Ralph Blakelock, E. I. Couse, Maynard Dixon, William Henry Jackson, Lute Pease (whose death at 94 occurred recently), as well as the two giants, C. M. Russell and Frederic Remington, has evinced a great deal of interest in Helena. And the interest is much enhanced by the publication, sponsored by both exhibiting institutions, of a completely illustrated catalog in which Dr. and Mrs. Stenzel provide biographical material on nearly all the 50 artists represented. The catalog will be stocked permanently at the Society, Director Kennedy said, because of its long-range value as a source of information about the artists and their work. This can be procured by mail for $1.50 by writing the Business Office.

Dr. Stenzel, who maintains a full-time practice of internal medicine in Portland, joins with his wife in the collection of art and research into the lives of artists. Patient digging at libraries throughout the country is combined with voluminous correspondence in pinning down little known facts about many of the artists and details concerning their works. Anyone who has had occasion to find out about some of the earlier artists, particularly, will appreciate the patient work which has gone into the Stenzel collection and the published material, Kennedy added.

Two Brilliant Sculpture Pieces By John Weaver Still Available From Society

Lovers of Western art are reminded that the Society still has available two models of consummate beauty, executed by John B. Weaver, who was curator at the Society until he accepted a staff post with the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D. C.

The Vanquished, a dramatic action model of a spirited bronc dumping his rider, is available in magicmetal, a bronze-like, unbreakable material. Cast exclusively by New York's Sculpture House, this 12″ high model is a bargain at $75.00.



Beautifully cast in dark bronze-like Vatican Art Stone is Rangeland Rembrandt, book-end or single desk piece busts of C. M. Russell which Weaver adapted from his incomparable full figure sculpture of the Cowboy Artist, now in National Statuary Hall in Washington, D. C. As single desk pieces, these sell for $22.50 each, in book-end sets at $40.00.

Orders Now Being Taken for Two Rare Western Book Treats

The recollections of Frank Bird Linderman of his unique and warmly human associations with C. M. Russell are the subject of a University of Oklahoma Press offering, due in mid-October at $4.95. Entitled Recollections of Charley Russell, this contains stories of campfires, trails, conversations and fun which the Cowboy Artist and the great delineator of Indian lore shared during their years of friendship. It is edited and prefaced by H. G. Merriam, who edited and published Frontier and Midland, a regional magazine published from 1927 to 1939 in which much of Linderman's writings appeared. Merriam, who was also a close friend of Linderman, was the author of a finely drawn study of him in a recent issue of our magazine. Those who seek fresh material on C. M. Russell can do no better than this intimate volume of reminiscence. The Society, in fact, has an especially warm feeling about the appearance of this book, because we were privileged to take a hand in getting the machinery in motion for its long-overdue publication.

Another new and beautiful book is The West of William H. Ashley, soon to be published by the Old West Publishing Company of Denver. This stunning, large (14 x 9¼ inches) folio size volume is edited by Dale L. Morgan, whose masterful touch was evidenced in Jedediah Smith and the Opening of the West. Dr. Morgan has worked on the papers of Fur Trader Ashley for more than 10 years, and the resulting volume is without doubt one of the handsomest volumes to appear in the field for a long time. The price is commensurate: $35 for the regular edition, $65 for the deluxe.

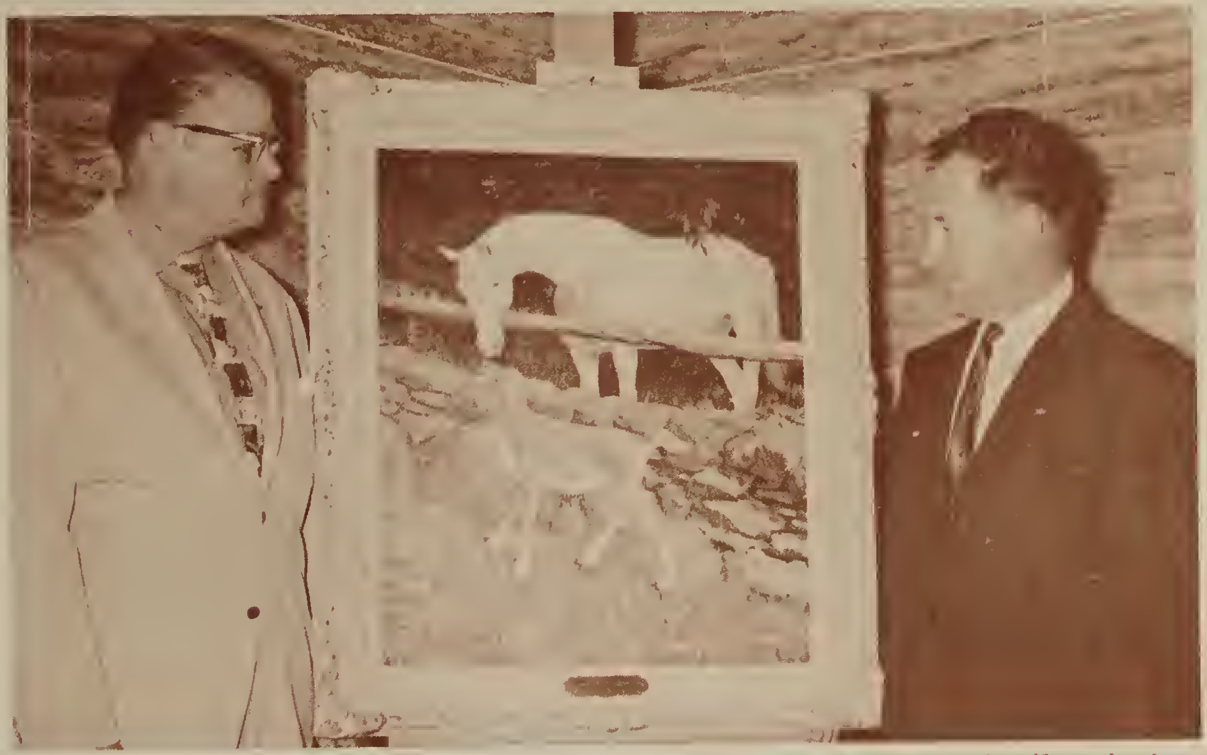
Advance orders for either of these offerings should be addressed to the Business Office, Montana Historical Society.

Permanent Bound Volumes of Magazine with Indexes

Devotees of Western History have found a prime item for their library shelves with the appearance of permanently linen-bound volumes of MONTANA the Magazine of Western History, now available for the volume years 1958 through 1962. All are lettered in gold and contain full color C. M. Russell prints on the front and as endsheets. Each book contains the four issues for each volume year, and beginning with 1961, each will include an index for that year. The price is $9.50 each, and a special price of $42.50 will bring you all five.

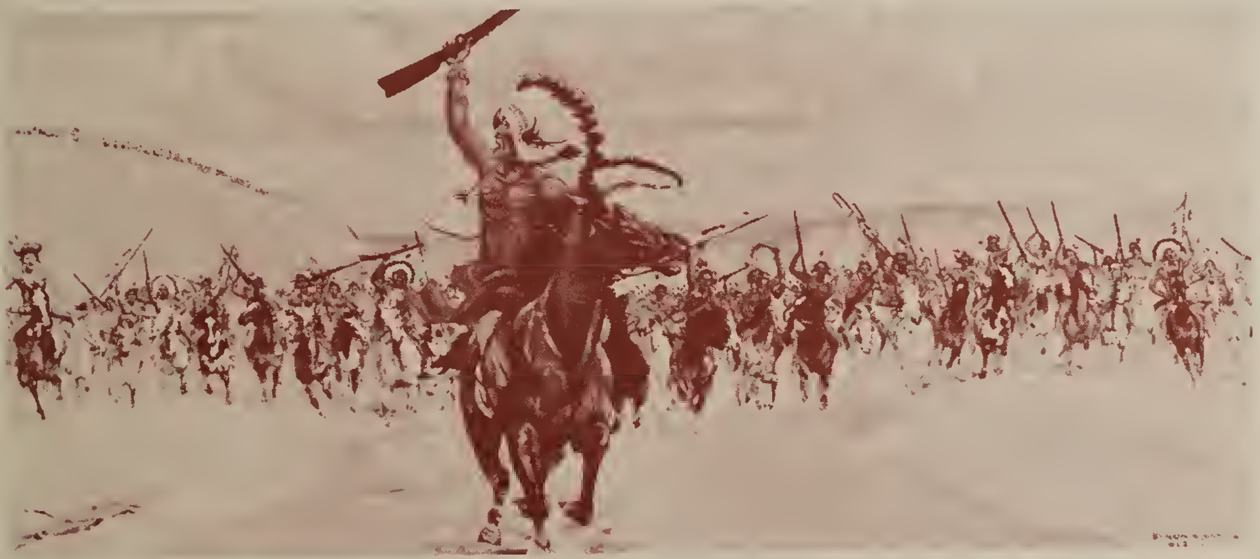
Speaking of indexes, the magazine was indexed for the first 10 years of publication (1951 through 1960) and this is available as a package for $1.50. Single indexes of 1961 and 1962 are selling for 50c each.

Governor Babcock Accepts Original Clymer Painting



Governor Tim Babcock is seen here accepting an original oil painting, The Gentles, by the famed contemporary landscape artist, John Clymer. Doing the presenting is J. E. (Ed) Rafn of Lewistown, chairman of the Montana Liquor Control Board, whose visit earlier this year to the White Horse Cellar Museum in New York inspired donation of the painting by the Browne-Vintners company of that city. Clymer, who is especially well known as a cover artist for The Saturday Evening Post, executed a series of white horse subjects for the firm, and this is considered the most sympathetic and appropriate for Montana. It will become part of the Society's permanent art collection, and joins another Clymer original donated by the Post two years ago.

Society Receives Oil Painting of Roman Nose's Beecher Island Charge



A CAREFULLY researched study in oils of Cheyenne Chief Roman Nose leading the first charge against Colonel George A. Forsythe at Beecher's Island in present-day Eastern Colorado in September, 1868, has been donated to the Society by the artist, Byron B. Wolfe of Leawood, Kansas, who began serious work in oils only recently after a long career in commercial advertising.

The large 36 x 20 framed painting is accompanied by Wolfe's carefully prepared working and research sketch. It lists his sources of information about the charge, the kind of weapons used, the tribes involved, and the exact nature of the terrain. (Roman Nose, who violated his medicine man's plea not to touch food which had been touched by metal, was killed in the first charge. The Beecher Island battle, however, lasted for eight days, the embattled troops finally rescued by a force from Fort Wallace, Kansas).

Wolfe left his employment with a Kansas City advertising firm in 1962 and since has devoted himself fully to painting in oils, encouraged by an order from the American Hereford Association for two white-face Hereford bulls done in this medium. The artist was a visitor at the Society last month, during which he conferred with Director Mike Kennedy and Curator Bob Morgan and showed other works he has completed, including Prime Trophy, a closeup oil of an Indian buffalo kill, and a dramatic depiction of George Custer in mortal hand-to-hand combat with Chief White Bull.

A long-time member of the Kansas City Posse of the Westerners, Wolfe is now translating his interest in western history into increasingly well-done oil painting. As Director Kennedy said in accepting The Charge at Beecher's Island for the Society: "Byron Wolfe is on the right track because he has the humility and good sense to research his subjects as thoroughly as possible before attempting to paint. He is open to help and suggestion, and his talent as a serious painter is unquestioned. We hope he will continue to turn out work like this, and we look forward to exhibiting a full showing of it at some future time, perhaps the centennial year of 1964."

Permanent Collection Of MIA on Display In Lower Museum

THIS CORNER of the ground floor gallery area of the Society is reserved for the fine permanent art collection gathered by the Montana Institute of the Arts and recently rearranged and labeled by the Society staff in association with Mrs. Ray Bjork of Helena.

At the extreme left, on the wall, is the vertical glazed tile panel executed by Mrs. Franklin Blackmer of Missoula and entitled "The Acrobats." Other paintings and artwork on the wall are, left to right, an oil painting, "The Pit," by Aden Arnold of Missoula; a large watercolor by Jim Haughey of Billings; above, a photograph by Bertha Clow of Bozeman; just below it, a wax emulsion watercolor, "Rhubarb," by Branson Stevenson of Great Falls; a large oil painting, "Northern Lights," by James E. Dew of Missoula; at the extreme right, above, photograph by Robert E. Fehlberg of Billings, and extreme right, below, a photograph "Spring Morning," by the late E. E. Bruffey, Havre. The floor case at the left contains two fine examples of hand weaving, the plaid by Mrs. L. O. Brockman, formerly of Havre and now of Whittier, Calif., and a white altar hanging by Hilda L. Cunningham, Simms. In the foreground is a terra cotta relief sculpture by John B. Weaver of Washington, D. C. In the case in the center are a cottonwood sculpture, "Bear in Trap," by John L. Clarke, East Glacier, and a woven piece by Mrs. M. M. Afanasiev, Bozeman.

Your order or inquiry to the Business Office will be acknowledged promptly.

Lewis and Clark Diorama Largest Devoted to Journey

The gigantic Lewis and Clark diorama which dominates the Frontier Museum on the main floor is the largest ever devoted to this significant journey. The scene contains 26 heroic-sized human figures and is 21 feet wide, 10 feet high and nearly 20 feet deep. It depicts the breaking of the last Montana river camp near the Beaver's Head in Southwestern Montana on the morning of August 9, 1805, as the expedition neared the Rocky Mountains. The party could no longer navigate the river and were desperately in need of horses. Captain Lewis and a party of three are shown leaving the main group in search of Sacajawea's Snake tribe, from whom they eventually secured horses.

AUGUST EVENT OF UNIQUE SIGNIFICANCE:

An Art Perspective of Historic Pacific Northwest

"ONE OF THE most comprehensive exhibitions of art ever attempted here, occupying both the Gallery of Western Art and Hall Gallery of the museum during the full month of August, is a tour-de-force which no one interested in either the history or the art of this region can afford to miss," according to Director Michael Kennedy.

"Meticulously culled and blended from the great Stenzel collection, it projects an infinite variety of 75 paintings done by 50 artists over a span of considerably more than a century. It touches on almost every facet of our rich life and history. Although the region is described as the historic Pacific Northwest, the actual geographic area extends from the windswept reaches of the Pacific to the Sioux Indian Reservation at Pine Ridge, S. Dakota; and from the Ute Reservation to the Big Belly River of Canada. Montana, Washington, Oregon, Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, Idaho and the Dakotas are represented. The artists cover the span from Alfred T. Agate, who was a member of the U. S. National Academy in 1831 and a member of one of the first major expeditions to the region after Lewis and Clark—the Wilkes Expedition of 1838—up to painters just recently deceased. To add variety, some of the artists were English, Scottish, Danish and German. The subject matter is infinite," Kennedy says.

The lives and adventures of many of the artists are as fascinating as their portrayals. John Mix Stanley's two paintings are dated 1847 and 1853. "Mountain Charlie" Stobie was a famous frontier Indian Scout and buffalo hunter before he became an illustrator. The Dane, Peter Tofft, was in this wilderness in 1850. Felix O. C. Darley, who painted The Indian Captive in 1844, was already famous much earlier in the 18th century for his illustration of the works of Washington Irving, Fenimore Cooper and Hawthorne. E. T. Coleman of the British Royal Academy had climbed Mt. Blanc in France, long before he teamed up with General Stevens to scale and paint Mt. Rainier. And Ransome Gillette Holdredge, who painted Flathead Squaws in Camp in 1865, narrowly escaped death at the Battle of the Little Big Horn. He was a Scribner's correspondent, assigned to the command of Major Reno in 1876.

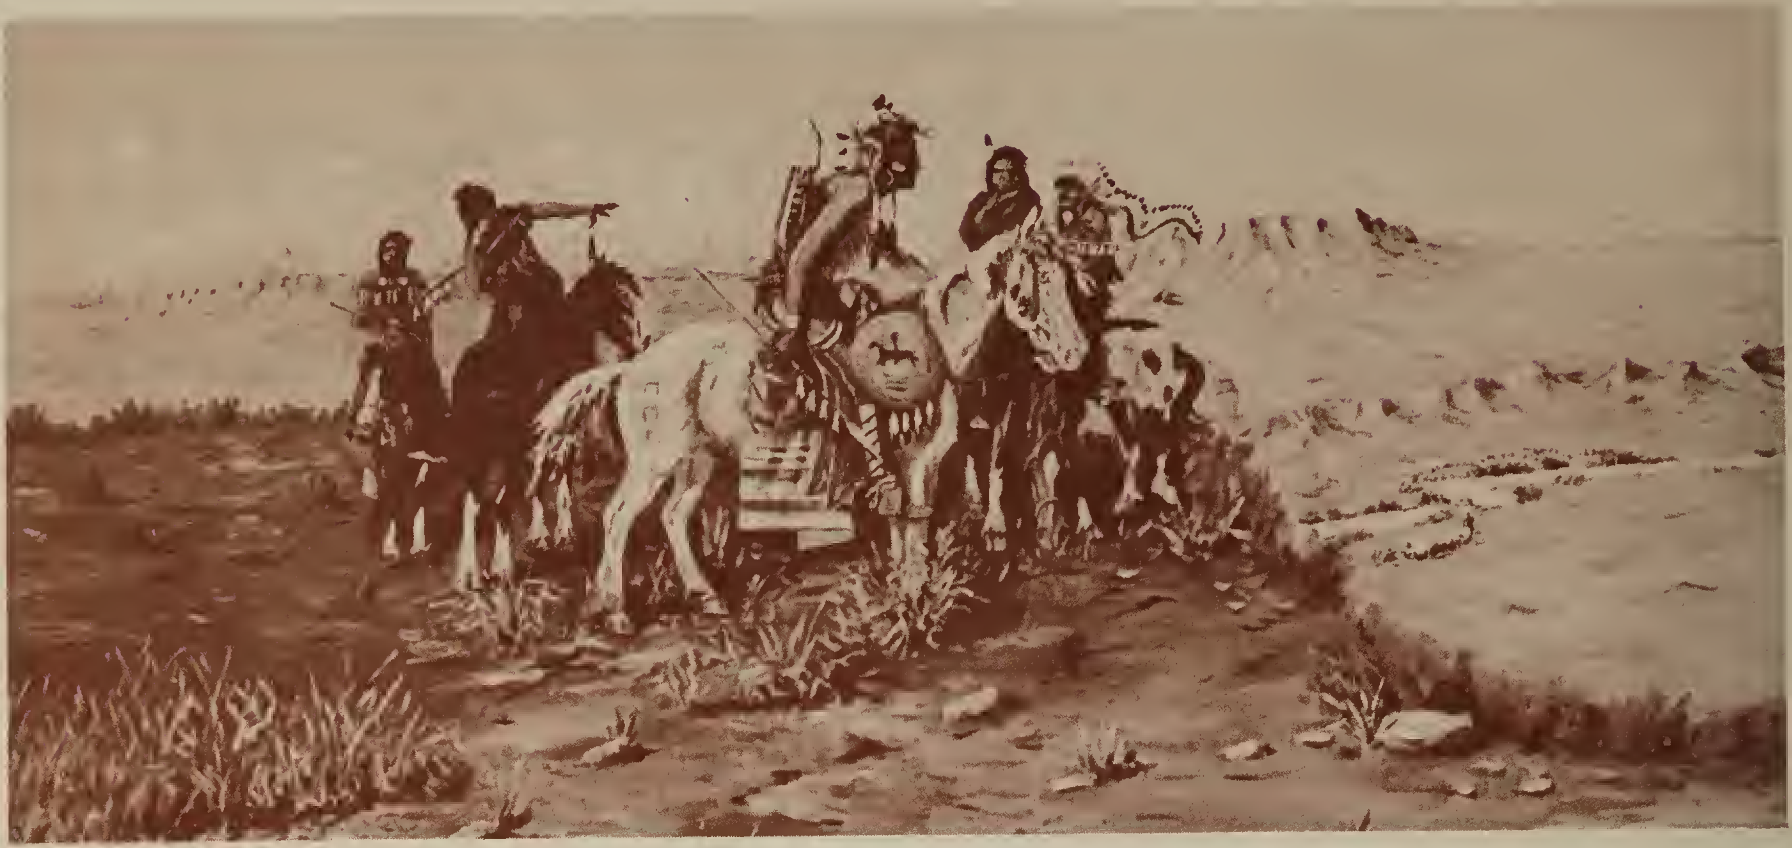
This is a joint venture of Montana and the Eastern Washington State Historical Society of Spokane, where it will exhibit in September. Every painting and detailed biographical material, much of it hitherto unavailable, will be represented in an attractive catalog, priced at $1.50, available with the show.

Artists included are Agate, Beard, Bierstadt, Blakelock, Borg, Bryce, Burbank, Coleman, Couse, Cox, Craig, Darley, Dixon, Hall, Harmer, Hayes, Holdredge, Jackson, Judson, Keith, Kemble, Lungren, Mathews, Martin, McIllwraith, Meyer, Ottinger, Paxson, Pease, Peters, Price, Proctor, Raborg, Remington, Riesenberg, Rockwell, Russell, Schafer, Seltzer, Sharp, Stanley, Stobie, Strong, Stuart, Tofft, Vanderhoff, Warre, Wettland and Wieghorst, as well as some unknown or not identified.

"The exhibition, including the extremely important catalog, stands as a monument to Dr. and Mrs. Franz R. Stenzel of Portland, Oregon. It is a tribute to their love of the region, profound understanding of its heritage, and a prodigious amount of time, research and discriminating judgment which brought about their famed 1,000-piece regional art collection. We are also much indebted to Dick Conn, director of the Eastern Washington Historical Society and the work of his fine staff for making this cooperative venture feasible," Kennedy said.

Now At The Society:

Early Painting Which Changed the Life of Olaf C. Seltzer



An interesting story of how a young Great Falls, Mont. emigrant laborer (who had been dabbling in art on the side) came to Lethbridge, Alberta to work some 66 years ago and was encouraged to execute his first oil painting, is tied up in this depiction entitled "The Scouts." Owned by Fred W. R. Downer of Vancouver, B. C., for whose father it was done, the large canvas has recently been hung at the Montana Historical Society.

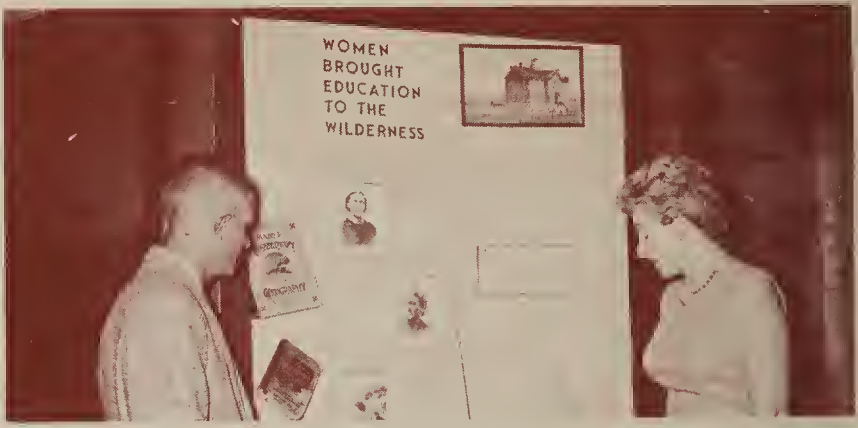
The older Mr. Downer, pioneer Canadian hotel owner, was operating the Lethbridge Hotel when the young Danish-speaking Seltzer turned up one day in 1897 looking for a room. Given space in the attic, Seltzer turned it into a studio, working at his machinist job during the day and doing western drawings on foolscap paper in his spare time. Downer later recalled that when he first saw the drawings, he told Seltzer he was certain they would sell across the hotel bar for 50 cents each. Olaf readily agreed, and the hotel man stated they "sold like hot cakes."

When Seltzer mentioned one day that C. M. Russell was his friend and mentor, Downer wanted to know if he himself had ever worked in oils. Seltzer said he had never tried that medium, whereupon Downer arranged to have an artist's kit sent in from "The States."

The result of Olaf Seltzer's first effort in oils was "The Scouts," the setting of which is in the Sun River country near Great Falls. The artist presented the painting to his friend, and the Downer family has owned it ever since. Years later, Seltzer again visited in Lethbridge, overjoyed at seeing his early work. He remarked: "You, Mr. Downer, made me an artist!"

Director Kennedy states that because of its historical interest for Montana, the owner is willing to part with the painting, provided it becomes a permanent acquisition of the Society. "Here," Kennedy said, "is a prime opportunity for some historically-minded and generous patron to make a significant contribution and insure that this great painting remain for the enjoyment of Montanans and our visitors. We will welcome inquiries."

New Education Display Accepted by AAUW Officers



Mrs. John P. Shannon of Billings, state president of the Montana Division, American Association of University Women, is seen here as she inspects the new education display in the Frontier Museum, sponsored by the group. Seen at the left is Curator Robert F. Morgan, who conducted Mrs. Shannon and other officers of the AAUW on a inspection tour of the Society's building. In the group were Mrs. Clarence Shively of Helena, state treasurer, and Mrs. Franklin G. Taylor of Helena, chairman of the state arts and education committee of the AAUW.

Mrs. Shannon pointed out that the Montana Division has worked on sponsorship of such a display since 1957, the project having its inception at the state convention held in Butte that year. Mrs. Harry Dahlberg of the Mining City was the first chairman, followed by Mrs. F. H. Blackmer of Missoula and Mrs. Henry Hibbard of Helena.

The display, which features women in early education in Montana, is in line with the continuing national aim of the AAUW to promote cultural and educational activities. Fifteen branches of the organization in Montana contributed to the completion of the display, in association with the curatorial staff of the Historical Society.

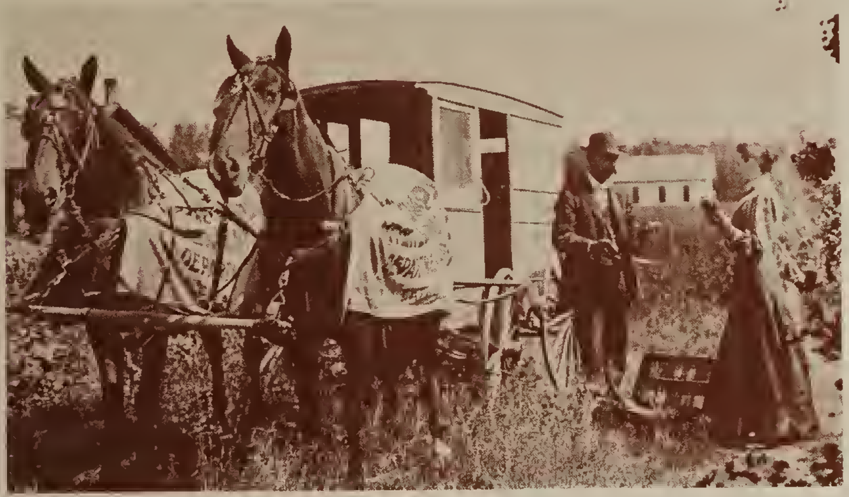
SIGNIFICANT HISTORIC EASTERN MONT. PICTURES JOIN LIBRARY COLLECTION

EASTERN MONTANA, particularly the Hi-Line area, will be represented as never before in the picture archives of the Historical Society, thanks to the cooperation of Al Lucke of Havre, history-conscious merchant who for many years has been acting as an unofficial clearing house for old pictures of the area and its people.

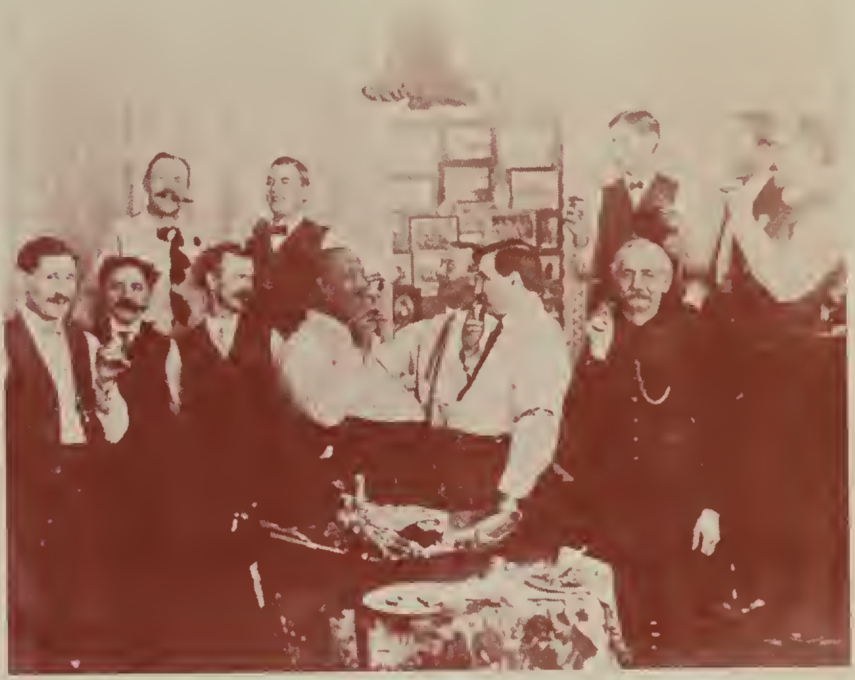
Librarian Mary Dempsey and her assistant, Harriett Meloy, have sifted through hundreds of the pictures, many of which were printed from old glass plates. A representative group is reproduced here.

Lucke, member of a pioneer Havre family, has been associated for many years in the Lou Lucke company. In a recent interview, he stated that he began his picture collection some years ago when the accumulation of old glass plate negatives in the Brainerd studio had to be moved to make room for photo equipment installed by the new owner, Vern Helmbrecht, who still operates the shop in Havre. Hearing of Lucke's interest in old pictures, Helmbrecht offered him the plates, printing copies from them himself. Later Lucke acquired pictures in the former studio of Maurice Wright, now owned by Fred Miller.

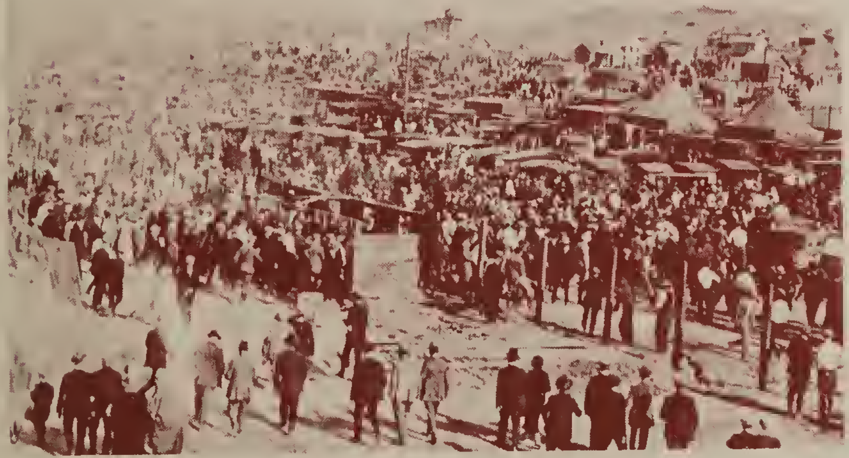
Through the years, individuals have also brought pictures to Lucke for safe-keeping and for the use of historians and other interested persons. "I have long hoped, however," Lucke recently said, "that the most documentary of the pictures, at least, find their way to the Historical Society where their full value will be realized. We will continue to gather the photographic record of this region, attempting at the same time to indentify as many as possible so they will have the greatest significance to future historians."

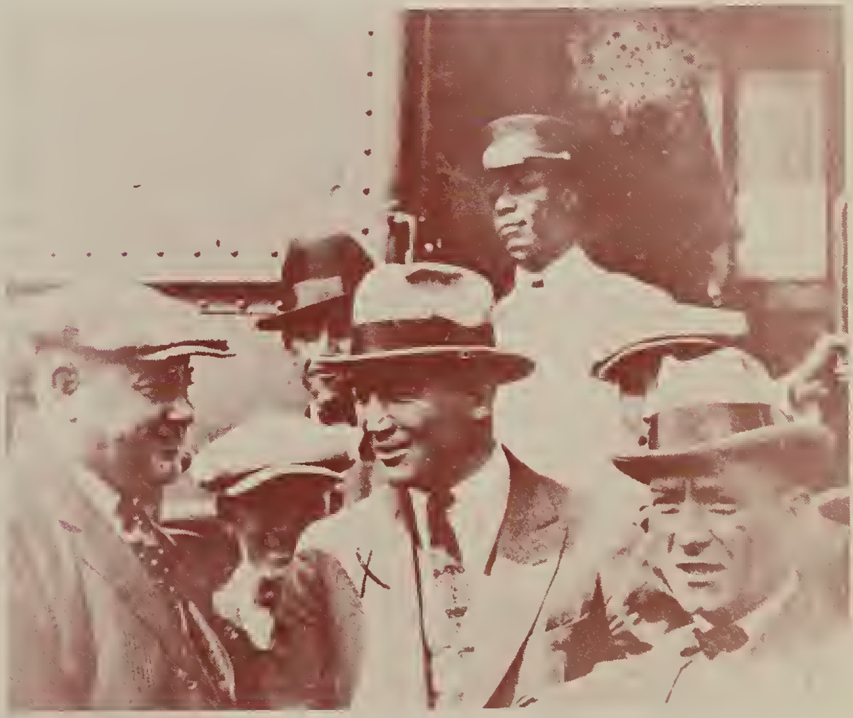


WATKINS PRODUCTS salesman calls on a lady in Havre's north side residential area in about 1913, his sample case of patent medicines and other items on the ground. Reproduced from a glass plate in the Brainerd collection.



HOLIDAY STAG PARTY around the turn of the century was photographed in the home of Jim Yeon, the older man standing in the right foreground. Yeon's son, Pat, is standing in profile at his father's right. Facing the young Yeon is Wellington Osborne, well known Havre restaurateur and gormet cook, who apparently prepared the sumptuous food seen in the foreground.





FAMOUS DEMPSEY-GIBBONS FIGHT in Shelby on July 4, 1923 is remembered as one of Montana's most famous sporting events, but one which did anything but enrich its promoters. In the scene at the left, some of the spectators may be seen making their way to the outdoor arena, built to hold 45,000 cash customers. Due to a set of unfortunate circumstances, no more than 7,000 paid to get in. Tommy Gibbons, who is seen arriving by train in the picture at the right, was badly beaten by The Manassa Mauler and because of the short gate received not a penny for his pains.

A New Dimension: Taped Narrative Sound in Museums, Galleries

A TAPED commentary sound system, which represents a climactic step in making the Montana Historical Society one of the Northwest's outstanding institutions, has been installed in time for one of the heaviest tourist summers in our history. As a corollary to this, attractive satin-finish aluminum railings have been placed in the formal C. M. Russell Room. These provide not only long-needed security for the priceless art in this room, but also act as holders for a series of earphone jacks which may be utilized by visitors, at a nominal fee, in hearing the commentary.

Most major dioramas, displays and paintings will now offer convenient plug plates, which visitors may use to hear commentaries ranging from 30 seconds to 15 minutes explaining each exhibit, the segment of history it portrays, or its significance as a work of art. In addition, the two museums and the larger art galleries in the building will have central sound systems which will be utilized for groups touring the building.

Director Mike Kennedy and his staff have studied the matter of sound installation for some time, recognizing that the added dimension of sound serves the public in a much more meaningful way. Since the Frontier Museum on the main floor was designed to show Montana's history in sequence, the commentaries will now tell the story in much greater depth and dramatic impact, from the natural setting first encountered by the mountain men, through the Indian-fur trade period, cattle and homestead eras, mining, communication and industrial development.

"These are, in a sense, living communication labels to the visual historical and artistic displays which we offer," Director Kennedy recently said. "All electric wiring and installations are completely concealed and in no way detract from the beauty of the building," he added.

The Armstrong Templeman company of Abilene, Kansas, installed the equipment, which has been used with great success by such institutions as the Denver Museum of Natural History, the Eisenhower and Truman museums and many others. If patronage warrants it, additional earphones will be installed, and as the displays change (particularly those in the Pioneer Museum on the lower floor) the commentary tapes can readily be modified.

AVAILABLE IMMEDIATELY: HISTORY OF MONTANA IN TWO CHRONOLOGICAL PARTS

Just off the press and available now on a first-come, first-serve basis is a two-section thumbnail sketch of Montana history which has been especially prepared by Associate Editor Vivian Paladin for those who want, in one handy package, a synthesis of the great events which shaped our heritage.

Beginning with the earliest explorations, the two sections cover, in sequence, the Lewis and Clark explorations, fur trade, early missions, railway surveys, gold strikes, beginnings of Territorial government, cattle and sheep bonanza, and the political upheavals which marked the move toward statehood. Chronological tables are included corresponding with the areas covered in each.

As a package, we offer these for 25 cents a set or five for one dollar. Simply address the Business Office.

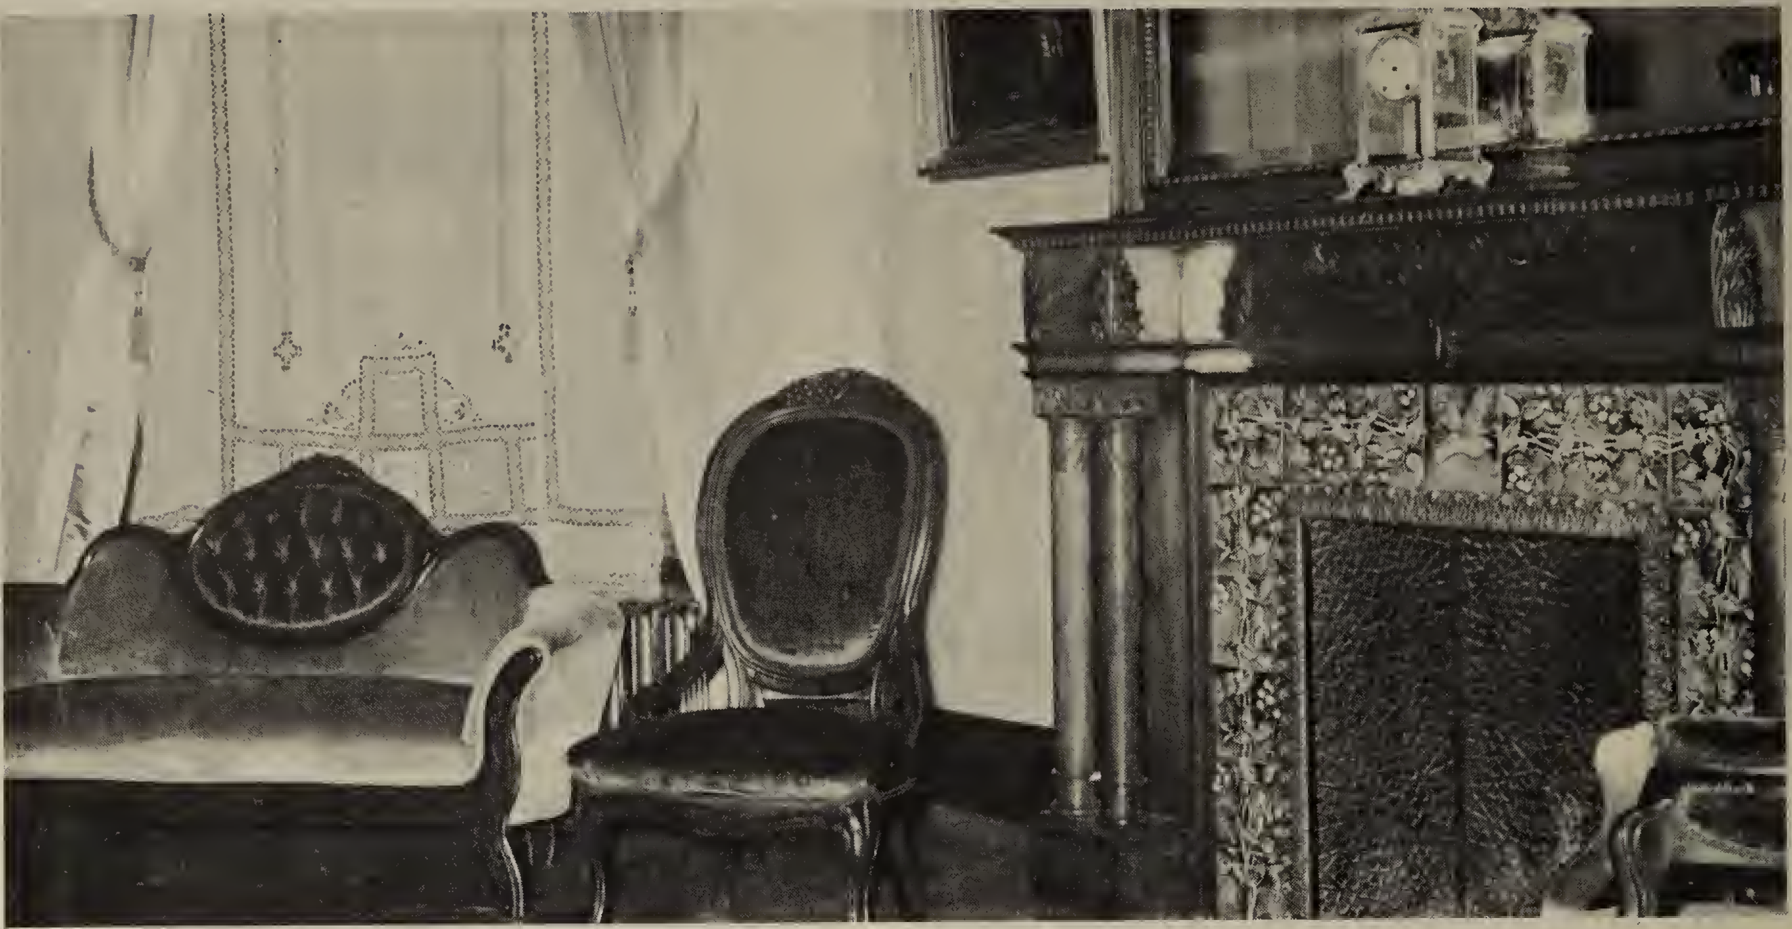
MASSACHUSETTS MAN CREATED DESIGN FOR MONTANA'S GREAT SEAL IN 1864

The bill establishing the Historical Society at the first Territorial Legislative Assembly in Bannack in 1864 was introduced by Francis M. Thompson of Massachusetts, who also submitted the basic design for Montana's Great Seal: a pick, shovel, and the great falls of the Missouri.

OLD GOVERNOR'S MANSION TEEMS WITH LIFE AGAIN



THE historic rooms of the old Governor's Mansion at the corner of Ewing and Sixth Avenue in Helena are alive with activity once more as the Centennial Commission steps up the pace of work leading to the crescendo of Centennial events in 1964. The Commission, headed by Chairman L. W. Upshaw of Great Falls, moved its nerve center to the mansion last month and now occupies offices on the main and second floors. Personnel includes Robert H. Rockhold, state Centennial co-ordinator, and his staff. Rockhold is also representative in Montana of the Rogers company, production company for "The Montana Story," official Centennial pageant to be presented next year in key cities throughout the state.

Meanwhile, as the picture above indicates, the front parlor of the mansion is being restored and is already a prime stop for tourists on Helena's popular Last Chancer tour train. Most of the antique furniture rapidly filling the room has been loaned by Donald Stagg, director of orchestral music in Helena's Junior and Senior high schools. Curtains and draperies seen in the picture are from the mansion of Senator T. C. Power, loaned by his granddaughter, Mrs. Thomas D. Tobin. Mrs. May C. Bartos is another donor of accessory pieces for the room.

Coordinating the work of restoration have been Mrs. Raymond T. Nagle, Robert Morgan and Dick Duffy of the Historical Society, working with Mrs. Ann Hoss of the Centennial Commission staff. Large oil portraits of Joseph K. Toole, Montana's first state governor, and the colorful "Acting One," Thomas Francis Meagher, have been taken from the Society's archives, enhancing the atmosphere of the historic mansion, built in 1885 and the home of Montana's governors from 1914 until completion of the new mansion in 1959.

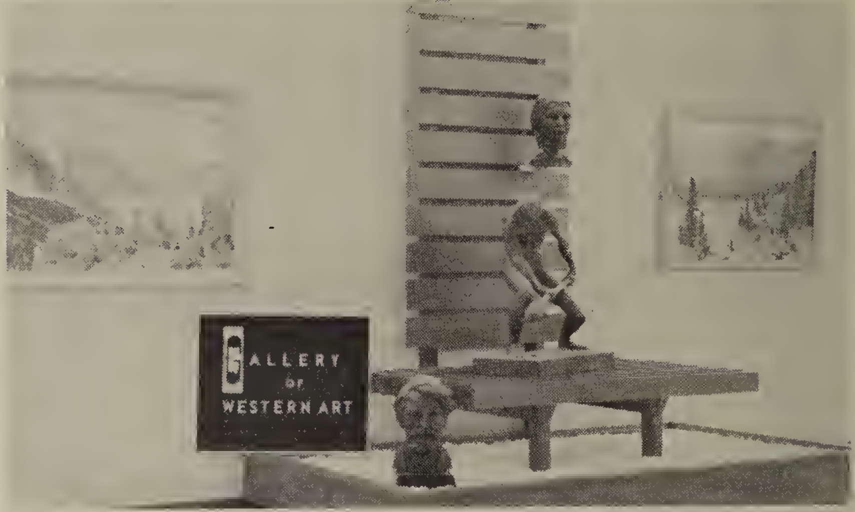
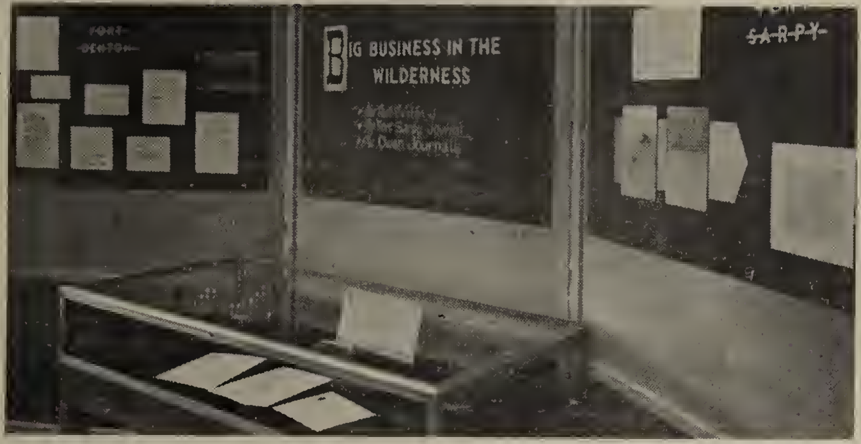
Redesigned Gallery of Western Art Now Showing Paxson Works



More than 100 oils, water colors and drawings by the late Edgar S. Paxson from the collection of Dr. and Mrs. Franz Stenzel of Portland, Ore. now occupy the newly refurbished Gallery of Western Art on the lower floor of the Society's building. A corner of the room, designed by Curator Bob Morgan, is pictured above upon its completion. On the walls are two fine wildlife paintings by the late Carl Rungius, from the Society's permanent art collection. The unique redwood stand, one of two especially designed for the gallery, contains three pieces of sculpture by John B. Weaver, former curator and now on the staff of the Smithsonian Institution.

The Stenzel collection, considered one of the largest single groups of Paxson art in existence, may be seen in the gallery throughout this month. In August, a group of other works from the Stenzel collection, representing the work of many other Northwest artists, will be shown.

Historic Journals Provide Intimate Glimpses Into Daily Life At Montana's Far-Flung Trading Posts in the Dim 1850's



THREE of the many significant manuscripts preserved in our Historical Library have been used to form the effective display pictured here. The three documents, the Fort Benton, Fort Sarpy and Fort Owen Journals, combine to give a warmly human insight into the period intermediate between the waning years of the fur trade and the discovery of gold in the 1860's. Located in the Library reading room on the second floor, the display was created by the Library staff in association with Curator Bob Morgan to give visual impact to these highly prized journals, heretofore most often seen by professional historians delving into Montana's dim past.

It should be added, parenthetically, that the Benton and Sarpy Journals, (edited and annotated by Mrs. Anne McDonnell, retired librarian) appear in Volume X of Contributions to the Historial Society. A few of these are still available at $20 each. The Owen Journals, published in their entirety in two volumes by the Society in 1927, are available in an abridged form in Men and Trade on the Northwest Frontier by George F. Weisel. The Society stocks this book at $5.00.

Although the journals are vastly different in spirit and content, some of the entries dramatically dovetail with each other: the railway survey visits of Governor Isaac I. Stevens are noted in all three, and the fur trading forays of Major John Owen appear in the Fort Benton journals with corroborating entries in Owen's own record.

The Fort Benton Journals, which read much like a ship's log and contain a variety of matter-of-fact as well as exciting and tragic details, were kept by Andrew Dawson, in charge of Fort Benton during the frequent absences of Major Alexander Culbertson. The rebuilding of old Fort Lewis after its stockade and timbers had been rafted to the present site of Fort Benton, is graphically told in Dawson's entries, which frequently mention making "dobbies" or doughboys." Both terms mean the adobe bricks with which Culbertson completed the new fort at a cost of $10,000. The bricks, measuring about 6x4x12 inches, were made of native mud and wild grass.

The journals, kept between September, 1854, and November, 1856, are deeply concerned with weather, the abundance (or lack of) fresh meat, the rising and falling robe trade, the arrival of visitors, and the continual presence of Indians. Some samples:

> July 19, 1855: Beautiful day Hunter started hunting, Indian went out & brot in two deer, if it were not for Indian we would be poorly off having no provisions and the Hunter being too lazy to hunt. . ."
> Mar. 12, 1856: . . . about noon Maj. John Owen, trader Flathead country arrived with several others—Maj. Owens very desirous of obtaining supplies for his trade from this side. . .
> Oct. 28, 1856: A young warrior, frozen, and thrown into the Fort today by his friends to die—He lays in the Indian House in great agony. . ."

The Fort Sarpy Journals, tinged with wry humor, obscenity and bitterness, were kept by the mysterious James H. Chambers. He was a clerk in the employe of the Chouteau Fur company, married to a Gros Ventre squaw named "Bricks," and is believed to have been killed in the late 1860's by Blackfeet. The journals were written from the second Fort Sarpy, built on the south side of the Yellowstone a few miles below the mouth of the Big Horn and abandoned in 1860. The first Fort Sarpy, originally called Fort Alexander, was built in 1850 on the north bank of the Yellowstone, not far below the mouth of the Rosebud. Both forts of this name were known as the most perilous of all the fur trade posts. Indian depredations were continual and deadly, and Chambers' record is replete with bitter references to them and to his disagreement with the management of Robert Meldrum whom Chambers frequently (and unaccountably) called Murrell. Some typical entries:

> Feb. 12, 1855: The Indians that came with Mr. M [eldrum] left loaded down with goods. When is this profuse waste going to end I have never seen any thing to equal it. . .
> Feb. 22, 1855: Birthday of the Father of our country Six [a white man, variously called Big Six, Moakes or Nokes] says that he came very near being born on Washington's Birthday but his Mother was in too great a hurry & I don't blame her for trying to get rid of him as soon as possible. . .

Very different in tone and spirit are the voluminous journals of Major John Owen, who presided in baronial fashion over Fort Owen, near present-day Stevensville, after he acquired the properties of old St. Mary's Mission from the Jesuits in 1850. Fort Owen was the center of many pioneer festivities, and the stopping place of all travelers and immigrants, including Governor Stevens and road builder Capt. John Mullan.

That Major Owen intended to make his settlement the permanent social and economic center of the Bitteroot valley is evidenced by the fact that the grain he planted came from the finest seed obtainable, that he imported agricultural machinery and built the first commercial gristmill in the Northwest. He bred blooded livestock, planted an orchard, and encouraged better roads.

Owen's journals run for two full decades, from 1850 to 1870, and are therefore among the longest and most complete records kept by a Montana pioneer. Even when he recorded the tragic and unfortunate, Owen's gracious and convivial nature shows through his writings, bringing to them a mood very different from that of the mysterious Chambers at Fort Sarpy. Some samples from the Owen journals:

> Mar. 25, 1856: . . . left Mr. Dawson with Some regret for he had given Myself & party the hospitality of fort Benton in an open and liberal Manner he is a Scotchman & one of the partners in the fur trade on the Mo river. . .
> May 3, 1856: The Chiefs [Blackfoot] and myself Exchanged pipes this morning in token of Mutual confidence & friendship I made both of them some small presents with which they seemed gratified I told them I was happy to see them manifest a disposition to cultivate friendly feelings with these Indians [the Flatheads] & bury the Tomahawk for Ever. . .

The good will and foresight of this remarkable man carries the historian into a new era. For Owen, who had given advice and aid to the railway survey parties and the Mullan road builders, now saw the finished route of the telegraph and railway (constructed during his lifetime) lay to the south of Fort Owen and the military road to the north.

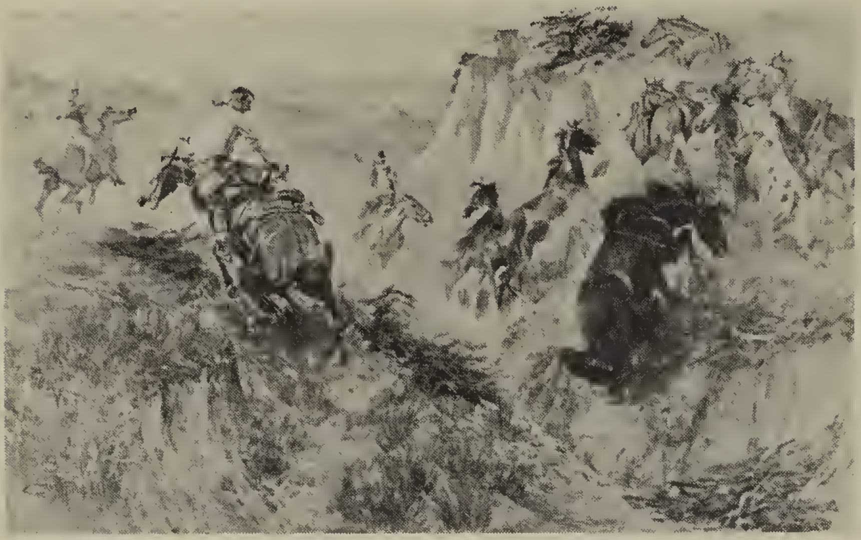
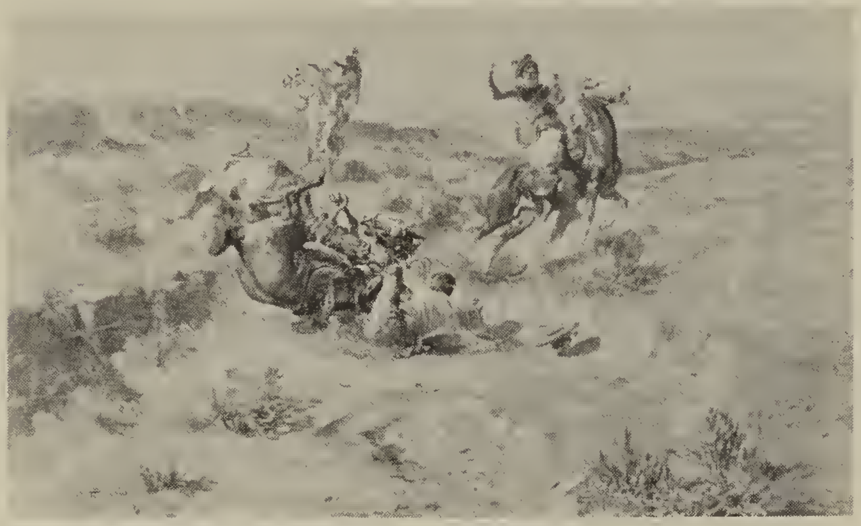
TWO EXCITING RUSSELL SUBJECTS AVAILABLE NOW IN DELUXE REPRODUCTIONS

By special arrangement with the Amon Carter Museum of Western Art, Fort Worth, Texas, two memorable C. M. Russell paintings from their permanent collection are available from the Society in large, matted deluxe reproductions, both at $12.00 each.



"Wild Horse Hunters" — 16½" x 26" — $12.00

WILD HORSE HUNTERS, painted in 1913, won acclaim when it was exhibited at the Dore Galleries in London in 1914. The frantic struggling of the wild horses contrasts sharply with the sure movements of the experienced men and their trained mounts. The reproduction from the 47x30 original is 16½x26 inches, exclusive of the white matting.



"The Broken Rope" — 17" x 26" — $12.00

Never before reproduced, the second exciting Russell is THE BROKEN ROPE, which the Cowboy Artist painted in 1904. Typically Russell, the painting reveals the danger of the moment when the enraged steer lunges toward the grounded cowboy, and yet implies what is yet to come: his rescue by the man in the background who is dismounting or by the man at the right who is ready to shoot the adversary if necessary. The deluxe print of this subject, also matted and ready for framing, is 17x26 inches.

Orders will be filled immediately for these exciting new reproductions. Address the Business Office.

WOMEN IN EARLY MONTANA EDUCATION SUBJECT OF DISPLAY

WOMEN BROUGHT EDUCATION TO THE WILDERNESS GEOGRAPHY

Women Brought Education to the Wilderness is the title of a new display case in the main floor museum, which, besides featuring blown-up photographs of three early women teachers, also displays oldtime textbooks and school supplies (all of which will probably strike a memory cord in many older viewers). Designed by Curator Bob Morgan, the case features pictures and sketches on Lucy Darling, niece of Territorial Governor Sidney Edgerton, who conducted school in the roaring gold camp, Bannack, in the Winters of 1863 and 1864; Sarah Raymond (later Mrs. J. M. Herndon), principal of Montana Territory's first public school which opened in Virginia City March 5, 1866; and Helen P. Clark, daughter of Malcolm Clark and the first superintendent of schools in present-day Lewis and Clark County. There is also a picture of the first class ever graduated from a Montana high school: three young ladies, Annie L. Warfield, Ida Wilson, and Mamie Wheeler.

JUNE, 1963

SOCIETY BRACES FOR BIGGEST TOURIST YEAR EVER

TOURISM has become an increasingly big business for Montana, and with the Territorial Centennial so near, 1963 is expected to be the biggest year of all. Indeed, an unequalled surge of tourists in the Historical Society building in Helena has already begun. On Saturday, June 1, our summer hours of 8:00 A.M. to 8:00 P.M., all seven days of the week, began and will be maintained through Labor Day to accommodate the anticipated record crowds.

Centennial interest is not only inspiring out-of-staters to come and stay longer, but it is attracting more students than usual from schools throughout Montana who happily tour the Museum and Library on days off. Bus-loads of students, in fact, have inspected the building in unusual numbers throughout the winter and spring months. And the Library has received an unprecedented number of inquiries about Montana history (some of the orders are rather tall: "please send me all the information you have about the Custer Battle") from students in and out of school.

Believing that a renewed interest in Montana will be one of the most vital and lasting effects of the Centennial celebration, the Society is trying now to fill one need which we think will show itself more and more as 1964 approaches: a thumbnail sketch of early Montana history. We plan to produce this historical highlight synthesis (prepared by Associate Editor Vivian Paladin) in two sections, the first dealing with the Lewis and Clark Expedition, fur trade, early missions, gold strikes and the beginnings of Territorial government, and the second with key events which took place between 1864 and statehood in 1889. Both will carry chronologies of all major events and will be available as a package this summer as early as we can manage it. In order to get widest distribution, the set will be offered at only 25 cents each, or five for one dollar. We will, of course, announce it the moment they are available.

The Museum itself is planning some unique art shows for the Summer, notably the great collection of E. S. Paxson art, much of which will eventually be acquired by the Society from Dr. Franz Stenzel of Portland. The newly refurbished Gallery of Western Art on the ground floor will be used to good advantage for this and other shows.

It is our hope that as many of you as possible will visit and enjoy our outstanding displays this Summer. Many of the readers of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY have come to know us very well in the field of Western History, but until the advent of our newsletter it has not been possible to introduce ourselves for what we are: a versatile, up-to-date museum-research center engaged in the visual business, too, of telling Montana's colorful, exciting story.

BEAUTIFUL NEW SETTING FOR HISTORIC U.S.S. HELENA SILVER SERVICE

JUST opened for public view in the Pioneer Museum on the ground floor is this display of the 21-piece silver service and trophies which had been aboard the recently retired cruiser, U.S.S. Helena. It will remain at the state museum until the vessel is put back in service or is replaced by another ship named U.S.S. Helena.

Board of Trustees member E. E. MacGilvra, Rear Admiral Ed Reeder, Governor Tim Babcock, and the Montana Navy League chapters were extremely helpful in cutting red tape and making it possible for this magnificent, patriotic collection to be returned to Montana.

Nineteen of the pieces, all of which are heavily engraved with historic Montana scenes, flags, the Great Seal, and appropriate epigrams, are the result of action taken by the 1907 Montana Legislature. A commission, composed of Judge Theodore Brantly, W. H. Haviland and W. W. Cheely, was authorized to spend a $6,000 appropriation. Containing 1600 ounces of pure silver, the service was designed and created to specifications by Reed and Barton, goldsmiths and silversmiths of Taunton, Mass. Needless to say, it is impossible to estimate how much more than $6,000 such a magnificent set of silver would cost at present-day prices.

The service was officially presented to the Navy on July 21, 1908 with the commissioning of the cruiser U.S.S. Montana at Norfolk, Va. This vessel, attached to the Atlantic fleet, escorted convoys to Europe during World War I and in 1919 carried 8,800 doughboys home in six trips. She was decommissioned at Puget Sound on Feb. 2, 1921 and was scrapped in October, 1935 under terms of the London Treaty. Meanwhile, the silver service was destined for a second U.S.S. Montana, but this vessel, when only 27 percent completed, was scrapped in 1923 under the Washington Treaty of Arms Reduction.

It was then that the silver was placed aboard the U.S.S. Helena, a light draft gunboat launched in January, 1896. A large punchbowl presented to this historic vessel (engraved Presented to the USS Gunboat Helena by the citizens of Helena, Montana) is a part of the museum display. The ladle is engraved Last Chance Gulch, Prospected 1864, Helena, Montana.

The original U.S.S. Helena distinguished herself in the Spanish-American War and in the Far East and after serving on the South China Patrol on a reduced commission basis, was stricken from the Navy list on May 27, 1932. The second U.S.S. Helena, the gallant cruiser which escaped destruction at Pearl Harbor and went on to do battle in World War II until her sinking at Kula Gulf in July, 1943, was launched August 27, 1939. The silver service was aboard her until she entered active service in World War II.

The third U.S.S. Helena, recently put in the mothball fleet, was launched April 28, 1945, sponsored by the people of Montana, who raised more than $41 million in the third war loan. Often the fleet flagship, the vessel served with distinction in the Korean War and her crew kept adding to her store of trophies and awards, all of which are now on display with her massive silver service.

Created by Curator Bob Morgan, the display case is handsomely backdropped in blue velvet with a watercolor picture of the last U.S.S. Helena in the background. The basic set, all inscribed USS MONTANA AD 1908, contains large and medium-sized punchbowls with ladles, two bottle holders, four trays, two fruit compotes, coffee urn, two ornate candelabra, two flower baskets, and a humidor. Besides the punchbowl and ladle engraved for the U.S. Helena, silver pieces other than the basic set include a 14-inch silver platter inscribed John W. Bonner, Governor of State of Montana and J. H. Kaiserman, Mayor of City of Helena, 1951.

THE LIBRARY CORNER

The Historical Society Library, housed on the second floor of the Veterans and Pioneers Memorial Building, is one of the Northwest's most complete research centers. Its five stack levels contain bound volumes of most of the newspapers ever published in Montana, beginning with the first issue of the MONTANA POST which first appeared in Virginia City in 1864. Extensive holdings in original journals, manuscripts, pictures and books on Montana and the Intermountain West are preserved. It should be emphasized that as a research library, (none of the materials leave the premises), its facilities are utilized through personal research only. As a service to our readers, however, we call attention this month to the following articles of particular historic interest which have been indexed from regional publications by the Library staff and which have become a part of our vast catalogued collection:

Contemporary accounts of the smallpox epidemic of 1869-70 appearing in The Manitoban are reprinted in the Spring issue of the Alberta Historical Review. The disease transmitted from a Missouri River steamboat to the Indians of Montana quickly spread northward with devastating impact—a grim and tragic story for Montana and western Canada.

Idaho Yesterdays offers in its Spring Centennial number several articles of interest to present and former Montanans: "Territorial Governors of Idaho," "Idaho's Centennial; How Idaho was Created in 1863" (with accompanying maps) and Merrill D. Beal's "Rustlers and Robbers: Idaho Cattle Thieves in Territorial Days."

American Heritage for April includes George Groh, "Doctors of the Frontier;" Gerald Carson, "The Saloon" (with an example of art from Taft's Holdup Saloon in Red Lodge, Montana); and Marshall B. Davidson, "Carl Bodmer's Unspoiled West," together with a sampling in full color of Bodmer watercolors.

The Minnesotan migration to new gold fields in the Northern Rocky Mountains is the subject of two recent articles by Helen M. White in Minnesota History (June 1962 and March 1963). The first issue covers the story of the 1862 Fisk expedition to Montana—"Minnesota, Montana, and Manifest Destiny;" the second piece is about Captain James L. Fisk, the leader.

The Annals of Wyoming (October 1962 issue) includes the following articles of interest: John D. McDermott, "Fort Laramie's Iron Bridge;" Gordon S. Chappell, "The Fortifications of Old Fort Laramie;" Fritiof Fryxell, "Albert Charles Peale, Pioneer Geologist of the Hayden Survey;" A. S. Gillespie, "Saddles," a study in depth of a familiar but little-known object of the West.

Richard Ruetten's appraisal of Montana's New Deal politics in 1938 with Burton Wheeler and Jerry O'Connell in leading roles appears in the January issue of the Pacific Northwest Quarterly, under title "Showdown in Montana, 1938."

A pocket diary of unusual interest kept by John O'Fallon Delany on his trip "Up the Missouri to the Montana Mines in 1862" appears in two parts in the Bulletin of the Missouri Historical Society (October 1962 and January 1963).

LONGING FOR A RUSSELL BRONZE? HERE MAY BE YOUR LAST CHANCE

As a prodigious assist to members who have always longed for an authentic bronze work by C. M. Russell, we are pleased to announce our appointment as selling agents for such great bronze collections as Homer Britzman, W. Alton Jones, Harry Carey, Jr., Dick Flood, and others. Some 70 different subjects—about half of CMR's known sculptures—ranging alphabetically from An Enemy That Warns to XIT BAR Longhorn and including such rare major works as The Bronc Twister, The Cryer and It Ain't No Lady's Job, to such little known gems as Dobie Carey's Goat are available. It's strictly first-come, first-served, since for the most part there's only one of each subject. Oh, yes, the price range: from $400 to $20,000. If you have a favorite you've long been seeking, let us know immediately. All inquiries should be addressed to The Director, Montana Historical Society. Needless to say, many of these will be snapped up immediately, so any delay in placing a firm option will probably prove fatal.

McBARRON'S 'LAST STAND' ACCEPTED FOR MONTANA

Newell Gough, Jr., second from left, president of the Montana Historical Society Board of Trustees, accepts the original painting, Custer's Last Stand on behalf of the Society at ceremonies held May 8, 1963. Offering the painting in the name of American Oil Company is A. G. Martin of Billings (right of painting) who is Montana manager for Standard Oil. At the extreme left in the picture is Director Michael Kennedy, and at the far right is Thomas K. Garry, superintendent of the Custer Battlefield National Monument. The painting, by H. Charles McBarron, is one of a series which the oil company sponsored depicting great events in America's past. They have been seen by millions through a traveling art exhibit and a national magazine campaign sponsored by Standard Oil Division of American Oil.

RARE BOOK BONANZA FOR MEMBERS ONLY

The Historical Society was fortunate in making some recent purchases of four very rare and beautiful Western books and as long as they last, we offer them here to our members. You will no doubt recognize on sight that these are available virtually nowhere else, and they can't last long. Get your copies at once by writing us, attention Book Order Department. Send your check or ask us to bill you.

THE C. M. RUSSELL BOOK by Harold McCracken. This, of course, is the all-time definitive book on the great Cowboy Artist, when assessed either on the completeness of its biographical content or on the beauty and widely representative qualities of its illustration. This has been a sell-out for a long time, and we can offer only a few. $23.50.

CHARLES M. RUSSELL BIOGRAPHY AND BIBLIOGRAPHY. Collector's Edition in Two Volumes. The classic biography by Ramon F. Adams and Homer E. Britzman and Karl Yost's great bibliography of Russell works are here combined in two beautifully bound volumes encased in a sturdy slip case. Both are heavily illustrated, with endsheets in full color. This is an uncommonly good buy at $25.00 for the set.

THE FRONTIER YEARS and BEFORE BARBED WIRE by Mark H. Brown and W. R. Felton. These two volumes, which utilize hundreds of documentary photographs by the great L. A. Huffman, have been out of print for some time. Both are the large 8x11 format with the text liberally sprinkled with fully identified pictures by Huffman, covering a wide range of subject matter from range and homestead scenes to Indian portraits. This is documentary Western history at its best. $25.00 each.

AGED NEZ PERCE READS HIS STORY IN MONTANA

MONTANA
Western History

Sam Tilden, who remembers (as a boy of 10) the tragic retreat of the Nez Perce from their Idaho home across Montana to surrender in Northern Montana in 1877, reads his story in the Winter 1963 issue of MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY. Written by Rowena and Gordon D. Alcorn of Tacoma, the article tells a uniquely personal story of a frightened boy who escaped across the Canadian line when his mother screamed "Grab your packsack and get away to the Redcoats!" Tilden, who is 96 years old and lives at a rest home in Lewiston, Idaho, was the subject of a recent article in the Morning Tribune of that city. The Alcorn story in MONTANA, by the way, was entered verbatim in the Congressional Record of Jan. 28, 1963, by Congressman Walt Horan of Washington.

NORTH AMERICAN ANIMALS IN MINIATURE SCULPTURE

The Society recently arranged exclusive distributorship for our membership and this region of miniature animal sculptures by Hungarian-born Louis Paul Jonas, distinguished taxidermist and sculptor. Although the artist's repertory includes animals common to all countries and climes, the Society will confine itself to North American animals: antelope, badger, bear, beaver, bison, caribou, coyote, deer, elk, fox, goat, lynx and bob cats, moose, mountain lion, musk ox, peccary, raccoon, Alaskan and Rocky Mountain sheep, walrus and wolf. The exciting models, most of which are to one-tenth life scale, may be purchased as single pieces or in stimulating, natural groups. Examples: a female black bear and two cubs at $70.00, or pronghorn antelope in a family group of buck, doe and young at $120.00. Single animal sculptures vary in price from $12.00 for a black bear cub to $75.00 for a bugling or standing bull elk. The delicate, life-like anatomical detail of Jonas' fine sculpture is achieved with a special ceramic clay compounded with latex. The result is a light, practically unbreakable substance called resilient ceramic. The casts, which go through intricate processes of tooling and assembly, are chemically sealed. Each piece is hand painted in oils to make truly distinctive mementoes and art forms for all lovers of American wildlife. Write us for full particulars.

MONTANA POST

VOLUME ONE, Number One MAY, 1963

HARBINGERS OF PROGRESS:

A SHORTER NAME, A BROADER PERMISSIVE LAW

AFTER a number of years of frustration in attempting to streamline our enabling act for more growth and effectiveness, sponsoring Senators Bill Mackay, Sumner Gerard and Charlie Bovey (all of whom are or have been members of our Board of Trustees) succeeded without dissent in passing Senate Bill 52. The recent legislative approval, readily signed by Governor Tim Babcock, gives the Society broad, forward-looking authority to do an even more effective job of promoting and preserving Montana's heritage.

It is of interest that Montana's Historical Society, originally created by the first (1864) Territorial Legislature, will celebrate its Centennial under the aegis of one of the most effective permissive laws among the 50 states. Broadly, these are the key provisions.

- Change to a shorter and more direct name: Montana Historical Society, replacing Historical Society of Montana.
- Continuation of a 15-member Board of Trustees, but clarification of the long-baffling mode of appointment. All shall be appointed by the Governor of Montana on the basis of distinguished merit and interest, and with geographical considerations in mind, to serve staggered terms of from one to five years each.
- The Trustees may expedite business and meet emergency problems through an executive committee of five, working with a Director appointed by the full Board. The Director is fully responsible for administration, subject to policies established by the Board.
- All funds raised by the Society shall be deposited in the State Treasury, but may not be used for any purposes other than the operation and development of the Society.

Our Job as Stated by the 1963 Law

To collect, assemble, preserve and display books, pamphlets, maps, charts, manuscripts, journals, diaries, papers, business records, paintings, drawings, engravings, photographs, statuary, models, relics, and all other materials illustrative of the history of Montana in particular, and generally of the Pacific Northwest, Northern Rocky Mountain and Northern Great Plains regions, and of the United States of America when pertinent. To procure from pioneers, early settlers and others, narratives of the events relative to the early settlement of Montana, the Indian occupancy, Indian and other wars, overland travel and immigration to the territories of the West and all other related documents of Montana's history, development and society. To gather contemporary information, specimens, and all materials which exhibit faithfully the distinctive historical and contemporary characteristics of the area with particular attention to Indian, military and pioneer artifacts and implements. To collect and preserve such natural history objects as fossils, plants, minerals and animals, as well as all other materials which will facilitate historical, scientific, and antiquarian research. To promote the study of Montana history by lectures, publications and all other means. To generally foster and encourage the fine arts and broad cultural activities in Montana. To receive for and on behalf of the state by donation or otherwise, art objects of any kind and description and to exhibit and circulate such objects in Montana and elsewhere; and to microfilm or otherwise preserve all documents in danger of disappearance or injury.

SOCIETY HAS HUGE STAKE IN CENTENNIAL PLANS

WE'RE PULLING FOR MONTANA'S Centennial TRAIN
295

BY THE nature of its facilities and its activities, past and present, the Society continues to be deeply concerned with the forthcoming observance (in 1964) of Montana's Territorial Centennial and the Diamond Jubilee of Statehood. Indeed the staff has been at work for three years, laying the historical research foundation for much of the planning.

Director Mike Kennedy was in on the ground floor of formal organization when that took place in 1961, being a member of the executive board of the Centennial Commission and acting as its secretary. Plans are rapidly coming to fruition by virtue of recent favorable Legislative appropriation for the celebration. The able leadership of L. W. Upshaw of Great Falls has been felt from the earliest beginnings.

Major events for 1964 now envisioned include participation in the Pasadena Rose Tournament Parade on January 1; departure of the Centennial Train from Billings on April 5 for stops at major cities with New York's World Fair as the prime objective on April 22; re-enactment of President Lincoln's proclamation establishing Montana Territory; re-enactment of Custer's Last Stand; Montana Indian pow-wow; Centennial air show; Charles M. Russell living art show, with live reproductions of the artist's most famous paintings; Indian Opera Poia composed by a Montanan, produced in Europe but never in America; logging sports show; square dance festival; and finally, The Montana Story, professionally produced outdoor stage spectacle to be presented in 12 key Montana areas during the Summer.

POINDEXTER ART COLLECTION

One of the most significant abstract expressionist art acquisitions among U. S. galleries in recent years is the 83-piece collection of works by the New York School, presented to the Society by George Poindexter of New York, whose roots lie deep in Montana and the West. Over the years this busy executive, whose pioneer Montana father was once Territorial Judge and Governor of Hawaii, has collected the works of such acknowledged contemporary greats as DeKooning, Pollack, Gorkey, DeNiro, Goodnough, Kerkam, Held, Diebenkorn, and many others. All are represented in the broad collection of this first of all-American schools of painting to achieve international recognition and stature. Most of the paintings are in oil, but there are some pastels, charcoals, and water colors. Because of the great size of the collection (many of the individual pieces are huge) the Society has had to wait for the refurbishing and relighting of its large ground floor gallery to accommodate its initial showing. This we hope will be possible in the near future.

---

It is a happy and unique fact that Montana celebrates not only the 100th anniversary of its Territorial status in 1964, but the 75th anniversary of its statehood as well.

---

The Centennial Train will carry 297 people in 11 sleeper cars, and there will be room for 60 horses and tack aboard three special cars. There will be three exhibit cars, one of which will carry a display of C. M. Russell paintings from the Society's collection.

U.S.S. HELENA SILVER SERVICE RETURNS TO MONTANA

THE 19-piece silver service, trophies and other historic items from the heavy cruiser USS Helena, which recently joined the Navy's mothball fleet, have been returned to Montana and will be preserved at the Historical Society until such time as the cruiser is reactivated or a new vessel of the same name is built. The Society hopes to put the items on display in the museum by late May.

The massive and beautifully engraved silver service has a great history. It was authorized by the 1907 Legislature and placed aboard the first commissioned USS Montana, which carried nearly 9,000 doughboys home from World War I. The vessel was decommissioned in 1921, and the service was then designated for another vessel named Montana which was scrapped under the 1923 arms reduction treaty. Shortly thereafter, the silver and 30 crystal champagne glasses were placed aboard the light cruiser USS Helena, launched in 1938. This vessel, damaged at Pearl Harbor, went on to participate in 13 South Pacific engagements in World War II before it was sunk at Kula Gulf in July, 1943. The silver had been sent ashore before the engagements. Montana raised more than $41 million in the third U. S. War Loan Drive in 1943 to purchase the present USS Helena, and again the silver service found a home, remaining aboard until the recent deactivation.

The unique silver service, featuring a large coffee urn heavily engraved with the Great Seal of Montana, the cruiser Helena, and beautiful scrollwork, and a punch bowl shaped like a Navy vessel should have a particularly warm and personal appeal for museum visitors this summer.

TREASURE TROVE OF CATLIN DRAWINGS

A collection of 52 large original pencil drawings by George Catlin, one of the earliest and best artists to depict the Far West and primitive American Indians, came to the Society late in 1962 and will go on display soon. Uncovered in England last Summer, the drawings are carefully described in the artist's own hand and are based on his epic journey to the Upper Missouri in 1832. The drawings were actually executed by Catlin in 1852 in London under commission of the Duke of Wellington. They include depictions of Blackfeet, Flatheads, Assiniboine, Crow, Mandan, Sioux, Chippewa and Cree, all tribes indigenous or closely related to Montana and the West. Thus the Society joins with the Smithsonian, Gilcrease, Huntington and other galleries in housing the rare original work of this great early Western delineator, the first to visit the Upper Missouri to sketch important scenes, events and aborigines years before the onrush of white settlement. Acquisition of this prime assortment of Americana was made possible by the trustees of The Montana Power Company. It is expected that the collection will have statewide exposure under Montana Power and our joint auspices in the years to come.

COBURN INDIAN COLLECTION

A major recent acquisition of the Society, now on view in the Pioneer Museum on the ground floor, is the Wallace Coburn collection of prime historical Indian artifacts, composed of more than 100 weapons, medicine bundles, war bonnets, and quill and beaded costumes, all with a great deal of history and special significance. This was recently acquired by the Society from the Cowboy Poet's widow, Ann, in accordance with his wishes. The collection is displayed in the large center panel on the west side of the museum. Heir of Robert Coburn, one of Montana's major cattlemen in the 1870's and 80's, Wallace Coburn acquired most of the items as a youth, riding the area north of the Milk River where his father's great herds of Circle C cattle ranged. The objects were collected with care and Coburn's sure knowledge of the Indian and his ways. Years ago, the late Max Fleischmann called this one of the most superb of all collections pertaining to the Northern Great Plains Indians.

C. M. RUSSELL STATIONERY

Through a special arrangement with the Yellowstone Paper Co. of Billings, the Society is featuring two unique types of correspondence paper imprinted with the incomparable art of C. M. Russell. Six different subjects are used on note paper (folded size 4x6) with 12 notes and envelopes enclosed in a neat box. Single sheet stationery (6x8) features Russell's great action self portrait Horse Wrangler. Included are 18 imprinted letterheads, 6 plain sheets, and 18 matching envelopes. These are also attractively boxed. The price for either item: $1.50. A new Christmas card series using Russell art and also produced by the Billings firm is now in production, and we expect to begin taking orders on these about mid-Summer. Personalized touches will be possible if potential customers make advance arrangements.

McBARRON'S LAST STAND ORIGINAL RETURNING TO HISTORICAL SOCIETY

The original painting, Custer's Last Stand, by H. Charles McBarron, will be formally received by the Society on May 8 at a presentation attended by distinguished guests, members of the Board of Trustees and staff of the Society. The painting, one of a series by McBarron which depicts great scenes from America's past, was presented to Governor Babcock in April, 1962, by the American Oil Company and was then placed on loan to the company for a traveling exhibit, recently completed. Along with the rest of the McBarron art series, Custer's Last Stand has been seen by thousands of people, not only in the original art show, but in magazine advertisements and in at least 100,000 sets of reprints distributed by American Oil. It will become part of our ever-expanding permanent collection.

The Society's building was erected without tax money, and its present varied activities are very largely supported by funds raised from the sale of C. M. Russell prints, one of the largest inventories of Western books in this area, and such publishing activities as MONTANA the Magazine of WESTERN HISTORY.

A Centennial Glance at Montana's History

Compiled by VIVIAN A. PALADIN, Assoc. Editor,
MONTANA, THE MAGAZINE OF WESTERN HISTORY

A hundred years is a short time when viewed in the light of man's total experience. Yet for this young state it is an important milestone, and in 1964 it will be marked with much activity, and, it is hoped, with a new consciousness of Montana's uniquely colorful and varied past.

Specifically, two milestones will be noted in 1964: Territorial status which came in 1864, a century ago, and Statehood achieved in 1889, three quarters of a century ago. But a great many significant events took place before and between these epic dates, all of them leaving gigantic footprints across the 147,138 square miles comprising this fourth largest state.

With the restricted space available here, it is impossible to explore in depth much of the history of Montana. For there is a lot of it, new as it is. But with the conjunctive use of chronological highlights, it is hoped that these pages will serve as a thumbnail introduction, at least, to the broadest, most significant or epic events which shaped our heritage.

Lewis and Clark's Epic Journey Opened Way To Montana's Heritage

Interesting as it is to speculate about how much of Montana was seen by the Verendryes, to inspect the lead plate they left on a hill overlooking the Missouri at what is now Pierre, So. Dakota, and to consider the indirect impact of the explorations of such men as La Hontan who was in Minnesota in the late 1690's and wrote of a "Long River" which was probably the Missouri, the significant journey of exploration did not come until 1804, when William Clark and Meriwether Lewis started from St. Louis on their epic adventure.

When the power-mad Napoleon sold the vast lands known as Louisiana in a wierdly clandestine deal with American Minister Robert Livingston late in 1803, the long-held dream of President Thomas Jefferson to explore the region took shape. His eagerness for exploration is easily understood: the United States, for about four cents an acre, had more than doubled its size. And the $15 million which Napoleon realized from the sale went up in smoke in his war with the English.

CO-CAPTAINS WERE DIVERSE PERSONALITIES

Meriwether Lewis, 28-year-old former aide to the President, chose as his co-commander (it was decided there should be two, in case of the death of one) his 32-year-old army comrade, William Clark. The jovial Clark was a happy choice to share command with the more taciturn and moody Lewis. There was never a conflict of personalities or of authority, a fact which most experts agree had much to do with the epic success of the Lewis and Clark Expedition.

The party of 45 men set out from St. Louis on May 14, 1804, navigating the Missouri in a 55-foot keelboat and two pirogues (flat-bottomed mackinaws). They kept their gunpowder in lead canisters, and wisely traveled light, guessing correctly

The only casualty of the expedition came in August with the death of Sgt. Charles Floyd from over-exposure. His position was that they could live off the country. filled by Patrick Gass, who at 35 was the oldest man in the expedition but who was to outlive all his comrades. By the end of October the party reached the villages of the Mandan Indians, where they spent the winter musing that now before them was the totally unexplored and unknown lands which they had come to explore and record.

During the winter, the men parleyed with the Indians and occasionally visited with white traders from the North-West Fur Company which had headquarters on the Assiniboine River to the north. But probably the most important contact which Lewis and Clark made that winter was with Sacajawea, a member of the Shoshone (Snake) tribe who had been captured by the Minnatarees of Dakota near the Three Forks of the Missouri when she was a young girl. Although the explorers actually hired Sacajawea's husband, the French-Canadian Charbonneau, events were to prove him quite worthless but his wife of immeasurable assistance.

EASTERN YOUNG LADIES GIVE NAMES TO MONTANA RIVERS

In April, 1805, the expedition of 31 men and Sacajawea (with her infant son, Pompey, strapped on her back) began the journey into what is now Montana. Two pirogues and six canoes made from hollowed out cottonwood trees carried them, in late April, as far as the confluence of the Missouri and Yellowstone. Early in May they passed through present-day Valley county in eastern Montana, naming the river they explored the Milk because it "possessed a peculiar whiteness, being about the color of a cup of tea with the admixture of a tablespoon of milk."

Proceeding westward, they came upon a river with fresh-water mollusks on the shore. This they named the Musselshell, noting at the same time the increasing presence of mosquitoes and gnats which were to be a major annoyance the rest of the way through Montana. Another river flowing into the Missouri was named the Judith, after Miss Julia Hancock of Virginia, whom Captain Clark later married.

The name of a second young eastern lady, Miss Maria Wood, was given to a large river which Lewis and Clark at first thought was the main Missouri channel. Flowing from the northwest, they finally decided it was a new river, and Lewis named it Marias River after his cousin.

SACAJAWEA RECOGNIZES THREE FORKS COUNTRY

It was on June 14 that the expedition came upon the cascades of the Missouri River, naming the highest the Great Falls. A little over a month later they had poled their way through a steep-walled canyon which they named Gates of the Mountains and came out about 14 miles northeast of Montana's capital city.

The Three Forks of the Missouri now lay ahead, and Sacajawea began recogniz-

Southern Terminus Of Montana Road

Corrine, Utah, some 30 miles west of Ogden, became the southern terminus of the Montana road in 1869, when the Union Pacific and Central Pacific joined to form the transcontinental railroad. Heavy freight wagons carried supplies to and from Montana, the round trip taking as much as two months.

Mountain Men and Dandies In High Beaver Hats Played Major Roles In the Colorful and Romantic Fur Trade Era

No man was more eager for news of the Lewis and Clark Expedition than one Manuel Lisa, a New Orleans resident of Spanish descent who had done some trading with the Osage Indians to the south. He was especially interested in official reports of great quantities of prime beaver in the streams of Montana. He had heard rumors about the fur wealth of this land before; now here was corroboration. Outfitting a party of 42 men, Lisa led them to the confluence of the Yellowstone and Big Horn Rivers and built Montana's first fur trading post. It was 1807, only a year after Lewis and Clark returned to St. Louis. First calling his post Fort Remon (for his son) Lisa rebuilt and enlarged it and variously called it Fort Lisa, Fort Manuel, and Manuel's Fort.

Thus began the fur trade era in Montana: colorful, romantic and exploitive. And while it lasted for more than 70 years, its total impact was strangely transient. It fed upon the vanity of man, for this was the time when furs were the mark of effluence, particularly the high beaver hat favored by gentlemen until the emergence of the silk hat in the mid-1880's.

Basically, the fur trade in Montana was dominated west of the Divide by the great crown-chartered British companies (Hudson's Bay and North-West), whereas the country to the east was worked by firms organized and financed in the United States (John Jacob Astor's American Fur Company and Ashley and Henry's Rocky Mountain Company).

But whether he worked for a big company or trapped on his own and traded individually with the Indians, the main character in the drama was the rugged character known variously as the mountain man, fur trader, free trapper or squaw man. He was the only white man who lived in Montana for many years, and although he came to know the land well, he seldom left a permanent record.

After his first winter in Montana (it was a severe one), Manuel Lisa returned to St. Louis and interested such men as Pierre and Auguste Chouteau, Reuben Lewis (a brother of Meriwether), Benjamin Wilkinson, Sylvester Labadie, William Clark and Andrew Henry in joining the enterprise. An ambitious expedition of nearly 300 men started out in the spring of 1809, but it was ill-fated from the start: eight men died at the hands of the incessantly hostile Blackfeet, and a large cache of furs was destroyed by fire.

Although he again suffered a reverse at the hands of the Blackfeet in the spring of 1810 (George Drouillard of the Lewis and Clark Expedition was among the 20 men killed near Three Forks), Andrew Henry kept up a heady interest in the fur trade. It was in 1822 that he and William H. Ashley formed the Rocky Mountain Fur Company, inaugurated the celebrated brigade system whereby individuals or small groups worked the country swiftly and brought their furs to a pre-arranged rendezvous, and introduced to the fur trade such stalwarts as Jedediah Smith, Mike Fink, Jim Bridger, Thomas Fitzpatrick, William and Milton Sublette, David E. Jackson and Robert Campbell.

John Jacob Astor, the German-born immigrant who was to establish one of America's great fortunes, was also one of the first to see the bonanza proportions of the western fur trade. Shortly after the Lewis and Clark Expedition, he formed the Pacific Fur Company and the American Fur Company, sending out one party to explore the Pacific Coast by sea, the other to go overland for an eventual rendezvous. The overland party crossed the southwest corner of Montana in 1811 during its hardship-ridden journey, while the sea expedition landed at the mouth of the Columbia and established the settlement of Astoria.

So far as Montana is concerned, though, the important aspect of Astor's operations came in 1822 when a separate branch was formed at St. Louis with Pierre Chouteau, Bernard Pratte among the partners and the ambitious Kenneth McKenzie (who had had experience in the Canadian trade) in charge of the company's interests on the Upper Missouri. In 1828 he built a large post near the mouth of the Yellowstone. First called Fort Floyd, this became known as Fort Union, the point of greatest concentration of activity during the fur trade period.

McKenzie accomplished something none of his predecessors had managed: he made peace with the Blackfeet. This led to the establishment of Forts Piegan (at the mouth of the Marias), Chardon (at the mouth of the Judith), McKenzie (later burned by the Blackfeet), Lewis (later moved downstream and re-named Fort Campbell, eventually becoming Fort Benton, the only fur trade post which has retained its identity), Cass (on the Big Horn) and Van Buren (on the Tongue).

It was during this time that the large shadow of Alexander Culbertson fell upon the scene, his skill at handling the Indians a major factor in sustaining the trade on the upper Missouri even after it had waned elsewhere.

Communities in present-day Western Montana still bear the names of men who worked for the big and monopolistic British companies. David Thompson, who explored and quite accurately mapped the Columbia Basin, was the first white man to visit many of the Indians west of the Rocky Mountains. He built Kootenae House near present-day Libby, and Saleesh House near Thompson Falls. The last post in Montana built with British capital was Fort Connah, erected in 1841 just south of Flathead Lake by Angus McDonald.

Although it was slow in coming, the end of the period was in sight below the 49th Parallel by 1860. The large companies gradually withdrew from the Upper Missouri, and only the small traders manning such Eastern Montana posts as Fort Kipp (near Culbertson), Fort Galpin (near Nashua), Fort Peck (south of Glasgow), Fort Musselshell, and Reed's Fort (Lewistown) survived beyond the 1880's.

St. Mary's Mission In the Bitterroot In 1841 Brought Many "Firsts" to Montana

While it is possible that the Flathead Indians of western Montana were more interested in "strong medicine" in 1831 than in cleansing their souls, they sought with unusual tenacity the coming of the Jesuit "Blackrobes" about whom they had heard from a few Catholic Iroquois who had come to live among them in the early 1820s. Thus came religion to the western mountains and along with their religion the missionaries brought Montana's first agriculture, its first medicine, surgery and drug store, as well as its first sawmill, gristmill and domestic animals.

The Flatheads began their quests for priests in 1831, making four treks to St. Louis (1831, 1835, 1837 and 1839) until they were successful in escorting the great Father Jean Pierre DeSmet to the Bitterroot Valley. The waiting tribe and their chief, Big Face, greeted DeSmet and his party with child-like joy and almost immediately the log chapel of St. Mary's Mission at present-day Stevensville was started. It was September, 1841.

For five years, St. Mary's prospered along with the Flatheads, who found hunting good, their troubles with the Blackfeet well in hand, and generally convinced that the "medicine" of the Blackrobes was strong. Father DeSmet had recruited the many-talented Father Anthony Ravalli during a European trip, and this physician-architect-machinist arrived at St. Mary's in 1845. He built a gristmill and sawmill and mixed medicines from native herbs in his log dispensary. But by 1850, the Flatheads had changed their attitude towards the missionaries to the point of open hostility, and the mission was leased to Major John Owen, whose famous trading post, Fort Owen, served as an outpost of civilization in western Montana for eight years.

The Jesuits persevered, however, and in 1854, Fr. Ravalli moved St. Ignatius Mission from its original location in Idaho's Panhandle to Montana's Mission Valley. At this historic spot, a boarding school for Indians was organized, Montana's first printing press installed, and a dictionary of the Kalispel language appeared.

Protestants missionaries, who found a greater early receptivity in the Oregon country, re-appeared in western Montana after the gold discoveries of the 1860s. But for the dim two-decade period of the Forties and Fifties, Jesuit missionary activity and the dwindling fur trade were the only evidences of white penetration.

The Vigilantes

The Vigilantes, still shrouded in mystery, hanged 32 outlaws in the Territory between December, 1863, and its gradual decline sometime in 1870. Many more outlaws were banished or fled. While the names of most of the 45 men who signed the Vigilante Oath are not known, such future Montana stalwarts as W. F. Sanders, Neil Howie, X. Beidler, Nelson Story, James Williams and A. M. Holter played leading roles.

Montana Indians Had To Give Ground to Manifest Destiny

Before the machinery of government or business could operate successfully in Montana Territory, the nagging problem of what to do about its nine major Indian tribes had to be solved. That the problem had to be solved has never been involved in the appraisals and reappraisals which have gone on since the Indian Wars. Nothing could have stopped onrushing Manifest Destiny, a fact recognized by the great Indian chiefs no less than their white counterparts.

Although there was always intertribal warfare and occasional brushes with fur traders, the tribes had the territory pretty much to themselves until the gold strikes triggered increasing white settlement. And this came at the end of the Civil War, when the traditional shrinking of the nation's armed strength was going on. There were not enough soldiers to patrol all the West, and depredations by tribes (rarely in alliance with each other) began to grow and along with them pressures on the Army for white protection.

General Philip Sheridan, commander of the Division of the Missouri which included Montana, realized that with his small command his only hope was to set up outposts of safety, keeping lines of communication open and forcing settlers to use well defined and traditional routes of travel. But with the scattered gold strikes and the growing numbers of usable roads leading westward, settlers did not always keep to defined routes.

Meanwhile, attempts were made to confine the Indians to reservations, which in the face of the disappearing buffalo, official bungling, the inroads of smallpox and alcoholism with its attendant debauchery caused alternate despair and hostility among the tribes. By 1868, Montana Territory was in great danger. There were overt and stupid acts on both sides. In August, 1869, a group of Piegans near Helena killed the respected Malcolm Clarke, married to a Piegan woman and considered a good friend to the tribe. This led to the killing of 173 Indians (nearly a third of them women and children) near Fort Shaw in a bitter January day in 1870 by four companies of cavalry commanded by Major Eugene M. Baker.

Sporadic encounters followed, and in 1874 George Armstrong Custer led a gold-seeking expedition into the Black Hills, bringing in its wake another surge of settlers on which the Sioux and Cheyenne looked with mounting fear and fury. It was in February, 1876, that the War Department took full responsibility for solving the Indian problem, overruling the so-called "peace" policies with which the Interior Department had been grappling.

Forces under Generals George Crook and Alfred Terry took the field and along with soldiers already in Montana at Fort Shaw, Camp Baker and Fort Ellis, planned to squeeze the Sioux in a three-pronged vise. Terry's command (which included George Custer's Seventh Cavalry) left Fort Abraham Lincoln in May, 1876, and later that month was joined by Colonel John Gibbon's combined Montana forces. On the Yellowstone, they found an Indian trail

Montana Boasted Territorial Status By the Spring of 1864, but Still Struggled With Strife and Chaos

The bewildering series of divisions and subdivisions under which this great area, now Montana, had functioned for so long finally ended in the spring of 1864 when a remote Congress passed the enabling act creating Montana Territory. Chief Justice Sidney Edgerton, stung by the taunts of southern sympathizers who threatened to shoot anyone who dared raise the national flag, made a hazardous trip to Washington, gold ingots sewn in the lining of his overcoat and dust and nuggets in his valise. This evidence of territorial wealth was displayed before the startled lawmakers, most of whom had little or no conception of the vast geography upon which they were conferring Territorial status.

MEASURE SIGNED BY LINCOLN

Abraham Lincoln, on May 26, 1864, signed the measure and Edgerton hastened toward Montana, receiving the news, when he reached Salt Lake City on June 22, that he had been named the Territory's first Governor. The President had also named Montana's first judiciary: Chief Justice H. L. Hosmer and Associate Justice L. P. Williston and Lyman E. Munson.

Upon his return to Bannack, Governor Edgerton went to work immediately, calling for a census which revealed there were 20,000 inhabitants in the Territory. He scheduled an election in October to select members of the first Legislature and to choose a delegate to Congress. The latter office was won by Samuel McLean, a Democrat, who opposed the popular and staunchly Republican Wilbur F. Sanders, a nephew of Edgerton. Even the intercession of Edgerton failed to sway enough voters, a commentary on the fact that the Democratic party was the majority party in Montana despite the consistent appointment of Republican officials by Washington, and despite the fact that the Democratic party had been equated with Southern sympathy.

FIRST SESSION IN BANNACK

Using the original county designations made by the Idaho Legislature, Edgerton alloted three of the council members to Madison county; two to Beaverhead, one to Jefferson, and one to Missoula, Deer Lodge and Chouteau combined. The 13 members of the House were apportioned by the same ratio. The Legislature met for 60 historic days in the winter of 1864-65 in a dirt-roofed cabin in Bannack, a wood stove furnishing inadequate heat.

Edgerton had troubles aplenty, not the least of which were monetary. There were federally appropriated funds from which to draw, but none could be spent without the signature of a territorial secretary. Edgerton had been paying initial expenses out of his own pocket, a situation which undoubtedly added to his increasing disillusionment. Two men appointed to the secretarial post by President Lincoln had declined to serve, and at the martyred President's death in April, 1865, it was still unfilled.

THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER

President Andrew Johnson, who had troubles of his own, finally appointed a man to the post of Territorial Secretary for Montana, and possibly no President has ever made a more colorful or dramatic choice. He was Thomas Francis Meagher, who arrived in Bannack in late September, 1865, eager to carve out a new career, preferably one that would rekindle his declining military glory.

A week later, Governor Edgerton left for Ohio to put his children in school. He went on to Washington on Territorial business, never to officially return to the Territory he had tried so hard to govern.

The Montana activities of Thomas Francis Meagher are fraught with so much drama, color and controversy that people still speak and write of this man who spent

"No Name at All"

The name Montana is derived from the Spanish word meaning "mountain". When James M. Ashley of Ohio (who became the third Territorial Governor) introduced the bill creating the territory in February, 1863, Representative Wilson of Massachusetts made this remark: "I move to strike out the name of the territory and insert Idaho. Montana is no name at all".

Copper Kings: Purveyors of Mineral and Political Wealth

Insignificant Gold Strike On Silver Bow Creek Leads to Silver, Then Copper and the Storied "Richest Hill On Earth"

When the gold strikes of the 1860's are discussed, one made along little Silver Bow Creek flowing down from the Continental Divide is usually dealt with in another history book chapter. G. O. Humphrey, William Allison, Dennis Leary and Alexander Scott were prospecting out of Alder Gulch in October, 1864, when they came upon some old diggings. Although it was shallow, there was enough of the yellow metal to justify calling it the Missoula Lode and forming a mining district.

Soon more prospectors came along and Silver Bow City, Rocker, McMinnville and Butte City sprang up. The gold played out, and Silver Bow City and Rocker quickly became ghost towns; indeed, in 1874 there were only about 60 people living in Butte itself. It was then that Congress passed the law requiring a certain amount of work be done on mining claims or the owner faced forfeiture. William Farlin, generally considered the man who saved Butte from oblivion, began taking over abandoned claims, guessing correctly that there was mineral wealth in the hard quartz.

Exploitation of the real wealth in the "richest hill on earth", of course, came with the storied Copper Kings: William A. Clark, Marcus Daly, and F. Augustus Heinze. These men were to figure so strongly in the political upheavals before statehood that this aspect will be dealt with in the final section on that subject. But the arrival of the three in Butte, the evolving of their fantastic fortunes, and a brief note on the kind of men they were seems appropriate here.

The first to come was Clark, in 1872. He had followed the gold seekers to Bannack in 1863, described by one who saw him as "a little, red-headed man with a pack on his back . . . he wore a red shirt, an old army coat with one of the tails burned off by too close a proximity to the fire". He did not yet wear the beard which covered a sharp chin, and his high thin voice was not yet raised in flowery oratory. He was not a likeable man, and kept much to himself. But he quickly saw the route he would take: not gold, but merchandising. By 1867 he had expanded his business to Virginia City and had a contract to haul mail from Missoula to Walla Walla. When he began buying mining property in Butte in 1872, Clark was already a man of wealth. With typical sagacity, he went east to the Columbia School of Mines to study metallurgy. When William Farlin defaulted on a mortgage in 1875, Clark obtained the Dexter Stamp Mill, and he owned a bank in Deer Lodge and a good deal of real estate.

Marcus Daly, an Irish immigrant, arrived in Butte in 1876 after serving his mining apprenticeship in California and Nevada. He had made some powerful mining contacts: George Hearst (father of William Randolph), James Ben Ali Haggin and Lloyd Tevis. Employed by Walker Brothers, Salt Lake City miners and bankers, Daly was sent to Butte to examine the Alice, a silver mine. He stayed to become its manager and one-third owner. In 1880 he sold the Alice and bought the fabled Anaconda, developing it with the help of Haggin, Hearst and Tevis.

Unlike Clark, this uneducated Irishman was intensely likeable, his popularity legendary. But like Clark, with whom he was friendly at first, Daly was intelligent and could be and was utterly purposeful and ruthless. By the turn of the century, he was wealthy, at war with Clark's political aspirations, and dying.

The bitterness between Clark and Daly was not lifelong, as is sometimes thought. It began in 1888, when a confident Clark found himself defeated for territorial delegate by Thomas H. Clark. He guessed, with some justification, that Daly had joined with Sam Hauser and other banking and lumbering interests in defeating him. Clark never forgot this affront, and was to carry on his vindictive feud for over a decade.

The third in the copper triumvirate was F. Augustus Heinze, a brash 20-year-old engineer who came to Butte in 1889 with a $50,000 inheritance. Quickly sensing the possibilities, he went to Germany to study mining and smelting, and returned to work for the Boston and Montana Consolidated company. Here he learned the complicated vein systems underlying Butte so well that he began seriously challenging the big interests in the courts, including Anaconda, which was bought out by Standard Oil in 1899 and controlled by the giant and complex holding company, Amalgamated.

W. A. Clark was an interested observer as young Heinze won court cases with suspicious regularity, the while taking with impunity the underground wealth of Amalgamated. Thus a Clark-Heinze coalition was effected, and by instituting an 8-hour day in the mines, the partners of expediency even challenged the personal popularity of Daly. The Clark-Heinze alliance did not last long after Daly's death in New York in 1900, and shortly thereafter Amalgamated assessed Heinze's nuisance value at around $10 million and bought him out. Heinze went to New York, where he hoped to juggle the New York Stock Exchange to his advantage. His machinations failed and are blamed by some for the panic of 1907. He was relatively impoverished and a completely broken man when he died three years later.

Back in Montana, the War of the Copper Kings was about over: Daly was dead, and Amalgamated began buying up the properties of W. A. Clark, by now much more interested in politics. In 1915, the gigantic Amalgamated holding company was dissolved, Standard Oil was no longer involved, and the old operating name, Anaconda, was back to stay.

Contrary to popular belief, the Indian tribes now considered indigenous to Montana were actually displaced persons, driven westward from their ancient homes in the east by the increasing pressures of white settlement.

leading up the Rosebud, and Custer was ordered to follow it. But he was to stay well in the rear of the Indians so any encounter could be met with the full command. Custer met the Sioux on June 25, 1876, on the Little Big Horn, convinced he could defeat them or any combination of tribes. The fate of Custer and his command has been dealt with too often to go into here.

Colonel Nelson A. Miles began building a cantonment at the mouth of the Tongue in the fall of 1876, and after a band of warriors attacked a pack train headed there, Miles pursued them and south of the Yellowstone turned back the main body. Sitting Bull, however, escaped to Canada with his band and was to be a nagging worry to settlers until his surrender in 1881. Miles continued a vigorous winter campaign, and by January, 1877, the mysterious and recalcitrant Crazy Horse had surrendered and in March more than 2,000 gave up at Camps Sheridan and Robinson.

The year 1877 also saw the celebrated retreat of Chief Joseph and his Nez Perce, driven in the classic pattern from their home in Idaho to seek refuge in Canada. The relentless pursuit of General O. O. Howard and attempts by Col. Gibbon and others to stop him in western Montana were to no avail. But in October, 1877, near present-day Chinook in northern Montana, the exhausted Joseph surrendered his Nez Perce to General Miles. Many believe he had stopped because he was certain he was already in Canada.

The Steamboat Era

Until it came to an end with the advancing railroads in the 1880s, Fort Benton was one of Montana's busiest spots. Headwaters for navigation on the Missouri, this was a veritable beehive of activity after the gold strikes in the 1860s demanded more and more travel and freight via the Missouri. The first steamboat to come close to Benton's docks was the "Chippewa", which arrived in 1859. Until the end of the era, hundreds of shallow-draft steamers arrived and left from its crowded levees, their skilled captains often losing out to the tricky river bottom, and marauding Indians who delighted in picking off the small parties of wood-cutters who strove to feed the boilers. Thirty-one steamers arrived in 1866, 39 in 1867, 35 in 1868, and 24 in 1869. It was in 1867 that $1,250,000 in raw gold was shipped to St. Louis.

The Fisk Expedition

James L. Fisk, who had been a private in the Third Minnesota Regiment, led four expeditions into Montana seeking to explore and map the best wagon routes. In July, 1862 he and a party of 130 left Fargo, crossed the plains to Fort Union, went up the Missouri and Milk Rivers to the site of present-day Havre, thence southwest to Fort Benton. This first and three succeeding Fisk expeditions brought the first significant numbers of settlers to Montana.

Lewis and Clark's Epic—

ing the country from which she had been kidnapped. Amazed at the three mighty rivers which now faced them, the explorers named them the Madison, Gallatin and Jefferson and chose the latter for navigation since it seemed to lead most directly toward the western mountains.

Pushing up the Jefferson, shallow water and lack of game began impeding the party. It was then that Captain Lewis with an advance party (this scene is depicted in the large diorama in the Historical Society Museum) left the headwaters of the Beaverhead, crossing the Continental Divide through Lemhi Pass and finally coming upon a Shoshone encampment. These were the people of Sacajawea. The men made good use of their welcome, spending two weeks repairing equipment and trading for horses. On September 11, the expedition pushed over Lolo Pass and out of Montana.

On the return journey, which began on the Pacific Coast in March, 1806, the explorers reached their previously found "Traveler's Rest" in the Bitterroot. The two captains now decided on separate routes, a decision particularly important to Montana for it meant exploration of broader scope. It was agreed that the men would meet six weeks later at the confluence of the Yellowstone and Missouri.

Lewis, accompanied by nine men, headed northward through the present site of Missoula, up the Blackfoot River, and across the Divide at the headwaters of that stream. Lewis' return exploration of the Marias country occasioned the only encounter the expedition had with hostile Indians. Again reaching the Great Falls, Lewis picked three men to accompany him on a side trip to find the headwaters of the Marias. Failing to find the watershed, Lewis had to give up fearing he would miss the rendezvous. But he had reached as far north as present-day Glacier county on U. S. Highway 2.

Meanwhile, Clark had crossed through Gibbon's Pass to the Big Hole, then down the Beaverhead and Jefferson to the Missouri. A detail was sent to meet Lewis at the mouth of the Marias, while Clark went overland to the Yellowstone. Late in July, Captain Clark found a sandstone rock on the south side of the river, containing pictographs made by Indians. Clark carved his name and the date in the rock and named the place Pompey's Pillar in honor of Sacajawea's son.

It was near the mouth of the Yellowstone on August 12, 1806, that the two halves of the expedition were reunited. John Colter, a member of the party, asked for and got his discharge at the Mandan villages in order to return to Montana and engage in the fur trade. He went on to participate in a hair-raising Indian adventure and to become the first white man to view and describe the thermal wonders of Yellowstone Park.

Skilled Isaac Stevens Charted The Lands and Pacified the Indians of Montana In 1853

Running a close second to the Lewis and Clark Expedition in significance to Montana and its development were the railway surveys of Isaac I. Stevens, which began in the summer of 1853 and which led, not only to detailed exploration of all the territory between the Mississippi and the Pacific Coast, but to the first effective treaties with the western Indians and to the first commercially feasible wagon road.

President Franklin Pierce, in 1853, appointed Isaac Stevens first governor of the new Territory of Washington, including what is now western Montana. The President could hardly have picked a better man, for the duties of the 35-year-old Stevens included superintendency of all the Indian tribes living in the vast area and direction of a northern railway survey.

In March, 1853, the War Department was empowered by Congress to launch four surveys seeking feasible transcontinental railway routes. Stevens, who had graduated from West Point with special training as an engineer, was allotted a penurious $40,000 with which to conduct the northern survey. He was expected to explore, map and illustrate an area 2,000 miles long and 250 miles wide, the terrain including at least 1,000 miles of bald prairies, two towering mountain ranges and the drainages of two mighty rivers. Having resigned from the Army to take his appointment, Stevens was to struggle with lack of funds as well as lack of military authority. He was directly responsible to Secretary of War Jefferson Davis; it was against Davis' Confederacy that Stevens was to die fighting a little more than a decade later.

In his detailed survey journals, Stevens gave full credit to the skilled men who helped him accomplish his task. They included Lt. John Mullan, who in 1862 completed the wagon road from Fort Benton to Walla Walla; John Mix Stanley, the great artist-photographer who illustrated Stevens' journals and left a documentary record of the route which is unsurpassed in early western annals; C. P. Higgins, one of the founders of Missoula who was a wagon-master with the expedition; Alexander Culbertson, American Fur Company agent whose skill in handling the Blackfeet contributed much to Stevens' negotiations with them; Hugh Monroe, former Hudson's Bay employe who was married to a Blackfoot, lived among the Indians longer than any other white man, and was of great value as an interpreter and mediator.

The Stevens expedition was split into two main divisions and two auxiliaries, Stevens himself commanding the eastern segment which assembled at St. Paul and proceeded overland to Fort Union near the mouth of the Yellowstone. Here they were met by a supply group under Lt. A. J. Donelson which steamed up the Missouri from St. Louis. The western division, which assembled at Vancouver Barracks and which was to explore the Cascade passes and the Columbia, was commanded by Capt. George McClellan who was to puzzle and frustrate President Lincoln a decade later when he was in charge of the Army of the Potomac. A second auxiliary party, led by Lt. Rufus Saxton, assembled on the lower Columbia and was ordered to pass over the mountains to Fort Owen in the Bitterroots to establish Cantonment Stevens, supply depot for the entire expedition.

Lack of funds forced Isaac Stevens to change his plans and take a chance on getting deficit funds from a reluctant Congress. Only part of the way he surveyed was ever used as a railway route. But his stalwart lieutenant, John Mullan, returned to complete the Mullan wagon road in 1862, and Stevens himself is given credit for establishing a reservation of 1,200,000 acres in western Montana as the result of his 1855 council with the Flatheads, Pend d'Oreilles, Nez Perce and Blackfeet.

After Bribery and Bizarre Political Maneuvers: Statehood

Relentless Efforts of W. A. Clark to Become Montana's Senator Led To a Constitutional Reform Amendment and Direct Elections

Grover Cleveland performed one of his last Presidential acts on Feb. 22, 1889, when he signed the Omnibus Statehood Bill paving the way to statehood for Montana, Washington and the two Dakotas. There remained the business of calling a new constitutional convention, election of officers on all levels, and ratification of a constitution by the people.

The convention met on July 4, 1889, and in mid-August had a constitution ready for the Oct. 1 election. It was approved overwhelmingly by the voters. Montana statehood was proclaimed on Nov. 8, 1889, with her tireless territorial delegate, Joseph K. Toole as the first state governor.

Helena, which had been named Territorial capital in the midst of much controversy in 1875, still had battles to fight after statehood. The harried constitutional delegates, faced with capital bids from a number of growing towns, put the matter to the voters in 1892. Since no city garnered a clear majority, the matter was set for election again in 1894. It was then that the race was narrowed to Anaconda and Helena, Marcus Daly backing the town which boasted his smelter, and W. A. Clark backing Helena. Helena won by about 2,000 votes in this bizarre affair, which is said to have cost Clark at least a half million dollars and Daly well over two and a half million.

The next hurdle came in 1895, when the legislature appointed a state capital commission charged with selecting a site for the state house. There followed more controversy and more allegations of graft as the capital building began to rise on excavations begun in September, 1896, in an almost deserted area a mile east of fabled Last Chance Gulch. The building was completed, without its east and west wings, on January, 1902, and W. A. Clark was one of the orators at its dedication on a rainy July 4, 1902.

After his defeat at the hands of Thomas H. Carter in 1888 for territorial delegate, Clark had longed ever more passionately for a seat in Washington. In the first State Legislature he tried for a Senate seat, the two political parties emerging completely deadlocked over who to send. The upshot was that Wilbur F. Sanders and T. C. Power were sent by the Republicans, and Clark and Martin Maginnis by the Democrats. The U. S. Senate declared Sanders and Power the legal Senators from the infant state.

But it was the appalling performance of 1899 which shocked the nation. Rumors of bribery became rampant and $30,000 of it actually reached the Senate floor when Senator Fred Whiteside of Flathead county rose and waved the currency, announcing it had been given to him by agents of Clark for his and four other votes.

After days of charges and counter-charges, during which Clark gradually garnered enough votes, the mining magnate was sent to the U. S. Senate. But there followed him there a memorial signed by 27 Montana legislators charging that he had bought his seat. On May 14, 1900, before an investigating committee could report, Clark resigned, rising in the U. S. Senate to pour out his resentment against Daly and the Anaconda Company. "I was never in all my life, except by such characters as are now pursuing me, charged with a dishonorable act," he cried, "and I propose to leave my children a legacy worth more than gold, that of an unblemished name."

Clark's passion to be a Senator, however, was undiminished for even as he spoke the wheels were rolling in Montana. Governor Robert B. Smith was induced to go to San Francisco on business, certain that Lt. Gov. A. E. Spriggs (a Clark man) was in Sioux Falls, S. Dakota, attending a convention. A wire from Clark's son, Charles, sent Spriggs back to Helena in time to reappoint Clark to the seat he had just vacaed.

Governor Smith, horrified at what had happened, declared the re-appointment invalid and named Martin Maginnis as Montana's senator. But the U. S. Senate refused to seat either man, and the office remained vacant until Clark's successful run in 1901. All these activities, almost unbelievable in retrospect, revealed so clearly the weaknesses of legislative selection of senators that they had a direct bearing on approval of the 17th amendment which ended the practice and placed the election of senators in the hands of the voters.

Political scandal a la Clark and Daly has passed from the scene as surely as have most of the old gold diggings and the longhorn cattle from Texas. But the state remains unpredictable politically and her people, engaged in encouragingly diversified enterprises, find a common bond in reflecting on the past as the centennial of Territoryhood and the diamond jubilee of Statehood approach.

Montana Boasted Territorial Status by 1864—

two brief years (his last) in the Territory but who twice became its Acting Governor and who wanted less to govern its motley population than to defend it militarily.

Meagher was an authentic Irish revolutionary hero and a colorful and courageous Civil War brigadier whose passionate thirst for adventure and glory led him to court official Washington ceaselessly for an appointment after his days of battle with his Irish Brigade were over. When he finally wangled an appointment as Montana's Secretary, he must have been disappointed, but he enthusiastically threw himself into the business of the Territory.

Meagher's first action after Edgerton's departure was to call the Legislature into session in Virginia City, which had replaced Bannack as capital. Both this session, and the one following, were to be declared null and void by the national Congress. True to his mercurial nature, Meagher shifted allegiance from the Republicans, whose appointee he was, to the Democrats. Meagher himself now had no Territorial Secretary, and because Edgerton had vetoed an apportionment bill which would have provided for the election of a new legislative body, there was a violation of the original Organic Act (which had expired in any case).

In the fall of 1865, Meagher was induced to call a new legislative election and a constitutional convention as well. The latter no doubt appealed to the Acting Governor because here was a chance for advancement—perhaps even to the United States Senate. Besides making a complete about-face politically, Meagher now changed his mind about the legality of the 1864 assembly, calling it back into session. The infuriated Republicans regarded both the second and third sessions illegal, and their able leader, W. F. Sanders, successfully engineered their voiding in Washington.

Late in the summer of 1866, President Johnson at last appointed a permanent Territorial Governor, another Civil War brigadier, Green Clay Smith of Kentucky. Smith arrived in October and Meagher was again Territorial Secretary, but not for long. Smith felt it advisable to return to Washington at once on Territorial business, so Meagher was again the Acting One. This time he seized on widespread fears of new depredations by the Indians to urge what he had always wanted: a military force to command. He was waiting at Fort Benton for a shipment of arms when he somehow fell from a Missouri steamboat and was drowned. It was July 1, 1867.

When Gov. Smith returned to Montana after Meagher's death, he found the Territory in chaos once again, Meagher's militia still in the field with no hostile Indians to fight and again no Secretary to disburse funds. Smith, whose term in Montana was all too short in view of the level-headed way in which he attacked Territorial problems, at once called for a new legislative session for December, 1867. With the actions of the preceding sessions now void, the Territory had had no effective legislation for three years.

Gov. Smith asked for the orderly recruitment of a militia to avoid the emotion-charged haphazard calling up of men, for the replacing of gold dust with greenbacks, and for the orderly collection of taxes. Still without a secretary and doubtless as disillusioned as Sidney Edgerton had been, Smith left the Territory in 1867 and James Tufts, belatedly named Territorial Secretary, acted as Governor until the spring of 1869 when President Grant appointed James M. Ashley as Governor.

Ashley, an Ohian who had led the bill of territorial creation and is generally credited with naming Montana, was a passionate Republican whose stiff-necked policies in refusing to recognize the Democratic plurality in Montana doomed his administration to chaos and inaction. Stability to any degree did not come until 1870 when President Grant suddenly recalled Ashley and replaced him with the businesslike Benjamin F. Potts.

For the first time, Montana moved toward a stable currency, political tranquillity, and an end to the passions which had divided her.

Open Range Cattle and Sheep, Fattening On Nutritious, Free, Prairie Grasses, Brought Eastern Montana Into the Economic Picture

Although it was gold which usually lured them, some of Montana's most prosperous men found their fortunes in the food which fed those who panned the western gulches. Indeed, agriculture had become important to Montana long before the gold strikes, and long after the last wooden gold-washing cradle had fallen into some gulch, this remained Montana's particular bonanza. It still is.

Charles Larpenteur of the American Fur Company had driven four cows and two bulls up from the Green River rendezvous in 1833, and by the 1840s, there were a number of cattle on the Upper Missouri. The Jesuit missionaries, who also brought seeds, grinding stones and other agricultural equipment, had nearly 50 head of cattle at St. Mary's Mission by 1846. When John Owen took over the mission, he rebuilt the saw and grist mills, fenced some land for crops, and built up the mission herd.

In the 1850s, Captain Richard Grant began feeding worn-out emigrant cattle in the Beaverhead and Ruby Valleys and soon Robert Dempsey and others were doing the same thing as far north as the Deer Lodge Valley. It was in the fall of 1864 that William C. Orr of the firm of Poindexter and Orr, drove a herd of California cattle into the Beaverhead Valley to begin that firm's cattle activities in Montana.

In 1866, Conrad Kohrs, who had been working in and operating butcher shops in Bannack and Virginia City, bought the Grant ranch near Deer Lodge and built its 600-head herd into Montana's largest individual cattle holding.

And it was also in 1866 that Nelson Story drove 600 head of Texas longhorns into Montana, and for the first time the vast acres of lush grasses in eastern and central Montana seriously entered the economic picture. Here were more than 40,000,000 acres, drained by the Yellowstone and Missouri, and their tributaries, and broken only slightly by small mountain ranges. It was some of the best grazing land in the world.

Cattle and the cowboys who drove them over the trails and managed them in the classic roundups on the range are most often thought of in connection with this era, but sheep-raising is a vital part of the picture. The woolies did not come to Montana as early as cattle, but the Jesuits had some at St. Ignatius in 1857 and by 1862 Major Owen was raising sheep at Fort Owen. Conrad Kohr drove a band of 400 to his Deer Lodge range the next year. Indeed, the growth of sheep-raising in Montana was even more spectacular than cattle. In 1870 there were believed to be only about 3,000 in the Territory, but in 1875 this had grown to at least 60,000. And in 1880 the total was a staggering 400,000, with Montana wool clips bringing more than $1 million.

The hard winter of 1886-87, roughly considered the end of the open range period, was not as devastating to sheep as to cattle and this induced some cattlemen to turn to raising woolies although they were inexperienced in this trickier business and many had looked upon it with scorn. The sheep bonanza was at its height in the Gay Nineties, and by 1900 there were 6 million sheep in Montana, more than in any other state. The day of the big sheepman continued until the homestead period began in earnest in 1910, when smaller operators came with their fences and plows.

The story of the homesteader or "honyocker" began with the penetration of the transcontinental railroads, notably the Great Northern which brought most of them to eastern and central Montana. The lure of virtually free land led to the settlement of some 93 million acres and the creation of more than half of Montana's 56 counties.

Crude Oil To Grease An Immigrant Wagon Becomes A Vital Industry

Near the Big Horn River in southern Montana in the summer of 1864, an immigrant wagon train stopped to fix the metal tire of a wagon wheel which had loosened in the dry heat. While searching for water, men of the train found crude oil in a small pool hidden in a grove of trees. They took some of the oily substance back to the wagons and used it to lubricate the axles. This is said to be the first discovery and use of Montana crude oil.

Natural gas, often a corollary of oil, was found in present Teton county when two cowboys, stopping to make coffee, accidentally lighted a gas seepage. Granville Stuart, credited with Montana's first gold discovery, found crude oil in Petroleum and Musselshell counties and made note of it. But the day of the gasoline engine and the importance of petroleum had not yet come.

Just before the turn of the century, oil seepages were found near Red Lodge, in connection with coal deposits. Similar discoveries were made in 1892 in Flathead county and these even caused a minor stampede of prospectors. But the first important oil discovery was in the Cat Creek area in Petroleum county, these shallow wells producing high grade crude at the initial rate of more than 3,000 barrels a day.

When the Great Northern Railway, bringing homesteaders into Montana, converted many of its locomotives from coal to crude oil burners, the oil industry in the state for the first time achieved some importance. Geologist Gordon Campbell, considered by many to be the "father of Montana's oil industry", became active in Montana and drilled a successful wildcat well near Kevin, north of Shelby. The Kevin-Sunburst field is one of Montana's largest and most important, its fields extending to the Canadian border.

The methane gas produced in the Cut Bank field and many others, including the new and massive Williston Basin, is pipelined through Montana, Idaho and into Washington and is now a major industry.

The Golden Era: Color In Pans, Beginning of Government

Diverse and Remote Jurisdictions Marked Pre-Territorial Days

Pre-Territorial days in Montana constitute an amazing political story, reflecting the emergence of the nation as a whole during the period of westward expansion. All Montana east of the Divide was a part of the Louisiana Territory, early setting the pattern of divisiveness between eastern and western Montana which persists to some extent to this day. Until 1805 the whole plains region was in the loose grasp of Indian Territory. Then the District of Louisiana became Louisiana Territory and remained so until a small part of the vast area became the State of Louisiana in 1812. It was then that the whole northern portion of the Purchase became known as Missouri Territory. When Missouri became a state in 1821, the great northwest was designated on maps as "Indian Country", which in fact it was. It was not until increasing westward movement of white men compelled the need for government that Nebraska Territory was created, giving it supervision over the northern plains. Dakota Territory, which included present eastern Montana, was formed in 1861 at a time when western Montana had an entirely different government and apparent destiny.

There was no political organization in the mountainous west until 1848, when it was included in the Clackamas District of the Oregon Country. Two years later the District of Vancouver was formed to include this region, and in 1849 it came under control of Clark County. When Washington Territory was formed in 1853, the northwestern region of present Montana became part of Walla Walla County. With the emergence of Spokane County in 1858, present western Montana had a new jurisdiction, and John Owen of the Bitterroot Valley became a county commissioner. Missoula County was created in Washington Territory on December 14, 1860.

Idaho Territory, comprising all of present-day Idaho, Montana and Wyoming, was carved from Washington Territory on March 3, 1863. Capital of the new territory was curiously fixed at Lewiston, on the extreme western boundary, and thus some thousand tortuous miles from Fort Laramie in the southeast corner of the 325,373 square mile area. To govern this great western land mass, President Abraham Lincoln appointed William H. Wallace, a former delegate to Congress from Washington Territory. Sidney Edgerton of Ohio, former representative in Congress and a stalwart Unionist Republican, was appointed chief justice of the Territory, and two westerners, A. C. Smith and Samuel C. Parks, became associate justices.

Governor Wallace forthwith divided the area into three judicial districts, assigning Chief Justice Edgerton, for some obscure reason, to the most unlikely district, the appallingly lawless gold camps which had sprung up in the western gulches of present western Montana.

It was an understandably disillusioned Edgerton who in September, 1863, brought his family to Bannack. Edgerton did not even attempt to hold open court that winter but was an interested observer and willing counselor to the miners' courts which administered what justice there was in an atmosphere of political and legal chaos.

The Governor and other responsible men clearly saw that Montana must have separate Territorial status.

Three Major Gold Strikes In Western Montana Gulches Brought Hordes of Riffraff But Also Solid Citizens and Some Law and Order

Since it is natural to conjecture about "firsts", the man who first found gold in Montana has been the subject of much investigation and writing. John Owen made a brief statement "Gold hunting, Found some" in his diary in 1852 when he was living at Fort Owen in the Bitterroot. But no further mention of gold is found in his writings. Four years later, at Fort Benton, John Silverthorne paid Alexander Culbertson for supplies with some gold dust, said to be worth more than $1,525. But where it came from was never determined.

More solid facts are known about the breed Francois Finlay, better known as Benetsee, who had done some prospecting in California. In 1850 he brought a small amount of dust to Fort Connah, the Hudson's Bay post south of Flathead Lake. He told Factor Duncan McDonald that he had found it at Gold Creek, near present-day Garrison. McDonald wrote his company about it, but officials advised him to keep quiet, claiming gold rumors would be disruptive to the fur trade.

Whatever tenuous credit which might go to these men, the solid discovery of gold in Montana was made by James and Granville Stuart, although it was not of bonanza proportions. Along with Reese Anderson, the Stuarts had been in California and were down on their luck. In 1857 they crossed into old Idaho Territory via Red Rock Divide and spent the winter in the Beaverhead Valley. Here they met a few white men living with their Indian families and raising cattle, among them Richard Grant, a former Hudson's Bay trader.

In the spring of 1858, the Stuart party started toward the Deer Lodge Valley, and on Benetsee Creek (Gold Creek) they sank a shaft and found color. But it was not until 1862 that the party was able to assemble enough equipment to work their claim, around which the settlement of American Fork developed. And although about 60 people were here by 1862, the Stuart discovery did not cause a rush and it is believed that most of those who came were on their way to the Salmon River country of Idaho.

It was in July, 1862, that the first real strike came. John White and a small party was searching for a pass over the Continental Divide, intending to go to the Salmon River country. Prospecting every stream they came to, they made a strike along Grasshopper Creek, a tributary of the Beaverhead River. The news spread like wildfire, and many who were headed elsewhere changed directions. By late fall it was apparent that the discovery was of major proportion, and a special train was sent to Salt Lake City for supplies. The town of Bannack was laid out, and by the spring of 1863 there were nearly a thousand inhabitants, the tents of the first prospectors rapidly giving way to log and clapboard buildings. The usual quota of riffraff followed the miners into Bannack, but the first solid mining citizens soon brought some semblance of order, and this became Montana's first territorial capital, its government based mainly on miner's laws. Nearly $5 million worth of gold was to come from Grasshopper Gulch.

Meanwhile, early in 1863, a party of six men left Bannack, intending to join James Stuart in prospecting the Yellowstone and Big Horn. In the party were Bill Fairweather, Henry Edgar, Tom Coover, Barney Hughes, Mike Sweeney, and Harry Rodgers. In an effort to elude a party of Crow Indians, the men decided to return to Bannack by way of the Madison. On the evening of May 26, they made camp on a small creek which flowed into the Stinking Water River. Fairweather and Edgar, left in camp to guard the horses, decided to prospect an outcropping along the creek, and fabulous Alder Gulch was found, the men naming it from a growth of alder trees in the area. Upon their return to Bannack to buy supplies with the gold dust they had found, the men tried without success to keep their secret. When the crowds pressed upon them, the discoverers called a meeting, and when it was agreed that their prior claims would be respected, they led the crowd to the creek. Without thought to permanence or order, Virginia City, Nevada City, Circle City and Central City sprouted and by late 1863 there were probably 6,000 men digging in Alder Gulch.

Always on the alert for new prospects in other gulches, some miners began leaving Alder Gulch in the winter of 1863 when they heard of new strikes on the Kootenai River. Four such men, who were to become known as the Four Georgians, answered the siren call. They were John Cowan, D. J. Miller, Reginald Stanley and John Crab. Making their way to Hell Gate on the Clark Fork, they met disappointed men who had just come from the Kootenai. The four decided to try their luck on the Marias instead, and on their way north they made a few passes at the waters of Prickly Pear Creek. They found some color, but moved on toward the Marias with barely a pause. Running into continued bad luck, the four began thinking about their "last chance". They were getting low on supplies and almost ready to give up when they again saw the Prickly Pear. It was on July 14, 1864, that enough colors were found to justify sending Cowan to Alder Gulch for supplies. As usual, he was followed back to the diggings by a horde of gold-seekers. The settlement of Last Chance Gulch was established, and the territory had its future capital.
